Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Board has under constant review the possible economic effects on Canada of various modes of oil transportation. I think I have indicated to the House previously that from the standpoint of the cost of moving northern oil from Prudhoe Bay or northern parts of Canada, if found, to the Chicago area, some 30 cents per barrel could be saved by Canadian movement rather than by Alaskan tanker movement.

APPLICATIONS TO ENERGY BOARD TO CONSTRUCT CONNECTING LINES BETWEEN BRITISH COLUMBIA AND STATE OF WASHINGTON

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether there are any applications before the National Energy Board at this time for construction of any increased capacity for oil or gas pipelines in an intertie between British Columbia and the refinery at Cherry Point in the state of Washington close to the Canadian border?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any specific applications to the National Energy Board. When the board sits in its capacity to hear applications, it sits in a quasi-judicial capacity, and thus is an independent entity, for that purpose. I shall be glad to make inquiries of the board on the specific question asked by the hon. member and let him know whether any such applications have been made.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Is consideration being given by the government to preparing a reference to the International Joint Commission on the subject of the TAPS plan?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge no such consideration is under surveillance at the present time. The International Joint Commission, of course, is under the responsibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I cannot tell what action would be planned after the Washington meetings, but at the present time I do not believe there is such an intention.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the minister used the word "surveillance" did he mean that he is afraid of being bugged too?

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize a last supplementary on this subject from the hon. member for Hillsborough and will then recognize the hon. member for Saint-Denis.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): A supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In light of the statement by the Minister of Public Works that Canada should scarcely criticize the western oil tanker route, can the Acting Prime Minister tell me which of the several and varying ministerial viewpoints the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be reflecting on May 3, when he talks to the Americans?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs will reflect the viewpoint of the government.

An hon. Member: What is that?

1915 ARMENIAN MASSACRE—REQUEST THAT DEPARTMENTAL REPRESENTATIVE MEET DELEGATION

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Tomorrow, April 24, the Armenian community of Canada will commemorate with a great peaceful march on Parliament Hill the slaughter of more than 1,500,000 Armenians. Would the Acting Prime Minister say whether a representative of the Department of External Affairs will greet the delegation?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. As far as I am aware, it is not the intention that any member of the government will meet with this delegation which will be on Parliament Hill tomorrow, though we do recall the tragic events to which this demonstration is related.

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN PROCEEDINGS BEFORE SUPREME COURT RESPECTING VALIDITY OF PROVINCIAL REGULATIONS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the increasing severity of the interprovincial restrictions on agricultural trade and the government's view that they will be disposed of by Bill C-176. Can the minister advise whether it is the intention of the government to instruct counsel to appear at the proceedings now coming before the Supreme Court of Canada, in order to oppose the validity of the provincial regulations which have given rise to this very serious situation?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will consider that very interesting suggestion and discuss it with the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Baldwin: In taking it into consideration, will the minister bear in mind that it is the understanding that the case will be before the Supreme Court of Canada very shortly and if the government is going to intervene it should make up its mind to do so at once and instruct counsel accordingly?

POINT ROBERTS REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—PROPOSAL OF PARK BY CANADA

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Having in mind the statement made yesterday by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry indicating a reference of the status of Point Roberts to the International Joint Commission, may I ask whether, in that connection, it will be Canada's intention to propose the creation of an international park at Point Roberts? This is a question of great interest in British Columbia.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge no decision has been taken by the government to make such a proposal, but I will be happy to draw the representation of the hon. member to the attention of the minister who can reply in further detail, if necessary.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

QUEBEC REPRESENTATIONS CONCERNING BILL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROVINCIAL OBJECTIONS PRIOR TO COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of Labour but in his absence I shall direct it to his parliamentary secretary. Since we will be dealing with the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act in the near future and as it is necessary for the committee to be apprised and aware of all objections by the provinces, if there are any, can the parliamentary secretary advise the House whether there have been further representations from the province of Quebec regarding any inadequacies or injustices within the present bill?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member no doubt is aware, a series of important conversations have taken place between the Minister of Labour and the provincial Ministers of Labour this week. I will transmit to the Minister of Labour the concern expressed in the House this morning by the hon. member.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to know that the parliamentary secretary will register my concern. Can the parliamentary secretary assure the House that before we deal with this bill in committee in a definitive way the minister will make a statement regarding the objections, submissions and representations made to him about the bill so that the committee will be aware of the specific problems being faced by the provinces? Can he assure the House that a statement will be made on motions before we deal further with this bill?

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, now that the measure has been given such substantial support by all members of the House—

Mr. Alexander: Could the parliamentary secretary not answer the question?

Mr. Perrault: —we are moving to the committee stage. At that point a full opportunity will be given to cross-examine the minister on these important points which have been raised. It is not the intention of the minister to avoid any possible problems that may arise. Matters are proceeding very well indeed.

Mr. Baldwin: Which way are you moving, forward or backward?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I quite appreciate the parliamentary secretary's answer although I accept it in the spirit in which it was given. I am asking the parliamentary secretary whether, on behalf of the minister, he can assure the House that a statement will be made regarding the positions taken by any provinces which have found objections within the bill. It is a simple question. Will a statement be made on motions before we deal with the bill?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary might reply to the question briefly, but it seems to me that the hon. member has reiterated very forcefully the question that was asked initially.

Mr. Alexander: I have not been given an answer and I want an answer.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, I can only say that this measure is proceeding in a spirit of co-operative federalism and it may be expected that such a statement will be made.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether—if the government should persist in wanting to implement this act which will cost Quebec some $20 million—the government would intend to adopt compensation measures to allow that province, which already has a deficit in that field, to collect funds through other means?

[English]

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the hon. member that he attend the meetings of the committee so that he may direct his questions at that time to the minister.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we are in a way anticipating an order of the day. As the parliamentary secretary has indicated and as hon. members realize, we are dealing with a bill which is still before the House under consideration. The question asked originally by the hon. member for Hamilton West as to whether a statement would be made on motions was quite in order, but I do not think the matter should be pursued.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

In reply, the parliamentary secretary invited me to attend the meetings of the committee. If the bill were passed, parliament would finally have to commit itself with regard to it and I am trying to avoid that in order for the government to express its views.

Mr. Speaker: The point of order is not founded.

FLOODS

MANITOBA-NORTH DAKOTA BORDER—ALLEGATIONS OF ACTS OF HOSTILITY BY CANADIANS—DISCUSSION OF PROPOSED DAM

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister of which I have given him notice. It concerns flooding along the American side of the border in North Dakota and on the Canadian side in Manitoba. Have there been any formal complaints from the United States government based on charges by North Dakotans that, as a certain congressman has stated, there have been acts of hostility on the part of the neighbouring Manitobans north of the forty-ninth parallel?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to study this question as fully as I would have liked since I received the notice, but I have no information that would support the hon. member's inference.

Mr. Murta: A supplementary question. For some time now there have been discussions about the proposed Pembillier dam that would control flooding and provide irrigation along the Canadian and American sectors of the international border. Is any action now being contemplated by the federal government to reintroduce discussions on this very important matter?

Mr. MacEachen: As I understand the situation, Mr. Speaker, it is under active surveillance and discussions will likely take place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

RAPESEED—OBJECTIONS BY OTHER COUNTRIES TO POSSIBLE CLOSING OF FUTURES MARKET AND INCLUSION UNDER WHEAT BOARD

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister who reports for the wheat board. It is in connection with rapeseed to which reference has been made during the last couple of days. Is the minister aware of the fact that in Holland, Japan and Germany, where there are large purchasers of rapeseed, strong objections have been taken to closing the futures market? Indeed, the indication is that it would strike a tremendous blow against the expansion of rapeseed production in Canada.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly aware of quite a bit of conversation about the rapeseed market and the futures market, probably based, of course, on an earlier erroneous report that there was an immediate move afoot to make a change with regard to the marketing of rapeseed and several other grains. I presume, with the clarification that no such change is being made and that the futures market is in no way interfered with, that any such concern should be allayed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have before me a number of cables that I received today expressing fears for our rapeseed markets along the lines I have indicated. Because of the uncertainty of the government's attitude in producing a bill with an amendment permitting the Wheat Board to have control over three types of seed grains, will the minister consider holding up the bill until an opportunity is available to the government and to the House of Commons in committee to hear the representations, because what is included in the bill is a threat that concerns these purchasers?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any threat contained in the bill and that has been a cause of concern. There has been concern based on an erroneous report. I think it has been allayed by the assurance I have given that no change will be made without the fullest consultation. Indeed, I am glad to say again that certainly on our part we have no intention of making any change without the very fullest support of the producers and consultations with the trade.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says he has no intention of making any change without consultation. Then why bring in a bill to permit the board to do the thing that he says they are not going to do?

Mr. Lang: This question will no doubt be discussed when the bill is before the House, Mr. Speaker. There are a number of reasons for doing this which I will be glad to explain at that time. Over the years there have been fairly strong representations on this subject from producer organizations. The oilseed marketing committee recommended a plebiscite in order to determine this issue. Further work is being done on the whole aspect of the issue. The issue is very complicated. In my opinion, the existing system is working very well, far better than the producers may understand.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why ruin it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF INCREASE IN GASOLINE PRICES IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the minister's department investigating the recent increases in gasoline prices in British Columbia and are these increases justified and generally applicable in all of Canada west of the Ottawa river?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker there have been quite a number of gasoline and fuel oil price increases, most of which, if not all, are being investigated by the Prices and Incomes Commission. I believe the particular price increases referred to by the hon. member are in that category.

Mr. Harding: Are the increases in the west caused by the increase in price of oil east of the Ottawa river? Imported Venezuelan oil has jumped rather sharply. There might be a reason there for an increase in gasoline prices, but does the same apply to the western part of Canada?

Mr. Basford: The purpose of an inquiry is to determine the reason for something. That is why we are having an inquiry.

NATIONAL PARKS

BONNE BAY—PARTICIPATION OF CITIZENS IN PLANNING THROUGH PUBLIC HEARINGS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is it the intention of the minister to hold public hearings in Newfoundland with interested citizens and authorities to permit them to participate and advise on the progressive planning of the national park at Bonne Bay?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have formulated a policy along those lines, and public hearings are being held where can be heard those who wish to make representations concerning the preparation of future parks.

In so far as the new parks are concerned, the problem is naturally a little more complicated since we must take into account the wish of citizens to proceed quickly. It is obvious that consultations like those requested by the hon. member could cause considerable delays. However, we can consider the possibility of having one for Bonne Bay.

NOVA SCOTIA—PROVINCIAL REQUEST FOR SURVEY OF SITE FOR THIRD PARK

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Will the minister indicate to the House whether he has received a request from the government of the province of Nova Scotia to undertake a survey of the area between Joggins and Apple River in Cumberland county as the site for a third national park in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply to the hon. member's question. In the past I have expressed reservations about questions being asked during the question period regarding the possibility of national parks in the many constituencies across the country. I suggest to hon. members that this kind of question should normally be put on the order paper. All hon. members have an interest in the possibility of national parks in their constituencies. We might spend most of the question period every day asking whether national parks will be established in hon. members' constituencies, including Stormont-Dundas.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: For the moment, the minister will be allowed to reply to the question.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): I am very happy to confirm the fact that the national parks of Canada are very popular indeed. In reply to the question asked by the hon. member, I do not know of any request by the provincial government with regard to a survey. We are having discussions with the Nova Scotia government with regard to establishing a third national park in that province, but I cannot state the nature of those conversations at this time.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): My question is for the Solicitor General. WHEAT—AVAILABILITY OF TRANSITIONAL PAYMENTS TO FARMERS PRIOR TO PASSAGE OF STABILIZATION LEGISLATION

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Having regard to the serious cash shortage in the western agricultural economy at the present time, will the government give immediate consideration to and implementation of suggestions that the contemplated $100 million acreage payment be made available to western farmers prior to the passing of the government's agricultural stabilization legislation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): We shall require legislative approval for the payment of the $100 million. I hope this may be given fairly soon in order that the money may get into the farmers' hands as early as possible.

RAPESEED—PRODUCERS' VOTE ON METHOD OF MARKETING

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the question which was posed by my right hon. friend from Prince Albert and ask the minister responsible for the Wheat Board whether he can assure the House that a producer vote will be taken with respect to the inclusion of rapeseed under the Canadian Wheat Board and that action will not be taken merely on the basis of requests from large grain companies and farm organizations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I should like to assure hon. members that when I spoke of full producer support I was talking about the broad category of individual producers, not of any specific way of determining their consent. The question of a specific vote is a very complicated one; it involves, somehow, trying to identify the group concerned and the voting system, and I would not wish to commit myself to the support of a particular technique at this stage.

KINGSTON—ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY INTO RIOT

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montréal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General.

Could he say whether he intends to appoint a board of inquiry into the recent disorders at Kingston penitentiary or if such a board has already been set up?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to announce that the Commissioner of Penitentiaries has created a board of inquiry on the events which took place at Kingston penitentiary on April 14 to 18. Mr. J. William Swackhamer, Q.C., a lawyer from Toronto, has been appointed chairman of this board. Other members are Mr. W. T. McGrath, executive director of the Canadian Criminology and Corrections Association, and Mr. H. E. Popp, director of security, Canadian Penitentiary Service. Mr. Ian G. Scott, a Toronto barrister, will act as secretary and adviser.

I asked that the Board report to me at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Trudel: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Will this Board consider the matter which was raised a short while ago with respect to the possibility of granting some sort of compensation to the guards who were kept as hostages?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the Board will have to stick to its terms of reference and I doubt that these will allow the Board to consider this matter.

RECREATIONAL INTEREST OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS IN NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC AND NORTHERN ONTARIO

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development responsible for parks and recreational places.

For some time, now, American citizens have taken a tremendous interest in the abandoned lands of northwestern Quebec and northern Ontario, and especially in recreational areas. I would like to ask the minister if he has been in touch with provincial authorities and some citizens who have expressed concern over this invasion by American interests.

[Mr. Lang.]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for raising this problem. I have not had any discussion concerning northern Ontario and northwestern Quebec with the authorities involved, but I shall look into the matter and see what can be done about it. This is a problem which is to be found practically everywhere, especially as regards Atlantic and Pacific beaches, and we are trying to do our best so that this land should remain in Canadian hands.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

REQUEST BY HIGH SCHOOL CLASS FOR EXPLANATION OF FEDERAL GRANT IN LIGHT OF NET INCOME

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It comes from a senior high school class at Killarney High School in my riding. These pupils have been studying the 1970 report of the Canadian Pacific Railway and they note that the company received a grant of $33.1 million as a normal payment from the federal government. They also note that the net income—

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member should ask her question. Up to this point I greatly suspect that it may not be a question which should be asked now. In any event, the hon. member should ask her question soon.

Mrs. MacInnis: I am coming right to it, Mr. Speaker. They note that the net income for 1970 was $55,772,000. They want to know—I do not know the answer and that is why I am putting the question now—whether the minister would explain the reason for such a grant to a company with so favourable an earnings statement?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member will appreciate, I am sure, that such a question is not in order. It is an interesting one, but normally it should be placed on the order paper.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED CONFUSION CAUSED BY NEW POSTAL ZONING POLICY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the minister responsible for the Post Office and it arises from a growing number of complaints about the confusion created by the new postal zoning policy because of the odd mixture of numerals and letters. Has the hon. gentleman any advice to offer whereby this difficulty can be resolved?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): I do not think that there is such confusion with the new postal code system, which is not a zoning system. If there are special cases, I should like to study them and see whether changes should be made. Up to now, it seems to me that everything is running smoothly.

[Later:]
[English]

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): I have a supplementary question for the minister responsible for the Post Office. Was it absolutely necessary to compose the individual postal codes from a mixture of letters and numerals when it is commonly known that straight numerals are easier to remember?

An hon. Member: Oh, I don't know about that.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is clearly debate or argument. I suggest to the hon. member that the question is not in order.

AGRICULTURE

USE OF IMPORTS AS PRICE REGULATOR GOVERNING DOMESTIC PRODUCTION

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister give the House the assurance that the government will not use the importation of agricultural products as a price regulator governing future domestic production?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The implications of that question are far wider than can be covered in a reply during the question period, Mr. Speaker. I would need further definition of what the connotation of some of the words used might be.

ONTARIO—DUMPING AND FREE DISTRIBUTION OF PRODUCE—REVIEW OF POLICY OR USE OF MARKETING BILL TO CORRECT SITUATION

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since Ontario farmers are in some cases dumping their produce and in other cases distributing their produce free in order to direct public attention to the lack of adequate returns to food producers, may I ask whether the government is reviewing its basic agriculture policy or whether it intends to continue to rely on Bill C-176 as the main instrument to correct this hardship?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I am not sure there is any relationship between Bill C-176 and some of the practices referred to. I might say I do not believe this dumping or free distribution is going on in a significant way. There are some local quota problems, and we certainly want to look into them.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have another 30 seconds in which to correct an answer I gave yesterday?

Mr. Speaker: It could be done only with the unanimous consent of the House because the question period has expired. I suggest that the matter raised by the hon. member for Kent-Essex might be continued next week, but the minister needs the unanimous consent of the House to make a correction at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: Do it tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: There is not consent. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YUKON MINERALS ACT

ADMINISTRATION, ACQUISITION AND RECORDING OF CLAIMS, ETC.

The House resumed, from Thursday, April 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-187, respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, this debate has been proceeding now over the past several months and in order to refresh my memory I have been reviewing the Hansard report of the debate. Before commenting directly on some of the statements made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), I should like to point out that actually this discussion has been going on for much longer than the past several months. This is a subject that has been debated for a number of decades. For example, I can recall in the mid 1950's the then member for the Yukon, supporting the Liberal government of the day, was taking strong exception to the principle of the bill that is once more, in substance, before this House. He was speaking on behalf of the people he represented in the Yukon Territory. I refer to Mr. Aubrey Simmons, who so effectively dealt with the matter at that time that the bill was set aside. Now, once again it is reappearing today in much the same terms as the bill that was discussed during those controversial days in the mid 1950's.

As a former minister of the department—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has been looking pleadingly in the direction of the Chair for the last few minutes. I think the time has finally come to bring to the attention of the members of the House that the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) has the floor and is attempting to make a very interesting speech. Those who are interested in following his remarks, as they are anxious to do, are having some difficulty.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The grand exodus that follows the question period when Orders of the Day are called always creates a momentary disturbance. However, I feel the matter before the House is so important that I should put my introductory statement before the House, because it should be noted that this is not a piece of legislation that has suddenly emerged but rather one that has been under discussion for many years. It appeared once before and was strongly opposed, as I have said, by the then member for Yukon.

As I was saying when Your Honour so kindly intervened in order to assure the attention of the members of the House, this matter was under discussion when I had the privilege of having ministerial responsibility. The reason no action was taken at that time is precisely the reason that was put forward by the former member for Yukon and put forward once again by the present member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in very forceful and comprehensive terms. The Yukon is one of the old established areas of Canada, established even before the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta which came into Confederation in 1905. I think the minister is well aware, as a result of his many visits to the north, that because of the long traditions that exit in the Yukon and the growing desire for autonomy, before any initiative is taken in this matter that is going to be helpful it will be necessary to have extensive consultations with the responsible people in the north, including the Territorial Council. During the course of my remarks this morning I want to indicate, by quoting statements from residents of the territory including members of the Territorial Council, that this is still precisely the case.

In reviewing the introductory statements of the minister, let me say he has done a very excellent public relations job. The present administration is very long on PR and sometimes short on actual involvement. We have the phrase "participatory democracy" that has been one of the shibboleths of the present government. But if we are to have participatory democracy we really must get down to the grass roots and consult with the people most concerned. It has been said that there are politicians who are born great, have greatness thrust upon them, and achieve greatness; but in this modern age of PR many of the politicians achieve their position as a result of hiring capable press agents.

In the minister's statement to this House, he used the phrase that Bill C-187 is "the updating and modernizing of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act of 1924". He suggested that the changes were going to be minor, such as using a mound of stone rather than wooden staking posts, for example. That is quite logical because wood is scarce and stones are plentiful in the Yukon. Then, there is going to be the use of metallic tags and an increase in the number of claims allowed from 16 to 36. This is what is known as the "soft sell". The minister also makes the point that financial return to the Crown will be more generous than under the existing Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

I want to raise a point that appears at page 4000 of Hansard for March 5, a point that is a vital aspect of this debate and the real point of controversy. The minister is reported as saying:

> The bill not only provides for more efficient local management but also for some new measures to stimulate the mining industry which is already flourishing in the Yukon.

I am going to make that the text for my remarks this morning because that one sentence brings into focus the main area of controversy. Instead of providing for local management, the bill is placing more and more power in the hands of the bureaucracy. The new act provides for sweeping powers to be given to officials and the minister, and it is for this reason that there has been some strong protest from the Yukon Territory. The minister also talked about stimulating the mining industry, and then immediately used the contradictory phrase "which is already flourishing in the Yukon". If the mining industry is flourishing in the Yukon, why do we have to go through the exercise that has been initiated by the introduction of Bill C-187? The question of local autonomy or, to use the minister's phrase, "efficient local management", is the essence of the problem at the present time.

• (12 noon)

In the last two decades since the establishment of the Department of Northern Affairs in 1953, there has been a growing sentiment in favour of more local autonomy. A promise was made that by Canada's centennial year, 1967, a giant step would be taken toward local autonomy. That giant step was not taken, with the result that there have been increasing protests from the residents of the Yukon Territory. These protests initiated a report by Mr. Carrothers which went into the difficulties in some detail. The report has been made available to members of the House. I want to deal briefly, however, with a more recent confrontation on this problem which occurred when members of the Joint Parliamentary Committee on the Constitution of Canada were in the Yukon Territory last September. There, the Yukon Chamber of Mines appeared before the committee, represented by Mr. Dave Robertson. In this regard I should like to quote from the Whitehorse Star of September 17, 1970:

> What was described by one M.P. on the Senate Joint Committee as a "thorough and thoughtful brief" was presented Tuesday night at their first Whitehorse hearing, by Dave Robertson on behalf of the Yukon Chamber of Mines.
> During the first day of their Yukon visit, members of the committee had travelled to Dawson City and heard a number of speakers there, before flying back for an evening session in the Elks Hall here.

That refers to Whitehorse.

> The Chamber of Mines' brief sparked a two-hour discussion in which almost every Senator and Member of Parliament took part.

The essence of the brief was that members of the Yukon Chamber on Mines, as represented by Mr. Robertson, felt they had not been consulted fully concerning the bill which is before us at the present moment. Their protest was in the same terms as that presented by Mr. Simmons back in the 1950's and again by the present member for the Yukon at this time. Let me read further with regard to that brief:

> The Chamber of Mines brief, designed to be applicable to the development of all the Yukon's resources, summed up its recommendations in the following words:
> "The initial establishment of the administration of all regulations governing the resource industries to be located where direct contact with those persons developing the resources can be maintained, as in the provinces. The transfer of control of the resources, flexible and subject to other considerations.
> "Local involvement in legislation affecting the Territory and the development of its resources, by requiring the local government (the Territorial Council) to become involved in the legislative process affecting matters which would be the concern only of the Territorial Council of the Yukon had status equal to the provinces. This is no more than a right already enjoyed by 21 million Canadians.

That places the point clearly in focus in respect of the man who was representing the resource development industry in the Yukon Territoritory. If I may be a little more specific, one of the councillors elected in the latest elections in the Yukon last summer, Mr. Norman Chamberlist, also appeared before the committee and spoke in the following terms:

> Norman Chamberlist told the Committee they were sitting in an area "where 70 years of frustration and the worst type of colonial status" had existed. "Even in the crown colony of Hong Kong they have the power to administer their own affairs" he said.

And then in a further paragraph in the report in the Whitehorse Star, we find this:

> The councillor, recently re-elected for Whitehorse East, said the changes which appear to have been made in council set-up are really not improvements at all. Putting two elected members on the executive committee doesn't go far enough and is "just the icing on the cake" he said. He charged that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was building "a government within a government" to control more than 50 per cent of the land area of Canada.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think the point the hon. member is making is very interesting, but he is making it at the wrong time. Last fall we had legislation concerning the administration of the Yukon and the changes were discussed and debated in the House. They were approved by the House. Now, we are discussing a mineral bill which really does not concern the administration of the Yukon Territory. I believe the hon. member should confine his remarks to the bill itself, because we wish to have his enlightened views in respect of this bill and not in respect of the bill that was passed last year.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the minister, may I say I think perhaps he has overlooked the fact that the changes in the Yukon Act which passed trough the House recently had to do with the transfer of certain areas of jurisdiction to the territorial administration. Unlike most areas in Canada, the Yukon has a two-headed, jurisdictional monster, one head of which is the responsibility of the federal government in respect of the bill under discussion and another head in respect of which the jurisdictional responsibility has been transferred to the territorial administration to which the minister is referring. Therefore, I believe the hon. member who has the floor is perfectly in order in referring to these federal aspects of the administation of the Yukon Territory.

Mr. Speaker: The point raised by the minister is one of interest. The argument by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) appears to be reasonable, but it is difficult for the Chair, without looking into all the details of the act much more closely, to determine whether the hon. member who now has the floor is going beyond the limit of the bill itself. That hon. member, who is one of the senior members of the House, knows the rules much better than the Speaker, and he realizes that he must limit his contribution in the debate to what is before the House, which is the second reading of the bill. I might add that he knows much better than the Speaker what is in the bill, and I am sure he would not want to take advantage of the situation to discuss at this time matters which do not fall within the scope of the bill which is now under consideration.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for those enlightening words. Perhaps because of all the noise which prevailed when the debate began today, the minister did not catch my point. I am emphasizing the fundamental problem that arises in connection with legislating for the Yukon Territory. The minister makes the point that it is the responsibility of the federal government. This is the reason we have such a strong protest from the people of the Yukon. They want to have move of this responsibility in their hands. I was quoting from responsible leaders of the Yukon who underlined this point. Now, I should like to quote from the minister himself. I refer to a press release of February 27, 1971 from his department. The following appears on page two of that release:

> Regarding the Yukon Minerals Act, Mr. Chrétien said that recent discussions in Whitehorse by officials of his department and representatives of the mining industry and the Yukon Legislative Council had resulted in a very meaningful exchange of ideas.

The phrase "a meaningful exchange of ideas" means that there was a good deal of heated controversy. In the world of semantics, that is the interpretation which one can always make at. The press release continues:

> He also said that he had been persuaded that further consideration should be given to some modification of the deductions allowable for royalty purposes. "While I know the reasons for concern about the Canadian participation provisions," the Minister said, "I feel that activity in oil and gas exploration in the North and in mining in the Northwest Territories, where similar provisions apply, indicates that the concerns are over emphasized."

Obviously, there is real static arising from the territory. I know, as a former minister, that this is the case when Ottawa arbitrarily intrudes into areas of responsibilities that should, at this late date, devolve upon the local people. The minister referred to "efficient local management". That is the first point I want to make, the necessity of consultation. The minister, I am sure, is aware of that point.

I should now like to deal briefly with another major issue, that is the application of the Canadian mining regulations to the Yukon territory. These were introduced to the Northwest Territories in 1961 and provide, as hon. members know, for Canadian participation in companies incorporated in Canada, and the listing of shares on the Canadian stock exchange at the production stage of resource development. There is no application of these regulations at the exploration or the lease stage of resource location and exploration.

The reason that these regulations were not applied to the Yukon territory in 1961 is precisely that there was no local agreement from the Yukon chamber of mines nor from the Yukon Territorial Council for the very good reason that they had an established industry. They had these traditions and they had a record of efficient management of resources over half a century. The minister himself acknowledged this when he used the phrase "the mining industry which is already flourishing in the Yukon". If it is already flourishing, why aggravate the situation, as the proposed new bill does? It is true that there has been an upsurge in the Northwest Territories since 1961, but this is more related to developments such as the Pine Point railway, which was to open the Pine Point mining operation, a project which was opposed by the Liberal opposition of the day. The upsurge has nothing to do with the Canadian mining regulations. The opening of the Pine Point mine was directly connected with the construction of the Pine Point railway by the former Conservative government.

The same applies to the exploration activity in the high Arctic with respect to oil. This is directly related to the well that was drilled on Melville Island in 1961, promoted by Dome Petroleum and a consortium of minor Canadian oil companies which took this tremendous risk of going into the high Arctic in the winter of 1961-62 and drilling an exploratory well. It is called a wildcat well because, I suppose, it was really a wildcat operation which paved the way for the present interest which is going forward under the auspices of Panarctic. Panarctic is a consortium of government and private companies, much on the same basis as the initial operation in 1961.

I should like to revert to what this will mean in terms of development in the Yukon. The same principle applies in the Yukon as in the Northwest Territories. During the 1960's there has been an upsurge of production from $13 million to $80 million. This is largely based on the development of the asbestos mine at Clinton Creek, the New Imperial mine on the outskirts of Whitehorse, and on the Anvil mine which came into production just over a year ago. But again, these operations are related more to the development programs that were carried out in the latter 50's and 60's than to any change in the legislation. There was no change in the legislation. The New Imperial mine was made possible by capital investment from Japan, and the Anvil mine is a consortium of Canadian, Japanese, German and British interests. All these projects were made possible by the Roads to Resources program that took place in the latter 50's and 60's. In other words, progress has been based on infrastructure rather than legislative manipulation.

I notice that the minister made an announcement recently that the Dempster highway is proceeding to connect the Yukon territory to the Mackenzie delta. The Mackenzie highway was under way in the early 1960's and was stopped by the Liberal government when it came to power in 1963. Instead of a new development, it is the resurrection of an aborted development that was under way and should now be completed. It is being revised now because the growing mining activity in the Yukon and right through to the Mackenzie delta has made it absolutely necessary to proceed with this project. A railroad will have to be developed also if we are going to bring in the rich iron ore deposits that were located by the Crest Explorations people on the Arctic circle. There are special development problems in the north. These areas are remote from markets; there are special transportation problems, so the costs are 25 per cent to 30 per cent higher. All these matters have to be taken into consideration. We have to listen to the voice of the local people if we are really going to deal with these problems by legislative action.

There is one other matter that I should like to bring into focus, and which I consider to be fundamental. The minister says that he wants efficient local management. This involves giving some consideration to the aboriginal rights of the native people of the Yukon. The minister, because of his failure to consult with Indians and with Eskimos, the aboriginal people of this country, has run into difficulty. He has also encountered difficulty in the national parks because he has failed to consult the local people concerned. I would refer him to the present controversy that is going on in Riding Mountain where the government has decided to close down a roller-rink which has provided positive recreational activities for many years. At a time when the government is providing $15 million for the Opportunities for Youth program, it phases out this program. The department is also phasing out church camps at a time when we need to expand summer opportunities for youth rather than to contract them.

The same problem has arisen with our aboriginal people because of failure to consult. The minister recently made a speech in this connection, as reported in the Globe and Mail of March 24, 1971, as follows:

"The government does not intend to force progress along the directions set out in the policy proposals of June 1969. The future direction will be that which emerges in meetings between the government and Indian representatives and people,"—

This is good, commonsense even though it comes belatedly. The article goes on:

—he said in a lecture sponsored by the Dunning Trust Lectures Committee.

Later in the speech, he referred to the "now defunct policy proposals."

In other words, he has backed down completely on the famous or the infamous Indian white paper in 1969. The response to this white paper was the publication of the Red Paper by the Indian people of Canada. This is something that must be taken into consideration when dealing with this bill. For this reason, I would like to move an amendment:

That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this Bill be not now read a second time but that it be resolved that in the opinion of this House the terms and conditions agreed to by resolution of this House and recorded in the Journals for 1867 that, upon transfer of the Territory to Canada and upon grant to Parliament of authority to legislate for the welfare and good government of the Territory, the claims of the Indian tribes in the Territory to compensation for lands required for purposes of settlement 'will be considered and settled in conformity with the equitable principles which uniformly governed the British Crown in its dealings with the aborigines' be implemented as a prior condition to the enactment of any further legislation concerning the sale of mineral rights in the lands of the Yukon Territory."

I move this amendment at this time, Mr. Speaker, because in the same article the minister was reported as follows:

Mr. Chrétien said flatly that the government will not renegotiate any treaties. It would become, he said, a never-ending process.

"What will be the situation in 100 years where the Indians of the day will say that the people who dealt with Chrétien were crazy to make that kind of deal? We are smarter than that," he said.

"That will never finish. So we say we will respect the treaties and uphold the treaty rights so they can share in the advantages and responsibilities of the Canadian society."

The matter goes further in the Yukon because the aboriginal peoples there do not have treaty rights, and if justice is to be done under the terms of the 1867 resolution this will mean that the present government will have to negotiate in terms of the amendment I have put before the House.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the amendment to the House I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that the Chair has some doubts as to the procedural validity of the motion as put by the hon. member. Briefly, and perhaps this will help hon. members who may want to advise the Chair, it seems to me that this amendment is, in effect, a substantive motion. It is not a reasoned amendment because it does not oppose the principle of the bill. Further, the amendment attaches a condition to the motion for second reading. The amendment clearly states that it attaches a condition, and there are many precedents which say that such an amendment cannot be moved on second reading.

I thought it might be helpful to hon. members, who may wish to argue in support of or in opposition to the regularity of the amendment, if I were to indicate my reservations. Of course, I would be grateful to hon. members who wish to indicate how the Chair might be guided in making a decision, or making a ruling on the acceptability of the proposed amendment.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take up the time of the House but I do wish to make exactly the same point as Your Honour has made. Really, this amendment is not related to the bill at all. It relates to a different problem, a problem of a different nature. The bill that we have before the House is a measure dealing with the administration of minerals in the Yukon, and ways and means of making sure that this mineral development will be achieved for the benefit of all. The amendment is related to a completely different problem. I recognize that it is a problem, but this is not the time to raise that problem. In terms of the specifics of the rules this is the only point I wish to make, but I think some other hon. members on the government side wish to raise other arguments in terms of the procedural aspect of the question.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief but I would submit that the proposed amendment offends the rule governing relevancy, as the minister has just suggested. In the second place, it does in fact clearly establish a condition precedent to the enactment, not only of this legislation but of any other contemplated legislation dealing with this question. This type of condition precedent is doubly repugnant. In the first place, it is repugnant because it is a condition precedent. In the second place, it is repugnant because it is not only a condition precedent to this measure but to any measure dealing with the sale of mineral rights in the lands of the Yukon Territory. There is precedent to indicate that amendments which propose to interfere not only with the passage of the contemplated legislation but with other legislation as well are repugnant.

I would submit that this amendment seems to raise an entirely new question outside the terms of this legislation altogether. But what troubles me the most about it, Mr. Speaker, is that it not only is a condition precedent to the passage of the legislation, but I wonder when Your Honour will be able to decide that such a condition had been fulfilled. The condition, in the terms of the amendment, says that prior to proceeding with this legislation, or the passage of any other legislation dealing with mineral rights in the lands of the Yukon Territory, a resolution enshrined in the Journals of 1867, dealing with fair treatment of Indians and their claims, must be implemented.

The question is, Mr. Speaker, when do we determine that a resolution, such as that referred to in the amendment, which stands on the books of this House and stipulates that we must have fair dealings with the Indian tribes in the territory, has been implemented? When do we arrive at the point when we say that this House has implemented such a resolution which calls upon us to be fair in our dealings with Indians and to compensate them for lands acquired in the Yukon Territory?

I submit that this amendment does not appear to be opposed to the principle of the bill, but rather refers to in general to fair dealing. Since it is not opposed to the principle of the bill, it should be ruled out of order. I submit that it is not relevant to the provisions of the bill and should be ruled out of order. I submit it raises a new condition, Mr. Speaker, and in imposing a condition precedent, not only to the passage of this legislation but to the passage of any other legislation dealing with this question, it should be ruled out of order. Furthermore, the condition precedent is impossible of fulfilment. For these reasons, I submit that Your Honour should rule the amendment out of order.

Mr. Barnett: The parliamentary secretary has placed before Your Honour two questions, one dealing with a matter of fact and the other dealing with a matter of the relevancy of the amendment to the bill.

I would submit with regard to the matter of fact that the question of whether or not the terms of an earlier resolution of the House have, or have not, been implemented would rest within the judgment of the House rather than being considered a procedural matter for Your Honour to decide. I feel that this is the obvious answer to that particular question which was raised by the parliamentary secretary, and I would submit that particular question is therefore irrelevant to the discussion of whether or not the amendment is in order.

I should like now to consider the question of whether or not the amendment is relevant to the bill. In view of a remark Your Honour made earlier to the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) that perhaps he might have more acquaintance with the details of the bill than Your Honour had an opportunity of acquiring, might I point out that Part II of the bill deals with the acquisition and recording of mineral claims in the lands of the Yukon Territory. In that Part, there are specific proposals that certain lands may or may not be acquired for this purpose. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if the question of relevancy is being raised, the principle of the amendment is on all fours with the basic principle of the bill. The bill deals with the acquisition and recording of claims or, to put it in reverse language, with the sale of mineral rights in the Yukon. It is quite within the ambit of the discussion of the basic principle of this bill for this House to have an opportunity of declaring itself on whether the terms and conditions with respect to the acquisition of these claims should be determined in light of the previous action of this House which is mentioned in the amendment.

I would therefore submit that, in substance, the amendment is on all fours and lies within the ambit of the basic principle of the bill.

Mr. Baldwin: I just arrived in time to hear the golden words of wisdom falling from Your Honour—

Mr. Greene: That will do you no good.

Mr. Baldwin: The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has obviously been attempting to use the same steps without any success.

As I heard Your Honour, you indicated the doubts you have and indicated what should be the practice with regard to amendments of this type. In response to the hon. parliamentary secretary, I would say that as usual the government approached this with a simple childlike faith that all things must be in order and in strict accordance with what has been done in the past so far as the form of amendments is concerned. If there is any deviation at all—and I use the word in its very best sense, Mr. Speaker—ministers, parliamentary secretaries and others are shocked and horrified. They say that it cannot be done because, although the principle and the idea is the same, a form of wording is used which they do not understand.

As I understand the practice it is very simple. No amendment can be moved, the objective of which could be achieved in the same way by voting against the measure. That leaves it to the ingenuity of those who see some value in the motion being considered by this House, but whose appreciation of that value is diminished by the fact that there should be some other principle expressed by the House. This principle need not necessarily be repugnant to the measure which the House is considering but should at least be at variance with it. Hon. members are then saying, "While we would like to vote for the passage of this bill, and while we do not want to vote against it, we would ask the House to adopt a principle which is somewhat different and which involves an acceptance of a fact which would otherwise be neglected by the passage of the original motion to adopt the bill for second reading."

[Mr. Barnett.]

I think this is the effect of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). He is saying, "We do not want the bill read a second time," but suggests this House resolves that it accepts a principle which the House a great many years ago had apparently adopted. With the adoption of that principle by the House, then we are inclined to say that the bill may have second reading. However, without the adoption of the measure contained in the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, we are not so inclined.

At this time hon. members find themselves in a quandary. Do we vote against second reading of the bill or do we vote for it? We say we suspend our decision on that until the House has dealt with this amendment which contains a principle not contrary to but at variance with the original bill which the House is considering.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the effect of the amendment moved by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) is to propose that Bill C-187 be not now read a second time but that the House proceed to resolve that the claims of the Indian tribes in the Yukon Territory "be considered and settled in conformity", and so on, as the resolution reads.

In my submission, Mr. Speaker, this practice follows the authority of May's Seventeenth Edition, pages 526 and 527 under the heading "Reasoned Amendment" at the foot of page 526, and I quote:

> It is also competent for a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a bill, to move what is known as a "reasoned amendment." This amendment is to leave out all the words in the main question after the word "that" and to add other words; and the question proposed upon the amendment is, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question.

Under the first subparagraph of that citation, Mr. Speaker, appear these words:

> It may be declatory—

That is the amendment.

> —of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy or provisions of the bill.

In my submission that effectively disposes of the submission of the parliamentary secretary that such an amendment cannot be adverse to the principle of the bill, even if the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) was right in restricting the effect of the amendment to the expression of a variance with the principle of the bill. May goes on further and stipulates that such an amendment may be declaratory of some principle adverse to or differing from the principle of the bill.

The same conclusion is reached if one refers to Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, page 168, paragraph 201, which reads:

> The object of an amendment may be to effect such an alteration in a question as will obtain the support of those who, without such alteration, must either vote against it or abstain from voting thereon, or to present to the House an alternative proposition either wholly or partially opposed to the original question. This may be effected by moving to omit all the words of the question after the first word, "That", and to substitute in their place other words of a different import.

I draw Your Honour's attention to the closing words of that sentence, "and to substitute in their place other words of a different import".

I should like also to draw Your Honour's attention to a publication which was put together by one of the respected officers of this House, Dr. Ollivier. It is entitled "British North America Acts and Selected Statutes, 1867-1962" At page 92 of that publication is set forth a section of the British North America Act which I shall read:

109. All lands, mines, minerals, and royalties belonging to the several provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick at the union, and all sums then due or payable for such lands, mines, minerals, or royalties, shall belong to the several provinces of Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick in which the same are situate or arise—

And here are the words which I wish to draw to your attention:

—subject to any trusts existing in respect thereof, and to any interest other than that of the province in the same.

It is my submission, Your Honour, that the legislation with which this bill purports to deal is subject to a trust which is recorded in the Journals of this House of 1867. Therefore, the amendment properly deals with a reference to our Journals and purports by its wording to have the Parliament of Canada proceed, subject to the trusts by which it is bound, as recorded in its own Journals. I therefore submit, Mr. Speaker, that I have dealt effectively with both points raised by the parliamentary secretary with the authorities that I have cited and I urge Your Honour to accept the amendment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with apologies to my friend, George Bain, perhaps I might say a few words on this point of order. I think it must be accepted that reasoned amendments always create difficulties for those who draft them, for those who speak to their procedural validity, and for the Chair. I might also say that I have frequently been surprised both ways. Sometimes reasoned amendments that I thought were clearly out of order have been accepted; and, on occasion, the reverse has happened.

Your Honour has indicated that you have some doubts about this. I think, therefore, that that gives us the right to try to resolve those doubts and to suggest that this can be done. One of the arguments that has been advanced—indeed, Your Honour suggested it from the Chair—is that this amendment in its very language lays down a prior condition and, therefore, that it should be ruled out of order. I know that that has been a reason in the past for ruling out of order some reasoned amendments; yet I suggest that it is hard to get around Citation 382 in Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, which is a condensation of the citation that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) just read from May's Seventeenth Edition. Precisely because it is a condensation I might, perhaps, be permitted to read it:

It is also competent to a member who desires to place on record any special reasons for not agreeing to the second reading of a Bill, to move as an amendment to the question, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to, or differing from, the principles, policy, or provisions of the bill, or expressing opinions as to any circumstances connected with its introduction, or prosecution; or otherwise opposed to its progress;—

I will stop there. There are two more lines but they are completely irrelevant to the point before us.

It seem to me, Sir, that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) is opposed to the progress of the bill. He is concerned about its being introduced when this other matter has not been dealt with and I suggest that it is not repugnant to parliamentary procedure if a member takes that stand. May I characterize the substantive question. It is a clear one. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris says that he does not want this bill to be proceeded with until a clear declaration has been made about a certain matter.

That leads me to the point raised by the Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council. May I comment on this question briefly, even though my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni in my view disposed of it pretty quickly. The Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council suggested that if this amendment were allowed it would put Your Honour in a difficult position. How would Your Honour decide when a bill had met this so-called prior condition. I think my friend from Comox-Alberni was quite right; that would not be a decision that Your Honour would have to make. The House might pass a motion today saying that we will not accept any legislation for all time unless this condition has been met, and the same House tomorrow might pass legislation without that condition having been met. There is nothing standing in the way of Parliament doing inconsistent things. I have been annoyed at some of the things that have been decided around here, presumably for all time, which subsequently have been changed. We have a statute known as the Canadian Bill of Rights that says that certain matters shall not be enacted into legislation. But that is only an annual statute. Arguments have surrounded that piece of legislation. It has been argued that Parliament can pass a bill contrary to its provisions, even though it may protect itself by saying, "notwithstanding the provisions of the Canadian Bill of Rights".

So, Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the authority and sovereignty of Parliament at all times, it seems to me that the passing of an amendment like this would be simply a declaration of where the House stands today on this matter. But the House is still the master of its proceedings and the master of its destiny and can make another decision tomorrow, next week or in the next session. So, Sir, to answer the suggestion put forward by Your Honour and by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council, it seems to me that this amendment really does not offend our procedural practices in that what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris is saying is, "I do not want this bill to be proceeded with until the House has had a chance to make this statement." Personally, I am not opposed to the passing of this bill on second reading; but it seems to me that the right of my hon. friend to seek this declaration is covered by the rules.

Some question has been raised as to whether the amendment is relevant to the bill. I think, again, that my colleague from Comox-Alberni has cleared up that point. That is always a fine point. The subject of a reasoned amendment has to be relevant to the bill. Somehow it has to touch on the subject that is touched on in the bill, or you cannot raise it. But, if it is an amendment that seeks to do something which could be done by amending a clause in the bill, then you cannot do it. That is one of the reasons why reasoned amendments have always been so difficult from a procedural point of view.

We must also consider another point which has been raised both ways. I think I heard the Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council say that this amendment was wrong in that it was opposed to the bill. Usually, the ruling of the Chair is—

Mr. Jerome: In that it is not opposed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In that it is not opposed? That is fine. I accept the correction. The hon. member says that it is not opposed to the bill. I do not see how he can adopt that position because, after all, if the amendment were passed it would defeat the bill right there. That would be the end of it for this session, and if that is not opposing the bill I do not know what is. That meets the condition that has been frequently laid down from the Chair, namely, that when one presents a reasoned amendment one cannot just beat around the bush and talk about things that are interesting to talk about. The mover of that amendment must be clearly opposed to the bill.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, this is a mixed up kind of subject. If I may speak for 30 seconds about my own views on the substance of the matter, may I say that I should like to see the question of aboriginal rights, and so on, discussed by the House. On the other hand, I do not want to see the bill blocked. I should like to see the bill get through. Nevertheless, I defend the right of my friends to my right to take the position that I think they are taking, namely, to use the words of Citation 382, to oppose the further progress of the bill at this time.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, may I very briefly speak about the matter that Your Honour raised. In case Your Honour has been persuaded or influenced by some of the arguments which have been put forward, may I draw to your attention Citation 203 of Beauchesne which I think is the essential one. The essential question is not whether there is relevancy. Although every member knows that is a requirement. An amendment is ruled out of order if it raises a new question which can only be considered on a distinct motion after notice. I think this amendment raises a new question within the context of the motion that is before the House. I do not want to expand further on that, although authorities and citations can be found at the bottom of page 527 and on page 528 of May's Seventeenth Edition.

There is one other essential point in view of the arguments that have been made. It is with respect to citation 382, to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred. That is that it is competent for a member to move an amendment where he is opposed to any further progress being made on the bill. I am sure Your Honour will recognize that there are appropriate ways to move an amendment for that purpose. This is not one of them. Even if it were one of them, the House has already taken a decision on that kind of amendment.

Yesterday we voted on an amendment that invoked the six months hoist. I think that is the most direct way to get the sense of the House as to whether members wish to make further progress on the bill before the House. I suggest that determination has already been made by a decision of this House.

Mr. Speaker: I thank hon. members for their valuable guidance in connection with this very interesting point of order. I took the initiative of indicating to hon. members that I had serious doubts as to certain procedural aspects of the amendment. The hon. member of Winnipeg North Centre has pointed out the difficulty with which hon. members are met in drafting so-called reasoned amendments, and the difficulty with which the Chair is faced in determining whether such amendments fall within the four corners of the established practice in relation to reasoned amendments.

I indicate nothing new to hon. members when I remind them that there are not very many kinds or types of amendments that can be moved on second reading. The scope or range of such amendments is very limited. Hon. members know that, generally speaking, they can move what is termed the six months hoist which was moved earlier in connection with this bill. Hon. members can move, by way of an amendment on second reading, that the subject matter of a bill be referred to a committee and they can move a reasoned amendment. That is about the limit of the amendments that can be proposed.

Reasoned amendments are not frequent in our practice. They are used more liberally in the British House, and to some extent we have to rely on the British practice to determine whether such amendments moved as reasoned amendments can be accepted. The hon. member for Yukon has very helpfully referred to May's Seventeenth Edition which specifies the conditions which govern a reasoned amendment.

Other hon. members have referred to the matter of relevancy. I indicated earlier that I had some difficulty determining whether the hon. member for Brandon-Souris, in the course of his contribution to the debate on second reading of this bill, was entirely relevant. Having made that admission, I find it a little difficult to make a ruling on the relevancy of the amendment which applies the line of argumentation proposed earlier by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

I have some reservations. Looking at the amendment and the title of the bill, I find that there may be some difference between the two, but I do not think that I should make a ruling on this basis. What worries me more seriously is whether this amendment as drafted imposes a condition precedent. Hon. members know very well that it is not competent to move an amendment which imposes a condition precedent, that is a reasoned amendment based on such conditions. I refer hon. members to May's Seventeenth Edition at page 528, subparagraph (2), on this point.

Perhaps an even more important point is whether this amendment opposes the principle of the bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said that the consequence of the adoption of the amendment would be that the bill could not be proceeded with if the amendment were carried. I do not disagree with that, but the amendment in these words, taken as such, does not oppose the principle of the bill. I believe that this is one of the essential aspects of a reasoned amendment, that it should first oppose the principle of the bill and indicate reasons why the second reading should not be proceeded with.

I refer hon. members to citation 393 (1) of Beauchesne:

> An amendment purporting to approve the principle of a Bill and at the same time enunciating a declaration of policy cannot be moved to the second reading. It must oppose the principle of the Bill.

I think this is fundamental. I have always felt that hon. members who wished to propose a reasoned amendment can do so fairly easily with a bit of imagination, providing they find some way which does oppose the principle of the bill and indicates in general terms why the mover of the amendment does not think that the bill should be proceeded with further That is why I have not been entirely reluctant to rule a reasoned amendment out of order because I feel that hon. members are not penalized very seriously. With some imagination, they can always rectify or remedy what the Chair thinks is a defect in the amendment which has been proposed.

This having been said, I have no alternative but to make a ruling in conformity with the British precedents relating to reasoned amendments and to tell the hon. member that I do not think that the amendment as proposed is acceptable. I do so with regret, because I appreciate the importance of the matter and the willingness and anxiety of hon. members to discuss, in relation to the second reading of the bill now before us, that aspect of the matter raised by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris. My conclusion must be that the amendment cannot be put.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

• (2.00 p.m.)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, when Bill C-187 was introduced in the House last November, and during the brief time in which it was debated during March, it had been my intention to speak briefly on the subject, not so much in respect of what the bill contains but rather in relation to some glaring omissions which I felt I should bring to the attention of the House.

The bill is a comprehensive one. It is a complicated measure, and generally speaking hon. members feel it represents the government's plan for the operation of Yukon mining resources in the future. When we consider the legislation in this light we find, as has been mentioned by previous speakers, that it runs somewhat contrary to the views expressed by several ministers sitting on the other side of the House.

A great deal of interest has been shown in this subject over the last few years, especially in the question of foreign control of Canadian industry and natural resources. At the present time, a large group in Canada is recruiting support in favour of what it terms an independent Canada. I said a few moments ago that the bill, in many respects, runs contrary to statements made by Ministers of the Crown. Yesterday in the House the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) referred to the remarks of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) in the course of the symposium on petroleum economics and evaluation which was held in Dallas in March. I know the minister may say we are misinterpreting his words, but it appears to me the minister indicated that foreign investment would certainly be welcomed by Canada. I can tell him I appreciate his interest in this respect.

An hon. Member: The minister of energy does not want it, though.

Mr. Simpson: My hon. friend is right. He has spoken out against it on many occasions. However, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development at that time stated to this group that foreign capital need not fear because Canada would remain an open country seeking positive, not negative, answers to questions relating to foreign investment.

• (2:10 p.m.)

A close look at this bill reveals that it introduces, unlike the existing act, Canadian ownership requirements which in effect provide that a lease of mineral rights can be granted only to a Canadian citizen or Canadian corporation incorporated in Canada; that 50 per cent of the outstanding shares of such corporation must be issued and beneficially owned by Canadian citizens or other Canadian corporations. It is easy for one to say that there should be not too much quarrel with that proposition, and generally I have no quarrel with it, though I for one do welcome foreign investment in Canada. The one reason that I wish to speak on Bill C-187 is that I learn from the bill that there are certain requirements governing foreign investment in minerals in the Yukon.

Ministers have been going across the country offering their own suggestions as to what the Canadian government should require in respect to foreign capital in Canada, and this brings me to the point I should like to make. Although I have said that this is not a good bill, I feel that in many places it is an exceptionally bad bill because of several important omissions in its provisions.

For example, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) mentioned briefly that nowhere in the bill is there any spelling out of the rights that native peoples may have in regard to the future sale or development of natural resources in the Yukon. The hon. member went so far as to move an amendment, which I was disappointed to see ruled out of order because the main objection that I and many others have to this bill is that the rights of our native peoples are not spelled out or even considered in it. I realize I might be charged with being out of order in speaking at great length about the rights of our native peoples in a debate on Bill C-187. But if this legislation is passed by the House, certain mineral resources in the Yukon will be developed, as they are being developed, with no opportunity whatever being given to the native peoples to discuss or put forward any of the requests they have made for a fair share of the natural resources of the land that once was theirs.

The government may say that all these things will be taken care of, though I think they will have a great deal of difficulty convincing the native peoples of this. For many years members of this House protested that there was no Indian claims commission in operation. For some seven or eight years, these members were told that an Indian claims commission would be set up in the near future. The Indian people got tired of waiting for this commission to commence operations. Nevertheless, they carried on very extensive discussions, or at least endeavoured to, with the government representatives in respect to their claims which, over the years, have remained unfulfilled.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I do not want to be unpleasant to the hon. member—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The minister is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should remember that we are discussing the Yukon minerals bill, not the Indian claims commission. I am ready to entertain questions in the House on that subject when the occasion arises, as I have many times so far. But may I say I should like enlightenment on the subject of minerals in the Yukon, not on the subject of the Indian claims commission.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the minister has made a point. When the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson) began his remarks about the Indian peoples he indicated that he would not be very long because Mr. Speaker might find him out of order. I am taking the hon. member at his word, and I hope that he is just concluding those particular remarks.

Mr. Simpson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I can understand the minister's concern in bringing this matter to your attention; it must be getting very tiresome for the government to hear continually requests regarding our native people's rights in Canada, especially in view of the fact that nothing whatever has been done about the many demands made by the Indian peoples regarding their property rights, let alone their hunting and other rights which are theirs through treaty. I realize, of course, that the Indian people of the Yukon Territory do not have treaty rights, as do Indian peoples in other areas.

If I may make my remarks a little more relevant to Bill C-187, and not discuss further the property rights of our native peoples, may I say I am also very disappointed that there is nothing spelled out in this bill about any royalties that may accrue from mineral development on lands that are presently occupied by native groups.

It is all very well for the minister to say that if a large mining development takes place in the Yukon closely adjacent to or on land upon which our native peoples are living and have lived for a number of years, proper compensation will be paid to them. The minister may say that and may genuinely believe that this question will be taken care of by the government of the day. However, in view of the fact there is no provision in this bill giving the native people protection in this regard, I find it is very difficult to accept the bill at this time. Before I conclude my remarks it is, therefore, my intention to move an amendment to the bill.

Once again I wish to say that it is exceedingly difficult for me to comprehend why the subject of the rights of the native people of the Yukon is not relevant to this bill. After all these people have been there for many years and undoubtedly the land on which they live will some day produce mineral resources. I think that in itself is an indication that their cause is very relevant to this bill. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie):

That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

The hon. member for the Yukon.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, when I last spoke on this bill on March 25, I indicated to the House and to the minister, because I am sure he was not aware of the extent to which there is opposition by the mineral industry in the Yukon and by the people of the Yukon, that the mineral industry generally is opposed to four offensive and objectionable features in this bill. It would be well to remind hon. members because 48 days have passed since this matter was last discussed, what these objections are. There is a lack of judicial appeal from the discretionary powers given to the public servants and the minister himself under this bill. There is virtually no provision for appeal by judicial process from a decision affecting the title to mineral rights in the Yukon made in governmental offices. No intelligent long-range planning can be made with any security by anyone undertaking the development of mineral resources if the rules are changed halfway through the game.

The second objectionable feature is the power in this bill to make regulations. The bureaucrats would have us believe this power is inserted in the bill because they want some kind of flexibility in these modern times. They say that technology has been so far advanced, and mineral exploration techniques altered so substantially, that there must be this kind of governmental interference now for the sake of efficiency. Yet we have had a mineral code in the form of the Yukon Quartz Mining Act operating in the territory for almost half a century with no power to make regulations. In the same breath the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) likes to take all sorts of plaudits for the rapidly accelerating development of the mineral industry in the Yukon. If it is rapidly accelerating and growing, it must be doing so in an efficient fashion. If so, why then is there the need for the inclusion of these wide discretionary powers in respect of making regulations? There can, of course, be but one answer. The government, the state, does not want the mineral industry to be controlled by the investment dollar. They want to tell the mineral industry where, when and how it can mine and under what terms. In fact, they wish to have virtual and absolute control over the industry. That is why, the last time I participated in this debate, I said it is their intention, whether declared or otherwise, not only in this field but in all the legislation I have seen go through this House in the last two and a half years, to garner for the government an increased degree of control through legislation. There is a long list of those engaged in the mineral industry in the north country who are profusely objecting to the provisions of this bill, two of which I have pointed out. I am not understating the situation.

A third objectionable feature of the bill is the newly constructed royalties provisions which the minister would have the members of the House believe alter in no substantial way the provisions that are in effect in other parts of Canada. That, Sir, is far from being the case. The royalties provisions now in this bill, if applied, will triple and more the royalties which are now payable by those pursuing the development of our mineral resources in the north. The minister, in his last remarks on this bill, equated the royalties which would be payable under these provisions with those now payable in Quebec and British Columbia. That is far from being the case. If the regulations are applied as they are now, the royalties will be substantially increased over the royalties paid by the industry in those two provinces, and this despite the fact that mineral resource development in the Yukon must compete with markets 1,500 miles further away than those in the province of British Columbia and the province of Quebec.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to interrupt my hon. friend but perhaps I could save him some time. Is he not aware that I said I intend to propose at the committee stage some changes in respect of the point he is making. I said this in my first speech. I would hope, therefore this debate could be completed as quickly as possible so that these changes might be made.

Mr. Nielsen: I realize the minister would like to see his bill go through without any objection whatsoever or that he would like to see a minimum amount of disagreement in respect of these objectionable features.

Mr. Chrétien: State the facts.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am stating the facts, and when I do not I invite the minister to interrupt. The minister made a token gesture, accompanied by blaring trumpets, when he stated that he would make some alteration in the royalties. I predict the alteration the minister will introduce before the committee will be simply taken as a camouflage in an attempt to make the bill more palatable to those who submitted massive objections to him, to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and to the committee in respect of royalties and the other objectional features. When the minister made the statement to which he referred, and published his press release, he said nothing about making alterations to the offensive regulatory power he has included in the bill. He said nothing about presenting an amendment in the committee regarding the restrictions we now impose on the investment dollar. For some 70 years the investment dollar has been flowing into the Yukon for the purpose of developing its mineral resources. Now, all of a sudden, the minister includes a provision in this bill which has already frightened away 30 per cent of the investment capital which is non-recoverable this year because the companies make their plans much in advance of the fall.

I have been told that the loss in respect of the investment dollar this year might be 50 per cent. This is accompanied by another serious difficulty. When I was in Alaska I was informed they have now enacted a retributive regulation which imposes upon Canadian companies a requirement of reciprocity. In other words, Canadian companies that have been active in exploration activities along the 50 mile strip of the Alaskan territory west of the Yukon-Alaskan boundary will be required to come up to the same standard that we are imposing upon United States Companies, otherwise they will not get rights to go in and explore that territory. Already deleterious effects on the Canadian industry and resource development in the Yukon have been noticed.

I will name just a few of the companies that have registered complaints with respect to this bill. This bill cannot be considered in a vacuum because, when combining the odious provisions in this bill with the completely impractical provisions in the land use regulations, which the Governor in Council intends to enact, governing the activities of explorers for mineral resources in the Yukon, and combining these provisions further with the probable legislative consequences of the white paper, we can find that the independent existence of the mineral industry in the Yukon will be virtually snuffed out.

Dynasty Explorations Limited, one of the major shareholders in the $100 million mining development at Anvil in the Yukon have registered very strong complaints against the provisions which I have pointed out in this bill. Atlas Explorations Limited, active in the Yukon to a great extent, have now pulled in their horns this year as a result of this odious piece of legislation. New Imperial Mines Limited who have closed down their operations this year because they ran out of economic ore as a result of the lowering of copper prices, is another such company. It takes no genius to figure out that the more overhead you place upon the mineral industry in the Yukon territory, a high cost area of operation, in the form of royalties or taxation, the less economic ore that industry will have to mine, the more marginal will be their operations. If the royalties provisions as proposed in this bill are enacted, very likely that mine will not go back into production. United Keno Hill Mines in the heart of the mineral rich Yukon territory, if these royalties provisions are enacted and if the white paper proposals on taxation are enacted, will likely also go out of business.

This government holds itself forth as a government which offers incentives for the development of resources in the Yukon and in the north. I say that is rubbish, otherwise they would not be proposing this kind of stupid legislation. Cassiar Asbestos Corporation Limited and Clinton Creek Asbestos, have both registered strong objections to the provisions in the bill. The Council of the Association of Professional Engineers, the Mining Association of B.C., the Mining Association of Canada, the A. J. Forsythe and Company Limited, the British Columbia Chamber of Commerce, the Hanna Mining Company, Archer Cathro and Associates Limited, who already have sent a telegram to the minister saying that they have curtailed their investment plan in the Yukon this year by 30 per cent and are looking elsewhere for a more attractive investment climate, have all registered complaints because of the objectionable features in this bill.

The previous Liberal candidate in the last federal election, who took leave of absence from his position as a geologist with the federal government in order to run against me, has written personally to the minister at length expounding the objections which I am now raising on behalf of the industry and on behalf of the people of the Yukon. I imagine that his representations are getting just as short shrift as any that will be made by government members, if they indeed are making any. As a matter of fact, the very lack of any contribution from hon. members sitting on the other side of the House indicates the extent of their knowledge of the mineral legislation that is now before the House. It would be interesting to hear a few of the members. I see some who are sitting here who know what effect this kind of provision in the legislation will have on the growth of the mineral industry and generally the resource industry in the north. Why do they not rise and express their views?

The Yukon Chamber of Mines have expressed extremely strong views. They represent the mineral industry and are the voice of the development segment of the Yukon population. The Yukon Research and Development Institute in the Yukon, the Yukon Prospectors Association, the Alberta Northwest Chamber of Mines, the Petroleum Association of Canada, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, the Yukon Trades Council, the Anvil Mining Corporation, the Yukon River Industries Limited, are some of the companies which have expressed objections which I know the minister has received, not to mention the dozens upon dozens of telegrams and letters which have come to the minister and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), all objecting to this bill.

Who are we in this Parliament of Canada to get up and speak, as they do on the other side, of the high-flown principle of participatory democracy and the voice of the people when there is such massive representation by well over 95 per cent of the people of the Yukon saying that this legislation is something they do not want? Who are we to insist on forcing it down their throats? When this proposal was last brought before the House in 1954 this self-same argument was made by the then sitting member, Mr. Simmons who said that the people of the Yukon do not want this legislation. They do not want the minister to have regulatory powers when we have had a mineral code that has been in existence for half a century which operated quite efficiently and acceptably. Who are we to force our views down the throats of the people of the Yukon. This is participatory democracy? The Prime Minister and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development say "let us have your views; we will consider your views". So, 95 per cent of the people of the Yukon do just that. They say they do not want this measure, but the government goes ahead with it anyway. What a hollow mockery of the principle of participatory democracy.

Reference has been made here today to the rights of the native people with respect to lands and minerals in the Yukon. In my submission, this Parliament is bound by a sacred trust which is recorded in its Journals of 1867 at a time when the territory of the Yukon was purported to have been transferred to the then Dominion of Canada, a fact which I seriously doubt and which has yet to be tested in the courts of our land. Yet, here we are attempting to fly in the face of that trust.

I recently had the good fortune, at the invitation of the minister, to make an extensive tour of New Zealand and Australia, one of the purposes of which was to compare the policies of those two countries with respect to dealing with their aboriginal peoples with those which exist in Canada. The policies which exist in New Zealand, because of different factors, are not relevant to this debate, but they certainly are in Australia where the aboriginal peoples have no absolute right to their lands. They have no treaties and no equivalent to the treaty of 1763, nor do they have the equivalent of what the Maoris of New Zealand have. But what does the government of Australia do? Notwithstanding the absence of any legal basis upon which to develop their policies, they have adopted the position that it is only morally correct that the government should recognize that these peoples do have some rights, and before a mining company obtains a lease to go into production the government of Australia ensures that a part of that production will be guaranteed to their aboriginal peoples. The minister learned this when he was in Australia, and I learned it for the first time, too.

Mr. Chrétien: Would the hon. member permit a question? I have nothing against this, Mr. Speaker, but I would like him to try to justify his plea to have an added royalty for the Indians in the Yukon when he opposes us having any royalty. Is he suggesting that we should have another royalty for the Indians? I am willing to accept that suggestion.

Mr. Nielsen: I am very interested to hear that the minister is amenable to a suggestion, but obviously he must be tired because he is not looking at all the facets of the suggestion. I admit that is one possibility, but what I meant was that out of the royalties even now paid into the federal treasury, why isn't a portion given to the Indian peoples and tribes in the Yukon Territory? If it is the intention of the government to insist that these royalties now, or in some minor adjusted form be paid into the federal treasury, why doesn't it give the Indian people of the territory a right to a portion of those royalties? I am not suggesting an additional royalty be added to that already imposed.

Mr. Chrétien: That is the case in Australia.

Mr. Nielsen: I didn't hear the minister.

Mr. Chrétien: I said that is the case in Australia. It is an added royalty.

Mr. Nielsen: No, no. As I understood the policy, in Australia a mining company, before it goes into production, has to enter into a lease agreement with the Australian government. It is in that agreement that these royalties are negotiated and spelled out at some length. But it does not follow that the government figures out the royalties it wants, and then adds to that sum a further royalty for the aboriginal people. In any event, even if I am wrong on that, it is long past the time when the Canadian government should have guaranteed to our native peoples a portion of the royalties that are now being received by the federal treasury. It is their moral right, without imposing on the Indian people of the Yukon the obligation of going to all the expense and difficulty of proving their claims in court.

Surely, there is a moral obligation to satisfy the legitimate demands of these people, particularly in an area where there have been no negotiations with the Indian people. There are no treaties with the Indians in the Yukon. It is not the case, as it is in the provinces, where treaties have been negotiated with the majority of the Indian tribes and where, under those treaty arrangements, the Indian people are entitled to their quid pro quo, meagre as it might be. Here in the Yukon you have a situation where the government of Canada has presumed to assume control over all of these lands without a yes, no, or by your leave from any of the Indian peoples.

The minister knows that it is the specific desire of the Yukon Native Indian Brotherhood, which he himself has been instrumental in funding, that there be some recognition extended of these rights, but there has been no scintilla of assurance from the minister that they will ever be given any recognition of their rights. That is something that should be done through this legislation, all the more so because the provisions as presently worded are in breach of the specific trust imposed by the Parliament of Canada to ensure that these rights would be guaranteed to the native peoples. What they require now is a statement from the minister that this kind of policy will be the policy of the government. If the government does not come out with a statement such as that, it will be confronted at a crucial time with actions taken through the courts. Injunctions will be obtained and major projects will be held up. I give the minister fair warning that this is going to happen. I think he knows it is going to happen. But all this could be circumvented by the minister saying that the moral obligations—indeed there is a good argument to be made that it is a legal obligation—of the government of Canada to recognize the rights of the native peoples of the Yukon will be honoured.

All he has to say is that it will be the policy of the government to ensure that a portion of these royalties will be put into a fund designated for the benefit of the Yukon Indian peoples. It is a very simple matter, but I very much doubt that he will do it. Indeed, if one can rely on the statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), something which it is becoming increasingly difficult to do these days, we have his assurance, given two years ago in British Columbia, that there will be no more treaties, no agreements that amount to treaties with the Indian people of Canada. As a result, it is a very short and unbright future which the Indian people have to look forward to, particularly those in the circumstances in which the Indian people of the Yukon Territory find themselves as well as a good many of those in the Northwest Territories.

There is one other objectionable feature of the bill. I mentioned that there were four. I have mentioned royalties, the lack of judicial appeal, and the regulatory power. The fourth objection that I have, and which I raise on behalf of the industry and of the people of the Yukon, is the fact that the provisions of this bill, as can be seen easily even if hon. members only browse through it, place wide discretionary powers in the hands of such persons as the mining engineer, the mining recorder, the minister, the deputy minister and the myriad of officials who go to make up the empire of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. All of these officials, in each of their capacities, are empowered to make decisions anywhere along the line from exploration to production, which can vitally affect the question of production itself. With this kind of lack of security, with this kind of broad discretionary power there can be no reliance whatsoever placed upon a continuing set of circumstances by any of the planners involved in the mineral resource development industry.

What may be valid today at the point where the first prospectors go into the field, might very well be altered tomorrow. The minister knows that it takes around three years to go from the exploration stage to the development stage of any mine. If people in the industry do not have the guarantee of rules written into the statute, rules that will govern their activities from exploration to production, they will just not get involved. For instance, there have been strong statements made such as the one which was made by the President of Anvil Mining Corporation, that if the same legislative prospects had been before them when they made the decision to go ahead with their $100 million development at Faro in the Yukon, that decision would not have been made.

Yesterday the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) said a similar statement was made with respect to a $150 million development in Newfoundland-Labrador. If the promoters had been confronted with the prospect of the proposals in the white paper on taxation finding their way into legislation at the time they made their decision to go ahead, they would not have made that decision. Surely, the massive outcry of the people in the Yukon—the minister smiles, but surely the opinion of these people must mean something to him. Now, he nods in affirmation. If they do mean something then what they say to him is that they do not want this legislation. Surely the voice of the people has to mean something if we are to believe at all in this hocus-pocus of participatory democracy. It is either that, or against that massive outcry in opposition to this legislation the minister is saying to them fuddle-duddle.

Mr. Greene: Shame! Shame! Withdraw!

Mr. Nielsen: I said it.

Mr. Greene: Unparliamentary.

Mr. Nielsen: In my view this highflung phrase, this ostensible adherence to this principle of participatory democracy is just about worth the powder it takes to blow it to kingdom come. We in the Yukon are much too familiar with the antics of the ministers responsible for Yukon affairs, and the bureaucrats responsible for Yukon affairs, to have any faith in a phrase like "participatory democracy".

I may sound like a cynic but it is a very simple question with a very simple answer. If you have this kind of situation where virtually all the people of the Yukon say "We don't want it" and the minister says, "You are going to get it anyway, whether you like it or not", it is like a dose of castor oil. The minister must be interested in the philosophy of justice since law was his profession at one time. If he has any fairness in his heart at all, he will write into the bill a provision for appeal to the courts in every case where a major bureaucratic decision is involved. It is neither justice nor government by the people when bureaucrats make unappealable decisions, particularly where they affect title to mineral claims.

When the minister speaks again, I hope he will deal with some of these questions to the satisfaction of the people of the Yukon. I have mentioned four specific areas in which he and I both know that the people of the Yukon do not want any part of this measure. Unless he puts forward more than mere token admissions that changes will be introduced, and unless he can spell out that the wishes of the residents of the Yukon will be adhered to, then the voice of the people is pretty meaningless. Perhaps we were right all along when we said we were a mere colony subject to the whim of the Chief Governor of the Yukon, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and his Deputy Governor, Mr. Smith of the Yukon. In other words, there is validity in the phrase, and the minister might as well say it, "l'État c'est moi" est absolument correct.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I cannot let the bill before us go by without saying a few words on it. In its way, it is one of the most important bills that has come before this House in a long time. As has been pointed out by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), its effect upon the territory of the Yukon will be as considerable as the effect of the new tax bill which we expect to see before the end of the current session.

I do not have the same pessimism as the hon. member for the Yukon about the ability of members of this House to write a good bill. I think it is within our capability to appreciate the problem and within the capability of the committee system to come to an understanding of some of the details and practicalities that must go into a bill to make it a good one.

Mr. Nielsen: You know all the companies that will go to B.C. from the Yukon.

Mr. Deachman: If I might be permitted to continue, the hon. member for the Yukon and I would not find ourselves too far apart, just as the Yukon and British Columbia are not that far apart.

Mr. Nielsen: Bennett would like us closer.

Mr. Deachman: First of all, I should like to draw attention to the great importance of the Yukon Territory. It is a part of the country that has to be seen to be believed, but not many members of this House of Commons have had that opportunity. If the problems of its mines are to be appreciated, if the infrastructure of the roads, the airstrips, the railways and communications are to be appreciated, then more members of this House should see the territory before this bill becomes law. With that in mind, I hope when the bill goes to committee, the committee will undertake to go to the Yukon and see some of the territory. I hope that an opportunity will be given to others in this House to accompany that committee and that all will then appreciate the importance of what is before us now.

In order to understand the question fully, I believe the committee should visit the city of Vancouver where the head offices of many of the western mining companies and associations are located. Then, members could speak to those who have been involved in the development of mining in northern British Columbia and the Yukon. Perhaps they could also visit Edmonton, which is the capital centre for mining in western Canada. I do not believe that we can fully appreciate whether the terms within this bill are valid to sustain the mining economy unless we first of all go through that exercise and understand the difficulties that these people encounter.

Those members charged with the responsibility of making a report from the Standing Committee should have an appreciation at first hand of what it is like to open up a low grade mine in a remote area of Canada such as the Yukon, to reduce the ore to concentrate and finally to get it out of the country and into the market at a price that is world competitive. If we do not understand this, and the vast capital cost required to build mines and the roads structure necessary to take the product to the market, then we have not come to grips with understanding the bill now before us. As we move the bill from this House into the committee, Mr. Speaker, I feel there is a real necessity to understand the size of the problem that faces the committee and to ensure that the committee understands the proposition by having an opportunity to look at it on the ground.

I am not going to comment on the point raised by the hon. member for the Yukon. He is something of an expert in the field because he lives with it daily. He would not be in this House unless he represented his people well in the field of mining development in the Yukon Territory. I do not feel competent to judge whether his criticisms are fair, but I feel that it is incumbent upon the government when considering this bill, just as it was in the examination of the white paper on taxation, to do such a thorough job that we cannot be accused, when the bill comes back at report stage and for third reading, of not understanding what it is about. We do not want to be accused of not understanding this territory of Canada which has the potential to become one of the richest corners of the world.

I make the plea that we do our job thoroughly as we have learned to do in other cases. We must do it here if we are to respect the territory of the Yukon and its people.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I say at the outset that it was a matter of regret to me that the motion proposed earlier today by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) was ruled out of order on procedural grounds. In commenting on the motion now before us I note that the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in his remarks referred to the subject matter, shall we say, of the amendment that was proposed by his colleague this morning. I agree with what he said in that respect. Indeed, I think he underlined some remarks of mine yesterday when I spoke on what I felt should be considered as the rights of aboriginal peoples with respect to their heritage in the Yukon Territory. However, that is not really the subject matter of the motion now before us.

Mr. Nielsen: That was precisely the reason for the amendment.

Mr. Barnett: Hon. members are familiar with the vigorous and expressive way in which the hon. member for Yukon makes his views known to this House, and I certainly would not accuse him of fuddling or duddling when trying to let us know what he thinks about a matter. Nevertheless, as I listen to him from time to time I detect in the tenor of his arguments the kind of language which he may use in his profession as a pleader before the courts.

Mr. Nielsen: Does the hon. member mean that I did not have him in tears?

Mr. Barnett: I think that we in this chamber do not exercise any judicial function over the arguments of hon. members, Nevertheless, I have detected certain flaws in the logic of some of the statements of the hon. member. Up to a point I felt there was a lack of logic in various aspects of his argument respecting the royalties that might be levied on the mining industry. However, I made some general comment on this subject yesterday. I made clear that I do not always share the views of the hon. member for Yukon as to the manner and method under which mining corporations ought to operate and what legal restrictions should properly be imposed on their methods of operation.

The motion we are considering says that the bill should not now be read the second time, but that the subject matter thereof should be referred to the standing committee. I say at once, Mr. Speaker, that this motion contradicts a previously stated position so far as this party is concerned. I and my colleague, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), have said that we are prepared to see this bill go to the committee after second reading. We hope that the fullest consideration will be given to it in committee. We reserve our right to determine after that whether we are prepared to agree to final passage of the bill in this House. I again say that this, of course, involves the question of report stage amendments as well as any appropriate motions that may be in order at third reading stage.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Will the hon. member say whether he and his colleagues intend to support the amendment, since its sole purpose is to refer the subject matter of the bill to the committee, as opposed to the bill itself, thus enabling the committee to go into the question that we attempted to go into by way of our previous amendment, namely, that of native rights?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, we in this House are often capable of reading into amendments what we want to read into them and of seeing in them that which we wish them to accomplish. I was coming to the general point which I think is in the mind of the hon. member for Yukon. He has implied that the motion was moved so that the subject matter of the earlier motion concerning aboriginal rights might be considered by the committee. I touched on this matter in my remarks yesterday and said that in my view there would be some opportunity for raising the question of the rights of native peoples during committee stage of the bill. I refer to clause 9 of the bill, which I think provides such an opportunity.

In light of the amendment that was moved earlier today, I do not think there would be the opportunity for the kind of complete consideration of the broad position that I think was proposed this morning. Nevertheless, I feel that this question could be considered in committee under the part of the bill which makes provision for such examination. I indicated yesterday that I intended to look at the question of appropriate amendments that might be considered by the committee in this regard.

In the course of the hon. member's remarks I think the minister referred to amendments that he had in mind which would be suggested for consideration by the committee. We certainly will be prepared to consider them on their merit. I also hope that the minister and his political supporters on the committee will show the same kind of flexibility to amendments which some of us may propose.

Although I might sympathize with the hon. member for Yukon who suggested the purpose of the amendment, having just now listened to the main thrust of his argument I still find myself in disagreement on the position that he feels should be accepted by the House with regard to the activities of mining corporations in the Yukon or in any part of Canada. I made this clear yesterday. However, I agree, as I think he does, that the committee ought to have the opportunity of listening to their arguments. I think all of us want the mining industry of this country to be a viable, economic activity. We may come, as I think was suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman), somewhat closer to general consensus on this subject than one might think from some remarks made in the debate. So far as I am concerned, that is something for the future.

That brings me to some of the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra. He suggested that the committee should visit the Yukon Territory in the course of considering this bill. As a member of the committee, this idea has been very much in my mind. Indeed, I have put it forward. It has been discussed in the committee and I am hopeful there will be general agreement that part of the proceedings of the committee can take place in the Yukon Territory. If I heard him correctly, the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra also suggested that the committee should visit Vancouver in the course of its examination of this bill because, as he put it, the headquarters of some mining corporations and those interested in mines are in that city.

I say at once that although I have nothing against the idea of a committee visiting Vancouver on occasion, I think in the circumstances it would be much better if the people to whom he referred were to meet the committee in the city of Ottawa after we have had an opportunity of hearing those who live in the Yukon.

• (3:10 p.m.)

The remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, particularly when he touched on the question of the problems of transportation as they affect mining and economic activity in the northern parts of Canada, including the Yukon Territory, suggest that consideration might be given to the committee visting and examining the situation in the part of British Columbia where the main transportation gap between the Yukon and Vancouver exists.

Mr. Nielsen: How will we get there?

Mr. Barnett: We could leave that to the ingenuity of the member for Vancouver Quadra and his colleague, the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River (Mr. Borrie), who is sitting close to him at the moment. The matter indirectly raised by the member for Vancouver Quadra is certainly not new. I am glad that a member from the government side of the House raised the question. If this House is interested in seeing what is necessary for the Yukon Territory to develop economically, increase its population and improve other aspects of community living, there could be less uncertainty in the mind of the government about the Yukon arriving at full provincial status.

The point by the member for Vancouver Quadra about transportation development is well taken. I am glad this question has been raised by a member on the government side because it has been raised more than once over the years from the opposition side. Until now the federal government has not indicated that it is prepared to take responsibility for some of the steps, financial and otherwise, which would assist in any major way to close the gap.

I remember a debate a number of years ago when it was proposed that federal financial assistance be extended to the provincially-owned railway system, the Pacific Great Eastern, for an extension of that railway northerly from the city of Prince George. The decision of the government at that time, led by the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, was that the government was prepared to assist to the extent of 50 per cent of the cost of construction up to a maximum of 50 miles northerly from the city of Prince George. That was the limit.

It was suggested at that time that it was not economically viable for the federal authority to be involved in the extension of that railway to any greater extent. As hon. members know, particularly the member for Vancouver Quadra and the member for Prince George-Peace River, that railway system has been extended northerly for a considerably greater distance than 50 miles.

Without having any expert knowledge of the situation, my own view is that it has been a very valuable and economically viable proposition. The connection of that railway to link the Peace River area of British Columbia with the Prince George area and on to the city of Vancouver was an important and constructive step. As hon. members know, extensions to that railway system are in the course of being developed; there is now a thrust of railway construction in the general direction of the Yukon Territory.

In connection with the general subject matter of this bill, it might be desirable for serious consideration to be given by the government and the House to the fact brought out by the member for Vancouver Quadra that there is a real disability to economic development in the Yukon Territory because of inadequacies in the existing transportation system.

As hon. members know, I do not always agree with the ideas put forward by the Premier of the province of British Columbia nor with all the requests he makes to the government of Canada, usually through the medium of newspaper headlines. However, the idea of federal assistance to link by means of the bulk transportation vehicle—the railway—all the lower parts of British Columbia to the Yukon Territory is economically justified. This matter is in the general national interest. It is a program that the federal government should be seriously considering. Whether the Pacific Great Eastern Railway remains a provincially-owned system or not, it should be recognized as being part of the national transportation system of Canada. This is why I am glad this question was raised by the member for Vancouver Quadra.

If there is any real value in the standing committee visiting anywhere other than the Yukon Territory in the course of studying this bill, it would be much better if the committee were to direct itself to the city of Prince George which, I am sure the hon. member for Prince George-Peace River would agree, is in the geographical heart of British Columbia. From that perspective it would get some idea of what would be involved in our responsibility as members of the federal House toward extending that transportation link northerly toward the capital city of the future province of the Yukon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Is the House ready for the question on the main motion?

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, because of a very important engagement I have this evening in Hamilton, I had every intention of going home a little early. But because of the importance of this matter—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I am very pleased by the reception of my colleagues because of my devotion to duty. Because of the very significant aspects of this bill I thought I should rise after my colleagues from the Yukon and from Churchill and give some of my thoughts on this important piece of legislation. Some of my colleagues on the other side may ask, "Is Alexander an expert on the question of minerals?"

An hon. Member: It never occurred to us.

Mr. Alexander: I am as honest as my friend from Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). He said he is no expert but in keeping with his devotion to duty he thought it was required of him to indicate to the House and the people of the Yukon his thoughts in this regard. I suggest that more members on the other side should follow the lead of the hon. member, who said to the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that perhaps they were not too far apart. After the impassioned plea made by the hon. member for Yukon as well as by the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson), I feel that when given the opportunity to do so I should add my concern to theirs.

I have often said that the role of the opposition can be extremely difficult and that at times it is misunderstood. I think there are three prime functions of an opposition. The first is to make the government behave. However, we will not go into that matter now. The second is that we are the watchdogs of the people's rights.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I see the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) is leaving the chamber. He may have found some offence in these remarks. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that we are the watchdogs of the people's rights. Having heard the hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Churchill elaborate in no uncertain terms and with strength of conviction about the objections they have received from organizations, agencies, mining associations and companies as well as from those who are most important, our native people, I think the phrase I used "watchdogs of the people" has meaning. We must have participatory democracy, and this is the only way we can get it. If the government will not listen to those who are directly affected, then I say it is up to the opposition to voice their objections.

The third matter which I believe is of consequence in the role of the opposition is that it must provide constructive criticism to bills which the government introduces. Surely we cannot complain about such a role, because it is important. I think the government, in its charity, will admit that we do have the capacity to understand bills and to submit amendments which will make bills good—not for our sake on this side, not for the sake of hon. members on the other side or for that of the Parliament of Canada but, rather, for the Canadian people.

When I look at Bill C-187, entitled an act respecting minerals in the Yukon territory, I feel that the mining industry is certainly of importance in this country. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra said that we should give due deliberation to this bill as we will to the legislation which will follow the white paper on tax reform. I hope that in the context of the white paper on tax reform and the mining industry, the government will show some understanding of the need for a viable and economic industry. This is what my friends on this side of the House have been talking about. We want do do a thorough job with respect to this matter.

The hon. member for the Yukon and the hon. member for Churchill have indicated that there are at least four main objections to this bill from which we shall not back away because it is necessary that they be implanted in the government's mind in order that the government has second thoughts on this most important piece of legislation.

But I say to the minister who has just come back to the chamber that what is more important is that the hon. member for Churchill was extremely concerned—I am trying to be as fair as I possibly can—about the lack of understanding by the government regarding the rights of our native peoples. I say this also to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), because for obvious reasons and with my background I feel some comradeship with our native peoples and with the problems with which they are faced.

I am not saying that the government is deliberately ignoring their plight and their pleas, but there seems to be no action. When members on this side point out to the government in no uncertain terms that they are ignoring the aboriginal rights of the native peoples, that they have shown no consistent understanding of their problems, it is time for many more on this side to stand and speak for the rights of our native peoples.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I admit that I am not an expert, but surely to goodness it is high time we realized that the government cannot continue bringing in legislation which ignores the rights of these people who I think have justification in asking us to understand, probe and come up with the necessary solutions. The hon. member was very concerned about royalties which our native peoples do not seem to be sharing. This is one of our main objections. Also, the industry that is directly involved seems to be ignored in terms of what they expect and should get.

Another matter that concerns me as a lawyer was mentioned by the hon. member for Yukon, who is also a very good lawyer, which I am sure the Minister of Justice will admit. The hon. member pointed out that there was an absence of judicial appeal from bureaucratic decision. Surely this is so. I have every faith in the ability of the hon. member who pointed this out to us. I feel it is a matter the minister should look into, because without the judicial appeal required in a democratic society we cannot speak of participatory democracy.

What also concerned the hon. member, and concerns me as a backbencher trying to learn his job, is that every time I am confronted with a bill I find that there are regulatory powers everywhere you look. This is required for flexibility. It is the Big Brother approach. I am told that it is required for efficiency, yet I heard the hon. member say that for the past 50 years these industries have been able to carry on without this type of unwarranted and unnecessary intervention. There is too much regulation. It seems to me that this government is attempting to control the industry to tie it up in knots in order that it can no longer be a viable and economic operation.

Another matter that concerns us on this side is the administration of the legislation. In Clause 3 of the bill I find that many people will be appointed other than those who are directly involved in this matter and who, with all due respect, may not have the necessary expertise. I shall mention just a few. Clause 4 reads:

The minister shall designate a person to be supervising mining recorder—

That is one. Then, the minister shall also designate one or more persons to be engineers of mines. Who else do we get here? Then we get a deputy mining recorder and a supervising mining recorder.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member, but it being four o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

POWER

BAY OF FUNDY—REQUEST FOR FEASIBILITY STUDY ON DEVELOPING TIDAL POWER

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of taking immediate action to initiate a further study to examine the feasibility of developing tidal power in the Bay of Fundy which would include the papers prepared by experts in this field that were prepared for the International Conference on the Utilization of Tidal Power, held at Halifax from May 24 to May 29, 1970, as well as a full examination of interest rates as they have applied to federal government projects in the capital works field.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a rather unique experience for a member of the opposition to rise in his place on a private member's resolution and to be able to say to members of the government that almost everything that is proposed in the resolution has already been accepted by the government and that plans are now going forward to implement these recommendations.

I say this with one thought in mind, that when my notice of motion was prepared and placed on the order paper, this was certainly not the case. Indeed, shortly after beginning the present session of Parliament, on questioning the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) I was informed that the government was not giving further consideration to the examination of the programming board report that covered the basic essentials of harnessing for power the Bay of Fundy tides.

But because we are as we are in the Maritime provinces, that is, very persistent and very determined to see that we have projects undertaken in that area of Canada which will allow us to determine our own future as a viable part of this nation, members of both political parties—I say both political parties because in the Maritime provinces we do not have any members of the NDP—

Request for Bay of Fundy Tital Power Study

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, are there not two New Democratic Party representatives in the Nova Scotia legislature?

Mr. MacInnis: No; they only think they are.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I understand the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I say to him that while at one time, a very long time ago, there was a member—a very good member—of the NDP from the island of Cape Breton, which is part of Nova Scotia, that has not been the case for some time and I do not foresee that it will happen again in the present century. What I am talking about now, so far as the electorate is concerned in the Maritime provinces, is what is happening federally; and federally I believe that in the future, just as at the present time, there will be representatives only from the two major parties in the House of Commons. I may be wrong but I do not think I am.

Members from the Progressive Conservative party and the Liberal party joined together in a manner that I have not known in the years I have been in this House—indeed, I am doubtful if it has happened in the past 100 years—to endeavour to see that a re-examination of the programming board's report on the Bay of Fundy tides be carried out by the federal government in co-operation with the governments of the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

We in the Progressive Conservative party are in a position to make a good deal of noise because we happen to sit in the opposition, but I would not want it to be thought by the people of the Maritime provinces that the Liberal members of this House are not as dedicated and determined as the members of the Progressive Conservative party to see that this re-examination is carried out. In fact, the decision by the government to carry out the re-examination came only after much pressure had been demonstrated to the public by members of the Progressive Conservative party and by similar pressure being applied by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) and various other members of the Liberal party in this House, on the minister responsible, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), to see that such an examination was carried out.

In so far as the government's decision to carry out this re-examination was concerned, I am quite certain it was made only because the President of the Privy Council, for instance, placed the problems of the Maritime provinces and the possible solution of those problems ahead of party politics. Certainly that was the case with the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I feel that their particular and unique knowledge of the problem associated with such re-examination assisted materially in the final determination by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to carry out the examination.

I believe that these two cabinet ministers, along with other Liberal members, deserve as much credit as any member of the Progressive Conservative party for seeing that the re-examination is going forward. I think this stands as an example of what we in the Maritime provinces can do if when we are elected to this Parliament we place the problems of our area ahead of partisan politics and endeavour to accomplish what we all believe will be in the best interests of the people of our area.

I believe that the parliamentary committee, which is non-governmental but is composed of every member from the province of New Brunswick, every member from the province of Prince Edward Island and every member from the province of Nova Scotia, is an indication to the people of the Maritimes that with or without Maritime union we can do much to convince our people and the government, whatever government it might be, that we are determined to solve our own problems, wherever that is possible, by utilizing our own resources wherever they are available. I hope the same approach will be taken to offshore mineral rights as has been taken to Fundy tides. I say that our accomplishments to date, although we are not yet building the dams that will harness the waters that will produce the power, represent a tremendous step forward in the re-examination that is to be carried out.

I can foresee in the very near future the dams being built that will harness the tides that will produce the power that will make the Maritime provinces a "have" area of this nation—not an area that is worried about equalization payments, but an area like Ontario that is more concerned about having to pay additional revenues into the federal treasury to be used in other parts of this nation; because we will no longer be a "have not" area but will be a "have" area and will be able to contribute more than we receive from the federal treasury. It will be quite all right with me when that time comes.

I want to make it positive and clear that so far as Fundy tides are concerned, as Members of Parliament we want every bit of useful information produced to help make a definitive decision. We hope when all the facts are put together they will indicate that the federal government, in co-operation with the private sector of this country, should harness these tides and produce energy. But in order to do this I believe we must consider certain things that the original examination did not take into consideration. One of the matters that unfortunately did not receive the careful attention it warranted concerns what the power produced from the tides would do for the over-all electrical energy system in the Maritime provinces. In other words, Mr. Speaker, those who initially examined the possibilities of harnessing the tides looked too much at what the energy output from Fundy alone would be, rather than examining it from a system point of view within the Maritime provinces.

Fundy tides produce a unique type of power that is best used from a peaking point of view. In other words, they produce a type of power that when placed into the grid is most useful at a time when large volumes of power are required in large sectors of the Maritime provinces or the northeastern United States. This power is not of a value similar to firm power which can be produced in other ways and is saleable at a much cheaper rate than peak power.

It is contended that the input of Fundy power into a grid system provides a type of power, expensive from the point of view of saleability, that would bring great dividends both to our nation and to the industrial community of the northeastern United States. Today we are aware that there is a great desire on the part of the utilities of the northeasern United States to secure additional power. They need it badly because they are facing blackouts and grayouts. Fundy has that power. All we have to do is harness the tides and the market is available.

In determining whether we should harness these tides and supply that market we must discover what the cost will be. We should not be rating the value of this power as compared with firm power; we should be rating it as a unique type of power saleable at a much higher rate. It is in demand to a greater degree than the firm power that can be produced from thermal or hydro energy.

The Americans want to buy our power, but as Canadians naturally we must think of Canada first, and we as Maritimers must first consider what this power can do for our region. At the same time, however, we must accept the fact that initially more power will be generated than we can use. We must also accept the fact that a market is available for it, and indeed we should be negotiating now with the power utilities of the northeastern United States to determine the extent of that market and the value of the power to be produced when the tides are harnessed.

I contend that when we examine what is available from the American point of view in the northeastern United States, coupled with what is now available and will be available in the future in the Maritime provinces, we will find that there is plenty of power to assist both areas at the same time. We will also find that we can look forward to a degree of industrialization in the Maritime provinces that has not yet been imagined. We will also be able to assist in solving a serious problem in the northeastern United States. The great value of this power is that it is pollution free. There is no great danger to the ecology of the Maritime provinces from the harnessing of these tides. There are none of the forbidding drawbacks associated with nuclear energy.

I believe that at the earliest date possible we should get this committee moving and have it examine the papers prepared for the International Conference on the Utilization of Tidal Power. We should do it today rather than the day after tomorrow. I hope that the government is now negotiating with the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick to arrange for the re-examination of the programming board's report.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the personnel who produced the original report should be re-examining it. That would put us in the same position as the private who appealed the decision of a corporal to a sergeant to determine whether it was right, and had it confirmed. The sergeant appealed it to a lieutenant, who confirmed it was right and appealed it to a captain, who confirmed it was right, who appealed it to a major who confirmed it was right. In other words, you get into the position where everybody is confirming what you said was right. I should like new people to examine the programming board's report to see whether they were right and used the proper technology. I am sure that is what the people of the Maritime provinces want.

I believe a number of other things should be involved in this re-examination and I shall list them: First, they should re-study the effect of barriers on tides; second, they should devise a scheme that will supply firm power; third, they should tailor the tidal scheme for the most lucrative power market; fourth, they should restudy projects using simplified lower cost generating units; fifth, they should reassess costs based on the caisson method of construction; sixth, evaluate the export power market and integration of tidal power; seventh, examine maximum use of the new interconnection between New England and the Maritimes for Fundy development; and eight, re-examine competitive power costs in the light of unusual price increases since 1968.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the government for its willingness to re-examine the programming board's report of 1969. I also commend the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources for his attitude throughout the process from the point where it was said there would be no re-examination to the point where today the re-examination is going forward. I commend the President of the Privy Council, the Minister of Veterans Affairs and those members of the Liberal party from the Maritime provinces who have taken a special interest and made a special effort to see that the programming board's report is re-examined. And certainly I congratulate the members of my party who have also shown a determination to have it re-examined.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their courtesy in extending to me the privilege of speaking at this time. I assure them that I shall not abuse this privilege but will keep my remarks brief.

An hon. Member: Take your full time.

Mr. Thomas: I should like to take much longer, but my time is limited. I want to congratulate my colleague, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) for placing this motion on the order paper. He has been a long-time advocate of Fundy tidal power and has kept the project alive at times when it seemed nobody was listening. He was also instrumental in forming the all-party House committee actively engaged in studying the subject at this time.

I should like to read an interesting comment which appeared in the Toronto Stock Exchange survey of energy resources in Canada. This confirms some opinions that people recently have made about this project. After referring to the vast power requirements in the next 10 or 15 years both of the United States and of Canada, and mentioning that sources of energy are declining and the United States and Canada are worried about the situation, the article says:

• (4:20 p.m.)

Recent declines in interest rates and the increasing costs of fossil fuels have begun to make the hydro-electric development of the Bay of Fundy tides appear more economically feasible.

Request for Bay of Fundy Tidal Power Study

My main purpose in speaking this afternoon is to put on record, as a member from New Brunswick, that the proposed project is important not only for Nova Scotia but for all Maritime provinces as well as for New England states and the eastern seaboard of the United States. Recently, the Premier of New Brunswick fully endorsed the project. In his remarks he noted that although interest rates are dropping, they still remain high. They are on the downward trend. He noted that environmental pressures have become more urgent and there is a growing realization that tidal power plants, one of our few non-pollution energy producers, must be further developed. He went on to say:

—because of the interprovincial nature of such a project, it would appear that any future undertaking must command heavy federal participation with related lower cost investment capital.

Governor Kenneth Curtis of Maine recently stated that New England is desperately short of power and would probably buy any and all power available from the Fundy project if it is built. He said that he could not think of a project which would be of greater mutual benefit to the New England states and the Maritime provinces.

The chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission, Mr. George E. McInerney, has gone on record as being strongly in favour of further research and the possible development of Fundy power. New Brunswick faces a growing power shortage, as do most countries today. New Brunswick has a reciprocal arrangement with Maine under which power that is produced in New Brunswick can be sold to Maine. At present Maine is taking all the extra power that New Brunswick can produce.

To take care of the growing power needs of the province, a new $50 million thermal plant is just being completed at Eel River. Nevertheless, the province faces the prospect that all the potential energy from the new plant will be sold and as a result plans are now on the drawing board for a further $50 million thermal plant which is to go into operation in 1975. All this indicates the desperate need of the area for power in the future. The chairman of the New Brunswick Electric Power Commission also said that the costs of thermal fuel are steadily going up. The recent increase in oil prices probably prompted him to say that every increase of $1 per barrel in the price of oil represents an additional expense to the province of $4.5 million annually. He therefore feels that serious thought must be given to developing further sources of power such as the Fundy project.

Premier Regan of Nova Scotia has done an excellent job in keeping the project before the public and in keeping it alive. His recent action in forming a corporation to carry on studies relating to the project must be commended. Some people are accusing the Premier of trying to "go it" alone. I do not buy this entirely. I think that his enterprise and initiative must be commended and that he is prepared to co-operate with the other provinces. I emphasize that one province cannot "go it" alone and that if the project is to be successful there must be co-operation between the three provinces, which must co-operate with the federal government. A recent editorial in the Telegraph Journal reads in part:

> The Bay of Fundy is not a Nova Scotia bay. It is at least as much New Brunswick's bay. New Brunswick has a tremendous interest both in what is done with the bay and in the power that it can produce—pollution-free power that would be endlessly renewable and not consume any of the world's shrinking fuel supply. New Brunswick must be involved and must be just as rigorous in pursuit of the idea as Nova Scotia.

The editorial points out that the bay is interprovincial and that therefore the federal government has a definite responsibility to take part in the project and assist the provinces financially because they cannot "go it" alone. The editorial concludes:

> The federal government should look at the project with an open pocketbook—
> That pocketbook should be just as open for this long neglected region as it was for wealthy central Canada in the 1950s when the St. Lawrence Seaway was built.

That editorial expresses my thoughts aptly. I simply say to all hon. members that the development of Fundy tidal power is worth examining seriously and I make this plea: Let there be a concerted effort to develop the project, an effort which should be made by the three provinces co-operating with the federal government.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I was not surprised to see this notice of motion on the order paper. I welcome this motion. I believe that when an hon. member feels as strongly about a subject as the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates), he is under an obligation to not take no for an answer. I think the forum available to him, the House of Commons, ought to be used on every possible occasion for putting forward his point of view. He ought to do this during the question period, as he has, during budget debates, opposition days and in private members' hour, as he has.

Without doubt, Mr. Speaker, his motion has merit. The matter raised by the hon. member has been the subject of a study. I will not labour that point. Some hon. members may wonder why I am speaking on this matter during private members' hour. I say to the mover of the motion and to the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) that I have lived in northern Ontario for some time and when I have had occasion to go outside Canada I have always been asked, surprisingly, about Niagara Falls and the Bay of Fundy tides? People outside Canada seem to have the idea that these areas are just around the corner from where one lives. I blush in confessing that I have not had the good fortune to see the Bay of Fundy tides. I hope to remedy that situation this summer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: The Bay of Fundy tides have a magical quality. Their quality permeates not only the area that the hon. member for Moncton represents, not only Nova Scotia and New Brunswick but all of Canada. I strongly suspect that if some way could be found to take the action suggested by the hon. member, Nova Scotia would certainly benefit as would New Brunswick. Probably the benefits would be even greater, since anything that benefits part of Canada surely benefits the country as a whole.

I have read the report on this subject and undertaken some background studies, and I have read a number of press clippings. As the hon. member for Moncton said, the Premier of Nova Scotia has been criticized in some circles for "going it" alone. Clearly, the point the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North was making was that certain things had to be done and that he was doing them alone. All the same, it was gratifying to hear him pay tribute in this connection to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé).

I recently read in the Globe and Mail that Mr. R. B. Cameron was appointed president of the recently created Tidal Power Corporation by the Premier of Nova Scotia, Gerald Regan. Then the article reads:

> A Crown corporation, the new company was funded at $10 million by legislation at the just completed session of the Nova Scotia legislature to derive power from the Bay of Fundy tides.

The article then says that Premier Regan and Mr. Cameron will leave for Europe to inspect the French tidal power plant in Brittany. It must also be pointed out that the hon. member's motion says, not that the government should consider the advisability of initiating a study but that it should initiate a further study. "Further" is the adjective used. I think this is obligatory because it is incumbent upon those who have the responsibility today to determine whether in this very comprehensive report something was in fact missed, and if there are ways of harnessing this tidal power particularly for the benefit of Canadians in that section of our country.

I want to read a short passage from the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board's report. It points to what man has been trying to do and what we are endeavouring to do in Canada. I quote:

> Over the centuries, mankind, in his quest for survival and his search for a better way of life, has directed his ingenuity to harnessing the forces of nature to his uses. Mastery and utilization of the energy evident in the sun, the wind, the rivers and the tides as well as of the latent sources existing in various elements of the earth has been a much sought goal, wherein the degree of achievement has grown or varied with the development of technical knowledge and its application and with the economic value of the forces to be harnessed.

In our search for this goal we must face the ever present questions, "Is it financially feasible? Is it in fact economically viable?" I understand from officials of the government that the federal government has offered to join with the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in a general review of the findings of the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board and present comments on the proposed development, with Nova Scotia and New Brunswick representatives, regarding a review group comprising a review board and a review committee.

I was interested in the comment by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates) that the same people should not be making the decision. I hope attention will be paid to that representation. The point I am trying to make is that I am in favour of this motion. I salute the hon. member for bringing it forward in another form in this House. It is an opportunity to put forward what I think is a good idea.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I too associate myself with the two previous speakers in paying tribute to the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates). He has been a consistent and vigorous advocate of this very important project for a very long time. He was very generous in paying tribute to others. Much could be said about his own unrelenting, thorough, ongoing efforts in which he has fought for this very valuable project. I commend him on his continuing zeal and for the vigour with which he has presented his case, as well as for the thoroughness with which he has mastered the research necessary to make him as much an authority on this matter as a non-technical person can become. Along with the hon. member and other colleagues to whom he has paid tribute, it should be pointed out that some of the newspapers in the Maritime region, desiccated by Davey, were also in the forefront in keeping this very valuable project before the public for consideration.

The Fundy project is not only of concern to the people in areas surrounding the great Bay of Fundy. It is a matter of concern to all in the Atlantic Region because the whole Atlantic region is interested in it. The whole Atlantic region would benefit if this great project should reach actuality. I could go even further. If the region should prosper therefrom, the whole of Canada would benefit because where one region is weak economically the whole country is weakened thereby.

We from the Maritime provinces do not particularly enjoy the "designated area" status. We do not relish pointing out year after year that the pact of confederation, as it is sometimes called, the arrangements of confederation and the tariff and economic adjustments of confederation have placed upon us disadvantages which, added to certain geographical disadvantages, have sometimes been almost intolerable. We do not enjoy constantly harping on these things. We ask that we be given a chance and some assistance in helping ourselves.

I was impressed when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was in Saint John last December. He spoke about the markets to the south, the important markets in New England and the chances for great Maritimes' trade with that area. I think he was profoundly correct. The ties with the economic portion of the great north-east United States has meant a great deal to the Maritimes. The artificiality of our being cut off from economic liaison with that area has been one of the consistent problems facing the Maritimes since their entry into confederation. Anything that can be done to further trade with the northeastern portion of the United States is to be welcomed wholeheartedly. As the mover of the motion has pointed out, the sale of power to a power-deficient area is not only good economics regionally and nationally but internationally as well.

The arguments are compelling for this great project. A former colleague who used to represent Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare, now the constituency of South Western Nova in large part, was an expert in engineering and in business. I recall that he gave quite a dissertation on the types of power and the way in which power could be rendered efficient and expanded. He spoke about tidal power as being an inexhaustible source. Very dramatically, Mr. Bower said that as long as the moon, the earth and the sun endure, there will always be tidal power. He said it is an exhaustible source of energy. I was much impressed with that very simple but profound illustration of the situation.

My colleague referred en passant to the question of Maritime union. Maritime union is not a project which greatly excites me. I am still capable of being excited over some things. The regrouping of some provinces, closing down three capitals and building a new provincial legislature would not do much to cope with the real, profound problem, the economy of our region. The development of such things as the Prince Edward Island causeway, the corridor road and the magnificent Fundy power project would be far more important than Maritime union and the studies which might emanate from that project which seem to interest some people.

It strikes me that very often we major in minors on some of the fundamental questions. Here my colleague has directed us to a major. He has done it in a major and important way. I commend him. I hope the study will go forward. I agree with him that not a day should be lost and that indeed too much time already has been lost. I hope that the study will be completed soon and the recommendations will be favourable. This great project will do much for our economy, to strengthen the region and thereby strengthen Canada. We should go forward in this area with the leadership of the provincial governments and the government of the nation which, as my hon. friend from Moncton (Mr. Thomas) pointed out, has responsibilities. Since it has responsibilities and the economic strength, I hope it will accept this obligation.

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I was hardly able to rise to my feet in the sense of having been so caught up in the remarks of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), who perhaps more than most of us in this chamber has a gift of using words more effectively on almost any subject, be it a subject of philosophic content or even such a very practical motion as that which is before us today.

I want to associate myself with what has been said by my hon. friend on this side of the House, the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), and each of those very fine speakers who represented what I might be permitted to call the holy trinity, the three Atlantic provinces so far represented in this debate, and pay tribute to the man in whose name this motion stands, the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North (Mr. Coates). I have for some time, of course, as have all other people, been aware of the concern and interest in the tidal power project, the feasibility studies, the waxing and waning not only of the tides but of interest in them. Among those who, from what I have been able to learn, have neither waxed nor waned in their interest is the hon. member in whose name this motion stands, and his non-partisan presentation today has, I am sure, impressed all of us in this chamber.

To come to the substance of the motion, this project is particularly intriguing if we recognize the many spin-off benefits which would accrue from it not only to the region but to the whole nation if a substantial source of low-cost power could be developed as recommended in the motion before us, provided, of course, studies could predict favourable results. No one who has taken seriously the ongoing discussion concerning the development of the Atlantic region of Canada can fail to be interested in the subject matter with which this notice of motion deals.

I am impressed that certain steps have been taken in Nova Scotia and, indeed, in other areas since October 16 last, the date on which this motion was set down. I know it is not permissible under the rules, but I would love, if it were permissible, to be able to ask the hon. member whether there would be any substantial changes made in his notice of motion if he were writing it this afternoon instead of some five months ago. Does he feel that his motion is as relevant now as it was then? Perhaps he believes it is even more relevant than it was on the date he first presented it in this House.

Mr. Coates: I should just like to tell the hon. member that this motion is in exactly the same words as one I put forward last session. There is no difference whatever in my attitude or in the words of the motion.

Mr. McBride: I suppose, Mr. Speaker, what I was really getting at was this: Does the hon. member feel that the need for federal participation is increased because of the action which has been taken in Nova Scotia? I am referring, of course, to the establishment of the Tidal Power Corporation. Does this make it more urgent that there should be federal participation in the sense of the study being more relevant, or does the situation remain roughly the same?

Be this as it may, we are all aware that the Tidal Power Corporation has been funded to the extent, as I understand it, of $10 million and that a man who it is my pleasure to know, in part at least, from my work on the regional development committee has been appointed president of that Crown corporation, Mr. R. B. Cameron. I for one, was delighted to learn that a man of his ability had been chosen. I think it is widely recognized that Mr. Cameron is a man of unusual gifts. His record in the field of industry and his work in Devco and other places is well known to all the Maritimes members, especially those from Nova Scotia. I see both the members from Cape Breton here. They know this situation even better than I do, even though we may not always concur in our assessment of aspects of the situation.

In October, 1969, as is well known—I shall not spend much time on this—the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board released its report entitled "Feasibility of Tidal Power Development in the Bay of Fundy." One of the conclusions of that report was that it had become abundantly clear to the board that substantial portions of the large potential tidal power resource of the upper part of the Bay of Fundy were possible of development in a variety of sites and arrangements. In fact, according to the findings of that report, the development of but three of the 23 possible development sites could provide electrical energy in excess of 13,000 million kwh annually.

I hardly need refer to the board's report in much more detail, but the board did conclude—this is some time ago now, and of course the purpose of the motion is to have the issue reopened—that the economic development of tidal power in the bay under conditions prevailing two years ago was not feasible.

I for one must confess this is such an imaginative project that I should be pleased if those who are technically more competent than perhaps any of us in this chamber could see any light at the end of the tunnel, any hope at all that some success may be obtained from further studies in the sense that some program might be developed which could prove economically feasible taking into account some of the additional factors which have been introduced so capably here. I refer to the export of power to the United States, with the large northeastern market available there, taking into consideration the over-all growth, energizing and stimulus effect this would have on the maritime economy and certainly, therefore, in a broad, general way on the economy of all of Canada, even to the perhaps optimistic but certainly intriguing dimensions suggested by the hon. member for Hillsborough. Hon. members will recall he suggested that the day might well dawn, if a feasible project could be constructed and sizeable power realized therefrom, when a province such as Nova Scotia, or since he was speaking for Prince Edward Island, the whole region, I suppose, might become a "have" rather than a "have not" region, to use the colloquial terms with which we are all familiar.

I was impressed earlier today with the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) pointing out the role of the opposition. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that here we see a good example of the role of the private member. A member is able to bring forward a subject for discussion and thereby put it on the record and have some of us respond to a project which certainly is dear to his heart and of value to a whole wide region of our nation.

I hope a study containing some input from the federal coffers might come forward with a proposal for action that would result at least in a portion of the benefits to

Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island that have been so glowingly described this afternoon.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, during this hour the House has heard from members representing each of the three Maritime provinces and also from Ontario. As a member from western Canada, I should like to add that we too commend the hon. member for bringing this matter before us. We should like to see the resolution passed.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would not wish the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to pre-empt exclusively the interest of western Canada in this matter. I do not claim to have any particular familiarity with tidal power. However, energy is a matter of considerable concern in my part of Canada and therefore I should like to speak for a few moments on this interesting resolution.

I suppose the hon. member has already garnered sufficient accolades and congratulations that perhaps he might be able to do without any from me, though perhaps I may say his persistence, as he admitted in his remarks, has in large measure been gratified between the time he placed this resolution on the order paper in the first instance and today, when finally the House has had an opportunity to debate the matter.

A couple of things have occurred in very recent weeks in the over-all field of energy as it affects the Atlantic provinces which have a bearing on the economic feasibility of this particular study. Certainly the price changes in crude petroleum imports to eastern Canada must make alternate energy sources more attractive and be yet another plus factor for this type of project.

Then there is the ongoing exploration for petroleum off the east coast of Canada. We have had some titivating rumours from time to time in this regard, but regrettably nothing of sufficient substance on which to hang anything firm. Nevertheless, in the petroleum industry in Atlantic Canada there is a firm confidence that these exploration efforts will be rewarded with success which, if that is the case, will mean another factor enters the field of supplying energy to Atlantic Canada, a factor that will contribute to its economic well-being.

One hon. member who spoke earlier, I believe the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), pointed out that the federal government has already offered to join with the two provincial governments directly concerned in making a review of the finding of the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board. The papers presented at the Halifax meeting of the International Tidal Power Conference in May last year are, of course, available to the federal authorities, and they have been studied very thoroughly. The results of that conference confirm the technical viability of that project; there is no question about that. But regrettably, as the hon. member noted in his motion, the results of that conference did not contribute materially to our knowledge of the economic viability of the project.

The resolution before the House today refers specifically to the interest rates that have applied to federal government projects in the capital works field. Interest rates for major capital projects is a subject that is to be reviewed by this joint study with the two provincial governments. The problem is to determine what the interest rate pattern is likely to be over the next eight to ten years when the project is being built. Federal interest rates for funds advanced to Crown agencies for capital cost programs increased through the 1950s and the 1960s to a peak of about 8¼ per cent in mid-1970. During the current calendar year this rate has dropped to just below 7 per cent—6-15/16ths per cent—in the present quarter.

This is for all practical purposes the same rate that the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board adopted for its studies. The board used the figure of 7 per cent. It should, of course, be noted that commercial rates and borrowing rates by the provinces are likely to be somewhat higher. At the moment I think the prime commercial borrowing rate and provincial borrowing rates are running 8 per cent to 8½ per cent per annum. So at the moment it appears there is no indication that interest rates will decline sufficiently to improve the economic viability of the project beyond the information that was available to the programming board.

On the basis of the board's 1969 report, interest rates would have to fall to 3½ per cent to 4 per cent in order to make tidal power competitive—when I say competitive, I do not mean cheaper—with other hydroelectric power sources. Therefore, it does not look too promising that interest rates will soon achieve a level that will make the project economically viable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The hour provided for consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair. This House therefore stands adjourned until Monday at 2 p.m.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, could I inquire of the acting government House leader what the business is for Monday and the ensuing days?

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I do not quite know to whom that reference is directed. However, if I may answer on behalf of the party involved, I believe that at page 5161 of Hansard for April 22 the government House leader outlined the sequence of government business. This means that we will continue with Bill C-187, an act respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory. I gather there is a disposition to conclude debate on this matter on Monday. That being the case, it will be followed by Bill C-228, an act to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Hon. members will appreciate that I have no lines to read today, though I could have been poetic about the romance, adventure and wealth of the Yukon. At the same time, I should have recalled the beauty and powerful majesty of the untamed tides of the sea of Fundy. We Canadians are fortunate indeed that all these things are ours to enjoy and cherish.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 26, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

CONGRATULATIONS TO MEMBER FOR YORK SOUTH ON ELECTION AS NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY LEADER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, from your perspective at the end of the chamber it may not have come to your attention that the hon. member for York South, as a result of certain events over the weekend, has moved two feet to the right of his previous position in the House. I am delighted to view such a moderating trend in that party. When one reflects that the cost of the NDP convention was about $25,000, this represents the sum of $1,000 per inch—surely the highest unit cost of any political shift in Canadian history.

On behalf of the Liberal caucus, I wish to offer congratulations to the hon. member in his new leadership position. His election is a deserved recognition of a long and dedicated political career.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2:10 p.m.)

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to associate myself and my colleagues with the welcome expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on the arrival of the new leader of the New Democratic Party in the House. The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) is to be warmly congratulated on being selected as national leader of his party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I am sure we all applaud his new status, which might be described as "even-Stephen or even better".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I compliment the new leader on the high tone and the serious calibre of the convention which elected him. It again exemplified to me that, while we may have wide-ranging philosophical differences, in the party structure in this country there are common aspects of our behavior that tend to hold us together.

The group in the New Democratic Party who get together and argue strongly for principles divergent from the main stream are referred to as the Waffle. In the Progressive Conservative party they are referred to as the membership—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: —and in the Liberal party they are referred to as the cabinet.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: I want to make it very clear to the new leader of the NDP that I was not one of those who went along with the argument that he was too old for the position. I seem to recall that the same type of argument was made some time ago when it was thought that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) might contest the leadership of their newly formed party. There were people at that time who said he was too tall to be leader! In any event, Sir, the new leader has arrived, and although some may suggest that the letters NDP may be now thought of as standing for the words, "now David's problem"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stanfield: —in all sincerity, Sir, my colleagues and I wish him well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I am joining with all my colleagues in this House to convey to the hon. member for York South my most sincere congratulations on his election as leader of his party.

I would also like to wish him a most rewarding and very long mandate.

On behalf of all my colleagues, I am pleased to convey to him our most sincere congratulations, and to wish him a long stay in Parliament.

[English]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, as the most recent unemployed party leader in the House I should like to say on behalf of all of the members who sit in this party how proud we are of the new leader who has just been elected to head the New Democratic Party in Canada.

May I say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the reason the new leader has moved right and that I have moved left is that there was a strong suspicion in our party that I was being subverted by the Tories, and so I have been moved left to regain some of the pristine purity of the party.

The members of the NDP caucus met this morning and our first item of business was to move an unanimous motion of confidence in the new party leader and to pledge to him our undivided loyalty and support. I can assure the House that that is exactly what he will get from me and from all of us in this party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am naturally very grateful for all the kind words. I should like to say to the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) that if his party wants to see our organizers and find out how voting at a convention should be conducted, I shall take personal steps to make sure his party is educated in that regard. I find it rather difficult to find some other way in which I can help to educate his party, but we can give him better voting machines.

I should like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for his kind words. I am always impressed by the way in which he notes details very carefully. He noted that I had moved two feet to the right. I should like to say, I hope without offence, that at least the distance I moved to the right was noticeable and short, Mr. Speaker.

I intend to do my best, as I have tried to before, to hold the confidence of my colleagues, to win the respect of the House and to serve the people of Canada as best I can.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SALARIES AND ALLOWANCES

STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING INCREASES FOR MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT, SENATORS, SENIOR PUBLIC SERVANTS AND JUDGES—TABLING OF REPORTS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members are aware that for several months the government has been seized with recommendations and suggestions concerning certain classes of persons whose salaries are drawn from public funds. I wish now to inform the House of the recommendations which the government is prepared to make to Parliament in these respects.

A heavy responsiblity rests upon the government at any time to balance and discharge properly its dual obligations to the public: one, to attract and hold persons of outstanding ability and proper motivation and, second, to guard the public purse against unnecessary or imprudent expenditures. During an inflationary period of rising prices and increasingly high salary awards, these obligations become even more onerous for in issue is the role of the government as a leader in restraint. For these reasons the government has taken a stringent approach to those salaries directly dependent on government initiative and is grateful to those concerned for their patience and understanding.

It has become increasingly apparent however, Mr. Speaker, that public salary questions cannot be deferred indefinitely. Hon. members are aware that no complete review of salaries of senior public servants has been undertaken since 1969, that judicial salaries have not been increased since 1967, and that parliamentary salaries have not changed since 1963. The government has sought the advice of distinguished consultants in relation to these categories of office-holders. It has consulted as well with members of Parliament including spokesmen of the opposition parties in this House and with members of the other Chamber with respect to the question of compensation for Members of Parliament and Senators.

[English]

With respect to parliamentary salaries and expenses, the government has also reviewed and considered the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Parliamentary Salaries and Expenses chaired by Mr. T. N. Beaupré. It will be recalled, Mr. Speaker, that that committee stated in its report that it was guided by six basic principles which I shall attempt to summarize as follows:

First, the future of Canada depends largely upon the ability of the public to secure the services of the best possible people as parliamentarians.

Second, salaries should be high enough to attract persons of proven ability at a time when their earning potential may be at its highest.

Third, the position of the parliamentarian is essentially a full-time occupation; his working day in the House of Commons is usually much longer than the industrial average.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Fourth, the tenure of office of a member of the House of Commons is uncertain; 292 members have been defeated in the past 12 years, with probably more to come.

Fifth, the nature of the position is becoming increasingly more time-consuming, more complicated, more sensitive and requiring considerable moral courage.

Sixth, a member of Parliament must meet many expenses that are not common to other salary earners and that are not deductible for income tax purposes, as is the practice in many other countries.

It is the view of the government, Mr. Speaker, that the interests of Canada will not be served if Parliament fixes the levels of compensation of the elected representatives of the people at a level which is either so high as to attract candidates for reasons of financial gain, or so low as to deny effectively the opportunity of parliamentary service to all but those possessing private incomes. In the judgment of the government the second hazard is of more immediate cause for concern than is the first.

For these reasons, the government proposes to introduce, in this session, legislation to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act in the following respects: salaries for Members of Parliament and Senators would be increased from $12,000 per annum to $18,000 per annum. This increase amounts to approximately 6 per cent per year since 1963, about one-half of the size recommended by the Beaupré Committee. Expense allowances for Members of Parliament would be increased in the amount of $2,000 with new differentials for members representing the northern constituencies. Expense allowances for Senators will continue to be one-half of those for Members of Parliament. It will be proposed that these changes take effect from the beginning of the present session.

The government will not propose at this time changes in the salaries of office holders in Parliament as recommended by the Beaupre committee.

The government will introduce in this session as well amendments to the Judges Act which will increase judicial salaries significantly in an attempt both to recognize more adequately the heavy responsibilities of these persons, and to facilitate the appointment to the bench of younger candidates who may have family responsibilities.

Legislation will also be introduced to provide for an increase in the salary of the Auditor General by equating the salary of the holder of this important public office to that of the Chief Justice of the Federal Court of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The government intends to introduce as well legislation to amend the Prime Minister's Residence Act to bring within it provisions for a residence for the Leader of the Opposition and for a residence for the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This measure recommends the conversion of that act into an Official Residences Act, placing the three residences on a rent-free basis consistent with the recommendations of the Beaupré Committee. In the case of the Prime Minister's residence the new provisions would come into force after the next general election, while provisions for the residences of the Speaker of the House and the Leader of the Opposition would be effective as of January 1, 1970.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to turn briefly to the question of salaries for senior members of the Public Service. The government has received and approved in principle the second report of the Advisory Group on Executive Compensation in the Public Service, chaired by Mr. J. V. Clyne.

In the report, the advisory group has once more stressed the importance of performance evaluation in the application and continuing administration of individual rates of pay for executives in the Public Service. It examined the existing executive salary structure in relation to the trends and levels in executive salaries in the private and public sectors as well as to the results of collective bargaining in the Public Service, and concluded that if the Public Service is to attract and retain the services of the best available personnel for executive positions, executive salaries must remain reasonably competitive with those in the private sector.

Although the advisory group recommended that the salary ranges for executives and deputy ministers be adjusted, it did so subject to the following reservation which the government strongly endorses:

> We wish to stress once again that we are not recommending salary increases for senior executives, but rather that we are providing a salary framework that should permit the government to obtain and retain the best available people for the most important positions in the Public Service.

The government has decided not to approve at this time the recommendation which would have had the effect of extending the maxima of the ranges by 20 per cent in exceptional circumstances.

The advisory group recommends that the managerial group excluded from collective bargaining should be more clearly identified and enlarged, and the government is prepared to have this matter studied further in conjunction with the review of legislation affecting collective bargaining. The government has also approved the four principles which would govern the determination of pay and conditions of work for the management group, whatever its size or composition.

The report deals with the proposals for early retirement which are reflected in the government organization bill which received first reading on December 9, 1970. The administrative recommendations relating to early retirement have been referred to the Treasury Board for action, as have the recommendations relating to non-salary compensation.

Salary revisions for both judges and senior public servants will be phased in over a two-year period, deferring full implementation until January 1, 1972, but moving half-way with effect from January 1, 1971.

Finallly, Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to express my appreciation and that, I am sure, of all hon. members to Mr. Beaupré and the members of his committee, Mr. Arthur Maloney and Monsieur Marc Lapointe, for the time which they have devoted to these important matters and for their excellent report. We also thank Mr. Clyne and the members of his advisory group, Drs. J. J. Deutsch and Roger Gaudry, Mr. Allen Lambert and Monsieur Marcel Vincent.

In conclusion, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table the second report of the Advisory Group on Executive Compensation, as well as a document containing details of the proposed increases in judicial salaries.

[English]

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) forecasts legislation of a type that is, I believe, of basic importance to the Canadian nation, Therefore I wish to express appreciation of the fact that a copy of the statement was made available in advance.

The statement deals with the most important institutions of our democratic system of government, including the position of Parliament itself with relation to the remuneration of the membership of the Senate and House of Commons. The provision of residences for two of the most important officers of the House, the Leader of the Opposition and the holder of the position of Speaker, is long overdue. The salary of the Auditor General, one of the most important servants of Parliament, is also of great importance, as are the salaries of judges. Finally, the salary ranges of senior public servants in the executive class range and the salary ranges of deputy ministers are of importance.

Referring to the last matter, I note that the government is closely following the recommendations of the advisory group on salary ranges for executives and deputy ministers. This matter will be carefully examined when the legislation is before us.

With regard to the salaries of judges, I believe it is essential that salaries in this field be kept at a level which will attract the most qualified members of the legal profession. However, members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and others more qualified to speak on this matter will deal with this item at greater length when the legislation is before us.

I commend the government for accepting the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts with regard to the salary of the Auditor General. I consider it appropriate that it be at the level now proposed.

With regard to the provision of residences for those holding the positions of Prime Minister, Leader of the Opposition and Speaker, I believe that Canada has been niggardly in this regard. Its record has been poor. There has been an official residence for the Prime Minister for the past number of years but no official residence for the Leader of the Opposition. Incidentally, there are some reservations attached to the former which I do not think appropriate. I hope they will be corrected. Up until this time, no residence has been provided at public expense for the Leader of the Opposition. I think it is time that this was corrected. The important position of Speaker of the House is one which should carry with it the provision of a suitable residence. We lag behind other countries of the Commonwealth in this regard.

I turn now to the subject of adjusting the salaries and allowances of Senators and Members of Parliament. Not since 1963 has anything been done in this field. I should like to quote briefly from what was said by the Prime Minister of the day on the occasion of the last salary adjustment. He said as reported at page 2735 of Hansard for July 29 of that year:

> This resolution, Mr. Chairman, involves a responsibility which, if action is to be taken at all, cannot be escaped either by the government of the day or by Parliament itself, since it cannot be delegated to any other body.

I should also like to quote briefly from the remarks of my right hon. friend from Prince Albert who was then the Leader of the Opposition. Speaking in the same debate, he said:

> I begin by saying that I am in agreement with the Prime Minister when he says the responsibility must rest upon the government. That responsibility is theirs. On the other hand, the matter is one that, being concerned with personal interest, denies consideration being given on a partisan basis. In other words, each and every member should be in the position of determining for himself or herself the attitude to be taken on this matter—I agree with the Prime Minister that legislating to one's own benefit is something that must be subject to the conscientious viewpoint of each and every member. It cannot be decided on the basis of party considerations or party purposes.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to bind members of this party as to their attitude to this measure, nor would I wish to do so if I could. I have, however, interested myself on behalf of this institution in the financial position in which members of the House of Commons find themselves as a result of serving the nation in Parliament. A considerable number of members are in the fortunate position of having independent means in consequence of which they are in a position to serve in Parliament regardless of what their remuneration may be. However, without belittling their services in any way I think it is fair to say they would be the first to believe that service in the House of Commons should not be limited to people who are so fortunate as to be blessed by independent means.

There is another group in the membership of the House who can manage fairly well on the present level of salaries. They are people with few or no dependants and members who, though perhaps in some cases they would not want to admit it, have working wives. Again, there are members who come from urban areas and who are able to vacate their homes and rent them to help pay for living accommodation in Ottawa during the year. However, I was struck by the number of members, especially younger members with young families, who are suffering real economic hardship because they are serving their constituents as Members of Parliament. I believe that if Canada is to be well served by a cross-section of age groups and economic groups representative of the general public, some improvement in the salaries and allowances of Members of Parliament is imperative.

It is imperative for a number of reasons, I believe. There has been a continual rise in the cost of living. There have been no increases in members' salaries since 1963. I suspect there are few other salaried groups in the country whose position has not been changed since 1963 either in the private sector or in the public sector. As a result, the salary ranges of Members of Parliament have fallen badly out of line with salaries paid in other fields, including salaries paid to members in other jurisdictions. In most cases, relatively speaking, Members of Parliament are in an unfavourable position compared with members of provincial legislatures and in some cases they are in an inferior position in absolute terms.

Over the period since 1963 there has been a great increase in the expenses hon. members must incur because they are subjected to increased costs in carrying out their representation of their constituencies adequately. I note that the increase in salaries recommended by the government is well within the wage increase guideline of a maximum of 6 per cent per annum. I note, too, that the increase in salaries is roughly half the increase recommended by the Beaupré Commission after a careful study of the question last year. Expense allowances on the average are probably less than those recommended by the Beaupré Commission, but a comparison in this field is difficult to make because of a difference of approach to this matter. I note with approval that differentials are being provided in the case of members who represent the vast northern constituencies.

I would hope however, that the government would envolve a more systematic method of dealing with parliamentary salaries. I believe that on the whole these proposals will commend themselves to the membership of the House. I think it behooves members to look at this matter as objectively as they can, recognizing that these salaries are provided not for the individuals who happen to be occupying seats at the moment but for the positions which are held.

Finally, I join with the Prime Minister in expressing appreciation for the work done by the Beaupré Commission, by the Clyne Committee and by the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the subject of members' salaries is a delicate one and that there is a great deal of uneasiness and some tension in connection with the matter. I also recognize that since the salaries and expense allowances have not been adjusted for eight years there may be some justification for increasing them now. I am most anxious that no one in the House should interpret what I am about to say as amounting to a "holier than thou" attitude, but I cannot agree to an increase of 50 per cent in the salaries of Members of Parliament when the government and the Prices and Incomes Commission have told the workers of Canada that they cannot have increases of more than 6 per cent and when the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission now says they should not have increases of more than 4 per cent to 5 per cent.

It is true to say that the job of a Member of Parliament has now become a full-time job, that we are working long hours and all the rest of it. It is also true to say that the overwhelming majority of working people in this country have no alternative but to take the jobs they have, no matter how low their wages, and that Members of Parliament have an alternative as to whether they want to be here or do some job elsewhere which may pay them more. I do not think this comparison is at all justified, either morally or factually.

I appreciate that there are differences in this House, that there are some people who are better off, some people who are worse off, some people who have more dependants and some who have fewer dependants to take care of. I do not condemn anyone for supporting this proposal, but I say that increases of 50 per cent in salary and 33 per cent in our expenses are far too large to place before Parliament. This is far too large an increase for us as Members of Parliament to accept and vote for at a time when a large proportion of our working people are unemployed and at a time when we have told workers there are limits to the amount of increases for which they ought to ask.

I find particularly unsatisfactory the suggestion that these increases be retroactive for six months to last October 1. Nor can I accept the explanation that there is a make-up provision by which we average out the increase to 6 per cent per year since 1963. The railway workers were negotiating very recently and demanded a make-up provision because they had fallen behind. They got something, but very little, and we were on the verge of a strike because of the attitude taken by the railway companies, particularly the publicly-owned company which depends on this Parliament for additional funds to deal with increases in the wages of its workers.

An hon. Member: What about plumbers and electricians?

Mr. Lewis: An hon. member refers to plumbers and electricians. Let me say without any hesitation, speaking for myself, that I think the increases in the construction trades did not take into account the need for homes, the cost of homes and the public welfare of this country, but that does not justify Members of Parliament taking steps which are socially unjustifiable in the circumstances in which we live.

The Prime Minister says that the government took into account the Beaupré report. May I suggest that the government did not do that at all. Two of the things the Beaupré report emphasizes are that there ought not be large expense allowances without expenses being justified by voucher and, second, that there ought to be a large increase in the kind of services we are able to give our constituents and the kind of facilities we have to do our jobs. Both of these suggestions were ignored by the government. The government merely proposes to increase from $6,000 to $8,000 the non-taxable expense allowance, for which we are not required to provide any vouchers at all. This is a pretty large sum of money that can now be used by Members of Parliament and members of the Senate for expenses without having to account for it.

There are differences in my party, as there are differences elsewhere, as to what level of increase there might be. But I am sure I remember correctly when I say that all my colleagues, when we discussed this matter some time ago, were unanimous in emphasizing that an increase in facilities and assistance for Members of Parliament in serving their constituents and their country is a more important matter than the question of an increase in salary. There is no adjustment whatsoever in the facilities which Members of Parliament are given although there is an increase in salaries and in expense allowances.

I knew when I rose that there would be catcalls, needling and catcalls round the House, but that is not going to stop me from making very clear the position I feel is the proper one. I suggest to the Prime Minister that the entire system in fact is wrong. I do not agree even with the appointment of a special committee or commission to deal with this matter. I think the time has come to place the salaries of Members of Parliament in some appropriate classification of the Public Service in order that members will obtain adjustments in the regular, annual way that public servants receive adjustments and will get no more than public servants receive from year to year.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Lewis: If all hon. members agree with the proposition—

An hon. Member: What classification?

Mr. Lewis: The classification might be suitable for the hon. member for Ontario or it might even be too high; I do not know. But if all hon. members agree that this is what should be done, surely this is the time to do it. Salaries should be set at some appropriate and not exaggerated level so Members of Parliament do not have to go through the unpleasant and distasteful job every few years of voting large increases because over a period of years there has been no adjustment at all.

I am particularly disturbed by the fact that increases of considerable size are being given members of the Senate. Their job is certainly not full time. They have ample time to carry on whatever business they have. We have always thought the Senate was an unnecessary institution anyway, and we do so now. I cannot in my mind justify the very exaggerated increase suggested for members of the other place any more than I can justify the increase suggested for members of this House.

May I say a word or two about one or two other matters. It is my understanding that the adjustment with regard to the residence of Mr. Speaker, and I hope I am wrong, is merely to legalize something that has already been done for some time. My understanding is that it refers only to the farm at Kingsmere. I think I am right in suggesting that the general feeling in the country as well as in the House is that we should make the Speaker's position more permanent and that one day Mr. Speaker will be provided with a home in Ottawa rather than being limited to the farm at Kingsmere.

As far as other personnel are concerned, I do not know exactly what the government is proposing because the details are not yet before us. I have already spoken too long and I do not wish to take any more time, but let me say to the government that the time is overdue for the setting up of machinery to take the place of collective bargaining for that part of the civil service which is not entitled to collective bargaining under the law.

I have deliberately spoken without the emphasis I usually employ because of my knowledge of the sensitivity of the problem. I conclude by repeating that, while in my view an increase in the salaries of hon. members is obviously justified after eight years without any adjustment, the government is wrong and the people who advised it are wrong when they come up with a figure of a 44 per cent increase in total, a 50 per cent increase in salary alone and a 33 per cent increase in expense allowances for which hon. members do not have to account by vouchers showing actual expenses. I am certain it was done in good faith. I am not making any accusations. But I am always impressed by the double standard we use in our society. We use one standard for people like ourselves who are in a privileged position and another standard for people who are not in a privileged position.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I see the government is no longer reluctant to introduce the conclusions of the Beaupré Committee. Judging from consultations that have been going on behind the scenes, there was anxiety.

However, I do not think that at any point of the negotiations there has ever been any threat of strike in the event the proposals would have been deemed unacceptable. Everything seems to be geared towards friendly relations among all concerned and the solution of what appears to be a salary increase problem.

I am pleased to congratulate the members of the Beaupré Committee for having given a report which does not apparently lead to too many unfavourable comments. I had the opportunity of finding out that arbitration reports on some negotiations are not always that welcome.

On the second page of the right hon. Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) remarks, it is mentioned that the committee was guided in its report by six basic principles of which I will quote some:

(1) The future of Canada depends largely upon the ability of the public to secure the services of the bast possible people as parliamentarians.

We agree entirely on that.

The fourth is as follows:

(4) The tenure of office of a Member of the House of Commons is uncertain; 292 members have been defeated in the past 12 years.

No doubt would it be interesting to analyse the causes of past changes. I do not think they could be attributed to the members' indemnity.

Here is the fifth:

(5) The nature of the position is becoming increasingly more time consuming, more complicated, more sensitive—

In fact, this is true in some cases.

—and requiring considerable moral courage.

An hon. member is undoubtedly liable to exhaust his fortitude reserves in order to bring Canadians to accept the present system.

In so far as incomes are concerned, I see that a great percentage of civil servants earn more than $25,000 a year, some $35,000 or $40,000, and I would like to mention in particular the Governor of the Bank of Canada, who earns $75,000 a year.

After that statement, I will add that we were much more interested in the improvement of working conditions in Parliament offices. Many hon. members are faced with space problems which should be solved. We think that it would have been in order for each hon. member to benefit from a secretarial office in his constituency in order to make available to his constituents the information which they need.

It can be read on page 44 of the report of the committee, and I quote:

For Members of the House of Commons wishing to establish constituency offices, provision of space in federal buildings or alternatively, payment up to $1,200 per annum for the rental of office accommodation and payment up to $1,500 per annum for office assistance.

I note that there is no mention of this in the statement.

To conclude what I had to say on this matter, I think that it is in order to repeat here what I said in 1963, since the last salary raise dates back to that year.

I have in hands the full text of what I said on a practically similar occasion, not very long after the salary raise which had been granted then, and I quote:

Has a second thought been given to the feeling of fathers who can barely make both ends meet with incomes of $1,000, $1,500 or $2,000 a year, to the feelings of those who, in their sickness, must accept the restrictions imposed by social service officials regarding their own subsistence and that of their families, and even worse, to the feelings of the unemployed? There are thousands of them, as everybody knows, who live in constant fear.

What was their reaction—

—or what will be their reaction—

—when they saw that legislators were looking after their own interests instead of settling urgent problems such as unemployment, family allowance increases, boosts in old age pensions—

—in this respect, there already has been clear improvement—and in pensions to veterans who, more than any others, have given their all for the survival of democracy, for which their countrymen should have been ever grateful—

—members of Parliament thought of themselves first.

I could continue enumerating quite a number of undeserved cases of destitution. Have we considered those unsettled cases before granting ourselves an increase of indemnities?

It is unfortunate, but such actions contribute to increase dissatisfaction among the people. Canadian citizens are always ready to pay their administrators handsomely,— —provided that they render good services—

—as long as they do not forget to give them in the first place the necessary means to earn a decent living.

Let us compare the imbalance between the increasing rise of salaries of the average Canadian heads of families and the unchanged rates of family allowances.

I said this in 1963, and there is nothing I have to withdraw. I have no reason for changing my opinion because the system has not improved.

This is what I had to say concerning the statement we just heard.

PEI—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS AND MANPOWER TRAINING

Question No. 1,079—Mr. McQuaid:

1. How many residents of the Province of Prince Edward Island were drawing unemployment insurance benefits as of (a) January 31, 1969 (b) January 31, 1970 (c) January 31, 1971?

2. What was the total amount paid in the Province of Prince Edward Island in unemployment insurance benefits on each date?

3. During the months of October, November and December, 1970 and January, 1971, how many applications for unemployment insurance were rejected and for what reasons?

4. As of January 31, 1971, how many people in the Province of Prince Edward Island were enrolled in the various upgrading courses sponsored by the Department of Manpower and Immigration?

5. What was the total amount paid during the month of January, 1971, to those enrolled in the various upgrading courses sponsored by the Department of Manpower and Immigration?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower and Immigration as follows: 1. The total of active benefit claims on January 31 of each year were: (a) 1969, 6,687; (b) 1970, 5,946; (c) 1971, 7,003.

2. The total amount of Unemployment Insurance Benefits paid in the month of January each year was: (a) 1969, $691,818; (b) 1970, $719,114; (c) 1971, $730,142.

3. The number of claimants who failed to qualify for benefit by reason of insufficient contributions to the fund during each month were: (a) October, 1970, 48; (b) November, 1970, 223; (c) December, 1970, 2377; (d) January, 1971, 949.

4. 2,086 full-time trainees in both skill and educational upgrading courses.

5. $412,224 was paid in training allowances during January, 1971 to trainees in Prince Edward Island.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES—INCOME DERIVED FROM COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,092—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources does not provide computer services to: (a) other departments; (b) industry; (c) provincial governments; (d) municipalities.

SASKATCHEWAN—SECOND NATIONAL PARK

Question No. 1,231—Mr. Southam:

Has a site for Saskatchewan's second National Park been definitely established and negotiations completed between the federal and provincial governments and, if so, on what date will the development work commence on this project?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No site for a second National Park in Saskatchewan has been definitely established. Discussions are continuing between Saskatchewan and the Federal Government to this end, however, and no development work will commence until an agreement is reached.

WOOD BUFFALO NATIONAL PARK—TIMBER BERTHS

Question No. 1,238—Mr. Harding:

1. In Wood Buffalo National Park, how many timber leases are currently in force (a) when was each lease granted (b) what is its termination date (c) what is the acreage involved (d) who holds the lease?

2. (a) What was the total revenue received from these leases for each of the past five fiscal years (b) what was the total timber cut involved?

3. (a) Who is responsible for reforestation on the leased areas (b) has any replanting of cut-over areas been carried out and, if so, by whom and in what amounts for each of the past five years?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Three timber cutting agreements are currently in force in Wood Buffalo National Park: (a) Timber Berth No. 367, June 8, 1955; Timber Berth No. 378, January 11, 1956; Timber Berth No. 408, May 24, 1956. (b) Timber Berth No. 367, July 31, 1972; Timber Berth No. 378, May 31, 1975; Timber Berth No. 408, July 31, 1981, with provision for one 21-year renewal. (c) Timber Berth No. 367, 13.4 square miles; Timber Berth No. 378, 26 square miles; Timber Berth No. 408, 216 square miles; (d) Swanson Lumber Co., Ltd., 600 Bentall Building, 10180—102 Street, Edmonton 15, Alberta.

2. (a) 1970, $23,208.16; 1969, $25,301.01; 1968, $21,928.63; 1967, $18,745.55; 1966, $14,248.59. (b) 90,475,021 FBM.

3. (a) Natural regeneration. (b) No.

GLACIER NATIONAL PARK—TIMBER BERTH

Question No. 1,241—Mr. Harding:

Have all the titles to private timber berths in Glacier National Park been transferred to the Crown and, if so (a) who was the previous owner of each (b) what was the acreage involved (c) what was the amount paid for the holdings purchased?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes. (a) Previous owners of each were: (i) Kicking Horse Forest Products Co. Ltd., in Golden, B.C. holding cutting licences for Timber Berths Nos. 40, 292, 328, 329 and 342; (ii) Selkirk Spruce Mills Co. Ltd., Donald, B.C., Timber Berth No. 117. (b) The acreage involved was approximately 31.85 square miles. (c) The amount paid for the purchases was $2,943,032.

GRANTS UNDER REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES ACT

Question No. 1,245—Mr. MacGuigan:

Have any individuals, firms or companies received more than one grant under the Regional Economic Expansion Programme and, if so, which ones?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes; under the Regional Development Incentives Act and the Government Organization Act (1969), the following firms have accepted more than one offer: Bruck Mills Ltd., Canadian International Paper Co., Chemcell Limited, Dominion Textile Ltd., Ecstall Mining Ltd., Green Lantern Wholesalers Ltd., Lakeside Farm Industries, L. E. Shaw Ltd., McCain Foods Ltd., Moore Business Forms Ltd., Murdock Lumber Co., National Sea Products Ltd., Noranda Mines Ltd., Ocean Harvesters Ltd., Red Earth Lumber Co. Ltd., Stanfield's Limited, Sydney Steel Corporation, and United Sawmill Co.

DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS—INCOME DERIVED FROM COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,258—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): (a) n/a; (b) n/a; (c) n/a; (d) n/a.

PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION—VOLUNTARY GUIDELINES, 1970

Question No. 1,274—Mr. Orlikow:

1. In preparing its voluntary guidelines in 1970 did the Prices and Incomes Commission make any normative assumptions about the distribution of income?

2 Did the Prices and Incomes Commission consider what the impact of its guidelines policy would be on the distribution of income and, if so, what was the expected impact?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I have been informed by the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission as follows: (1) The pricing criteria approved by the National Conference on Price Stability and endorsed by the Federal-Provincial Conference of First Ministers were intended to ensure a narrowing of average profit margins for the business sector of the economy as a whole during 1970. The wage and salary criteria, in conjunction with the pricing criteria, implied a greater moderation of the rise of consumer prices during 1970 than the corresponding moderation of the rise in average compensation per employee. Wage increases for employees earning $2.00 per hour or less were specifically exempted from the suggested upper limit of six per cent. (2) Taken as a whole, the guidelines for 1970 were intended to be consistent with some enlargement of the share of employee compensation in net national income during the year, involving some contraction of other income shares, including corporate profits.

REDUCTION IN LEVEL OF PRICE INCREASES, 1970

Question No. 1,283—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did the Prices and Incomes Commission contribute to a reduction in the rate of price increases in 1970?

2. To what factors other than its own activities does the Prices and Incomes Commission attribute the reduction in the level of price increases in 1970?

Hon. Ron. Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I have been informed by the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission as follows: 1. Yes.

2. Canada's price performance in 1970 was the result of several factors in addition to the price restraint program. These include a weaker demand for goods and services, the appreciation of the Canadian dollar, and special circumstances affecting food prices in certain parts of the country.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PUBLIC WORKS—HIRING OF ARCHITECTURAL FIRMS

Question No. 379—Mr. Coates:

1. How many architectural firms have been retained for specific projects by the government since June 25, 1968?

2. (a) What are the names of the firms retained (b) what is the specific project in each instance (c) what is the amount they have received to date in fees and expenses for services rendered (d) what will be the final estimated cost in fees and expenses in each instance?

Return tabled.

GRAIN—CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACCOUNTS

Question No. 617—Mr. Douglas:

1. What was the surplus or deficit in the Canadian Wheat Board accounts for durum wheat, other wheat, oats and barley in each of the past twenty crop years?

2. How many bushels of each class of grain were delivered in each of the same years?

3. In cents per bushel, what were the initial and final Wheat Board payments on the top grade of each of those four types of grain in each of the same years?

Return tabled.

FEDERAL CONTRACTS LET TO KATES, PEAT AND MARWICK

Question No. 675—Mr. Skoberg:

1. How many federal contracts have been let to the consulting firm of Kates, Peat and Marwick, in 1968 and 1969 (a) what was the total cost of the contracts in 1968 (b) what was the total cost of the contracts in 1969?

2. How many of these contracts for consulting services were awarded by competitive tender?

3. Were there any contracts let to the firm of Kates, Peat and Marwick concerning the survey of coal reserve estimates in any part of Canada and, if so, in what areas?

Return tabled.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT INTENTION REGARDING PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether, in light of answers given last week in the House, he is now in a position to tell the House what action, if any, is intended with regard to the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, sometimes referred to as the Turner act? Can the minister tell the House now what will happen to it?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No, Sir. We will make an announcement in the House as soon as feasible.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of what I understood was the assurance given by the minister that a proposal would be put before the House in such a manner that it could be discussed, is the minister prepared to give the House an assurance that this matter will not be introduced and a conclusion forced upon the House before the expiry date of the Turner act on April 30?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): My assurance was given and it stands. As for the date of April 30, the hon. gentleman will have to wait and see.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister why he cannot tell the House, or rather when he will tell the House, what action the government proposes to take and not simply stall and procrastinate on this important matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is hardly a supplementary question.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): My supplementary question is simple and straightforward, and I hope I will get the same kind of answer. Will the announcement the minister will be making be made before April 30 next?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I cannot be categorical about that.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—APPLICATION CRITERIA—EXPLANATION OF REFUSALS—INCREASE IN MONEY ALLOCATED

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister with regard to the student employment program about which he told the House some time ago. It arises out of a suspicion across the country about the criteria which have been used for the acceptance or refusal of proposals made to the Department of the Secretary of State. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he could take steps to make sure that those whose programs have been refused will receive a full explanation of the reasons for refusal and an elaborated idea of the criteria which are being used in judging these proposals?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the rumours on which the question is based are obviously wrong, because no program has either been accepted or refused as of this date. Obviously, in view of the figures which were given by the Secretary of State, we will have to refuse some of the proposals, and reasons will be given why they are refused.

Mr. Lewis: I am glad to stand corrected, Mr. Speaker, but will the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State assure the House that proposals which are made will be dealt with a great deal more rapidly, and that machinery for discussing the proposals will be made available to the people who have ideas instead of making them wait for weeks before they even receive an acknowledgement?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I can promise that, Mr. Speaker. That is at present the main goal we have in mind in the Secretary of State's Department for administration of the program.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Although I have not had any time to look through all of Hansard in the last few weeks, as the minister will understand, I did look quickly through the statement he made last Thursday in which he pointed out that a large amount of money would be involved if he accepted all the programs, which seemed to me to be not very relevant. May I ask the Secretary of State—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member asking a supplementary question?

Mr. Lewis: Yes, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Secretary of State whether the government is considering increasing the amount of money made available for the Opportunities for Youth program?

Mr. Pelletier: Yes, Mr. Speaker, the government is considering the matter.

[English]

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR COMPLETION OF PROJECTS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): My question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that there may be considerable delay, because of the number of applications under the Opportunities for Youth program, has the Secretary of State or the government considered extending the deadline for the completion of projects, since obviously some of them will not be starting as early as anticipated?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): That is a problem we have not faced yet, Mr. Speaker. After selection of projects and assessment of the time required for their implementation, we will get around to such considerations. I feel they are now premature. There are other more urgent problems.

[English]

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—APPROVAL OF PROJECTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Some members on this side may have misunderstood the Prime Minister, so perhaps he might wish to clarify one of his answers. Did the Prime Minister say that none of these projects has yet been approved?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Oxford and eventually the hon. member for Broadview, but after these two supplementary questions we will go on to the hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the Prime Minister's answer can he give the House the assurance that approval of these projects which are pending will commence immediately and not be delayed indefinitely?

Mr. Trudeau: We are expecting to do it by or before May 15.

TRAVELLING STUDENTS—SUGGESTED DELETION OF VAGRANCY SECTION FROM CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that many university students have completed their courses and will be travelling across Canada as a result of the summer youth projects, will the minister seriously consider deleting the vagrancy section from the Criminal Code so they will not be harassed in their travels?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

FINANCE

LIMITATION OF FOREIGN BORROWING BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the Minister of Finance.

Is he in a position to advise whether he has in recent days forwarded a letter to the provincial governments as well as to investment brokers asking them to restrict their bond sales and borrowings abroad?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): What I have done has been to urge Canadian borrowers to borrow in Canada rather than abroad, and I have done this before. When the current account is in surplus and there is an inflow of long-term foreign capital, it means that large borrowings abroad place pressure on the upward movement of the Canadian dollar.

REPEGGING OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FINANCIAL AND FISCAL COMMITTEE

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): In order to avoid further appreciation of the Canadian dollar, does the government now have a policy with regard to the dollar, and is there now an upper limit that the government will guarantee?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If the government is going to take a position with regard to re-establishing a fixed value for the Canadian dollar, it will be announced in the normal manner.

Mr. Ryan: Is the government considering the creation of a continuing joint federal-provincial financial and fiscal committee which would meet regularly, either monthly or quarterly, to co-ordinate borrowing and taxing policies?

Mr. Benson: If my hon. friend had been listening he would know that I have stated several times in the House that provincial treasurers and Ministers of Finance and the Minister of Finance of Canada have arranged to meet quarterly.

[Translation]

BANK OF CANADA—SUGGESTED PROVISION OF INTEREST-FREE LOANS

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Portneuf wishes to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of Finance be willing to put the Bank of Canada at the service of all Canadians so they may be granted interest-free loans to be used to create capital for public investment purposes?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The Bank of Canada is at the service of all Canadians.

MINING COMPANIES CAPITAL REQUIREMENTS—ALLOCATION OF MONEY AVAILABLE FOR BORROWING IN CANADA

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister given consideration to the fact that indications from mining companies are that there will be a 25.4 per cent increase in their capital requirements this year, and if those intentions are acted upon they will pre-empt other borrowings on the market? Has the minister, therefore, given any consideration to finding some way of allocating capital where it can be most usefully employed in the economy and thus reduce pressure on the Canadian dollar?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the past year the Canadian market has absorbed record amounts of long-term borrowing. There appears to be a good opportunity for borrowing in the Canadian market, and I have urged borrowers to use the Canadian market as much as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—FEDERAL INTERVENTION IN PROCEEDINGS BEFORE SUPREME COURT RESPECTING VALIDITY OF PROVINCIAL REGULATIONS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the very forthright Minister of Justice if he has instructed, or if the government has instructed, counsel to intervene in the litigation involving the validity of provincial regulations restricting interprovincial trade which were passed by the provinces of Quebec and Manitoba? Has he instructed counsel to appear and oppose the legality of those regulations?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member is talking about the appeal from the Court of Appeal of Manitoba on that type of legislation, the federal government will appear before the Supreme Court of Canada in that case.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, will the minister assure the House categorically now that the instructions which will be given to counsel will be to oppose the legality of these regulations, and not sit idly by and watch this problem in connection with national unity become worse?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the proper place for counsel to reveal his position on behalf of the Department of Justice is before the court.

Mr. Baldwin: On a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I am asking the government to reveal its position.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a further supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. Can he advise the House how soon this appeal will be heard by the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, as it is a very important case I imagine the Supreme Court would want to put it on the preferential list, but that is up to the court.

COMMUNICATIONS

INCLUSION ON AGENDA OF JUNE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE IN LIGHT OF STATEMENT BY QUEBEC MINISTER

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister say whether, in view of the statement of the Quebec Minister of Communications which one of the Prime Minister's own colleagues has termed rather flabbergasting, the subject of federal authority over communications will be a specific item on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference to be held in Victoria in June?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There has been no request that the matter be put on the agenda, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Benson.]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State. Has the Secretary of State, who speaks for the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, submitted a proposal to the Prime Minister that this matter be placed on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference in June in view of the extensive remarks which the Quebec Minister of Communications made last weekend, regardless of what he said the weekend before, which clearly challenge federal authority in this field?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member who has just spoken sees clearly what threats arise from these speeches and on which particular points and group of points the minister wants to instigate changes, I must admit that he has been able to consider the minister's statements for longer than I have or with greater concentration. Indeed, from one statement to the next, growing confusion persists regarding the minister's intentions, and that is why I, myself, have not been able to submit any clear proposal to the attention of the government.

[English]

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a further supplementary question to the Secretary of State. When the Secretary of State has time to translate the statement of the provincial Minister of Communications, or to talk to the federal Minister of Communications to find out what the Minister of Communications in Quebec is saying about this important matter, would he be prepared to make a statement in the House on the position of the federal government, prior to the federal-provincial conference, as to whether this matter is going to be discussed at that conference, or are we going to witness another example of the federal government abdicating its jurisdiction and responsibility as it has with agriculture?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN HUDSON BAY MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY AND EMPLOYEES—DEPARTMENTAL ACTION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can he say whether he or the officials of his department are taking any new steps to bring an end to the dispute at Flin Flon which has continued for so many months?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I had a chat late last week with the hon. member for Churchill, as well as with the Minister of Labour of Manitoba, about the prolonged strike at Flin Flon, and I am now contemplating the establishment of an industrial inquiry commission, if necessary, later in the week. At least, this is one of the areas I am now investigating.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

USE OF ALL-ESKIMO JURY—SIMILAR PRACTICE IN TRIALS OF INDIANS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the precedent recently set in the Northwest Territories concerning the appointment of an all-Eskimo jury in the trial of an Eskimo, so far as his authority allows him would the minister recommend a similar practice in cases of trials of people of Indian ancestry?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, a jury is selected according to the provisions of the Criminal Code.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

QUEBEC OBJECTIONS TO BILL—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT PRIOR TO COMMITTEE CONSIDERATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour in connection with the unemployment insurance bill which has received second reading. In light of the fact the Minister of Labour of Quebec has indicated that he remains unwilling to accept some of the basic features of federal unemployment insurance, and since it is more than likely the minister held a meeting within the past week to discuss this matter, can he now advise if the objections which the provincial minister has taken in his emphatic stand have been cleared up, or is the standing committee of this House going to meet in a state of frustration, not knowing what that province or any other province wants?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member for Hamilton West will not mind my suggesting to him that the question he is asking deals with a matter which has been before the House and is now before a committee of the House. I would think that the question the hon. member has asked should better be resolved when the matter is before the committee or eventually when it is again before the House. Perhaps there may be an aspect of the matter which escapes me at the moment, but I would hope that the hon. member would not press the question.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and with all due deference, the matter happens to be quite important to me, and I think to all those of us on this side of the House, in view of the fact we have been continually told by the Minister of Labour that if there have been any objections by the provinces, and particularly by the province of Quebec, those objections have been met. It seems to me that the minister must make a statement prior to the time the standing committee meets in order to prevent frustration on the part of hon. members and in order that we may know just what are the problems raised by Quebec in connection with the bill. I think the House is entitled to a statement by the minister on motions prior to the bill being considered by the committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply briefly, but I still suggest to hon. members it is a basic rule of procedure that when a bill is before a standing committee of the House, or when a bill is under consideration in the House, no question should be asked about it during the question period. But I appreciate the point made by the hon. member, and the minister might be allowed to reply to it briefly.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am quite satisfied that the bill falls within the jurisdiction of the federal government. Now that we have adopted the principle of the bill on second reading I presume all members of the House will understand that it is a federal bill, not a provincial bill. I am not certain what philosophical differences may still exist between the Minister of Labour for the province of Quebec and myself, or for that matter with other provinces, but I am satisfied that the bill is structurally sound, does not violate the constitution, and is an important and progressive piece of social legislation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The reply given by the minister indicates exactly the difficulty which underlies the allowing of questions about a bill which has been before the House and has been given second reading, indicating that there has been approval by the House of the principle of the bill. In my view, it is a reflection on the vote of the House to be asking questions now about the matter which to my recollection were discussed when the bill was before the House for second reading.

I suggest to hon. members it is entirely out of order at this time to be debating matters which have already been considered by the House, particularly when they ought to be discussed either in the committee or on third reading of the bill. It seems to me that the point made by the hon. member now might well be made on third reading.

Mr. Alexander: On a point of order and with all due respect, Sir, in light of the fact the minister has just indicated by implication that there are differences of opinion and—I stand to be corrected—that he intends to ignore those differences of opinion inasmuch as this is federal legislation, is he now going to ignore the demands and the objections of the province of Quebec? If so, then I would think it all the more important that a statement should be made by the minister as to what those objections are.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that even if the minister wanted to make a statement now I would suggest to him that he would be out of order in making such a statement. I suggest to the hon. member that if we extend the question period by raising points of order we will not make much progress. The rules are made in such a way that when a member is not satisfied with a ruling made by the Chair on a question asked he has the right to suggest that the question be raised at the time of the adjournment. That is the recourse of the hon. member, not to raise the matter by way of a point of order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FUTURE USE OF FORMER COQUALEETZA HOSPITAL

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the decision of the department of Indian and Eskimo affairs not to accept the Coqualeetza property in British Columbia for an Indian cultural and educational centre, can the minister say what plans his department now has for the disposal of this property?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that the department is giving serious consideration to possible programs for renewed use of the property within the ambit of our own responsibility and for the benefit of the Indian people.

Mrs. MacInnis: Can the minister inform us when the decision will be made on the use to which this property is to be put?

Mr. Munro: Soon, I hope.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PROVISION OF OPPORTUNITY TO DEBATE ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. As more than a year has passed since the Prime Minister undertook to provide a day for debating the royal commission report on security, could he now indicate to the House when that debate might occur?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I shall discuss this matter with the House leader, Mr. Speaker.

POLLUTION

OIL—EXTENT OF APPLICATION OF BRITISH LEGISLATION AUTHORIZING DESTRUCTION OF SHIPS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that several countries protested to the Canadian government when the Canada Shipping Act was passed, can the Prime Minister state whether this government has protested the action of the British government recently in passing a bill dealing with oil pollution in which they proclaim their right to blow up vessels polluting their shores and even up to our own shores?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

COMPULSORY TRANSFER FROM NON-TAXABLE WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCES TO TAXABLE GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT—APPLICATION OF TAX RELIEF TO 1971

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has held out to veterans, especially those who are being forced to transfer from the non-taxable war veterans allowance to the taxable guaranteed income supplement, that something will be done this year to relieve their tax position, can the Minister of Finance give the assurance that any changes affecting the position of these veterans will apply to the year 1971?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot indicate in advance in the House what the position of the government will be with respect to tax measures.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—EFFECT OF STATEMENT BY LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the most welcome recent statement in Vancouver by the Leader of the Opposition on the tanker route problem on the west coast, which in effect repudiates the efforts of the Conservative House leader on March 18 to scuttle the efforts of Members of Parliament to examine the question in detail, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he has decided to follow suit and, in turn, repudiate the government House leader's misguided support of his Conservative colleague's action?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would point out to the hon. member that this question is more in the form of an argument.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

LANCASTER HOSPITAL—MAINTENANCE OF SERVICE AND STANDARDS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs in connection with the Lancaster veterans hospital in New Brunswick. Can the minister give every assurance that there will not be a downgrading of service in this institution and that standards will remain at exactly the same level whether or not the final takeover comes about?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our paramount consideration is the good care of veterans. We will always try to do our utmost to make sure they get the best possible health care available at the hospital and in the area.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES TO LOWER DOLLAR EXCHANGE LEVEL AND ENCOURAGE EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question arising out of an earlier question to the Minister of Finance regarding the curbing of foreign borrowing. Since the minister is justifiably concerned about the loss of jobs that will accrue to Canada unless we reduce the exchange level of our dollar, is he considering the reduction of interest rates or urging that interest rates be reduced in order to bring down the value of the dollar and encourage employment opportunities in Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend takes a look he will find that short-term interest rates in Canada are lower than in the United States and our interest rates in the long term are very competitive with the United States.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's explanation and I should like to ask him whether he is considering reducing interest rates even further because of the enormous amount of unemployment in Canada?

DISPROPORTIONATE PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL COST OF BORROWING—COMPENSATION THROUGH FEDERAL BUDGET OR TAX CHANGES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government reciprocated with the provinces on foreign borrowings by assuring the provinces that any budget changes or tax amendments will compensate for the disproportionate costs of provincial and municipal debt financing compared with those of the federal government?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the question is very involved and I think I need to read it. I really could not understand what my hon. friend was getting at.

Mr. Ryan: Would the minister take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker?

INFLATION—PROPOSED INCREASE IN POSTAL RATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Having in mind the minister's oft-repeated urgings that we try to do everything to combat inflation, is the Postmaster General reflecting government policy by indicating a further substantial increase in the basic postal rates?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that the question cannot be asked in this way or in those terms. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YUKON MINERALS ACT

ADMINISTRATION, ACQUISITION AND RECORDING OF CLAIMS, ETC.

The House resumed, from Friday, April 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-187, respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, at the conclusion of Friday's sitting I had elaborated at some length on the bureaucracy being set up by this government with respect to this act. I do not have very much more to say, except that I will continually ask for recognition of the legitimate demands of our native people. I would also impress upon the government, and particularly the minister responsible in this area, that the continual procrastination, bypassing and paternalistic attitude as well as undue complacency regarding our native people is not only an attitude which is morally wrong but one which exhibits a surprising unawareness on the part of government of a very specific situation vis-à-vis our native people. It seems to me that for some time the native people have not been brought into the decision-making process to any significant degree and, accordingly and I would say of necessity, they are left with the impression that they are not needed nor are their thoughts of any importance or consequence with respect to government decisions that may affect their lives.

I shall recap and reiterate, Mr. Speaker, the four main objectives that have been set forth at some great length by the member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and the member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson). The lack of judicial appeal, as far as this act is concerned, and the legislation by regulation seem to me and others on this side of the House to lead only to absolute control which will result in stifling the viability of economic prospects for the mining industry of the Yukon.

Another factor of some concern is the extension of appointments to the bureaucracy. I listed them the other day, and they range from the supervising mining recorder, the engineers of mines, to deputy mining recorder and so forth. Last but not least, is the situation regarding the royalties vis-à-vis mining companies. The interest of the native peoples in this regard is of paramount interest and of considerable concern to members of this House.

Accordingly, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles):

That all the words after "that" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"inasmuch as this House opposes the principle of a bill which provides for the payment of royalties accruing from the sale of mineral rights into the general revenues of the Consolidated Revenue Fund whereby such revenues may be appropriated for purposes to be recommended by His Excellency the Governor General and which bill is not accompanied by a Message from His Excellency recommending that such royalties be subject to a trust or lien in respect of the land claims of the Indian tribes in the Yukon territory, this House resolves that this bill be not now read a second time but that the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development prepare an humble address of this House to His Excellency praying that he be pleased to recommend the appropriation of a proportion of all royalties received from the sale of mineral rights in the Yukon territory in partial settlement of Canada's undertaking that the land claims of the Indian tribes in the Yukon territory would be settled in conformity with equitable principles, as by reference to the Journals of this House for 1867 will more fully appear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In a moment the Chair will look a little more closely at the amendment that has been proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West. As it has been read by the hon. member I have very serious reservations, indeed most serious reservations, about whether it is acceptable from the procedural standpoint. However, I stand to be corrected and would be pleased to listen to arguments in this regard.

When a similar amendment was made last week by an hon. member to my left, the matter was considered and there was a lengthy procedural argument. I thought it was a very interesting argument and I would be delighted to have it renewed at this time.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, Your Honour will recall that last week you ruled an amendment that was almost on all fours with this one out of order principally because Your Honour felt that the amendment did not oppose the principle of the bill. The amendment that is being put forward at this time, it will be noted, clearly stipulates that the House does oppose the principle of the bill. The remainder of the arguments, which I shall not reiterate, with respect to the procedural correctness of the amendment as presented last week apply with equal force to the acceptability of this amendment.

Your Honour's objection to the acceptability of the amendment moved last week having been met by the clear statement that this amendment does oppose the principle of the bill, I suggest this amendment is now acceptable.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have one or two very brief comments to make on the amendment moved by the hon. member. My first point is that, as is evident to all members, opposition to the principle of a bill can be registered in the most direct way by voting against the bill. Merely to say in an amendment that the House opposes the principle of the bill is not in any way to construct a principle that is, in itself, antithetical or opposed to the principle of the bill. Therefore I do not believe that the hon. member has saved himself by adding, as the preliminary words of the amendment, the words "inasmuch as this House opposes the principle of a bill". This objective can be attained by a straight vote against the bill.

The second point I would make is that it proposes some unusual procedure by which a standing committee will be asked to propose to His Excellency that he recommend to the House the appropriation of funds. Usually, the royal recommendation is induced by the recommendation of His Excellency's advisers. So, this presents a logical difficulty to my mind.

Mr. Nielsen: It has been done before.

Mr. MacEachen: In addition, it seems to me that if the hon. member's purpose is to attain certain objectives with respect to the distribution of revenues that are to be collected as a result of the payment of royalties, the place for him to tackle that problem, with whatever ingenuity he can muster within the procedure, is when we deal with the clauses in the standing committee. He will then be in a position to move an amendment, if he can find one that will bring about this particular purpose, though there again I think he will be stopped by the exercise of the royal recommendation which can only be induced by His Excellency's advisers.

I commend the hon. member for his ingenuity in framing the motion. It seems to be so ingenious that it does not fit within any of the normal procedures that we follow in this House.

Mr. Speaker: May I thank the hon. member for Yukon and the President of the Privy Council for their learned and illuminating comments. The problem with the amendment now proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West is that it is so unusual it is difficult for one to put one's finger exactly on what is wrong with it.

My feeling is that a number of things are wrong with it. The point raised by the President of the Privy Council is interesting; his proposition is that you cannot do indirectly what you can do directly. I have very serious reservations whether, if this motion were proposed in any way other than the way now proposed by the hon. member for Hamilton West, it could be accepted. It would clearly go against the financial reservations and prerogatives of the Crown, and in this regard I doubt that it would be acceptable.

That is not really my main objection to the motion. It seems to me that basically the motion is a substantive one. The hon. member suggests that all of the difficulties have been overcome by the initial words of the amendment "inasmuch as this House opposes the principle of the bill which provides for the payment of royalties" and so on. The hon. member suggests that the inclusion of this statement in the amendment automatically makes it an amendment that ought to be accepted as a reasoned amendment.

There are other considerations. This difficulty having been cured, I think there is another difficulty that has not been cured, and it is that this is a substantive proposition. Last week I refused to rule on the question whether the amendment then proposed, which of course was not the same as this one, was within the four corners of the matter before the House, and whether it was relevant. I suggested at the time that I was not sufficiently familiar with all the details of the bill to be able to decide whether the amendment as proposed was relevant to the bill before us.

I would not hesitate to say at the moment that as it stands this proposition goes beyond the terms of the bill before us. It is in itself a substantive motion, and as such I do not think it can be proposed as a reasoned amendment. The Chair suggested last week that it ought to be possible for hon. members to introduce a reasoned amendment that would be acceptable to the Chair. This appeared to be extremely difficult, but because the Chair has ruled two out of order I felt that perhaps I should be as lenient as possible in interpreting the amendment which has been submitted at this time. Taking all these considerations into account, as well as my desire to be helpful and to allow hon. members to move a reasoned amendment which would be acceptable from a procedural standpoint, I do not see how this particular amendment can be accepted for the reasons which I have just stated.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I am not questioning Your Honour's ruling, but I am sorry that the amendment, which demonstrates the concern which I would like to mention in a little greater detail later, was not acceptable to the Chair. As the title suggests, there is too much emphasis in the bill on the exploitation of the mineral resources of the Yukon, and it is not enough concerned with the effects of this exploitation and exploration on the native people who live there. I hope some hon. members will get their heads together and come up with an amendment acceptable to the Chair which will cover this crucial point.

I will now go on to what I had intended to say about this particular bill. As the title suggests, and as I suggested earlier, this is an act respecting minerals in the Yukon territories. I wish to emphasize the word "minerals". This bill deals mainly with and is concerned about a single resource in the Canadian north, minerals. As would be imagined, the bill bristles with mining terms such as claims, mining recorders, surveys, etc. In my view that is exactly what is wrong with it. It chooses to focus on the exploratory aspect of northern development and virtually ignores any other human aspect.

Instead of a comprehensive balanced approach to total resource development and management, Bill C-187 continues a single purpose type of policy. This policy might best be capsualized in terms of "Let's raid the cookie jar; Let's do it now while no one is looking and to hell with the ecological consequences." Who was responsible for this panic to poke holes in the tundra all over northern Canada? What is the great rush, when at this moment we scarcely know the extent of the resources there? We know little about the legacy of what might prove to be a precipitous and irresponsible move. Are we so greedy that we ignore vertically everything learned from our mistakes in more temperate climates? We have mercury laden lakes and rivers and the depletion of fish off both coasts. Have we not learned from these experiences that caution is needed when dealing with northern development, where the ecology is much more sensitive and much less capable of regeneration than that of the temperate zones?

We have violated our renewable resources to such an extent that they may take years to rehabilitate. I speak of such resources as fisheries and forestry. Having raped our renewable resources, we should exercise a tremendously greater caution when dealing with nonrenewable resources and an ecology that is probably less capable of regeneration than that of the more temperate zones.

I wish to return to my earlier concern for a balanced, multiple use of public lands or what might be described as a more rational approach to northern development. Bill C-187 expresses relatively little concern for the native people. It does not express a great deal more concern for the sensitive plant and animal communities of that very important part of Canada. At the risk of fatiguing hon. members, I wish to quote extensively from an editorial entitled "Our Vulnerable North" which appeared in the Saturday, April 10 edition of the Globe and Mail. The editorial quotes a Department of Northern Affairs official, Dr. Naysmith, who put forward his case. He did not argue against northern development. He is speaking of oil and gas exploration and pipelines. I quote:

> Most wisely, he presents his case of the imagination of Canadians through the impact which development could have on a particular group,—
> —the Old Crow Indians who have sustained themselves in a certain area from time out of mind, without impairing its ecological balance. There are about 150 of them. Caribou is their main source of food and clothing; they take about 500 a year. They also fish and trap for furs. On the basis of a hunting and trapping economy the annual return to the Old Crow Indians averages out at around $70,000.
> What would development yield them? Discussions with geophysical exploration companies—

I will paraphrase here. The editorial indicates that in a five year period the total would be approximately $120,000. The editorial continues:

> The pipeline companies estimated that the maintenance of a pipeline could employ approximately five Old Crow Indians at an annual wage of $7,000, which over 20 years would mean $700,000.
> The total industrial gains to the Old Crow Indians, from both sources, would therefore in 20 years amount to $820,000,—

This is the important point:

> —whereas by following their own mode of life they would earn the equivalent of $1,400,000, and it would be spread through the whole community and not just handed to a few.
> Development without the proper protections could, according to Mr. Naysmith, reduce the value of the land in terms of a hunting and trapping economy to zero. "On the other hand," he writes, "rigid regulatory control of land-use operations could maintain the value of the habitat at the full $1,400,000."

The article is rather lengthy, so I will not continue with it but it indicates the kind of cost-benefit concern we have to highlight. This is exactly what the amendment proposed a few moments ago was attempting to get at. The Naysmith editorial dealt only with oil and gas exploration, but we know there are other groups of companies involved in other kinds of exploration—minerals, for examples. We know also that there are native people in northern Canada, other than the Old Crow Indians, used in my example who are affected.

The statement in the editorial is indicative of what can happen to one group of people. It is but an example. We can read more into it than that if we remember that nearly 50 per cent of the people living in northern Canada are native people.

If one did not learn from reading the bill, a tip-off as to who is really calling the shots on northern development could be obtained from a press release from the minister's office datelined Whitehorse, February 27, 1971. I quote from page 1 of the press release:

Proposed Land-Use Regulations—

By the way, we have not seen these land-use regulations.

Mr. Nielsen: We have.

Mr. Rose: I have not seen these land-use regulations.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen: Which version?

Mr. Rose: I had intended to make that point later. Will these land use regulations be made public by press release or will they be tabled in the House of Commons?

Mr. Nielsen: The press release version, I expect.

Mr. Rose: There will probably be many versions before we are through. It should not be forgotten that the success of this bill depends to a great extent on the nature of these land use regulations. If the regulations are amorphous or ambiguous, the situation is all the more frightening. Anyway, before I was assisted by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), I was about to quote from the minister's press release. The hon. gentleman says that regulations for the Yukon have caused concern in the territory. He does not tell us where this concern originated. He added that these regulations were still subject to discussion between government representatives, the mining industry and some of the other interested people. I hope "some of the other interested people" are natives. That is what the minister said on February 27. The communique went on to state:

The minister gave this assurance following representations made last week by the mining industry which feels that the regulations in their present form would inhibit development of the Yukon.

An hon. Member: Isn't that awful?

[Mr. Rose.]

Mr. Rose: That is interesting, because there is likely to be a polarity of opinion, a dichotomy of view as between those who owe allegiance to shareholders and those who are concerned about the ecology of the north and the wellbeing of the native people. We would like to know on whose side the minister is. The communique continues:

The minister said he wanted to assure the people of the Yukon and the Yukon Chamber of Mines that there would be adequate provision for appeal—

So, these people will be able to appeal. Will there be adequate provision for appeal by the native people when their traplines are desecrated and their herds made extinct? That is what we should like to know. This is the most important issue before us now. It is obvious the mining companies have "got to" the minister, those who want to go to the north, make a profit, and get out as fast as possible. Are only they to be given adequate opportunity for appeal?

—where discretionary powers were exercised in a quasi-judicial manner; the need for other discretionary powers would be carefully reviewed and regulations pursuant to the act would be introduced only after thorough discussion and after adequate notice had been given to the mining industry and the general public of the Yukon.

That press release was sent out in February, and it is relatively old. In any event, it is not particularly reassuring. I think we should understand perfectly clearly who it is the minister wants to reassure. Is it the Indians? Is it the Eskimo who have lived for centuries in the north? Is it the tourist camp operators who look upon the north, its flora and wildlife as worth preserving? Or is the minister thinking of those who consider the north only as a storehouse, as a resource package to be exploited? I submit that those the minister wants to reassure are the mining and exploration companies and their satellites, the businessmen, the subcontractors, the whites who want to go into the north, make a killing and get out as fast as possible. An examination of the cemeteries of the north would reveal that most whites go south to die.

Mr. Chrétien: It is no longer so. You have not been there for a long time, if ever. That is evident.

Mr. Rose: I have not been there since the minister has been to Texas.

These are the people the minister wants to reassure. They are a powerful and well-financed lobby and I think they will do their best to destroy even the puny environmental regulations for which provision is made in the bill. This is what frightens us. If we can mount as powerful and persuasive a lobby from this side of the House, so much the better.

A few weeks ago the CBC aired an excellent documentary on the north. It was called "A White Paper on the North" and in my opinion it should be required viewing in every school and college in Canada. I say this because unless we wake up very soon, the north will be dominated by the explorers and the exploiters whose depredations—and this is the view of many well-informed people —will destroy a part of Canada which is so sensitive as to be incapable of ecological regeneration within a reasonable time.

People who know most about this subject belong to a special branch of science called boreal biology. They tell us that special techniques and attitudes are necessary in the north. I am sure the Department of Northern Development has specialists in this field on its staff. What I am not so sure about is whether anyone listens to their advice. They might help write the press releases, handle the public relations, but are they listened to when the decisions are made? Why is the ecology of the north so sensitive? A brief review might be worth while. First, the low energy budget of northern ecosystems; for example, scars made by tracked vehicles are virtually permanent. Second, the factor of permafrost; once the insulation has been removed, the subsurface softens, contributing to the permanency of the scarring. Dr. Pruitt, who is an outstanding boreal biologist, has commented on this subject and I believe his observations are worthy of notice. He was called upon to assist the department in connection with these studies, but I am uncertain whether or not his recommendations were accepted.

Mr. Chrétien: Some, yes.

Mr. Rose: I am not sure that all the recommendations were accepted, particularly those which would ensure that the dangers about which we are talking would be avoided.

Mr. Chrétien: The hon. member saw over the weekend that there are two sides to a question.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, but the mining companies' side always comes up.

Mr. Rose: Dr. Pruitt does not want development in the north to be stopped. He wants assurance that the north will remain as unspoiled as possible, consistent with reasonable development. He wants reasonable care to be taken. Writing in the CSRS newsletter, he says:

> The regulations due to be presented are ecologically unsound and philosophically naïve... They will not stop the single resource concept, the one-resource concern of the federal government.

He goes on to make some suggestions. In his view, the proposed regulations would limit the multiple use of all resources. He specified some of the restrictions which should be imposed. For instance, tracked vehicles should not exceed a ground pressure of 70 pounds per square inch.

He also recommends the burning of all trash, or the burying of all trash, including oil barrels, of the unburnable type. He suggests that all exploration information be pooled in order that the results may be available to everyone without repeating exploration which would result in the digging of holes all over the Arctic. Regulations should require that all camps be equipped with incinerators for the burning of garbage. Dr. Pruitt would prohibit vehicle travel in streams, except by canoes or airboats. Camp operations would be prohibited in caribou fawning or rutting areas during certain times of the year and camps should be fenced. He refers to many other things and in general is very critical about the proposed regulations. He also suggests more and larger land management zones. The point should be made also that land management zones represent a very small fraction of the total land area of the north.

Dr. Pruitt concludes his CSRS newsletter article by saying:

> Thus we see that the problem resolves itself into three parts: (a) the absolute necessity of having regulations and stipulations that ensure the survival of the entire ecosystem; in other words, regulations based on the hard facts of boreal ecology, not on economic expediency.
> (b) The necessity of covering all the NWT and YT with regulations designed for each ecological zone; and
> (c) the necessity of a performance bond to be posted for each operator or permitee.

A pretty strong case therefore has been made about the possible dangers of ecological damage. It should be emphasized too, that we are not against development, but rather development without proper regard for the possible consequences.

Now, let me refer to something a little more specific in relation to this bill. There are probably two main areas of contention. One area concerns commonlaw rights, rights of entry, restrictions on claim staking, protection and compensation for holders of surface rights who have been infringed upon by the mining industry, most of which are historically occupied by native people. The main point is the degree to which the mining industry has control over the public lands. Where can one not explore? You cannot explore in townsites, but how many townsites are there in the Yukon? You cannot explore in national parks in the Yukon. Where are the national parks in the Yukon?

Mr. Nielsen: Ask the minister.

Mr. Rose: You cannot explore in cemeteries, but everywhere else you can explore. These are not very restrictive exploration limits.

The second point of contention deals with regulations for the proper use of land once a claim has been entered. I think it is fair to say that the Territorial Land Act of 1952 did not cover well enough the area of protection and control of exploitation and development. The amendments in this bill refer to land use regulations which are still in draft form. I have not received any real assurance to the contrary. This is vital because a great deal of the environmental provisions for land use written into Bill C-187 are contingent upon land use regulations.

The bill of course represents an improvement over what we have had up until now, the Yukon Quartz Mining Act, but there is a great deal more which must be done. Land use regulations, in my opinion, will be formed in two parts. There will be general land use regulations concerning the whole, of the territorial lands and there will be rules for special zones to be set aside known as land management zones. As I understand it, the second part of the regulations in respect of land management zones will be more specific and effective. However, the point is that virtually none of the Yukon mineral areas will be part of the land management zones. I think this indicates something unhealthy about the legislation.

When we were discussing the government reorganizational bill we learned to our horror that the minister of environment was not going to be responsible for the environment or pollution in the Northwest Territories. This responsibility will reside mainly with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien). When we in this party spoke about that part of the reorganizational bill which deals with the environment, we insisted that the minister of environment should have his authority extended to cover the land part of Canada, if not the sea. Under this bill, decisions concerning the environment will be largely in the hands of mining appointees and engineers. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) made this point when he talked about the bureaucracy associated with these decisions. These mining appointees will probably not have sufficient guidelines spelled out and will operate largely on the basis of personal opinion.

Presumably the first part of these land use regulations, which none of us has seen, will be designed by mining engineers. Are mining engineers really capable of making judgments involving boreal ecological matters? If we leave the protection of our public lands in the hands of these mining engineers, it is essential that they clearly state their intentions. It must be clearly stated what the authority of these engineers is, the regulations they must follow and the extent to which they can go. We must remember that a mining engineer is also responsible for the construction of roads and airstrips. It is not only an exploration site which is subject to destruction, but also the access area to those sites. There is nothing to prevent exploration companies from building roads all over the north.

Mr. Nielsen: Or prospectors going in with hobnail boots.

Mr. Rose: That is right, destroying the tundra. That is a possibility and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) makes light of this. He should not be facetious about something so essential to the future of human life on this planet. People who are sensitive about ecological matters are often considered to be softheaded and sentimental.

We realize there must be a considerable amount of initiative, exploration and development in order to provide any kind of full employment or an economic base in Canada. We do not argue that point. The argument being made here is that we must do this with the least disruption possible. We must remember that about 60 per cent of the mines in the Yukon are owned by United States citizens and that about 60 per cent of production is exported. Why are we doing this? We must make up our minds.

An hon. Member: How much longer?

Mr. Rose: I have not very much time left. Let me say I do not believe a mining engineer should have jurisdiction beyond areas included in mining claims. We require specialists in ecology. There is a profound risk that public lands in Canada, owned by all the people, might be exploited by being subject to single purpose uses. The people of Canada are subsidizing much of the activity in the north.

Mr. Nielsen: And in the provinces.

Mr. Rose: The north is not generating this activity for the benefit of the rest of the people.

Let me conclude by summarizing some of the things I have stated. I do not speak for other members of my party in this regard, but I personally object to the single resources concept, and that is what this bill is. I object to the fact that the Yukon Territory does not come within the authority of the minister of environment. We are concerned because there is lack of appreciation for aboriginal rights. We are concerned because the land use regulations are still to be published in final form. We are concerned because the land management zones are entirely above the 65th parallel where litte exploratory work is being done. We are concerned that the mining engineer will have jurisdiction over all the land. What competence has he? We would hope to have the multiple use concept recognized if the regulations were passed immediately in the light of what we know about boreal ecology. I should like to see all the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory covered by the legislation. I should also like to see a performance bond for each operator.

In conclusion, I wish to make a cyclical reference to my introductory concern about the native people, the Indians, Eskimos and the Métis who make up 45 per cent of the population, but only 4 per cent of whom are employed in the Yukon. I would hope we would do everything possible to see that the rights of the native people are assured and that there is compensation for those people who live in the historical lands which have been violated. I would also hope we would exercise every possible concern for orderly development in respect of the vital and sensitive ecology.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few comments in respect of this bill. I assure members of the House that I do not do so on the basis of having all the answers about the north or that I have become an expert on the subject. A few days ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) admitted quite bluntly that during the negotiations for the sale of Home Oil, he was constantly skating on thin ice because of the absence of a government policy on the whole question of foreign investment in Canada. I suggest the same sort of thing applies to the present bill. It is another example of the government moving or trying to move in this delicate area without first having adopted, or perhaps even considered, any integrated policy in respect of foreign investment or even northern development. It is another example of the piecemeal type of operation we have so often criticized in the past. Not only is there no integrated investment or development policy, because these are aspects of the same thing, but neither is there a policy in respect of native rights, as previous speakers have indicated. Yet this bill attempts, in a vague way, to deal with both, and with matters of ecology, which is another field in which general policy is still non-existent.

Surely, this is no way to proceed with regard to a serious matter. It is no way to write a bill on a serious subject. In granting a wide range of discretionary powers to officialdom while at the same time doing away with the right of appeal to the courts from their decisions, in many instances the government seems again to be abdicating its responsibility in this matter. I say that, while the government may be content to do that, I do not believe Parliament will look very kindly upon that kind of abdication. The simple but sad fact is that in the realm of mineral exploitation, as in so many areas with this government, we are constantly faced by uncertainty and confusion. Policies, whether for the short-term or long run, are noticeable only for their vagueness and any knowledge is notable only by its absence.

I know a little whereof I speak because I have just returned from another part of the north, places where the closely related issues of mining and development are of vital importance not only to business and governments but above all to the people who live there. Both in the State of Alaska and in the province of British Columbia, I found great evidence of uncertainty and ignorance. The people there certainly were very uncertain concerning the intentions of the Canadian government, and it was quite obvious that the government of Canada was quite ignorant about what will be happening in Alaska that will affect the future development of our own north as well as the coast of British Columbia.

There is no question but that what is going on in Alaska today is important with regard to the future development of the Yukon, our own North, and the type of issue that is raised by this bill. In Alaska, of course, the pipeline project has not received final approval and we are not, in respect of this bill, talking about the movement of oil. We are considering, however, the question of development of the Yukon. Even the mineral development may very well involve questions such as pipelines and their feasibility. Here we have next door to us in Alaska a large project in respect of which feasibility studies are well under way, where the route has been surveyed and where experiments have been under way concerning different aspects of the project, such as how pipe may be laid in permafrost and other problems related to permafrost.

In the face of all this, and the fact that Canada itself may very well be involved in a pipeline before long, this government apparently has chosen, if not to ignore the activities in Alaska, at least to not place an observer on the spot which would have been very easy to do. The government has chosen not to follow the problems arising from the whole problem, the solutions made or required, and the diffculties which are foreseen. The government of Canada has made arrangements for the exchange of information with regard to the north with the USSR, and I fully approve of that. But here right next door to us a feasibility study is being carried on which, in many respects, is of first importance to our own country, but so far as I can find out the government of Canada is not closely following this development. Observers have not been there. This, after all, would have called for some spirit of initiative and some practical imagination on the part of the government but here, as in so many other places, neither has been forthcoming.

This is not the time for me to speak about the oil situation or the movement of oil, except to say that the evidence of ignorance on the part of the government of Canada and its callousness in respect of what may be happening is almost overwhelming. Here, in terms of the oil business—I am interested in this because the same industry is involved to some extent in both areas—we have conflicting statements concerning what the government of Canada would like to see happen. We have the government of Canada going around in circles and behaving like a windmill. I only hope the government of Canada and its officials know more about the development of minerals in the north, and the environmental problems associated with this, than it knows about the problems involved in the movement of oil and the effect which the plans people are making will have upon our own country. I only hope that somehow or other this government and the department concerned are more knowledgeable with regard to the subject of this bill than they are with regard to the general subject of minerals, but I am afraid I really cannot have such confidence.

We do not know in this country whether the many possible developments are practical in economic terms or desirable in terms of the physical environment of the areas, and we do not know how we should proceed. We are certainly not using our opportunities to find out. In other words, we seem to have the worst of both worlds so far as the government is concerned. The government has been sitting by, doing little on its own. I recognize that there have been experiments, that some research has been going on in Inuvik and perhaps some other places. We certainly have not been trying to find out what has been going on just outside our borders or what effect this may have on us. Even though others have been vigorously conducting their studies and spending millions of dollars in the process, we have not even taken the trouble to look at what they have been doing and how they have been doing it.

The same thing applies to another vital aspect of northern development, and others have referred to it. I am referring here to the question of native rights, the rights of Indian and Eskimo peoples whose land and lives have already been so severely affected by the coming of our civilization to their part of the world,—if we want to speak of it as civilization—and to whom we have a responsibility. Even if someone wanted to ignore the human aspect of the native rights and consider only the legal problems, it is surely clear that one of the problems that the development of Alaska, for example, has run into is precisely the issue of the rights of the native people. It is very clear to the Alaskans that a settlement of the native rights question is essential before any real development can go forward. There has been at least a searching for a solution and, I think, one could say an honest approach toward a solution.

In our northwest we seem to be far behind and we can expect to pay the price for what once again is a lack of initiative and imagination on the part of this government. Even if one wanted to ignore the human aspects of the problem, there are many ways in which the question of native rights can be involved in the mineral and other development of the Yukon and of our north. I say that this absence of policy and this government confusion goes far beyond the north and the northwest. It extends right down the coast of British Columbia, and it goes along with what seems to be an uncaring ignorance of the prospects of environmental damage that are associated with such matters as the tanker route from Alaska to the U.S. west coast ports. This is not the time to develop this theme. I mention it simply as an indication of the ignorance of this government and what seems to be its indifference to matters of such importance in an area similar to the area considered by this bill.

Mr. Nielsen: Shameful neglect.

Mr. Stanfield: The further north one goes the greater is the danger to the coast of British Columbia and the greater the need for Canadian intervention in the whole question of oil transportation. I say that this government—in that area at least, and I am afraid of this—seems content to bask in its own ignorance and to pretend that a problem does not exist if you simply ignore it. In northern development, just as in the related problem of the environment of the west coast, this government has been guilty of dereliction of duty.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), and I do so with great reluctance, but it does seem to me that a great deal of his speech has been devoted to the development of oil transportation and the exploration for oil. May I point out with respect that I have some difficulty in relating that directly to the bill and I would ask the Leader of the Opposition with respect to relate his remarks to the bill.

Mr. Stanfield: I respect your views, Mr. Speaker. I thought I was being careful to make clear the relevance of the point I was making to this bill, that is that questions of transportation, for example, and questions relating to native rights having been clearly ignored, obviously these other areas are equally relevant in connection with the bill that we are considering.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: I was relating in particular the question of pipelines to this bill because it would not stretch one's imagination to consider the possibility of pipelines being used to transport solid fuels and minerals generally, in addition to oil or gas. But I want to emphasize in particular the recognition of native rights, which must be relevant to this bill whatever view one takes of it. The government has achieved nothing but continuing and growing tension. If we as a Parliament are to show our concern about the technical and human problems involved we have only one choice, that is to adopt the position advocated by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and to force the government to adopt some acceptable long term policies before going ahead with this slipshod and dangerous legislation.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of features of Bill C-187, the Yukon Minerals Act, which disturb me greatly, and chief amongst them is the excessive amount of discretionary powers which will be vested in appointed officials of the public service in the administration of this act. The dangers of these powers, quite aside from them being discretionary, lie in the fact that appeals to independent judicial bodies from decisions made under them do not exist.

Over 40 years ago the Right Hon. Lord Hewart of Bury, Lord Chief Justice of England, wrote an incisive and still timely work called "The New Despotism". One of the chapters in his book is entitled "Administrative Lawlessness", from which I would like to quote the following passage:

> Will anybody at this time of day deny that it is essential to the proper administration of justice that the decision should be based on evidence, and that the evidence should be heard in the presence of both parties, who are given the opportunity of cross examination? Evidence not tested by cross examination is nearly always misleading and practically valueless. The public official, as had been observed, may, and often does, decide without any evidence at all, and he may act on ex parte statements, made by one party without anything to support them, which are never brought to the knowledge of the other party. so that he has no opportunity to contravert them. Is it too much to say that such proceedings are a mere travesty of justice?

Earlier on in his work, Lord Hewart observed that:

> To employ the terms "administrative law" and "administrative justice" to such a system, or negation of system, is really grotesque. The exercise of arbitrary power is neither law nor justice, administrative or at all. The very conception of law is a conception of something involving the application of known rules and principles, and a regular course of procedure.

Subclause (1) of clause 37 of Bill C-187 provides for the supervising mining recorder to cancel the recording of, or to refuse to record, any mineral claim where he is satisfied that the person claiming the rights involved therein is not entitled to them. While an appeal from his decision is permitted, it is restricted to being heard by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chretien), whose decision thereon then becomes final. When we remember that the minister will be entirely dependent on the advice of his officials in arriving at the decisions made on such appeals, it becomes obvious that, in effect, what is taking place is really a meaningless appeal procedure whereby one public servant, or several, pass judgment on the appropriateness of the decision of one of their colleagues. Under these circumstances, can any one wonder why miners are apprehensive about the type of justice which they are likely to receive under the provisions of this bill? Public servants, passing judgment on other public servants, particularly when they are all in the same department, in my view represent nothing more than the workings of a mutual admiration society.

As a further specific example of excessive discretionary powers proposed in the bill, Mr. Speaker, I would draw your attention to clause 79(2), a particularly important clause because it deals with annual royalties payable to the Crown by mine owners. This subclause allows the minister—and of course this authority will be delegated—to decide whether two or more mines are operated by the same mine operator, or whether they are under the same general management and control. There is no appeal provided from this most arbitrary decision, the consequences of which could be enormous for the people who may be affected by it.

Paragraph (a) of clause 83 empowers the minister to reduce the value of depreciation on machinery, equipment or buildings at a mine where such depreciation has been claimed at a rate of 15 per cent per annum. Again, no appeal lies from this arbitrary decision. The discretionary powers embodied in the bill only add uncertainty to the Yukon mining industry, an industry which if nothing else is uncertain and risky by its very nature. Hon. members also ought to note that the proposed legislation further threatens the industry by establishing a most substantially increased scale of royalties which will not be alleviated by tax abatement provisions because, as I pointed out in my remarks on April 22, the Yukon Territory is not a province.

The measures proposed in this bill are particularly resented by the people of the Yukon Territory because, at a time when mining development is just beginning to move at a very encouraging rate, new proposals are introduced which place mineral operations in the Yukon Territory at a very significant taxation disadvantage compared with the same type of operation in British Columbia and Quebec. This cannot but discourage mineral exploration and development in the Yukon Territory, with appropriate consequences for the people who live there.

In a recent report in the Globe and Mail, to be specific on March 26, 1971, Mr. Jack Austin, the Deputy Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, is reported as having told a group of mining executives in Toronto that:

> Old antagonisms between government and the mining industry are breaking down.

If the present bill, as proposed, becomes law I can assure Mr. Austin and his minister, as well as the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that they will be in for very substantial disillusionment. How can a piece of legislation such as the present bill, which would treat so unfairly the principal industry in an area faced with enormous natural problems in developing industrially, be received with anything else but hostility by the people who must operate under it or who otherwise will be affected by it?

In response to Mr. Austin's questionable optimism, I think it is worth citing a small portion from an editorial entitled "This is Where It's At" which appeared in the December, 1970, edition of the Western Miner. The final paragraph in that editorial reads:

> As Mr. P. M. Reynold, President of Bethlehem Copper Corporation, so aptly observed at a recent meeting with Finance Minister Benson—"We are just not able to communicate with you and your advisers. We are not on the same wave length." The industry has made every possible effort to communicate, but apparently to no avail. Surely, with such undeniable evidence of the employment creating capability of the mining industry, government must reconsider its proposals to destroy this capability through unrealistic tax policies.

If we were dealing with a government which had a normal measure of humility, it might be possible to have some of the more extreme and punitive aspects of this legislation changed. Frankly, having observed the arrogance and self-righteousness of the government, particularly when it comes to listening to points of view alternative to its, I must despair of hoping that it will heed the representations which have been made against the proposed act by such bodies as the Vancouver Board of Trade.

In its letter of February 23, 1971, the Vancouver Board of Trade wrote to the minister as follows:

> It is calculated that the proposed Yukon royalty will be more than three times as much as the present royalty over the first five years of an operating mine and more than twice as much over the first ten years.
> This increase in disparity with mining taxes in the provinces coupled with the higher cost of mining and exploration in the Yukon will minimize the future growth in the territory.

On the matter of ministerial discretion, the Board of Trade observed, and again I quote:

> There are sufficient uncertainties in mining without compounding the problem. Ministerial discretion, which in practice may mean a civil servant without mining or business experience, is an unacceptable method of applying a tax. It should be used as a last resort and not to cover vagueness and ambiguity in drafting. Examples of unnecessary use of ministerial discretion can be found throughout the bill but in particular we point out section 79(2), 80(c) and 83(a) and 84. The abrogation of parliamentary rights and the resultant possible abuse becomes critical when a taxpayer has no right of appeal to a court.

The Yukon Chamber of Mines in its submission to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development on this bill made the following criticism of its royalties provisions:

> The Finance Minister's white paper on tax reform indicates a major tax increase for mining companies. A study of an existing copper mining company of an average size revealed that over a ten year period its tax burden would have been increased by more than 35 per cent had the white paper been in effect during that time. In a ten year period the total tax burden for a mining company operating in British Columbia under the white paper would have been 60 per cent greater than the burden it would have had to bear in the United States and 63 per cent more than it would have had to sustain in Australia. Mining investment capital is very specialized in that it tends to stay with the industry and not move to other industries. Should mining in Canada become less attractive as a result of the white paper it is very probable that Canadian mining capital would not be deployed to some other activity in Canada but rather would leave the country in search of other more attractive (mining) ventures.

It seems to me that once again the government is working at cross purposes in this bill. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is responsible for a department which is spending many millions of dollars yearly in an effort to stimulate economic expansion in areas where such activity is not taking place at a sufficient rate and in a degree to provide stable employment for the local work force. The provisions of this bill will work to the detriment of the efforts of his department in giving incentive grants to industries located in the north because its provisions will work in such a way as to discourage and penalize development in the principal industry in the Yukon Territory. Those of us who have watched the progress of mineral development at such an optimistic rate in the Yukon Territory have hoped that from it would spring logically related, and badly needed secondary industries to provide a whole new base for future development in that part of our country.

There is no doubt, however, that short-sighted, negative, arbitrary and restrictive measures, such as those contained in this proposed act, will destroy any such hope for the development of secondary industries when the primary industry on which they would be based will be so adversely affected by this unwarranted piece of legislation. Is it any wonder that it has been so soundly criticized by those people who know best the needs of the Yukon Territory and whose views I have already cited in small measure earlier in this speech? This proposed act is merely further evidence that the government intends to continue its policy of designing laws geared to making life simple for the bureaucrats. The fact that this measure is neither sought by the people whom it affects, nor of benefit to them, is not, of course, and as usual, regarded by this government as being sufficient reason for altering it.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I prepared this speech about a month and a half ago, so if the situation regarding the bill has changed in the meantime I hope I can still be understood. I should like to suggest that the minerals or anything else in the north should be developed for the benefit of the people of all Canada. Perhaps we should start with the people of the north and then include all Canada, but I do not think these resources should be developed only for the people of southern Canada, as I am afraid has been the case quite frequently in the past.

I think there should be some definite move on the part of the government, in connection with this bill or any other, to help the people of the north on a permanent basis. I cannot think of anything that would be more effective than moving those people connected with the administration of mining or power or anything else to the communities concerned. Surely, if they lived in the area they would have a better understanding of the problems and their decisions would benefit the people much more than decisions made in Ottawa.

The complaints I receive from people in the north tend to be along the line that we do not understand their problems and make decisions about things without sufficient knowledge. I would like, therefore, to suggest that the government base its decision-making personnel closer to the areas with which they are concerned. We should make definite efforts to conserve the non-renewable resources of the north for future use. It will be too bad if we do not make the most effective use of the resources available. First, we should take an inventory of the mineral resources of the north. We have done this to some degree already in the Carr report, which resulted from a study of the obvious things in the north but I am sure there is still much to be done.

I should like to make the following points: There has been no study of Canada's mineral resources either in the north or in the rest of Canada, or of our future national needs for various minerals similar to the study of the National Energy Board on oil, gas and coal in which the future demand and supply reserves were estimated based on probable reserves, projected future production, and future needs based on certain estimates of what our economic growth, industrial development and trading patterns should be. As far as mineral resources are concerned, the Canadian government is pursuing a "head in the sand" type of policy in which it is assumed that we have plentiful reserves and our economic growth and balance of payments position depend upon the ever-increasing development and sale of our natural resources by whomever can be enticed into exploiting them.

I would suggest that it is important that we make an inventory of what we have, and then decide on our future needs. Exploiting our resources to make money is not good enough. In conjunction with the mining development in the north, we should begin to build secondary industries. Smelters, refineries and reduction plants would provide a base for heavy industry, and freight costs on many items in and out would be reduced if we had a total package rather than one primary industry. The development of a total economy, rather than just mining, is desirable. It should not just be a matter of mine quickly, get out and leave the north. Mining will form the basis of northern economy but development of support services may bring something which will be renewable and long lasting. I would suggest also the development of farming. Thinking in terms of the Yukon, there may be a form of farming, different from that in Ontario or western Canada, but which would be suitable to that particular area.

I have asked the minister a number of times if he has investigated what the Russians have done. I have suggested that he take the committee to see how they have developed the north. As I understand it, the Canadian government has not done too much. I am sure the committee would gain much from such a visit and could make worth-while recommendations as a result. I saw a film provided by the minister called "Below Zero". It was most enjoyable but I noticed a serious omission. There was nothing in it about the country which has more northern territory and more winter than all others put together, that is Russia. Surely, this area should be investigated. I do not suggest that we should do everything the way the Russians do or that they have necessarily done the right thing, but surely we could learn something from them.

I read Farley Mowat's book on Siberia recently and while I do not suggest that he is an authority on this or any other north, he did point out some measures that I do not think we have followed in Canada. He spoke of using the permafrost to build dams, for instance, and this idea interested me very much. He described some testing in regard to pipelines, and mentioned mining for diamonds and gold and drilling for oil. He described support services such as agriculture in the north, speaking particularly of reindeer herds which supply meat for people in the mining camps. Surely, it would be worth while for the committee to make a trip to northern Siberia in order to study what has been done there. I do not think the minister or members of the committee have been able to persuade the government to let them go. Should they be able to do so, I am sure there would be no lack of volunteers from this side of the House to accompany them. In so far as this bill is concerned, I think we should certainly make a trip to the north to hear what the people there think about it.

With regard to ownership in the north, I should like to make the brief comment that, in developing mines in the north beyond the financial capacity of Canadian private enterprise, rather than introduce foreign capital we should adopt the Panarctic approach. Further, if we want to construct smelters or refineries and things of that kind, we should turn to the Canada Development Corporation for financing. After all, why ship out of the country minerals in unprocessed form if we can process them at home? I suggest here is a logical place for the Canada Development Corporation to assist in Canadian development. Finally, we should show particular concern for the natives of the north. We should educate them so that they can contribute to northern development and find employment in the mining of Yukon minerals.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I must point out to the House that if the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) now takes the floor, that will bring the debate to an end. Is there agreement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to take too much time since there will be occasion to debate the bill at committee stage after it has been referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

May I thank all hon. members who have participated in the debate, which I think has been a good one. Some hon. members wanted to raise other problems that have arisen in the past, such as the problems facing our native peoples. I am sorry we cannot have a full discussion of those problems, but I would say that I think all hon. members, certainly those on this side of the House, will agree that never before has the federal government entered into a dialogue with the native population of Canada. We have tried to seek their advice concerning the many measures we are proposing, especially in the field of employment in the north. We started a campaign two years ago to try to persuade developers in the north to give priority to the employment of the native population. This was evident from the guidelines we issued last August which stated that, if pipelines are constructed in the north, not only at the construction stage but at the operation stage the native people should be fully and permanently employed.

We very strongly believe that if we give our native people the skills required they will make very good employees and be very reliable. There is one benefit we will all gain from their working in the north, and that is that they will have no wish to come south. They are happy to live in the north because that is their country. The government and I realize this, and it is why we are not shy about speaking of what we have done and are planning to do for our native people.

Now is not the time to discuss this because this bill deals with mineral development in the Yukon. It is not a perfect bill, of course, and I said in my speech that we would make some changes at the committee stage. People in the north are concerned about the level of royalties, and I did say that we would make some adjustments there. I think all hon. members will agree that we must make sure that the royalties we receive from the mines in the north are not higher in amount than those received in British Columbia. But I repeat: We are going to make sure that revenue from royalties from mines in the Yukon received by the government will be lower than revenues received by the provincial administration of B.C. In this regard, I am going to present an amendment that will reflect the wishes of the House.

As far as the Canadian participation clause is concerned, I do not apologize for forcing industry in the north to accept investment from Canadians. This is the only industry in the Yukon under federal administration to which a clause of this sort does not apply. Pending a general review of policy on Canadian participation; we are going to put this proposal forward. I do not think development of the Yukon will suffer. At the same time, I think it is right that Canadians be allowed to participate in northern development if they so wish.

Mr. Nielsen: They can do so now.

Mr. Chrétien: If a United States company develops a mine in the Yukon at the present time, it can refuse Canadian participation. We are trying to get such concerns to list their stocks on the Canadian market. In that event, any Canadian could buy shares in that company.

I was glad to hear the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) make a speech. The only thing that annoyed me a little was that he visited Alaska before he visited Canada. He should have visited the Canadian north before making that speech.

Mr. Nielsen: He has been to the north.

Mr. Chrétien: He went during the last campaign; he went to the Northwest Territories. I think he should have visited the Canadian north first, and I am glad he is planning to do that. I am only sorry he did not do it before.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The impression is being left by the minister that the Leader of the Opposition has not visited the north. That is inaccurate. He has been to the Yukon and to the Northwest Territories. The previous Prime Minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert, was the first Canadian Prime Minister to visit the north twice in succession.

Mr. Chrétien: Since we are close to five o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I will not raise any more issues. One of the accusations made by the Leader of the Opposition was that we are not following the Alaskan experience. I was in Alaska before he was and officials of my department visit Alaska regularly. They are making sure that we are kept informed on everything taking place there. I can assure hon. members that we pretty well know the situation in Alaska, and know much more about the situation in the north than do the members of the opposition. We will have ample opportunity to discuss the bill in committee after second reading. I am willing to examine all suggestions made by hon. members in committee, and I am sure this bill is going to be a great improvement on the former legislation governing the administration of the resources in the north.

Mr. Nielsen: Rubbish.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Nielsen: We want a recorded division, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): All those in favour of the said motion please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): All those opposed please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Chrétien) which was agreed to on the following division:

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie).—Proposed trans-Alaska pipeline system—expression of Canadian opposition—participation by British Columbia in meeting with United States officials; the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin)—Public Service—Department of National Health and Welfare—officers in Toronto reportedly receiving higher salaries than those in Quebec City; and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall)—National Parks—Ship Harbour—prevention of land speculation.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, since it is one of our private members' motions which would be affected by the shortened hour, may I take the initiative and suggest we call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there agreement to the suggestion of the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster that I call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING HOURS OF WORK, WAGES, VACATIONS, TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT, ETC.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-288, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, a little later in the session I will be bringing in, I hope, changes to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act which have been awaited for some considerable time by members of the House who are interested in the problems of labour, and by organized labour itself. I think, however, we tend to forget that in Canada only about 40 per cent of the work force may be considered to be organized, that is, represented by trade unions at the bargaining table, and about 50 per cent in the federal field due primarily to the fact that public servants in general are entitled to collective bargaining.

When we do bring forward the bill on the IRDI Act later in the session I think we will have indicated, despite the criticism that all too frequently is raised in respect of collective bargaining these days, that we do believe this Canadian system bears perhaps strengthening but certainly warrants preserving. I think it goes without saying that in a civilized system the responsibility of government does not end with providing the legal framework within which organized labour and management bargain to establish their norms. I believe it is the responsibility of the government to protect the unorganized in this country who, as I mentioned, represent the greater percentage of the work force. I refer to people who are not covered by collective agreements and depend, therefore, on the federal government and provincial governments to varying degrees to provide the standards or minimums which govern their very existence in the work force.

I think we should remind ourselves that minimum labour standards are designed to ensure that all workers, whether organized or not, who are employed by small businesses or large corporations are entitled to specific conditions of employment which conform to socially acceptable norms. These are designed to establish a legal barrier below which these conditions cannot be driven by the unfettered play of market forces.

At a time when those who plan the future shape of our system of social security are searching for comprehensive solutions to the problems of poverty, including those faced by the working poor, this barrier represented by minimum standards is being increasingly recognized as an important instrument of social policy. It is so recognized by the government of Canada and will be used accordingly.

Again let me remind the House, although I believe most members know this, that the first Labour (Standards) Code was brought into existence in the federal field in 1965. I do not think anyone would mind if I were to pay tribute to the present government House leader, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), who piloted through the House the first Labour (Standards) Code in 1965. I believe those of us who are preoccupied with portfolios which address themselves primarily to people will recognize that this original piece of legislation has made a valuable contribution to Canadian development, and I hope these amendments will make it an even more valuable piece of legislation.

As members may recall, the 1965 code covered certain basic standards governing hours of work, overtime pay, vacations with pay and general holidays. The minimum wage at the time was $1.25. The standard hours of work were set at eight per day and 40 per week with a maximum of 48 per week. The minimum rate for overtime beyond standard hours was set at time and one half, the minimum paid vacation at two weeks and the minimum number of paid general holidays at eight per year.

In the present bill we are introducing amendments that relate to all the standards which I have just enumerated. These amendments are based on the experience over the last five years and they are intended, for the most part, to overcome many administrative problems and to avoid unnecessary interference with the practices established by collective bargaining. This is the result of the experience of five or six years during which the standards have been in force.

In addition to this, we intend, as hon. members who are familiar with the bill know, to introduce many new features to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code which are new at least in the federal field. My hope is that among other things these amendments will make it possible to deal more effectively with the type of difficulty that has made it necessary, in so far as the existing hours of work provisions are concerned, to issue special orders covering certain portions of the transportation industry and to keep railroads under deferment.

I think most hon. members appreciate the difficulty which we had in introducing the standards under the Canada Labour (Standards) Code in the field of transportation, the problem of adapting the code to the railway industry, the tracking industry, the airline industry and the shipping industry. Consequently, for six years a rigidity has been built into the existing legislation which has made it rather difficult, in the part of the code dealing with hours of work, to introduce the code with any consistency.

It is my intention to see that the increased flexibility which is proposed in this bill will permit me not only to make the bill more applicable and more functional in these areas but also to allow it to be used with good sense and in consultation with labour and management. In this way we will be able to ensure that the spirit of the code is applied both to employers and to employees in the transportation industry. With one obvious exception, and that is the minimum wage, there will be no basic change in the standards now set forth in the code. Measured against the norms established by international conventions, provincial laws and the provisions of collective agreements, these standards still appear to be appropriate as minimum standards.

With regard to minimum wages, hon. members may recall that some time before last July, if I am not mistaken, we amended the minimum wage provisions, or that portion of the Labour (Standards) Code that applied to minimum wages, to increase the minimum wage from $1.25 to $1.65 per hour. At the same time I promised the committee that I would recommend the increase of the minimum to $1.75 when I brought in the bill and that I would try to find ways and means of facilitating future adjustments to the minimum wage.

I think hon. members will recall that the minimum wage prior to last July had not been changed for five years, which meant that people who worked for minimum wages found not only their dollar eroding but that it was almost ludicrous and certainly a disincentive to work for the minimum wage of $1.25 per hour—$50 per week—which in many provinces is below the amount paid through welfare payments. What I propose to do in the bill is to make it possible to increase the minimum wage, preferably every year by Governor in Council upon the recommendation of the Minister of Labour.

I think this will get us over the problem with which we were faced between 1965 and 1970 when certain events made it impossible to get around to raising the minimum wage by bringing legislation before the House. I believe there were one or two elections, just to mention one unexpected event which can impede the orderly increase of minimum wages. I believe that the ability to adjust minimum wages by Governor in Council will be a useful addition to the bill; and of course, once again this added power will be used judiciously.

As Minister of Labour I would provide for a continuing process of review in which representatives of employers and trade unions will be invited periodically to participate so that the minimum wage can be periodically revised and maintained at an economically relevant and socially desirable level. This was one of the subject matters that we discussed in the past week with Ministers of Labour from across Canada. The impact that federal minimum wages could or do have on the provinces and on their own particular norms is felt as the Ministers of Labour of the provinces realize the need to keep alive and in existence a labour incentive industry rather than a capital incentive industry.

In setting the federal rate we must at all times recognize the distortion that any change might have on the provinces. I might remind the House that the minimum applies only to employees of the age of 17 years and over, but since 1965 we have set a special rate by regulation for people in the work force under 17 and last July we raised that rate from $1 to $1.40 per hour. If the general minimum is increased as now proposed, I intend to recommend to my colleagues a similar increase to employees under 17 which would bring the minimum wage up to $1.50 per hour.

I think the government has made it clear that it recognizes the need to examine all aspects of law and policy which affect the rights of women in Canadian society. To this end it has launched a careful review of the many recommendations contained in the recent report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. I am pleased that the Department of Labour will be heavily involved in the review which will proceed in a climate that the work of our women's bureau has helped to create. I am also pleased that as Minister of Labour I can now come forward with legislative proposals that are consistent with the general thrust of the royal commission's recommendations. I refer, of course, to the provisions in the bill relating to equal pay for equal work, and maternity leave. Given the large and continuing increase in the number of women including married women who participate in the work force, it seems to me that these two basic provisions are essential.

The amendments to the act would replace the existing provisions of the Female Employees Equal Pay Act of 1956 by strengthened provisions in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. The proposed change of statutory locale is in itself important because in my opinion problems of inequity affecting women should wherever possible be dealt with, not in special legislation for women but in general legislation applicable to Canadians whether male or female. In this connection members of the House will note that the language used in the proposed new equal pay part of the code will prohibit pay differentials based on sex, whether directed against men or against women.

The proposed new standard should be much more effective, for two reasons. To begin with, the prohibitive practice is more broadly defined, referring not to "identical or substantially identical work" but to "the same or similar work on jobs requiring the same or similar skill, effort and responsibility". Equally important, application of the law will no longer be dependent upon the receipt of complaints of individuals. The proposed new provisions will be subject to the general inspection and enforcement procedures of the code.

I think this is a very important change because under the existing legislation which has been around since 1956 the onus of responsibility for initiating a complaint or investigation rests with the person who feels she is aggrieved. Many women insecure in the work force dare not initiate such a complaint and therefore the act has not had nearly the impact that it should. Now that it is to be placed within the ambit of the Labour (Standards) Code, the responsibility will be broadened. Not only will the department act on complaints by women in the work force, but a complaint or an alleged violation of the act will be brought forward by the inspectors who will inspect the records of employers with respect to hours of work—something which they have been doing for some years. This added responsibility placed on the shoulders of the inspectors should do much to eliminate the discrimination which has gone on for far too long in the federal field.

The amendments relating to maternity leave would prohibit dismissal or lay-off solely because of pregnancy, and establish a right to maternity leave. An employee with at least one year of service would be entitled to maximum leave covering a period 11 weeks before and six weeks after delivery, together with any period between the estimated and actual dates of delivery. I hope that pleases some members of the New Democratic Party because I am not too sure that this type of legislation was pleasing to all members of that party at their convention last week.

I should note that the period of 11 weeks before and six weeks afterward is consistent with the provisions in the bill to revise the Unemployment Insurance Act under which an employee whose earnings are interrupted by pregnancy, after a two-week waiting period will be entitled to benefits for a maximum period of 15 weeks. The combined effect of these provisions will be that in most cases an employee who must take time off for the purposes of childbirth will be entitled both to job security and a reasonable level of income maintenance. I think hon. members will agree that this provision represents an important forward step.

There is another area that the Labour (Standards) Code deals with this time that was not in it in 1965. This concerns the increasing problem of people who are leaving the work force, of the senior worker who is forced out of his job through automation and who realizes that less and less he can depend entirely on seniority for security of tenure. I think we all agree that in this technological age this is one of the big problems faced by any worker—the problem of adjusting from one job to another, the shock of losing work and in some cases the shock for a person who finds that his or her skill is redundant. That person needs all the help that Parliament can extend, and this principle is quite consistent with the basic philosophy of all political parties.

In the bill there is provision in the case of large scale terminations for notice to the government and to any trade union representing the workers affected, the required period of notice varying from eight to 16 weeks depending on the size of the group terminated. The purpose of this provision is to ensure that there is time for employers and trade unions to work closely with the Department of Manpower and Immigration so that the placement, training and relocation services provided by that department can be brought fully into play. It is unfortunate that all too frequently large groups of people, particularly in the unorganized sector of the work force, are laid off with little or no advance notice, making it increasingly difficult for the Department of Manpower and Immigration to be effective and to guide them into other work if they have a particular skill and work is available.

In the case of people eligible for unemployment insurance, again this advance notice is of importance if there is to be no undue hardship suffered by the worker in applying for unemployment insurance. It is my hope and belief that the great majority of employers will be both willing and anxious to comply with the group notice requirements of the law. In the event that they do not, we will provide fines in the bill ranging up to $100,000. I would hope this would be sufficient deterrent to those employers who, by any stretch of the imagination, would want to ignore the provisions of the law which insist that there be sufficient notice for group termination of work.

The second standard in this general area would provide the individual whose employment is being terminated with entitlement to a minimum notice of two weeks or an equivalent amount of play in lieu of notice. The third standard that is new in the legislation, that we did not have before and which I think is equally important, is that for the first time we have introduced this feature for what you might call the unorganized sector, the feature of a legal right to a minimum amount of severance pay. I think that severance pay, grouped with the provision for advance notice of termination, is of tremendous significance in this particular field.

An employee with five years or more of service whose employment is being terminated, except by way of dismissal for just cause or retirement on an immediate pension, would be entitled to two days' pay for each year of service, up to a maximum of 40 days' pay. Assuming a five-day week, this would mean a minimum severance payment ranging from two weeks' pay for an employee with five years of service to eight weeks' pay for an employee with 20 or more years of service.

There is another amendment that would prohibit dismissal of an employee solely because he was the subject of garnishment proceedings. This may not seem significant but, ironically, many people are dismissed because they happen to be the subject of garnishment proceedings. I think it is unfortunate that so many employers, rather than be bothered with the paperwork associated with court orders simply prefer to dismiss an employee. I have never been able to understand the social sense of an employer who would do this, but from our statistics we know that it is a fairly common practice. When an employee is in financial difficulties he should not be subject to loss of employment and earnings simply because his employer must undertake the paperwork required to comply with a court order for garnishment of wages. Therefore, if Parliament approves this bill we would prohibit this practice and see it is brought to an end in industries within federal jurisdiction.

There are two other areas concerning the bill which I would like to mention. One is that under its provisions the new standards relating to equal pay for equal work, maternity leave, group terminations of employment and dismissal for garnishment would apply to managerial and professional employees as well as to all other employees. The original act, if I am not mistaken, set standards for a particular, identifiable group of employees spelled out in the act. What we are doing here is making these provisions relating to equal pay for equal work, maternity leave, group terminations of employment and dismissal for garnishment apply to managerial and professional employees just the same as to all other classes of workers. This is an important departure and in my view is fully justified in view of the social significance of the standards in question.

Hon. members who have read the bill will also have noted that for most of the amendments the proposed effective date is July 1, 1971. Because of the possibility that related regulations will require a somewhat longer period in which to prepare and discuss them with interested parties, it is proposed that the provisions relating to notice of termination of employment and severance pay should come into effect on a date to be fixed by proclamation, which will be the earliest possible date after July 1.

Again I remind hon. members that the Canada Labour (Standards) Code does not apply to the public service as a matter of law. However, as the result of a commitment made to Parliament in 1965 by the then Minister of Labour, the standards established by the code are applied to the public service as a matter of government policy. I am pleased to now reiterate that commitment with respect to the standards embodied in the proposed amendments.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, although in preparing the bill we have given careful consideration to the provisions of relevant conventions and recommendations of the International Labour Organization, the contents of related laws in the provinces, the provisions of collective agreements, the views expressed from time to time by labour and management and the experience of the department in administering the code, I am hoping the bill will receive careful scrutiny by the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration and that the committee will agree to receive representations from the major organizations of employers and trade unions. I assure the House that constructive criticism and comment will be both welcome and carefully considered as the bill proceeds through the parliamentary process.

In my opinion and in the opinion of the government this is important legislation designed to benefit working men and women and deserves to be examined with care before taking its place on the statute books. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to move that Bill C-228, an act to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, be read a second time.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that this is extremely important legislation. It is important because it affects the lives of hundreds of thousands of people. As I understand it, it is involved with federal jurisdiction in the areas of railroad and water transportation and all services instrumental in pipeline, telephone, radio and television, grain elevators, grain milling, banking, etc.

Mr. Benjamin: And the staff in your law office.

Mr. Alexander: I think it is important in this area because it seems to me, as the minister has explained, that the vast bulk of our labouring force is within the unorganized field. Those who are affected by collective bargaining have an opportunity and, usually, the wherewithal with which to protect themselves, so it is within those areas that we have to be concerned about good leadership. I think the minister has indicated that through federal and provincial prerogative they can give some leadership to those who are not adequately protected.

What we are trying to do here, Mr. Speaker, is establish a social policy ranging from the study of the minimum wage to questions of discrimination and the establishment of safety codes. I know the minister believes this latter point is extremely important and I understand that legislation will be brought forward in keeping with its importance. I agree with what the minister has said, that this legislation effects a minimum wage, equal pay for equal work, maximum hours of work, maternity leave, giving notice of separation, and severance pay. All these are very important, timely and necessary. Of course, we reserve the right to question some of the matters raised by the legislation.

There are two important areas in which I believe the government's response is inadequate in light of crying social conditions. One is the provision for the adjustment of the minimum wage and the other is the bringing in of equal pay for equal work. I was impressed with what the minister said in attempting to bring before the House the position he takes regarding the provision for adjustment of the minimum wage. However, I was a little disappointed inasmuch as I was led to understand last fall, when the minister introduced legislation increasing the minimum wage from $1.25 to $1.65, that he would attempt to bring in an adjustment procedure or standard. This has not occurred.

The minister indicated that he has met with his colleagues at the provincial level. I understand that they are to meet periodically to discuss the matter and if they feel the climate warrants it or the political atmosphere makes it desirable—this is what concerns me—the minister will move to increase the minimum wage. I shall discuss that matter shortly. When we are talking about guidelines in this area, I think it is important to realize that the minister's decision can be affected by political atmosphere, particularly when we see how this government moves—I say this with a great deal of respect—and when we realize their complacency or policy with respect to creating unemployment. It may mean that the minister cannot take the opportunity to raise the minimum wage.

I believe the hours of work provide for a 48-hour week, with exceptions in certain circumstances. We are desirous of having this bill go to committee because in this area we run into the whole problem of transportation. The minister is well aware of that problem. I understand that permits will continue to be granted with respect to exceptions to the 48-hour week in those industries or commercial endeavours which need an extension. I think it is advisable that guidelines be established and I am sure we will deal with this question in committee. The guidelines that are proposed should take into consideration the situation where a restricted work week of 48 hours will be detrimental to employers or employees and where the nature of the work would make the regulation unreasonable. We will have to discuss this point at some length.

I have discussed the minimum wage, but I was short of time when the minister increased it to $1.65 last year. He was not very happy because I think it had been stated by several people on his behalf that he was interested in making it at least $1.75 an hour. On a previous occasion I said that while there may be no absolute virtue in leaving the procedure for adjustment within the amending process of Parliament, the government had not proposed an alternative that really improved the existing procedure. If the minimum wage has as its objective a floor consistent with current needs, this objective should be pursued by means of an automatic adjusting factor which would keep it in line with the cost of living. That is what we proposed on this side and we thought the minister would be bringing it in. Perhaps there is an explanation so I shall not dwell on the matter except to state that such an adjustment would naturally bypass amendment in Parliament, and with the proposed amendment Parliament would be bypassed without the rationale of automatic adjustment. The amendment proposed does not even provide a broad guideline or formula upon which a cabinet decision would be based. I suggest that there is an unacceptable arbitrariness on the part of the cabinet when the minimum wage is to be changed.

The matter of equal pay for equal work I believe primarily stems from the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and reflects the general attitude regarding the importance of women in the work force. Some time ago I made a speech and I should like to put on record some thoughts I had then regarding statistics. At that time I said:

> Back in 1950, women formed only 22 per cent of the Canadian labour force. That proportion has grown this year to 32 per cent. By 1980, according to projections of the Economic Council of Canada, you will form better than 35 per cent of the labour force—3,681,000 as compared with 7,017,000 males.
> The significant fact is that the annual growth in the female component of the labour force since the mid-sixties has been consistently above the projections of the council. By 1980 you could form closer to 50 per cent than 35 per cent of the labour force.
> The growth of the number of women workers has matched the sustained growth of the whole labour force.

This is extremely important. When we talk about equal pay for equal work, the consistency of our thinking becomes extremely realistic and acceptable. The Economic Council has stated—

Mr. Benjamin: Are you in favour of it?

Mr. Alexander: I notice that the member on my left is continually objecting. I know he has some oratorical brilliance and I hope he will give us the benefit of his thinking, rather than reading a local newspaper, and do something constructive for a change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Alexander: As I was saying, the Economic Council has stated that rising female labour force participation rates are expected to make the female component of the future labour force growth particularly large, with females accounting for over 1 million and males slightly under two million in the over-all growth to 1980.

Mr. Benjamin: Read on.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, I am reading because I wrote it myself in the first instance. If you had been listening, my friend, instead of reading that paper you would have heard me say that I made a speech about the problems of women. By 1980, women will form a larger percentage of the national labour force than they did even in the man-short years of the second World War. It is obvious that this larger and more widespread employment of women will mean that they will wield an evermore direct influence upon national affairs and have an ever-increasing voice in Canada's destiny. Their interest, too, will grow more direct and less passive as they leave the restricted scope of the housewife for the wider field of industry and commerce, public life and public affairs.

The coming decade will inevitably be a decade of expansion and development for Canada—or so we hope. Up to the early sixties, Canadian women formed a smaller proportion of the national labour force than was the case in the six other leading western industrial states. But the Economic Council believes that during the seventies Canada will approach the levels of female participation prevailing in other leading industrial countries. This indicates pretty clearly that during the seventies Canadian women will achieve all they could wish in regard to participation in the nation's work force.

But what about the quality of the positions they will hold? What about progress up the ladder within the labour force? This is an old battleground. This is where a good deal of the masculine talk about the equality of women is shown to be merely lip-service to an abstract ideal rather than practical adherence to accepted custom.

In an address to the Beth Tzedec Sisterhood in Toronto last December, Miss Sylva M. Gelber, director of the women's bureau of the Canada Department of Labour—a woman for whom I have a great deal of respect—emphasized the inequalities and discrimination that face women who would enter the professions or business. I want to put on record the fact that I think Canadians are becoming more aware of the important role that women can play. In this regard I should like to refer to a poll conducted by the Canadian Institute of Public Opinion, published in the Ottawa Citizen for March 20 under the headline "Women getting support for rights, says poll". The following questions were asked:

> Would you tell me if you approve or disapprove of these suggestions:
> That women who work should receive equal pay with men for the same kind of work?
> That, by law, women should be given leave of absence by their employers totalling 18 weeks for pregnancy and confinement?

Then follows a table showing public opinion. With regard to equal pay for women, 80 per cent of the people of Canada approved and only 11 per cent disapproved. The undecideds were 2 per cent.

In regard to the statements made by Miss Gelber, I might add that Mr. John Carson, chairman of the Public Service Commission, has called down the blame on his own head for discrimination against women in the federal bureaucracy, and I respect him for doing so. I hope the minister is aware that you cannot talk of motherhood and pay only lip-service to it. I think the minister must give the fair employment practices act sufficient teeth to do its job.

I should also like to quote some of the points made in a report in the Spectator for March 19 last:

> Mr. Carson said the report last December of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women left the commissioners "desperately ashamed of ourselves"...
> As for problems involving women workers, he said the commission is seeking to bring more women into its executive training program. The federal government employs 81,000 women, mostly in secretarial and clerical roles.

When the bill goes before the standing committee I hope the minister will make definitive statements regarding his recommendations to Mr. Carson, and the federal government's approach to this very vital and sensitive area. We all hear of the activities of Women's Lib and we have had the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Unless the federal government shows leadership in bringing women into the work force in a way which means they are accepted for the contributions they make, instead of on the basis of just being women, we are going through an exercise in frustration at the present time.

However outstanding the merit of the progressive amendment regarding equal pay for equal work, I respectfully state that the effect of this amendment is quickly nullified by the qualifying provision that follows, and I should like the minister to reflect on this. I refer to the proposed new section 14A(2) which reads:

> Payment to male and female employees of different wages does not constitute a violation of subsection (1) if the difference is based on any factor or factors other than sex that justify such a difference.

It seems to me that this provision derogates from the initial intention of the equal pay for equal work legislation. This is precisely the kind of situation the commissioners had in mind when they recommended an improvement in the language describing an equal pay for equal work situation. While attempting to improve their credibility by making a linguistic leap of faith, the government has ensured, by this qualifier, that the real situation will remain the same as it was. I suggest this aspect must be carefully watched if we are to retain our credibility.

With regard to maternity leave, which we heard about in the white paper on unemployment insurance, I was under the impression that under the Unemployment Insurance Act the period was 15 weeks. There is now a two-week difference; the period under this legislation is 17 weeks.

Mr. Mackasey: There is a two-week waiting period.

Mr. Alexander: The minister explains that there is a two-week waiting period. This matter has been dealt with at length in terms of the unemployment insurance reforms, so there is no sense in my elaborating on it here. This question will be further explored when the standing committee deals with the white paper on unemployment insurance.

I think the subject of group termination of employment is of significant interest. I believe this provision relates to employees in groups of 50 and up and the amount of advance notice given depends on the number of employees laid off. Advance notice is highly important in facilitating retraining programs and replacement opportunities. It is to be hoped that the Manpower Department will make efficient use of the advance information which will be required once this act becomes law. It would be commendable if the Department of Labour were to assist the trade unions by making research facilities available to them in order that the information about lay-offs can be utilized by them.

As I indicated earlier, when the minimum wage was increased to $1.65 last fall, the Progressive Conservative party accepted the premise of the legislation. We also accept this legislation; there is no question about that. I have endeavoured to raise one or two points that will be conducive to constructive criticism at the committee stage. Further, we shall bring in amendments where we feel they are necessary, particularly with regard to the provisions respecting women.

What concerns us about the minimum wage is that when the federal government gives leadership in this area, because of the lack of economic growth on the same basis as the federal government the provinces can run into trouble. If the federal government is paying $1.75 an hour and the province of Ontario $1.50, we are telling the province of Ontario to try and lift itself up. This can create a problem at a time when they really cannot afford it.

Mr. Benjamin: Oh, yes, they can.

Mr. Alexander: As I have read the press notices of late, there was some question about marrying the minimum wage on a regional scale. Apparently this has now been discounted. As I understand it, the representative labour ministers are not happy but they are prepared to go along with the minister's suggestion in terms of the minimum wage.

I was pleased to read the section regarding garnishees. This can be a matter of frustration. Those of us who are lawyers understand that this provision will alleviate and perhaps even prevent a lot of frustration which occurs as a result of inadequacies in handling money, overspending, obtaining too much credit and being faced with a garnishee. I am speaking in general: I have never had to face one myself. This has led to the breadwinner being laid off because the company did not want to bother with the additional bookkeeping involved. Rather than face this situation and show compassion to their employee, they would simply lay him off. The minister has stated that no person can be laid off as a result of a garnishee order having been made against him.

In conclusion, we are in general agreement with what the minister has proposed, subject to reservations. This is not for the purpose of holding up this bill, but if we deem it necessary we shall submit appropriate amendments. As I said the other day, these will not be to make the bill better for the government or for the opposition but to make it better for those who will be affected by it, the Canadian people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said that he was pleased to be able to bring in this bill. I am sure he was. I like him so much that I wish he would give himself about five times as much pleasure by bringing in a bill about five times as good as this one. This is another of those cases where there is nothing in it we can attack. There is nothing in it that is wrong. Nobody could vote against it. However, you can tell by the low-key debate we have had thus far tonight that there is no particular excitement about it. It is one of those cases of making a few improvements here and there on the basis of which the government will be able to say when the next election comes, "Look at what we did for the workers of Canada".

Mr. Perrault: That is the last thing on our mind; you know that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As long as that remark by the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) is put on the record showing the smile with which he made it, I do not mind. Perhaps before I get into the serious part—

Mr. Benjamin: Is this the humorous part?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —I wish to say a word or two about the claim that the minister made for one of his colleagues. Far be it from me to deny any man his pride of paternity, but I suggest that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) is not the only cabinet minister or Member of Parliament who should be given credit for being the father of labour standards legislation. After all, the Hon. Michael Starr brought in a couple of bills with regard to annual vacations with pay and statutory holidays with pay.

Mr. Benjamin: Look what happened to him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Hon. Milton Gregg brought in a bill dealing with equal pay for equal work.

Mr. Benjamin: He is not here either.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If we look back over the years we will find other pieces of legislation dealing with this kind of thing.

Mr. Horner: Didn't Mackenzie King do this sort of thing?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, and before Mr. Starr and Mr. Gregg came to this place, this member for Winnipeg North Centre was bringing in these bills year after year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before I came here—and I now refer to an era that began 50 years ago—the previous member for Winnipeg North Centre, the late J. S. Woodsworth, was proposing this kind of thing. Let us give credit to the President of the Privy Council for being the minister in whose name the Canada Labour (Standards) Code was first placed on the order paper as a unified bill, but let us keep our history straight. A lot of people have been involved in this kind of legislation.

We must also remember that once this legislation is on the books, it will not apply to all the workers of Canada. It will only apply to those who are in industries that come under federal labour jurisdiction. This represents about 10 per cent of the work force. Perhaps it is a little higher if the public servants who are brought in by regulation are included, but it is still a very small section of the labour force of this country. For this to be universal, it would require constant agitation in all the provincial legislatures in order to get those bodies to bring in comparable legislation. It is quite true that it is in this place that a lead can be given. I hope the improvements that are before us tonight in this legislation will be noted by the legislatures of all the provinces and that they will make similar improvements.

I might also add as another preliminary remark that what bothers me about this kind of legislation is the number of loopholes that are always to be found in it—the exceptions it contains. For a number of years, we have had the Canada Labour (Standards) Code on the books. That provides for a maximum of 40 hours of work per week at which time overtime is supposed to begin. There have been a succession of permits from Ministers of Labour that have excepted some employers from that part of the Labour (Standards) Code. I notice that there are some of these things in the bill now before us, Bill C-228.

In the interesting section about the termination of employment where more than 50 people are turfed out at once, while some things must be done—I will deal with them in a few minutes—the requirement to do this can be waived by the minister if in his opinion it would be injurious to a particular industry or to the public. I do not know why we have to mess up good pieces of legislation with all these exceptions.

It is always a matter of concern how long it takes to get the regulations passed that are necessary to put this kind of legislation fully into effect. As the minister knows, because he has had to answer questions of mine about it here and in other places, he has the companion piece of legislation known as the Canada Labour (Safety) Code. The minister will recall, because he was then just a lowly Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour, that in December 1966 the then Minister of Labour urged us to get that bill through. He said it was important to get the law on the statute books to enable the regulations to be made. After all, people were being hurt, people were losing their lives because safety provisions had not been established.

We co-operated with the then Minister of Labour and with the then parliamentary secretary, the present Minister of Labour, in getting that bill through. That was in December, 1966. Now, in April, 1971, the minister still cannot point to a complete set of regulations under that bill. Mind you, he did express confidence a few days ago, when I questioned him about the matter, that these regulations would be completed before the end of 1971.

Mr. Benjamin: Well now!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is quite an accomplishment, I suppose, to be able to announce that within five years these regulations may be complete. Of course, it is a complicated process. There is the Constitution to be considered. There is the question of the co-operation of the provinces, and the regulations must be thought out carefully so that no injury is done to a person as a result of sloppy drafting. But the point is that the effectiveness of good legislation can be offset by delay in working out regulations. I hope this will not be the case with the legislation before us tonight.

The minister was quite right to point out that several kinds of legislation are needed in this field. We noted with interest his reference to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, amendments to which he intends to bring in later. This is, of course, a piece of legislation which has a long history. It is a very important piece of legislation in that it lays down, in the main, the rules or the guidelines under which collective bargaining takes place. It is in the area governed by collective bargaining that the workers fare best. The minister is perfectly right in saying that it is not enough for us to provide good rules for collective bargaining because, after all, they deal with only 40 per cent at most of the workers of this country; we have to protect the unorganized, the other 60 per cent. There is, in my opinion, an unanswerable case for standards of the kind which are embodied in this bill and which ought to be matched by legislation on the statute books of every province.

I move on to some other features of this bill about which the minister and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) have been speaking. One which has been mentioned is the proposal to increase the minimum wage from $1.65 to $1.75 an hour. I wonder whether the Minister of Labour in his own way managed to arrange for this bill to be debated tonight on the same day the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced that there would be an increase of $8,000 a year for ourselves. A minimum wage of $1.75 an hour for a 40-hour week would amount to $70, and for 50 weeks in a year, allowing for a couple of weeks' holiday, it would amount to $3,500 a year. As you know, Mr. Speaker, it was announced today that the increase to be granted to Members of Parliament, retroactive to last October, would be more than twice that amount, more than twice the total a worker would get under the new minimum wage.

It is so standard for us in this party to say that government proposals do not go far enough that there is a tendency by the government to pay no attention. In fact, their retort will be: Whatever we do, you will say it is not enough. Well, I have been saying it for a long time, and no doubt I shall be saying it for a long time yet. The reaction of the president of the Canadian Labour Congress to this figure of $1.75 an hour was that it ought right now to be $2.50 an hour. Perhaps I would be willing to compromise and settle for the figure in the bill I introduced last October. Mind you, the cost of living has gone up so much since then that I shall have to revise that bill. But I suggested $2.00 an hour. A vote was taken last fall in the committee on a proposition to that effect, and we came awfully close—I think there was a vote of nine to eight. We did not do quite as well back here in the House.

However, I suggest the House should take seriously the protest we are making from this quarter of the chamber even though the government might say: This is the kind of thing you do over and over again, and you have done it for years and years. It is still valid. It is not good enough to come before the House of Commons in April, 1971, and propose an increase in the minimum wage of only 10 cents an hour.

Mr. Benjamin: Liberals. Always behind.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The interjection is well to the point. I am waiting in case there are more. I hope that in committee we can get this changed. It is a common situation around this place that whenever money is mentioned members on the government side sit back and enjoy the protection of the fact that because money is involved the opposition cannot move an amendment; that there cannot be a vote on the question. I have news for them. I want to make it perfectly clear that there will be a vote on this issue in the standing committee and, if we do not win it there, in the House at the report stage.

I say this because it has been established on many occasions that this proposal for a minimum wage is one which affects private employers who employ people who come under federal labour jurisdiction. It is, therefore, not something which involves the expenditure of money from the federal treasury and members of the House of Commons, even private members, have a right to move amendments. This will be done. We have no intention of going through the report stage content to settle for $1.75, when the president of the CLC says the figure ought to be $2.50. Certainly it ought not to be less than $2 an hour.

The Minister of Labour has departed from an undertaking he gave last fall. I do not regard this as a breach of faith; it is a case of changing his mind, but I think it is a mistake. He told us in the committee last fall that he would write into the legislation now before us a precise formula for upgrading the minimum wage. Now, instead, he has provided that beyond this $1.75 further changes are to be made by Order in Council on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour. I suppose he is asking us to accept this on the grounds that he is sympathetic to labour. He is sympathetic all the way up to $1.75 an hour!

He is asking us to believe that it is better to rely on getting an Order in Council to raise the minimum wage level than it is to take the time to get a piece of legislation through Parliament. He will appear before the committee. He is good at appearing and at answering questions, but I think he will have to make a much better case than he did tonight—though he did not even try to make one tonight—as to why he did not put into this bill a precise formula so we would know that when the cost of living index goes up and as the wage index goes up, out of these two in some combination there will be an automatic increase in the level of the minimum wage. These two things ought to be done: first, the present $1.75 should be at least $2 right now, if not more, and there should be in this bill an automatic formula for pushing the minimum wage up from here on.

I move to one of the other major sections of this amending bill, the part having to do with equal wages for equal work as between men and women. I welcome the idea—and the minister said this in his speech—of dealing with equality as between men and women, not by having special legislation for women which is what we had under the old Female Employees Equal Pay Act, for the very title of that act was a form of discrimination, but equality between the sexes must be covered by general legislation. Perhaps this is a technical or procedural matter, but it is a very important technical or procedural one to have in general labour standards legislation if there is to be equal pay for equal work.

An hon. Member: It is symbolic.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But as my parliamentary assistant in the back row is pointing out, this is highly symbolic.

Mr. Mackasey: He is a member of the Waffle group.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, no. The minister has made some remarks about this, but under the old legislation the only way anything could be done about a case of unequal pay was if the affected employee made a complaint. Now the government is providing for a certain amount of inspection to make sure that inequality of this kind is not practised. I urge that as long as there are kinds of employment where practically all the employees are women and other kinds of employment where practically all the employees are men, there is not equality and something is wrong.

When we get into the committee on this bill one amendment I intend to move at the appropriate stage will urge that in any establishment where more than 80 per cent of the positions in any job classification are held by members of one sex, the minister should order an investigation of the hiring, training and promoting practices in that industry to see whether something can be done to provide a more equitable distribution of the job classifications between male and female employees. I do not think you can solve this problem by edict or law that says there must be 50 per cent men and 50 per cent women in every one of these classifications. I think there was something in the debate last week at our convention regarding that general proposition.

Mr. Mackasey: Who voted against women? Your heckler did; I saw him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't worry about my heckler. He is one of my valuable parliamentary assistants. He does not get the $4,000 extra pay.

An hon. Member: I thought you were going to give him your share.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have parliamentary assistants all over the House; my namesake over here, the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour over there, and several others.

An hon. Member: Is he a member of the Waffle group?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The point I am trying to make—and my friends are just as serious about this as I am—is that if we are to do anything about achieving equality between the sexes in the work world, we have to work at it. We have to hold investigations to find out why certain patterns prevail. A fair amount has been done about this already. I refer to the investigation into the subject of sex in the Public Service. That was an interesting study in this area. The work of Miss Sylva Gelber is extremely important.

I remember the days when we did not have any section of the Department of Labour devoted to the work of women, and some of us were advocating this away back in the early days. This has paid off and it has been very useful having somebody heading up that kind of work. The minister must not just rest with the idea of getting this legislation passed; he must work on the idea of equality between the sexes in the work force of Canada.

Related to the whole matter of equality between the sexes is the question of maternity leave as provided in this bill. This is another of those famous steps in the right direction. But let it be pointed out again that this bill applies only to those who come under federal labour jurisdiction. This provision is looked at sometimes as a companion piece to the pregnancy insurance coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act. The difference there is that it covers women in the entire work force of Canada, and the maternity leave under this bill only covers women in industries which come under federal labour jurisdiction.

Let it also be pointed out that while this legislation provides for leave of up to 17 weeks, there is no pay connected with it. This is leave without pay. I am sure the minister will say that we are covering that by the benefits of the unemployment insurance provision. I can see that, and it is good. I do not quite know why the total number of weeks that is being allotted has to be a number of weeks before childbirth and a number of weeks after. Is the minister an expert in this area and is that what he is suggesting? There may be some expectant mothers who would work almost up to the time of childbirth and have a longer period afterward for nursing the baby at home, or what have you; but I think fixing the period before and after childbirth in the arbitrary way it is done in this bill is quite unnecessary.

An hon. Member: That is the only way—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The parliamentary assistant who is helping me now is not quite as helpful as the other one. That is the reason I pay the other one twice as much.

An hon. Member: What about equal pay for equal work?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Everyone knows what twice nothing is.

Mr. Horner: What if they have a miscarriage? Would they still get the 17 weeks?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) is not on my staff yet.

Mr. Horner: Will they give them another chance?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am prepared to go along with the humour, but let us not forget that this is a serious business. Another provision of this maternity leave that puzzles me is the requirement that it is made available only in the case of a woman employee who has been in the services of an employer for one year. I do not see any point in that provision.

Mr. Mackasey: The employer won't hire them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister says that an employer won't hire them. Surely an employer can tell whether a woman is pregnant at the time he is hiring her.

An hon. Member: It depends on how long.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Quite seriously, it seems to me that this is a different question altogether, whether the woman is hired at all. But if a woman is an employee and has a job, why should she not get the maternity leave if she has been employed only 51 weeks rather than 52? I think we can improve this provision when we get it before the standing committee.

Let me move on to that part of the bill which deals with termination of employment. These are new sections to be put into the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, and we welcome them. As the minister knows, this is another case of the government looking over private members' bills, seeing that there are good ideas in them and deciding to put them into legislation. The minister has picked up ideas from members on this side of the House quite often.

I notice that the provision regarding mass termination of employment really does not go much further than giving notice. You still lose your job. Granted, it is of some use for the Department of Labour, the Department of Manpower and Immigration and the trade unions to know it is happening. But is that enough? What about the whole question of pay? Perhaps the provisions in respect of two weeks' pay for individuals laid off, or severance pay for those with five years' service still apply in the case of mass lay-offs, but as I look at the bill this does not seem to be very clear.

Then I wonder why the minister has chosen the figure of 50. Why only if 50 or more are being laid off is this procedure to be complied with? It seems to me the figure should be much lower. I would make it as low as ten. If ten or more people are being laid off, this provision should be complied with. This area in the bill seems to have three main parts. There is the case of what happens if 50 or more people are laid off, and I said I believed it should be down to ten. Then there is the part which deals with individual employees being laid off who get two weeks' notice or pay in lieu of notice if they have been working for the same employer for three months. That is good and it has pretty well been taken out of bills presented from this side of the House. Then there is the other provision about severance pay which also is good. This, however, is allowed only in the case of employees who have been five years with the same employer.

We are in an age of great shifting around as a result of changes due to automation, computers and all the rest of it, and as time goes on this trend will probably be even more striking and the number of people who work for employers for periods of less than five years will grow. I suggest the period should be much less than it is. The whole area in this bill having to do with termination of employment and severance pay is new. It is good. It was not put in when the President of the Privy Council brought in the legislation five or six years ago. Precisely because it is new I think it should be dressed up a bit and I hope we can deal with it appropriately in the standing committee.

In the statement he made this evening the minister said that the Canada Labour (Standards) Code covers a number of other things such as vacations with pay and general holidays, as well as one or two others. Then he said that although we are not changing the standards that are already in the legislation having to do with vacation pay and general holidays, some of the regulations are being changed. This is correct. I have looked over the bill and I see there are a number of instances in which definitions are being changed to make certain that employees get the two weeks' vacation a year provided in the legislation, general holidays, and so on. The minister is nodding to indicate that I am interpreting it correctly. But so far that is all the minister is doing in the bill with regard to vacations with pay and general holidays. Let me give him notice of amendments. We have brought in amendments before, and we can do it again. On occasion our amendments have even been accepted.

On the question of vacations with pay, when the hon. Michael Starr first brought in his bill it provided for one week's vacation after one year of service, and two weeks' vacation after two years or more of service. That did not seem to us to be good enough and we persuaded the Liberals when they returned to office to improve it so that it would be two weeks after the first year of service. It is slightly improved now. It is now two weeks for a year of service, so they do not get caught with the use of the word "after". There are some jurisdictions in this country where for longer service there is a longer vacation.

I have a bill on the order paper which I believe is a minimal proposal. It asks for vacation with pay of three weeks after three years' service. It is so little I am almost ashamed to be asking for it. An employee would have to work three years with the same employer before he would receive three weeks' vacation. At least, it is better than two weeks, and I say that no Labour (Standards) Code is worthy of the name if it does not have at least that minimum in it. I have a private member's bill which would provide for that. I do not know whether it will be reached this session, but if so it will be talked out, because that is the usual fate of such bills. I am grateful to the minister for bringing in this bill amending the Labour (Standards) Code, because in it he touches on the question of vacations with pay and I think this will give us an opportunity to move an amendment in the committee.

The same thing applies to the question of general holidays. The bill the President of the Privy Council brought in five or six years ago had a proposal in respect of seven general holidays. In the committee of the whole we were able to get an amendment through which provided an eighth holiday, Remembrance Day. The public service has more than eight general holidays in the course of a year, and there are some other areas of employment where this is also the case. It seems to me the time has come to increase the number to at least nine. I hope this is one of the improvements we will make to the legislation when the bill reaches the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

I see, Sir, that I have not used up all my time, but that is no reason to stay on my feet another five minutes. I am sure my valuable assistants in the back rows are itching to get to their feet, and also members in other parts of the House, so I shall resume my seat. If I have not been able to make the rafters ring about this legislation, I hope at least, with the assistance I have had from all sides of the House, I have been able to make my point.

I make the point as strongly as I can that we should not be satisfied just because we have a bill which makes a few improvements. It does that, and I give the minister all the credit he has already asked us to give him for doing it. But I say, why stop there? We do not amend the Labour (Standards) Code very often. Times now move a lot faster than they did when this type of legislation was first introduced. In view of the fast way in which times are moving, I hope we will make all the improvements in this bill which I have suggested when we get to the committee, and a few more so that when we come back and the minister rises to move third reading he will be able to say—I shall draft his little speech for him now—"It gave me a great deal of pleasure to introduce this bill for second reading, and it gives me infinitely more pleasure to move its third reading because the job the members in the committee have done has made it very much better."

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Labour (Standards) Code is the legislation establishing the minimum standards governing the basic conditions of employment in industries under federal jurisdiction. There are approximately 530,000 employees in the industries governed by the Code, whose standards also apply to the federal public service as a governmental policy.

The initial legislation of 1965 established the minimum standards governing salary rates, working hours, overtime pay, leave with pay and statutory holidays.

Under the current provisions of the Code, the bill proposes for the first time the creation of standards concerning maternity leave, notice of employment termination, severance pay and garnishment. It provides for major changes in existing standards with respect to the minimum wage and equal pay for equal work. It contains a number of other changes.

These amendments would increase the minimum wage, in the field within the ambit of federal authority, from $1.65 to $1.75 per hour, effective July 1, 1971. They would also permit the governor in council, upon recommendation by the Minister of Labour (M. Mackasey), to increase the minimum wage in the future. The normal duration of work is eight hours a day and 40 hours a week, with a maximum of 48 hours a week. The minimum rate applicable to work performed over and above normal working hours is half as much again as the normal rate.

Minimum annual leave is set at two weeks per year, and the minimum number of legal holidays with pay is eight per year.

Representatives of the Department of Labour would have to watch very closely the terms of the application of the act and regulations. One only has to look at the list of the employers who have asked that the application of the Labour Code to their organization be delayed, to understand what I am referring to.

Close to five years after the passing of the act in Parliament, there still are workers who are required to work a weekly number of hours which go far beyond the provisions of the Code and there are still too many employers who are reluctant to effect salary adjustments.

I could quote various instances with regard to employees of the CNR, especially those extra gangs doing seasonal work on branch-line construction or road repairs. Indeed, the number of hours worked does not always comply with the requirements of the Code.

The industries to which the Code applies are, I think, the railroads, truck transportation, pipeline construction, water transportation and other key services relating to water transportation of an interprovincial or international character; air transportation, interprovincial or international telephone, telegraph and cable systems, radio, television and banks.

Establishing a minimum wage level and standard hours of work does not result from collective bargaining involving employees of a given industry or service. It is however quite normal to link to such a minimum wage factors which cannot be ingored, such as cost of living, income of the worker and his ability to provide his dependents with a decent style of living, should he assume the responsibilities of a family.

Quite clearly, the rate of $1.75 per hour is inadequate. However, the adjustments of wage rates provided in Bill C-228 can serve as an example to provinces where the minimum wage is lower than $1.75 per hour. The minimum hourly wage set up in the various provinces in Canada varies between 85 cents and $1.50, except where there have been adjustments. The highest level in force is in British Columbia and the lowest in Newfoundland, namely $1.10 for men and 85 cents for women, which is ridiculous in 1971.

I am very happy to see that Bill C-228 provides for periodical reviews of minimum wage taking into account, I trust, economic fluctuations such as the cost of living, the devaluation of money or other factors that reduce the worker's purchasing power.

It would no doubt be profitable to the legislators to examine their conscience which would allow them to realize that the workers' claims are often inspired by example given them in various places.

As they note that fairly substantial salary raises are obtained in high places without any slow bargaining nor detrimental strikes, which people try to justify by puting forward the constant increase in the cost of living, workers are inevitably led to wonder why there is so much tendency to niggardliness when it comes to ensure them a salary which will allow them and their families a decent living.

When the employees of the Canadian National, particularly those who have no adequate salaries and working conditions, note that a group of public servants travel in special cars built at a cost of half a million dollars or more, they are incensed. These cars which are extremely comfortable and furnished most luxuriously are used regularly by one group of officials on their travels, whether short or long, where they are joined by friends who take part in the treat, and this at the expense of the Canadian people who will pay in the end for these festivities taking place in picnic cars where the variety of bottles would make Bacchus himself jealous. These are luxury trips, at the expense of the taxpayers.

Should such special car service be discontinued, nearly four to five million dollars would be saved each year.

When workers realize that the railway president is earning $75,000 a year and that on retirement he is going to receive a $26,000 pension, they are certainly justified in demanding normal working conditions—at least those who look after track maintenance—and more suitable accommodations after an exhausting day of work. Bunks are no longer adequate in an era of research within the field of comfort.

I give that example to show that too often privileged people seem to forget the worries of workers who are often compelled to put up with working conditions which could be greatly improved. I could give a great many more examples of that kind. Obviously, a large number of grievances are sometimes quite difficult to solve.

Some responsible people have carried out investigations in different services and their reports show that not only have they determined the causes of certain problems but they have also offered suggestions that should be of help to the legislators when legislative measures establishing the rights of both employers and employees are to be amended or adopted. Some hon. members have had experience with the problems of workers and so their views should be taken under consideration without partisanship and at the right moment in order to correct the intolerable situation reflected in a series of strikes which, in most cases, are prejudicial to the workers, and which always have an unfavourable effect because they spread economic disorder.

This trend toward centralization often makes one forget about the efficiency of human communications which are required for appreciating employee's grievances. An ever-alert consultation mechanism must necessarily be created and maintained, especially when changes must be introduced in working conditions. Sacrificing the morale and well-being of employees to an ideal of efficiency or service is not normal.

Some important factors must be taken into account when working conditions have to be established. One must not lose sight of the fact that the employee is a human being and not a machine, that he seeks security and stability. He generally wants his working place to be well organized and managed and it is only right that he be treated in all fairness. The employee also wants to be informed about the state of his company's business, which makes him sure that he can expect a fair income.

Those are basic realities about the human being, that an active labour relations service must try to understand and correct, if required. In order to do so, we shall have to come to grips with a difficult problem because this is a purely abstract matter which covers the attitude of people, their motivations, interests, fears, personal problems and what is most flexible, the human being. However, if everyone tries to understand his role, it is highly possible that all those concerned will reach agreement as they would all like to.

Following industrialization, workers have pratically become proletarians and they were forced to sacrifice to big undertak.ngs their legitimate desire to be their own masters, as yesterday's economy allowed them to be.

Therefore it seems that modern industry should provide workers with some compensation for the sacrifices they endure and for the alienation of their freedom.

Workers have less security than they had before. Technology, automation and competition between producers constantly threaten them with unemployment, its miseries and privations. The worker therefore feels dispossessed, and becomes bitter, specially when he realizes that big industry subordinates the fate of the worker to efficiency, that is to the return on its capital.

The word "dialogue" is very much in fashion in our modern society. It means that people with differing opinions have the opportunity of exchanging views with others. Still, the real problem lies with persuading each one of the parties to listen to the ideas of the other, then to revise and question his own. Perhaps we should adopt as a slogan to speak less and listen more! When everyone speaks at once and no one listens, there is no communication, only noise.

In this chamber the rules state that only one member may have the floor at a time. However, this does not always establish a communication of ideas. In a corporation, we see that if the boss does not listen to the workers, the workers will not listen to the boss. If university administrators do not listen to the students, the students will not listen to the administrators.

And if the government does not listen to the representatives of industry, industry will not listen to the government's representatives. Often it happens that the government and labour do not speak the same language, especially when talking about the government's wage policy and the workers.

These are terms that many people use with different connotations. I recently came upon an editorial written by Mr. Jean-Paul Desbiens in the March 31, 1971 issue of La Presse; this article is quite appropriate to the circumstances. It says:

> The need for rationalization leads on the one hand to centralization and, on the other, to longer and longer collective agreements. Contrarily to living beings, collective agreements never discharge any waste. Moreover, negotiators—whichever side of the table they may sit on—tend to develop the habit of endlessly polishing old clauses while inventing new ones. All parties argue about where a comma should be placed and run the risk of forgetting the basic aim of collective agrements, namely to humanize labour relations.
> In fact, relations become more and more entangled in formality and pettifogging. Instead of mapping a safety zone for everybody, collective agreements become a mine field.
> Nobody realizes how beneficial it would be to administer a good purgative to the old collective agreements. After all, collective agreements are not unlike pharmacies: about three quarters of the pills could well go down the drain without the citizens being affected in their health.

It is unfortunate to note sometimes that people who should be interested in maintaining good relations are not as anxious to fulfill their responsibilities as they are to claim their rights. Many problems would automatically be solved if people were more concerned about putting into practice that good old law of compensation which says that well-done work should be rewarded. With the new production methods used in this age of automation, a good number of workers are prone to demand high pay for little work, with the result that in the different administrative services, there are function-holders who are not "functioning". Some could be compared to the big books in a library, the higher ones being often the ones that are used less.

I cannot help quoting the conclusions of a humourous observer, published in a newspaper, where he gave the best way of testing the reactions of an inanimate civil servant. The article was published on September 7, 1969 under the title "Dead or Asleep" and I quote:

> As many service directors in the Public Service find it hard to know whether some public servants are dead or merely asleep, they issued the following memorandum: "Any public servant found seated after his death shall be summarily struck off strength in accordance with Rule 3043, paragraph P, section 8. On account of the great sensitiveness of our employees and of the great resemblance between death and their usual position, the inquiry must be made quietly so as not to wake up the employee, should he be merely asleep. If, after the inquiry, there is any doubt about the employee's condition, hand him a cheque. Should there be no reaction, it means he is dead. In some cases, the stretching hand instinct is so great that a post mortem spasm could occur. Be careful not to be misled.

To those who are under the impression that all problems, such as salary adjustments, unemployment insurance benefits and others can be solved through a computer, allow me to quote in conclusion the point of view of a contemporary observer:

> A modern computer is an electronic wonder that makes extremely complicated mathematical operations in one ten-thousandth of a second and sends its results ten days too late.

I wish also to add that I support the passing of Bill C-228, as it is a step toward improvement and I have good reasons to believe that its study in committee will contribute to the clarification of its content.

Canada Labour (Standards) Code

[English]

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate and to give my unqualified support to second reading of Bill C-228. This bill is an indication of the government's concern for the workingman. I am pleased to note that not only are we improving the present legislation but are branching out into a new field, namely, legislation providing for severance pay. I am sorry that time will not permit me to touch upon every area covered by the bill. Circumstances limit me to commenting on only one or two areas. However, from looking over the bill one cannot help conceding that it is legislation with which parliament should be concerned and should be happy to support.

As a former lawyer, I welcome the proposed amendment which would prohibit an employer dismissing, suspending or laying-off an employee solely on the ground that garnishment procedures have been or may be taken in regard to the employee's wages. It was inconceivable to me that an employer, because he was put to some additional bookkeeping, would see fit to terminate a man's employment because his wages had been garnisheed. In many cases the garnishee was not warranted nor, in fact, was it allowed by the court. Quite often the threat only that a garnishee proceeding might be taken would force debtors into a position of entering into unconscionable transactions in order to protect their jobs. I am pleased the government has seen fit to remove this form of legal blackmail which has been too readily available to creditors.

Mr. Speaker, I now want to say something about the proposed federal standard dealing with severance pay. It is my understanding that there is no existing federal or provincial legislation in respect of severance pay. It would be my guess—I do not have the statistics—that a large percentage of employees working under major collective agreements in Canada are covered by severance pay plans of some kind. It would also be my prediction that the proportion is almost certain to increase because of the interest in job security that is manifesting itself.

Mr. Horner: The uncertain times of today!

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) wishes to speak, I shall be happy to yield the floor. He is interrupting everybody tonight, but I feel honoured that he has listened. I shall continue as I have only five minutes left, but I should like the hon. member to sit down or go outside the House.

Probably the most common type of plan provides for payment to employees with one year's service of severance pay equal to one week's pay for each year of service up to a maximum period. To me this is one more indication of the benefit or responsible collective bargaining and is the kind of thing union leaders should be looking for when negotiating on behalf of their members. The government has recognized its responsibility to workers coming within federal jurisdiction who do not—

[Mr. Dionne.]

Mr. Horner: Can you read the parliamentary secretary's note?

Mr. Cullen: The parliamentary secretary's note says, "Don't let Horner bother you. He has been talking like that all night."

Mr. Horner: I did not know I was so effective.

Mr. Cullen: —have the benefit of a collective bargaining agreement or membership in a union. In Bill C-228 we have provision whereby an employee whose job is terminated for reasons other than just cause, and who has completed five consecutive years of employment with the same employer, shall be entitled to severance pay of two days' pay at his regular rate for each year of continuous service up to a maximum of 40 days' pay. Employees who are entitled on termination to an immediate pension under a registered pension plan, old age security, and so on, are not entitled to receive this severance pay as a matter of law.

The bill goes on to define what a lay-off is. It is my impression, Mr. Speaker, that no one can properly attack the principle of severance pay under this bill. I suspect that members of the opposition will see fit to find ways of suggesting a shorter period of time in which an individual would have to be employed. That is only natural, and I think if I were sitting over there I would be making this kind of representation to the government. It is my feeling that the Department of Labour under this particular minister cannot be accused of "stand-patitis." I think the legislation that we have here is the kind that all members of the House will welcome, and if it is possible to improve it at committee stage I hope that improvements will be made.

I was particularly impressed with the provision in the bill covering mass lay-offs and the responsibility that employers in the federal field will have to face in the future. They will have to recognize that some attempt must be made to help individuals. Recently Polymer Corporation found it necessary to lay off 47 employees at a plant called Kayson Plastics and Chemicals, Limited. Rather than simply laying off these employees and letting them find their own jobs, they decided to notify the government two or three months in advance so that they could take advantage of the opportunities under manpower training and the Department of Labour of Ontario. They set up a citizens' committee, and in addition appointed an individual who is described in the Financial Post of February 20, 1971, in the following way:

> Another key Polymer move has been the placing of an employee relations official from Sarnia into the Kayson plant.
> The man is Pat Muise, a warm ex-Cape Breton coal miner. His assignment: find jobs.

This man canvassed industries and plants in the area and found 13 jobs that had not been previously advertised. This has cost Polymer something like $1,000 per job. The headline of the article, written by John Schreiner, is "The $1,000 Goodbye: How to Turn Layoff Into Jobs". The Crown corporation has set an admirable precedent.

The legislation we are discussing today is the kind that we should be dealing with in this House. I welcome both the initiative of the government, and the initiative of a Crown corporation which found itself faced with having to lay off employees and saw that they obtained other employment.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I was prepared to say a few words on Bill C-228, but as it is approximately ten o'clock may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may call it ten o'clock if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

OIL—PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—EXPRESSION OF CANADIAN OPPOSITION—PARTICIPATION BY BRITISH COLUMBIA IN MEETING WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, without question one of the most important issues facing Canada today concerns the manner in which another country is moving oil from one part of its domain, namely, Alaska, to the great markets of the southern portion of the United States. This question concerns the protection of the ecological heritage of this country, it impinges on considerations of our political sovereignty and it has significance in consideration of our own natural resources and our commercial politics and postures generally.

It is regrettable that in dealing with so vital a matter of concern to our own and succeeding generations the government of Canada displays a lack of purpose, a lack of consistency, a lack of vigour and at times, one fears, a lack of concern. We are advised that on May 3 a meeting is to be held with United States authorities on the matter. But what will the Canadian representative say at that meeting? What view or views will be presented or represented? When I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on April 21 if there was a cabinet-wide position on the TAPS route, he replied immediately, "No, Mr. Speaker, the subject has not been the object of policy by the government." So if the government has no policy—and this I readily believe—what will be the role of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) at this major meeting?

From various ministers we have had a wide spectrum of views. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has declared that he wants the TAPS route rejected. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) ponders aloud as to the right of Canada even to question the American government on the movement of oil down our west coast, considering tanker movements on our own east coast. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien), and that ebullient, effervescent gentleman the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) go awooing American big business, suggesting that the Mackenzie Valley route is the best of all possible solutions. But the Minister of Communications, (Mr. Kierans), not one of the silent, strong members of the cabinet as is the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) at the moment, declares that a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley would be a disaster. Out of all this array of variance, uncertainty and contradiction, how can anyone believe that there could be coherence or consistency on this vital question among the group of people now in charge of this nation's affairs?

I suggested to the Prime Minister the other day that since the British Columbia government and legislature had a clear point of view on this matter—unlike the government of Canada—steps should be taken to have the British Columbia government represented at the May 3 meeting. Then at least the people of British Columbia and the rest of the country would have some assurance that someone at least knew what they supported and knew what they opposed.

The danger of ecolocatastrophe on our west coast should be sufficiently frightening to stir the government into united action and strong representation to the United States authorities. I hope that after all the weeks and months of vacillation, contradiction, uncertainty and pusillanimous utterances, such a policy and such a voice will be forthcoming in time.

Mr. Barney Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to respond to the question posed by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) who has expressed concern about this rather important problem. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has expressed the government's very serious concern about the risk of pollution if the Alaska route is adopted. It was for this reason that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) requested consultation with United States officials, and as the hon. member has stated this will take place in Washington on May 3.

We have been in touch with the government of British Columbia on this question and it has been established that British Columbia officials will be participating in the Canadian delegation. This will also include officials from the Department of External Affairs, the Department of Transport and the Department of Fisheries and Forestry.

The consultations are on the problem of pollution and will deal with such matters as conditions relating to navigation, volume of oil which should be moved, drift in case of accident, effect on marine life, legislation and financial considerations. The Canadian interest is to prevent any damage to the natural environment more than with the problem of how we should clean up oil spills once they occur. We are seeking facts. There is a legitimate worry about the danger which a massive movement of oil would present to the natural environment. It is important that full information be assessed before action is taken which could prove detrimental to both countries.

The hon. member suggests that there is no policy. There is no policy by the "seat of the pants". This government does not make policy in that way. Its concerns are deep and long-range. The hoped-for establishment of a ministry of the environment is a true indication of the government's concern in this area, together with the designation of one of the most able ministers ever to serve this country as minister of that department. So I think lack of coherence, consistency or concern, to use the hon. member's own words, does not exist. This is a time for thoughtful consideration, for consultation and for positive action stemming from well thought-out policies; and I think the hon. member will find that this will be the case.

PUBLIC SERVICE—DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—ALLEGED PREFERENTIAL SALARY TREATMENT FOR TORONTO EMPLOYEES COMPARED WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday April 21, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) the following question as recorded on page 5118 of Hansard:

> Is the hon. minister aware of serious complaints lodged by federal civil servants employed in the family allowance branch in Quebec City, to the effect that because of the department's practice of classifying employees doing the same kind of work, the officers on duty in the Toronto office receive $1,000 more annually than those in Quebec City?

I asked this question because in the Quebec region, we are always astonished at the difference between salaries paid by this department to its Toronto officers and those paid to the Quebec officers who belong to the same category.

This has already caused some protests on the part of the Quebec officers who know their rights are not respected.

At that time, prior to the integration into this department of certain employees of the Department of Supply and Services, the Quebec officer working in the "transfer" unit was classified CR 2 with a salary of $4,900 whereas an officer with the same position in Toronto was classified CR 3 with an additional $1,000 per year.

The Quebec officers lived through a moment of hope when the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated his election program in 1968, namely the establishment of a just society.

Perhaps the Prime Minister found pleasure in detailing his program. However, I think time has come to point out that the situation is still deplorable for the Quebec officers who are disgusted and tired of paying for other people.

Does the minister know that this kind of operation enabled the Quebec City office to record an administration surplus of $107,000 for the year 1969-70 and that this amount was transferred to Toronto, enabling the local office to grant salaries as those I have already mentioned?

Did the department give instructions to that effect or was there an understanding involving both offices exclusively? Why does the reclassification revision office tolerate such an injustice? How can the revision officers allow themselves to act in a way that leads us to question their ability and their intentions?

Does the minister know that two people went to the Quebec City office to inquire after the employees had informed of their grievances the former union leader the hon. member for Langelier (Mr. Marchand)?

Can the minister explain why the report that was to follow the inquiry was never made available to the interested parties?

Does the minister recognize the principle of equality: equal work, equal pay?

Can the minister tell us whether he intends to take into consideration the greater merit of the Quebec City office employees, who are bilingual and can therefore discharge their duties more quickly than their Toronto counterparts who must wait for the return of their correspondence which is translated through a special service?

I doubt that the minister is in possession of all the necessary information that would enable him to reply satisfactorily, since I am convinced that many things have been hidden from him until now. Therefore, I beg leave to suggest to the minister not to try and wash his hands of this business as Pilate once did.

This is too serious a question for me to expect a final answer today. In my view, this matter should be studied in depth. May I take the liberty of advising the minister on the choice of the investigators. He might prove to us his wish to really solve this problem in conducting a personal investigation which, all in all, should only require a few days, provided he contacts the people affected by this monkey business.

The best report could be prepared with co-operation of the victims of this hanky-panky, that is employees of all levels in the Quebec City office, who are in a position to provide him with all the details on this unfortunate situation.

If the Department of National Health and Welfare recognizes that family allowances and old age pensions should be paid at the same rate for both Quebec and Ontario residents, I submit that the minister should also recognize the need for paying the same salaries to his employees who operate under a classification which I feel should be the same throughout Canada.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to answer the question of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin). I must commend him for the excellent electoral speech that he has just made. He referred to a just society, and I should like him also to be just to society.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have been informed that 49 employees of the family allowance branch for the province of Quebec, located in Quebec City, filed grievances to complain about the difference in levels of classification that exists between employees in Quebec City and Toronto.

Mr. Speaker, these grievances were examined through the usual procedure and French-speaking classification officers of the Department of National Health and Welfare inquired, together with officers of the Department of National Defence.

The organization and classification of employees in Quebec and Toronto working for the family allowance branch in Quebec City are the same and, accordingly, the grievances presented were rejected.

NATIONAL PARKS—SHIP HARBOUR—PREVENTION OF LAND SPECULATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish first of all to thank the minister for having stayed this evening. The issue I wish to bring forward arises from two brief questions I put to him, as reported in Hansard on April 21 on page 5122, having to do with reports and suggestions which are reaching my office in considerable numbers expressing concern and alarm over what appears to be land speculation in connection with a proposed park at Ship Harbour.

My purpose in being here tonight is to illicit certain information from the minister, not necessarily to emphasize the aspect I have just mentioned. I am sure that if there is anything of that nature going on, the minister and the federal authority will take steps accordingly, even though at this stage it would not be a matter of particular concern to them directly but one of indirect concern.

I should like to ask the hon. gentleman one or two simple questions. The answers to them, or the reaction to them, would go a long way toward bringing to an end the concern which arises when people are not kept advised of a situation. The first question is this: Why has there not been any form of communication with the public in the area concerned, in a public way, for more than a year? About a year ago the citizens of the area became sufficiently concerned to cause a public meeting to be held. Certain public officials attended that meeting and as a result a good deal of misunderstanding was cleared up. A year has now gone by and no attempt has been made to repeat this process.

My second question arises from the general vagueness which seems to surround the question of a third national park in Nova Scotia. There has been a clear indication in correspondence and from the provincial authorities that there will indeed be a third park in the province and that planning is in progress, but as yet there has been no public announcement by the minister to the effect that the federal authority has decided to go ahead. I think the minister should first call a meeting and, second, inform us whether it is intended to provide a park. He should have the common sense to tell the people in the area concerned what the boundaries are to be. This is the only way in which it is possible to establish a park with minimum disruption to the people directly concerned and with minimum benefit to those who might use information, possibly coming from provincial offices, for their own advantage. This could put them in the position where they would go around the countryside buying up land they knew, or had reason to believe, the provincial government might buy for the purpose of developing a park. Some indication from the minister about these three very brief points would be very welcome.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this debate but I am afraid I cannot help him very much. We are embarking upon a very aggressive campaign to establish more national parks in Canada. In 2½ years we have succeeded in establishing six new national parks, compared with only four in the previous four years.

It is true that we are negotiating with the government of the province of Nova Scotia in respect of a national park there. Those who want to speculate can do so, because we do not know yet where the third national park will be if one is agreed upon. The hon. member will realize there are other factors to be kept in mind. We are receiving proposals from all parts of Nova Scotia, and Ship Harbour is one of the possibilities. We have not come to terms with the administration about the second national park in Nova Scotia, so we do not know where it will be situated.

There are all sorts of factors involved in any purchase from the province by the federal administration. We have to decide on the kind of park it should be, and so on. There will be a national park in Nova Scotia because we have to preserve some of the land along the coast. I understand that much of this land is being purchased by Americans and I think it is our duty to put some aside for future generations. I should like to see a third national park in Nova Scotia, but I cannot speculate about it as we have not yet come to terms. Perhaps the people who are purchasing this land will hold on to it. We are not advising anyone to buy this land right now, because they could turn out to be losers.

I indicated to the hon. member that I would convey his remarks to the provincial administration which controls the land, and this is in the process of being done. I thank the hon. member for raising this matter. I hope we will have a third national park in Nova Scotia, but I cannot say it will be at Ship Harbour or anywhere else. Nova Scotia is a very beautiful province and many places could be used for national parks.

Mr. Bell: Don't forget New Brunswick.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 27, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF REPRESENTATIVES OF PEOPLE'S CONSULTATIVE CONGRESS OF INDONESIA

Mr. Speaker: This House has the honour and pleasure of welcoming today a most distinguished parliamentary figure and a national hero in his own country, General Abdul Haris Nasution, Chairman of the People's Consultative Congress of Indonesia.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: General Nasution is concluding a nine-day visit to Canada, accompanied by his beautiful and charming wife, Madame Sunarti Nasution, as well as by Mr. Mustamin Matutu, a Member of the Congress, and Lieutenant Colonel Supolo, Secretary to the Congress. They are in the Speaker's Gallery today with His Excellency the Ambassador of Indonesia and Madame Bandoro.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: These honoured guests have visited a number of Canadian cities before coming to the capital city. It is the hope of this House that their tour has been enjoyable, that their many contacts with Canadians from all walks of life have proven useful, and that they take away with them many pleasant memories of their visit. We want to assure them of our own personal and enduring friendship.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. FORTIN—CONVERSION OF COQUALEETZA HOSPITAL INTO COMMUNITY CENTRE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on March 24 last, I asked the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) a number of questions concerning the conversion of the Coqualeetza Hospital into a community centre and the related family and social problems. The minister's answers to these questions are recorded on page 4566 of Hansard.

On March 24, the minister replied that no decision had been made as to the conversion of this property, further indicating that three proposals had been made by the Indians, that his department was studying each of these proposals and that the government would make a decision later. May I quote the minister's words:

—We are not, however, in a position to give an answer at this time.

Now, the same day, Mr. Wilbur T. Campbell, president of the North American Indian Brotherhood of British Columbia and of the Coqualeetza Community Centre received a letter from Mr. Bergevin, Assistant Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, stating quite clearly that a decision had already been taken and would stand.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that the House has been misinformed, as I have been myself, and that this prevents us from making the representations that should be made at this level.

I, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise):

That any decision be withheld until the conclusion of a thorough investigation regarding the conversion of the Coqualeetza Hospital into a community centre.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member can only move this motion to the extent that the Chair recognizes that this is a question of privilege. I suggest to the hon. member that this is not a matter of privilege, at least, not a prima facie case. It seems to me that the hon. member could obtain the information that he is seeking in some way other than through a question of privilege.

In any case, I suggest to him that the motion that he is moving is a substantive one, and not one of privilege, and that, in these circumstances, it cannot be put before the House.

TRADE

TABLING OF AGREEMENT WITH FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY ON SCIENTIFIC AND TECHNOLOGICAL CO-OPERATION—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41 (2), I should like to table, in the two official languages, copies of an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the Federal Republic of Germany on scientific and technological co-operation.

Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege last week of leading a trade and industry mission to the Federal Republic of Germany. The mission was made up of 28 leading businessmen representing a wide range of interests, and a group of senior federal and provincial officials. Our purposes were 1) to sign this agreement, developed earlier by a science-technology mission of scientists and officials from business and government, 2) to develop closer economic relations of every type between Canada and the Federal Republic and 3) to discuss with the German government bilateral, European and multilateral trade problems.

This new scientific and technological agreement is similar to those with Belgium and the USSR which we have concluded this year. Its aims are to encourage the exchange of information and research; to facilitate the movement of scientists and technologists; and, through the exchange of knowledge and experience, to contribute to Canada's trade and industrial development and to the growth of our exports of advanced industrial products and services.

I might add that the science and technology mission had identified a number of areas of collaboration with Germany which are particularly promising for Canada—computer software, oceanography, geophysics, metallurgy, construction techniques, to name only a few.

The choice of business representatives on the mission I led was related to these promising areas for trade and development as well as other sectors of mutual interest. The business members of my mission travelled widely throughout Germany, for private meetings with manufacturers, bankers and prospective investors. They developed new contacts which are expected to lead to increased trade, to the introduction of new technology into Canada, to licensing agreements, joint ventures, new investment and to other forms of co-operation between the business communities of the two countries. The businessmen were well pleased with the opportunities the mission was able to develop. A detailed report on these opportunities is being prepared and will be released when it is completed.

While the meetings between business men were proceeding, I held discussions with the German Ministers and/or State Secretaries of Economics, Science, Foreign Affairs and Defence and their officials; and with the Governor of the German Central Bank.

[English]

Accompanied by members of the mission, I also met with representatives of the Federation of German Industries, the German Chamber of Commerce and with a wide range of leading figures in the German business community. I encouraged them to step up their interest in the development of industry in Canada and in purchasing their basic food and material requirements from Canada, as well as in buying more of the products of our secondary industry. I also drew their attention to Canada as a possible source of more of their energy needs in the future. World trading problems and prospects were quite extensively discussed, as well as Canadian policies on these important matters.

With ministers and officials I emphasized the problems which enlargement of the Common Market would bring to Canadian exporters to Britain.

I also spoke of the need to move forward at an early date toward a freer world trading environment. I sought to establish that the Federal Republic, as well as other members of the community, should in their own interests wish to undertake broad trade negotiations with outside countries as soon as practicable and generally avoid the disruption of established and valuable trade relations with Canada and other non-member countries.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that these discussions were very useful. German ministers now have a better understanding and knowledge of the particular position of Canada in relation to the enlargement of the European Economic Community. I believe that they now better realize the extent of the mutuality of interest between Canada, the existing community and the prospective new members. German ministers emphasized repeatedly the commitment of their country to a multilateral free trading system.

I hope that this greater understanding will help to lead to better solutions of world trading problems, taking account of the interests of Canada and other trading partners of the Common Market. It would indeed be welcome if the EEC countries and the applicant members were prepared, in the coming months, to indicate their willingness to enter into another meaningful round of negotiations for the freeing of world trade.

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by thanking the minister for his usual courtesy in providing the opposition with a copy of his speech whenever he has the intention to make one on motions. This has proven to be most helpful.

We are indeed delighted that an agreement of this kind has been signed with the Federal Republic of Germany, a nation which has aroused the envy of the world, especially in the last decade, because of its economic and industrial aggressiveness. Certainly that country has much that we could copy and from which we could learn. One has only to visit Germany to be impressed at once by the psychology of its people who seem determined to make industrial progress. No day seems to be too long. There is one area in particular that we could emulate. Here is a country which over the past ten years has actually found it progressively more difficult to obtain enough employees to service its various economic projects and industrial complexes, while in Canada in the last ten years we seem to have been constantly fighting a losing battle to provide equal job opportunities and economic welfare.

The minister's statement speaks of the exchanges which will be possible between the business and scientific interests of the two nations. Up to now we only have the signing of an agreement. Its success will depend on industry, the ambition of Canadian businessmen and technocrats, and the encouragement of the government in taking full advantage of the open door and the opportunities offered to us at this time. I hope the government will continue to take the lead in this regard and provide constant encouragement for these interests to take full advantage of the opportunity afforded to them.

I wish to deal with one other part of the statement. The statement deals with vague generalities. The minister spoke of his dealings and talks with ministers of the Federal Republic of Germany concerning the European Common Market and Canadian policies. I am sure they were in doubt about such policies because we in the Parliament of Canada are also in doubt.

We hope that at an early opportunity the minister will avail himself of the opportunity on motions to deal in some detail not only with the government's policies and programs with regard to the European Common Market but also the equally important subject of the government's position and progress toward freer international trade. This must be a complex problem as far as other nations are concerned in their dealings with Canada. In some areas we seem perfectly willing to progress rapidly toward a freer exchange of goods, but in other areas we are loath to reduce any tariff or non-tariff barriers in order to move toward a free exchange of goods between countries. The minister and the government should provide an opportunity for a full debate so that the opposition and the people of Canada will know to what degree the government's policy is directed toward free trade, whether it is a policy of selective free trade, progressive free trade or complete free trade. We in this country as well as the countries of the European Economic Community would like to know what the government's policy is in this regard.

The opposition welcomes the agreement that has been signed. This is real progress. We can learn much from the Federal Republic of Germany. We can gain much from its economic, industrial and technical know-how. I hope that country will find it equally lucrative to visit Canada.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all hon. members always welcome reports of initiatives taken by the minister and his department in carrying on exchanges and discussions with responsible officials of other countries in an attempt to improve our economic relationships with those countries. These are certainly to be welcomed and encouraged. However, it should be pointed out that such initiatives will only achieve adequate results if they are cast within a proper and adequately thought-out policy framework, if, indeed, the objectives and the thrust of such initiatives are adequately defined. Members of this party have on many occasions pointed out to the government that we feel it has not adequately defined its policy objectives and the general thrust of its policy in encouraging trading relations with other countries.

One point that should also be noted is that, while I have no doubt that the 28 leading businessmen who accompanied the minister to Germany were all very well qualified in their own fields, I think it is to be regretted that representatives of the labour movement and of the agricultural industry were not included in the delegation. Representatives of these two groups could have added significantly to the usefulness of the mission.

I believe we will all agree that the signing of an agreement such as that described by the minister is useful and to be encouraged. However, by itself the agreement does not accomplish the objectives we would hope to achieve. Again, it is a matter of casting such agreements within a properly defined policy framework.

In addition, we should take note of the minister's statement that during the discussions with the German government and German businessmen he encouraged them to step up their interest in the development of industry in Canada and in the purchase of basic food and material requirements from Canada. Two points arise in this regard. First, what are the implications of the phrase "development of industry in Canada"? Does it simply mean we shall be obtaining more capital from Germany in future rather than from another country, or will such a move be properly related to whatever policy announcement the government may make with respect to foreign ownership of Canadian industries? Again, with respect to material requirements I notice the minister did not use the term "raw material requirements" though it seemed to me that the tone of his statement pointed in that direction. Everyone will agree that there is a need to encourage the export of agricultural and food products to Germany as well as to other countries in western Europe.

The minister also told us that discussions were held concerning world trading problems and prospects. It is, of course, essential and important to discuss this matter with other countries at every opportunity. The tone of the minister's statement certainly indicated the concern he now feels about the problems which are arising in consequence of the new developments in the European Economic Community. I believe we will agree with the minister that we should move toward a freer world trading environment, but I am sure the minister would also agree that there are many roadblocks in the way of achieving such an environment. Indeed, it is quite possible that such an environment may not be achieved by Canada and by other countries interested in such an objective. It is therefore essential that the government should have open to it alternative policy approaches designed to deal with possible problems that will arise in the future.

A good deal of publicity has been given in recent weeks to the development of world trading blocs and the problems which this is likely to create for countries such as Canada. The minister should be encouraged and, indeed, urged to deal with this situation and develop the approach of the department and of the government in this respect.

I also noted the minister's comment that it would indeed be welcome if the EEC countries and applicants were prepared to indicate their willingness to enter into further discussions. The words "it would indeed be welcome" suggest to me that the hon. gentleman has doubts whether in fact that will turn out to be the case. This underlines the concern many of us feel about Canada's future trading relations.

Overriding all these things is the need for the government to develop an adequate economic strategy to deal with our economic problems. This strategy must take account of the growth of multinational corporations, the influence of technology, the need for the rationalization of much of our industry and the attendant specialization that goes with it. Trading problems are, of course, closely related to all this. Thus I think it is essential to Canada's future and for the well being of our people that the government develop its policy more adequately than it has up to the present time.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, while listening to the preliminary report presented by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and seeing him table the agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany on Scientific and Technological Cooperation, we are happy to find that our relations with that country are better at the present time than they were thirty years ago.

I hope this agreement on scientific and technological cooperation will bring about advantages to both countries and mainly to Canada. However, this agreement should not be profitable to only one party as in some cases, where one puts in a horse and the other a rabbit. Agreements must be made on an equitable manner in order that the two parties may benefit from research made in either country. If expenses have been incurred to allow Canadian businessmen and industrialists to see the developments in Germany and compare their costs with those in Canada, I trust they were profitable, not only to those businessmen but also to the people who depend on them.

I am thinking, in particular, of the high rate of unemployment in Canada; we can compare it, for instance, to the rate in Germany, which the minister visited. Advice might also be sought, not only with regard to industry and business, but administration, to acquire experience. We won the war, it seems, but at first glance it would seem that we have lost the economic war to that highly industrialized country.

As we read the minister's report, as well as several others, it seems that the development of the European Common Market is of great concern to countries which do not take part in it, in particular to Commonwealth countries. It seems that as the mother country abandons its children, they find themselves helpless.

I note that, in his report, the minister says that he strongly encouraged Germany to step up its interest in Canadian agricultural products, which puzzles me. While Germany is invited to take an interest in Canadian agricultural products, we feel free to buy some of these products which may be grown at home from other Commonwealth countries.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce told the members of a Senate Committee on November 4, 1970, that we had imported in 1969 for $60 million worth of beef and lamb, and that in the statements made at that time, the government, the department had even taken the lead.

Now it seems to me that there is a conflict between the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Agriculture. Trade consists in buying for re-sale. I see no other reason for those invitations to trade.

So instead of buying from other Commonwealth countries goods we can produce, let us invite Germany to deal direct with Australia and New Zealand, to obtain the farm products it requires.

So, Mr. Speaker, I hope these efforts will be profitable for Canadian businessmen, for Canadian industry, and will contribute somewhat to solving Canada's unemployment problem.

AIRPORTS

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I raise a matter of urgency which in my opinion must be put before the House.

For all practical purposes, the work at the Sainte-Scholastique airport has been stopped owing to jurisdictional misunderstanding between the federal and provincial governments. Both those governments are accusing each other of being responsible for that situation. If the manpower crisis continues, the project will be considerably delayed and the citizens will again pay the costs.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous leave of the House to consider the following motion, which I move seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

That the House direct the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications to study the problem of manpower at Sainte-Scholastique, to report completely as soon as possible to the House on the state of the situation and to make recommendations likely to put the project back into operation.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion introduced by the hon. member for Joliette under Standing Order 43. It may only be put with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimity?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimity, the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

OIL

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—VOLUME AND DESTINATION OF MOVEMENTS—JOINT INVESTIGATION OF POLLUTION RISKS PRIOR TO DECISION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question concerning the consultations that officials of the government propose to undertake with Washington regarding the proposed TAPS pipeline which, according to the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary, are to include questions relating to pollution, including the volume of oil to be moved. My question is whether his officials intend to ascertain not only the volume of oil to be moved, which is quite well known, but the place to which the oil is to be moved.

I ask this question because of the importance of knowing how much oil is to be moved through the Strait of Juan de Fuca and in view of the indications that a pipeline may be built from there to the midwest involving the movement of as much as one million barrels a day, despite the statement of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that he knew nothing about the prospect of any such pipeline. Can the Prime Minister assure the House that the officials will seek to ascertain the volume of oil to be moved through the Strait of Juan de Fuca from Alaska?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question is quite involved. I must confess that I do not have the exact terms of reference, but if I could refer the question to the minister responsible for pollution he might be able to answer it.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I would think that one of the questions that the officials would be asking is how much oil will be moving down the west coast and what its principal destinations are, namely in California and in the United States Pacific northwest.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the last part of the minister's answer.

Mr. Davis: If I may put it more simply, Mr. Speaker, certainly the officials will be wanting to find out how much oil will be moving and what its principal destinations are on the United States west coast.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, might I ask the minister whether he would make a report promptly next week to the House, following the return of these officials, in regard to the information obtained from Washington, particularly the amount of oil intended to be moved through the Strait of Juan de Fuca?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to bring the hon. member's request for information to the attention of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister, particularly in view of the vagueness of the answers I am receiving, whether the government of Canada will press the government of the United States to make no decision with regard to the proposed Alaska pipeline until a joint Canada-United States body has had an opportunity to assess the pollution risks to the west coast of Canada, particularly that region inside the Strait of Juan de Fuca? I ask this question in view of the disastrous consequences that might result from a decision being taken prior to such an assessment?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the premise of the question to the extent the hon. member suggested that the answers were vague. He asked two questions. One was answered very clearly. The second question was whether there would be a statement, and the minister quite properly answered that the minister responsible for controlling this would receive the representation made by the hon. member.

Mr. Stanfield: I have one further supplementary question. May I ask why the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who is responsible does not reply when, according to the statement of the Prime Minister's parliamentary secretary, the purpose of the mission is to find out about environmental damage?

VISIT BY CERTAIN UNITED STATES OFFICIALS TO INUVIK PIPELINE TEST FACILITIES—MEMBERS OF CANADIAN DELEGATION TO WASHINGTON

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary which I should like to address in the first instance to the right hon. Prime Minister inasmuch as the responsibilities of several departments are involved. Are the chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers and the director of the Office of Emergency Preparedness visiting Inuvik and flying down the Mackenzie River valley, at the invitation of the Canadian government in relation to an examination of the possible development of a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley to the southern United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed that Dr. McCracken and General Lincoln will make a refuelling stop at Inuvik, and that it is at their request they are making the stop on their way back to Washington from Prudhoe Bay. It is at their request that they are visiting the Inuvik test facilities of Mackenzie Valley Pipeline Research Limited.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, in the same context I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he can indicate who will constitute the membership of the Canadian delegation which I understand is to visit Washington shortly on this general subject matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, without giving the names, because I do not have them, I can say there will be officials from the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, from the Department of External Affairs, some other officials, and some representatives of the British Columbia government.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DISCUSSION OF DEFENCE IMPLICATIONS OF PROPOSED NORTHERN PIPELINES AT WASHINGTON MEETING

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the defence implications of these proposed pipelines are among matters to be considered at this meeting? By this I mean particularly security of supply of oil from the Prudhoe Bay area to the central part of the continent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the meeting is to be held essentially in the context of preservation of the environment, but it is quite possible problems of defence will also be raised, particularly by the United States.

PROPOSED TRANSPORTATION THROUGH STRAIT OF GEORGIA—REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE INQUIRY BE PROCEEDED WITH

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. The Leader of the Opposition has apparently withdrawn his party's opposition to an inquiry on the subject of oil transportation in the Strait of Georgia. May I ask the Prime Minister whether he will instruct the government House leader to bring forward government order No. 63 which will permit a committee of the House to carry out an examination on site in respect of this problem?

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the Prime Minister. Can he indicate whether there is now general agreement among the cabinet in respect of the position on the TAPS route, and will this formal position be made clear to the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that a question asked in those terms is not in order.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—SUGGESTED FEASIBILITY STUDY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the questions directed to the Prime Minister indicate how complex and divisive this problem is. I do not mean division on the part of the government but rather the complexity resulting from the pollution factor, economic factors and the defence aspect mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary Centre. Will the government now consider setting up a feasibility study by the best experts in these fields and Members of Parliament and Senators in order that we can get together on this subject, work together as a nation and come up with the right answers as a basis for our submissions to the United States?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we hope that in respect of all questions affecting Canada's future we can work together as a nation, but as a result of the way the parliamentary system has been set up there is one executive called upon to take its responsibilities, and that we intend to do. It would be a very delightful solution if we could get together on all subjects and take decisions as a nation, but after all we do admit that some people have the right to sit in the opposition.

Mr. Baldwin: Will you put that in writing?

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I should like to follow up on that question. I appreciate the Prime Minister's answer. In view of the fact that this is probably the most complex problem we are now facing, will the Prime Minister take my suggestion seriously and implement it?

FINANCE

SHARED-COST PROGRAMS—INDICATION BY ONTARIO OF DESIRE TO WITHDRAW—FEDERAL REPLY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, as a member who apparently has the right to sit in the opposition I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question arising from the budget speech made yesterday by the provincial treasurer of Ontario. Has the government of Ontario made either a formal request or an informal inquiry of the federal government regarding its desire to have the federal government opt out of shared-cost programs, with Ontario to receive tax equivalents? If such a request or inquiry has been made, has there been a reply by the government and what was that reply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the first part of the question I can assure the hon. member that we will respect his right to sit in the opposition as long as his party wants.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: On the second part of the question, I cannot speak for the Minister of Finance, but in so far as the Prime Minister of Ontario and myself are concerned there has been no request for such an opting out. The first I heard of it was in the budget speech made by the treasurer of Ontario. Of course, the hon. member and other members of the House know that back in 1964 federal legislation provided that provinces which wanted to take tax points instead of the other arrangement concerning shared-cost programs could do so. At that time the only province which adopted this option was Quebec. The option remained open until 1969. When the government presented its white paper on taxation it withdrew this offer for the very simple reason that the whole basis of tax points would be changed and therefore the offer under the reformed tax system could not be made in the same way. We have now taken note of the stand of the province of Ontario and we will, as we said we would, sit down with the provincial authorities after tax reform has been implemented and discuss with them the way in which they might want to re-exercise the right of opting out which they did not exercise previously.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, do I understand from the Prime Minister's answer that the right to opt out has been closed as far as this government is concerned or is it still open? I am afraid I could not understand precisely what the Prime Minister meant.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the terms of the opting out which was presented in 1964 were withdrawn in 1969 when we brought in the new white paper. The principle of opting out is still acceptable. When we implement tax reform we will go to the provinces and discuss a new way of doing it, if they desire to exercise that right.

Mr. Stanfield: A special status.

Mr. Trudeau: There will be no special status as the Leader of the Opposition seems to suggest, because it will be offered to all provinces as it was in 1964.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, obviously this subject is always of great importance to Canada as a whole. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether there have been any inquiries from provinces other than Quebec, which has already opted out, and the province of Ontario, which has suggested it might desire to do so? Has any other province of Canada suggested, either formally or informally, that it would like the federal share to be replaced by tax points?

Mr. Trudeau: No clear request that I know of, Mr. Speaker, but from time to time provinces, including the province of Ontario, have said over the past few years that if they do not get more tax room they may consider using the opting out program which was proposed in 1964. The idea was sometimes raised, but there was no clear proposal to implement it until this proposal from Ontario.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Oxford on a supplementary question, and subsequently the hon. member for Lotbinière.

REMOVAL OF TAX ADVANTAGE OF UNITED STATES COMPANIES IN ACQUIRING CANADIAN FIRMS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that Ontario, through the budget speech, has now done its share to remove the tax advantage now possessed by United States companies which attempt to purchase Canadian companies, will the minister now recommend to his colleagues that the federal government finish the job and remove the present tax advantage that U.S. companies have in Canada?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly aware of the importance of the subject, but any tax changes will have to be announced in the House in the usual manner.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

ALLEGED CENSORING OF FILM, "ON EST AU COTON"

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

The National Film Board shot a film entitled "On est au coton" in Magog, Coaticook and Sherbrooke which depicts the problem of textile products. Now there has been a delay in its release. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether it is true that members of his office have seen this film and censored or forbidden it in view of its contents?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime minister): I do not know, Mr. Speaker. I will inquire and inform the hon. member.

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGED FAILURE TO SUPPLY AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS WITH NECESSARY INFORMATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I wish to direct a question or two to the Minister of Transport with respect to the report in today's newspapers about near air collisions arising from a breakdown of procedure in the distribution of information. I should like to ask the minister first of all—and I assume that an intensive investigation is going on—whether or not part of this investigation will include very extensive conversations with the United States federal aviation authorities as to the cause of the breakdown, if one exists?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): In the first instance, without the full information which I have now requested I cannot, as members will understand, accept the premise that there has been a breakdown. I only know in this regard what the air traffic controllers have said publicly, but there is a thorough investigation under way. Officials are in Toronto today discussing the matter with the air controllers, and I hope to have a full statement or full information within a very short time.

Mr. Forrestall: Because of the very obvious danger that is involved and the difficulty we would find ourselves in if two 747's loaded with passengers came together somewhere other than on the ground, has the minister given any consideration—I put this to him seriously—to halting the movement of unidentifiable aircraft in our major air traffic zones, such as Toronto International airport and the airports at Montreal and Vancouver, until such time as this whole matter is cleared up? At the same time perhaps he might deal with the question of movement of equipment in the same zone on which we have not as yet sufficient technical information.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply to the question but it seems to me it is a little long.

Mr. Jamieson: This is a highly technical matter, as the hon. member knows. It is also one on which I would have to be extremely careful in any statement I made publicly without having all the facts in advance. I want to emphasize, however, that on the basis of what I have discussed already with the officials of the department the possibility that the hon. member has referred to is not present. They are satisfied that the procedures are satisfactory to the extent that there is no imminent danger, if you wish to put it that way. But I can only repeat that in a matter of this kind I think it is only proper that I obtain all the facts before saying anything further.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Certainly hon. members agree with the minister that it is desirable to get all the facts, but since the public statement of the air controllers is critical of the officials of the Department of Transport, may I ask the minister from whom he is going to get the information? Will it be from the officials who are being criticized or does the minister intend to have direct contact with the air controllers to find out what the facts are with regard to what could be a very serious situation?

Mr. Jamieson: Once again I have to say that I get advice from the widest possible range of informed opinion, and on this basis the deputy minister of the department left for Toronto the first thing this morning to discuss the matter with the air controllers. I might say, incidentally, that had the air controllers done the same thing initially, perhaps we might not have had this potentially unnecessary argument and perhaps unnecessary concern on the part of hon. members.

FLOODS

MANITOBA-NORTH DAKOTA BORDER—COMPLAINTS BY UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I directed a question to the Acting Prime Minister, and since I did not receive what I consider to be a satisfactory answer I should like to direct a question now to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The question concerns, as it did before, flooding on the United States and Canadian sides of the Manitoba-North Dakota border. Has the Department of External Affairs received any complaints from the U.S. government concerning serious flooding charged by the Americans to have been caused by the neighbouring Manitobans?

[Translation]

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we did receive a note from the U.S. Secretary of State expressing some reservations about the Pembina river dam and asking that it be dismantled.

We replied that this dam had been built under an agreement between municipal authorities on both sides of the border. We do not believe that there necessarily exists a problem as a result of this treaty, which is commonly referred to as the Boundary Waters Treaty.

PENITENTIARIES

INVESTIGATION OF ALLEGED BEATING OF INMATES AT MILLHAVEN FOLLOWING TRANSFER FROM KINGSTON

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Has he received in the last day or two any representations or allegations about inmates in Millhaven penitentiary who were formerly at Kingston penitentiary having received beatings at the hands of guards after having been transferred to Millhaven? If he has received such representations, can he tell us whether an inquiry will be made into this matter?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have received such information from the Commissioner of Penitentiaries.

I have requested that an inquiry be held and, moreover, the Commission of Inquiry into the events at Kingston must consider this aspect of the matter. As a matter of fact, paragraph (f) of its terms of reference reads as follows:

(f) what bodily harm was occasioned to persons, whether inmate or staff, during the course of the said disturbances or related thereto, and the identity of the persons responsible for causing such harm;

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Inasmuch as the minister has already said that the report of the board of inquiry—I assume it is the one headed by Mr. J. W. Swackhammer—will not be made public and inasmuch as he has now said, in quoting from the terms of reference, that the board of inquiry will only look into those injuries which may have been sustained by inmates either from other inmates or at the hands of the guards during the uprising, would he not expand the inquiry to include the allegation that these inmates have received beatings at the hands of guards after they were transferred to Millhaven? Will he also, in the conduct of this inquiry, make sure that it is carried out by people outside of the penitentiary service who thus have no axe to grind?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, for the information of the hon. member, I shall state in English that the terms of reference are in fact the following:

[English]

During the course of the said disturbances or related thereto.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary question relating to the first part of my question. For the information of people outside the penitentiary service and outside the board of inquiry, since their report will not be made public, would the minister be prepared to allow medical practitioners to go into Millhaven to assess the extent of the injuries and the possible source of them?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have full confidence in the Commission of Inquiry that has been established.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question because I am still not clear whether the board of inquiry will look into the allegations which have now been made, either by Mr. Martin or by one of the professors, that there were beatings of those who may have been responsible for the riot at Kingston, after they were transferred to Millhaven. Will that definitely be looked into and will the report be made public? Will that information be given here in Parliament when the report is completed?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House I would like to table the documents outlining the terms of reference of the inquiry commission to which hon. members could refer.

As for the second part of the question, the commission will report to me but such commissions and their reports are considered to serve internal purposes. I must point out a precedent: it is the first time that two of the three members of the commission are people from outside while the practice has always been to appoint officials of the department to inquire into such events.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—UNITED STATES CUSTOMS COURT DECISION RECLASSIFYING CANADIAN-FORGED PARTS AS DUTIABLE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. What steps have been taken, or does he propose to take, concerning the recent United States customs court decision to place a duty on Canadian-made forged auto parts when exported to the United States?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that some of these exports are covered by the automobile agreement, and whatever might not be covered by the automobile agreement will be the subject of negotiation between Canada and the United States.

Mr. Hales: In view of the great harm done to the Canadian manufacturers of these parts in the meantime would the minister not consider taking reciprocal action against United States companies?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I think I had better take notice of this question because, as is known, I have just returned from Germany and I should like to look into the matter further to see what happened when I was away.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

PROPOSED PASSENGER FARE INCREASE—PRESENTATION OF GOVERNMENT POSITION TO TRANSPORT COMMISSION

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the government going to present to the Canadian Transport Commission a formal position on the request of the Canadian Pacific Railway to increase railway passenger fares by about 11 per cent and, if so, what is that position going to be?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have just been informed of this matter and there is no reason why it should be different from what has been stated in the news reports. I am examining it at the present time. There are procedures for representations by all interested parties to the CTC, but whether or not the government will in fact make representations has not yet been decided.

[Later:]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs if the Prices and Incomes Commission has undertaken a study of the increases in rail passenger fares proposed by the CPR, and will the commission make its findings known before the CTC makes its decision on the CPR application?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to inquire.

INCOME SECURITY

AMENDMENT OF WHITE PAPER TO BRING IN LINE WITH UNIVERSAL DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. the Prime Minister. In view of the strong criticisms of the government's position on income security made in a statement issued by the National Council on Welfare, a body appointed by the federal government, will the government consider recasting its white paper on income security to bring it more in line with the principles of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the white paper is before the House and the country. We feel that it is in line with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. If there is any special amendment the opposition wants to move to improve it, we will gladly listen to its arguments.

Inquiries of the Ministry

POLLUTION

CONSULTATIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON REGULATION OF SHIPPING IN STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA AND ADJACENT WATERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport whether there have been any discussions or consultations within the last six months or so between this department and United States authorities, either state or federal, with regard to the regulation or control or the need for regulation or control of traffic through the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the body of water serving Puget Sound and Vancouver?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I answered a similar question during the absence of the Leader of the Opposition from the House. The position is that there are ongoing discussions with United States authorities, and there have been such discussions for over a year, on the whole question of the control of potential oil spills and the like, not merely in the region to which he refers but indeed around all our coastlines, that is, those of the United States and Canada.

Also, on this question of the west coast we have been discussing with them the matter of appropriate navigational aids, and in addition a contingency plan having to do with the way in which we deal with oil spills, again anywhere around our coastlines. I would once more emphasize that these talks began well before the current discussions originated with regard to the transportation of oil from Alaska to Cherry Point. I do feel that the mechanisms are there and that considerable progress has been made in regard to the general problem as opposed to the specific one which the hon. member has in mind.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport whether, in connection with any of the discussions about a possible system of navigational aids along the Pacific coast, the United States has given any indication of a willingness to accept the responsibility for the cost of such installations on a route between Alaska and its more southerly states, if in fact the United States decides to establish such a route?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker, I could not say that our talks have reached the point where the matter of responsibility for costs has been involved. I would think, however, on the premise we have employed constantly with regard to our own territorial and adjoining waters, that in our own waters Canada has normally accepted the cost of the provision of navigational aids. I do not anticipate that there would necessarily be any departure from that practice in this case.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would bring to the attention of the House that we have already spent 10 to 15 minutes on this subject and in fairness we should soon go on to another subject. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich may ask one supplementary, and after that we will go on to another subject.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

OIL SPILL AT ANACORTES, WASHINGTON—OFFER OF ASSISTANCE BY DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the 5,000 gallon diesel oil spill at the Texaco refinery at Anacortes, Washington, yesterday, which threatens 35,000 migratory geese and which may well move to the southern tip of Vancouver Island, has the Minister of National Defence offered any assistance to the Washington State Department of the Environment which is attempting to deal with this catastrophe?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that this spill at the present time is within American jurisdiction, or American waters. However, we are keeping a close watch on it and we will be in a position to lend any assistance that might be requested of us.

KINGSTON RIOT—SUGGESTED APPEARANCE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF INMATES BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. First of all, would the Solicitor General table the terms of reference, as he said he would this afternoon, concerning the inquiry at Kingston? Second, in view of the fact that the findings of that inquiry will not be made public, will he invite representatives from Kingston to the hearings of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which is dealing with the estimates for penitentiaries, in view of the fact that the commissioner, Mr. Begbie, will also be there and it would only be fair and appropriate that the inmates be represented—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has asked the question and perhaps the minister might be allowed to reply.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly very pleased, with consent of the House, to table the terms of reference of the Commission of Inquiry, in both official languages. Furthermore, since a board of inquiry is looking thoroughly into the events which took place in Kingston, it would, in my opinion, be wiser to let the work proceed in that manner.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister the consent of the House, under motions, to table the documents to which he referred?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STRAWBERRIES—EFFECT ON FRASER VALLEY GROWERS OF DUMPING OF MEXICAN PRODUCT—IMPOSITION OF SURTAX

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question might properly be directed to the Minister of Finance but as the matter is urgent I shall direct it to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister aware that strawberry growers in the Fraser Valley are now faced with ploughing up strawberry acreage as a result of the failure of the government to implement surtax regulations to combat the dumping of strawberries from Mexico, now allegedly taking place, as requested by representatives from Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the Department of Finance is looking into this question with the co-operation of the Departments of Agriculture and Industry, Trade and Commerce. I shall ask the Minister of Finance to answer the question the next time he is in the House.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might pose a supplementary question to the minister. While they are at it would they examine the situation in relation to Mexican eggs which are being brought into this country?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONVERSION OF COQUALEETZA HOSPITAL INTO COMMUNITY CENTRE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Is the minister in a position to assert categorically that no decision has yet been made concerning the conversion of Coqualeetza Hospital into a community centre at the request of the Indians?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I answer this question since the hon. member at the beginning of today's meeting rose on a question of privilege or on a point of order, in this connection. I must say that Mr. Bergevin, Assistant Deputy Minister for Indian and Eskimo affairs may have signed a letter on that date but he had not as yet put his recommendation to me. Since then, he did make a specific recommendation but I must inform the hon. member that the proposal submitted by that group of Indians in the area was not acceptable to the government since the group had promised that it would obtain funds from different sources both provincial and federal, and in the final analysis, the Indians were asking the government to foot the bill in full and at this moment we do not have the funds required for this.

Therefore, we were unable to accept the building which remains the property of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The minister just stated that prior to writing his letter to the Indians Mr. Bergevin had not consulted him, which might explain his answer of March 24. Am I to take it that he is rejecting the contents of Mr. Bergevin's letter or is this letter still valid?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, since I received Mr. Bergevin's letter, I have written an identical letter to Mr. Wilbur T. Campbell.

EFFECTS OF ONTARIO BUDGET ON NATIONAL POLICIES —CONSULTATIONS WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister, if I can get his attention for a moment, Mr. Speaker. It arises from the Ontario budget which was brought down yesterday. Since many of the items in it seem to be directly antagonistic to the federal budget, I should like to ask whether there has been any consultation between the federal government and the provincial government of Ontario regarding the effects of the Ontario budget on national policies?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. It is an established practice for weak governments to try to have the combat on federal ground rather than on provincial issues.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Western Nova.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for South Western Nova, but I must bring to the attention of the House the fact that we are running short of time. We have time for only two or three more questions at the most. This is why the Chair recognizes the hon. member for South Western Nova.

POLLUTION

OIL—CANADIAN POSITION RESPECTING BRITISH LEGISLATION AUTHORIZING DESTRUCTION OF SHIPS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I would direct a different type of question to the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that several countries protested the action of the Canadian government with respect to the Canada Shipping Act, has the government protested the action of the British government with respect to the recent bill dealing with oil pollution in which they claim the right to blow up vessels polluting their shores?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think I might be permitted a little amusement over the fact that countries which did protest our bill so vigorously are now taking the same kind of action, as I told the House they would, when they found that their own beaches were being befouled.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

APPROVAL OF GRANT TO SAWRIDGE BAND TO CONSTRUCT MOTEL

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of the fact that a grant to the Sawridge Indian band at Slave Lake has been approved by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for construction of a motor hotel and the deadline for this grant is expiring in about two weeks, can the minister indicate whether he has had an opportunity to look into the hold-up in his department regarding the financing? Can he inform us if we can expect it to be cleared up in the near future?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I doubt if the minister can reply to the question in that form. I would think that normally it should be discussed at the time of adjournment.

COMMUNICATIONS

INCLUSION ON AGENDA OF JUNE FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE IN LIGHT OF STATEMENT BY QUEBEC MINISTER

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of his interesting answer regarding the constitution a moment ago, and in view of the statement of Premier Bourassa of the province of Quebec regarding the field of federal communications and broadcasting, since there has been no request that this matter be placed on the federal-provincial conference agenda for June, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he is going to expand his constitutional theories and take some initiative to have this matter placed on the agenda? I ask this question in view of the confusion that is developing in this very important area as witnessed by the answer given yesterday by the Secretary of State who admitted there was confusion.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, not all matters can be settled in June. If some are settled we will be very happy, but there are many matters of jurisdictional differences being discussed all the time between the federal and provincial governments. This question of broadcasting is one of them. There have been discussions in the past between federal and provincial officials on the matter of broadcasting, as I am sure there will be in the future. This does not mean it will be settled in June, Mr. Speaker.

CABLEVISION—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

As the Premier of Quebec has confirmed that the statements made by Mr. L'Allier represent the policy of the Quebec government on cablevision, will the Prime Minister soon make a fairly specific statement on the policy the federal government intends to follow in the negotiations now under way between Ottawa and Quebec?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec premier and myself have touched upon the subject briefly together. I know his position, and he knows ours. We do not intend to change them, but we do intend to have discussions to find out whether a compromise cannot be reached. Other provinces intend to do the same. Indeed, I know that the authorities of the province of Ontario have also asked questions about that jurisdictional matter; we will discuss it with them in the same way.

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING HOURS OF WORK, WAGES, VACATIONS, TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT, ETC.

The House resumed, from Monday, April 26, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackasey that Bill C-228, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, I have a few thoughts that I had expected to get on the record last evening but was unable to do so.

First of all, in discussing the question of the government of Canada laying down a labour standards code, one really has to analyse who will be affected by it. It will be, basically, the unorganized labour sector of our society and the small, private business sector of our society. Really, in laying down a system of labour standards one can outline the hours of work and conditions of work, but many of the decisions on these aspects are made, in relation to what one might call the larger corporations, through labour negotiations with the unions. In the small, private business sector, we do not have the same provision for negotiating hours of work and labour conditions. So, there is a need for the federal government to lay down labour standards. In fact, if the federal government creates undue hardship in the small, private business sector by making the labour standards code too strict or by enforcing too rigid a pattern, then the cost of doing business in that sector is increased. One must be careful, therefore, to balance the situation in the small, private business sector with the organized sector, because individuals in both groups must live in the same environment. The non-organized worker must live under the same living conditions.

If we allow a system to evolve in which organized labour is able to acquire rapid and continual increases in wages, then of course these wage increases will have an effect on inflation. They contribute to inflation in the economy and, once again, labour will be drastically hurt unless the minimum wage is increased. This bill, in fact, increases the minimum wage and creates a situation wherein the minimum wage can be increased automatically by the governor in council. Up until this time, the minimum wage increase has come about through Parliament passing a bill to this effect. In fact, I believe it is less than a year ago that the minimum wage was increased from $1.25 to $1.65, and this bill would boost it up to $1.75. One could take that as an admission that we have allowed the economy to inflate at a very rapid rate, and have had to increase the minimum wage so that once again the worker might at least be able to cope with the inflated economy.

If we are to bring about some equalization of opportunity, and of working conditions, I believe the government of the day must realize that perhaps the time has come when we cannot keep on pushing up the unorganized workers' wages. Perhaps some action should be taken on the other side of the pendulum so that some government body or labour court could bring about some relationship between the organized and unorganized parts of our society. I know this has been attempted. Mr. Young of the Prices and Incomes Commission seriously tried, by the art of persuasion, to convince unions and corporations that prices should not be increased and that demands for higher wages should not exceed the rate of 6 per cent. I think we have reached the point in our rationalization when we can readily agree that this attempt was a complete failure. I believe Mr. Young was bitterly disappointed that his policy had no effect whatsoever on trade unions and had only a marginal effect on corporations. Of course, the corporations will make up for this in the coming year.

So, while we pass labour standards legislation setting out working conditions and number of hours, as well as a minimum wage, in respect of the unorganized part of our society, this really is not enough. We must study the situation and begin to do something about the other side of the ledger, because if we allow wages to increase practically out of hand sooner or later this will be reflected in the price of goods. When we get out of step with societies in other countries we find it necessary, as Canadians, to buy more and more foreign made goods which automatically creates less and less of an opportunity for the working man in Canada. As an example of this, one has only to look at the influx of Japanese automobiles, particularly in western Canada. One might ask what the reason is for this. They are good automobiles. They are allowed in because the economy has moved ahead and the cost of production has increased at such a rapid rate that a vacuum has been created into which the Japanese manufacturer can move.

The same thing applies in respect of the textile industry. Earlier the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) brought in legislation which, in effect, provides some kind of a stop-gap measure to temporarily protect the textile industry. The difficulty is that if we do that in respect of every piece of manufactured goods, we will continually move toward a state of isolation and this would seem to me to be the wrong step to take. The world is growing smaller and we are having more and more pressure placed upon us to be free traders. Therefore, we must be in step with the other facets of our society and of the trading world.

It is interesting to note the direction in which we are moving today in Canada. In respect of trade and manufactured goods, we find we are a nation composed of ten countries. I abhor the thought, but in actual fact this is what is taking place. In some areas we find goods being produced by employees who receive very low wages. Since these goods are produced in a low wage area, they are able to move effectively into highly industrialized areas where the wages are very high. Immediately, barriers are raised within our society. I am referring here to the production of broiler chickens, for example. This is a direct example of how the low wages in respect of broiler chicken production in the agricultural sector of Quebec is having a harmful effect on the broiler chicken industry in the province of Ontario. The market is being undercut.

We are being asked to pass a bill which would establish the minimum wage in the federal sector at $1.75. One must compare that with the minimum wage in other segments of our society. The minimum wage varies all the way from 85 cents an hour to $1.50 an hour in the ten provinces which compose this country. Newfoundland has the lowest wage at 85 cents an hour for women and $1.10 for men. Ontario has the highest at $1.50 per hour for men. Politicians sometimes become agitated about being popular politically, but cabinet ministers should always put their country first. We should try to stay in step with our country and keep the levels of our society in step with one another. At times, I feel the present government is doing everything it can to completely wreck the private sector of the economy. It would seem to be doing everything it can to convince the people now engaged in the private sector that the best thing for them to do would be to sell out and go to work for the government or some giant corporation. I really do not know what motivates the government in this regard, but this is how it appears. The government is making it more and more difficult for the private sector to survive in our society. They are making it easier for the giant corporations and the government to be the major employers in our society. What is the purpose of bringing in a standard which is far above the prevailing practice in many fields in which people are employed? The federal Labour Standards Act will not affect a great portion of the unorganized workers because most of them come under provincial jurisdiction. Provincial legislation does not set minimum wages nearly this high, nor are the conditions as stringent.

If the provinces felt that they could become popular by suddenly increasing minimum wages, I think they would. What would be the net affect? It would be an increase in the cost of production in those regions. In many of the regions where there is high unemployment, governments are trying to create opportunities rather than bring about a situation in which fewer and fewer opportunities will exist. I am certain even the Liberal government in Newfoundland would like to enact a higher minimum wage level, but this would make it very difficult for the private sector in that province to survive. Therefore, they are reluctant to do so. Most provinces have to place the emphasis on the creation of opportunities, not on the security of those already employed.

At a time when approximately 600,000 people are unemployed and the government is prepared to spend $58 million to keep the youth occupied by this summer, we cannot say that we are happy and contented. We cannot pass legislation which will only serve to make a certain cabinet minister popular. We have to create opportunities, not protect the well established firms, businesses or enterprises and the working men who have secure jobs.

Many portions of this legislation are very good. The severence pay concept is good, but my belief is that it does not go far enough by only allowing two days severence pay for every year that a person is employed. If a person is employed for five years, he receives payment for 10 days when he is released, fired or laid off through no fault of his own. Although it does not go far enough, it is a step in the right direction.

The whole concept in the House of Commons today is to repeatedly pass legislation which narrows the opportunities for Canadians. I have to point that out with regard to every piece of legislation that comes before this House, because this is the only way I can get the message across to the people of Canada and this government. We have to broaden the opportunity for Canadians to participate fully in our society. This legislation does not do anything in that regard. It attempts to protect those people already employed and, at the same time, narrows the opportunities for those people who are unemployed. For that reason, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) should not find any great pleasure in having this legislation passed. He should perhaps do this dutifully, but in conjunction with labour legislation which creates opportunities for employment. We have not seen such legislation yet.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank three members for their courtesy in yielding their right to speak to me at this time because I have an engagement later this afternoon outside the city. They are the members for London East (Mr. Turner), Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) and Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg).

I wish to make three comments on the measure before us this afternoon. The first is with regard to the minimum wage. I know the difficulty of trying to establish one figure which will be suitable for all Canada. As I am not wiser than Solomon, there is very little I can say in that regard.

The idea of giving the Governor in Council the right to establish these wages in the future is fraught with danger. I suppose the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) is aware of the danger. Perhaps I can put my fears on record so that they can be dealt with in committee. This approach may put the Governor in Council under a great deal of stress at certain times, probably once every four years. Also, it could be capable of abuse. At least the advantage of having the change made here is that we have an opportunity to openly apply pressure to see what we can come up with. The minister should be specific in committee and spell out the factors which will enter into the formula for the minimum wage so that we, and through us the country, will have a good idea just how the wage is determined for the 530,000 people under federal jurisdiction. In this way, a lot of grief for the Governor in Council can be avoided in the future.

The second point on which I want to comment concerns the equal pay provision. I have no quarrel with that in principle. It is a step forward that the policing will not have to be done by the individual. In the past, a woman usually had to complain that she was being discriminated against. That is an awkward burden to put on any person. We are not all ready to yell for our rights, and perhaps more women are in this category. If a woman does yell for her rights and gets them, she fears that she may be shown the front door of the factory. It is much better to have the department do the policing. I suppose the department will still be following up complaints. As this part of the bill is remarkably brief, I suggest that some policy of warning to employers might be instituted so that they will not be hauled holus-bolus into court as a result, perhaps inadvertently, of breaching the law.

One question which may be interpreted one way by the employer and another way by the employee is whether a female employee is doing the same sort of work as the males in the plant are doing. That may be a contentious factor. The employer might, in good faith, have a different level of wages, but the court may consider that both the male and female employees are doing the same type of work and that the female is being discriminated against. There has to be an element of common sense in the policing and enforcement of this section of the act, particularly as the law is now compressed into these two subparagraphs.

I welcome the maternity leave provision. It is indicative of a measure of civilization and common sense. I do not think there will be any danger of abuse through the granting of such a right to the female portion of the work force. As I promised to be brief, I will simply say that I welcome this principle.

Finally, I wish to deal with the question of the extension of the 40 hour work week. When the act was originally introduced, there were some, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who felt there should be very little derogation from the 40 hour work week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: As the hon. member says "hear, hear", I know that is still his philosophy. I listened to his contribution last night which, as usual, was excellent. However, there are some people for whom the extension of that provision that would be very unjust. An element of that group lives in my constituency. These are the people who work on the longshore in Halifax, and I suppose my argument would also apply to those who work on the longshore in Saint John where the work load is apt to be very uneven. There are large amounts of work in the wintertime, because these are year-round ports, but smaller amounts in the summertime. So, people on the longshore at Halifax and Saint John earn their bread during a very concentrated period, two or three months. I know the present Minister of Labour has been very receptive to using the provision of the act which enable the 40-hour work week to be exceeded by such people, and I am grateful for this. I hope the changes provided for in the present bill will allow this situation to continue. The minister nods. I gather this is the case, and I am pleased that it should be so.

This may be illustrative of industries where technological change may hurt people such as longshoremen, stevedores, checkers and the like, because the technology in the new system of transportation is hurting their earnings seriously. This is as good a place as any in which to exercise a large modicum of common sense and not tie ourselves down with too exact formulas. Since the Minister of Labour does a very good job thinking of those whose livelihood depends on what they can earn at work to which they take their lunchpails, I am not fearful of the law being administered by him; I just hope the good direction he pursues will be continued by others in future generations.

Before I sit down I wish to express my approval of this legislation. I think these are good changes, and important changes.

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, the general objectives of the amendments to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code are to provide minimum standards and benefits not previously provided under the Code and to update some of the existing standards. At this time I wish to talk about two parts of the bill which I believe must be drawn to the attention of members of this House for their consideration: first, group termination of employment and, second, individual termination of employment.

The introduction of these changes will provide federal employees with the minimum protection from the less responsible employers. Looking at the railroad industry since the introduction of diesels, we find that drastic cuts in the work force have taken place and many who were once proud employees of the nation's railways now find themselves on welfare during the winter months. Due to the fact that they were over 40 or 50 years of age when the lay-offs took place, it was not possible for many of these employees to be reabsorbed into the labour market on a permanent basis.

Each year many industries in Canada make changes in their production methods; many decide to lock the door and move to some other part of the world. The rapid pace of technological progress and economic growth can and does have adverse effects on the working population. If resistance to change on the part of employees is to be less harmful, as must be the case if Canada is to achieve its full potential as an industrial power, trade unions and governments must accept responsibility for the development and implementation of policies designed to cushion the impact of change on individuals.

More and more, Mr. Speaker, people of this nation are becoming aware that high labour costs have been leading managements in Canada and the United States to think in terms of closing out Canadian plants and transferring certain operations to other parts of the world. But the same managers seem to forget that the men they put out of work are also the consumers of their products. Most foreign demand for our products is concentrated, first and foremost, on our resource industries. Exports of grain, oil and gas, minerals and forest products are necessary to a trading nation such as Canada, but we must rely on heavy factory production and employment to provide the necessary lift to our Canadian economy. Any successful business is a combination of money and labour working toward a common goal of high production at lowest cost, so that both parties can compete in the home and export markets.

Down through the years employers and employees have worked hard to build many successful business establishments in this country, and much of their achievement has been accomplished with the help of foreign investment. We, as Canadians, welcome foreign capital but when the time comes for parent organizations to make any changes in the work pattern or plant operation, I say it must be done by prior consultation with the employees and their representatives. During the past few months, several plants in this country have closed down and it is certainly not in the best interests of the employees or residents of the communities affected to be saddled with the problem of relocating the employees without the help from the industry causing the shift.

For many years employers and trade unions have included in their collective agreements provisions designed to make the procedures governing lay-offs and recall more predictable and equitable, and settlements have included various arrangements to provide employees with some degree of protection against the effects of displacement. Governments, too, have recognized their responsibilities in this area and are pursuing policies designed to maintain conditions of general economic growth by offering a variety of manpower services, providing displaced employees with opportunities for retraining, relocation and job placement, providing short-term support for loss of income resulting from displacement under a general system of unemployment insurance and other special supplementary arrangements such as the transitional assistance benefit program which may apply when displacement results from government action designed to cause or accelerate industrial conversion.

Now, for the first time, the federal government requires appropriate notices of termination of employment to be given, thus enabling the manpower authorities to effectively utilize their various services. Bill C-228 provides that any employer who intends to terminate the employment of a substantial number of employees, and this includes managerial personnel and members of certain professions, shall be required to give advance notice to the Minister of Labour, the Department of Manpower and Immigration and any trade union certified to represent the affected employees. The minimum period of notice required to be given varies with the number of employees involved. If 50 to 100 employees are to be dismissed, eight weeks' notice is required; if the number is between 101 and 300, 12 weeks' notice is to be given; if the number is greater than 300, 16 weeks' notice shall be given. Notification shall include the proposed date of termination and the estimated number of workers concerned. Regulations will prescribe circumstances in which a lay-off will not be deemed to be a termination of service. Employers and trade unions shall co-operate with the manpower services to assist workers under notice of dismissal to find alternative employment. The Governor-in-Council may make regulations that include exemption of employees employed on a seasonal or irregular basis, and provide for notification of group dismissal of less than 50 workers where industrial or regional conditions are of particular significance.

Waiver by the Minister of Labour of dismissal notification is provided for where it would harm the interests of employees, be unduly prejudicial to employers, or seriously hinder the operation of the industrial establishment concerned. Enforcement of the notice requirement will be the responsibility of the Department of Labour, as is the case with a wide range of other provisions. Any employer who violates this part of the law would be guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction by a fine of up to $10,000 or, on an indictable offence, by a fine of up to $100,000.

The information supplied by employers proposing substantial job terminations in a relatively short period will assist the manpower authorities to carry out their programs to help the affected employees in such matters as placement, retraining, relocation and others. There is no existing federal legislation on group termination of employment, and therefore this legislation is desirable. The legislation proposes that an individual who has worked continuously for an employer for three months or more is entitled to at least two weeks' written notice of termination of employment or, in lieu of such notice, pay at the regular rate for the regular hours. This provision does not apply in cases of dismissal or just cause.

A special provision is included to deal with situations where employees whose positions become redundant have "bumping rights" under the collective agreement. In such cases, the employer must give two weeks notice to such an employee and to the trade union, and must post a copy of the notice in a conspicuous place on his premises. If the employer fails to give the required notices, he must pay two weeks' wages in lieu of notice to the employee who is ultimately displaced as a result of the bumping process.

A layoff is regarded as a termination unless regulations prescribe otherwise. Wages and terms or conditions are not to be altered during the period of notice without the consent of the employee. Compliance with the notice provision in a particular case lapses if the employee continues in employment for two weeks beyond the notice period, unless he consents in writing, and any subsequent notice to that individual must comply with the proposed legislation. Notice of individual termination will not apply to managers, supervisors and members of designated professions. Absences which do not interrupt continuity of employment and the meaning of "regular hours of work" are to be defined by regulation. "Successor rights" also apply to this section. There is at present no federal legislation regulating individual termination of employment.

Six provinces, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, Ontario and Quebec, have legislation requiring an employer to give an employee a specified period of notice or, except in Manitoba, compensation in lieu of notice on termination of employment. The Quebec provisions are contained in the civil code, which is at present under revision. In Nova Scotia, Ontario and Saskatchewan, to be entitled to notice of termination of employment an employee must have been employed by the employer continuously for three months or more. In Manitoba notice is not required if employment is terminated during an employee's first two weeks in a job, unless the employer and employee have agreed in writing that the notice requirements of the act will apply. In Newfoundland notice is not required during the first month of a probationary period established by mutual agreement.

In closing, I would like to point out that during the war years thousands of Canadians joined our military services and went overseas to protect our freedom and way of life. They did not worry about leaving a steady job because the basic fibre of democracy was being threatened. They were willing to make sacrifices to protect these principles. When they returned thousands of veterans went directly to new jobs, and once they became established in the communities of this nation they naturally thought that they were set for life. The foreign industries of this nation have a responsibility to these Canadian employees to make sure that in the event of close-out everything possible in the way of retraining and severance pay is offered to these displaced employees.

Governments must have rules and regulations to make it impossible for foreign industry to close out without disclosing to the government departments the reason for their action. It is tragic when industry forces hundreds of people on to the labour market at an age when it is impossible for them to make the necessary changes without prior consultation. No one is resisting change, but all branches of society must be fully informed of industrial change so that ways and means can be found to cushion its impact on the lives of all Canadians and communities.

Many changes in this bill must be complemented by changes in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, whereby close-outs and changes in working conditions will be the subject of negotiations between companies and unions under government supervision. I know that the minister is very concerned about all the details of the changes as well as the problems of the working people of this nation as we move ahead into the seventies.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief comments on Bill C-228. I think the main points have already been made by my colleagues who have spoken previously. All members of the House would rather see free, collective bargaining than the implementation of legislation to govern such negotiations. At the same time, I hope that the provisions of Bill C-228 will provide some spin-off and not a brush-off by some of the legislatures of this country. It appears that in many cases it does take the initiative of the federal government to bring about changes in provincial laws.

It seems strange that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) would bring in a bill at this time to provide for wage uniformity, since the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) not too long ago was substantiating the wage differential that existed between certain areas of the country. I have in mind the dockyard workers at Nanaimo and at Halifax, whose wage disparity was not eliminated. I am pleased to see that at least the Minister of Labour sees the need for bringing about uniformity throughout the country in this regard; I hope I am correct in that assumption.

The greatest problem with any bill is the enforcing and policing of the regulations that must go with it. A short while ago Canadian National Railways was fined because they violated the provisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. I have before me an article dated Saturday, May 31, 1969 which reports that:

> The Canadian National Railways was fined $175 in Quebec Superior Court for violating the Canada Labour (Standards) Code for failing to pay three of its employees time and one-half during national holidays.

We all recall the recent statements in the House of Commons with regard to CNR. I am pleased to say that once again the Minister of Labour stated he would not stand for any of this type of manoeuvring on the part of a Crown corporation like Canadian National. I refer to the attempt to pay provincial rates of pay when the uniform standards provisions of the act should have applied. I hope this matter has now been resolved to the satisfaction of all concerned.

A short while ago, specifically on December 4, 1968, it was being suggested that a new law would be introduced to regulate lay-offs. At that time, pressure was mounting in the cabinet to introduce legislation that would prevent companies from laying off employees with little or no prior warning to the employees or the government. Let me refer to an article dealing with this matter which puts it in this way:

> Two federal cabinet ministers have publicly denounced major layoffs in recent days. They contend that management made no effort to help labour adjust to unemployment.
> Labour Minister Mackasey said in the Commons last week "I think the time has come for the minister of labour to convince his colleagues that legislation emphasizing management's responsibility to its employees in the area of technological change is long overdue."

• (4:00 p.m.)

Then, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Marchand) also said in the Commons:

—that recent heavy lay-offs, which caught both labour and government by surprise, raised the question whether it might not be necessary "to oblige companies by law to provide advance notice".

I am sure the dissatisfaction of the government and the Minister of Labour in this regard has brought about some of the changes we see before us at this particular time.

The only suggestion I should like to make in respect of this legislation is that it would require employers to give advance notice of up to 16 weeks in the case of mass lay-offs, and severance pay to employees with at least five years' service. Advance notice is required only in the case of lay-offs of 50 or more employees, leaving an apparent loophole for employers to spread their lay-offs over a longer period. I hope when the committee studies this bill it will take this situation into consideration. I have in mind irresponsible companies which would deliberately use the provisions of this bill to lay-off fewer than 50 employees in order to avoid the obligations of the provisions of this bill. I understand there have been lay-offs recently of fewer than 50, and everyone knows that this practice will become progressively worse as time passes. I am sure this is an area all of us will consider in the committee when the time comes, in order to determine exactly what should be done as far as amendments are concerned.

There is no need to repeat some of the thoughts which have been expressed in this House. Most of us agree that this bill is very necessary, and with some amendments could be a model bill acceptable throughout this country, particularly to labour organizations and responsible companies.

It is interesting to note that there is some danger in the provision for equal pay for equal work. We should realize there are some 2.5 million women in the labour force and that more than 50 per cent of them are married. Some of the provisions in this bill will require a great deal of regulation and policing in order to ensure some type of uniformity. I am sure that the provision regarding the same or similar jobs requiring the same or similar skills, effort or responsibility, might bring about definitions by employers. I am sure we will all be responsible when we consider this fact. We all realize that all too often women are not brought into so-called decision-making positions. I am sure that a simple law requiring equal pay for equal work will be completely inadequate, because the work may be comparable or similar but different job classifications will be adopted allowing women to be hired for lower paid positions. I am sure it is not the intention of the Minister of Labour to bring about this type of situation.

It appears that these provisions must be accompanied by regulations which will require that all job classifications be open to women. This suggestion will be considered when the bill is before the committee for further discussion. At the present time there are no laws in respect of equal pay for equal work which require that all positions be open to everyone, regardless of sex. The provisions of this bill, I suggest, will not make any noticeable change in the present situation. Let us look at the situation in the House of Commons where we have one female member. This makes one wonder whether we consider there is equal opportunity for both sexes in so far as election to this House is concerned. I believe the government is serious in bringing about an end to discrimination and that it will make funds available for the staff required to seek out the inequalities which exist at this time.

In respect of maternity leave, I believe we must be serious when looking at the situation which exists. The bill before us requires a woman to have 12 months' employment with one employer to qualify for 17 weeks' maternity leave. To say the least, this does not seem equitable. Since an employer is not required to provide leave with pay, but merely an unpaid leave of absence, it is difficult to understand the need for such a requirement at this time. This provision limits a woman's mobility in the work force and restricts the amount of leave to which she may be entitled, in relation to her biological function of childbearing. It also seems to me that this is a most crucial time to a woman in the work force, a time when she encounters added expenses. This provision would still allow an employer to fire a woman who becomes pregnant if she does not have 12 months of continuous employment before the need for maternity leave arises. I hope this aspect will be seriously considered by the standing committee.

The committee must also consider the provision for 11 weeks' leave prior to confinement and six weeks after. This is another point which will receive the consideration to which it is entitled by the committee.

Let me now refer to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code suspense account. On January 15 a return was tabled in this House to a question I had asked. My question was:

What payments have been made into the Labour (Standards) Code suspense account and what wages have been paid out of it to entitled employees for each year 1965 to 1970 inclusive?

The answer was that there was a continuous increase in money paid in and a smaller amount paid out. I suggest that there must be a better method for the determination by various departments, not necessarily the Department of Labour alone, of these people who have paid into this account and who are entitled to some repayment.

I asked also what policies and practices were carried out by the minister to locate the employees who were entitled to payment, once a payment was received into the Labour (Standards) Code suspense account. The answer at that time was that a program to have the Department of National Revenue locate and advise employees of their entitlement was presently under trial, using social insurance numbers. It appears to me that by using the social insurance numbers these employees could be contacted and advised that they might receive the money they had paid into this account.

We realize that the railroad industry does often have deferments. I realize that it is practically impossible to adopt any regulation or guideline for operation in respect of the transportation industry. We should have some regulation or an agreement as a result of collective bargaining between management and labour covering the hours put in by truckers and railway employees. It appears there should be a determined effort made, perhaps with a little prompting by the minister, to bring about some resolution in so far as the hours of work of employees of the transportation industry are concerned.

In closing, I should like to say I am extremely pleased to note that provision in the bill dealing with the garnisheeing of wages. I know of too many occasions when employees have lost employment because their wages have been garnisheed. In the past, this has been sufficient reason for dismissal. I am exceedingly pleased that the minister and the government have decided to bring in a regulation prohibiting the dismissal of an employee for this reason. Far too often we find irresponsible employers will take advantage of such a situation to dismiss an employee. This has been the case in respect of the garnishment of wages. The minister is to be congratulated for this move. I will be pleased to see this bill sent to the committee. It is not my intention to hold it up at this time. I am anxious to see it discussed by the committee and amended as they might see fit.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, it will take me but a few minutes to say the nice things that I want to say about the minister; the other remarks I will have to make will take a little longer. This bill, in so far as it goes, is a good bill. I would not imagine there are too many people who think there is no longer much need for the minimum wage provision. There are surprising and tragic numbers of young people and others still employed in Canada receiving the minimum wage. I think that any bill which allows the government to ensure a minimum standard and a minimum wage is all to the good. I think this bill brings us up to date in this respect.

Then, there is the question of maternity leave. I think this provision follows the thinking of the population today. I do not believe anyone would object to it, except perhaps the men, because the other clause dealing with equal rights does not give this privilege to men, but then very few men ever get pregnant.

An hon. Member: There will be changes.

Mr. Otto: Yes, all sorts of changes are possible. I am glad to see this section of the bill dealing with maternity leave, as opposed to the inclusion of such a provision in the Unemployment Insurance Act where, as I already indicated, it does not belong. But even under this bill, there will be a difference. Of course, I take it that the maternity leave provisions in this bill will apply to women who are in the labour force and who will remain in the labour force. In other words, this part of the bill will apply to women who will continue working after they have had a child. There is a distinction between the women who have to make a living, who have to remain in the labour force after pregnancy and the majority of women who do not come back to the labour force. The latter group will not apply for the leave permitted by this bill. But under the Unemployment Insurance Act, with which we dealt a few days ago, no distinction was made between these two group. For that reason, I am glad to see the inclusion of the provision in this bill but not in the other one.

So far as notice of lay-offs is concerned, I think that is a worthwhile provision. The minister has made himself familiar with the problems arising in cases of mass lay-offs which come almost as a surprise. In most cases, notice could have been given. This bill makes such notice mandatory, and again I think that is a good provision.

Enough has been said about equality of wages. I believe Canadians accept this principle. I am glad also to see the provision with respect to garnishment, as the member who just sat down said. It is a little thing but it is evil because the debt collectors never bother collecting. They secure a garnishee order and immediately hound the employer until he gets so sick of it that the next fellow who gets a garnishee order against him will be laid off or fired. I should now like to see the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) do away with garnishment completely. It is an old fashioned practice which serves no purpose in this day and age.

When we have dealt with these items in the bill I wonder if we have really dealt with our labour problems. This is the labour code, and I would have liked to have seen the brackets taken away and the act entitled the Canada labour code, not the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. The bill covers little things which do not solve the vast problems of labour today. The problem is that the population at large is beginning to look with suspicion at organized labour and organized labour is beginning to defend itself, but neither one nor the other has a labour code to follow. We have no labour policy. We have been going along, adding item by item. We have this bill and we have other minor bills, but to say that we cannot deal with the labour problem because they are within provincial jurisdiction is nonsense. I think that today the federal government must take the whole labour question in hand and deal with it.

We have inflation, and what happens? We immediately have to institute controls, or at least the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) thinks we have to do so, and then we have unemployment. Then, we have another round of inflation. The employer blames the employee, and the employee says "it is not my fault, you are making too much profit, Mr. Employer". Then, there is the question of what to do with our unions. No one has set down a policy, nor has this government done so. What will we do with the problems of labour? I think they must be recognized as problems which we have left alone for too long.

The hon. member for London East (Mr. Turner) spoke about lay-offs as a result of the implementation of new techniques. He said, justifiably so, that it is not equitable to have people laid off and thrown on the welfare rolls merely because a new machine has taken over. He must also recognize that in order to keep up with the production capacity of other countries we must introduce new techniques. I would suggest to him, and to this government as well as to labour, that deadheading is not the answer. Deadheading is a practice of that part of our existing labour institution by which, if you do not need firemen because you no longer have fires in the boilers of steam engines you employ one anyway. In fact, an employer is required to train apprentices to be hired when there is no longer any need for firemen. That does not make sense, even to the gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Skoberg: I should have spoken after you.

Mr. Otto: But then what is the answer? In Toronto, the three large department stores send a mat to the three newspapers, the same mat appearing in all. It is not necessary to set up all the type, and the ad is printed on the same date. For years people have been employed by the three newspapers, days after this advertisement has appeared and the newspapers have been thrown away, to line up the advertisements, print one copy, which is then thrown away. Even to the gentlemen opposite this does not make sense, and it should not make sense to this government. However, no solution to that problem seems to have been found.

So, we have all these labour problems, but no answers have been provided in this bill nor in any other bill, nor has this government a policy. We are faced with strikes more frequently than ever. Can anyone tell me how a strike, which throws people out of work and closes down the factory, will ever improve the current position of the employer or the employee? What really happens is that at the time of the strike workmen go home without pay. They dig into their savings and into the strike fund which the union has provided. When these funds are exhausted they finally receive an increase which never makes up the loss which they sustained. In the meantime, the employers have lost their reserves, and it just becomes a tactics game. Surely, one hundred years after the institution of this old fashioned scheme of things we should, as a government, put forward some ideas by which labour can get its fair share of new techniques and new production, by which the employer can use new techniques, and by which the nation can prosper and increase its productivity. For months before a strike, labour becomes antagonistic. For months after a strike is settled, labour usually has not settled the details and is still antagonistic, so the loss of production continues. I have been involved on both sides of this question and I know what can happen to production. This is an evil thing and we have not done anything about it.

Surely, in this day and age we can find some method of dealing with labour-management disputes without having work stoppages.

Mr. Orlikow: Tell us how.

Mr. Otto: At one time I introduced a bill telling how, and I will repeat the details for the hon. gentleman. But the question is not one of labour-management disputes; it is one of labour-consumer disputes. Management does not worry too much. It merely adds on the cost of a strike and the consumer pays. Under the terms of the bill that I introduced when a strike is declared, instead of work stoppage actually taking place, people would continue to work but the profits made by the corporation during the time that its workers were without a contract would be taxed 100 per cent. No one would suffer; the country would benefit, and the dispute would still be settled through negotiation. Such a provision is not made in this bill, and there are other things which are also not provided in it.

I am trying to inform you, Mr. Speaker, of something that is a fact today. There is no sense in closing our eyes and saying that everything in the labour-management field is fine. The fact is that this is not so. Surely, Mr. Speaker, you have known for a number of years that there is irritation in this field, and we do not seem to know what to do about it. But somebody has to come to some conclusion, and I suggest it is the government's responsibility to come up with a full labour policy, a full labour code, rather than the few words that are in this bill. This bill should have been four times as long and should have included many other matters.

One subject which seems to be taboo, and which is not covered in this bill, is the election of union officers. It has been said that anyone who stands up and opposes the slate of union officers usually nominated cannot lead a free life any more. It is true that some unions have secret ballots in the election of officers, but most do not. Surely, it is time we settled that question and said that from this time on the election of all officers of all associations and fraternities should take place by secret ballot. Why can't we include that in this bill?

An hon. Member: For corporations, too?

Mr. Otto: Corporations, fraternities, churches, everyone.

Mr. Bigg: And the cabinet?

Mr. Otto: I am speaking of responsible positions. If you were talking about electing deputy ministers that would be fine, but I do not think it is important for cabinet members.

We must also soon recognize unions as legal entities. If they enter a contract they must observe the terms of that contract and be responsible for them. At present, we have a wishy-washy situation because the courts have said that unions are really fraternal associations, and are not a body corporate. That is nonsense.

I have already said that this bill should not require much debate. All of its provisions are acceptable to the public at large. The minister has earned a kudo for including some of the things, such as prohibition of dismissal for garnishment of wages, and the provision of maternity leave. I think we should get on with the bill as quickly as possible, but also as quickly as possible we should deal with the whole range of labour problems and the provision of a labour code setting government policy once and for all. We do not have much time in which to tackle that larger issue.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have studied with interest the measures proposed in Bill

C-228, an act to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code and, in general, I support what other speakers from my party have had to say in principle regarding the proposed legislation. I believe that all of us in this House have a moral obligation to ensure that for the many people whom this bill will affect there will exist humane and reasonable standards of employment, under conditions which represent as enlightened an approach as we can bring to this important subject.

Clause 5 of the bill deals with the requirement of a ministerial permit for an employer to work any group of employees in excess of the maximum hours prescribed by the legislation. I have some reservations about the practicality of this measure, although I quite agree with the principle. It seems to me that a number of situations must surely arise in which an employer has urgent and immediate need to extend the permitted maximum hours of work of some of his employees, and where the requirement that he obtain a permit in advance would be quite impossible and unduly onerous.

As a simple, practical illustration of this I am reminded of a situation of which I have personal knowledge. A local contractor was completing work on a new roof on a commercial establishment. It was imperative that the work be completed as quickly as possible because any serious rainstorm could have resulted in extensive damage to the interior of the building. The contractor has scheduled the work for completion at the end of a certain week. However, when Friday came he found that his schedule would have to be extended by at least another working day. His only real option was to work his employees on the Saturday, or to trust to luck that there would be no weather damage if he did not. He chose to leave the work unfinished over the week end and the weather held fine. It seems to me that under the terms of this bill it would have been difficult for him to get a permit in advance in order to complete the work on the Saturday. I appreciate that general contractors are not covered by this bill. Nevertheless, I am sure that similar situations could arise affecting employers who will be subjected to the requirements of a ministerial permit. All I am trying to say is that I hope when the bill is studied in committee some more flexible provision will be made regarding the matter of ministerial permits.

On the matter of overtime work, I wonder if there is not some wisdom in pressing for incorporation in this bill of a practice which has been followed by certain provincial departments in my province of Manitoba. For example, I know that payment for overtime work in the provincial department of highways, which is done mainly in the summer months, is banked and becomes payable on a regular weekly basis to tradesmen during the winter months when they are most likely to be unemployed. In fact, it would be impossible for that department in Manitoba to employ its work force throughout the whole year with any degree of efficiency. In this way tradesmen benefit from having a more continuous income throughout the year, without the necessity of relying upon unemployment insurance benefits to provide them with an income in slack periods. I think that this system makes a good deal of sense, both from the employee's viewpoint and from that of the government, his employer, which otherwise must subsidize him through unemployment insurance payments to compensate for the irregular nature of his employment.

On the matter of minimum hourly wages, I support the principle involved in this concept. However, I wonder whether the legislation really solves as many problems as some of its supporters think it does. Certainly, in some of our smaller urban or rural communities a minimum hourly wage of $1.75 per hour, as this act proposes be the case on July 1, 1971, would be quite an adequate remuneration to enable one to enjoy reasonable minimum standards of living. Indeed, in some areas it might be in excess of this and if employers who come under this legislation constitute a significant number of the employers in the area, this provision could then have the effect of obliging the other employers to establish in their businesses or industries a minimum wage structure which could even work some hardship.

On the other hand, in a large urban centre, and for someone who may be married, I do not think $1.75 an hour would accomplish the desirable objectives of this section of the proposed act. If one has dependent children in addition to his wife, and he is employed in a large urban centre at the minimum hourly wage, it may very well be that he would be substantially better off on welfare. We assume that with our welfare we are giving the minimum standard necessary, compatible with a reasonable degree of sustenance. Indeed, even assuming such an individual were to work the maximum permitted hours of work under this act, namely 48, his gross weekly income would be $84. A married man could almost certainly exceed this amount through welfare payments. I think the foregoing illustrates that this very important section of the proposed act requires substantial further consideration to see if amendments cannot be proposed which will remedy, in a more effective manner than the present bill permits, the situations to which I have alluded.

I want to commend the minister, Mr. Speaker, for the provision in his proposed act which forbids an employer dismissing someone solely because a court order has been issued garnisheeing a portion of his wages. Many people, through circumstances quite honestly beyond their control, become the objects of a garnishment order, which in itself is a sufficient hardship, embarrassment and obstacle to their becoming financially solvent that I do not think employers should be permitted to add to such an individual's hardships by dismissing him solely for this reason when he most desperately needs employment. However, we recognize that people do have garnishments and that this adds to the employer's trouble.

As a related act to the Unemployment Insurance Act, this proposed bill provides for pregnancy leave of 17 weeks, consisting of 11 weeks before confinement and six weeks after delivery. This is one area where I think improvement could be made in the proportioning of leave. Pregnancy is a physiological phenomenon and is not considered an illness. The date of delivery is uncertain, even under the best regulated circumstances.

Indeed, it is probably safe to say that not more than 50 per cent of births fall into the category of a week or two on either side of the expected date. Then, add all the problems of deciding when a pregnant woman may deliver and you are left with a wide margin for error on either side.

In addition, to the difficulty of deciding when the expected event will occur, both for the medical practioner and the woman, there is the question of how long a woman can work before her confinement. This depends on her job to a significant degree. If she is in a sedentary occupation, such as stenographer, she may well be able to work almost the full time; if she is in a more manual occupation she may be required, both for safety and production, to leave her job much sooner. After delivery, when complications may well arise, six weeks does not seem too much. In my observation, it is significant that most women do not return to their original employment. This may not be true in very large companies but it certainly bears investigation. Women often choose an occupation, usually at a lesser salary and with lesser work, in order to be able to devote more time to their family or to be closer to home.

I would like to see this section changed to 17 weeks to be given totally, proportioned as the woman herself decides. If she wishes to work up to nearly the time of her delivery and her employer is willing, it seems that she should be entitled to the full 17 weeks. I do not think it is practical to divide the time into two periods. This would create a lot of injustice and would not be happily received by many people.

These are a few short observations that I have on this bill, Mr. Speaker. I hope that in committee some of the provisions I have mentioned can be improved, and I will look forward to that.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this bill is important because the few provisions which it proposes to add to the Labour (Standards) Code can and will have an effect on millions of Canadians. When we passed the original legislation in 1965, we set the minimum wage for workers under federal jurisdiction at $1.25 an hour. At that time I doubt if any province in Canada had a minimum wage for workers under provincial jurisdiction of more than or even up to $1 an hour. A recent survey indicates that in the province of Ontario the minimum wage under the Employment Standards Act is now $1.65; in Quebec it is $1.45; in British Columbia $1.50; in Newfoundland it is $1.25 for men and $1 for women; in Manitoba $1.50 an hour, and in Saskatchewan $1.15 an hour. I have no doubt, therefore, that if we increase the minimum wage from the $1.65 at which it was set some months ago to $1.75, this will have a very fast effect on provincial governments. We will see similar increases in the provinces and I support that completely.

When introducing the legislation the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) made the valid point that it is particularly important to the 60 per cent of the labour force which does not belong to trade unions, and do not have the protection of collective bargaining and union rates of pay. For those people who do not belong to labour unions, the only protection with regard to wage rates is that given by legislation such as this or by the minimum wage legislation passed by the respective provinces.

A high percentage of unorganized labour has to depend on the protection provided by legislation. So, I am disturbed by the fact that in the year 1971 the minister has seen fit to propose a minimum wage as low as $1.75 an hour. That comes to just $3,600 a year for the person who works 40 hours a week, 50 weeks a year and gets two weeks off.

Mr. Perrault: What did you say it was in Manitoba?

Mr. Orlikow: I said it was $1.50 an hour in Manitoba. I have already said, if the parliamentary secretary would take the trouble to listen, that the provinces traditionally follow the federal government. The parliamentary secretary, who I presume met with the ministers of labour of the provinces who were here last week, should know the province of Manitoba intends to raise its minimum wage again in the near future. The federal government has always set the example. I would hope it would set an example in this case. It is easy for the federal government to do this. Only a parliamentary secretary as stupid as this one would not know that—

Mr. Perrault: Keep it non-political.

Mr. Orlikow: If the parliamentary secretary, who is not sitting in his own seat, would stop making stupid interjections I would ignore him, which is what he deserves. He should know that the industries which come under federal jurisdiction are by and large the railways, airlines, flour mills, the telecommunications systems and the banks. These can afford to pay the higher minimum wages proposed in the federal legislation. For this reason, I would expect any federal government, no matter what party is in office, would have a higher minimum wage than any provincial government, regardless of the party in power in that province.

I say the $1.75 proposed in this legislation is completely inadequate. The $3,600 a year, on the basis of $1.75 an hour a person would earn under the provisions of this legislation, is below the poverty line established by the Economic Council of Canada for a family. I suggest that the parliamentary secretary read—if he can read, which I sometimes doubt—a statement on income security which was made public this morning by the National Council of Welfare. This National Council of Welfare is not an NDP organization, an organization established by some trade union bureaucracy or an organization established by some revolutionary radical movement. It is an organization appointed by the federal government. It has, as members, representatives from every province in Canada. I would assume this government would have appointed to it people who are not very revolutionary. I would assume they would be people who, if not Liberals, would certainly not be very antagonistic to this government. I would commend to the members of the government, and the parliamentary secretary, this report because it deals with the whole question of income. I believe it gets to the guts of the type of things I am talking about, the difficulty in respect of a minimum wage of $1.75 an hour in the year 1971.

For the benefit of the parliamentary secretary, I might read a few excerpts from this report. It points out that a large number of people do not have adequate income at the present time in Canada and that these can be divided into three groups. The first group is that of a family which has no employable member. The second group is one in which no employment is available for the employable member of the family. We know that almost three quarters of a million people are unemployed at the present time in this country. In the third group, the income from employment of the employed member or members of the family is inadequate to the needs of that family.

The report points out that it is estimated there are almost four million Canadians represented by families in which the earnings are less than the amount required to meet their needs. Need I remind hon. members of this House that there are people living on farms in Canada, people engaged in fishing, people living in the bush and Indian and Métis people whose income is far below the poverty level established by the Economic Council of Canada. I shall read one section of this report:

> We have ensured that the stigma of poverty—

"We" means the people of Canada and the government.

> —attaches to the children of the poor by providing insufficient income for them to dress as their classmates, to afford a class picture as their classmates, to participate in class outings or extra-curricular activities involving expenditure. When they consequently learn to hate the school situation in which they are thus made to feel inadequate, drop out at the earliest opportunity in quest of a job—are the first to be laid off and thence drift into delinquency and crime, we blame the "culture of poverty" and talk piously of "cultural deprivation".

What amount is required to maintain a family? Let me quote what the National Council of Welfare says:

> The Quebec Government Commission, updating Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures to 1971, identified these as $2,000 for a single person, $3,400 for a family of two adults, $3,900 for a family of three, and $4,560 for a family of four.

I believe I have already pointed out what is to be provided by this legislation. The fact is that the minimum wage in our country is to be something in the neighbourhood of $3,600. So, if this legislation is passed we will continue to ensure that a large number of people who come under federal jurisdiction because of their employment will be working fully but will not be earning enough money on which to live in anything but poverty. I do not think that is good enough. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), has a bill on the order paper which would set the minimum wage at $2 an hour. The Canadian Labour Congress suggested it should be set at $2.50 an hour and the Canadian Railway Labour Association suggests in its brief to the government that the minimum wage should be set at $2.25 an hour. I would be prepared to accept any of these suggestions but I am certainly convinced—

Mr. Perrault: What is the Manitoba figure going to be? Do you know?

Mr. Orlikow: I have not spoken to my colleagues in Manitoba, but I am sure when this government moves up the province of Manitoba will do so too, as will the other provinces.

Mr. Perrault: Following the Liberal lead.

Mr. Orlikow: I do not think the government of Manitoba will follow any Liberal lead, and the parliamentary secretary knows this. I cannot accept the proposal of the minister that the $1.75 an hour in the future be amended through order in council as need is demonstrated. We have seen—and I shall deal with this later in respect of another aspect—how difficult it is to get the government to act. I had hoped the minister would have been prepared to spell out in this legislation that the $1.75 an hour he is proposing, which I have already said is much too low, would be adjusted annually and automatically based on increases in the cost of living.

With the exception of last year, we know the cost of living has been going up something in the neighbourhood of from 3 per cent to 5 per cent or more a year. This year's increase in the first three months of 1½ per cent indicates we are to have in this year an increase in the cost of living of between 5 per cent and 6 per cent. That being the case, I am not prepared to leave the adjustment of the minimum wage to the whole cabinet. I would not mind if the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) could do it on his own, because I have a good deal more confidence in him than in most other ministers of the government. I certainly am not prepared to leave the adjustment of the minimum wage to the whole cabinet through order in council, because we know from experience how slow a process that can be.

Before I leave the question of a minimum wage, I want to repeat what I said in 1965. I regret very much that this bill does not provide for a basic wage of even $1.75, as it does for all employees who come under federal jurisdiction, and give protection to the workers in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. These two territories are almost entirely dependent upon the federal government for their way of life. Because of their tremendous distance from the main centres of population in Canada and their very difficult terrain, these areas have the highest cost of living in Canada. These two areas have a very high, if not the highest, percentage of native people, Indians and Eskimos, in Canada. This is not the time to go into the terrible problems which we have foisted upon the descendants of the original inhabitants of this country. The incomes of the Indian and Eskimo people of this country, whether derived from work or other sources such as welfare or pension, are a disgrace.

Yesterday I spoke to a Canadian who spent five years working in backward, underdeveloped Africa. That person spent last week not in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon, but in The Pas, Manitoba. She told me she had never seen the kind of poverty, hopelessness and despair in backward, underdeveloped Africa which she witnessed among the Indian and Métis people in The Pas.

It would have been very easy for the government to include a clause in this legislation which would give the protection of this miserly $1.75 minimum wage to the workers in the Northwest Territories and in the Yukon.

I want to deal with one other matter, the supposed provisions in the act passed in 1965 with regard to the hours of work. The then Minister of Labour hailed this act as a great step forward, since it provided for not only a minimum wage but a 40 hour week. When the bill was originally introduced, it provided that where industries might be adversely affected by the implementation of a 40 hour week, they could apply to the department for a deferment before the 40 hour week provision would be implemented. The act provided that the minister could give up to an 18 month deferment. At that time, some hon. members, including myself, protested that the 18 month deferment was too long a period of time. I must confess that I was an extremely naïve Member of Parliament in 1965. I did not realize that not only could the minister give an 18 month deferment, but by taking the request under advisement he could in fact give what amounts to a permanent deferment.

Six years after being given such glowing hosannas about the paradise which this bill would create for the working people of Canada, almost every industry that comes under federal jurisdiction not only applied, but got and still has a deferment. The railway, marine, shipping and trucking industries still have not been brought under the provisions of the act with regard to the hours of work for workers.

The trade unions know the difficulties in their industries. At the time we passed the original bill, the Teamsters Union made representations to members of all parties about what might happen. The railway institutions made and are still making representations. The Canadian Railway Labour Association dealt with this problem in their April 19, 1971 submission. They agreed that there are problems which make it difficult to implement the sections of the act with regard to those who operate the trains. They made it clear in their submission that there is no excuse, six years after the original enactment of this bill for the non-operating employees, who represent 85 per cent or more of all railway employees, not yet being covered by the provisions of this act. If this is true, it denotes the most cynical collusion between the Department of Labour and the government on the one hand, and the railway employers on the other.

I hope the minister will make good the sentiments he expressed in his speech when he introduced this bill and that in the near future, certainly within a year, the number of workers who are still exempt from the protection which this bill supposedly gave to employees who come under federal jurisdiction will be reduced to the irreducible minimum. They would those employees for whom there is a relevant reason why the 40 hour provision cannot be applied.

I am going to vote for this bill, Mr. Speaker, mainly because what it provides can be agreed upon by all parties and all people in Canada. Those matters raised by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) about strikes, the labour code and other matters can be debated in more detail and more relevantly when the minister brings forward the amendments to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act which he has promised.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Unemployment—Plans for provision of summer jobs for students; the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe)—Inquiry of the Ministry; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Unemployment—Rate of hard-core unemployment.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private member's business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

DATA PRIVACY ACT

PREVENTION OF MISUSE OF INFORMATION STORED IN DATA BANKS

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved that Bill C-38, to prevent the invasion of privacy resulting from the misuse of information stored in data banks, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps it would be well for me to begin by outlining the reasons that I took it upon myself to bring forth a bill such as this one. It might seem to hon. members, and I am sure we will hear from them in the course of this debate, that a matter of this importance should be dealt with by the appropriate ministers of the Crown. After all, these ministers have the expertise of whole departments at their disposal. Surely, the country should not have to wait for a backbencher to bring forward a measure of this urgency and importance; a bill designed to meet the threat posed to the very foundation of our existence as a free people by the misuse of computer technology. Yet this is exactly what has happened.

The logical next question, then, is why is this independent action on my part necessary? Is nothing being done by the Department of Communications? The short answer to that question appears to be that the departmental leadership is not especially interested in the role computers and data banks are playing in depriving us of a vital part of our freedom. Let me cite, for example, the words of the minister in a speech to the Montreal Chapter of the Data Processing Management Association on February 19 of last year:

> It is not my intention here to dwell at length on the threats, real or imagined, that the computer utility poses for Canadians either individually or collectively. We are much more interested in the promise.

Well, I am interested in the promise, too; the promise of a future without Big Brother.

There have been a few glimmers of hope. In a one-sentence statement late last November it was finally announced that a special group within the task force on computer-communications will prepare a separate report on privacy. Even more significant perhaps is the fact that the Department of Communications did join with the Department of Justice, the Information Processing Society and Queen's University in sponsoring a conference on computers and privacy last May. To those assembled at the conference, however, the minister chose to deliver a speech some 14 pages in length during which he devoted only one and one-half paragraphs to the subject at hand, and those few words were spent minimizing the problem. "This conference", the minister said, "is a step, and no more than a step, in exploring the potential—and I emphasize the word "potential"—invasion and circumscription of privacy which may be brought about by the rapid development of computerized information systems and data banks." He closed his meagre remarks on the privacy issue by proclaiming: " I intend to say no more on the issue of computers and the invasion of privacy. In the first place I am in no sense an expert. In the second place, it is the business of this conference."

I am willing to admit, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) may not be an expert, but I think the people of Canada have a right to expect that he at least approach this subject with the interest of a concerned layman.

Nor does the report of the telecommission issued earlier this month give much cause for satisfaction on this issue. Despite catchy headings such as "Soul in the System" and "The Human Goldfish" it is clear that the hand of the technocrat lies heavily on this report. This is only to be expected, for the primary concerns of the telecommission are technological issues. I submit, however, that privacy is very much a human issue and must be treated as such.

As I read the report, the authors argue that while there is a potential problem it is not one that we in Canada have to deal with immediately. Neither the public nor the private sector, they argue, are computerized to the extent we see in the United States and therefore it would be "premature to concentrate too much attention on locking the stable door before there is a horse inside." Well, Mr. Speaker, if we must sink to dealing in proverbs I have one for the Telecommission: "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

So, as the Minister of Communications becomes more and more entangled in the Wired City where does that leave us? Well, fortunately, Mr. Speaker, there is a member of the cabinet who is concerned. I refer, of course, to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). He has stated on many occasions that he is alarmed about the growth of techniques which permit infringement on our privacy. Everything from devices the size of a pin which can transmit voices a distance of 25 miles, to parabolic microphones which can capture the conversations of persons miles away, to miniature cameras capable of photographing a subject two blocks away by moonlight—all of these devices can and are being used to destroy the privacy of Canadians. This is frightening, but there is a more severe threat yet. The minister expressed it in a speech last May. He said this:

> The threat to privacy from electronic eavesdropping in both an individual and societal sense, pales before the privacy-shrinking enormities inherent in the computronics of data surveillance. It is here that the new information transfer technologies, with their capacity to accumulate, manipulate, store, retrieve, transmit and disclose information, come into their own.

The Minister of Justice then went on to quote Professor Arthur Miller of the University of Michigan Law School on the subject:

> The computer, with its insatiable appetite for information, its image of infallibility, and its inability to forget anything that has been stored in it, may become the heart of surveillance system that will turn society into a transparent world in which our homes, our finances and our associations will be bared to a wide range of observers.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the time is close at hand. We must not delay taking corrective and preventive measures while we still can. In the August-September, 1970, edition of Data Systems News, a trade journal of some considerable repute, Mr. Robert P. Henderson, Vice-President and General Manager of Honeywell Corporation's Electronic Data Processing Division, put it very bluntly. He said:

> We have until, possibly, 1975 to come up with a solution. If we wait until 1977, it will already be 1984.

Mr. Henderson says "possibly 1975", 1975 at the outside. Do you really want to wait that long? Do you really want to live in a world where there is no refuge, where your every dealing, no matter how intimate, is known?

The Minister of Justice has said that he is concerned and alarmed. I believe that. I also believe that the Department of Justice is working on controls for computer systems. But the unfortunate fact is, as one of our leading newspapers pointed out not too long ago, the Minister of Justice has been concerned and alarmed since he took over the portfolio, and still parliament has taken no legislative action on this matter.

The reason for the introduction of my bill at this time, then, is to impress upon not only this government but upon governments at all levels that the time for action is now. What I am presenting is an alternative to the general lack of protective legislation for Canadians in this vital field. I have drafted the bill in the widest possible way so that hon. members may be able this afternoon to address themselves to almost any aspect of this most complex and far-reaching subject.

Briefly, what Bill C-38 would do would be to establish a register of virtually all data banks in Canada. The operators of these data banks would be required to give the individuals concerned a print-out of all information stored about them, the names and addresses of all who receive it and a note on the purposes for which it has and is being used. There would be criminal penalties for failure to comply with the law and civil remedies for aggrieved persons. Individuals about whom information is contained in data banks would have the right to apply to have the information expunged or amended.

The bill does not, however, deal with another danger of the computer age—the storage of information about Canadians in foreign-controlled data banks. This omission does not mean that I think lightly of the danger of a situation in which, potentially, the nationals or government of another country could gain uncontrolled access to information about the private affairs of Canadians. Just the opposite. I believe this subject must be dealt with as soon as possible in legislation which would prohibit storage of such data outside our borders. Such legislation is a necessary companion-piece to the bill I am presenting today. The full title of this bill is "An act to prevent the invasion of privacy resulting from the misuse of information stored in data banks". In order to understand just what is meant by the phrase "invasion of privacy" we must examine the concept of privacy itself.

Is privacy really that important a factor in our lives? Must we have privacy in order to have dignity and freedom? The answer to these questions must, I submit, be an emphatic "Yes". To exist without privacy is to exist as something other than a full human being. Professor Charles Fried of Yale University has put it this way:

> Privacy is not just one possible means among others to insure some other value, but it is necessarily related to ends and relations of the most fundamental sort: respect, love, friendship and trust. Privacy is not merely a good technique for furthering these fundamental relations; rather without privacy they are simply inconceivable. They require a context of privacy or the possibility of privacy for their existence. To make clear the necessity of privacy as a context for respect, love, friendship and trust is to bring out also why a threat to privacy seems to threaten our very integrity as persons. To respect, love, trust, feel affection for others and to regard ourselves as the objects of love, trust and affection is at the heart of our notion of ourselves as persons among persons, and privacy is the necessary atmosphere for these attitudes and actions, as oxygen is for combustion.

But does there exist a right to privacy? I would have to argue that in legal terms there is a very serious doubt that most Canadians can claim such a right. Canada has clearly been backward in this regard, especially in comparison to the United States. For example, the first article in an American legal journal setting forth the proposition of the right to privacy was written in 1890. The first article on this subject in Canada was not published until 1961, 71 years later. For over 70 years while writing, debate and legislative activity on this vital issue were taking place in the United States, Canadians did virtually nothing. This is a difficult fact to accept, but it is true and it reflects badly on both our scholars and our legislators.

So, it is that we must look to the U.S. experience. As I have said, the right to privacy was first seriously postulated in that country by Louis Brandeis and Samuel Warren in 1890. They described the right to privacy as the right to be left alone. Some 40 years after he had examined this right in the Harvard Law Review, Louis Brandeis, as Associate Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, wrote a dissenting judgment that described in this way the philosophic underpinnings of the right to privacy:

> The makers of the constitution undertook to secure conditions favourable to the pursuit of happiness. They recognized the significance of man's spiritual nature, of his feelings and of his intellect. They knew that only a part of the pain, pleasure and satisfaction of life are to be found in material things. They sought to protect people in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions and their sensations. They conferred as against the government, the right to be let alone—the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men.

So, gradually the majority of U.S. jurisdictions came to accept the right of privacy as a legal right providing protection for American citizens, while that right continued to have practically no status in Canada.

It was not until 1968 that the first breakthrough was made in Canada. In that year my home province of British Columbia passed its Privacy Act which Jerome Atrens, in an article in The Advocate, called "the first legislation of its kind in the Commonwealth". Mr. Atrens, a member of the faculty of law at the University of British Columbia, commented:

> The enactment of the British Columbia Privacy Act is one of the most significant recent developments in the law of torts. Anglo-Canadian common law has never recognized an independent right of privacy. Under our common law the privacy of the individual receives indirect but inadequate protection through various causes of action, such as defamation, breach of contract, interference with a property right, trespass, nuisance and infringement of copyright.
> The Privacy Act is the first legislation of its kind in the Commonwealth.

In the two and a half years since that article was written, the provinces have done little to advance the cause of protection of privacy; the federal government, nothing at all. The intention of my bill is to correct that act of omission in an extremely sensitive area, that of the improper use of computer technology.

The computer has quickly become a dominant influence in the commerce, industry and administration of western society. Experts rightly caution that the output of such machines depends on the material and facts fed into them. Men, not machines, are to be blamed for the abuses that may flow from "electronic brains". Electricity, gunpowder and the internal combustion engine are all valuable servants but dangerous when misused.

It cannot be denied, however, that it is the very efficiency of these machines that makes abuse both relatively easy and extremely tempting. Discussing the growing power of computers, M. S. Stone and Malcolm Warner, in an article in the Political Quarterly, note that the computers of 1968 were 1,000 times as fast as the largest of those manufactured in 1954. They have become smaller and more compact while the cost of computing power and data storage has declined sharply.

In economic terms, it has become not only possible but profitable to maintain exceedingly detailed information on whole populations. In fact, the computer technology of today almost invites this. For example, if a corporation, or a government agency for that matter, is devising a form to be completed by its clients for later conversion into computer language, what is the difference if a few extra questions are added? They may not be relevant today but the answers might be handy to have a month or a decade from now. Before the advent of the computer such an attitude would have meant more work, bulkier files, and more difficult retrieval. Unfortunately for our privacy, this is no longer a problem.

Consider this case. In Washington, the National Aeronautics and Space Administration has awarded Honeywell a contract to develop a laser-storage technique that will allow one 4,500 foot magnetic tape to record and instantaneously feed back the equivalent of 12 pages apiece about every person in the entire United States. Less than one mile of tape containing the life history and habits of over 200 million people!

I must emphasize again that I do not mean to imply that computer technology is somehow bad and that data banks are dangerous in and of themselves. Of course, this is not the case. It is not some evil mastermind that I fear but rather those who, in the name of efficiency, start us on the road to that glass prison that is an existence without privacy. It happens that government itself is very prone to this sort of thing. Attacked on all sides for not being efficient, governments are apt to do what is expedient in the personal information field, much to the detriment of the people. An example of this type of thing, I believe, is to be seen in the decision of the government of Ontario to provide the following service, as reported in the Globe and Mail of December 15, 1970:

> Anyone with $2 will be able to find out all your major debts in Ontario under a new computer storage system being launched January 1.
> The searcher will have to get an account number with the Ontario Department of Justice, but anyone will be able to get such a number.

I am sure that this new system is much more efficient than the old method of searching through records in 48 offices across the province. Whether efficiency alone should be the criterion used to judge a plan such as this, I leave to the consideration of the people of Ontario. What would really bother me if I were a citizen of this province would be the decision the provincial government has taken to use the same data bank to store this information with information from another department. With just a slight change in the computer program, this could provide the basis for computer dossiers for most adults in Ontario. Legally there is no protection against such an abuse.

A potentially even more dangerous trend came to my attention last summer. On July 10, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) announced that the federal government was going to contribute over $97,000 toward a pilot project in Prince Edward Island to evaluate the use of social insurance numbers in providing health services to the public. According to the press release the project would "test the use of social insurance numbers assigned to P.E.I. residents in administering health services, in research and possibly in other social fields." I just wonder what those "other social fields" might be. I do not know. I do know that the use of social insurance numbers is being required more and more often on everything from tax forms to medicare applications. This is, I suppose, a reaction to one of the findings of the royal commission on government organization. This is what the Glassco commission report had to say—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired. Is it agreed that the hon. member may carry on?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Goode: I will conclude in a very few minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Put it on the computer.

Mr. Goode: This is what the Glassco commission report had to say:

> The real benefits of integrating the flow of information can only be realized by automatic handling throughout, which will facilitate the exchange of common information between different systems. A numbering system that could be used to identify individuals for all purposes would contribute significantly to improved efficiency both in government and outside.

I am not satisfied that enough thought has been given to the implications of this suggestion. I recognize, even though somewhat reluctantly, the need for numerical identification in the computer age. However, I feel I must sound a warning note. If the trend continues for individual Canadians to be known more and more as one specific set of digits, our social insurance number, then we may well be in very serious danger of loss of privacy. Because of the increasing compatability of the latest computers and their ability to communicate with each other, our social insurance number could become the key which would open up our lives to the unscrupulous data bank manipulator. Computer languages have become so standardized that data may flow easily in and out of separate systems. For instance, information about 705-113-405 could easily be traded between various data banks to form a complete record of the subject's dealings and activities. We must take steps to ensure that this does not happen.

In summary, put in its simplest terms, the problem is that many generations after the development of the original computer data systems, we still do not even have laws to govern the use of first generation computers. My bill will not solve all the problems I have raised this afternoon. I do not claim that. But it would be a start, and that is what is needed. The rapid expansion of the information processing art has left us with little time remaining to deal intelligently with the situation. We just cannot afford to put this vital matter off until next year, next session or next month. The time for action is now, for ultimately it will be too late.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should first of all like to commend the hon. member for bringing forward this bill. His last few remarks regarding this existing problem in Canada were very cogent. The time to move is now, because we do need some kind of control over the rapid explosion of the data bank systems in credit bureaus and other areas which is taking place in this country of ours. The privacy of individuals can be invaded very easily in this highly technological era in which we live.

I am amazed to some extent that a bill such as this should be brought forward by a private member rather than by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). We, in Canada, are sometimes motivated in our legislative thinking by fears which date back to the depression years of the 1930's. We are trying to pass legislation geared for the 1970's based on our thinking of the past. Certain legislation in respect of whether my wife or another housewife buys the proper size can of pork and beans must be based on eighteenth century thinking. Our whole education system has failed completely if we are no longer able to judge the per ounce cost of a can of beans which contains 28 ounces. I suggest this whole concept is misguided and motivated by fears which arose during the depression years. Perhaps this is understandable when one thinks of the sociological effects of a depression. Many people in the government and in the House of Commons today were of young and tender years during the past depression. This may have had a formative effect on our thinking.

Our computers are here to stay and we are wondering whether we can effectively manage machines or whether machines will manage men. This is a question of the 1970's and we are very concerned about it. About a year or two ago, I attended a seminar of UNESCO which studied the whole question of computers and data banks. This was attended by two members from each of the many influential nations which belong to the United Nations. They discussed what was being done in their countries. There were two members from Russia, two from Sweden as well as representatives from other countries. I was particularly interested in this subject matter as a firm believer in the suggestion that the individuality of man must be protected. Man must always have control over machines and the society in which he lives.

The rapid increase in the use of computer systems and data bank information is beginning to have more and more effect on our society. The Swedish delegates to this seminar explained that the government of Sweden has a national data bank system with information on everybody. If my memory serves me correctly, it is against the law there for anybody else to have such a data bank system. The government system contains all the factual information that can be gathered in respect of the individual. An individual can have access to that information merely by dialing a telephone number. One of the delegates suggested that this was perfectly all right. If an individual wanted to hire someone in Sweden, all he had to do was phone this number to find out the job that individual now held, how much he was receiving and how many jobs he had held over the last ten years. In other words, he could ascertain quickly whether an individual was likely to stay in his employ for some time. He could ascertain quickly what the individual's former employer thought he was worth by finding out his present wage. This seems to be a bit frightening.

The Swedish delegates went on to explain that this system went a little further. The government had developed a scheme whereby they could put an isotope on the fingertip of every person in Sweden. Instead of having a social security number, as suggested by the former speaker, each person would have this isotope on his finger. In this way one could gain access to the whereabouts of that individual at any given time. The isotope could be fed into a computer system and at any time within the range of the computer system a government official could find out in what part of the city that isotope was. He could even determine whether you were at home with your wife or in a neighbouring city, where you were supposed to be, or down the road and across the street.

It is a frightening experience to listen to educated men explaining how carefully and closely you could be watched by a machine. We in this country have reached the stage of having a social security number. But they were even thinking of putting everybody on a particular isotope which could be implanted in the finger tip and all you would have to do is record the individual so that a computer could indicate where he was at any given time.

Surely we have advanced far enough in the system of data banks, credit bureaux and the relationship that a credit bureau will have to a particular individual to sit down as educated people and say that we must bring in legislation to protect the individual against possible false compilation of information. A section of Bill C-38 deals very fully with the ability of an individual to dial and receive information about himself filed in the bank and to request that the information be changed. I would go further than is suggested in the bill. If the data centre is not prepared to change the information, it should be possible to sue them and take them to court because they are releasing false data about a person. Then at least the courts could decide whether they were releasing false data.

It seems to me that our whole society depends on the individual and on his having as much freedom as possible to do what he wants to do. Our society is geared to the belief that we must have a higher quality of life. In my way of thinking we cannot have a high quality of life if some persons are allowed to compile false data about us and to release it without our knowledge.

We have had extensive discussion in the House about the RCMP compiling dossiers on Members of Parliament and anyone else. We may have some sense of security because surely the information they compile will only be released to a few people. However, credit bureaux and data information banks release information for a price—information which may be completely false.

Another interesting aspect of data banks and credit bureau systems established in this country is that in most cases they are owned by U.S. concerns: all the information is being fed to a computer in a foreign country. It seems to me it is high time we took steps to control this machinery. They could exchange data bank information for a price and data banks could be drained dry in exchanging information. This is a very alarming possibility, because an individual might now know what information is compiled about him by data banks and with whom they have exchanged it.

This bill attempts to set out rules and regulations whereby a data bank would have to inform the individual who has asked what information was given about him. He could then ascertain how it was used and whether it was used in a manner which might detrimentally affect the health and welfare of his family and himself. I believe it is very important that an individual in our society knows what information is being spread about him throughout the country and how it is being used. If we believe in the concept that the individual is the all-important being in our society, surely we must take concrete action to assure individuals that in fact the government believes them to be all-important. If we do not accept that concept we can no longer believe that we are striving for a higher quality of life for the individual, because the misuse of information compiled without the knowledge of the individual can be detrimental to society as a whole.

I commend the Ontario government for establishing some sort of control. I think that the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, as I said at the beginning of my speech, is operating from a fear complex, which perhaps originated in the 1930s, that if in fact 20 per cent of the tax dollar is spent on education, a person in our society will sooner or later be sufficiently educated to understand what is the proper size of a container in which he buys his food. But even with the best education that our society can provide, we cannot match the complex data systems that are being established on the North American continent—and I stress the words "North American continent". We are alarmed, as individuals, at their wide use and at the misuse of information which may detrimentally affect our society. If the government will not bring in legislation to give the individual tools with which to cope with the complex situation in which he finds himself in the twentieth century, then it is failing miserably to live up to its responsibilities in this day and age.

I commend the hon. member for introducing this bill. I hope he will be able to convince the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) that action along this line should be taken. I hope the bill will be sent to committee where it will receive exhaustive study. I am not naïve enough to think that the government will accept the bill as drafted, but I would like to think that after studying it the government will bring in a similar bill or one with the same purpose, that is, the protection of the individual from a computer system which can compile and release false information about him which might be detrimental to him and his family.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I support the principle of this bill because I believe we must take steps to prevent the invasion of privacy—not just the invasion of privacy resulting from the misuse of information stored in data banks but the invasion of all privacy.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), before he was Prime Minister, said that the state had no business in the bedrooms of the nation, I agreed with him and commended him. When the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) proposes to bring in a bill which will, if not prohibit the use of wiretapping and electronic surveillance, certainly regulate and control it, I commend him and support it. When the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) is asked whether the RCMP are listening to telephone conversations of Members of Parliament and refuses to make a clear and unequivocal denial that such practice exists, I am critical of him—not because I believe, as some people have said, that Members of Parliament are a special class of citizens entitled to privileges to which nobody else is entitled, but because I believe that it is wrong to permit wiretapping.

Even if there are occasions when wiretapping or electronic surveillance may be necessary, it is wrong to permit it without the most severe checks on how and when it is done. So, Mr. Speaker, when the Solicitor General gives answers that can only be interpreted to mean that in all probability the RCMP are wiretapping the phones of some Members of Parliament, and when the police in Toronto issue a report—as they did a few days ago—that over a certain period of time they had wiretapped 57 telephones in Toronto without accounting to the Attorney General of the province, to a superior court judge or to anybody else except, I presume, to the chief of police of the city of Toronto, I am concerned because I have always believed and will continue to believe and hope that the people of this country are entitled to privacy.

I could not help being struck by some of the comments made by the hon. member who introduced this bill. He held up the horrible example of the province of Ontario which, according to him—and I remember reading the news item at the time—was considering permitting any person on payment of a $2 fee to get information stored in data banks, information which had been compiled for government purposes by the province. I am not enthused over that idea. I feel no needs to defend the government of Ontario, but one would have hoped that the hon. member would have been fair and would have also told hon. members of the House that recently the province of Ontario announced it was introducing legislation which would control the use of information collected by agencies, particularly private agencies, and would permit any person who asked to be shown the information collected about him in the records of agencies. The hon. member did not do that, and in all fairness I think it should be pointed out that the government of Ontario is to be commended for its example to all other provinces.

I am much more concerned about invasion of the privacy of the people of Canada by private agencies than I am about the invasion of their privacy by governments. But the hon. member who introduced the bill did not mention that at all. I suppose very few of us in Canada have not on occasion bought something without paying for it fully in cash. Usually a person needs a mortgage to buy a house, credit to buy a car, a television set, a radio, a stove, a frig or furniture.

When we get credit cards, whether they be from Freimans, Eaton's, Simpsons-Sears or credit cards covering gas and oil purchases, we know that the companies issuing them will have made inquiries about us. But I wonder how many people realize that when such inquiry is made the information collected is in all probability exchanged among the oil companies, the merchants and the credit bureaux all across Canada. In fact, as mentioned by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), in all likelihood such information is sent down for processing to the United States. That is a risk which most of us who want credit must face.

What we have not realized is that during this collection of information about us, agencies not only get information from the banks with which we deal, from retail companies and oil companies with which we deal, but also talk to our neighbours and acquaintances. Mr. Speaker, your neighbour may not be your friend. Your neighbour may have had an argument with you. Your neighbour may be ill-disposed to you, and to the inquiring organization your neighbour may give information which in whole or in part is false. Your neighbour may tell somebody who inquires about you that you do not pay your bills. Your neighbour may tell somebody inquiring about you that you drink to excess.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or that you have not stopped beating your wife.

Mr. Orlikow: As my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says, your neighbour may say that you have not stopped beating your wife. Your neighbour may say you run around with somebody else's wife. All that information—true, false, partially true, partially false—goes into your record and you may not know anything about it. If I had time I could read into the record many cases where mistakes were made, where people were denied jobs because allegations had been made about them which were not true but which the people concerned did not know about and which they could not disprove. I could cite cases of people who were accused of the most heinous crimes and did not know about the accusations.

It is because this kind of thing goes on that I support the principle of the bill. I believe a person is entitled to privacy. I believe a person has a right to know that adverse allegations have been made about him, so that he may defend himself. I believe in the principle that the people of Canada are entitled to privacy and are entitled to inspect data bank records and credit reports which are made about them. I believe that people are entitled to privacy, unless they are lawbreakers, against the incursions of both government agencies and private agencies. Because of this I am prepared to support the principle enunciated in the bill, although I was less than enthused over the arguments put forward by the hon. member who introduced it.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of hon. members, particularly the hon. member who just sat down. I am sure we all agree that in a democratic society we have a very strong obligation to preserve the rights of individuals, and the right to privacy is very much part of that. None of us wants to create mechanisms which could be subverted at some future date to the workings of a police state.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker—and I am sure there is no disagreement in this respect—there are other aspects of this bill which call for very careful consideration before Parliament or any other body in Canada adopts it.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, briefly what is at stake here in our national policy with regard to computers. I suggest we have very basic objectives. We want to create in Canada a computer technology of full range from basic computers of the so-called hardware type and design to the application of special machines to serve business and consumers and to the creation of computers to assist small, competitive businesses engaged in service to the public.

We want to create a leading place for Canada in this industry because we recognize its basic importance in the development of technology and improvement of productivity in industry. I think we also want to provide a maximum range of service to consumers. We want to prevent fraud, and we want to make it possible for consumers to use a credit card to purchase gasoline if they go on a trip to our neighbour to the south, rent a hotel room or purchase a number of other things.

In an attempt to reach these basic objectives I suggest we are obliged to distinguish between private and public use of data banks and computers. The hon. member exempted from his bill certain categories of police investigation and data banks used for that purpose and other public services. However, I note that many areas in which the hon. member claimed there was the possibility of abuse did involve government. He talked about possible extension of social security numbers and of a test project of the Department of National Health and Welfare to ascertain what can be done with the application of these numbers. He raised questions about the possible extension to other areas.

The very areas he has excluded from the bill, government services, are those wherein the problem he posed arises in its sharpest form. On the other hand, there are developments in the area of private industry, to which this bill would primarily apply, which I think would create unnecessary restrictions and impede the development of a national policy with regard to the best use of computers.

Along with a number of other members of this House I accepted the invitation of a local computer firm last week when Systems Dimensions Limited asked us to visit them, see what they are doing and learn something about the computer industry. I very much appreciated their hospitality. The service they placed at our disposal, the senior staff now accompanied us and the opportunity to freely ask questions gave us a better understanding of what goes on.

One thing that struck me forcibly was the elaborate provision for privacy which was the essence of their service. They operate 24 hours a day. In many businesses, after closing at five o'clock an hour or two is spent putting basic data on computer tape, which is then fed by electronic devices, or in some cases over the telephone, to the computer bank. However, this firm had an elaborate precaution, extending to every member of its staff, which ensured that information coming from one customer was completely shrouded in secrecy. They were selling the service to industry and prided themselves on the fact that they had built security and privacy into their data bank that was foolproof against raids by competitors. It was the essence of their service that the 150 people using it were confident that when they bought the service none of the information would be available to anyone else.

I was pleasantly surprised to find that this company had developed an export business fully competitive in its pricing and range of service. It has a number of customers south of the border who find that they can come to Ottawa and buy the service more economically and efficiently than in neighbouring northern United States cities.

The hon. member who proposed this bill would prohibit the use of memory banks across international borders. I suggest that this cannot be prohibited. It has to be examined on its merits. We are developing an industry in this country with a population of 21½ million people and the very essence of the industry is that it should be free to compete for business in the large market to the south. If we are prepared to do business to the south, we must be prepared to allow businesses based in the United States to have certain reciprocal access to our market where we offer a specialized service.

I use an international brand of gasoline and I cannot conceive of the situation where I cannot use my credit card almost anywhere on the North American continent. I know very well that when I make a purchase on my credit card, the details of the purchase will go into a computer bank. I would be naïve to think that the computer bank would have to be located in Canada through any type of legislative compulsion that would fly in the face of the economics of the industry. I want to the service of that credit card and I have to face the consequences of the industry having a certain international aspect.

I agree with the intent of the bill, Mr. Speaker, and I agree that this is an important question. It deserves a place in the legislation not only of this House but of all democratic societies in the western world. The answers are not simple; they are not black and white—but they do not involve a prohibition on computer information going across an international border. They do not, I think, involve placing elaborate, red tape restrictions on access to information from data banks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has expired. I have just one remark to make about the subject under consideration. Perhaps we should legalize only those data banks which would store and freely provide information on the qualities and good points of individuals.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING HOURS OF WORK, WAGES, VACATIONS, TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackasey that Bill C-228, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my colleagues have dealt very thoroughly with our criticism of a number of the features of this legislation and it is my intention to emphasize only two of the points in the bill, the provision that deals with equal pay for women and the provision having to do with maternity leave.

This bill provides for the repeal of the Female Employees Equal Pay Act of 1956 and its replacement by new provisions. The minister emphatically explained that these new provisions are stronger than those in the old legislation. We certainly hope so. Under the old act differences in rates of pay were prohibited for men and women performing "identical or substantially identical work". Under the proposed section of the code this prohibition is extended by referring to "the same or similar work on jobs requiring the same or similar skill, effort and responsibility". The wording undoubtedly is more elaborate and detailed. I wish the minister had been a little more detailed in his explanation of the difference. I hope there is a difference and not merely a change of wording. I hope, also, that this provision will really represent a difference in practice. One wonders how fool proof the new legislation will be in practice.

The president of the Canada Labour Congress has referred to the fact that this provision is somewhat loosely worded: it is not very explicit. The new provision will make evasion a little more difficult for employers. It will still allow them to pay women at a lower rate for work which involves more skill and responsibility than work done by highly paid male workers. This situation exists in some industries. The minister said he wanted to carry out the recommendations in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Paragraph 218 at page 67 of that report reads:

> Canada has not, however, ratified the International Labour Organization convention concerning equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value (Convention 100). We believe that Canada should do this. Therefore, we recommend that a federal-provincial conference on labour legislation affecting women in Canada be called to prepare for Canada's ratification of the International Labour Organization convention concerning equal remuneration for men and women workers for work of equal value (Convention 100).

The minister could indicate his stand with regard to this point which is made in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. I would like the minister to specifically state whether at the recent meeting in Ottawa the labour ministers discussed this point. Could I get the ear of the parliamentary secretary for one moment? I would like the parliamentary secretary to take note of this question. When the minister replies, will he state whether during the labour minister's conference there was discussion on the advisability of Canada ratifying the International Labour Organization's Convention 100. This is a recommendation of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

The Canada Labour (Standards) Code affects approximately 530,000 employees who are under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Labour. There are approximately 2.5 million women in the labour force. In order to have effective legislation regarding equal pay for equal work, it would have to be parallelled by provincial legislation. Will the parliamentary secretary inform the minister that we would like him to report on whether this matter was also discussed at the recent labour ministers' conference and, if so, what was the result? If there were discussions, what was the general feeling about the possibility of getting parallel legislation in the provinces which would make the equal pay changes effective in the provinces?

One big improvement in this legislation, to which the minister referred, is the matter of complaints. He stated, quite rightly, that under the old legislation women were afraid to complain because of the fear of still further discrimination. Under the new bill, the minister stated that the onus will be on the inspectors of the Department of Labour to lay complaints and launch prosecutions. These provisions are only as good as the system of inspection that is established. How thorough will the inspection services be, and how will they be enforced? The fines will be higher, but not much higher than those under the Combines Investigation Act which have been criticized as being very inadequate for large firms.

My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), suggested that the Department of Labour should do more than just wait for complaints to turn up. He suggested that where more than 80 per cent of the positions in any job classification are held by members of one sex, the minister should order an investigation into the hiring, training and promotion practices of the industry concerned to see whether there could be a more equitable balance as between male and female employees. We do not say this should be on a 50-50 basis, but where there is a large discrepancy between the number of male and female workers there should be an investigation into the hiring, training and promotion practices. A number of these points should be considered in committee.

While the new legislation is an improvement, it will be no better than the inspection and enforcement of its provisions. It will not be widespread or universal unless the provinces follow it through. I hope the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) will not wait for the provinces to do this on their own. One of the jobs of a federal minister ought to be to persuade the provinces and to follow through good legislation if only for the reason that there is a great deal of mobility of workers across Canada. There is no use having protection for a worker in one province if he moves to another province which is not under the legislative umbrella. This is equally true of women workers.

I want to deal briefly with the maternity leave provisions. I wish to express my satisfaction that the minister has introduced these two companion provisions. They represent a real advance in the promotion of women workers in Canada. However, I must make some criticism because this legislation does not go far enough. Although it is a step in the right direction, it is far from perfect. Many people will now be experiencing a degree of protection which they did not have before.

One shortcoming in this legislation is that an employee must be employed for 12 months with the same employer in order to qualify for 17 weeks of maternity leave. As the employer will not be required to provide leave with pay but merely unpaid leave of absence, it is hard to understand the need for such a requirement. We would like to know wherein the need lies. It limits a woman's mobility in the work force and restricts the recognition of her right to be in the work force regardless of her biological function of childbearing. At a time when a woman is most in need of a job because of the additional expenses involved, this provision will still allow employers to fire a woman who becomes pregnant if she has not had the luck to work for him for 12 months before becoming pregnant. This seems to us to constitute a real hardship and a shortcoming in the legislation, which ought to be modified. Here again, the minister has probably noted that his legislation differs from the report of the royal commission which recommended 18 weeks of maternity leave, not 17. Again, we should like to know the reason for failure to follow the commission's recommendation.

Moreover, the act only prohibits an employer from dismissing a woman solely because of her pregnancy. The royal commission suggested a blanket prohibition against dismissing a woman, on any ground, during her pregnancy. This blanket provision was recommended because it would prevent an employer from citing a spurious reason for releasing a woman when the actual reason for dismissal was her pregnancy. This is a situation in which the advice of the commission might well be taken. Many employers do not like having pregnant women in the labour force: as a matter of fact, they do not like having women in the labour force at all and they might well be inclined to cloak their dismissal of a pregnant woman by some other excuse. For this reason it might be well to follow the commission's recommendation by flatly preventing dismissing a woman during her pregnancy.

Another criticism I should like to make concerns the lack of flexibility of the legislation. The clause providing for 11 weeks' leave prior to confinement and six weeks after should be changed so as to eliminate the distinction between before and after childbirth. There is little reason for most women to sit at home and do nothing in the last 11 weeks prior to childbirth. I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker; I am afraid my sore throat is the result of our convention.

Mr. Perrault: All that cigar smoke!

An hon. Member: I did not know she smoked cigars.

Mrs. MacInnis: I warn hon. members that I intend to get through this speech. I hope it will not be too embarrassing for them, but I intend to finish it.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

Mrs. MacInnis: Such women are not sick. In most cases they are fully capable of performing their jobs. A woman with a new baby, a baby she might be nursing, would have much more use for time off after the birth than before. If a woman were allowed to make her own arrangements regarding the 17 weeks, she might well prefer to take one or two weeks off prior to the birth of the child and 16 weeks off afterward. Some of our women friends note that this clause clearly shows the effect of masculine thinking in the drawing up of legislation, rather than that of women. I hope the parliamentary secretary is not responsible for the drafting here, because if he is he will have a lot of explaining to do.

Mr. Perrault: It was a very complicated clause.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He has had no experience.

Mrs. MacInnis: Maybe it is complicated, but it is too rigid; it lacks the flexibility it ought to have. Again, in this case it is important that there be consultation between the department and the provinces. While unemployment insurance covers all women in the labour force, this does not; it refers only to women in industries and services which come under federal jurisdiction. It is most important that maternity leave should be extended to all women in the labour force in addition to unemployment insurance, and I trust such leave will be granted in a parallel way.

These are some of the points I wanted to emphasize, although I realize they have been raised earlier. I hope that this legislation will, as a result of consultation with the provinces and consequent action, be extended across Canada in an even-handed way. This may be a small step but it is a genuine step in the right direction. If the inspection and enforcement arrangements can be made foolproof we shall have registered a definite gain in increasing security for women workers across this country.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Before the House rose for dinner, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) spoke of his trusting naïvety back in 1965 when he was first elected a Member of Parliament. He indicated that when the Labour (Standards) Code was introduced at that time he believed it was a great document, one which would do great things for workers in the federal sphere.

As a matter of interest I decided to look back in Hansard to see just what kind of trust he had in the bill when it was passed at that time. I will put just one short quotation on record to show that his views have not changed a great deal since then. As reported on page 11534 of Hansard for February 19, 1965, he said: "Indeed, the whole act probably ought not to be here at all." I presume he meant here in the House, or before the House. So I suggest his critical attitude today is not much different from what it was then.

There was also an exchange between the parliamentary secretary and the hon. member for Winnipeg North prior to dinner in connection with the minimum wage standard, which this bill suggests ought to be $1.75 an hour. The hon. member told us that his party thought it should be higher, that perhaps it ought to be $2 an hour. I am not quarrelling with that. I think the committee ought to look into that side of the question. But it is interesting to note that the only province in Canada where the New Democratic Party is in power has provided for a minimum wage of $1.50. I hope they will follow the example of this bill and make it at least $1.75 an hour.

Mr. Skoberg: You were not here to hear my hon. friend.

Mr. Cafik: I was here and I did listen to him.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Speak on this bill instead of bawling!

[English]

Mr. Cafik: If we may have order, I will continue, Mr. Speaker. As I was saying, I hope they follow our example. It is interesting to recall that last year we made a change in the legislation to raise the minimum wage to $1.65 an hour, and that has not yet been followed by all the provinces, including the province I have mentioned which has an NDP government.

Mr. Stanbury: Shame!

Mr. Cafik: I should like to make a few observations at this point before the bill is referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. First, I hope the measure will be passed expeditiously in order that these amendments may take effect on the proposed date of July 1 this year.

As we all know, federal labour standards were first introduced in 1965. The importance of these standards rests on the example the federal government sets for other jurisdictions as much as on the degree of assistance given to the limited number of employees presently working under federal jurisdiction.

• (8:30 p.m.)

In 1965, the first federal code established the minimum wage at $1.25 an hour. In July, 1970, this was changed to $1.65, and in these proposals it is suggested this figure be amended to $1.75. I support this proposed change, but more importantly I endorse the fact that under this legislation the Governor in Council, upon the recommendation of the Minister of Labour, can increase the figure from time to time without specific legislation being required. The power given to the minister and to the Governor in Council will, I hope, eliminate the long delays in making changes and, hopefully, will result in an annual review of the minimum wage for people working within federal jurisdiction. I hope the committee will give consideration to recommending that the Minister of Labour review this minimum standards annually.

This bill is of particular importance since we have an obligation to protect the unorganized labour forces in Canada which come within federal jurisdiction. Hopefully, as I said before, this legislation should set an example to other jurisdictions and encourage them to take the same action within their areas of responsibility. Most of the members of this House realize that approximately 60 per cent of the labour force of Canada is without the protection of a labour union. On the federal level there is a 50-50 split between organized and unorganized labour. In view of the large numbers of people concerned, these amendments assume particular importance.

The minimum wage standards set in this legislation do not apply to employees under 17 years of age. In 1965 specific regulations were established to set the rate for such people at $1 per hour. In July last year, this rate was raised to $1.40 per hour. It is my understanding that the minister will recommend to cabinet, following passage of this bill, that the regulation be changed to establish the rate at $1.50 per hour. I hope that the minister will review the minimum wage for those under 17 years of age in our work force at the same time as he reviews the over-all minimum wage for those over the age of 17, and that this will be done annually in both instances.

In clause 17, at page 13 of the bill, there is a provision dealing with the individual termination of employment whereby two weeks' notice, or pay in lieu of notice, must be given to an employee with three months' service or more. This provision will apply to all regular employees but not to those performing managerial functions or in professional categories. Frankly, I fail to see why this distinction must be made between ordinary employees and management or professional employees and I trust that the standing committee will look carefully at this question and satisfy itself that there are compelling reasons for making this exception. If there are not compelling reasons, I hope the committee will recommend the elimination of this distinction.

Still on clause 17, I want to talk for a few moments about severance pay and to support the provision whereby an employee with five or more years' service receives two days per year severance pay, to a maximum of 40 days. Obviously, this does not apply to an employee whose employment has been terminated for just cause, or who is entitled to pension whether it be the Canada pension or the like. I hope the committee will give consideration to reviewing these provisions with the thought of establishing a two-day benefit for every year of service without the five-year minimum requirement.

I make this suggestion because it seems to me that if it is valid to give a person 10 days' severance pay after five years' service, then it is unfair to cut any benefit for a person with only four years and 11 months' service. If we were to establish benefits on the basis of two days for every one year of service, then after one year a person would receive two days' pay; after four years he would receive eight days' pay, and so on. I think that is a reasonable suggestion to make. Although the minister may well have some valid reason why it cannot be implemented, I hope the committee will carefully review this suggestion. Excluded from the severance pay provisions are those in a managerial or professional category. Once more, I fail to see why the distinction has to be made between them and ordinary employees.

The bill also covers group termination of employment. This proposed new part provides that an employer contemplating the termination of employment of 50 or more workers within a four-week period must give the Minister of Labour notice in writing. A copy of the notice must be sent to the nearest Canada Manpower centre and to the trade unions concerned. This part will apply to all employees, including persons performing managerial functions and professional people, but will exclude those who are seasonally or irregularly employed. I suggest that the committee give careful consideration to this proposal, because those employees who are not covered by labour union contracts—in other words, those who have an individual relationship with their employer—are not really given specific notice under this legislation.

I should like to read the provision on page 11 of the bill. The section deals with the notice that must be given to the Minister of Labour and to the labour union. As far as the person not covered by labour union agreement is concerned, the bill provides:

> —and where any employee in such group is not represented by a trade union, a copy of such notice shall be given to him or posted forthwith by the employer in a conspicuous place—

I suggest that when the committee reviews the bill, it should give consideration to deleting the word "or" and substituting therefor the word "and", so that the bill would then provide that there is an obligation on the employer to give notice to the individual not covered by labour contract as well as to post that notice in a conspicuous place. I do not think that this proposal would be difficult to implement. Generally speaking, I am 100 per cent in favour of the provisions dealing with group termination of employment. I think they are long overdue. Under these provisions, an employer who wants to lay off between 50 and 100 workers within a four-week period would have to give eight weeks' notice; if he wanted to lay off between 100 and 300 workers he would have to give 12 weeks' notice; and to lay off more than 300 workers would require 16 weeks' notice.

Clause 17 of the bill also makes provision for dismissal for garnishment. I think it is high time the government implemented this kind of legislation and I hope that other jurisdictions will follow suit. I think this legislation is an example for them and, as I said before, it is high time we ended discrimination against those who find themselves in financial difficulties, who have their pay cheques garnisheed and who prior to now were very often, if not in the vast majority of cases, fired because the employer did not like the inconvenience of having to go through the garnishee formalities.

I should like also to comment on the maternity leave provision of this bill. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). I know the interest she has in the rights of women and I share much of her concern in this regard. The hon. member has made two or three suggestions that are worthy of careful consideration by the committee. I agree with her when she said I hope I quote her correctly that the maternity leave provision and the equal pay benefits are real advances for the women workers of Canada.

I do not believe, however, that any piece of legislation is perfect, and I am sure there is room for improvement in this bill. Under the proposal, an employee who has completed 12 months' employment with her employer would be entitled to maternity leave of up to 11 weeks before delivery of the child and six weeks after. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway suggested that the 12 months ought to be reconsidered and I agree with that. I also agree that perhaps there should be a degree of flexibility as to whether a person should be entitled to the leave prior to the birth of the child or after. In my experience, being the father of five children, often the real crisis is after the birth of the child and not before. This varies a great deal, depending on individual conditions including the temperament of the woman involved. There is good reason for the committee to consider this suggestion very carefully.

I am heartily in favour of the equal pay provisions. As a matter of fact, at a convention in Ottawa about a year ago, in the Chateau Laurier, I remember putting forward a resolution which was passed, changing the approach from equal pay for equal work to equal pay for similar work. It is much easier to say that someone is performing a similar function than to say it is an equal function. "Equal" implies that it is equal in every detail. I believe that if it is similar work, that is enough.

I believe that the provision for equal pay for similar work with similar responsibilities is a considerable improvement in terms of terminology and I think it will have a practical effect in terms of the relationship between employers and employees. I hope the employers will look upon this as a meaningful change and will be much more careful in the way they apply salaries to men and women in order to ensure that they are in fact equal if the work is similar.

In closing, may I say I strongly support this bill to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. It is a major step forward in the protection of workers in Canada under federal jurisdiction. Even more important, I think it is a great step forward by way of example for other jurisdictions to follow. I sincerely hope that the provinces will follow the lead we have given so that people all across Canada will be able to work under some kind of universal labour code which would be in their interest and the interest of the country as a whole.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, speaking of the lay-off of 500 employees by Canadian Vickers Limited, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) said this to the House on May 26, 1969, as reported on page 9040 of Hansard:

> Last fall I undertook to bring this kind of legislation forward and... all parties supported me. I said on that occasion, however, that I could not visualize such legislation being before the House until late fall or early spring, and I see no reason which would enable me to advance that date.

At that time, the minister recognized that present legislation is inadequate and obsolete in many respects. Today, as we study Bill C-228 amending the Canada Labour (Standards) Code and setting up new labour standards, it would seem that the minister has at last found the spring he spoke of then, and I congratulate him.

Although the amendments introduced by Bill C-228 have long been overdue—a practice which, by the way, seems to suit this government—I am in agreement generally as to the principles involved.

None the less, as our group usually does when we find errors in a bill introduced by the government, we make whatever criticisms and suggestions that seem appropriate.

It has been a long time since the government first promised such a bill, and more specifically since the 1968 general election, and we would have expected this bill to be the result of thorough consideration. Unfortunately, in spite of this long wait, this bill is definitely inadequate. At the most, it is but the pretence of a bill dealing among other things with termination of employment and I will endeavour to limit my comments to this matter even though there are other less important issues discussed in this bill.

I will give an example in order to prove how superficial and confusing this bill is. As regards group or individual terminations of employment, clause 17 of the bill provides for the addition of several Parts, and I should like to quote subclause (4) of clause 341 of new Part IVC. It reads as follows:

> Except where otherwise prescribed by regulation, an employer shall, for the purposes of this Part, be deemed to have terminated the employment of an employee where he lays off this employee.

First of all, it will be noted, Mr. Speaker, that the beginning of this clause is drafted in this way:

> Except where otherwise prescribed by regulation...

In short, when reading this bill we find that it is somehow a statement of principle or of general philosophy about the Canada Labour Code and that there is, moreover, a series of rules which hon. members may not even discuss in this House and that may very often be inconsistent with the Labour Code itself.

It is quite clear that a one- or two-day lay-off, does not come under the clause I just quoted and, to support this, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues subclause (d) of new clause 34K. Here is what strikes me and what should be brought to the attention of the House: no limit is set; everything will be decided through regulations.

We can see in the Quebec Labour Code that a lay-off at the provincial level cannot be final before six months.

On the other hand, under Ontario employment standards, a lay-off is considered as final if it exceeds 13 weeks out of 20.

There are other standards in other provinces.

There is quite diversity and, for sure, we can say that there is no uniformity, comparison or co-operation from one province to the other in this field.

If the minimum lay-off period which commands a notice under the proposed legislation is one week only, it is too short. However, if the minimum period is six months as in Quebec it would be too long but I will never get the opportunity to say anything about it as a member of Parliament because this period is not to be established by this House through the passing of a bill but through regulations. This system which gives precedence to regulations by putting only general provisions in the standards is unacceptable. This is often the problem with this government.

The bill we are asked to pass is high-sounding but it gives rise to injustices and doubts of all kinds and invites all kinds of interpretations. Even after a three-year study of the question, the solution is no nearer than it was before. The government bring this measure forward in hoste, a method which is more or less effective and always uncertain. In that way, the government hopes to get some support from the Canadian people and the agreement, at least in principle, of the opposition. But the legislation is so awkwardly drafted that the opposition has no other alternative then to object to details.

Unfortunately, the electorate does not realize that and it is easy then for the government to accuse us of obstruction. The opposition is blamed for not having allowed the government to approve a social security program but as a matter of fact, it is its own fault.

The young offenders' legislation was withdrawn so as to correct political as well as drafting errors.

The government organization bill was a failure, for lack of proper policy and drafting.

Today we have a major problem, although a ridiculous one, which is being met by the bill before us now. That is why, instead of a thorough account of Canadian labour standards, all we find in Bill C-228 are general ideas, many superficial things and nothing precise. For instance,—and I should like to make a detailed study of that to illustrate my point—this is what we find in the new section 34K:

> The Governor in Council may make regulations
> (b) requiring employers to comply with the provisions of this Part in respect of terminations of employment of groups of employees numbering less than fifty but greater than a number prescribed in the regulations;

Nobody knows under what conditions such a regulation could be used. There is nothing about it in the bill; the governor in council will decide that unilaterally, without consultation with Parliament. Are these estimates as those made in Ontario or are these different considerations? How many employees will be required for an employer to come under this regulation? Nobody knows.

• (8:50 p.m.)

The figure stated in subclause (b) of the new clause 34M is essential to the operation of the legislation. This is not at all a minor detail. In fact, it is important to know exactly the meaning of the word "figure". But nothing is said about it. Moreover, most labour standards in the other provinces are based on the forecast concept. Nevertheless, as regards the group termination of employment, new clause 34L provides for detrimental applications of the act and does not provide for forecast. Any notice of lay-off is probably detrimental to the employer or the employees but if we want a fair application of the law, no exemption should exist in the case of foreseeable termination of employment.

In the case of individual terminations of employment, I wonder why all employees, whatever their seniority undistinctly receive the same notice.

In Ontario, the notice period depends on how long the employee has been working for his employer. The notice depends on seniority. If he has been working, for instance, for two years, the notice should be one week. If he has been working from two to five years, the notice should be two weeks. If he has been working from five to ten years, the notice should be four weeks; if he has been working for over ten years, it should be eight weeks. It is considered that an employee with more experience is more important to the employer, and the employer because of the importance of this employee cannot fire him under such a short notice as those with less experience.

But, anyway, under the current administrative system, whether someone is experienced or not, whether he has education or not, he does not work and the bill now before us will not change his condition.

It is easier to predict the laying off of an employee with years of experience than it is in the case of a worker with little or no seniority. This procedure also seems fairer since an Ontario worker with 11 years of experience, for instance, among a group of 48 will get the same notice as if he were part of a group numbering from 50 to 200 people.

Now, under the scheme provided in Bill C-228, this man will get only two weeks' notice notwithstanding his years of service or anticipation of impending lay-offs, whereas, belonging to a group of over 50 workers, he would get eight weeks' notice.

This is a fine example of how the government complicates its legislations and makes them incomprehensible for the ordinary worker and even for those attempting to become experts in that field.

Moreover, the Ontario Labour Code specifies that the legislation in no way alters any right favourable to the employee. But such a clause cannot be found in the standards put forward by the federal government today. Why should there be such inconsistencies between federal and provincial legislations?

Mr. Speaker, does this mean that in the case of a single lay-off, the individual laid off can claim only two weeks' notice? Is he not entitled to request a longer notice under a collective agreement or common law? If not, the standards proposed today will be prejudicial to the employee who would otherwise be entitled to a longer notice.

Furthermore, in order to make as complicated a study as the proposed legislation itself, I will say that common law provides for a notice on the part of the employee who wishes to leave his job, a notice which is not at all affected by the bill under consideration, and the required notice involves many factors, including the period of payments, the terms of employment and so forth.

At any rate, the period of notice must be reasonable—and I use here the expression of the bill itself—that is in many cases, the notice required from an employee who wishes to leave his job will be longer than that required from his employer, if the latter decides to lay him off. Such a situation is so abnormal that it must be dealt with first, but in this connection neither the minister nor his parliamentary secretary would give us any explanation.

At least, the requirements about the period covered by the notice should be the same for both sides. That is my first request to the minister. There is no reason to make them heavier for the employee than they are for the employer.

Mr. Speaker, it would be better to assure workers the period most favourable to them on the basis of seniority and, thus, on anticipation in order to recognize the rights usually granted to those who have more years of service with the employer.

We might also consider the problem of vacations. After a certain period of employment, a worker is entitled to vacations, but according to the bill now before us, the employer decides when to grant them. No provision of the present legislation prevents the employer from giving two weeks' notice to an individual, saying that the period coincides with his vacations. This does not seem to run counter to new clause 34N, because this would not decrease the rate of pay nor change any other condition of employment. This way, an employer might withhold from his employee two weeks' pay to which he would be otherwise entitled, without the employee being able to say anything against it. That is another inequity which workers cannot and should not put up with.

As for garnishment and its effect on employment, another part of the legislation deals with it. I agree entirely with the content of new clause 34U, although its introduction is late.

There are several other things remaining and which have not been provided for in the proposed legislation. I shall deal with them through questions which I shall put very humbly and politely to the minister, in the hope that he will give a reply before the end of this debate.

First of all, what would be the effect of a strike on the notice period? Secondly, can an employer give notice to his employees while a strike is in progress, without having to pay them compensation? Thirdly, would employees having been given the required notice be allowed to strike and, at the same time, be paid by the employer, pursuant to the same act? Further, will an illegal strike be dealt with in the same way as a legal one, with regard to the notice? What will be the effect of a lock-out?

Those are important questions to which, at present, no answer is given. I do not want to take up any more of the time of the House, but I do feel that answers to those questions should be given by the Minister of Labour or his parliamentary secretary (Mr. Perrault) so that no doubts should subsist with regard to Bill C-228.

May I say that this is one of those bills which are very complicated and very difficult to understand by the worker and by the employer, both of whom we wish to protect.

It seems to me—and this does not come under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Department of Labour—that those who are responsible for the drafting of bills should make an effort to simplify the text.

Being unaware of the minister's intentions, I should like to recommend to him—

• (9:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the hon. member? The hon. member has asked a number of important questions, but with all due respect I think the questions he directed to this side would be more appropriately asked at the committee stage. However, they were important questions and I will make certain that the minister is apprised of them before he makes his formal reply tomorrow.

However, Mr. Speaker, I wish to know whether the hon. member is seeking detailed replies from me this evening, because I think it would be impossible to give such detailed replies in anything but a committee setting. This is the question I ask: Does the hon. member expect replies this evening?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the attention paid to my remarks by the parliamentary secretary. Of course, I do not expect an answer to these questions immediately, since I am hoping for a detailed and full answer about these basic problems, as the parliamentary secretary said himself. I hope at least that I shall obtain a full answer to these questions before the vote on the motion for third reading of this bill in order to be aware of all the consequences.

In view of the complex drafting of this legislation, I should like to recommend to the minister that he redraft the bill so as to make it understandable to everybody, to employers and employees who have not all had the chance to become learned draftsmen such as those whom the government employs to draft legislation that, besides, they are the only ones to understand.

Considering the importance of this bill—and I should make the same remarks about the unemployment insurance bill—the wording should be clearer.

While speaking on this bill, my colleague from Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) quoted some clauses that are completely incomprehensible: a cow would not recognize its own calf, which shows how complicated this bill is.

It seems to me that as Members of Parliament, our first duty is not only to pass intelligent laws, but also and foremost, if we really want to serve the interests of Canadians, to make these laws easily understood by all. They should be drafted in French and in English, instead of being translated word for word, because very often the French version is incomprehensible in regard to the English text.

At any rate, without any intention of blaming the Translation Bureau, which does excellent work, I feel that because of the complexity of the present bill, a point on which the Parliamentary Secretary will agree with me, the department should be strongly urged to bring out some kind of leaflet explaining each clause of the bill in simple words, illustrated by examples, in order to enable all those the bill is to help, both employers and employees, really to derive therefrom the benefits planned by the government.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that throughout my remarks I have stressed the striking disparities between federal and provincial legislation in this particuliar field. Actually when we try to solve a problem we must refer to innumerable acts and compare provincial legislation to federal legislation, since employees are not treated the same way in all provinces.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that the Department of Labour should make a special effort in this direction and cooperate closely with the provincial governments in order to ensure more uniformity as far as Canadian labour standards are concerned, and a better treatment for the employees. It is not normal that the workers of one province be treated in a different way than those of an other province.

It seems that those are promising avenues which the minister may not open up at this time, but in respect of which he can work hard in order to give back to the workers, the employers and employees, not merely in words, but by means of legislation the security and uniformity of labour standards recognized from one province to another.

Nevertheless, this bill deals with termination of employment, lay-off, advance notice, and the like, but there remains that as long as our financial system is not entirely revamped, this type of bill dealing with lay-offs, leaves, etc., will not solve the basic problem.

Accordingly, this bill, just like so many others, is nothing but a poultice on a wooden leg.

Mr. Paul Langlois (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, it is with great satisfaction that I participate in this debate on amendments to the Canadian Labour (Standards) Code. I understand that the Code only applies to workers directly under federal jurisdiction, but nevertheless we are now discussing an important component of the social policy of the government.

Of all the sections in the Code, there is one which appears capital to me, namely, the section on minimum wage.

The provisions of the amendment in this respect are a good reflection of Canadian tradition in the field of labour. Indeed, we all consider as unjust the existence of starvation wages which allow some industries to survive by generating poverty. I am proud to support this tradition whereby natural market forces can operate freely only above a vital minimum for workers. I believe in the principle of free enterprise, I believe in a minimum of government intervention in the market, but I also believe that government has a responsibility to ensure that employers in this country pay their employees with a minimum of decency.

As I was saying a few moments ago, the establishment of a minimum wage is a significant milestone in the social policy of any government. However, one of its special features is that the cost is not directly and totally absorbed by the government. In other words, in establishing the minimum wage, the government is asking the private sector to carry its part of the load to bring about a society where social justice prevails. The minimum wage affects this class of citizens who are not covered by other social measures, that is low wage-earners. As a rule, since these people are working, they are not entitled to welfare and unemployment insurance benefits and they cannot avail themselves of manpower retraining programs. Therefore, they cling to the minimum wage, and in my view, the government must not only make sure that its level is adequate, but that all employers under federal jurisdiction comply with it. I believe that the basic question lies in the establishment of a minimum wage and knowing who receives it, who foots the bill and what the effects of these two factors are.

As I was saying a while ago, the one who benefits from it is the worker who, in spite of his salary, still lives in poverty. We find this worker in industries where labour is the most important factor and, generally speaking, he is not trained. I should like to add that, according to my experience in the world of labour, an important part of these workers are women, and as all hon. members know, the ratio of women in the labour force has considerably increased in the last few years. Moreover, in most cases, where both husband and wife work, the woman's salary allows the family to live barely beyond the poverty level. In that perspective, it therefore seems imperative to me that in setting a minimum wage, one should be realistic and take into account, not just the needs of the workers, but also his contribution to the economy of the land.

It must be noted that by setting the minimum wage at $1.75, we give a new incentive to the Canadian citizen to leave the ranks of the people on welfare and join those of the labour force.

I should like to touch on another subject now, namely, who pays the bill when the government increases the minimum wage? Obviously, it turns to the employer. Unfortunately, we hear too much criticism to the effect that the minimum wage will force some industries to close their plants. In this regard and without hesitation, I say that the employer who cannot guarantee his employees a vital minimum has no right to stay in business. On the other hand, on a more positive basis, the minimum wage may spur these industrialists into modernizing their equipment, into rationalizing their operations and, consequently, into putting themselves in a more favourable position to face national and international competition.

I recognize that too high a minimum wage could create unemployment. I believe the answer to this problem is to keep the minimum wage within bounds.

I have followed last night's debate with a great deal of interest. The ease with which some opposition members recommend a higher minimum wage has surprised me. Do they not know that the minimum wage that is being proposed is above that provided in any provincial legislation, and that barely a year ago, the minimum wage provided by the federal government was only $1.25? Are they not aware of the disturbing effect of too high a minimum wage on some of the poorer areas of this country?

Obviously it is easy—and some take pleasure in doing so—to recommend a higher minimum wage than that provided in the bill. But why stop at $2.00 per hour? Why not propose $2.10, $2.15 or even $2.25? If no consideration is given to the balance between social justice and economic vitality, why should hon. members show such moderation in their suggestions?

Therefore, I would like to point out that Canadian tradition has always been favourable to the collective bargaining system, and that is felt in all labour negotiations in Canada. In my opinion, the determination of wages must normally be the result of negotiations between employers and unions, according to the rules established by government. However, since unionization is not compulsory, the government should guarantee that workers not covered by collective agreements are protected by the law. In that regard, I approve its position in determining minimum standards in a variety of cases such as severance pay, maternity leave, notices of termination of employment and hours of work.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

An hon. Member: I thought the member wanted the minister to reply.

Mr. Perrault: I think the understanding has been that tomorrow the minister will be granted an opportunity to make his final reply.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, there was some discussion and I think there was an understanding that when we reached the point where no one else wished to speak, we would agree that debate be considered closed except for the minister's concluding speech. Of course, if anybody else wants to speak, let him do so now or forever hold his peace.

Mr. Peters: That can only happen if we call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I take it that no hon. members wish to participate in the debate at this point. As I understand it, if there is agreement there will be an order that the debate be concluded at this stage of the bill subject to the right of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) to make a closing speech.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: Then we call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Speaker, we are agreed on that. We are even willing to call it ten o'clock, if you like.

An hon. Member: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Mr. Horner: I would like to speak on the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Perrault: It is not a point of order.

Mr. Horner: I understand that debate on Bill C-228 will continue when the minister returns; he will speak on second reading before the bill is referred to committee. I have reason to believe that members who are away today for reasons unknown to us may wish to speak at a later date. Will this be permitted, or is debate being held over for the sole purpose of allowing the minister to speak? I wonder if this point could be cleared up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome).

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, there was a suggestion this afternoon from members opposite that a more appropriate way to handle this matter would be that rather than having the minister's statement made in his absence by someone else, which is what we suggested at first, the debate be concluded at this point and the minister would make his final speech tomorrow. It was agreed that if the minister were here and did speak, it would conclude the debate. If hon. members opposite do not want to go along with that suggestion, we can adjourn the debate to another day.

It has been suggested that if the minister were here and intervened tonight, that would conclude the debate. The simpler thing to do would be to conclude the debate by agreement and have the minister's intervention tomorrow.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not think hon. members would want to take a great deal of time discussing this point. The Chair's understanding is that there was unanimous agreement among the House leaders, but of course if there is not agreement the order cannot be made and the Chair will be guided by the House and will call another order of business.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might speak again for a few moments in order to facilitate the passage of this legislation. The minister is not here this evening and, as the assistant government whip has pointed out, the minister would like to close the debate. I would like to hear him because he is a very imaginative and informative Minister of Labour. In light of this I believe passage of the legislation could best be facilitated by calling it ten o'clock and hearing the minister's remarks on another occasion.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly on the point of order advanced initially by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner). The minister is absent this evening because he is speaking to the Ontario school teachers. Because of the complex nature of the legislation before us—and a series of very complex questions have been asked—it was the minister's intention to study carefully the debate as recorded in Hansard this evening so that he could answer in detail the pertinent questions raised by hon. members on the other side of the House.

Accord was reached earlier today to the effect that we would deal with the second reading stage this evening and that tomorrow the minister would be given the privilege of replying to these questions. I would hope hon. members on both sides of the House would consider this to be a useful procedure.

Mr. Peters: Calling it ten o'clock is the easy way out.

Mr. Horner: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair must be guided by the wish of hon. members. As I understood it, there was agreement. Hon. members have spoken on the point of order. Is it agreed that the debate at this point be concluded save only for the reply of the Minister of Labour?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no such agreement.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It has been moved by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome), seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode), that the debate be now adjourned. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the circumstances we will agree to dispense with a motion in writing because of the very urgent nature of this motion.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL MARKETING COUNCIL AND AGENCIES

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-176, to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. On the report stage of Bill C-176, which is now before the House for consideration, the Chair understands there have been discussions on the procedure to be followed. As hon. members know, there is authority in the Chair to group or combine certain amendments. I believe there are some 30 amendments to be considered at this stage of the debate. Perhaps I might put to hon. members what I understand is the agreement, and if there should be a divergence of opinion I know hon. members will say so. I will read the notes I have, and if there is agreement it could be put in the form of an order.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I realize the Chair has a difficult job in attempting to sort out the amendments, some of which have a great deal of similarity. I regret very much that the Chair has not consulted the movers of the amendments. The motivation behind the amendments can best be described by the movers, and therefore the grouping of the amendments can best be determined by the movers with the expertise of the Chair. Therefore, I suggest to the Chair that there may be disagreement in respect of the grouping of the amendments because the Chair has not seen fit to consult the movers.

I raise this point, Mr. Speaker, only as a suggestion. We are all grouping under a new set of rules with regard to report stage. I raise this point now to suggest to the Chair that on a future occasion a similar situation might arise and it might be advisable if the Chair, before grouping amendments, consulted the movers of the amendments to agree on their grouping.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I understand the hon. member's suggestion. The Chair is about to put forward suggestions with which it is hoped hon. members will agree in order to facilitate the debate. Of course, the hon. members in whose names the motions stand are primarily concerned and I agree that their wishes might well be considered, but hon. members realize the Chair has authority to make the grouping. However, the Chair would not want to force it on hon. members who are reluctant to accept it.

Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 inclusive relate to subclause (c) of clause 2 and it is suggested that these three motions be grouped for the purpose of debate but that the question on each be put separately.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I realize your grouping is final in this instance, but it might be advisable to seek—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I thought I had indicated that these groupings, at least in the opinion of the Chair, at this point are not final. I would hope they would be and I believe there is general consent, but I do not want to impose the suggestions I have in mind on the hon. member for Crowfoot, although I hope he will accept them.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interruption by the Chair because I have always worked on a very sparse margin of hope. I suggest that you consider grouping amendments Nos. 1, 5 and 22. In so doing we would still be taking three amendments together. I might briefly explain the reason. If one quickly reads amendment No. 1 he will see it suggests basically that no commodity group be included in the bill.

The argument put forward repeatedly by the minister and the chairman of the committee has been that this is permissive and enabling legislation. The context of amendments 1, 5 and 22 basically is that the bill would be made enabling or permissive legislation. The order paper, however, lists these amendments in the order of the clauses in the bill. In other words, clause 2 automatically comes before clause 18. Amendment No. 22 deals with clause 18. The intent of the amendment to clause 18, the intent of the amendment to clause 5 and the intent of the amendment to clause 2(c) would make the bill permissive and enabling legislation, as the proponents of the bill suggest. That is why I object.

Amendments Nos. 2 and 3, to take the other amendments which Your Honour suggests should be grouped, state in essence that all farm products should be in the bill except, as No. 2 suggests, cattle and calves and, as No. 3 suggests, except hogs and pork products. There is a basic difference. No. 1 suggests that nobody shall be included unless they request to be included and can prove to the minister and the Governor in Council that the majority of the producers want inclusion. In order to give that amendment some teeth, further amendments have to be moved to clause 2(g) and clause 18(1) and (2).

I would rather Your Honour followed the pattern of grouping amendments and calling on the movers, to better understand their intent on moving these amendments, rather than grouping them in the way suggested. The Chair might then better follow the intent of the amendments, the debate would become very much simpler and it would be clearer for Your Honour to rule on the amendments.

As I understand it, the purpose of grouping amendments is to create a situation in which Your Honour can rule a certain speech in order or out of order. The speeches at report stage must pertain to the amendment specified. I do not object to the authority of the Chair to group amendments, but I believe that in future it will be better to have consultation with the movers of amendments so that their intent in moving the amendment can be considered. The debate would then follow the intent of motions so grouped.

I suggest to hon. members, the government House leader and Your Honour—the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and the chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture are not here—that owing to the efforts of the assistant government whip a few minutes ago and in light of the argument I have put forward with regard to grouping, perhaps we should now call it ten o'clock. A regrouping of amendments could take place tomorrow morning before the bill is debated. I would be in favour of that; I think it would facilitate early agreement on how these amendments should be dealt with.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair would like to read a suggestion into the record so that hon. members, particularly the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), might have an opportunity, in line with this suggestion, to give further consideration to the manner in which the motions should be grouped. This will be done with the assurance that it is no more than a suggestion. It will form a basis for consideration by hon. members overnight and tomorrow, particularly hon. members in whose names the motions stand, as to the way in which the Chair feels the groups might be made. Again, these are only suggestions.

Of the 30 motions to amend Bill C-176, it would appear that only motion No. 30 is defective from a procedural point of view in that the motion seems to amend the Export and Import Permits Act. An opportunity to submit procedural argument might be deferred until that motion is called for consideration.

Motions Nos. 1 to 3 inclusive relate to subclause (c) of clause 2. It is suggested that those three motions be grouped for the purpose of debate, but that the question on each be put separately. It is suggested that motions Nos. 4 and 5 be debated and disposed of separately. It is suggested that any deferred division then standing might be disposed of before proceeding to part I of the bill.

It is suggested that motions Nos. 6, 7 and 8 be grouped for the purpose of debate, but the question on each be put separately. It is suggested that motion No. 9 be considered and disposed of separately. Motions Nos. 10 and 11 could be grouped for debate and disposed of with one vote. Motion No. 12 might be considered and disposed of separately. At this stage any outstanding deferred division might be taken.

Motions Nos. 13, 14, 15 and 16 all relate to clause 7 of the bill. It is suggested that those motions be grouped for the purpose of debate, but that each question be put separately. Deferred divisions on the foregoing, if any, might be taken at that time. Motions Nos. 17 and 18, which are on clause 8 of the bill, should be grouped for debate but voted upon separately. Motions Nos. 19 and 20 might be debated and voted upon separately. At this stage, any outstanding deferred division might be taken before proceeding to part II of the bill.

It is suggested that motions Nos. 21, 22 and 23 be debated and disposed of separately. It is suggested that motions Nos. 24, 25 and 26 be grouped for the purpose of debate, but the question on each be put separately. At this stage, it might be desirable to take any outstanding deferred divisions. It is suggested that motion No. 27 be debated and disposed of separately. It is also suggested that motions Nos. 28 and 29 be grouped for the purpose of debate, but the question be put on each separately.

As suggested earlier, motion No. 30 might not be acceptable in that it purports to amend the Export and Import Permits Act and it would appear to be irrelevant to Bill C-176. It might be desirable to hear representations when motion No. 30 is reached. After motion No. 30 is disposed of, any outstanding deferred division may be taken to complete the report stage.

If hon. members are in agreement, the Chair will call motion No. 1. We can then proceed in the time remaining this evening. Hon. members might give some thought to the memorandum I have just read into the record.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) moves amendment No. 1 as follows:

That Bill C-176, an act to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, be amended by deleting from subclause (c) of clause 2 all the words after the word "agriculture" at line 14, page 1.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): May I make one suggestion at this stage, now that Your Honour has read the reasons for the groupings? I had a chance to discuss and consider these groupings earlier; I did not have a chance to complete my consideration. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) has indicated what might be a reasonable ground for urging the Chair to review the grouping including motion No. 1. There are two other motions in his name which have the same principle at stake as motion No. 1.

As Your Honour has called motion No. 1, in view of the argument made by the hon. member for Crowfoot would it be fair at this stage to say that the hon. member for Crowfoot will not be precluded from making his argument until there is an opportunity for the Chair to further consider the representations made by the hon. member? The hon. member for Crowfoot might be free to at least address his remarks to the grouping which he has urged upon the Chair as being reasonable. The Chair would then have an opportunity to read his remarks. Acknowledging that Your Honour has complete discretion to accept the remarks of the hon. member for Crowfoot, it may be that tomorrow Your Honour could make an adjustment on this one particular grouping.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

I urge this now in order that my hon. friend from Crowfoot will not be restricted as he otherwise might be in the remarks he has to make dealing with the first motion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Unless hon. members have objections to raise, the Chair feels that the hon. member for Crowfoot should be allowed to make his observations at this point on the basis of the procedural argument he put forward earlier, and all hon. members will have a chance to read it by tomorrow.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In rising in to debate what has now become a very famous bill, Bill C-176 I intend to speak on the concept of its basic principles. As I understand it, this is basically enabling legislation or, at the utmost, permissive legislation. Nobody will be involved unless he wishes to be. This is enabling legislation which will encompass no part of the agricultural industry unless it really wants to be encompassed.

It is necessary when considering this question to possess some concept of British justice or British tradition, a tradition inherited by our system in Canada, by virtue of which we are innocent until proven guilty. All kinds of latitude are given to an individual to govern himself or his property until the law says that certain things cannot be done. In essence, everything can be done unless the law forbids it. The bill before us has to do with agricultural products, but whether or not it will directly affect any particular agricultural product will depend solely on the producers of those products. To understand this concept perfectly, of course, I suppose one has to be a lawyer. I am not a lawyer but somehow or other, through seepage or through a process of osmosis in this House of Commons, these notions filter through.

Where did the concept of the bill before us originate, and why is this legislation being brought forward now? I think this can best be explained by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself by reference to a few curt remarks he made about the Liberal party in 1963. He said then that the Liberal party was a party madly in search of power and prepared to use power for the sake of power alone. I have the exact quotation here somewhere and will gladly read it when I find it. In any case, I should like to read from the Prime Minister's remarks with regard to agricultural policy and marketing arrangements made in a speech in Winnipeg on June 2, 1968. It just so happens it was prior to an election. He had this to say about national marketing boards:

More and more farmers are turning to marketing boards to provide them with a vehicle for the orderly marketing of their products. Existing boards established under provincial authority are finding it increasingly difficult to operate due to altered conditions brought on largely through changes in the technology of transportation and product handling. To meet this situation and to complement the action of provincial boards through the provision of a basis for orderly inter-provincial and export marketing the government proposes to introduce special legislation to provide for commodity marketing boards as the particular need for each commodity becomes evident.

I underline the words "as the particular need for each commodity becomes evident". One can clearly see that as early as June 2, 1968, the government was fully prepared to bring in legislation such as Bill C-176, or Bill C-197 as it was called in the first instance. The government was prepared to do so as a particular need in respect of each commodity became evident. My amendment clearly spells out that no commodity shall be encompassed by the bill until a need becomes evident to the producers.

Clause 17 clearly establishes that the majority of producers must request that they be included. In his speech of June 2, 1968, the Prime Minister left open the question who should determine when the need was evident. Of course, one can rest assured that a power-hungry government will do the determining. Nevertheless, we now have the concept accepted in the bill that the producers themselves shall determine whether or not they should be included.

Toward the end of his remarks on the occasion to which I have referred, the Prime Minister stated:

In order to meet the difficulties of divided jurisdiction in the area of the marketing of agricultural products, the government would undertake to raise for discussion with the provinces the possibility of providing over-all authority for the marketing of agricultural products as a federal responsibility.

The government did hold discussions with the provinces. But today there is no unanimity with regard to Bill C-176. Newfoundland said the bill was ultra vires; they did not believe the federal government had the authority to enforce it. The Saskatchewan Premier said the other day to his people: Don't worry about the bill. As long as I am Premier it will never come into force in this province. The Premier of Alberta, Mr. Strom, said just the other day: I want red meats excluded. A common definition of that term would be beef, pork and sheep products, basically lamb and mutton. There is no unanimity. The provinces have not agreed to this over-all concept.

A regrettable situation has developed across Canada inasmuch as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) primised the nation that cattle would be excepted. It was found that his word was completely discredited since cattle were still covered by the bill. On September 9 a federal-provincial conference took place in Ottawa. The Premiers came out of that conference saying: From what we know of Bill C-197 at this time, we accept it and pass it. It may be the answer to the chicken and eggs war. But this agreement hinged on cattle being excluded from the bill.

Many Members of Parliament think the Minister of Agriculture has reneged on his undertaking to the cattlemen, that he has somehow misled the Canadian Cattlemen's Association. But he did not mislead the Canadian cattlemen alone; he misled the provincial Premiers. If one wants evidence of this one can find it at page 18 of committee proceedings No. 7 for December 15, when the Minister of Agriculture outlined what was in the communiqué issued by the federal-provincial conference held in Ottawa, at which the Premiers and the Prime Minister urged passage of the legislation provided provisions relating to cattle and calves were eliminated.

In Winnipeg the Prime Minister acknowledged the fact that in order to meet the difficulty of divided jurisdiction in the area of marketing agricultural produce, the government would undertake to discuss with the provinces the possibility of providing an over-all authority for agricultural products under federal jurisdiction. In other words, the federal government would take unto itself more power. Although there is a certain jealousy in Canadian society today among the provinces with regard to central government authority, on this occasion the provinces agreed to accept the Prime Minister's suggestion.

This acceptance was contingent upon the statement made on September 16 that cattle and calves would be excluded. This was the condition upon which the provinces agreed to early passage of the bill. However, today, six months after that statement was made on September 16, the provisions relating to cattle and calves are still in the bill. As a result, I say that the agreement reached between the provinces and the government is null and void. The only conclusion I can reach is that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Agriculture have no agreement at all with the provinces. Mr. Speaker, this situation vividly illustrates why the bill should not be proceeded with until it is ascertained whether agreement has been reached.

It may be argued that some provinces agree with the bill while others do not. It may also be argued that Members of Parliament are misrepresenting the facts. What are the facts regarding the agreement of the provinces and the jurisdictional question? This marketing legislation has been referred to the Supreme Court of Canada by the province of Manitoba. If the government of Manitoba were in favour of this bill and wanted early passage, why would it refer the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada? At least seven of the ten provinces have informed the Supreme Court that they would be prepared to submit evidence to the court and to brief counsel. Unfortunately, owing to pressure of business the Supreme Court cannot hear the case until May 31, which is about one month away.

What has been happening in the meantime? There has been an escalation of the war between the "countries"—the provinces. Members may laugh at that statement, but I remember one of the greatest exponents of this bill in the Liberal party saying that Canada is not one country but ten countries under one nation. To me that is a terrible admission to make. I still hold out a ray of hope that in essence Canada is one country, that we are not building fences around our provinces.

Mr. Mahoney: Who said that?

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) said that. I have before me an advertisement that was put out by the department of information, and I am glad to see the minister of that department present. I went to a picture-show the other evening and heard him make a speech. This advertisement was sponsored by the Canadian Advertising Association and says that Canada stands together, that we understand together. I ask, are we really understanding one another when the whole country is torn asunder by Bill C-176? This advertisement states that had Canada not been faced with so vast a geography and an arc of people along its southern regions—

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? Would he be kind enough to identify what it is he is reading? And if it is valuable enough to quote from, perhaps he would table it.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to table it, but I may never get another copy. Let me continue to read it. It says that the problem might have been different—

Mr. Stanbury: Identify it.

Mr. Horner: All hon. members can see it. It is an advertisement put out by Information Canada.

Mr. Stanbury: No, it is not.

Mr. Horner: The minister shakes his head and says no. If he does not know about it, why is the stamp of his department on it and why did I receive it from his department. Let me just continue for a moment, Mr. Speaker, so I can finish this point.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PLANS FOR PROVISION OF SUMMER JOBS FOR STUDENTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on February 5 I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether in light of statements made by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) and the Canadian Student Liberals about the deepening unemployment crisis, the government would inform the House if plans were being evolved to provide work for the large number of students who would be entering the job market from universities and high schools this summer. The Prime Minister replied that the government was working on plans for student employment this summer. Since asking that question last February we have had statements made by a battery of ministers—by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), who is co-ordinating the program; I think by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration—about a whole series of government programs.

We have the Opportunities for Youth program which calls for student employment. We have travel programs, including the student exchange program, with foreign countries and we have the hostel programs for students who will travel across the country. Those programs accomplish too little and have come too late. Programs were announced less than one month before university students finish their courses and start looking for work. They were put forward in a manner which can only cause confusion and difficulty. Students and other voluntary organizations were invited to submit proposals for new and imaginative programs. The criteria under which programs are to be selected are, to say the least, unclear.

In the last two days I have received letters from responsible organizations in Winnipeg, some of which expressed knowledge of what the government would bring forward. They contained details of constructive programs suggested for employing young people. These people as yet have no knowledge whether their programs will be approved or accepted. From the tenor of the questions they have asked, I conclude they are doubtful that approval will be given by the government departments responsible in this area.

When the program was announced I suggested there would not be time to evaluate the many proposals which might come forward in order that the best could be accepted. The Secretary of State has said that only $57 million has been allocated for youth employment programs. In fact, if all the programs which have been suggested to his department were accepted the government would have to provide $150 million to finance them. As I said, the program was announced in such a way there will not be time to pick and choose the best suggestions, although the situation is even more serious than it was last year.

There were about 450,000 university and high school students looking for work last summer. I am speaking from memory but I think about 90 per cent of them obtained work. That sounds like a very impressive figure, but when one analyses the actual results he finds that only 50 per cent of the students looking for work obtained work for more than half the period they were available.

A university student who finishes his course at the end of April and does not go back until the latter part of September, unless he has pretty substantial financial support from home requires work for the bulk of the summer months. Last year only half of the students obtained work for more than 50 per cent of the time they were available. This is a disaster for young people who want to continue their studies. The government, the Department of Manpower, the universities, junior colleges and technical schools have been telling young people they ought to continue their studies as long as possible. In recent years the people who have been unemployed for the longest period of time, and most frequently, are unskilled, uneducated and untrained.

But it is precisely these young people who are finding most difficulty in getting work. It is precisely these young people who are trying to continue their studies at universities, junior colleges or community colleges, who are finding that while they need employment during the summer there simply is no work because they have to compete with people who are looking for permanent employment. Last month there were almost three-quarters of a million unemployed—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member, as I always do, and could not agree with him, which is usual. I do not think his criticisms are warranted, because since the question was put on the order paper there has been a statement in the House by the minister. On Thursday, April 22, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) spoke of the great success of the Opportunities for Youth program and of the fact that it has been substantially oversubscribed. Our youth have obviously accepted the challenge and have responded with most imaginative programs.

I was pleased to learn that the Department of the Secretary of State had indicated today that an announcement would be made this Thursday of the programs which have been accepted. It is true that all cannot be accepted, but I have every confidence that this will prove to be most worthwhile and the most imaginative program of this nature ever developed by a Canadian government and responded to by students.

There are those who will be disappointed. There will be programs that do not meet the necessary criteria and there will be programs that do meet the criteria but, due to budgetary considerations, cannot be accepted. It will not all be perfection. This program is in the form of an experiment. But this is a government that is not afraid to innovate. It has thrown out an imaginative challenge, to which youth has responded, and those who have not been successful in this program will I am sure find their way without waiting for the total welfare state, which my hon. friend would like to see, where it is handed to them on a silver platter. I do not think youth wants this, nor do I think that it is good for our youth. I think that the program as announced on April 22 and the projects which have been accepted and will be announced on April 29 will be a credit to the government as well as to the youth of this country.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, on April 6, I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) the following question:

> Would he tell the House if he intends to ask the government to amend the Bank of Canada Act and the Bank Act concerning chartered banks to establish government participation in the major decisions of the banks and the economic independence they advocate?

We could note then that the minister was a proponent of economic independence. He says that the Americans are absorbing us and that they are increasingly taking over our economy.

What is it that enables the Americans to gain control of our economy, our natural resources, our trade? Everything goes.

The Americans invest capital massively in Canadian securities. I urge the minister to do something, to instruct our great Canadian institution to intervene and issue credit on the same securities, because the reason why the Americans invest in Canada is that they have securities. They take Canadian securities to invest them. So, a national body can do exactly the same thing, and issue the same credit on the same securities.

I was then asking the minister whether he was willing to act along these lines in order that we may become masters in our own home, assume the control of our resources and undertake new development projects in connection with our natural resources. Briefly speaking, if the Americans can give securities or issue credit on new projects and new developments, why is it that the Bank of Canada would not be in a position to do likewise? Unless we take this action, we will fail to recover control over our economy. Day after day we will be losing some of this control and we will go on losing it until the Americans assume it completely. And I think that if we do not change our own policies regarding investment and control of our credit issues, we will soon become the exclusive property of the Americans. And we can count on the fingers of one hand the number of years that it will take to the Americans to swamp Canada with their investments.

I think that if the hon. minister is serious and wants to act effectively, it is high time that he urge the government to allocate the funds necessary for financing the development of our natural resources and our industries with the same guarantees.

I believe that it would be easy for Canadians to develop their country in an unheard of manner, because it is my conviction that all that is physically possible should be financially workable.

Presently, we are tackling pollution problems which we can only solve through investments. There will always be pollution due to lack of necessary funds. However, these will be provided by the Americans who will gain greater control over our natural resources, our waterways and finally our education by getting ownership of our school handbooks. Americans are getting into every kind of activity. It is not their fault but ours because we are too willing to be led, because we do not open our eyes before it is too late and because we do not take the necessary measures to settle this situation. This is a serious problem. If we really seek to remain Canadians, to develop our resources, to be masters in our own house, we shall need economic and political independence. By gaining economic independence, we shall necessarily accede to political independence. We have lost our economic independence and we do almost nothing to regain it. We make beautiful speeches but we take no action to regain our independence. Most of our activities are presently in the hands of Americans.

I could quote figures but I have no time and I think that the parliamentary secretary to the minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) will be in a position to give me a satisfactory answer.

With this answer, we shall learn whether this government is in a position to do something or whether he wishes us to stay under the rule of the United States or any other country although we could well regain the control of our economy while it is still time.

[English]

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, firstly and briefly I am advised that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) has no immediate or present intention of asking the government to amend either the Bank Act or the Bank of Canada Act. Certainly a comprehensive review of the Bank Act will be a major task of the next Parliament in the regular decennial revision. I think that I should assure the hon. member that all Canadians, including those in the government, share the concern that he has expressed for the degree of foreign ownership of our industry and our resources.

Among other things we are watching critically the manner in which all our financial institutions, including our banks, are serving the national interest. The government has proposed and this Parliament has enacted during the past 2 1/2 years important legislation making trust, loan and finance companies much more effective institutions in Canada's over-all financial structure.

The hon. member will be aware that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) has under review the whole matter of foreign ownership and that we are anticipating a full and comprehensive report on this subject. The hon. member will also be aware that the bill creating the Canada Development Corporation, which will be a new, imaginative and highly effective instrument in Canada's financial structure, is currently before the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

I might point out, since it was bankers' statements that gave a rise to this question originally, that the particular bankers who made their comments in New York, the banks they represent, none of the Canadian chartered banks nor the Canadian Bankers' Association have indicated any interest in appearing before the standing committee as it deals with the Canada Development Corporation bill.

UNEMPLOYMENT—RATE OF HARD-CORE UNEMPLOYMENT JOBS FOR STUDENTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on March 18, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether, in view of the fact that over the past 11 months the seasonally adjusted rate of unemployment has varied from a low of 5.6 per cent to a high of 8.2 per cent, we should take it as government policy to accept an unemployment rate of 5 1/2 per cent to 6 per cent in the future. The Prime Minister did not answer my question because the Chair ruled that he had already answered a similar question.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

The answer which the Prime Minister gave was in fact incorrect. The figures released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Manpower and Immigration in April for the month of March show that in March, 1971, there were 650,000 people unemployed, an increase from the 542,000 unemployed in March, 1970, of more than 100,000.

If we look at the regional rates we become even more alarmed. The very high unemployment in Quebec increased from 206,000 in March, 1970, to 236,000 in March, 1971. In Ontario, the most prosperous province in Canada, it increased from 141,000 in March, 1970, to 192,000 in March, 1971. In British Columbia it increased from 59,000 in March, 1970, to 73,000 in March, 1971. It is true that the seasonally adjusted rate declined to 6.6 per cent, but that does not help the 650,000 people who are unemployed.

Apart from the large number of unemployed we have a particular problem in respect of the hard-core unemployed which is becoming more serious. The number of Canadians unemployed for a period of four months or longer in March rose to 308,000. This is an increase from 263,000 in February and 225,000 in January of this year. Even more significant, however, is the fact that the figure of 308,000 in March of this year is more than 100,000 higher than the 200,000 people who were unemployed for four months or longer in March of 1970. In the hard-core category, the 182,000 who had been unemployed for a period of between four and six months in March this year, and 126,000 who had been unemployed for six months or longer, have a right to begin to think their unemployment will be of a permanent nature.

Dr. W. R. Dymond, who is now a professor of economics at the University of Ottawa and in other years was a deputy minister, I believe, in the Department of Manpower and Immigration, has written articles recently in which he emphasizes the gravity of the unemployment situation and suggests very strongly that unemployment will not normalize as the economy revives, if it revives. He points out that between 1960 and 1970 Canada has experienced an 11 per cent increase in unemployment over all age groups, but that the age group 14 to 19 years has experienced a 43 per cent increase in unemployment and that the comparable increase for the 20 to 24 years group is 49 per cent. I believe these figures substantiate conclusively the question I asked the Prime Minister, namely, whether we could expect that for the next year an unemployment rate which would vary between 5.5 per cent and 6 per cent for the whole year on a seasonally adjusted basis was, on the whole, a very conservative estimate.

The economists to whom I have spoken are doubtful it will hit 5.5 per cent even in the best months of 1971 and in the first part of 1972. This is not surprising. We have a government which was so concerned about inflation that it adopted policies of restraint—the government is proud of this—which kept the cost of living increase last year to 1½ per cent, the lowest figure of any country in the western industrialized world. The inevitable result of that policy of restraint which was urged upon the government by the governor of the Bank of Canada, the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission and other important government officials, was that we had the greatest rate of unemployment of any industrialized country in the western world. I have said before and continue to say this is exactly opposite to the just society about which the Prime Minister has spoken because those who are least able to carry the burden, namely, the unemployed pay for the mismanagement of the economy and for the inflation we have.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's original question, as reported at page 4373 of Hansard for March 18, 1971, stripped of its preamble, was:

—can we take it that it is government policy to accept an unemployment rate of 5.5 per cent to 6 per cent for the future?

A few minutes earlier, as reported at page 4371 of Hansard, the then leader of the NDP, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), after a preamble with respect to unemployment asked:

—if we can now assume that the government is prepared to settle down to a seasonally adjusted rate of 5½ per cent to 6 per cent per year?

It must have come as quite a shock to the hon. member to have had Your Honour disallow his question on the basis that it had been asked a few moments before. The hon. member is to be congratulated on his scrupulous loyalty to his leader, if not on his creativity. I am sure that his qualities are particularly valued by his party and leader early in the new reign.

The answer to the question is, of course, an unequivocal no. The government is not prepared to accept an unemployment rate of 5½ per cent to 6 per cent seasonally adjusted or otherwise, for the future. Government policies are designed for and are working effectively toward a much more acceptable level than that experienced during the past winter. Positive results are being achieved both nationally and regionally. I would refer the hon. member to the testimony given today in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs by the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada with respect to the excellent performance of Canada's economy relative to that of other free market economies, including that of the United States, and I would in particular refer him to employment trends.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

EAST PAKISTAN CONFLICT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster (Mr. Bell):

That this House express its anxiety concerning events in East Pakistan and urge that the government of Canada take such steps as are feasible toward assisting the reduction of human suffering and the forestalling of widening hostilities;

That the government take the lead in bringing about the shipment of medical supplies for the relief of the suffering of the East Pakistan people and that the House indicate its willingness to depute some of its members to act as observers in the area of conflict and suffering if such a role should be deemed helpful in this crucial issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Hillsborough. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 unanimous consent is required.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. Therefore the hon. member's motion cannot be put to the House.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ESTIMATED LOST PRODUCTION AS RESULT OF UNEMPLOYMENT, 1971

Question No. 638—Mr. Orlikow:

What estimates has the government received for 1971 for the value of lost production as a result of unemployment as compared with what production would have been in 1971 if there were full employment, namely, only 4% unemployed in the coming year?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Attention is directed to Hansard, page 3326, dated February 12, 1971.

ESTIMATED UNEMPLOYMENT, 1971

Question No. 639—Mr. Orlikow:

What estimates has the government received from departments or agencies as to anticipated unemployment month by month for the year 1971—either actual or seasonally adjusted rates?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): See the reply made this day to Question No. 638.

AIR CANADA—CHECK OF BILINGUALISM

Question No. 831—Mr. MacRae:

1. Was an employee of the Language Commissioner or any department employed to check bilingualism among Air Canada employees in Ottawa on December 14, 1970 and, if so, on whose direct authority was this done?

2. Were tape recorders used without the knowledge of Air Canada employees being checked and, if so, were such tape recorders in plain view at all times of those being investigated?

3. What disciplinary action has been taken against those involved?

4. Have steps been taken to see that there is no recurrence of this either in Air Canada or in any other level of government?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Language Commissioner reports directly to Parliament and not through a minister. Questions can be made directly to him privately.

REMOVAL OF PAGES FROM "FOREIGN TRADE" SUPPLEMENT

Question No. 838—Mr. Crouse:

1. With respect to the answer given to Question Number 512 at page 2806 in Hansard, January 27, 1971, regarding the removal of pages one and two from "Foreign Trade", what was the content of the two pages?

2. What were the statements that might have been misleading?

3. Will the government table the two pages in question?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): 1. These pages contained (1) the text of the joint communiqué issued by the Government of Canada and the People's Republic of China recording agreement on mutual recognition of the establishment of diplomatic relations and (2) a resume outlining the purpose of the special issue.

2. Release of the joint communiqué was simultaneous in Ottawa and Peking and page 1 of "Foreign Trade" indicated the release date as being October 13, 1970. The release date in Peking was October 14 because of the time differential due to the international dateline. Also "Foreign Trade" reported that Canada and China released the communiqué in Stockholm where the negotiations had taken place whereas, in fact, separate announcements had been made in their own capitals.

3. Yes.

CONSUMER PRICE INDEX

Question No. 857—Mr. Robinson:

1. What variables are considered in calculating the Consumer Price Index?

2. Is any regional allowance made in reaching the calculations?

3. Is the index considered valid for all of Canada and, if not, for what reason?

4. Are only certain urban centres considered and is any consideration being given to including additional centres?

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: 1. The Consumer Price Index for Canada is designed to measure the effect of changes in consumer prices on the cost of purchasing an unchanging or equivalent basket of consumer goods and services. The only variable which is considered to cause movement in the index is price change. The basket of consumer goods and services in the index is designed to reflect the spending pattern of a broad middle-income group of urban families of two to six persons.

[Mr. MacRae.]

2. In the Consumer Price Index for Canada the prices used are collected in 33 cities across Canada. Also, the index basket itself is a composite of spending patterns in Canada for urban middle-income families. Thus, regional movements of prices are incorporated in the Canada index in proportion to their importance in the basket.

3. The Canada index is an average or composite for the population group specified in 1. above. It is considered valid for that group as a whole and because of the homogeneity of spending patterns within the group, the index is considered reasonably valid for any significant components of it.

4. As indicated in 2. above, prices from 33 cities are now included in the Canada index. Periodic reviews are carried out to up-date the basket and price samples for the index and such a review is underway currently. Separate Consumer Price Indexes for 10 regional cities in Canada are prepared, but these indexes measure percentage change in consumer prices from one period to the next within each city and cannot be used to compare levels of prices between cities.

CBC—COVERAGE OF PRIME MINISTER'S ASIAN TOUR AND COMMONWEALTH CONFERENCE

Question No. 875—Mr. Marshall:

1. How many personnel were sent by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to cover the Prime Minister's Asian tour?

2. How many CBC personnel covered the Commonwealth Heads of Government Conference?

3. What was the total cost of the coverage of the Prime Minister's tour and at the Commonwealth Conference to CBC and, what was the total amount of coverage provided on the French and English networks, radio and television?

4. How many personnel from CTV were included in the Prime Minister's press group on the Asian tour and at the Commonwealth Conference?

5. What was the total amount of programming provided by CTV network on the tour and at Conference?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices as follows: 1. and 2. A total of five for English language radio and television services; seven for French language radio and television services, two of whom were sent from Hong Kong. The same teams covered the Commonwealth Conference, the English language group being augmented for coverage of this event by two additional personnel, one of whom was sent from Hong Kong.

3. Combined English and French language radio and television coverage totalled approximately eight hours. It has not been customary to require the CBC to disclose individual program costs. However in the case of the above events, numerous reports and commentaries of varying duration were aired over a three-week period on several programs on the English and French CBC networks and the shortwave International Services. A reasonable estimate of the over-all cost would be in the range of $45,000.

4. Two.

5. Information regarding CTV programming is not available.

NEWFOUNDLAND—ASSISTANCE UNDER FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT, 1970

Question No. 1,011—Mr. Carter:

1. How many applications for loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act were received from Newfoundland in 1970?

2. How many loans were approved and the total amount of money involved?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. Loans under this program are made directly by the chartered banks and other designated lenders to whom applications are addressed. No data is maintained centrally as to the number of applications received by a lender which do not result in a loan being advanced.

2. During the first nine months of the 1970-71 program year (April 1—December 31) 14 loans were advanced totalling $39,757. The figures for Newfoundland for the year ending March 31, 1971 will be published in the Annual Report for the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act later this year.

PEI—ASSISTANCE UNDER FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT, 1970

Question No. 1,084—Mr. McQuaid:

1. How many applications for loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act were received from the Province of Prince Edward Island?

2. Of the applications received during 1970, how many were (a) approved (b) rejected?

3. What was the total amount paid during 1970, by way of loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1, 2 and 3. Loans under this program are made directly by the chartered banks and other designated lenders to whom applications are addressed. No data is maintained centrally as to the number of applications received by a lender which do not result in a loan being advanced. During the first nine months of the 1970-71 program year (April 1—December 31) 65 loans were advanced totalling $122,466. The figures for Prince Edward Island for the year ending March 31, 1971 will be published in the Annual Report for the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act later this year.

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—CONSTRUCTION OF PROPOSED NEW EAST-WEST RUNWAY

Question No. 1,158—Mr. Goode:

1. Will tenders be called for construction of the proposed new East-West runway at Vancouver International Airport and, if so (a) on what date (b) when is construction on the runway scheduled to begin (c) when is the runway scheduled to come into use?

2. Are any criteria applicable to the distance between operating runways and land occupied for residential purposes at Vancouver International Airport and, if so, what are they?

3. Does the Department of Transport, at this time, own all the land within the boundaries prescribed in such criteria?

4. Does the Department of Transport, at this time, own all the land within the boundaries projected for the new East-West runway in accordance with the criteria?

5. Does the Department of Transport plan to construct a large cargo terminal north of the proposed East-West runway at Vancouver Airport and, if so, when is construction scheduled to start?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Final decision on construction of a new East-West runway at Vancouver International Airport has not been made.

2. Yes, as described in the official zoning regulations for Vancouver International Airport. These are height restrictions, which indirectly dictate the distance required between runway threshholds and any structures, including those for residential purposes.

3. Yes.

4. Yes.

5. No, but land is being reserved in the area for that purpose.

OTTAWA INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—COFFEE SHOP

Question No. 1,165—Mr. Peddle:

1. What is the name of the company which operates the coffee shop at the Ottawa International Airport?

2. What amount does the holder pay yearly to the government?

3. When does the present agreement expire?

4. What opening hours of the coffee shop are called for by the present contract?

Mr. Gerard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Golden Totem Restaurants Limited.

2. The coffee shop is operated as part of a combined coffee shop, dining room and cocktail lounge concession. The rental formula is as follows: (a) For the coffee shop and dining room: 10 per cent of the gross revenue per annum (excluding liquor sales) up to and including $200,000; and 12 per cent of the gross revenue per annum (excluding liquor sales) over $200,000 and up to and including $300,000; and 14 per cent of the gross revenue per annum (excluding liquor sales) over $300,000. The amount paid to the ministry for the coffee shop and dining room for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1970 was $54,761.00. (b) For the cocktail lounge the rental is subject to annual review. For the calendar year 1970 the rent was $15,000.

3. July 31, 1975.

4. The contract provides for operation of the coffee shop starting daily at 7:00 a.m. but the service may be commenced earlier at the option of the concessionaire.

PEI—TRAFFIC STATISTICS ON FERRY JOHN HAMILTON GRAY

Question No. 1,179—Mr. Blouin:

During the year 1970, what was the traffic in (a) number of passengers (b) number of cars and trucks (c) number of railway cars on the ferry John Hamilton Gray between Cape Tormentine, N.B. and Borden, P.E.I.?

Mr. Gerard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): (a) Passenger statistics are not maintained by vessel. (b) Number of cars and trucks carried during the year 1970 totalled 159,671. (c) Number of railway cars carried during the year 1970 totalled 28,054.

CUSO—SOUTHERN AFRICA LIBERATION MOVEMENTS

Question No. 1,192—Mr. Robinson:

Is the government aware of a resolution passed by CUSO at its annual meeting "that CUSO take the position that the Canadian Government recognize the legitimacy of Southern Africa Liberation Movements" and, if so (a) does the government endorse such policy (b) does the government intend to provide further funds to CUSO?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The government is aware of the resolution in question. It should be noted that such resolutions are an expression of opinion on the part of the CUSO membership and have no binding effect on the organization. (a) While respecting the justice of the cause espoused by the Southern Africa liberation movements the Government does not believe that armed conflict will bring beneficial results to either the black or white communities of Southern Africa. (b) Yes.

CUSO—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Question No. 1,207—Mr. Robinson:

1. Has financial support been given to CUSO by the government and, if so, how much each year to date?

2. What is the criteria for CUSO to be entitled to apply and receive federal funds?

3. What departments of government sponsor CUSO at the present time?

4. How many members of CUSO are former members of CYC?

5. How many members of CYC at any time were former members of CUSO?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Canadian International Development Agency and the Company of Young Canadians as follows: 1. Financial support has been provided to CUSO by the Canadian Government as follows: Fiscal Year 62/63, $3,294; 65/66, $458,750; 66/67, $742,776; 67/68, $1,678,250; 68/69, $2,374,360; 69/70, $3,260,000; 70/71, $4,250,000.

2. CUSO is a qualified Canadian non-governmental organization under the criteria for eligibility for financial support of non-government organizations in the field of development assistance. Financial support by CIDA is provided in the form of yearly contracts with CUSO to send Canadians to work in developing countries in accordance with the objects of CUSO as contained in the Supplementary Letters Patent granted to this organization.

3. Financial support is provided to CUSO by the Canadian International Development Agency through the non-governmental organizations program.

4. As CUSO is primarily interested in the ability of its members to carry out the job in hand the personnel records maintained are not oriented to automatically retrieve this type of information. As far as can be readily ascertained by CUSO two people who are now members of that organization were previously associated with CYC.

5. To the best of the CYC's knowledge, two members have been former members of CUSO.

POSSIBILITY OF LEGISLATION TO CURB ILLEGAL STRIKE ACTIVITIES

Question No. 1,233—Mr. Southam:

Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation to curb wildcat labour strikes and other illegal activities similar to that recently passed in Great Britain?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The intentions of the Government with respect to industrial relations legislation will be made known in due course. It should be noted, however, that existing legislation defines the circumstances in which strikes or lockouts may take place legally.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY, TRADE AND COMMERCE—INCOME DERIVED FROM COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,246—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): (a), (b), (c) and (d) No income is derived from computer services.

POST OFFICE—DEFICIT ON VARIOUS CLASSES OF MAIL

Question No. 1,254—Mr. Mather:

1. Did the Post Office Department lose money on first class mail (a) in 1969-1970 (b) 1970-1971 and, if so, what was the amount?

2. What was the amount lost by the Post Office for the same periods on second class mail?

3. During the same periods, did the Post Office lose or profit by third class mail?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): The Post Office Department maintains an accounting system whereby total costs are apportioned to classes of mail giving consideration to labour time factors, weight and physical characters of mail, space requirements, etc. Using this method, deficits were attributed to the operations of various classes of mail as indicated in the published Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1972, as follows: 1. Yes. (a) 1969-70 (actual), $360,000; (b) 1970-71 (forecast), $35,075,000.

2. 1969-70 (actual), $28,209,000; 1970-71 (forecast), $33,946,000.

3. 1969-70 (actual), $20,120,000; 1970-71 (forecast), $33,847,000. As final figures for the fiscal year 1970-71 will not be available for some time, the above forecast is offered as the most current information available.

VALCARTIER MILITARY BASE—ERECTION OF HOTEL

Question No. 1,256—Mr. Godin:

Does the government intend to erect a hotel at the Valcartier military base, which hotel would be available to all Canadians visiting parents or military friends?

[Translation]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): No, at the time the current base development plan was being reviewed by CFB Valcartier, members of the local Non-Public Fund organization drew up a list of suggested personnel support program proposals, one of which was an NPF operated hostel. This proposal was never accepted as part of either the public or non-public Valcartier program.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—MARRIED QUARTERS

Question No. 1,262—Mr. Forrestall:

1. How many married quarters, by type and location, does the Canadian Armed Forces have (a) on what dates were they built (b) what was the total and per unit cost?

2. Concerning recuperation of cost, when will each be paid for and how are they written off at each site?

3. What was the average, yearly rent in the past 10 years, 5 years, 2 years at each site and for all PMQs on CF bases?

4. (a) How does the government deal with the maintenance and renovation costs of these units (b) is there anything in the nature of a policy that establishes guidelines re: the time and amount of renovation and/or maintenance that may be carried out and, if so (i) what is that policy (ii) specifically, is there any proportion of these costs born by the residents and, if so, what proportion?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): 1. The Canadian Forces have approximately 24,000 married quarters of various types throughout Canada, most of which were built during the period 1950-1960. In addition, 4,400 are leased or rented in Canada, and 3,880 in Europe. Insofar as (a), and (b) are concerned the requested information is not readily available in Headquarters' records and the necessary expert staff is not available to undertake the large amount of work which would be required to gather the necessary data.

2. All original construction costs were funded from departmental appropriations during the year or years of construction and there is no procedure or policy for the recovery of these costs.

3. Up to 1968 the cost of married quarters to occupants was related to an allowance in accordance with occupant's rank, regardless of the type and size of quarter occupied. As a result it is not possible to determine the average rental allowance paid for married quarters prior to 1968. Since 1968 the rental charges for all federal married quarters have been based on a CMHC appraised rental system. See Hansard dated 6 April, 1970, pages 5492-3.

4. (a) The maintenance and renovation costs for married quarters are budgetted annually by each base and included in departmental appropriations; (b) The general policy and guidelines for the maintenance and renovation of married quarters is published in Canadian Forces Construction Engineering Manual (CFP 120) which is held by all Base Commanders and Engineer Officers; (i) to keep married quarters in good repair subject, of course, to the availability of funds; (ii) no.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—INCOME DERIVED FROM COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,269—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of External Affairs (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of External Affairs is concerned the reply is none.

NAVAL DOCKYARDS—RELEASE OF CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,273—Mr. Anderson:

1. By month, for the period October 1, 1970 to March 31, 1971, how many (a) employees of (b) apprentices in the Ship-Repair Occupational Groups were released or have quit at the Naval Dockyards (i) in Halifax (ii) in Esquimalt?

2. In the same period, how many employees in the Ship-Repair Occupational Groups at the Naval Dockyards died (a) in Halifax (b) in Esquimalt?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence):

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO ONTARIO UNIVERSITIES

Question No. 316—Mr. Foster:

What amount of financial assistance has been made available by the federal government to each accredited university in the Province of Ontario for each of the past five years for (a) operating expenses (b) capital expenses?

Return tabled.

MONEY ALLOCATED TO CANADIAN UNIVERSITY STUDENTS BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Question No. 337—Mr. Fortin:

1. From December, 1961 to October, 1970 how much money has the federal government allocated to university students in (a) Canada (b) the Province of Quebec?

2. By year, what was the amount received in the case of each university in 1965 to 1970 inclusive?

3. What are the specific purposes, if any, of such scholarships or grants?

Return tabled.

IMPORTATION OF SUGAR INTO CANADA

Question No. 455—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. (a) What countries are the sources of sugar imported into Canada (b) what companies in Canada do the importing, and in what quantities each year since 1960?

2. Were Canadian Sugar Refineries convicted under the Combines Act in 1960 for operating a cartel to suppress importations of Cuban refined sugar to Canada in favour of an agreed upon allocation of raw sugar and, if so, what were the details of the judgment at that time?

3. Has the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs received information that Canadian Sugar Refineries are operating a cartel to maintain high domestic prices on sugar and, if so, what action has been taken?

Return tabled.

DOMINION BUREAU OF STATISTICS—HIRING OF OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS AND TOTAL ANNUAL BUDGET

Question No. 693—Mr. Skoberg:

1. For each year 1965-66 to 1969-70, how many consultants outside the Public Service of Canada were retained by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics?

2. What did these services cost?

3. What are (a) the names of the firms or individuals retained (b) the reasons in each instance for retaining the service (c) the costs in each instance where a firm was involved (d) the fee and expenses in each instance where individuals were involved?

4. For each year 1959-60 to 1969-70, what was (a) the total annual budget of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics (b) the total number of continuing (full-time) employees and the number of term employees (c) the total annual expenditure for salaries and wages (d) the total amount expended for professional and special service and the nature of these services?

Return tabled.

SALE OF MAILING LISTS FOR COMMERCIAL USE

Question No. 874—Mr. Goode:

Does any government department, agency or Crown corporation sell mailing lists for commercial use and, if so, by department, agency, or Crown corporation involved (a) when did this practice begin (b) to whom were such sales made during the past fiscal year (c) what were the proceeds from each such sale (d) what restrictions are placed on the use of lists sold?

Return tabled.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to be as difficult as the hon. member from a Nova Scotia constituency was concerning his question as to the use of a certain Jetstar aircraft, but question No. 79 has been on the order paper since October 8. It was also on the order paper in the previous session. It has to do with the use by the Prime Minister's office of outside consultants. I do not think it should be difficult to answer, and I wonder if I could get some indication of when the answer might be forthcoming?

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Jerome: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There have been a number of questions on the order paper involving this same general subject, the use of consultants' studies, with which there was some difficulty in making responses. We have now solved that problem and in the last few days have in fact tabled a number of responses in that general area, although not specifically to the question of the hon. member. I am very optimistic that we will be able to table an answer to his specific question very soon.

Mr. Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, last December a $160 million loan fund was established to help the provinces in their programs. On February 3 I asked a question. I am sure the government has the answer. I cannot see why the government has not answered because this program has been in effect.

Mr. Jerome: I will look into it, Mr. Speaker.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notices of Motions Nos. 156 and 212.

CORRESPONDENCE BY MINISTER RESPONSIBLE FOR HOUSING TO BANKS, LOAN COMPANIES AND INSURANCE COMPANIES

Motion No. 156—Mr. Gilbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all memoranda, correspondence, etc. by the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Housing and presented to chartered banks, loan companies, and insurance companies at meetings held at the end of September, 1970.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I move this motion on the hon. member's behalf.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing held a series of meetings with representatives of the approved lenders at the end of September, 1970. The presentations at these meetings were oral. Since memoranda or correspondence were not presented to the representatives of the approved lenders by the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing at the September meetings, I would request the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I guess I have to accept that, unless there were any tapes. Maybe they could be produced.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN JULES DEMICHER AND GOVERNMENT CONCERNING EMPLOYMENT AND DISCHARGE

Motion No. 212—Mr. Nowlan:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of all correspondence, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between Jules Demicher and the government regarding his employment in, and his subsequent discharge from the federal Public Service.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the government wishes to advise the hon. member that as this matter is now the subject of an inquiry it would be inappropriate to table any such documents at this time. I therefore request the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Nowlan: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is withdrawn.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Mr. Jerome: I ask that the remaining Notices of Motions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

SHARED-COST PROGRAMS—OPTING OUT—EFFECT OF ITEM IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Prime Minister. It is based on a statement attributed to the right hon. member that in no way would Ontario be able to opt out of federal-provincial shared-cost programs and receive fiscal equivalents like the province of Quebec. Will the Prime Minister make a statement to reconcile this firm stand under the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act with the fact that just a few weeks ago an item was slipped by the government into Supplementary Estimates (C)—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That obviously is not a question. The hon. member is making an argument now and I suggest that the question as asked is not in order. If the hon. member is seeking information, he should ask a question. I appreciate that he has invited the Prime Minister to make a statement but, even when an hon. member does that, the question should be asked in a way that cannot be considered as argumentative from the point of view of the Chair.

Mr. Danforth: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps Your Honour will allow me to rephrase the question. I ask the Prime Minister if the $1 item that was placed in Supplementary Estimates (C), which extended this very privilege to the province of Quebec and other provinces, did not include the province of Ontario?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no difficulty in explaining this, if the House will bear with me. As I explained yesterday, the offer was made under the Established Programs (Interim Arrangements) Act in 1964. It was offered to all provinces. At that time only one province accepted. That was the province of Quebec. When we brought in tax reform in 1969, we explained that the tax points would no longer have the same meaning under the new taxation laws and therefore the same offer could not stand. In the meantime, Quebec, having accepted this temporary arrangement, was pressing to have the temporary arrangement made permanent. We said to them, as we are saying to Ontario: We cannot make it permanent until we know the value of a tax point; therefore, let us extend it temporarily on a yearly basis. After tax reform, we can then sit down and see whether we are going to have the same opting out or different provisions and how they could be made permanent and how they could be made available to Ontario as well as Quebec, and to any other provinces which wished to exercise that option.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Would the Prime Minister assure the House that the extension to the province of Quebec for two years involving the sum of $25 million will not be resumed after that date?

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member is presuming that we shall be here in two years to make that decision, I accept the premise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

STATEMENT BY ECONOMIC COUNCIL CHAIRMAN ON INFLATION AND EMPLOYMENT OUTLOOKS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada stated that in the view of the Council inflation may be a problem for decades in Canada, that full employment would take three years to reach in the best of circumstances and that the economy is losing $3 billion a year in terms of production. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the appraisal of the Economic Council is shared by the government or, if it differs, in what way is that difference reflected?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is a very interesting one, but it seems to me he has raised large issues and that he is inviting the Prime Minister or someone on behalf of the government to make a very general statement of the kind which ought to be made on motions. Perhaps the question might be rephrased.

Mr. Saltsman: May I just ask the right hon. gentleman whether the government has set a date by which this country will return to full employment?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): If the hon. member could state a percentage which he considers to be full employment I might be able to answer the question.

Mr. Saltsman: Although 4 per cent is not considered full employment, when does the right hon. gentleman think Canada will reach an unemployment rate of 4 per cent?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question asked in those terms is in order.

Mr. Saltsman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I realize that my question is somewhat unusual but it was put in that way in response to the question directed to me by the Prime Minister. I would hope the Prime Minister asked his question in all sincerity and that he will now be prepared to give an answer as to when the government anticipates we can return to a level of 4 per cent unemployment in Canada.

HIGHWAYS

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL AID TO COMPLETE TRANS-CANADA ROUTE BETWEEN MONTMAGNY AND NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

As the construction of the Trans-Canada Highway has not been completed in an important part of Quebec, namely that which is located between Montmagny and the New-Brunswick border, has the government of Canada received a request for financial help from the government of the province of Quebec for the purpose of completing the construction of this highway as soon as possible? If so, what was the government's reply?

[English]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such request having been directed to me. I will consult with the Minister of Transport to ascertain whether he is aware of any such request.

FINANCE

DATE OF PRESENTATION OF BUDGET—METHOD OF MAKING INCOME TAX CHANGES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Last week I asked him whether by the end of April he could tell us when he intended to present his budget and whether that budget would include the income tax changes that have been forecast. Is he able to do so today?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. We shall have to extend the end of April by a few days.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister will not be here at the end of April. Can he tell us whether he intends to let us have this information next week, because there is a great deal of uncertainty in the country and a great deal of anticipation about what is going to happen?

Mr. Benson: I can assure the hon. member I shall make the House aware of these facts at the earliest possible opportunity.

PROVISION OF SPECIAL CREDITS FOR MUNICIPALITIES IN BUDGET—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the hon. Minister of Finance.

Whereas the Canadian Municipal Union has asked the federal government to allot credits to municipal projects and whereas the budget is forthcoming, would the minister be in a position to advise whether special estimates will be allotted to such projects and whether there will be talks with the provinces in this regard?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it would not be proper for me to indicate what is going to be in the budget before the budget is presented.

AIRCRAFT

STATUS OF ORDERS FOR LOCKHEED TRI-STAR AIRCRAFT

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister inform the House as to the present state of Air Canada's orders for the Lockheed Tri-Star aircraft, whether these aircraft will be equipped with Rolls-Royce RB-211 engines, what delay there will be in delivery, and the effect, if any, on subcontracts which will be let to the Canadian aircraft industry?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will try to answer the question briefly. The decision whether or not to proceed with the tri-jet program, that is, the decision by Lockheed to employ Rolls-Royce engines, has not yet been resolved. However, negotiations at the highest level are going on between the United States and Great Britain and the information, both public and private, is to the effect that these negotiations are progressing favourably. If agreement is reached between Lockheed and Rolls-Royce or between the two governments and the aircraft is therefore manufactured, it is anticipated that Air Canada will maintain its order for the tri-jets. This, of course, would result in the work already committed for in Canada in terms of subcontractors being carried on, as was the case before the Rolls-Royce troubles developed.

Mr. MacLean: Has the minister any indication of what the delay will be in delivery time and in contract work that will ensue if his forecast is correct?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, assuming an early resolution of the current negotiations—and there have been reports today that they have made further progress—the general feeling, I believe, within the industry is that the delivery schedules for all carriers will be delayed by from nine months to one year. Since Air Canada was anticipating taking delivery of its 1011's at the end of the current year or early in 1972, I assume it is reasonable to suppose that it will now be late 1972 or early 1973.

HISTORIC SITES

RECOGNITION OF BIRTHPLACE OF DR. NORMAN BETHUNE

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. It concerns relations between Canada and Mainland China and a long-neglected matter of common interest between the two countries. Is the government giving consideration to recognizing the birthplace of Dr. Norman Bethune at Gravenhurst, Ontario?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for notifying me that he was going to ask this question. I am informed that the matter will be discussed within a month by the Historic Sites and Monuments Board; I believe they are to take it up next month. Hon. members know that this board is the body which is authorized to make recommendations regarding such proposals. As an old China hand myself, I must say it is somewhat surprising to see this great Canadian recognized more in China than in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: With respect, I suggest to the hon. member and to the right hon. Prime Minister that this kind of question should normally be put on the order paper or discussed at the time of adjournment. The question has been asked and the answer given, but I would not want this kind of question to be considered a precedent.

INCOME SECURITY

REVISION OF WHITE PAPER IN LIGHT OF CRITICISM BY NATIONAL COUNCIL ON WELFARE—AMENDMENT OF FAMILY SECURITY PLAN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of criticisms of the government's white paper on income security by the National Council on Welfare, which says that it is only a redistribution of poverty, may I ask the minister whether the government is considering revising its white paper on income security?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, without at all agreeing with the comment by the council or by the hon. member that this is redistribution of poverty, I would indicate, as I have done on many occasions here and outside the House, that we welcome proposals in respect of beneficial changes that can be made in the suggestions put forward in the white paper. That offer still stands.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in light of the comment just made by the minister, may I ask whether he and the government will give consideration to the request of the Canadian Council on Social Development that the government recast its family income security plan?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I have also indicated previously that we are reconsidering aspects of the family income security plan, and we continue to welcome suggestions in this area.

AIR TRANSPORT

ALLEGED FAILURE TO SUPPLY AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS WITH NECESSARY INFORMATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, in light of the urgency and very obvious difficulty involved, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether he can now clarify some of the confusion in respect of the air traffic controllers?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the investigation to which I referred yesterday, and which I ordered immediately the news items appeared, is still continuing. It not only includes conversations with representatives of the air traffic controllers but also a thorough examination of the procedures we are following in relation to the FAA in the United States. I have two interim memoranda from various officials who have been going into this matter. I realize, of course, that it is impossible for me at this stage to give a totally definitive answer, but I believe that two short excerpts may serve to clear the situation as it is now.

I have been advised that the officials have not been able to find any substance in the allegations in safety report No. 2 that on two occasions aircraft safety was jeopardized. I repeat, they have not been able to find any substance in it.

On another point, it has been established that Boeing 747 performance data and airspace separation data dictated by turbulence criteria were communicated to ATC units in January, 1970, and in fact Boeing 747 aircraft have been making use of Canadian airspace under Canadian control since approximately that date.

One final very brief observation I should like to make, with your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, is that officials of my department have reported to me that yesterday they asked the executive of the Air Traffic Controllers Association how the committee of consultation was working—I refer to the one I established and announced to the House two years ago—and the air controllers reported that they were quite pleased, that the meetings were much better than they had been in the past.

I can only say that the three things I put forward now to allay any fears will be followed up and I will make a full report to the House just as soon as the investigation is completed.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I am sure we welcome that statement but I feel it is hardly enough in view of the many procedural errors and confusion in recent years. May I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In order to avoid this type of confusion and the apprehension that arises when this type of error occurs, will the government now consider establishing an independent inquiry into matters of transportation rather than just air transportation alone? The Prime Minister has indicated he is willing to reply to the question in respect of the establishment of an independent inquiry. Perhaps he might be allowed to give us the benefit of his thoughts.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not answer immediately because I was consulting with the minister. The answer to the question is no. We feel the situation is under control and there is no interest to be served by stirring it up, as might perhaps be the intention.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—DECISION ON SITE FOR NEW FACILITY

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the apparently continuing confusion among the air traffic controllers at the Toronto airport because it would appear that the airport is surrounded by so many housing units, when will we have some information on where the new Toronto airport will be located? The present situation pinpoints the importance of constructing a new airport remote from present highly developed areas.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, without trying to shirk answering the question I can say, with respect, that it might more properly at this point be directed to the Minister of Transport for the province of Ontario to whom I have communicated the details of a specific proposal. I am now awaiting a response from him.

[Later:]

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the minister's announcement that he has made a single site proposal for a second Toronto region airport to the government of Ontario, I should like to ask when this proposal was made and how long he is giving the province to comment on it before the proposal is made public?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I did not set any deadline. To the best of my recollection the proposal was made about four weeks ago. The new Premier of Ontario asked for time to consider it. He wants to consider it himself and have it considered by his colleagues. I should think it reasonable to ask them next week how far they have progressed.

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF INQUIRY INTO DC-8 CRASH AT MALTON

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport when a reply will be made as to what steps the government is taking, if any, regarding the eight specific recommendations of the judicial inquiry into the crash of the DC-8 at Malton Airport, Toronto?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will allow the minister to reply to the hon. member's question and perhaps a supplementary question by the hon. member for Don Valley, and then recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member asked me if I would prepare a report at the time our estimates were being considered by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. This work is being done but because of the Easter recess I must confess I do not know what stage it has reached at this time. I will make some inquiries and get a reply for him as soon as possible.

FINANCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF CREDIT INSTITUTION FOR MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Does he intend to give a favourable answer to the request made by the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities that a credit body be created to finance cities and municipalities?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I did reply to the mayors and municipalities at the time of their submission and indicated that generally our view was that outside the number of programs we have set up over a period of time to assist in the financing of municipalities, we felt that the basic responsibility was within provincial jurisdiction. Some of the provinces have set up institutions to do the borrowing for their municipalities.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

EMPLOYMENT FORECAST BY ECONOMIC COUNCIL CHAIRMAN—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Does the government agree with the projection made by the chairman of the Economc Council of Canada that it will take three years for this country to reach full employment calculated on the basis of 4 per cent unemployment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau: I apologize, Mr. Speaker, I did not understand the question.

GOVERNMENT INTENTION REGARDING PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of his commitment to the House that the government's intention in respect of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act would be made known prior to its expiry on April 30, does the government intend to let the act expire on Friday next? Will he give us that assurance?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my promise to the House was that an announcement would be made before the end of the month, and that commitment still stands.

Mr. Douglas: At the same time, and prior to the end of the month, will the Prime Minister tell the House whether it is his intention to accede to the request of the premier of Quebec for permanent legislation, or can he assure the House now that the government is not going to proceed with permanent legislation and that present legislation on the statute books is adequate to deal with any situation which may arise?

Mr. Trudeau: That is not my understanding of what the premier of Quebec is requesting. Therefore I cannot answer the hypothetical question.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the Prime Minister said on March 12, in response to a question, that before the end of April the Parliament of Canada would be seized with this particular matter, is it his intention to limit government action in this matter to a statement only and, if so, will there be two statements, one by the Prime Minister and one by a spokesman for the rest of the cabinet?

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary and arises out of what the Prime Minister said. Has the premier of the province of Quebec asked for an extension of this act or for permanent legislation? If so, what has been the answer of the Prime Minister and the government to the premier who seems to be waiting for a reply to his letter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the premier is not really as worried as the hon. member. He wrote me several days ago asking what we were going to do. I have had some telephone conversations with him and my understanding of his position now is that he is not necessarily asking for the immediate enactment of further legislation.

Mr. Woolliams: Arising from that answer, as the premier is not asking for permanent legislation has he asked for an extension of the present act?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding he is not asking this but his statements have been made publicly and he has said nothing different publicly from what he has been telling me privately, and that is that he is not now asking for an extension of the present act.

Mr. Woolliams: Or any other act.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Joliette on a supplementary. However, I bring to the attention of hon. members that we are running out of time and a number of members are anxious to ask questions. I would seek the co-operation of the House in relation to supplementaries.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he is prepared to accede to the Quebec government's request concerning this legislation and whether his government is in favour of extending the present legislation.

Mr. Trudeau: As for my government's position, Mr. Speaker, I have already said a statement will be made in the House before the end of the month. However, it is rather strange that opposition parties, primarily the Progressive Conservative party, have expressed no opinion in this regard. We should be very pleased to know their views, if they have any.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

TIME OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the federal government yet prepared to introduce legislation to reform the family allowance system? If so, can the minister assure the House that the legislation will be introduced in time to be enacted by September of this year?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe I indicated to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we are welcoming proposals now. We indicated in the white paper that we hoped to have legislation before the House by April, I believe. I do not believe that is possible now, but it is our hope, as expressed, that we will have legislation as soon as possible and as soon as we have had ample opportunity to consider all views.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With the co-operation of the hon. member, perhaps the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot might be allowed a supplementary.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Monteith: I shall be very brief, Mr. Speaker. I take it then that the legislation will not be enacted in time to have it take effect in September?

Mr. Munro: I do not think that would be possible.

Can the minister indicate whether this problem is reaching a resolution and, if not, when does he anticipate it will?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I suppose the matter of freight rates in western Canada or in any part of Canada will never reach what the hon. member calls a resolution, but some easement or improvement of the situation I hope will result from the current talks. As to the timetable, I am afraid I cannot be specific other than to say I hope it will be within a matter of weeks.

Can he tell the House when something will be done about straightening up the mess of the small harbours administration on the Pacific coast along the lines of the report of Dr. Tom How?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I can only hope soon. There have been some complications with regard to the transfer of authority. As you know, we have been having conversations on the whole matter of port administration. While unfortunately in the past I have had to delay the time of announcement frequently, on this occasion I hope I can say I will be able to make it within a month.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): In answer to the latter question, no, Mr. Speaker. In reply to the question whether talks have resumed, the answer is yes. REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY AS TO SIGNING OF NEW AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—EFFECTS OF ACT ON NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. [Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I believe a speech would be needed to answer that question. If the matter deals merely with the renewal of the agreement, I hope that this will be done shortly, but I do not yet have any date in mind.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair has already sought the co-operation of hon. members regarding supplementary questions. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. John's East for one supplementary and then call on the hon. member for Annapolis Valley.

Mr. McGrath: I repeat my original question. When will the new agreements be signed—new, not renewed—and will the agreement with Newfoundland take into account the discriminatory effects on that province of the present Regional Development Incentives Act? It is a very simple question.

Will these officials then be sent to various centres across the country to teach other officials, and to what extent have they been given instructions to follow the proposals set out in the white paper?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, plans are being made to train staff once the bill is made public and also when the decisions of the House are available. WHEAT—PROPOSED ACREAGE PAYMENT—AVAILABILITY TO PRODUCERS WHO FAILED TO OBTAIN PERMIT BOOKS

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. It is in regard to the proposed acreage payment of $1.40 per cultivated acre as shown on last year's permit books of the producers. Will the minister ensure that there is no discrimination against those grain producers who, for different reasons, failed to take out permit books last year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the bill which will soon be before the House indicates eligibility for payments for permit-holders who had their permits by March 1.

Mr. Moore: Would the minister not agree that a different basis could be used, because is it not true that there is no law which says that a producer must take out a permit book?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the hon. member's supplementary is in the form of an argument and a submission.

WHEAT—PROPOSED ACREAGE PAYMENT—AVAILABILITY TO PRODUCERS WHO FAILED TO OBTAIN PERMIT BOOKS—APPEAL PROVISION

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): My question is supplementary to the one the hon. member for Wetaskiwin asked of the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. It concerns the possibility of an appeals provision being established in regard to the matter of qualification for the stabilization fund payments of producers who, in the past, have not had occasion to have permit books and who have been growing grain but in effect have been feeding it to livestock. Will an appeals procedure be set up for them?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): None is anticipated. I think it should be understood that the transitional payment is related to the stabilization fund which itself will be related to the marketing opportunities for grain, and therefore it is intended for those producers who are in the grain selling business.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Crouse: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Shore on a point of order.

Mr. Crouse: I wish to raise a point of order, Mr. Speaker, based on the reply given to my question by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. He indicated that funds would be made available for the summer training of students by the Fisheries Research Board. I have evidence before me which indicates that no funds have been made available for this type of training, and I would ask the minister to clarify this situation so that students—

I bring to his attention that a number of hon. members did not have an opportunity to ask their questions. Perhaps the hon. member might be given priority tomorrow to raise this matter by way of an original question.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING HOURS OF WORK, WAGES, VACATIONS, TERMINATION OF EMPLOYMENT, ETC.

The House resumed, from Tuesday, April 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackasey that Bill C-228, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is it understood that the minister's being called now will close the debate? I believe there was discussion in the House yesterday with regard to this matter. If there is no further discussion on the point, and the minister speaks now, he will close the debate. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my first words are to thank the members of the opposition for permitting me to close the debate at this time in order that we may go on to other legislation before six o'clock.

As is customary with legislation dealing with labour, Mr. Speaker, the debate has been marked by very constructive criticism of changes and additions to the Labour (Standards) Code as well as suggestions on how the bill could be improved at the committee stage. It has been noted by most speakers that while the bill does not amend or change to any great extent the standards that are incorporated in the present legislation, nevertheless in many areas the proposed changes are breaking new ground in this country.

I might recall for members who have not been present during the debate of the last couple of days that for the first time in the federal field we will be providing for severance pay, group termination, individual notice, maternity leave, equal pay for similar work and protection for workers against loss of employment as a result of garnishment of their wages. The differences of opinion, which were valid, of course, did not centre on whether we should include those features in the legislation which the House is being asked to adopt in principle but whether the changes proposed go far enough.

There has been criticism of the whole approach of the government to labour and I am not certain that these criticisms were expressed at the proper time on second reading. I might remind the House once again that a companion piece of legislation will be introduced later in the session which will deal with industrial relations; that is, it will deal exclusively with what we tend to call the organized sector of labour.

As I mentioned earlier in the debate, I think we all too frequently forget that approximately 60 per cent of the work force in Canada, and certainly more than 50 per cent in the federal field, is made up of workers who for the most part depend upon the standards and minimums—I emphasize the word "minimums"—that are introduced and passed in this House, rather than upon trade unions, craft unions or any other form of protection at the bargaining table.

In other words, the minimum wage, hours of work, conditions for drawing overtime and all the new provisions that I mentioned are now available to people in the unorganized sector of the economy as a result of legislation and not as a result of collective bargaining. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I must emphasize that the standards we are introducing and the standards we are amending, particularly in the minimum wage area, are meant to be precisely that—standards and minimums. It is not the intent as a general principle to run ahead of collective bargaining because that would be very unfair to the employer and to some degree unfair to those employees who do have the right to bargain collectively for conditions of employment.

There was some talk yesterday, Mr. Speaker, of the effect the minimum wage could have on our export position, but I have been unable to trace any such effect. As a matter of fact, in preparing this bill and in preparing myself for debate on various occasions, not only in this House but elsewhere, and considering the effect the minimum wage would have on the economy through the work force and its possible effect on employers and industry, I have been surprised, and disenchanted to some degree, at the lack of material available on the effect not only of the minimum wage but of termination, individual notice, and so forth.

There has been mention of the textile industry. Speaking for myself and not necessarily the government, I agree with the concept raised by some members of the House that labour should not resist technological change. I have always been an advocate of the concept that for our industries to remain competitive in the export field, labour and management must accept technological change, innovation and new methods of automation. While these may have the short-term effect of reducing a particular work force, in my opinion the end result is a more competitive industry. The studies which I have read, which are available in any library, indicate that our real competition in the textile industry—Japan and Korea—stems not primarily and exclusively from inexpensive labour in those countries but, rather, because these countries have taken advantage of the latest technology.

Having said that, and recognized that labour is on shaky ground in rejecting technological change, I think employers are also on shaky ground when asking labour to accept technological change for the good of the country, for the good of their children and grandchildren because change sometimes prevents the disappearance of an industry. I think employers should be prepared to minimize the effects of technological change and to give labour as much advance notice as possible of its introduction, with an opportunity to appreciate the end result. Labour should have a voice in the decision-making when technological change is to be introduced.

I was not aware of the effects on our Unemployment Insurance Department a year or two ago when it was found necessary to introduce computers into the operation because of the workload resulting from an increased work force. At first glance it meant the elimination of 800 jobs. But when I insisted, quite properly, as the minister charged with the basic responsibility in this area that positions be found for these 800 people, positions were found because the officials realized that they had to help in retraining those people on the job and to look after them in the sense that they had to be reclassified and helped with mobility grants. As the result of a little hard work and co-operation on the part of the work staff, all 800 people were absorbed by the unemployment insurance staff. When we reorganized our unemployment insurance structure in the future in order to improve the service to the people of this country, I hope this again will be the pattern—that we will not reduce our over-all strength but, on the contrary, we will probably add to it.

Without delving too deeply into the philosophy of minimum wages may I say that according to studies I have undertaken increased minimum wages, at one time or another, force companies into making bad decisions. They must decide on occasion whether they will pay increased minimum wages and remain inefficient, or reduce the work staff and introduce a greater degree of automation, thus placing their industry in a more competitive position. The result may be that the company concerned not only may remain in business but may expand its business. This is the concept I have alluded to and essentially I think it is an honest one.

May I say at this point that I agree that labour ought to accept technological change. I also believe that management has a responsibility to consult and negotiate, when it has arrived at a decision to introduce technological change, with the representatives of the work force and as a result of the ready acceptance of technological change labour may be redistributed, absorbed elsewhere or in some cases reduced. I think companies which have adopted this realistic approach have in most instances found labour to be very receptive and co-operative and I think the end results have been encouraging.

In going through some of the research material relating to the effects that minimum wages have on certain labour-intensive industries we usually find that one of several things happens. Surprisingly, one effect of the minimum wage is that it brings about greatly increased managerial competence, which results in higher productivity. Higher productivity makes it easy for the employer to accept or absorb the increased minimum wage. I am talking about industries which have traditionally depended upon inexpensive labour for their survival.

The increase in the minimum wage is quite often offset by increased managerial responsibility and efficiency. This usually results in increased productivity. Sometimes it results in a conscious decision on the part of management to automate plant in order to make it more efficient. As a result, the work force may be reduced temporarily but the economy is better off. In short, I have very little sympathy for businesses which are able to exist simply because there is a pool of cheap labour at their disposal. You will usually find that these industries hide behind high tariff walls. That is unfair to some parts of the country and does not strengthen our position as an exporting nation.

I am sure that when we get to the committee stage there will be the usual well-meaning amendments suggesting that the minimum wage be increased beyond the proposed $1.75. Perhaps what I am about to say will contradict what I have said previously. Having said, on the one hand, a minimum wage is most beneficial, I am also saying paradoxically that in increasing minimum wages in a federal state such as this I must be conscious of the effect that action will have on all the provinces. Our minimum wage law affects industries under federal jurisdiction that can better afford to pay the new, higher minimum wage than other industries. Here I am thinking of chartered banks, radio and television stations, trucking and industries like that. I am therefore not unmindful of the problems of the provinces.

It has been suggested that I am interested in raising the minimum wage because I want to become more popular. I suppose if I were to follow the logic of that argument I could become even more popular by bringing forward a minimum wage of $2, $2.25 or even $2.50 as the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) has been suggesting. I have a sense of responsibility which prompts me to take into consideration the problems of the provinces, particularly the Atlantic provinces where many small communities still engage in labour-intensive industries. Those industries do not lend themselves easily to automated methods of production or to technological change.

While I might like to see the minimum wage raised to $2, $2.25 or even $2.50 an hour if we were legislating in isolation from the other ten jurisdictions, nevertheless that cannot be done. I feel responsible for what happens in the provinces and I have a responsibility to the Ministers of Labour of the provinces—this has nothing to do with political backgrounds—not to distort beyond a reasonable limit wage patterns in industry. In other words, although traditionally industries under federal jurisdiction have paid higher minimum wages than in other industries, we do not want to go ahead so far ahead of the pack as to create embarrassing problems for some communities. That has been the experience in Manitoba. I do not wish to deal too stringently with the things that province has done because the debate so far has been moderate.

The government of Manitoba was elected because of its pro-labour concepts and its concern for people. Nevertheless, that province has had to set its minimum wage at a realistic level. They set it on the high side, which brought about the very real possibility that industries might move from Manitoba to other provinces where the minimum wage is considerably lower or where the distribution of goods is easier than in Manitoba. It is Utopian to set the minimum wage at $2, $2.25 or $2.50 an hour, but one cannot do that realistically and one must take into account the particular problems of each province.

Having said that, I am pleased to say that our minimum wage legislation has had the effect of forcing some of the more conservative members of the business community—I spell conservative with a small "c"—to realize that the minimum wage is really an instrument that can be used in the alleviation of poverty. It has been properly pointed out that you do not get rich if you are paid the minimum wage and it is very difficult, no matter how thrifty you are, to accumulate savings on a wage of $50 a week. Frequently wages paid are so low that people cannot live on them. Low wage rates encourage inefficient businesses and the continuation of cheap labour for certain employers. By permitting low wages we are really subsidizing those employers because their employees, not being able to live on their wages, need help which is often given in the form of supplements of some kind or welfare. Thus the taxpayer is made to subsidize those employers. In this way we are indirectly subsidizing inefficient management and underpaid labour.

Having said this, I propose that we stick to the minimum wage of $1.75 despite the eloquent arguments which have been advanced from all parties, including my own, for the minimum wage to be set at $2. The cost of any increase must be considered. A ten-cent increase in the minimum wage will bring about an additional cost of $2 million. To raise the minimum wage to $2 an hour would cost about $20 million. In reality we are proposing to increase the minimum wage from $1.25 to $1.75 in two stages and in a rather short period of time. On July 1 last the minimum wage was $1.25 and soon it will be $1.75.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question? Would he indicate whether the cost figures he referred to just now represent the cost to society as a whole or the cost to the government?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, speaking subject to correction because I do not have the figures in front of me, it is anticipated that this would be the increased cost to employers who would be asked to absorb the increase in the minimum wage.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mostly private employers.

Mr. Mackasey: As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, I have no particular brief for chartered banks, radio or television stations. If I have any reluctance to increase the minimum wage to more than the $1.75 it is because I am not unaware of the problems of the provinces, including the province of Manitoba, which at some point become realistic and appreciate the effects of minimum wages. Certain provinces may have many labour-incentive industries.

We discussed methods of an adjusting formula. At one time I said, when bringing in the minimum wage of $1.65, that I was hopeful of finding a suitable formula. We can discuss in the committee an acceptable formula that will not be too rigid. The problem is that these formulas have a tendency to work in two directions. Despite the amount of research and effort we in the department have put into it, we have yet to come up with a suitable formula. We have made it possible for the Governor in Council to make increases on the recommendation of the Minister of Labour to his colleagues. Some people have quite properly and gently pointed out the political ramifications of the power given to the Minister of Labour through the Governor in Council to increase the minimum wage a month before an election. I will be quite prepared to accept an amendment at the committee stage which will limit the amount I could increase it by, if someone from the opposition would like to introduce such a formula into the bill.

I will deal very briefly with the hours of work because this is one of the areas where there is a legitimate difference of opinion. This is one of the provisions in the old labour code. Part I basically states the concept that nobody in Canada should work more than 40 hours a week, and if he is obliged to work more than eight hours a day or 40 hours a week he should draw time and a half. That is a basic concept which I endorse and a philosophy which most people in my party endorse.

Employees can work as many as 48 hours a week without being in violation of the code. The problem is in particular industries—the running trades, the field of transportation, railways, shipping and airline industries. While this concept is Utopian and desirable, it is not practical. It is all right for members opposite to say that the code should be rigidly enforced. The first people who would complain if the code were rigidly enforced would be the trade unions of this country. I know this from representations which they have made.

What we are proposing to do with the new code is introduce a large degree of flexibility, as mentioned by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) in his very useful contribution. This bill will permit me for the first time to treat one segment of an industry different from another. In other words, there is no real logic in the shop crafts in the railways not being protected by this basic philosophy of eight hours a day, 40 hours a week. Their pattern is fairly uniform. This is true of a mechanic in the trucking industry who goes to work at eight o'clock and comes home at four or five o'clock, depending on the work pattern. There is no reason why the code should not be stringently enforced in these areas. Because it is virtually impossible to apply the code so narrowly in other areas of the trucking industry we have been unable to apply the code in those areas where it makes sense. The built-in flexibility in the bill will permit me to do precisely that.

One of the aggravations of the Minister of Labour, as was quite properly pointed out yesterday by members of the New Democratic Party, is that I seem to spend all my time signing exemptions from the code. After one more inquiry in each industry we propose to set up practical standards for the industry, that is, practical in the sense that if 60 hours is practical, then after representations from employees and employers this will become the standard of that segment of the industry where it makes sense. We must remember, of course, the necessity and importance of the companion piece of legislation, the safety code, where regulations are finally coming to completion after much prodding by interested members opposite.

We have to weigh the number of hours we will permit the transportation field, the trucking industry, to work. We have to couple this with the responsibility to society to make sure that a driver is working under the safest conditions and not running on pep pills or falling asleep at the wheel. The two must be balanced. Under the proposed legislation, which we can discuss in greater detail in committee, this will now be practical. This meets with the approval of the strong unions. I use the word "strong" numerically.

If one looks at the latest representations made by the association representing the railway employees he will see that on one page they recommend complete endorsation of the code and on the next page they say, "But we don't want it applied here". In other words, they would like to have their cake and eat it too. Any member who says that we should limit everyone's work week to 40 hours a week, eight hours a day, is not being realistic. I hate to say this. It may be desirable but it is not realistic. Nevertheless, the introduction of the code in 1965 and the adoption of the basic principle by this House has been good. In every industry, with one or two exceptions, we have been able to move from the practice that prevailed in 1965 to a much more enlightened and realistic position in 1971. In the airline, shipping and trucking industries we have been able to reduce the number of hours a person can work without sleep, etc. Rather than the exercise being considered futile, it has been very useful.

There have been many favourabe comments about the concept of equal pay for similar work. Some members more knowledgeable than I, know that legislation introduced in the late fifties attempted to do this. The weakness in that legislation was that the onus was on the alleged aggrieved person to instigate an investigation. Few people were that brave, especially when jobs for women were, and still are, scarce in many industries. Women were reluctant to bring to the attention of the department a formal complaint of alleged discrimination in the field of equal pay for equal work. This will now be rectified. That act will be eliminated and this facet of labour legislation will be introduced into the code.

The basic change will be the added responsibility assumed by our inspectors. They now visit employers under federal jurisdiction and check on wages, hours of work and other features of the code. They will have the added responsibility and duty of digging out these forms of discrimination as indicated by the payroll. By using the term "similar work" we are reducing the possibility of the odd reactionary employer to circumvent the law by saying that the work done by females is not quite equal.

Some hon. members delved into the area of general discrimination against women in the work force. This is more properly treated under the fair employment practices bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is nodding his head, recognizing his own contribution about the possibility of discrimination in an industry predominantly male or female. He was in reality talking about the provisions that should be included in the fair employment practices bill which will be before the House perhaps this fall and certainly no later than next spring. It will be a companion piece of legislation. The two pieces of legislation cover equal pay for similar work, which will be in the present code, and the fair employment practices bill which will eliminate discrimination practiced against anybody, not just women, discrimination against race, colour, creed or sex.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As long as you are working on it.

Mr. Mackasey: The government is working very hard on it. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) referred to the question of public servants. In our department we are working very closely with the appropriate minister and officials in the public service to make certain that this change in the labour code and the present fair employment practices act is applied a little more assiduously and with a little more vigour than has been the case in the public service in the past. As has been mentioned in the debate, Mr. Carson and others who are knowledgeable of the public service have admitted that perhaps we have not been as assiduous as we should have been, but if any of them are listening now they may take my word that we intend to increase our activities in this field and make sure there is no discrimination being practiced in the public service, at least in those areas over which we have jurisdiction.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I do not intend to get into a discussion on equal pay. We can do this when we get to committee. As to the question of annual vacation, let me say I never ridicule the suggestions made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We admit that his suggestions are based, usually, on his convictions and they are usually reflected in the private bills he has brought into the House for many years. He has urged that rather than make provision for two weeks' holiday after five years' employment, the figure should be increased to three weeks. This sounds like a very simple change, but I have approached the whole concept of standards in its relation to the organized sector of the work force.

I happen to be one who thinks this country would be better off if more of the work force were unionized, and for this reason I am not anxious for labour standards to destroy collective agreements or run ahead of the results of collective bargaining. A study of collective agreements carried out by our research branch discloses that less than 25 per cent of the workers covered by such agreements are entitled to three weeks' holiday after five years. If we were to introduce such a requirement across the board we would be destroying collective bargaining.

Those who understand the collective bargaining process know that a group will often settle for two weeks' holiday rather than three weeks or four weeks in return for something they believe to be more beneficial, perhaps better sick leave arrangements or higher rates of pay. Nothing in a collective agreement can be studied in isolation, so I am reluctant to accept an amendment such as the hon. member proposed, for the reason that it runs contrary to provisions in many of the collective agreements. Moreover, the whole bill is based on minimum standards. The same is true of general holidays, although I am not convinced I am on as good a ground statistically here as I am in connection with the three weeks' holiday proposal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So we can count on your support on that one.

Mr. Mackasey: I did not say that. It is just that my mind is a little more open on that one. The concept of maternity leave has been well accepted by everybody in the House. Again, it fits in nicely with the proposal in Bill C-229 amending the Unemployment Insurance Act. The period of time, 17 weeks, is of course identical with the provision made in the Unemployment Insurance legislation when one counts the two weeks' waiting period and 15 weeks' insurance.

The proposal here is that the employer be obliged to provide maternity leave for 17 weeks. This is one of the reasons we are definite about the way in which those 17 weeks are to be made up. Some speakers have suggested the arrangement ought not to be so rigid. We are not providing a holiday. Under the Unemployment Insurance Act we are interested in providing income to more than one million women in the work force who work because they have to work, because their wage or salary means the difference between poverty and a decent income.

Here we are seeking to provide maximum protection for the mother and the child. We would be defeating that purpose if we allowed a woman to determine herself how the 17 weeks should be broken up—whether it should be two weeks before confinement and 15 weeks after, or whether it should be 15 weeks before confinement and two weeks after, for example. The studies which have come out of the ILO, carried out in conjunction with the medical profession, indicate that the ideal circumstances for people in general—not, of course, for every individual—are those provided in the formula we have proposed, that is, the nine weeks and the six weeks. Of course, we have added two extra weeks so as to be consistent with the provisions of the unemployment insurance legislation. We cannot leave it up to the mother to decide how these 17 weeks should be broken up if we are to be consistent in our concern for her health and the health of what one might call the new addition.

One of the areas in which I found a real scarcity of information and research involved the question of group termination. I do not intend to take too long discussing this question. One document which I would recommend to all hon. members who are interested in the subject is a document which was published recently by the research department of the Western Business School and the Ontario Department of Labour. To my surprise—this shows I do not know everything—I find it was financed in part by the federal Department of Labour. It is worthwhile reading.

What these researchers have done is to study objectively the effect advance notice had on a particular group of employees in London, Ontario. Hon. members may recall the decision by Kelvinator to cease operations in Canada entirely. Advance notice was given and there was also severance pay. One of the conditions of receiving it was that workers were to remain on the job despite the fact that advance notice had been given. In the event, the workers did stay on the job in order to get the severance pay.

I shall not even read the conclusion of the report because it would take too long, but summarized very briefly the conclusion was—and this is substantiated by similar studies undertaken in the United States—that advance notice is really meaningful provided the full services of federal and provincial manpower departments and other agencies are given an opportunity to take effect. The irony of this is that the unions, despite many of their statements, are hardly progressive in this field. They failed in this case to co-operate with the departments of manpower, federal or provincial, in the attempt to find work for those affected during the advance period, or to arrange for retraining.

I would appreciate it if some of the labour critics in the House would look at this short but important study. It would indicate that measures to deal with the results of group termination of employment are much more effective if both sides involved, management and employees, accept the services of the proper agencies in order that the people concerned may find new jobs more easily.

One of the sections of the report speaks of the hardship caused by shutdowns of this type to a predictable group of people in the work force, persons over 50, persons whose skills are no longer required. They are virtually paralyzed, without any real chance of being reabsorbed into the work force. This means that the government must assume its responsibility—as I think we have in the case of the textile industry to a limited degree—to provide some income for those who are out of work often for reasons over which they have no control, perhaps as a result of a decision by a corporation whose headquarters are a thousand miles away to close down a branch plant in this country. There has been legitimate criticism with regard to the amendment specifying 50 employees. I believe that in the course of honest discussion during the committee stage we could perhaps vary the figure in such a way as to relate it to the size of the community in which a lay-off takes place. I am flexible in this area and look forward to the observations of hon. members.

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) made a very effective speech yesterday. He was a little concerned, as he had the right to be, about the powers at my disposal through the regulations made pursuant to the bill. I have just outlined one of the reasons I need these regulations, in order to make these provisions as flexible as possible—not to help the employer but to make the bill as practicable as possible, something that perhaps was not provided for in 1965.

With regard to individual termination, I think the two weeks that we have suggested is quite in order with private bills that I have studied and quite in order with the findings of the study to which I have made reference, and is sufficient advance notice to enable Manpower to look after the problems of one individual. Taken in conjunction with the provisions of holiday and severance pay, the period is certainly long enough and pretty much in line with the provisions in collective agreements.

Severance pay provisions have been criticized because some hon. members felt they did not go far enough. I suppose such criticism is logical in that in the eyes of some people we never go far enough. I do not mean this sarcastically, but the important thing here is not so much that the provisions do not go far enough but that we have them at all. To the best of my knowledge this is the only Labour (Standards) Code in North America that includes provisions relating to severance pay. So that while hon. members may say the five-year qualifying period is too long, or that the provision of two days' pay for every year's service is insufficient, the fact remains that we have broken new ground with this piece of legislation and we can study it again in depth in committee.

Finally, in discussing garnishment, there is no use belabouring the point. I suppose the general feeling in the House is that in all probability we should have made provision for this a long time ago. I understand that more than one suggestion has been made that another minister look at the concept of garnisheeing wages with a view perhaps to obliterating this social evil entirely.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question so as to make clear one point that has not been referred to at all in the course of this debate? In view of the fact that the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, which were tabled a few days ago by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) include a consolidation of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, the Canada Labour (Safety) Code, the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and three or four other labour acts into one massive statute called the Canada Labour Code, may we assume that at the end of the process this bill will in fact amend that consolidated Canada Labour Code?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to assume anything. The hon. gentleman is asking me a question regarding an area he is much more knowledgeable about than I am. This could be the end result and I might presume that the question is really the answer. I can find out if I can enlighten the House.

Yesterday one hon. member on this side made a contribution in the wrong debate. I do not endorse anything he said. The hon. member said we had no labour policy in this House. Our policy is one of fair play to all Canadians no matter whether they are in the work force or on the employer's side. I am prepared to debate this with my colleague when the appropriate piece of legislation is before the House later this session.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING AGENCIES BILL

ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL MARKETING COUNCIL AND AGENCIES

The House resumed, from Tuesday, April 27, consideration of Bill C-176, to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture, and motion No. 1 (Mr. Horner).

Mr. Speaker: Before calling on the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) to resume the remarks he was making last evening in connection with the motion now before the House, I might make some brief remarks in connection with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Crowfoot in regard to the possible grouping of the motions.

The hon. member suggested that motions Nos. 1, 5 and 22 be grouped as one and that debate on motion No. 1 cover at the same time motions Nos. 5 and 22. Though it had not appeared to the Chair originally that this might be the logical way to debate the matter, on reconsideration and after studying the argument made by the hon. member last evening this would appear to be a reasonable suggestion and I can see no objection to the grouping suggested by the hon. member for Crowfoot. I believe he also suggested that there be a separate vote on each motion, and with that the Chair is prepared to agree.

It has also been brought to my attention that it has been suggested that motion No. 26 not be grouped with motions Nos. 24 and 25, as had been proposed by the Chair. Again, I would think that this suggestion would be a reasonable one and that motions Nos. 24 and 25 which stand in the name of the hon. member for Crowfoot be considered as one, that motion No. 26, which stands in the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) be considered separately, and that there be separate votes on each of these three motions.

I see the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicating that he would like to comment on this suggestion of the Chair and I will recognize him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my comment is very brief. I simply wish to say that with the change Your Honour has suggested regarding motion

No. 26, the entire line-up of these 30 motions which you have set out meets with our approval.

Mr. Speaker: Then that is agreed and so ordered. I might suggest to the House that the voting procedures will have to be changed in that motions Nos. 5 and 22 will have to be called with the first group of motions on which there will be divisions. It had been suggested by the Chair that the vote on motions Nos. 5 and 22 be taken later. Are hon. members agreeable to this suggestion?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. I do not know whether it ought to be raised now or when we reach motion No. 9. On reading Hansard I noted that the comment was made that all of the amendments were considered to be in order with the exception that some reservation was expressed about motion No. 30. I should like to draw to Your Honour's attention that motion No. 9 was in fact moved in the committee and declared to be out of order because it exceeded the recommendation of the Governor General. I wonder whether you would take that point into consideration in deciding whether motion No. 9 is in order here.

Mr. Speaker: The minister recognizes, of course, that the Chair is not bound by a ruling which may have been made in committee. If when motion No. 9 is reached the minister wishes to raise this point, he can reserve the right at this time to raise it by way of a point of order and the decision might then be taken whether the motion should be put and debated. For the moment the Chair is required, under the rules, to put motions Nos. 5 and 22, which are to be considered together with motion No. 1.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) moves motion No. 5 as follows:

That Bill C-176, an act to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, be amended by deleting paragraph (ii) of subclause (g) of clause 2 at page 3.

The motion will, of course, be put later. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) also moves motion No. 22 as follows:

• (3:50 p.m.)

That Bill C-176, an act to establish the National Farm Products Marketing Council and to authorize the establishment of national marketing agencies for farm products, be amended

(a) by adding to subparagraph (ii) paragraph (a) of subclause (1) of clause 18 the word "such" after the word "any" at line 13, page 12 and by deleting from the subparagraph all the words after the word "proclamation" at line 14; and

(b) by adding to subparagraph (ii) paragraph (a) of subclause (2) of clause 18 the word "such" after the word "any" at line 6, page 13 and by deleting from the subparagraph all the words after the word "proclamation" at line 7.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks last evening I drew attention to the fact that I did not want to proceed with this item at a time when neither the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) nor the chairman of the agricultural committee were in attendance. I felt an important bill such as this should not be proceeded with unless one of the authorities responsible for bringing it before the House was present to take part in the debate or to at least listen to the remarks of hon. members.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

One hears a great deal about Bill C-176, particularly that it is an all-powerful piece of legislation which takes much of the decision-making from the farmers and gives it to the government. It is interesting to note what was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at a Liberal party meeting back in 1963. He said that power is what they are interested in. The only kick allowed is that which comes from a donkey. Some say it does not matter. He also said at that time: Say anything and think anything you like, but put us in power because we are best suited to govern.

As a result of this bill in the name of the Minister of Agriculture it is interesting to note how quickly the Prime Minister has changed from an NDP supporter to a Liberal supporter. He wants power and he does not want anybody to interfere with this power. When the Minister of Agriculture attempted to interfere by removing cattle from the coverage of this bill he was not allowed to do so because the Prime Minister did not want it. Last night I referred to proceedings No. 7 of the committee, page 18, where the minister is reported as having said:

On September 16, 1970, I quote:

12. The first ministers also considered current problems which were being encountered in the interprovincial marketing of certain agricultural products.

13. The conference received a report that Bill C-197, the farm products marketing agencies bill which is at present before Parliament, would enable national marketing boards to be established which could help to meet the marketing problems being encountered. It was noted that the bill would provide for delegation of both federal and provincial authority to the marketing boards. It was observed also that while Bill C-197 had been generally agreed to by provincial Ministers of Agriculture, the federal government was ready at this time to consider suggestions which provinces might wish to offer for amendments to the bill. It was the consensus also that it would be appropriate for the bill to exclude beef cattle from the jurisdiction of such marketing agencies.

I emphasize these words to make it abundantly clear that the provinces agreed to this bill under certain conditions. One of the conditions was that cattle would be excluded. In my amendment I suggest that all products be excluded from the provisions of legislation until such time as the provinces agree. This would then in a true sense be enabling legislation: it would be there for use only if the producers wanted to use it.

The Prime Minister stated quite clearly in his Winnipeg speech that there must be agreement with the province regarding jurisdiction in marketing under this legislative proposal. There is no unanimity by the provinces regarding this bill. Representatives of Newfoundland informed the committee that this bill was ultra vires and they wanted no part of it. Mr. Thatcher said that so long as he was in office in Saskatchewan no part of Bill C-176 would be used in that province. Mr. Strom of Alberta suggested that red meat should be excluded from the bill. Manitoba is taking the whole matter to the Supreme Court of Canada which has now agreed to hear the case, and other governments have until May 21 to file their arguments in support of Manitoba's case.

There is no unanimity among the provinces in respect of this legislation, yet this government intends to proceed with it at a time when the department of information is sponsoring literature which suggests that Canada and Canadians must stand together and understand together. Can the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) honestly say they understand the position of Manitoba, when that province has to go to the Supreme Court of Canada for understanding and justice? The article to which I have referred suggests that we cannot bring Canada together by building fences around regions. I suggest that Bill C-176 allows for the building of fences around certain regions. My amendments Nos. 1, 5 and 22 would help tear down the fences this bill will allow to be constructed.

Some may say that I am misrepresenting the facts and that there will be no fences. They may suggest this is all in my imagination. Let me read what the deputy minister said about fences being built, as reported in committee proceedings No. 39, page 45 as follows:

I think if one changed it to the conditional what you are saying, sir, is perfectly correct; it could be. I do think of necessity that it will be. When I say that, if the Governor in Council wishes to extend that power to them, an agency can have authority to exercise control over products moving from an unregulated area into a regulated area.

He went on to say:

"We are not going to allow you to expand the movement into our market on an unlimited base." Probably what they would say to them would be something that might be similar to our GATT arrangements—

The Deputy Minister of Agriculture suggested to the Committee on Agriculture that the regions of Canada might require trade agreements similar to GATT. If that is the case we can hardly say this is one country. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) said in this House and across the country that Canada is actually composed of 10 countries under one nation. If that is true we can look forward to very difficult times. If we have any intention of remaining united we will find ourselves in difficulty as a result of measures of this kind. This is what Mr. Uskiw, Minister of Agriculture for Manitoba, had to say on this point: it is to be found at page 26 of proceedings No. 17:

Let me say, as I mentioned earlier, that we did have discussions with the minister from Quebec. To what extent the trade has been involved with their counterparts in eastern Canada I do not know. That is another vehicle. However, again may I point out to you that I am not at all happy about accepting the principle of having to negotiate one's way into a Canadian market.

I suggest he does not have much hope. If we are one country we should be able to move freely between the various regions. We should be able to take our cattle and our money freely between the various regions and to move our produce freely between them, if this is one country. This bill will compound the problem of unity within our country. It is interesting to note that the question is before the Supreme Court. This debate should not proceed until the Supreme Court has ruled on whether we are one country or ten countries as the hon. member suggests. As recorded at page 134 of committee proceedings No. 43, the minister had this to say on the subject:

It could be if it was moving into an area that was regulated.

The minister was answering a question I had asked as to whether the movement of products would be affected when being moved into another area for export. After the minister replied I said, "Yes, it may be affected". Then the minister said, "Yes". The transcript continues:

Mr. Horner: In other words then it may not be all that permissive.

Mr. Olson: Well it is permissive to the extent that I have explained previously.

Mr. Horner: Yes, to the extent that you have explained previously, but not completely permissive. If a province does not want to go in, it may well be affected by others going in.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, quite obviously if a number of provinces agreed to a national marketing plan to regulate the product within that region that some other region could not be expected to have complete free access to that market outside of the marketing agency.

In other words, he admits that if an agency is set up to encompass a portion of Canada, then the produce from the unregulated area cannot move into another area. This immediately sets up regions within Canada. As recorded at page 67 of committee proceedings No. 35, in answer to a question put by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) who was pursuing a certain line of questioning the minister said:

Mr. Chairman, the provisions for what Mr. Mazankowski has raised are provided in clause 18 which is, indeed, the contents of the proclamation establishing an agency and giving that agency the powers by an act of the Governor in Council. Of course, if every province in Canada wants an iron-clad guarantee that they can opt out of the plan if a plan is in effect and still sell all of their products into any other part of Canada without any obstruction at all is the position that they would be in in the event that no province had any marketing legislation. We know that the situation is that the provinces have and some of them are exercising their authority very severely now.

He is quite correct. The report continues:

Mr. Mazankowski: Is it constitutional, though?

Mr. Olson: Of course, that is an argument that the courts will decide.

He immediately admits that the courts must decide this question. Why are we occupying time in the agricultural committee and in this House on a matter which will be decided by the courts? I understand the arguments have to be filed by May 21. We should not be proceeding with this matter. We all know there has been a great deal of debate on this bill. What does the report of the agricultural task force say about this? This passage appears at page 320:

One posible kind of national marketing board is a national producer-controlled agency created by provincial marketing boards.

This is exactly what this bill attempts to do. The report goes on to give an explanation of how it might work:

A formula might be devised to share expansion in each provincial market, perhaps according to growth in population or to give greater self-sufficiency provincially.

It continues:

> Economically, this system is likely to be a disaster. Balkanizing the economy into ten sub-economies and preventing the shift of production to those areas in which it can be carried out most cheaply and most profitably.

This is a very interesting statement. This is exactly what the bill is doing: it will balkanize the country and create regions and barriers within the country. It is interesting to note what the newspapers have to say. Here is an item which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press Weekly of February 13. The headline reads: "C-176 not for producers". Here is another in the Western Producer of February 11: "Western groups list objections to national marketing bill terms". The article lists the number of people who are opposed. The Manitoba Co-operator states that Bill C-176 in its present form is a document that could perpetuate and accentuate regional differences and destroy the basic economy of Manitoba. What did the minister say at Purdue University, Indiana? I have here an editorial which appeared in the Country Guide for April, 1971. It reads as follows:

> Federal agricultural minister H. A. "Bud" Olson, speaking at a meeting at Purdue University, Lafayette, Ind.: "Reduced to its simplest terms, the legislation would allow provincial marketing agencies to delegate their powers to a national agency. By the same token, the federal government could delegate its authority, including the power to control trade between provinces, to the national agency.

Is the province of Quebec prepared to delegate its power to a national agency? Is Bill Stewart, the Minister of Agriculture, prepared to delegate his power to a national agency over which he has no control? I doubt it very much. Today we see the provinces trying to protect that which is theirs. The national government, under this power-hungry Prime Minister, is seeking more and more power: the Minister of Agriculture admits it in this article.

Is the federal government really delegating its power to a national agency? It is not. It is appointing the national agency, so, actually the agency is part and parcel of the federal government. Therefore, the federal government really is not delegating its power, but the provincial governments will be delegating their power. If in June the Supreme Court should uphold the Manitoba case to the effect that there shall be free trade in Canada and that no province can interfere with it, there will not be one province which will agree with this bill. Why should they? Their trade would then move and no one could interfere with it. I say this bill should be held up and not debated until we know exactly the situation in respect of interprovincial trade. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East had something to say about this as recorded in the Canadian Poultryman for January, 1971. He said:

> The government presented a poorly-drafted bill.

Never was a truer word spoken by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. The article continues:

> The producers have succeeded in preventing more comprehensive amendments.

The matter is being discussed in the courts and by people all across Canada. It is being discussed by the apple growers in British Columbia and by the apple growers in Nova Scotia. The bill should be held up until the whole question is settled. I have endeavoured to understand the government persistence. As I said earlier, the only rationalization I can find for the government's persistence in this regard is that it wants power: power is the only thing the Prime Minister and the government want. He is now a full member of the Liberal party as he saw it in 1963—power-hungry, reaching out for more power and taking power from the provinces through this legislation under the guise that he will then regulate everything. It is something like a farmer telling his son, "I will give you no money. Leave all the money with me and I will dole it out wisely." This never satisfies the son. When the provinces really understand this legislation they will not be satisfied with it either.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, welcome this opportunity to comment on Bill C-176, particularly on the first amendment that has been moved following its return to the House from the standing committee. However, I am in a bit of a quandary because it seems to me there were assertions made about motives and that sort of things respecting certain witnesses, and indeed certain hon. members, in connection with things which it is suggested took place during the committee hearings.

I am not sure whether it is appropriate for members of the House to reflect on what has taken place in committee, particularly in that respect, because if this is to be a practice that is undertaken by some committees I am sure, Mr. Speaker, you would agree it is open to all members of the House to take the same position with respect to that kind of procedure. I am not raising a point of order about it now, but I take it from the comments made that we will probably get into that situation and I think it will be regrettable if we do.

Mr. Horner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the committee proceedings, the committee studied a bill and its proceedings then became available to all members of the House. Many hon. members may have wished to take part in the debate in the committee but were not able to do so because of prior allotment of their time to other committees. Therefore it behooves me to suggest that what the minister is saying would disallow discussion on what took place in the committee. Surely it is the duty of committee members to enlighten all members of the House on what went on in the committee and the arguments raised in the committee.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has completely missed the point. I think it is one of the long-standing rules of the House that no member may reflect on the vote or indeed on the motives of any other hon. member, whether the member was voting in the House or in committee. But in any event I am not going to raise a fuss—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret interrupting the minister, and I know he did not raise this as a point of order. I appreciate the point raised by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), and both hon. members have indicated some concern. Frankly, the Chair was not very concerned about the remarks of the hon. member for Crowfoot because I do not think that in them there was a reflection on decisions made by hon. members in committee or a reflection on the motives of hon. members. If such had been the case, I think the hon. member for Crowfoot would have been out of order. My impression was that he made some comments on the evidence given to the committee and I think he was generally in order. I thank the minister for raising this point and I know hon. members will wish to keep it very much in mind.

Mr. Olson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This bill has received very extensive consideration in the agricultural committee. You will recall that there was some consideration of essentially the same bill in the last session of Parliament. Something like 37 agencies appeared before the committee to give their views, and then of course there were meetings across the country. The evidence taken and the record of the committee proceedings runs to almost 3,000 pages. I might add, Mr. Speaker, that 36 amendments were accepted by the committee since Bill C-176 was referred to it by the House.

Now I wish to make one or two general comments. In so far as the need for the provisions of Bill C-176 is concerned, the argument has been made in this House and in many other places across the country that the bill will contribute to the balkanization of the country and, indeed, to setting up trade barriers between provinces. I say, with great respect and deference to those who make that assertion, that the whole purpose of Bill C-176, the desired end result and the objective are exactly the opposite of that suggestion. The purpose of the bill is to provide a means whereby the provinces can in fact get together and work out a plan that is acceptable to all the provinces, bearing in mind that all the provinces have legislation on their books dealing with the orderly marketing of farm products, and to make it possible for the federal government to delegate some of the authority it has with respect to the interprovincial movement of agricultural products so that marketing orders, wherever they may be made, will be applied uniformly on all sides of provincial borders.

This argument ignores one very essential point, and that is that all the provinces now have this legislation on their books. And indeed we cannot ignore what has happened in the past few months, the application of such legislation on the books not only by Ontario and Quebec but by many other provinces respecting the two commodities with which there is presently the greatest difficulty, eggs and broiler chickens. This has now happened and we cannot ignore what has happened and what is likely to happen.

Indeed, Ministers of Agriculture meeting more than two years ago indicated they were afraid that unless concerted action was taken across the country under the aegis of federal legislation, the situation in which we find ourselves today respecting some agricultural products would arise. What is more, Mr. Speaker, within the last few days we find further indications of an escalation of this situation by the passing of more severe marketing orders respecting these two products, as well as an indication by some provincial officials that the situation will probably escalate to other products and will not necessarily be confined to agricultural products.

That is the problem with which we are faced, and for hon. members or members of the public generally to suggest that Bill C-176 is going to balkanize the country, when that is exactly what is going on now in the absence of a national marketing act that will provide the legal basis upon which a co-operative framework can be laid, is a contradictory argument. Without saying anything more about that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend a few minutes discussing some advertising that has been taking place.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) referred to some advertising. I note that he has also been responsible for getting some advertising into a number of papers across the country. One of the ads—this is the one which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on April 22—carried the same format as a number of others that have appeared in other papers. The advertisement states—

Mr. Horner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear the minister but I am informed that he said I was responsible for some ads being placed in papers, particularly in the Ottawa Citizen. I want to make it abundantly clear that I am not in any way responsible. I consulted no papers. I know of the ads he speaks of because my office is being bombarded with coupons, and I am glad to serve the farmers in any way I can. I am not responsible for the ads at all. I am not financing them, nor am I in any way responsible for their wording or their being placed in the papers. I want to make that abundantly clear.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the ad I hold in my hand is dated April 22, the Ottawa Citizen. After many other things appear the words: "Mail to Jack Horner, MP, Ottawa".

Mr. Horner: On this point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Crowfoot has indicated to the minister and hon. members of the House, if I can paraphrase him, that he was not responsible for the ad. The Chair does not assess the significance of it, but I think hon. members will accept the word of the hon. member for Crowfoot.

Mr. Horner: On that point of order, Mr. Speaker, I know from my experience in campaigning that when an ad is placed in a newspaper it has to be stated somewhere in it who is responsible for it. The minister has the ad before him. In order to clear my name—I find my name in the newspapers a lot these days; sometimes I wish it were not, but in this case I am glad it is there because I am prepared to serve the farmers in any way I can—I wonder if the minister would read who is responsible for the ad.

Mr. Olson: I am prepared to table the ad, Mr. Speaker. It does not say anywhere who is responsible for it. The headline reads: "All Ontario Farmers!" It deals with a lot of erroneous arguments and at the bottom it says: "Mail to Jack Horner, MP, Parliament Buildings, Ottawa". There are some other names but it does not say who they are or what they are doing. It doesn't say that they inserted it or that it is being sponsored by them. There are the names, "Maurice McCallum—Carp" and "Omer Beriault—Green Valley", and it says: "Representing a group of farmers". It does not say who put the ad in the newspaper or that they sponsor it. Anyway, I accept the hon. member's assertion that he is not responsible for these ads.

Mr. Ricard: You tried it and did not succeed, Mr. Minister.

Mr. Horner: I will give you the coupons.

Mr. Olson: I have a few coupons too. I want to deal with the substance of the ad, if I may. It reads that this policy "inevitably leads to total and arbitrary government control". The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that the bill provides that no agency will be established unless a majority of the producers of the commodity wish it.

Mr. Horner: How is that majority determined?

Mr. Olson: That is specifically stated in clauses 7 and 17 of the bill which provide a wide range of the type of agencies, from those solely involved in promotion to those which come under provincial legislation to control production—that is, under the delegation of provincial authority. The nature of the agency will depend upon the plan that is negotiated between the provinces and the federal government. Producers will decide whether they like a plan, because Bill C-176 itself does not provide for production controls. This bill does not give authority for production controls in any way, shape or form. It says what the marketing agencies may administer, but no attempt is made to give authority to those marketing boards nor to give them the right to control production. The reason is that this is entirely under provincial authority—

Mr. Horner: Read clause 2(d) of the bill.

Mr. Olson: —and at the present time all provinces have acts that provide for this. Dealing with the amendments before us now, in motions Nos. 1, 5 and 22 there are no exemptions from provincial legislation of any specific commodity whether it be beef, pork, apples, potatoes or anything else. Another point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, concerns the statement in this ad that "government appointees shall set prices of farm products without negotiations with farmers." The bill provides that the make-up of the agency will be as set out in the plan; thus, it could be by farmer election or any other method that is accepted in the plan. Indeed, there are other places where the committee did in fact strengthen it. We knew it was going to be that way without it being articulated, but the committee spelled out that there must be a majority of producers both on national council and in the marketing agencies.

The next point I wish to deal with is where the ad asks: "Why are there no import controls in C-176? Because imports are the regulator of the farmer's price..." Mr. Speaker, import controls are not provided in Bill C-176 because ample authority exists in other legislation. There are other matters I could deal with in this respect, Mr. Speaker, but I shall not take up any more time on it. I hope that my remarks convey to some degree how inaccurate the assertions in this ad have been and the extent to which they have misled farmers all across the country. I hope these people will realize that they have done a very great disservice to the farming community.

The amendment before us would place in jeopardy the meaning of an agricultural product since it proposes to delete all the words after "agriculture". I do not believe I can accept this amendment because it would remove those words which are used to clarify but not to restrict the term "farm product".

Amendment No. 5 which is also before us would delete paragraph (ii) of subclause (g) of clause 2. If this were accepted, in effect it would allow an agency authorized to operate within seven provinces to exercise its power in all ten provinces. We made it very clear that we do not intend to impose this and indeed I am not even sure that we could if a province did not agree. This paragraph was introduced to ensure that the agency could only exercise its powers, (a) with respect to production produced within the area of its jurisdiction, and (b) within its area respecting production produced elsewhere in Canada outside its jurisdiction. I think there is need for the latter power because it is only with respect to entry into the region, and only then should circumstances arise which would make it evident that there was an attempt to circumvent the purpose of the agency within the designated region. There has been argument about this with respect to amendment No. 5. I suggest that it would completely frustrate the purpose, and that is one of the main reasons why provincial legislation by itself has been insufficient to cope with the situation.

When the marketing orders and the application of that legislation is confined to a very small area or a restricted area, then of course there are ways of circumventing and therefore frustrating the purpose of the provincial government. We want to make sure this does not happen. The argument that some provinces other than those which have joined in a marketing plan ought to have open, complete and free access to the market that is being regulated under a plan agreed to by other provinces completely negates the purpose or some of the solutions which Bill C-176 is designed to correct.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, since I suspect that there will be several other opportunities to speak on the amendments before the House may I say a word or two about the other amendments included in the group which we are discussing. The amendments contained in paragraphs (a) and (b) of motion No. 22 seek to inhibit the successful operation of an agency. They propose that an agency may not be given authority to protect its operation from those who are outside the designated area and operating in a manner that is designed to circumvent that scheme.

I think it must be appreciated that this subparagraph of clause 18 is written in such a manner as to provide authority to the Governor in Council to set out in a proclamation whether or not an agency shall have authority to deal with products from outside the designated region. Written in this fashion, it allows the Governor in Council to give or to withhold such power. Furthermore, it gives the Governor in Council the opportunity to indicate to what extent such authority may be given respecting products produced outside the designated area. So, Mr. Speaker, we must be vigilant.

In bringing forward a plan that will work for the orderly marketing of the particular product of a majority of farmers, we must be vigilant in case we leave loopholes by which other farmers may benefit as a result of circumventing the purposes of the act or its administration, thereby being put in a favourable position because they are able to do their marketing in isolation from conditions which the overwhelming majority of farmers have approved. Having made these comments may I say that so far as I am concerned I do not think we should accept the amendments in the group now under discussion.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the proposals in this bill received a great deal of amendment and consideration in the standing committee over a long period of time. They were first considered when introduced in the former bill and were subsequently considered when introduced in Bill C-176.

At the outset may I say that one of the unfortunate aspects of the situation is the time when the bill was presented to the House for consideration. By that I do not mean that the government deliberately picked the time; I do not know whether they did or not. The fact is that the bill came forward to Parliament and to the standing committee for consideration when agricultural marketing in this country was in a turmoil and when the marketing of agricultural products was being interfered with by provincial governments and agencies of provincial governments.

This had the effect of stirring up a great deal of fear and misgiving in the provinces concerned and among the producers of some products who found their free access to certain markets to which up to that time they had undisputed access, interfered with and curtailed. That drastically affected their incomes. The point I wish to make is that no matter whether this bill is passed or is rejected, this situation exists.

The government expects a great deal from this legislation if it thinks that the legislation alone will correct the situation which exists. The most serious charge that can be brought against the government has nothing to do with what is in this bill; it is that they did not move immediately to establish the right of free movement of farm products across Canada and to any market in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gleave: I said this in committee when we first met to consider Bill C-176. The government's lack of action and its lack of concern for action has been the cause of much of the fear that has been engendered in the country. I have seen some advertisements similar to the one the minister spoke of. They reflect the fear to which I allude. Those remarks are by the way; I am merely alluding to the circumstances under which this bill has come forward for consideration.

I think that at least the federal government should associate itself actively with the undertaking which the government of Manitoba has under way to bring this matter before the Supreme Court. This government ought to offer assistance to the government of Manitoba and leave no doubt that they are concerned about establishing the right of farm products to move freely back and forth across this country. Unless that right is established I have grave doubts whether this legislation will be able to accomplish what is hoped of it.

This is enabling legislation. The amendments before us, if passed, would probably restrict the legislation to some extent or make it less effective than it otherwise might be. My thought is that if we are to have such legislation, let it be effective and workable. If it is not, it will hold out a hope of effectiveness to participating producers which does not and will not exist. If we do not want to pass effective legislation, it would be much better for us not to pass any legislation. If we do not want to give the producer a vehicle that will work, it would be much better if we were to give him no vehicle at all. At the same time we must establish a climate, if we want the legislation to work, in which it can and will work.

Mr. Speaker, when I have listened to arguments on this subject I have sometimes concluded that some people think that farm marketing legislation is a brand new idea. The farm organizations of this country, the Federation of Agriculture and the National Farmers Union, have asked for national marketing legislation for years. I can show you briefs which they submitted to the government, and you will find such requests in those briefs. The first legislation to establish marketing boards was passed in the 1930s. At that time there was a different government than now sits in this House. Further legislation was passed by a succeeding federal government. Perhaps enabling legislation is not the correct term, but it permitted a sharing of power with the provinces. It was passed by a forerunner of the present government.

The legislation now on the books of provincial governments was probably passed, amended or changed by governments of every stripe and political hue that we have had in Canada. I find it strange that it should come as a great shock that we are asked to consider this type of legislation, since the principles are not new. In the final analysis, this is the government's legislation. They are responsible to see that it is effective legislation and to establish a climate in which it can work. One reason why we had some difficulty with this bill is that it was not well-drawn in the first instance. It did not provide for sufficient participation by the producers on the regulatory bodies. Much of that has been corrected by the members of the committee, including opposition members.

I wish to deal with the protection or lack of protection which it will or will not give to the producers. As the bill has been changed and amended, there are plenty of safeguards. It is abundantly clear that in the case of each product the majority of producers have to be in favour before an agency can be established. That is an important point. It is important because we were asked to accept certain exclusions that we did not accept. If there are no exclusions we must be sure that the producers of a given product who do not want to come under the act will not be forced to accept an agency. One of the shortcomings of the legislation is that it does not deal adequately with ensuring income to the producer. There are at least two amendments to come before the House which will deal with that question. This legislation should concern itself with income.

The basic approach of the provincial legislation both when it was established and throughout the years was that the provincial agencies would be bargaining agencies designed to achieve a fair, reasonable or adequate market price and income return for the producer. That is the basic approach. One of the failures in this bill is that there is no stated concern about farm income. By inference, this is left to the agricultural prices support legislation which we have on the books. With regard to many farm products, this is inadequate and is not administered effectively.

Hon. members have repeatedly asked why the prices support act is not used to assist farmers who are in considerable difficulty because of the present low prices for hogs and other farm products. If the Agricultural Prices Support Act is not going to be effectively used to protect the farm income position, we should consider ways and means of doing it through this bill.

The position of the provinces with regard to this bill is not one of total unanimity or of total disagreement. I know one province which changed its position while this bill was being considered. This was a public move. I do not know what has been said to the minister behind closed doors or what opinions have been privately expressed by the provinces. When this bill is passed, it will be permissive for the provinces and producers. Those provinces which in their wisdom do not choose to use it with regard to certain products will not have to do so. By the same token, if the producers of eggs, hogs, apples, potatoes or cattle consider that this type of legislation is not of use to them, they will not be required to use it.

If they consider that the marketing system which they have is adequate and they can live in the same manner as the producers of hogs in my province are attempting to do with $19 hogs, it will be their right to do so. As free citizens of Canada, they will be able to continue in that manner because this bill will not force them to do anything else. We must keep this in mind.

I have reservations which can be dealt with by further amendments which we intend to move. We hope they will be considered and accepted by this House. They would make the bill a more effective instrument and make it possible for farmers to use it more effectively. The first order of business of a Parliament should be to ensure that products move freely and have access to the markets across Canada. If that is done, this should be a workable instrument. There should not be any coercion. Farmers and producers should have the right to either use or not to use this legislation. They should have free access to the markets in Canada as well as those outside Canada. When marketing farm produce we should have available all the markets we can find. We should not approach the marketing of farm produce from a restrictive point of view but from an expansionary point of view.

Representatives of the Dairy Commission appeared before the standing committee yesterday. They were asked whether they were taking advantage of the present market for powdered milk which appears as though it might be expanded. In our agricultural production we should not have a policy which will box us into the Canadian market. After all, this country has only 20 million people. Our agencies, whether privately or publicly-owned, should provide an opportunity to expand into other markets so that we can use the available agricultural resources in terms of people, land, know-how and ability to produce. Our over-all policy should be one which is outward-looking.

It would be a mistake to consider this bill as a restrictive instrument. Our approach should be that this is an instrument which will enable us to more effectively market our products and exploit all markets that may be available to us both domestically and overseas.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, the bill under study, Bill C-176, supersedes Bill C-197 which having been discussed at length prior to the adjournment of the previous session, comes back to this House under a new form but with the same basic principles. It was then a highly controversial bill and some people were in favour of it while others were dead set against it, but all these points of view were from the producers or farm associations concerned.

During this session this bill has been discussed at some considerable length. The House asked the Committee on Agriculture to travel across the country and consult provincial agriculture ministers and hear the views of the various farm organizations.

I was really amazed at the continuing interest for all our sittings, be it in eastern, central or western Canada. I am convinced that each member of the Standing Committee on Agriculture worked very seriously. We all had the purpose of collecting information so as to be able to provide farmers with a helpful piece of legislation, while preserving the interest of consumers and agencies concerned with the trade of agricultural production.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, at the provincial level, in Nova Scotia, for instance, the Minister of Agriculture expressed the views of his government in a very extensive brief. I could summarize the minister's attitude by quoting the following sentence from Committee Proceedings No. 11, of Thursday, January 21, 1971:

Our chief concern, however, is with the wider implications of the Bill. We recognize that this is enabling legislation and that it must be of a general nature. Yet it seems to us that the Bill is raising almost as many problems as it is attempting to resolve.

Mr. Speaker, that was the opinion of a minister from Eastern Canada. Now coming to central Canada, we have the provincial minister of agriculture who said the following in his brief on January 22, 1971 and I quote:

—and the effects, whether they are favourable or not—

—of the act, following the passing of Bill C-176—

—whether they are favourable or not, according to the point of view of the people affected, or according to what you expect from it, means that in the field of Agriculture, in the province of Quebec and elsewhere it will call for reactions which are as varied as the various vested interests involved and which tend to develop in this very important sector of our economy.

I continue the quotation:

In the face of these various different stands, not only different but often contradictory, the Department of Agriculture of the province of Quebec hesitates to put itself in the position of an arbiter because circumstances do not justify such a role.

Further on, the minister added:

However, Quebec does not feel that this Bill C-176 will ipso facto, just by being put into effect, bring an automatic solution. This solution can only be brought about after frank and open discussions between the provinces directly involved and can only be applied, if the provinces are willing to agree to the sacrifice of certain special interests for the general welfare of Canadian agriculture.

For the past months the situation in Canada has been truly disastrous. For example, we see the Ontario government passing legislation to protect producers in that province while seriously harming those of other provinces.

I am under the impression that the situation, far from improving, will, if I am well informed, be getting worse. In fact, I am apprehensive about the future of Canada should such a situation persist and I doubt that Bill C-176 can really represent a completely adequate solution.

I do not mean that Bill C-176 is not an appropriate tool to start discussions and to correct a situation which should be improved, but we must not forget that, in the end, the farmers' only objective is to put their products on the Canadian market in order to meet the producers' needs and to receive a fair reward for their work.

It does not matter much whether butter produced in Quebec is sold in Vancouver, Edmonton or Regina, as long as the producer receives a retribution for his work. That the pound of beef produced at Edmonton or Regina should be sold in Montreal, Quebec or Toronto matters little as long as the producer is paid for his work.

I think it is necessary first to consider things from both the national and the regional point of view. Unfortunately, as a committee member I could notice during the trip that the tendency was to think on a regional rather than on a national basis.

Marketing councils will be able to establish marketing agencies upon request from the majority of interested producers. These agencies will evidently be able to operate if there are provincial agreements, agreements which could be quickly negotiated if there is good will and if everybody sees the possibility of helping producers all across the country.

If such marketing agencies are contested, discussed and their case brought before courts, who is going to pay for all this which is going from bad to worse? It will still be the producers. Who is going to suffer the consequences? The consumers!

That is why I deplore the fact the the marketing council does not have the required powers to negotiate in an intelligent manner. In the end, however, there must always be some authority having the power to decide, to settle the question.

Having studied all the briefs submitted to them, the members of the committee came back to Ottawa and sat for long hours trying to put down on paper the amendments suggested in order to make this legislation as perfect as possible.

Some amendments were accepted, others were not. Maybe they will again be discussed in the House. One of them deals with the exclusion of certain products: beef and veal for instance.

If Bill C-176 is such as to help egg, poultry, wool, maple syrup or honey producers, I firmly believe that it could also help the other producers provided this is their desire.

I am gratified to see that the bill provides that a marketing agency may be established by the Marketing Council upon the request of a majority of a class of producers.

This is a safety valve. As is the case with other members, I have received representations from beef producers across the country, through their association, asking that this class of products be excluded from the bill as, according to them, they have no need for these provisions at the present time.

I am willing to believe that they are right and that this is not absolutely necessary for the time being, but at the national level we must pass legislation which will be available to all producers.

I entertain no absolute confidence in the effectiveness of this legislation, and I think that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) is able to anticipate that its administration will be extremely difficult. A considerable amount of goodwill will be required to achieve the establishment of marketing boards that may actually operate and provide practical results that will satisfy all producers.

There is a problem, however. I have listened attentively to the minister. If I am wrong, he can correct me. I understood that he had stated that there was no question, under this bill, of controlling production. If I remember correctly, the provisions of the bill which provide for the establishment of the boards enable these boards to issue production permits and, by the same token, to determine, if required, production quotas. I think that at the same time the bill should include a special provision to guarantee producers the prices that would enable them to get a decent income.

The problem in agriculture is always the same: we constantly struggle to get decent prices without fleecing consumers, in short, prices which will allow producers to make reasonable profits.

The bill also contains provisions to balance production volume and makret possibilities. I do not quite agree on that because market conditions are always determined by consumer purchasing power. And heaven knows it is a problem in too many families.

The real extent of the market is not known, according to surveys made by the Senate Committee on Poverty. The only way the committee may have helped the people was by determining to what extent the economic system may have prevented production from reaching the table of the consumer. In any event, there seems to be disagreement with regard to the report of the committee and rich people were certainly not found in every area of the country. Indeed, there are families that do not have exactly what they need, not only to eat but to dress decently.

That is why I say the bill will not achieve all its aims; but it will help get more agricultural produce into the stores and that will be one step ahead. One organization will enable the producers to prove that they have worked, that they produced something which the consumers can use.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, for all those reasons, I think that we should continue to seriously consider the proposed amendments in order to find out whether there might not be one which could likely improve the bill, so that it could unite Canadians instead of dividing them. For no consideration whatever would I like hon. members to my right, who represent constituencies of other provinces, to think that our positions are those of mean Canadians who consider only their area or their province. But the fact remains that every member is conscientious enough—I am sure—to represent honestly and properly his constituency, his electors and to follow up on the representations made to him.

I would not like it to be said that because the province of Quebec supports the best provisions of this bill, it regards the bill as perfect. That is not what I mean. Even if only 50 per cent of the provisions of the bill were good, we should use them and later on improve the legislation so as to really reach its objective, namely to put all farm products on the national market so as to make them available to the Canadian people.

As I already said, I think it is extremely regrettable that this bill does not include a provision enabling those marketing boards to channel in the same way all the products that will be imported from other countries.

I see that an amendment in this regard has been put on the order paper. A few moments ago, the Minister of Agriculture mentioned it and said that other agencies and departments were sharing this responsibility and that we should not multiply the number of agencies in the same field.

I submit that it does not amount to multiplying the agencies. They could remain under the authority of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce but with the possibility for the marketing boards to demonstrate that they are acting in a relevant way when they grant import licences for some farm products which are in direct competition with Canadian products.

I am well aware that there is presently such a possibility of control by the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce but God knows how difficult it is to have this legislation applied, these restrictions enforced when it is necessary. We had to make representations to our farm organizations. Federated Co-op had to take action several times to draw the attention of the authorities on a particular field so as to give fair protection to Canadian farmers. For this reason, I hoped the bill would have contained a provision to regulate the activities of people engaged in international trade with a view to profits only and not as a service to the community.

This form of trade must be regulated in an intelligent way so as to allow farmers to fulfill the objectives spelled out in the bill, namely to give farmers the possibility of living decently.

[English]

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) with a great deal of interest. I was disappointed in that I felt he might have spent less time dealing with the picayune matter of an advertisement in a newspaper and more time defending the reasons for the government's adopting the measures in this bill. This is one of the most important bills to be dealt with by the Committee on Agriculture in the last 50 years.

In the short time allotted to me I should like to deal with the necessity of the amendments to this legislation. As you are aware, we in the province of Ontario are familiar with marketing schemes, agencies and marketing commissions. A number of marketing operations and bodies are now operative in this province as in other regions of Canada. The reason is very simple. One of the earliest marketing schemes was started in my own riding, in Chatham, Ontario. Similar schemes were commenced many years ago in the province of British Columbia. We are very familiar with this type of operation, as they are in the province of Quebec and in most provinces where marketing schemes exist to varying degrees.

A previous speaker stated that the concept of national marketing legislation is not new. For many years successful marketing boards have been working for the betterment of the farm community in their local or regional areas. These people naturally felt there was no reason why this proposal, if extended nationally, should not work to the benefit of a great many more engaged in the production of agricultural products. This is not a new concept. When this legislation was introduced it received a great deal of approval in the provinces of Ontario, Quebec, British Columbia and other regions of Canada where marketing agencies are operative. Once this matter was brought before Parliament with the concept that the federal government would enter the field, the idea began to percolate in the agricultural communities of Canada. As a result, a great deal of concern has developed in these communities.

Let me point out why I feel there has been tremendous concern and an abrupt change in attitude on the part of many toward this bill in its present form. In the production of any commodity there is not, and never will be, total support for a marketing scheme. Some people feel such a scheme is not in the interests of the primary producer. Perhaps the majority feel that it is in their interests. As a result, we have in every province, region and community a nucleus of people who believe in free enterprise and that mandatory marketing legislation is not in the common interest.

Let us also consider what is happening in respect of this legislation. Producers in Ontario and other regions of Canada are concerned about the government bringing in an omnibus bill. The bill before us is such a bill. Its concept is based on the fact that all agricultural products in all areas of Canada should be covered. The bill itself speaks not only of primary products but any portion or any manufactured part of a primary product. This is certainly an omnibus concept.

The minister said in his speech that nowhere does this bill indicate there should be production control. I cannot agree with his interpretation. Let me put on record why the majority of producers in Canada cannot agree with this assertion. Over and over again the minister and this government have stated that the bill is patterned on provincial legislation which gives production control. They have pointed to the Canadian Wheat Board and the National Dairy Council as prime examples of how this concept can work. Anyone who is familiar with agriculture knows that the Canadian Wheat Board and the National Dairy Council are based on the concept of production control and supply management. For the government to suggest now that nowhere implicit in this bill is such a provision is, to say the least, misleading.

Let us consider what has happened in respect of the Dairy Commission. It was set up to protect dairy interests in Canada. We find that small enterprises have been forced out and that it is almost impossible for new farmers to get into this business. An apt description of what is taking place as a result of such legislation is that large producers are placed in a comfortable position, protected against encroachment by government regulation. Another grave concern in Ontario relates to the provision in this bill which makes it possible for the government to delegate provincial authority to national marketing agencies and the federal authority. It is expected that the two working together in harmony and within the democratic process will bring about the hoped-for adjustments. But this is immediately eroded by the fact that the minister in his explanation left the impression that the provincial authority is delegated only perhaps by negotiation and that it is within the purview of the provinces to opt out of the measure entirely or on a commodity by commodity basis. I think this is a major weakness.

The second major weakness is that no import control is inherent in this legislation. It is all very well for the minister to say we do not need it in legislation of this type because it is inherent in other legislation which is available to the government and that therefore there would be duplication. In respect of the practical application of marketing schemes already in existence in Canada, we see that every time an application is made to the government for import control either it is not granted or the delay is of such a nature that it becomes almost impossible to make a profitable sale of the commodity in question.

A prime example of this arose in the House yesterday when the hon. member for British Columbia, a proponent of this bill, criticized his own government because there was no import control on strawberries coming into his province. This shows why import control is absolutely necessary. I join with my colleague in the allegation that this bill will not, and cannot, solve the problem of interprovincial trade and the restrictions we now face, because the only tool it has is negotiation. As the minister has indicated, it will provide a forum for negotiation of differences. There is no legal way under Bill C-176 in which there can be a determination or real assessment of the problem facing the provinces. So I agree with my colleague that the only way in which this matter can be solved is by reference to the Supreme Court. I agree with him that a proper assessment of Bill C-176 is not possible until we know the decision of the Supreme Court, because if the decision should be what we expect it to be, then the terms and provisions set out in this bill will not be applicable.

Another matter which is very upsetting to me and to others who are familiar with the workings of marketing agencies and the way in which they provide aid to primary producers is that during the committee hearings, while listening to the government's defence of its own bill it became readily discernible that the government is more concerned about control over agriculture than with providing a democratic method of supply-marketing in a regular fashion.

I think we will find that the major difference between this measure and a provincial measure is that there is not spelled out in this bill the basis for the success of such schemes in the provincial field. It is all very well for the minister to state that there will be a democratic process and that the majority of the primary producers of any commodity will have to solicit the government in order to be placed under the terms of the legislation, but that is only half the story because the reverse is not equally true. If the primary producers should find that rather than being of benefit to their industry it is a detriment, then there is no provision for a plebescite or any other means of adopting a negative approach to the bill so that such an agency could be disbanded. This is a basic weakness as between the federal and provincial legislation.

Over and over again the minister has emphasized that this is a democratic approach and this will not be done unless the majority of producers wish it. I maintain that the minister immediately loses his credibility, because there is no doubt in anyone's mind that the majority of cattlemen in this country do not wish to come under the provisions of this measure. They have said so over and over again. They want no part of it.

Mr. Speaker, the government is interested in only one thing. It is interested in bringing a bill before the House in a manner which includes cattlemen whether or not they wish it. It is all very well for the minister to say they are only being brought under the umbrella of this bill and that it will not be implemented so far as cattlemen are concerned unless they wish it. What bothers me is that in the terms of this bill we are giving tremendous authority to public servants who are answerable only to the minister and this House. I am concerned that this measure is of such importance that if we should be wrong it could mean the economic ruin of hundreds and hundreds of farmers in this country.

I do not hold a brief for those who moan and whine about the length of time spent on this matter by the House and the committee, because if in our deliberations we can amend the bill in such a way that we save only one farmer from bankruptcy then in my opinion the time will have been well spent. If we make a mistake it could take years to bring in an amendment in order to redress the wrong, especially when we see the degree of esteem in which this government holds the farming community of Canada.

We must look at this bill very carefully. We will have to amend it in order that it can be operative and can solve the various problems facing Canada today. I am terribly disturbed that we have not been able to obtain a Supreme Court ruling on the very cornerstone of this bill before we are asked to give it final passage. This is major legislation.

I am very sorry the minister did not adopt a more moderate course in dealing with something which primary producers across the country have wanted for many years. I had hoped the minister would bring in a measure of national scope as he did in respect of the dairy industry and as was done in respect of the wheat industry.

If the government had brought in such legislation for the poultry industry, which dearly wanted it, it would have received rapid passage through the House. If such legislation had been brought in and operated successfully, then the other commodity groups would have been lining up at the minister's door demanding similar legislation. The minister did not do that. He is trying to bring it in all at once to cover a tremendous number of commodities and regions. This involves many different personalties and ten different governments. In my opinion it will be impossible to achieve rapid implementation of this measure once it is passed, because the problem of interprovincial barriers is growing each and every day and is becoming more and more ominous. I think it is misleading for the minister to say that this measure will settle the problem. Even if it did provide a solution, I submit it would take a minimum of 12 months to draft all the regulations and negotiate them with the provinces. I have no hesitation in supporting the amendments proposed by my colleague.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have great pleasure in speaking in this debate, not so much because of the content of the bill but because I wish to point out to the thinking people in this country what will be the effect if this measure is passed. I believe that the result will be a disaster. The bill was first introduced a year or so ago as Bill C-197. At that time the standing committee heard many witnesses. There was a general rejection of what that bill encompassed and we rather suspected that after it died on the Order Paper last June, on being reintroduced it would be redrafted and contain many improvements. It was very disheartening to see it come forward in this form.

The suggestion was made that this bill is a product of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and he has received a great deal of the blame for it. It was pointed out earlier today that much of the thought behind the bill originated with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and that he elaborated on it in a speech at Winnipeg on June 2, 1968. In other words, the bill was not proposed by anyone with an agricultural background but by what you might call a playboy from Westmount, a world traveller from Westmount. When you read the bill you can easily see that this was the case. To substantiate that statement I quote from the speech he delivered in Winnipeg on June 2, 1968, as follows:

> In order to meet the difficulties of divided jurisdiction in the area of marketing of agricultural products, the government would undertake to raise for discussion with the provinces the possibility of providing over-all authority for the marketing of agricultural products as a federal responsibility.

That statement was made before the members of the present government knew they would be appointed to the positions they hold. I want to make it abundantly clear that the thought behind the bill did not come from the agricultural community. Marketing boards are not the main thrust of the bill. The main thrust will be restricted provincial trade policies and government control—nothing more and nothing less. The Minister of Agriculture has made many speeches to the effect that this bill is what we need. We will all wait with baited breath to see if the bill, when proclaimed, will solve the interprovincial trade situation, the so-called chicken and egg wars which have been developing and have given rise to increasing trade restrictions between provinces.

As has been so well pointed out by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and by the hon. member for Kent-Essex (Mr. Danforth), in reality the whole situation boils down to a decision that should have been made by the Supreme Court. In reality we are wasting our time in this debate in the House. Time and time again members of the government rise and say, "We must get this legislation through, or that legislation through. We are in a hurry; we are short of time." Then why, Mr. Speaker, are we wasting our time debating this matter now, when it is a matter to be decided by the Supreme Court of Canada?

I heard a very prominent judge say that this will be the most important decision made by the Supreme Court of Canada in the last 50 years. I would say it could probably be the most important decision ever made by the Supreme Court, since confederation itself may hinge on the decision. The decision, in effect, may be on whether Canada is in reality a nation, or ten nations. If the decision is made that there should not be free trade between the provinces of Canada, then the die will be cast, separatism will spread and we will truly become ten nations. But if the Supreme Court decision is to the effect that there should be free trade between the provinces, this bill will mean nothing and the agencies or boards set up under it will mean nothing. However, if the Supreme Court decision goes the other way, in effect saying that each province is a separate nation, we will need something resembling an interprovincial GATT agreement and the provision in this bill giving provinces the right to opt out of any arrangement will mean nothing. In effect each province will have to become part of an over-all agency in order to get part of a national quota. Some provinces may set up barriers against the importation of goods from other areas.

We could very well run into a situation in the western provinces, where they do not have the people to consume the goods they produce and rely on the export of their farm products, where they would set up barriers to the high-priced industrial goods they have been bringing in from other parts of Canada. They could start looking to places like Japan and the U.S. and make their own international trading arrangements.

On many occasions the minister has made light of the fact that we need this bill to create another forum for consultation wherein the provinces can get together and discuss these trade arrangements and agencies. But we have all the forums we need now, and there is nothing to stop the ministers getting together. The creation of one more forum to solve the matter of interprovincial trade is only a joke. There are the federal-provincial conferences with ample opportunities for provincial ministers to get together. The argument that this bill will set up another forum is only a red herring and has no value at all.

The Supreme Court ruling which will be handed down probably toward the end of next month will be one of the most important decisions made since confederation. It will be the deciding factor on the way in which Canada will go. We have had many divisive pieces of legislation from this government. I think the official languages bill has been most divisive and this is substantiated every day. But no legislation has ever been brought forward that will be as divisive and detrimental to this nation as the bill before us.

To return to the matter of another forum for consultation, I think this is just idealism. In this regard I should like to quote from the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Agriculture when that committee met in Halifax on January 21, 1971. In answer to a question, Mr. Callahan, the Minister of Agriculture for Newfoundland, said:

> Mr. Chairman, in the first instance I do not agree that the provinces are agreed on this bill. They are not. So far as I am aware, no province has come out and said, "We agree with this legislation", and I have already indicated that at a full meeting of the ministers six months ago—and I have quoted from the proceedings of that meeting—there was a consensus which, as I have said, is the lowest form of opinion, which seriously questions vital aspects of the bill, so I do not agree that the provinces are asking for this. I know what they have been asking for. I have been among them and I know what we have asked for.

If this is the way some provincial ministers see the bill, how can any new forum created under this bill sweep that away and make everything glorious and fine and create a wonderful agreement on the question of provincial trade? I do not think anyone here who truly represents agriculture would not support the bill if they could see that it provides one extra dollar for the producer. Where is there anything in the bill about pricing or giving producers more money in their pockets?

We repeatedly saw amendments turned down in committee. I recall an amendment to put the word "viable" into the clauses to replace the words "efficient and competitive", but the latter phrase was chosen. This would mean just another cheap food policy. Time and time again we have heard the word "efficient" used in regard to business where it generally means a greater profit margin, but as it relates to agriculture it can only mean a cheap food policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Downey: We were given no assurance that the word "competitive" does not mean competitive with another country. What are we to be competitive with—Mexican tomatoes, Australian beef? The terminology of the bill gives no assurance that this would not be the type of competition producers would have to face.

I think the most ridiculous concept of this bill has been the matter of controlled production, though quite a few people may not be in agreement with this. However, I think anyone could and should be ridiculed for bringing forth control of production without control of imports. This is one of the most ridiculous assumptions ever made. Surely the minister would not try to implant in the minds of the farmers that their standard of living could be raised by controlling production and granting licences to farm with no mention at all of imports.

The apple growers and beef producers appeared before the committee. I recall that the apple growers of Nova Scotia and British Columbia said they had no problems and did not need this bill, that the only thing they suffered from was imports because they had to leave their apples under the trees; it was too expensive to pick them. They questioned how it was proposed to raise the income of farmers without doing anything in this regard. The amendment was moved in committee on several occasions. It is the same type of amendment that has been written into other bills such as the textile bill, where a product was protected—but it was turned down in regard to agriculture.

Initially this bill contained clauses which ensured that the interests of consumers would be looked after before the interests of producers. I supposed that this was an agricultural bill brought forward by the Department of Agriculture to look after the interests of farmers, yet its language suggests that consumers are to be placed on a higher level than producers.

Controlling production without controlling imports simply means that the government will have the right to set the price of agricultural products. It will be able to perpetuate a cheap food policy in this country by allowing imports in or by shutting them off at will. If the price of a commodity rises to a level at which farmers can survive if they produce it, the government can simply import that commodity and control or lower its price. That is what is done with beef. For one month in 12, Canadians eat beef produced in Australia. The minister has been questioned about this in the House and has said, "Well, the need is there. We do not have the beef available." You do not mean to tell me that if beef was not brought in people would not buy Canadian beef that is already on shop shelves, and thus raise the price to the level that beef producers ought to get. Why, back in 1952, 18 years ago, beef prices were higher than today. You can imagine what the costs of production were 18 years ago. Look at the current prices of machinery and at the costs of labour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to make some remarks on the amendments proposed by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), namely amendments Nos 1, 5, and 22 which deal with certain implications of Bill C-176.

As members of the committee, we have travelled throughout Canada from Halifax to Vancouver and found that producer associations, mainly primary producers, were seriously worried. As for the bill, Primary producers are sceptical about the bill because most of them throughout Canada are used to work on their own.

A farmer wants to be his own boss. He wants to sell his products himself and be the master of his production and his prices. He also wants in all regards to be the master of his future.

I think that with the passing of Bill C-176, the producer will no longer be his own boss. He will have to think in a different way, to act in a different way and also to decide his future in a different way.

Particularly when we visited Ontario, we found that many producer associations were concerned about the implications of Bill C-176. In the course of our trip, we met 78 producer associations, 90 per cent of which grouped primary producers.

I should like to call the attention of hon. members on the most frequent questions raised in the briefs that were presented to us respecting the producers' concern. They asked: Who will control imports? Who will control the boards? Who will pay the administrative costs? Will some provinces be allowed to withdraw from the marketing agencies? Can such a system generate local favoritism? Will the farmer or the producer take the decisions within the marketing agencies? Will the producer be entitled to prosper at an equal rate in all provinces? Will the rights already secured under the British North America Act be more or less diluted by this bill? Will the farmer now have to decide or negotiate on quotas? Are the quotas transferable? Will all farm products be regulated by a quota system?

All these questions were put to us by farming groups. Many were in favour of the proposed measures; however, almost everybody agreed on the implications of the bill, though mildly. Almost all expressed the wish that their member should move amendments to the bill.

In committee, 29 amendments were proposed. Some were approved and others were rejected. However, I believe that all of them would be essential for friendly understanding between the producers from the various provinces.

We are sorry, indeed, to see that some provincial governments, namely the Ontario government, have already placed an embargo on Quebec products.

We know a bill like this one is necessary to put an end to this type of thing. But before approving it on third reading, I feel we should give it further thought.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, could the government House leader tell us what business the House will consider tomorrow?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would advise the House that tomorrow we propose to call second reading of the bill to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Isn't that a bit hasty?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

I would like to ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) whether when introducing his proposed legislation tomorrow he intends to establish the government policy concerning the services related to that legislation.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will be making a statement on the bill and on matters related thereto.

Business of the House

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I was thinking this evening that Parliament seems at times to operate slowly, but I believe that hon. members are hard-working, patient, confident and optimistic. I therefore wish them good night, and may their projects of today become the realities of tomorrow.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, April 29, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HOWARD (SKEENA)—RIGHT OF MEMBERS TO VISIT PENITENTIARIES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a question of privilege that affects the House and all members. By way of a preliminary perhaps I ought to say that yesterday the hon. member for Broadview, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, the hon. member for Timiskaming and I took the occasion to visit Millhaven penitentiary, which has received some publicity lately. When we arrived we were received with cordiality and friendliness by the warden and deputy warden, who were in no way hesitant about our right to visit the institution during reasonable hours of the day. Actually, I understand that there are some internal memos within the department on the matter which indicate that Members of Parliament may receive courtesies and opportunities not available to anybody else.

It has been a longstanding British tradition going back to long before Canada was founded and it has been a Canadian tradition as well that Members of Parliament, as the elected representatives of the public, should have the right to have access to those areas where the public invests its money in order to determine matters involving administration and also to assist in developing public policy relating to penitentiaries as a result of their understanding of the situation concerning penitentiaries. Thus they can assist in developing public policy. Such visits in the past have certainly brought about a greater appreciation of the desire and need to make changes in the penitentiary system.

After about three and a half or four hours in the institution and at a time when we were speaking with one of the inmates in Millhaven, there was an interruption by the warden who carried with him the following message:

> The minister has asked me through the Deputy Commissioner that the M.P.'s be asked to leave the institute right away. A legal opinion has been obtained that they have no statutory right to be in the institute. The minister's request is made because the whole matter is under review by a commission of inquiry and also because of a police investigation into a murder.

I assume that was the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer). There was no indication that it was any other minister, and penitentiaries come under the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General.

The phrase in that message about a legal opinion having been obtained with regard to the statutory right of members to visit such institutions is in reality a subterfuge. In activities of this sort, and I hope the Solicitor General feels this way, we should not be concerned about legal opinions but about moral rights and obligations.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Although this is not directly a part of the question of privilege, the reference in the message to the matter being under review by a commission of inquiry and about a police investigation into a murder is somewhat offensive in that it implies that we may have been intent upon impeding or in fact were impeding either of these inquiries. Such is not the case.

Members of Parliament are the elected representatives of the public. In that sense they have certain rights and privileges that are not available to other citizens. In the pursuit of their duties and obligations they have an obligation to visit areas where public money is being expended. There should be no consideration on the part of the cabinet of interference in the normal course of events with those examinations and studies, especially by one who has so little sensitivity to British and Canadian traditions in this field. It is the right of Parliament and Members of Parliament to review the administration of the cabinet. It is not a right of the cabinet to abrogate that review.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): It is not only a traditional right but at one time in our Canadian statutes it was in fact a statutory right. Prior to the session of 1960-61 the Penitentiary Act contained a provision in section 45 which read as follows:

> The following persons may visit any penitentiary during business hours, that is to say—

Then it lists a number, including the Governor General of Canada and "any member of the Parliament of Canada".

When the Penitentiary Act was revised in 1960-61 the Hon. Davie Fulton was Minister of Justice and the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was Prime Minister. The point was raised about leaving out of the proposed new Penitentiary Act the provision containing the right of Members of Parliament to visit penitentiaries during business hours. We were assured by the then Minister of Justice that this action had the endorsement and approval of the then Prime Minister. He said that it was considered appropriate because of the legal construction of statute law not to have that provision carried forward into the new act but that it would be contained within the regulations and that there would not be any interference with that particular right. This has been the course followed by every warden of every penitentiary which has ever been visited since that time by any Member of Parliament; they have respected the right of Members of Parliament to inquire into and visit these institutions in the course of their obligations.

I consider the action on the part of the Solicitor General—I am commenting on the basis of the information given to us by the warden; if that information is incorrect, then, of course, I am in error, but there is no reason to think so—to be highly affronting to the privileges of this House, highly affronting to the general public and an abrogation of a privilege which is basic in character. Parliament must always be very jealous of its rights, because the preservation of these rights is directly connected with its ability to carry out its duties and responsibilities. Particularly in areas such as penitentiaries where the general public is denied the right and the opportunity to visit and see what is happening, it is even more important in the public interest that the public should have knowledge about the administration of penitentiaries, both in terms of their proper administration and of influencing public policy. Every time Parliament loses a right it loses part of the freedom of this nation in the process.

Without going further into the matter, let me say I believe there is a prima facie question of privilege. If, in Your Honour's estimation, this is the case, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert):

That the matter of the right of Members of this House to visit penitentiaries under the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada during business hours be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: If there is to be no reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Skeena I am prepared to express an opinion on whether there is a prima facie case of privilege in the circumstances alluded to by the hon. member for Skeena. He has, of course, given the Chair the required notice and that has afforded the Chair an opportunity to reflect on the situation and to consider whether there is, indeed, a prima facie case of privilege involved.

The hon. member suggests that the refusal on the part of the government, or of a representative of the government, or of the Solicitor General to allow him access to a penitentiary constitutes a breach of the parliamentary privileges. The question to be determined is, whether included in the rights and privileges belonging to the House and to its members individually is a right or a privilege to visit certain institutions, including penitentiaries.

On a number of occasions I have defined what I consider to be parliamentary privilege. Privilege is that which sets hon. members apart from other citizens giving them rights which the public do not possess. I suggest we should be careful in construing any particular circumstance which might add to the privileges which have been recognized over the years and perhaps over the centuries as belonging to members of the House of Commons. In my view, parliamentary privilege does not go much beyond the right of free speech in the House of Commons and the right of a member to discharge his duties in the House as a member of the House of Commons. It seems to me that the fact that the Penitentiary Act in the past, until 1961 I believe, did provide for a right on the part of members to make visits is an indication that if it were part of parliamentary privilege, it would not have been included in the statutes.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: That is why it was taken out.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming suggests that this is why it was taken out, but there is nothing anywhere it seems to me which will indicate that is the reason for removing that provision.

I suggest to hon. members that if there is cause for complaint it ought to be in the form of a grievance against the minister or against the government. I would hesitate very much to suggest to hon. members that there is included as part of our special rights as members of this House the right to visit certain institutions, including penitentiaries. The hon. member says that this right does apply to penitentiaries but he has not said what other institutions might be covered by this suggested special right. I do not think that our special privileges should be deemed, construed and interpreted as including that particular right.

I recognize that there is a very special problem here. It seems to me that if there is not a question of privilege, as I am inclined to conclude, there is a problem which might very well be considered by the House in some other way or form, but it seems to me that the motion proposed by the hon. member is in the form of a substantive motion rather than a question of privilege. He has suggested that a very important problem, which has been brought to the fore by the fact that he and other of his colleagues in the House of Commons have been denied what they consider to be a traditional right, and the question should be investigated. It is my thought that the matter might be looked into not under the guise or cover of a question of privilege but perhaps by or as a result of a substantive motion.

I fully recognized the importance of the matter and the seriousness of the situation brought to the fore by the hon. member. I would hope it might be cleared up in one way or another, but it should not be dealt with through the agency of a question of privilege.

MR. LAPRISE—CORRECTION OF STATEMENT BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege to set the record straight concerning an erroneous and misleading statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), before the Sherbrooke Optimist Club, last Monday, April 26, 1971, when he said, and I quote the newspaper La Tribune:

—the position of the Créditistes is most regrettable. He called the latter mean, miserly and heartless because they object to Canada's allotting 0.5 per cent of its gross national product to ease the misery of the third world's 2 billion inhabitants.

Mr. Speaker, this statement which has been made by a public figure, is erroneous and misleading, since the members of the Ralliement créditiste did not object to assistance being given to underdeveloped countries, but they even requested the same privileges and considerations for our provincial and municipal governments.

I wanted to set the facts in their true light, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi has given the Chair notice of the question he wanted to raise. As he is not moving a motion in the House, it may not be necessary for me to express an opinion as to the merits of the question of privilege raised by him.

Nevertheless I may perhaps refer the hon. member to Citation No. 113 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fourth Edition, which states as follows:

—a dispute arising between two members, as to allegations of facts, does not fulfil the conditions of parliamentary privilege.

And elsewhere, it says:

A question of privilege ought rarely to come up in Parliament.

I do not want to repeat my remarks with regard to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). What I said then applies, to a certain extent, to the circumstances mentioned by the hon. member. I have come to the conclusion that there is no prima facie case of privilege; therefore, no motion can be considered.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE MINISTRY

TABLING OF LETTER OF RESIGNATION OF MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the House that I have received a letter of resignation, as a member of the government, from the Hon. Eric Kierans, Minister of Communications, and that I have recommended to the Governor General that it be accepted.

[English]

The Acting Minister of Communications will be the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Longueuil (Mr. Côté).

Under Standing Order 41(2) I wish to table the correspondence exchanged between Mr. Kierans and myself.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON VISIT TO EUROPE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from Europe, where I had the honour to accompany the Governor General and Mrs. Michener on a series of official visits to the Netherlands, Belgium and Luxembourg. Queen Juliana and the Prince of the Netherlands, the King and Queen of Belgium and the Grand Duke and Duchess of Luxembourg received Their Excellencies with great kindness. These visits served to underline the closeness of the bonds of kinship and affection between Canada and the host countries, bonds forged by a shared history, strengthened by comradeship in two world wars and maintained by our alliance in NATO. His Excellency reminded his hosts in all three countries of the contribution made by so many Canadians of Benelux origin to the development of Canada and the friendship between our countries. He stressed the growing importance of trading relationships and scientific and cultural exchanges. I am sure I speak for us all when I thank the governments and people of the Benelux countries for the warm welcome given to the Governor General and Mrs. Michener wherever they went. Their Excellencies took advantage of their visits to The Netherlands and Belgium to join with their hosts in paying homage to the Canadian dead of two world wars by visits to Canadian cemeteries at Holten and in Flanders.

While in Europe, I had useful talks on a number of questions, including particularly the Common Market, with the Benelux governments, the Italian government, members of the European Economic Commission and the Secretary General of NATO. Our ambassadors to France and Germany joined me for a day of discussions in Brussels, enabling me to have some contact with all six countries of the European Economic Community.

The principal subject of all my talks was the current negotiation for the enlargement of the community. As the House is aware, the government, through meetings at the ministerial level, diplomatic representations and public speeches, has been making known over a period of many months Canadian concern about some of the effects of the anticipated enlargement of the Common Market. The government is not opposed to the broadening and deepening of the community; on the contrary, we see this development as an important contribution to greater stability and prosperity in Europe and the world. We have urged, however, that it is neither desirable nor necessary that this economic unification should take place at the expense of third countries like Canada. We have made concrete proposals to minimize the possible adverse effects of enlargement. In the same constructive spirit, we have urged the community to be open and outward-looking and non-discriminatory in its trading policies, and to do everything to avoid a trade confrontation with the United States costly to themselves, to us and the western world as a whole.

While in Europe, I re-emphasized these points, as did my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) who, as the House knows, was in Bonn at the same time. I went a step further on this occasion and urged both the member governments and the commission of the EEC to give serious consideration to the establishment of procedures for regular consultation with Canada. Hon. members will readily understand that if and when enlargement is achieved relations between Canada and the other great trading entities—the European community, the United States and Japan—as well as among these entities themselves, will assume even greater significance for us and for them. It will be a different trading world.

I believe I am justified in saying that the Canadian concerns are fully understood in Europe and that the response has been positive, principally because our fundamental attitude to European unity has been constructive. We shall continue to press our case on every suitable occasion during the months ahead when crucial decisions are to be made.

While in Brussels, I signed, on behalf of Canada, an agreement for scientific and technological co-operation with Belgium. This agreement will facilitate and encourage expansion of scientific industrial and technological co-operation between our countries. The agreement illustrates how Canada is broadening the scope of its relations with Europe, one of our major policy objectives, as identified in the government's foreign policy review.

While in Rome, I was received in audience by the Pope. Our discussion ranged over the troubled areas of the world and concentrated upon the Middle East, which is one of His Holiness' gravest concerns. The Pope recalled with pleasure a visit he paid to Canada some 20 years ago, and the expression of his warm sentiments for this country brought to mind the thoughtful comment he made in 1969 when he said that the forces uniting Canadians seemed to him stronger than the forces that tend to divide us.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I must begin by welcoming back the minister. It has become my pleasant and frequent duty to welcome him back from very extensive and sometimes exotic tours abroad. This time he was in an exalted role in which he was an escort to vice-royalty, to dukes, duchesses, kings and grand duchesses. How many of us commoners have such a role cast upon us, to walk with kings and sup with queens.

I see in this morning's Globe and Mail that the minister is cast in the mantle of Sir Walter Raleigh. I would not presume to comment upon the courtier's function—I would not know it—but I must caution the minister to recall that Raleigh is not a very good model for a politician. That attendant knight had a political career which was something less than glorious. He spent much of his time forecasting discoveries, inventions and achievements which never came to pass. He pursued many goals which he never did attain. He was often away from home and, worst of all, ran afoul of the personage who held the political realm at bay and he spent many years in the Tower devoid of influence, power and freedom. I have no reference to the erstwhile Minister of Communications!

Of course this was a most important visit. I believe that the current pilgrimages to Europe are efforts by the government to overcome some of the ill effects of the government's own recent policies toward Europe. We have, I fear, given Europe a lower priority, and I am afraid we are being taken less seriously by Europe as a result. In its preoccupation with other ventures the government appears almost to be taken by surprise at the tremendous developments now taking place in western Europe. It should not surprise anyone that Britain is interested in moving into the ECM. This is not something which took place yesterday. It was some months ago that the government in its contemporary wisdom decided to downgrade our NATO role and diminish our interest in the Commonwealth and especially in the senior member of the commonwealth, Britain, but now we are rudely awakened to the impact of a much larger and more closely integrated European community.

In the Committee on External Affairs and National Defence the other day we were told by a distinguished witness in the international field that the great danger facing Canada today was not that of being taken over but of being left out in light of the many important and massive trade relationships which are being built up. I wonder—and I express this with great concern and anxiety—if the Canadian economy is in any way prepared for the developments which will take place when the United Kingdom enters the European Common Market. The Canadian economy is in a very precarious position because not sufficient was done before. The minister is quite right when he says that in the future there will be a different trading world. Will it be a world for which Canada is prepared and in which Canada will play a prosperous and useful part? This is the essential question. Western Europe is still an area of vital concern and profound interest to this country and no flirtations with other deviations and developments of frills in foreign policy will ever blot out that fact.

I notice that the minister had an audience with His Holiness the Pope. I had that great honour a year ago. At that time too the Holy Father expressed his interest in the Middle East and his grave concern about the trouble in that part of the world. I read in the European press that the Holy Father expressed the hope that Canada might play a more important and more valuable role in the Middle East. I would say that the minister might well be urged to follow the advice and suggestion of His Holiness the Pope because we cannot, should not and dare not evade our responsibilities in the Middle East, that tense, troubled and explosive spot.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to join with my colleague in welcoming back the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I am quite sure that during his visit to Europe he probably used his very considerable persuasive powers to convince the Economic Community that Canada must have some entry into that organization. However, what disturbs me about the minister's statement is that obviously he has returned emptyhanded without any encouragement and hope for a relationship with the European Economic Community, and the rather Pollyanna, head-in-the-sand attitude he has regarding our future prospects. While I appreciate the efforts the Secretary of State for External Affairs is making in terms of pressing our case on the members of the EEC, it is quite obvious that we are not in a strong position in terms of getting concessions in that market. What is imperative at the moment is that Canada frame alternative policies and thereby have a set of policies in the event that our persuasion of the Europeans does not work.

It is also very obvious that the Europeans are worried about the growth of international corporations and are making very determined efforts by combining with each other to ensure they have some control over the future of their countries and their economies. This is not going to go away and will not succumb to our blandishments. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, while welcoming the minister back I would hope he will take an early opportunity to tell us not only the kind of representations he has made to the countries of Europe but also what alternatives the government has in the event that we cannot get entry into the European Common Market. He should not fob us off by saying we are still trying because obviously our efforts are not meeting with success in that direction.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, like the colleagues who spoke before me, I welcome back the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp). I feel it might be well to consider posting a permanent welcome at the entrance of Parliament since during the past few months a procession of Canadian ministers, as also provincial premiers bound on somewhat different business, have been travelling abroad.

We note in the report of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as we did in a report presented earlier this week by another minister, the Canadian government's concern with the creation of a European Common Market. It would appear that the creation of this common market would be fatal to Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the minister says that he urged the members of states and the EEC Commission to seriously consider the creation of mechanisms conducive to continuing consultations with Canada, as if we were telling member states of the common market to ask us permission to organize themselves and find ways and means to live better, and turn their industries, the agricultural potentialities and their trade with central Europe to their best account.

We cannot prevent the Europeans from improving their lot and in my view the organization of the economic community is by no means a catastrophe. This we find rather amazing and we should be able, thanks to our immense country and our hard-working countrymen, to do quite well for ourselves. We often hear that Canada is one of the most industrially developed countries in the world; therefore, we need not fear the commercial development that other countries are trying to achieve.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that he also met His Holiness the Pope in Rome. I am happy that he deemed it advisable to meet this high international authority; I am convinced that this was beneficial to him and that relations with the Vatican should be multiplied. This would doubtless be helpful in seeking better international agreements, perhaps not in the commercial field, but in seeking world peace, which people desire, but which few are dedicated to attain.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGED PATRONAGE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move a motion under Standing Order 43 in light of the declaration made yesterday by Mr. Claude Edwards, President of the Public Service Alliance, to the effect that the hiring procedure by departments of government has resulted in increasing personal and bureaucratic patronage in the appointment of federal employees, contrary to the merit system.

I therefore move, with the consent of the House, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates investigate and report upon the hiring practices used by various departments of government in recruiting for the Public Service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member for St. John's West requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Since there is not unanimous consent, the motion cannot be put at this time.

I believe the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton seeks the unanimous consent of the House to return to the item, presenting reports, for the purpose of presenting a report. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS AND STANDING ORDERS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Victor Forget (Saint-Michel) moved that the first report of the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, presented to the House on Tuesday, April 27, 1971, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS TO WESTERN CANADA PRODUCERS IN YEARS WHEN RECEIPTS BELOW FIVE-YEAR AVERAGE

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-244, respecting the stabilization of Prairie grain sale proceeds and to repeal or amend certain related statutes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT INTENTION REGARDING PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF SENATE AND HOUSE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice relating to the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act. Has any decision been made following the meeting of the government? Whatever the decision, I gather that the minister has not decided to resign in any event. Can the minister tell the House whether or not a decision has been reached with regard to the continuation of the so-called Turner act or as to any measure to take its place?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): The government has decided not to seek extension of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The President of the Privy Council will be giving notice of a resolution to appoint a special joint committee of the Senate and House of Commons to examine, inquire into and report upon the nature and kind of legislation required to deal with emergencies that may arise from time to time in the future by reason of lawlessness or violence in Canadian society that would endanger the existence of government or the maintenance of peace and public order.

NUMBER OF CHARGES PENDING FOR MEMBERSHIP IN FLQ

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question following that very decisive measure announced by the minister. I should like to ask the minister whether there are charges pending, where trial has not been completed, for membership in the FLQ, and if there are such charges pending where trial has not been completed, approximately how many such charges are there?

[Mr. Forget.]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I have sought that information and will give it to the House, but I want to say to the Leader of the Opposition that any charges pending under the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act remain valid charges even after the expiry of that act.

Mr. Stanfield: Yes, but I wonder whether the minister would make a statement to the House promptly with regard to the confusing situation which now exists whereby, for example, it is today a crime under the Turner act to be a member of the FLQ whereas on Monday it will not be. Will the minister make a statement explaining the position of the government and setting forth exactly where matters stand and how the government proposes to justify the situation that will exist?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I do not need to make a statement; I can reply to the question very briefly. While it is true that membership in the FLQ will no longer, per se, be a criminal offence, I believe it can properly be said that having regard to the proposed aims and purposes of the FLQ it will continue to be an illegal organization in the sense that any group of individuals who conspire together to commit criminal acts and who do in fact commit such criminal acts can properly be described as an illegal organization.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: I told you that on October 16 and you denied it. You just discovered the Criminal Code.

NUMBER OF CHARGES LAID UNDER WAR MEASURES AND PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): When my friends to the left are a little quieter I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister. In light of the answer now given by the Minister of Justice and in light of the answer he gave to the news media yesterday, were not all the offences in reference to this matter covered in the Criminal Code if the law had been administered under the Criminal Code? I wonder, therefore, if the Minister could answer why the act was brought in at all?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will recognize that the question as asked is an argument, and I have the impression that I have heard that argument on a number of occasions.

Mr. Woolliams: Then may I rephrase it, Mr. Speaker. In light of the answer given by the Minister of Justice I should like to ask the Prime Minister how many charges were actually laid under the War Measures Act and the Public Order (Temporary) Measures Act out of the 497 who were arrested?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I do not have the information, Mr. Speaker, but the Minister of Justice has given the statistics from time to time that he got from the Attorney General of Quebec.

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE OF SENATE AND HOUSE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. I am sure we are all pleased by the enlightenment that has taken place on the other side of the House, although it was a little long in coming—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will have noticed that a few other members wish to ask supplementary questions. Perhaps the hon. member should ask his supplementary while he has the floor.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): With reference to the proposed committee announced by the Minister of Justice, can the minister indicate whether the terms of reference will be such as to empower the committee to bring before it persons and papers and to review the actual events in order that this may not be simply an academic discussion but that a full evaluation may be made of the events last fall so that proper action can be recommended by the committee?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): When the President of the Privy Council gives notice of the resolution he will set forth the terms under which the committee shall sit and the terms of reference will speak for themselves.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER OF JUSTICE APPEAR BEFORE SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE TO GIVE INFORMATION CONCERNING APPREHENDED INSURRECTION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement by the Minister of Justice that the government has full authority under the Criminal Code to deal with illegal organizations guilty of seditious conspiracy, is the House to take it that the minister is now making a public apology to the people of Canada for having introduced unnecessary legislation in the form of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act and is the minister prepared—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that question is in order. Perhaps the hon. member might like to rephrase it in some other way.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the rest of my question was to inquire whether the minister would be prepared—preferably the Prime Minister but I am directing the question to the Minister of Justice—to appear before the committee when this matter is referred to it in order to acquaint the committee with all the facts and information that the government had at its disposal at the time it decided there was an apprehended insurrection in Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that depends upon whether the committee decides to call me. If so, I shall appear before the committee within the terms of reference of that committee. I want to say, for the enlightenment of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, that the special crime of illegality of being a member of the FLQ was necessary in the circumstances to lower the burden of proof in a time of crisis and, more important, to expand the scope of the procedural advantages that were given to the Crown, namely, an extension in the power of arrest, and in the power of search.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the minister for interrupting him but it seems to me that the question period has now changed into a debate. If hon. members wish to have a debate about this very important matter I am sure they can arrange this between themselves. However, I would not think that the question period should be turned into a debate on this very important matter. I understand there are a number of members who wish to raise different questions, and if we spend the whole question period debating this matter rather than seeking information we will not achieve as much as we might otherwise. I would therefore invite the Minister of Justice to reach the conclusion of his statement as soon as possible.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Baldwin: On the point of order you have raised, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Minister of Justice on a point of order.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I take what you say to heart, but I would have thought that in the fairness you show in your presidency of this House you would have allowed me to reply to the preamble that was bootlegged into the question of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the Minister of Justice and to all hon. members that if the question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was not entirely regular, in the same way the minister's response was not entirely regular. They were both interrupted as soon as the Chair could get the floor.

Mr. Baldwin: On the point of order Your Honour has raised—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Peace River rises on the point of order.

Mr. Baldwin: On the point which you raised, Mr. Speaker, I would submit that the Minister of Justice could have answered very simply in two words—"more power".

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Minister of Justice a supplementary question? Will either the minister or the President of the Privy Council undertake to assure the House that the terms of reference for the setting up of this investigation by a joint committee will be broad enough to permit an inquiry into the grounds upon which the government decided both to invoke the War Measures Act and to pass the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will have to wait until he sees the terms of reference. The resolution is debatable and he may make whatever representations he has at that time.

EXPIRY OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT —LETTER FROM QUEBEC PREMIER CONCERNING ACTION

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question on this matter to the Prime Minister. Has the government just now received a communication from Premier Bourassa which demands this action and, if so, can the Prime Minister tell the House the contents of this wire?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not precisely the action that Premier Bourassa has suggested the federal government should take. As I said to the House yesterday, he has communicated with me in different circumstances. I think the clearest thing that I can put on the record as being his most important request is that we should enact specific legislation to make the FLQ and like organizations illegal, but particularly the FLQ. As to the matter of continuing the present act, I believe I answered the hon. member for Calgary North yesterday to the effect that this was not the premier's request. He is asking this specific thing, that the FLQ be made illegal and he is hoping that the gaps in the law will be studied by Parliament and that Parliament will act on them as soon as possible.

Mr. Bell: Would the Prime Minister table this wire that has just been received in this matter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it was a letter that I received from the premier and we had a series of telephone conversations. I cannot table the latter and, as to the former, I think if the premier wants to make it public he will do so of his own accord.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will allow one last supplementary question to the hon. member for Sainte-Marie and then recognize the hon. member for Skeena.

REASONS FOR APPOINTING JOINT COMMITTEE RATHER THAN ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Justice.

Why did the government decide to establish a joint committee of the House and the Senate rather than appoint a royal commission, which would have excluded politics from the judiciary field? Why did the minister decide to proceed that way?

[English]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the government believes that this issue is so important, involving as it does the balance of individual liberties and the safety of the community, that the people of Canada ought to be involved through their representatives in Parliament.

PENITENTIARIES

MILLHAVEN—CURTAILMENT OF VISIT BY CERTAIN MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as expected, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. Inasmuch as he sat silent during the question of privilege that was raised earlier, I wonder if he would mind telling the House whether he in fact gave the instruction or orders that we were not to be permitted to remain within Millhaven institution?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Would the minister mind enlarging upon that a little bit and take the House into his confidence and tell us by what authority he did so?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, as it has been said, visiting rights in penitentiaries were abolished by act of Parliament in 1961. However, the practice has been maintained and since I was appointed Solicitor General, I have given no instructions to end this practice, or, in other words, to deprive hon. members of the right to visit our penitentiaries without advance notice.

On the other hand, I have not forgone either the advantages of the act and in my opinion whenever there are valid reasons to prevent any visit, I must make a decision and advise hon. members when they are courteous enough to contract me beforehand.

Considering the present conditions, there are three reasons why I feel justified in denying this visit: firstly, a board of inquiry has been appointed. Besides, two investigations are now being carried out, the first by the coroner and the second by the Ontario Provincial Police.

The second reason—

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I have one additional supplementary question. May I say at the outset to the Minister that evasiveness is no substitute for intelligence.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Inasmuch as he has already said that the report of the commission of inquiry will not be made public, that none of the reports of other inquiries will be made public and that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will not have the opportunity to visit Millhaven, may I ask him very simply if he would mind telling the House what he is afraid of? What have you got to hide?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I did not appeal to the intelligence of the hon. member but to his courtesy, and I see he lacks both.

Following the Kingston events, we had no choice in Millhaven. We had to transfer inmates in an institution that was not completed. Therefore, Millhaven is overcrowded and after the troubles in Kingston, the population is of course still in a precarious psychological state.

The third reason is that if I had allowed four members of the same party to visit Millhaven, which was not proper in the circumstances, I would have had to agree to similar requests which might have come from government members, members of the official opposition or the Ralliement créditiste. I feel that a visit to Millhaven would be inopportune at this time.

[English]

RIGHT OF COUNSEL TO VISIT PRISONERS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the directive he has given and his answer, may I ask the Solicitor General whether counsel representing prisoners who are incarcerated in various penitentiaries in Canada must obtain his consent before they can see their clients?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the practice is well known; when a prisoner advises the authorities of an institution that he wants to see a lawyer, steps are taken for his rights to be respected.

[English]

MILLHAVEN—CURTAILMENT OF VISIT BY CERTAIN MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister, who is presumptuous enough to judge the intelligence and courtesy of other people—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: This is not the Waffle.

Mr. Speaker: May we have order, please?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he inquired as to what the conversations were about before taking the authoritarian action of deciding that conversations could not take place? Did he inquire what the members were talking about, whom they were talking to, and what the subject of the conversation was before he decided that it would interfere with inquiries that somebody else was carrying on?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I had and have absolutely no intention of interfering with what hon. members have to say to the prisoners. It is their right, and I respect it. On the other hand, I explained the reasons which motivated my decision and I feel they are valid.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN PRICE OF GASOLINE AND FUEL OIL—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION BY PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, but in his absence I will direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the recent increase in the price of gasoline and fuel oil, can the Prime Minister indicate whether he intends to ask the Prices and Incomes Commission to inquire into that matter since oil companies like Imperial Oil and Petrofina announced today a significant increase in their profits for the first quarter of 1971?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question on behalf of the minister responsible to the House for the Prices and Incomes Commission.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. First of all, I want to thank him for the statistics he sends us every month about the number of days lost across the country due to strikes or lock-outs.

Would the minister be prepared to provide us also with the statistics concerning the number of days and millions of dollars lost by the 700,000 unemployed Canadians during 1970?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the minister to give him statistical information and a question of this nature should be put on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN CONFLICT—CANADIAN ACTION TO EASE SUFFERING AND DIMINISH FIGHTING

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the honourable and courtly Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he advise if the government is contemplating any steps to ameliorate the terrible suffering of the people of East Pakistan? Can he also advise if, in concert with other Commonwealth states, the government is taking any initiatives toward diminishing the fighting and the possibility of its broadening into conflict between two of our Commonwealth members, India and Pakistan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has made it plain that we are prepared to join with other countries in measures to assist in the relief of the people of East Pakistan. We are also urging, of course, that there should be a political settlement of this question and not one that involves so much bloodshed.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Macquarrie: Can the minister advise if any relief is now proceeding from Canada to that area?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker, we have not yet had any request that we can fulfil. Of course, it is only recently that the Canadian government was providing substantial relief to Pakistan in connection with the flooding, and I cannot say whether all of this has arrived.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FURTHER MEASURES TO CONTROL POSSIBLE PRICE INCREASES

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the warning of the head of the Bank of Canada that the economy may be entering a period of rapid price rise before inflation is brought completely under control, is the government preparing further controls, other than the present fiscal tools, for application in the future?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated previously, the government for a long period of time during the recent battle against inflation has been studying the possibility of other types of measures that might be used in order to combat rapidly rising prices.

PENITENTIARIES

MILLHAVEN—CURTAILMENT OF VISIT BY CERTAIN MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Solicitor General if his directive yesterday was issued only because members of the opposition were involved and does not apply to other members? I understand that one member of his party has been in the penitentiary within the last few days and there was not this kind of directive.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that fact.

[English]

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General, in my opinion, was aware of this because I understand that he took the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands in with him as the Member of Parliament for that area.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS WITH CERTAIN COUNTRIES ON PHASING OUT THEIR FISHING OPERATIONS WITHIN CANADIAN WATERS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. According to a release from his office dated April 28, proposals have been made by Canada and Norway which could serve as the basis for agreement between the two countries on the future conduct of fishing and sealing activities in Canada's territorial sea and exclusive fishing zones. Would the minister indicate whether any progress has been made in arranging similar meetings with Portugal, Spain, Italy, Denmark, the United Kingdom and especially France which would cover the phasing out of fishing operations and the acceptance of Canadian jurisdiction in the newly created 12-mile territorial sea and fishing zones off Canada's east and west coasts?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, negotiations and conversations are under way with a number of those countries. I should like to take the question as notice before giving a precise answer.

DISCUSSIONS WITH DENMARK ON CONSERVATION OF ATLANTIC SALMON

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Does he intend to initiate any discussions with the government of Denmark with respect to the failure of that country to act on conservation measures with respect to the overexploitation of Atlantic salmon off the coast of Greenland?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Yes, Mr. Speaker, in the first week of June.

INFORMATION CANADA

POSSIBILITY OF REDUCING COST OF PUBLICATIONS FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct my question to the hon. minister responsible for Information Canada.

Can he indicate to the House what possibilities there are for Information Canada to lower the prices of books sold to students in order to make it much easier for young students who would like to use these books to get information?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question was put yesterday. Unfortunately, I do not remember whether the hon. minister had promised an answer. It would be simpler maybe to allow him to do so briefly.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, Informaiton Canada does its utmost to make available to students, at the lowest prices possible, certain publications which may be of some use to them.

Besides, Information Canada offers a 33⅓ per cent discount to any school board or school which orders its publications with the special order forms of this agency.

HEALTH

FINANCING OF NURSING HOMES—INCLUSION ON AGENDA OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—AMENDMENT OF ACT

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Since the Minister of National Health and Welfare is not in the House, although this is his day, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister if I can get his attention. Will the financing of nursing home care be placed on the agenda of the upcoming federal-provincial conference, or is the government going to introduce an amendment to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act so that there will be federal assistance for nursing homes across the country?

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this question will be brought to the attention of the minister, who will undoubtedly consider it with the greatest care.

POTATOES—REQUEST BY PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK FOR ASSISTANCE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. What has he to report to the House on the question of assistance to potato growers in the Atlantic provinces as a result of his meeting last Monday with the Minister of Agriculture from that area?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the representation that we received from the Ministers of Agriculture for Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick was of a somewhat different nature from that of the past—in that they were not asking for a program under the Agricultural Stabilization Act. There were good reasons for that which I cannot explain now. This is a new departure in the form of assistance and we are looking at it very carefully.

OIL

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—NATURE OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES—COMPOSITION OF DELEGATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I believe that on Monday next the minister will be meeting with Mr. William Rogers, Secretary of State of the United States. Is the minister planning to have discussions with him regarding the trans-Alaska pipeline system and will any studies on the ecological dangers of transporting oil by tanker down the Pacific coast be presented to the American government? If so, by whom have they been prepared? Also, will there be representatives of the Canadian Department of Transport with the minister when he makes these representations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked whether I am going to be present at these meetings. On the contrary, these meetings are going to be held at the official level. The Canadian delegation will be led by the Director General of the Bureau of Economic and Scientific Affairs of the Department of External Affairs. There will be officials of the Department of Transport, the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, the Canadian embassy in Washington, and the province of British Columbia.

Mr. Douglas: I may have misunderstood the Prime Minister the other day. I was under the impression that the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be meeting Mr. Rogers. May I ask if such a meeting has been arranged, because the minister will recall that some time ago he indicated his intention of having discussions with Mr. Rogers regarding the TAPS program?

Mr. Sharp: What I said in the House was that I had been in touch with Mr. Rogers to arrange a meeting. The Prime Minister has confirmed to me that he did not indicate that I would be present or that Mr. Rogers would be present. As the House knows, Mr. Rogers is engaged in a very important mission in the Middle East, and we certainly would not want to bring him back to meet with me at this time.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask if any representations regarding the proposed underground nuclear testing on Amchitka Island be made at this meeting? If so, what representations will the Canadian government be making?

Mr. Sharp: No, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the House will agree that the purpose of this meeting should be to examine the dangers to the environment from the building of the trans-Alaska pipeline and the accompanying movement of oil by tankers down the west coast. We have made representations to the United States in connection with the Amchitka tests. The President of the United States has not yet made a decision. I hope he will make one that recognizes the dangers we have pointed out.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Has there been some omission in the list of officials read by the Secretary of State for External Affairs? He did not mention anyone from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. When I asked for some information from ministers the other day, the Prime Minister said I would have to get that information from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources as he is in charge of this operation.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, but he is not in charge of the mission to Washington.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Since the Minister of Labour has called into question the activities of the Minister of Finance, will the minister explain for the benefit of the House, particularly for the benefit of the Minister of Labour, just what he is doing as Minister of Finance?

Mr. Speaker: That statement should be made on motions.

Mr. MacInnis: I wish to follow up my original question by addressing a supplementary to the Minister of Labour. In order to satisfy his own curiosity and the curiosity of members on this side of the House, will the Minister of Labour ascertain from the Minister of Finance just what he is doing in that department, thereby informing himself and other members as to what is going on?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FUTURE USE OF CF-5 PLANES

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, my proposals with regard to the aircraft are before cabinet in the form of a white paper. When a decision is made in that regard, I hope to be able to announce it.

BILINGUALISM

ONTARIO—DISCONTINUANCE OF SPECIAL GRANTS TO BILINGUAL UNIVERSITIES

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Secretary of State.

Following the announcement by the Ontario Minister of Academic Affairs that special grants to bilingual universities, including those of Ottawa and Sudbury, will be discontinued effective next year, is it the intention of the hon. minister to enter into negotiations with provincial authorities to suggest that they should pursue this form of assistance which is necessary to the promotion of bilingualism in Ontario, or is he now in a position to tell the House whether the federal government intends to provide special assistance to the only two bilingual higher learning institutions in Ontario?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have been amazed by the news which was reported in this morning's papers. Hon. members know that, for the time being, the incentive policy for the teaching of official languages in Canada does not cover universities. However, some recommendations concerning higher education will be discussed with the provinces. I intend to take opportunity of these consultations to open the dialogue with provincial ministers in this regard and particularly with the Ontario minister.

Mr. Serré: Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary, I wonder if the hon. minister could tell us if he intends to extend the existing program with regard to the $50 million assistance to second language teaching at the elementary, secondary and higher levels?

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I think it is too early for me to answer this question.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROVISION OF GRANTS TO MANITOBA INDIAN BROTHERHOOD

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I wish to direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of citizenship. Has the hon. gentleman yet replied in an affirmative way to telegrams he received yesterday and today from the Manitoba Indian Brotherhood to the effect that unless they get their grants for 1971 immediately they will have to cease operations and lay off their entire staff?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Orlikow: Can the minister tell hon. members whether he has agreed to transmit the money in time in order that the operations of this very important organization can continue?

Mr. Stanbury: The grants are being transmitted as quickly as possible in light of the speed with which the financial information required is received from organizations.

PUBLIC SERVICE

ALLEGATION BY PUBLIC SERVICE ALLIANCE RESPECTING PATRONAGE

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): May I direct this question to the Prime Minister in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board. Would the Prime Minister undertake to investigate the allegation by the Public Service Alliance that government hiring practices are resulting in increasing personal and bureaucratic patronage in the Public Service?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will try to see what representations were made and follow them up.

Mr. Carter: In view of the allegation by the president of the Public Service Alliance that abuses have crept in since the Public Service Commission turned over hiring practices to the departments, will the Prime Minister take action to have the Public Service Commission assume full responsibility for hiring practices in all departments?

Mr. Trudeau: As I said in answer to the previous question, I will look into the matter. I am satisfied there is no accusation of patronage exercised by the government; this relates to the Public Service, as I understand it.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION TO ASSIST OWNERS OF SMALL FARMS TO RETIRE OR CHANGE OCCUPATION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns proposed legislation which would assist owners of small farms to retire or take up other trades or professions. Would the minister tell us when we can expect the legislation to be brought down?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I cannot give a precise date. Obviously, the legislation cannot be introduced until we have reached a satisfactory level of agreement with the provinces, and negotiations are still being conducted.

Mr. Murta: Is it true that the minister plans to place a ceiling of $20,000 as the maximum value of farms which would be covered—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking the minister to confirm or deny a statement, and a question in those terms is not in order.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED CONFERENCE ON FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL JURISDICTION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I see that the Solicitor General has left the House. I will therefore ask my question of the Prime Minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Would he tell us when he will propose a federal-provincial conference on the sharing of jurisdictions and on the provincial and federal responsibilities in the criminal field?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the general issue of distribution of power between the two government levels was put on the agenda as early as the February 1969 conference if my memory serves me right. Of course, the issue of penal and criminal jurisdiction is included but, as far as I know, no province has urgently requested a study of this question.

FINANCE

LIMITATION OF FOREIGN BORROWING BY PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Finance.

Can he tell the House whether he has sent to the Quebec premier a list of Canadian institutions from which he could obtain the funds he needs instead of looking for money outside this country?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is being put as a suggestion to the minister. I do not believe that, in such terms, this question is in order.

Mr. Ricard: Respectfully, Mr. Speaker, I should like to insist since the matter is vitally important and since the minister himself has made this point. I think that people would be happy to be informed of the minister's views in that respect.

Mr. Speaker: The minister could indicate his views on motions, if it is the hon. member's wish.

WATER RESOURCES

DIVERSION INTO SASKATCHEWAN RIVER OF WATER FROM NORTHWARD FLOWING STREAMS—DISCUSSIONS WITH ALBERTA

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Has the federal government held any discussions with the provincial authorities in Alberta concerning the diversion of water into the Saskatchewan River from water sources now flowing north to the Arctic?

Hon. Jack Davies (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): There have been discussions concerning the Peace River and the flooding of the Athabasca delta, but our discussions have been confined primarily to that subject.

Mr. Harding: Has any agreement for diversion been reached and, if so, how many acre feet are involved? Have surveys been made to assess any ecological damage which may result from such a diversion?

Mr. Davis: I have no knowledge of a possible diversion, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

QUOTA PROGRAM—REASSIGNMENT OF ACREAGE TO GRAINS OTHER THAN THOSE ASSIGNED IN ORIGINAL PERMIT BOOK APPLICATIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): This question is directed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. It pertains to the new grain quota program recently announced. Is any provision being considered to allow for the reassignment of acreage to grains other than those assigned in the original permit book applications to compensate for changes in farmers' programs necessitated by abnormal weather conditions or other unforeseen situations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. At all times it was intended that some permission would be given to make changes in the event of crop failures or some similar situation. The Wheat Board is now giving serious consideration to authorizing a general right of reassignment prior to a certain date in the late fall.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I have delayed doing so until the end of the question period because I did not want to interfere with the time available for questions. I thought the self-appointed repository of courtesy and intelligence in this chamber, the Solicitor General, would be here, but he is not. He left about 10 minutes ago. Had I known he was going to leave I would have raised my question of privilege earlier. It relates to something the hon. gentleman said. At one stage he said one of the reasons for refusing entry to Millhaven penitentiary of Members of Parliament was that if he did it for one he would have to do the same thing for others, and he did not wish to set that sort of precedent.

When my hon. friend from Timiskaming asked whether other members had visited the penitentiary during the time of the riot or later, he said no. The supplementary question of my hon. friend from Temiskaming established that the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands was a visitor to Kingston penitentiary, and such being the case I submit it casts some doubt upon the truthfulness of the remarks of the Solicitor General.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that is not a question of privilege. The hon. member is debating with the minister what were the actual circumstances. This cannot, in my estimation, constitute a question of privilege. I would say that the citation I quoted earlier when the hon. member for Abitibi rose on a question of privilege, Citation 113, is relevant in this case. I suggested to him that his question did not constitute a question of privilege and I have to make the same ruling in the case of the hon. member for Skeena. This is a matter for debate. Perhaps the hon. member might ask the minister again and try to have the question elucidated tomorrow.

[Mr. Davis.]

Mr. Benson: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, to simply state that I have never been in Millhaven penitentiary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Timiskaming and the hon. member for Skeena seek the floor at the same time. We shall have to recognize them one at a time. We shall begin with the hon. member for Skeena, but I would remind him that he has raised a question of privilege, that a ruling has been made by the Chair, and that the ruling is not subject to appeal.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I am not appealing your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I know I am not able to do so. But the evasive, cover-up answer from the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands, shows precisely how far he and his colleagues will go to hide from the truth.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has to resume his seat. The question period has expired and there is nothing before the House at the moment except calling orders of the day. The hon. member rose on a question of privilege and the Chair ruled it was not a question of privilege. The Minister of Finance rose on a question of privilege and again it was ruled there was no question of privilege. I do not see in what way we can continue the debate at this time.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): With respect, Mr. Speaker, I just rose to indicate, on a question of privilege, that both the Solicitor General and now the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands have not been telling the truth in this House. Surely that is a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have just ruled that it is not a question of privilege. I would invite the hon. member to read Citation 113 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition. I have made my ruling. The hon. member can make the point ten times, but he will still get the same ruling ten times. It is not a question of privilege. Orders of the day.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, may I raise a very simple question of privilege. In the discussion that has taken place this afternoon, and in the remarks that I made we were asking about entrance into a penitentiary. The Minister of Finance, who is also the Member of Parliament for Kingston and The Islands, visited a penitentiary in similar circumstances, and that was my point. The answer that the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands has now given in his role as a member, in my opinion, is not correct.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This again is debate. It seems to me that the whole situation is very clear; certainly it is to me. These questions can be asked again by the hon. member, not by way of a question of privilege or point of order but as straight questions. The question is a valid one and should be asked in the question period. If hon. members think that we should pursue the question period seven minutes after it has expired, this can be done, but only by unanimous consent. I will inquire whether there is unanimity.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I respectfully suggest to the hon. members for Skeena and Timiskaming, who are seeking information that they are certainly entitled to obtain, that they raise the matter again when we reach the question period tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, today being Thursday, is the hon. member for Peace River not going to ask what is the business of the House for the ensuing days?

Mr. Baldwin: I was, Mr. Speaker, but I wanted to make sure that all questions of privilege had been thoroughly exhausted. Can the government House leader indicate what will be the business for today, tomorrow, Monday and as far along into next week as his strong eyes can see?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, today, as was announced yesterday, we will begin with the amendment to the Senate and House of Commons Act, followed by the amendment to the Prime Minister's Residence Act. Following that I would call the agricultural bills, of which there are several, and then the Post Office Act. I should like to discuss further with my colleagues in what order I will call the various agricultural bills.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS' SESSIONAL AND EXPENSE ALLOWANCES, ETC.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved that Bill C-242, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and an act to make provisions for the retirement of members of the Senate, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this particular bill, and the issue surrounding it, have really been in the public domain since February 1970, when the committee on parliamentary salaries and expenses was appointed, and remained very active until its report was completed on November 16, 1970. In introducing this measure, and before paying some attention to the details of the bill, I should like to make a few comments about the role of the Member of Parliament.

The government and members on both sides of the House have for some time been concerned about the ability of the Member of Parliament to perform his role. As a result of this concern and the concern expressed by members themselves, members' facilities have gradually been improved. Some members will recall a time not so long ago when office accommodation had to be shared between two Members of Parliament. This situation has gradually been changed under successive governments, and plans are being developed for further improvement in office accommodation.

Following the 1968 election the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced the creation of research facilities for Members of Parliament, with the result that research divisions were established for the first time and attached to each caucus. Recently, improvements have been made, slight but definite improvements, in secretarial facilities. These are among a number of steps that have been taken to assist members in the performance of their function as representatives of the people.

While there are some aspects of the Beaupré report which the government does not feel ready at this time to accept or to recommend to Parliament—for example, increases in salaries for office holders—it does fully support the analysis of the role of the Member of Parliament contained in that report.

Touching upon the role of the member and the facilities required to discharge the responsibilities undertaken by members, the Beaupré committee makes the following comment:

> And yet, Members of Parliament, charged with the complicated and onerous responsibility of representing individual rights and interests as well as directing the affairs of the country are often deprived of even the most fundamental facilities requisite to the efficient performance of their duties, either because governments have not seen fit to make them available, or because of the strictures of the member's personal financial situation.

Then, in commenting upon the modern role of the Member of Parliament, the committee states:

> It is our belief that the individual member is the most important link in the communication chain that joins government to the public it serves. The committee—

That is, the Beaupré committee—

> —visualizes the role of the member as becoming more onerous, more complicated, more responsible and more time consuming. Consequently, it will become increasingly important that provisions be made that will permit him to respond quickly and adequately to the requirements of the people of Canada.

It seems to me it is not quite fair to demand of our Members of Parliament such a high degree of dedication to the public interest and then to fail to supply them with the necessary resources to help them discharge the tasks imposed upon them. Although the duties of a Member of Parliament cannot always be set down in a carefully drawn job description, these duties are nevertheless real and important and have always been recognized as an integral part of the job of representing the electorate of Canada.

The simple fact is that constituents expect and are entitled to a certain amount of attention and service from their member and, in the modern context, usually the provision of these services costs money. In addition to that, Members of Parliament have certain duties imposed upon them by the electorate. They are not always in a position to pick and choose what they shall do and what they shall not do. We, who serve as Members of Parliament, all know that often times we respond to the requirements and needs of the constituents we serve at a time when we have carefully determined goals for ourselves. That is to be expected and it is quite supportable.

Members of Parliament are not always in a position to control the time spent on their jobs, nor do they have nicely categorized responsibilities and carefully determined jobs to which they can direct their attention. A member is usually and willingly at the beck and call of his constituents, and must at the same time serve his responsibilities in the House. These are important responsibilities which lie at the very heart of our democratic parliamentary system.

The late Mr. King, as Prime Minister, put the situation in these terms:

> We cannot seek to detract from the importance of Parliament and we must afford to Members of Parliament that which will help them to preserve their independence and cause the best men in the country to enter its halls.

That objective is still modern and relevant, even though these words were spoken by Mr. King in 1945.

Even before the appointment of the Beaupré committee, it was obvious that members without independent means were unable to fulfil their responsibilities to their constituents and maintain a decent and reasonable standard of living for themselves and their families. The proposed measure is an attempt to deal with the problems, which members know better than anyone else, in a reasonable, honest and adequate fashion. The House will, of course, have the final determination of the proposals contained in this bill. The proposed bill has been put forward only after wide consultation and prolonged investigation by an independent committee and hon. members of the House. It is being introduced with the knowledge that it may not represent a perfect solution and that further study of this question will continue into the future, along with consideration of the role of the member in the functioning of the parliamentary system in the various ways in which members can be assisted to participate to the fullest extent in the adequate functioning of this institution.

These proposals are designed, in our view, to meet immediate requirements and alleviate present hardships. We believe that the goals suggested in the Beaupré report will be more directly attained by following the method outlined in the bill than by pursuing a course which may in the long run affect the status of elected members in a way not hitherto contemplated by Parliament.

The provision of $18,000 in indemnity and $8,000 in expense allowance will assist members to meet the pressing problems of maintaining two residences and fulfilling their personal, family, parliamentary and constituency obligations in a reasonable way. The bill is put forward as a solution which it is hoped will meet the problems with which members have had to deal in recent years and which have formed the basis of change. If better solutions or more effective proposals can be brought forward, the government is disposed to listen with sympathy and attention for future consideration.

The bill also contains amendments to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. The amendments proposed are designed so there will be no increase in either the contributions or pensions payable as a result of the proposed amendments to sections 33 and 44 of the Senate and House of Commons Act. The amount of contribution which a member pays is a percentage of his sessional indemnity as defined in paragraph (2)(1)(d) of the act. As a member of the House of Commons has been contributing on the sum of $12,000 sessional indemnity and $6,000 expense allowance, or $18,000 year only, there shall be no change in the level of contribution or the eventual pension as a result of the increase set out in the bill. Therefore, it is necessary to amend the definition of his sessional indemnity so that contributions will be made only on the net $18,000 sessional allowance.

The effect of this amendment is really to maintain a status quo in respect of the level of contributions and the maximum pension possible to a Member of Parliament. Similarly, a Senator who is under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act has been contributing on the sum of $12,000 sessional indemnity and $3,000 expense allowance, or $15,000 a year. In order that he shall continue to contribute on $15,000, it is necessary to amend the definition of his sessional indemnity. That is achieved by an amendment to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Because it is of interest to members and to members of the other place, a Senator who is under the 1965 act which makes provision for the retirement of members of the Senate has been contributing on his $12,000 sessional indemnity alone. An amendment proposed in this bill is designed to provide that he will continue to contribute and have his pension calculated on the basis of $12,000 instead of the new allowance of $18,000. No change in the rate of contribution is proposed. So much for the amendment to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Special provisions are made for members representing northern constituencies because they are subject to heavy burdens of expenses. These provisions are spelled out in the bill and will go a long way toward ensuring for elected representatives a degree of personal security which will compare with that in other less uncertain professions and contribute, I am certain, to the more efficient discharge of their responsibilities to the public.

Also of some interest is the provision to widen the existing authority for providing assistance to members for legitimate transportation and telecommunications expenses. As Your Honour is aware, the capacity of the House to provide, in a flexible way, for the transportation and telecommunications expenses has been somewhat hampered by restrictions in the present act. This will give the House an opportunity, if it so wishes, to provide for additional such expenses as recommended by the Beaupré committee report.

I might mention, since it is of interest, that the total increase over the 7½ year period, because it is effective October last year, is 44 per cent or approximately, if taken on an annual basis, I think a little better than 6 per cent. It may not be conclusive to any person who is opposed to this measure, but it is of interest and is helpful in making comparisons to note that between 1963 and 1970 the average weekly salaries and wages for all wage earners and salaried employees in the industrial composite rose 52.2 per cent. The salary, for example, of economists rose from between 45 per cent and 50 per cent. The salaries of engineers increased by about 50 per cent and the salaries of university professors increased from between 63 per cent and 68 per cent. It would seem that if the increases proposed here had been undertaken on an annual basis they would not be out of line with those experienced in other comparable occupations. For example, the average annual increase for managerial personnel between 1967 and 1969 has been between 7 per cent and 9 per cent.

Another instructive illustration is that engineers and statisticians have experienced pay increases averaging 8.6 per cent and 7.1 per cent in 1969 and 1970. In comparison with public servants with comparable responsibilities, the proposed salaries and allowances are not out of line. Many public servants in the upper brackets receive higher salaries, as do many executives in industry. I looked back at the debate which took place in 1954. The speeches made in that debate stuck in my mind over all those years. At that time I was a backbencher. I was so far along the backbench that I was almost out in the corridor. But I listened intently to the speeches made and those which remained in my mind were one made by the then Minister of Finance, now Mr. Justice Abbott, and another by the then hon. member for Cape Breton South, the late Clarey Gillis. I went back to these speeches. One question asked Mr. Abbott was what the salary was of the top deputy minister at that time. After some consultations with his colleagues, he stated that the top salary was something like $17,500. I do not know exactly what the top deputy minister in our public service receives today, but the proposals of the Clyne committee have been tabled in this House and it is possible for us to determine what changes have taken place in the payment to public servants.

As I mentioned, it would seem to me to be quite difficult to equate the responsibilities and the diversity of function of a Member of Parliament to any precise category in the public service, but it is certainly not unreasonable to think that we should at least be hooked up with some executive category within the public service, and that our responsibilities are at least equivalent to the responsibilities exercised in the executive category of the public service. Members of Parliament can take a look at what has been and what is happening in that category of the public service. At $26,000, including the tax free allowance, the remuneration of Canadian parliamentarians are still quite below that of representatives in the United States. In the United States the salaries are far ahead of those of Canadian parliamentarians. I have often wondered why the British government allows the salaries and facilities of Members of Parliament to be so dismally low. I cynically think to myself that any government or any party which wanted to render Members of Parliament less effective would give them the least possible facilities and the least possible money so that they would have to spend much time away from Parliament earning their living, and so that when they came to Parliament they would not have the services and accommodation that would enable them to represent the people.

Some people may think a good model is the British member who we see on a bench in a corridor dictating to his secretary, who I suppose probably is someone else's secretary as well. Certainly, that kind of approach is not one to which we generally subscribe in this country, nor is it supported by the Beaupré Report. We have heard from the distinguished new leader of the New Democratic Party, and the spokesman from the Créditiste party, about their concern with regard to facilities and things a member needs in order to do his job. I think it would be wrong for Members of Parliament to assist in perpetuation of the idea that the $8,000 expense account is salary. I think in this debate there can be no valid basis for disagreement concerning the method of treating the expense portion of this proposal. Mr. Speaker, any member can argue that it ought to be accountable and voucherable. That is one argument. But in my view it really is not quite cricket to argue that it can be regarded as salary because it is intended to provide a Member of Parliament with a fixed sum of money to allow him, in his own judgment, to provide those facilities and services which he thinks will enable him to best serve his constituents. In my judgment, in view of the other responsibilities we exercise daily, it is not too great a responsibility to give this opportunity to a member to decide how he will determine the allocation of the $8,000 and not oblige him to come back and have his accounts vetted by a member of the bureaucracy who normally is interrogated, questioned and brought to heel by elected Members of Parliament.

Mr. Lewis: You mean we try.

Mr. MacEachen: So, it has been felt wise to preserve the allowance feature. Therefore a clear distinction is made between what a member receives in indemnity, $18,000 under the proposed legislation compared to $12,000 at present, and what he receives as an allowance to enable him to discharge his function as a member. This will rise from $6,000 to $8,000. I should like to make clear that the government's thinking in providing the $8,000 allowance, and in increasing the amount of the allowance by $2,000, is to assist members in providing additional facilities or services for themselves in order better to serve the public. The need for such services is repeatedly stressed in the Beaupré report.

The $8,000 so recommended can be used by the member for accommodation in Ottawa, for a certain amount of travel including travel in his constituency, accommodation away from home and facilities in his constituency for keeping the member in closer contact with the electors of his riding. We are, therefore, recommending non-accountable expenses of $8,000 following the policy and tradition of this parliament since 1945. It will be recalled that the tax free allowance was introduced, I believe, in 1945 "for expenses incidental to the discharge of his duties as a member". In successive revisions since that time the principle of the allowance has been preserved, relating directly to the discharge of duties encountered by a Member of Parliament in his role as a Member of Parliament. I want to emphasize, with regard to the provision of facilities for constituency purposes, that the allowance is intended to enable the member to provide those facilities which in his own judgment are best suited to the needs of his particular constituency and in the way in which he can best use that sum of money to serve his constituents.

The elected member should have the authority and responsibility, in our view, to apply the allowance in a manner appropriate to his own particular situation. The Member of Parliament is continuously accountable, it seems to me, in a much more meaningful and relevant way to his fellow members of the House of Commons, to public opinion, and to the electorate. He will be required to give an accounting, and is giving an accounting, for all his activities to all these observing groups at all times. Surely, they will observe also and take him to account for the way in which he deals with the responsibility that he has now.

The considerations which the Beaupré committee used in reaching their conclusions on services are found on page 39 of the report. I will not repeat them here, but these were the considerations that led the committee to conclude that the welfare of Parliament demanded an increase in facilities and a substantial increase in salaries. We have differed somewhat in method from the recommendation of the Beaupré committee, but our approach favours the same goal. I have stated already the reasons which led us to reach this conclusion.

I want to make one point, and I think it is important to make it, that if you examine the Beaupré report and you make a list of those items of expense for which the Beaupré committee said members should be reimbursed, and if you put a figure on these, which is not hard to do, you will find that the total of these recommended expenses which should be met out of the public purse will, according to Beaupré, reach at least $8,000. The hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) said that his total was in excess of $8,000. The expenses which Beaupré said should be reimbursable on voucher will at least reach $8,000 in my view, and I agree with the hon. member for Malpeque that it exceeds $8,000. So, we are really attempting to implement the facilities proposals of Beaupré. All we differ in is the method, whether it be by submission of vouchers or through a fixed sum, with the responsibility in the hands of the member. That is the difference in method, and I believe there can be valid differences of opinion on that approach. The cabinet has certainly given very careful consideration to this matter and has concluded that it would be more in accord with the position of Members of Parliament to maintain this tax free allowance non-accountable.

My colleagues will recall that this was a very important point of argument, and the conclusion was reached on the basis of principle that we ought to maintain this, not because of any personal status which we want to confer on ourselves individually, or because of any personal glorification. We will pass out of here in due course, perhaps some of us quicker than we would like, but other Members of Parliament will come in to perform that office. We think this type of method is more in keeping with the traditional role of a Member of Parliament.

Today we had a question of privilege. It was on the grounds that Members of Parliament had a right to visit penal institutions. Presumably because the job demanded a particular independence that no other citizen required, Mr. Speaker made clear that Members of Parliament enjoy certain privileges under act of parliament which no other citizen enjoys. We can say what we please in this House within our rules. Why have we been given this special privilege? It has been given so Members of Parliament, as representatives of the people, will be able to speak freely without fear or favour.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: They will have the independence to say what they think is necessary without fear of reprisal of any kind. If a member exceeds the bounds of good conduct, the House will discipline that member, but it is a special privilege.

Mr. Lewis: For which we should get paid?

Mr. MacEachen: What I am arguing is—and I believe the hon. member will follow the argument if he does not agree with it—that Members of Parliament have certain privileges that no other citizen has in order to maintain their independence. That is the point. There are precedents. This situation was not created by this government or by this Parliament. It was created a long time ago. The Senate and House of Commons Act says that Members of Parliament shall have immunities, privileges and powers equivalent to those powers and privileges enjoyed by members of the British parliament. These continue for reasons that I have stated.

It may not be a great point, but I think the point is worth making, that we should preserve the independence of Members of Parliament and their status by not equating them to other civil servants who have to submit their accounts for minute examination. That is the only point that I am making. You can disagree with it or not, but I thought I should explain to the House that this is the reason that we have adopted this approach.

I should like to say a few things in conclusion. We agree, I believe, that we cannot afford to close out parliamentary life or parliamentary careers to men of modest means. Over the years, the principle followed has been that of attempting to draw a line between what is necessary as adequate compensation for those without private income while at the same time rejecting the principle that parliament shall be made attractive purely as a source of income. I think we have tried successfully to accomplish these objectives in this measure. I do not see any great danger of people running for parliament purely in order to obtain the remuneration and allowances spelled out in this measure. If they did so, I think they would be fooling themselves and I do not think in any such situation they would likely be elected. We do not need to ask the Beaupre Committee to tell us of the definite possibility of some hon. members, who otherwise might have been constrained to withdraw from public life in order to provide adequately for their families and meet their responsibilities, now being able to reconsider. One can only visualize cases of competent and able persons prevented from standing for a parliamentary seat because of financial obligations who will now be able hopefully to make their services available. That, at least, is one of the purposes of the proposed legislation.

Anyone who is a member of this House knows the problems that have to be faced. They are recognized in the Beaupré committee report and in other studies over the years. The government is certainly not going to try to sell the measure to the House. Members will act according to their own personal assessment of the situation in which they and others find themselves.

In looking over the debate in 1954 I came across a statement by the then prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent. When introducing the legislation on that occasion he made the point which the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party made on Monday. He said:

> Hon. members will appreciate, however, that these recommendations, which affect all of us in Parliament personally and directly, present an unusual situation. All of us feel reluctance to do for ourselves what we would not hesitate to do for others.

This is a difficult situation and makes the advocacy of this particular bill not the most pleasant task for a minister like myself, who usually has come into the House in support of measures affecting a broad class of people other than Members of Parliament. However, the job has to be done and it has been made clear in all the debates that nobody can take this responsibility except the government. We feel that in this instance, and based on a lot of thought, the move we are making is in the best interests of Parliament and not just the member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen) or the member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) or the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but Parliament as a whole. It is in that spirit that I believe we ought to consider the measure.

Mr. St. Laurent made this further comment:

> However, all of us have a duty to consider first what is advisable in the interest of upholding and strengthening our democratic parliamentary institutions, and I ask every hon. member on both sides of the House to put aside all personal or partisan considerations and to approach the consideration of this resolution and the consequent legislation in an objective spirit, and deal with it not because of the way in which it may affect him personally, but in the way in which he honestly believes will be in the best interests of our Canadian parliamentary institutions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Later, an amendment was made by the then hon. member for MacLeod that would make the proposal at that time optional. In other words if you wanted to take the salary, there would be a clause in the bill giving you that option. The prime minister of the day refused that amendment because he said the bill had to be considered not on what was the wish of any individual member, on whether he wanted to take it, but that these measures ought to be judged on what was good for the institution of Parliament. That is the spirit in which I am proposing this bill to the House and I hope I have displayed that spirit in making my presentation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House is for second reading and reference to the Committee on Procedure and Organization of Bill C-242, which deals, among other things, with the question of increasing the pay and allowances of members of Parliament. As the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has said, this is not a task that any of us look forward to or relish, but nevertheless the responsibility rests with the government to bring in the proposed measure and with Parliament as a whole to determine what its fate will be. This being the case, there is no way that we can avoid our responsibility.

Members of Parliament must therefore look objectively at this problem as it affects this institution and its future, and as it will affect the men and women who will replace those of us who sit in this chamber at the present time. I refer to the young men and women just starting their parliamentary career who would look forward to a considerable number of years in the service of this chamber. It would be easy to cater to the fact that the general public may be lacking in information with regard to the peculiarities of the duties of Members of Parliament. It is therefore a rather thorny nettle that we must grasp but we must grasp it now. I feel that nobody should look upon the sessional allowance of Members of Parliament as a salary for the simple reason that nobody should consider service in this House of Commons as a career that they can choose as young men and look forward to as a way of providing a livelihood in their productive years. Anyone who looks to service in the House of Commons from this selfish point of view, as something that he sets out to do, usually does not get here. Rather he may end up in some university teaching Political Science, but he certainly would not be elected as a Member of Parliament because the very opposite is the case.

Members of Parliament, as a rule, do not put themselves forward in the first instance as candidates for nomination by a political party; by the reverse process, political parties representing bodies of opinion throughout the country seek the man they think will attract the greatest confidence of the greatest number of people in the area and they call upon the electorate to elect him. He is not home free yet by any manner of means. He is then subject to an election campaign where he is presumably running against two or three others who are the best people their parties can find in that area. Only one can win; there are no second prizes in this business. Having gone through that process, he has no security of tenure. He is subject to re-election, usually at least every four years. Over the last period of years elections have been much more frequent than that. I have not served in this chamber for quite 20 years, yet I have had to win eight elections.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: What I want to try to impress on the chamber is that we are not looking at a salary that can be accurately compared with a salary in any other field of endeavour. To begin with, the salary does not increase automatically as one gains experience and as one serves over a period. The fellow who has been here for 30 years, and since confederation several members have served here for 30 years, gets exactly the same as the fellow who was just elected in the last election. In other words, you do not get more simply because you have been here for a long time, or succeeded in staying here for a long time, unless you happen to be given the opportunity of taking on additional responsibilities or are made a cabinet minister. I shall say more about that later.

So, the ordinary criteria that apply to suitable remuneration in an ordinary career cannot validly be applied to the remuneration for serving in this place. It is difficult to know any field with which one can validly compare this place. It occurs to me that an allowance one is paid here is something like damages. When somebody, through negligence, causes an accident that destroys some person's ability to carry on an ordinary career and earn his ordinary means of livelihood, damages are paid. There is an element of this in the sessional allowances paid to Members of Parliament. Many members are pressured, I might say, into running for Parliament by their parties. They are elected because they are doing well in their careers. Usually at that time when they are making a good living and they should be consolidating their positions. Sometimes they serve here as members for one or two parliaments, and are defeated. When they go back they find that the business they had built up or the professional career they had established as an income producer has been virtually destroyed, and they must start over again at great financial sacrifice to themselves. That is why, basically, we must look at the salary in the first instance as a sessional allowance.

What is an appropriate figure? As I have said, it is difficult to be just in this matter. We should need the judgment of Solomon to come down with a figure, applicable to every member of the House, that would be fair. It is difficult to do, since what we are trying to do applies to ourselves and our colleagues. Therefore, as the minister has said, we must try to remain somewhere between two levels, between the figure that would be so attractive that people would seek election to this place for monetary gain and the second, lower figure, below which Canadians except those of independent means would be completely precluded from serving in Parliament. I sincerely believe that we are well below that figure now and will be below it until this legislation is passed. The proof of that pudding is that there are a number of members in this House who, if the indemnity were not increased, could not in conscience continue in this House. They would have to refrain from running in the next election in the interests of maintaining their obligations to their dependents and to themselves.

As I said the other day, there are roughly three categories of members in this House: those of independent means; those who can serve here as a result of a combination of favourable circumstances; and those who, if the present situation were to continue, would have to discontinue membership in the House if they were to be fair to their families. On a different occasion the wife of a member made a caustic comment to me. She said, "You know, I worked for two or three years to put my husband through college. We had to pay for him for the last three years until he got his degree. I didn't expect that I would have to work for a number of years to put him through parliament as well."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: May I say a word about the amount that has been recommended by the minister. I ought to say at once, and I neglected to say this at the beginning of my remarks, that this is not a party, political matter and, therefore, I am not in a position to bind the stand of members of my party on this bill. Nor would I wish to do so even if I could. I think it is fair to say, nevertheless, that the vast majority of members of the official opposition agree with the proposition that, in principle, something must be done. Since we have gone through a long period of inflation and rising costs, I deplore the fact that there has been such a long period without adjustment. The longer such a period is, the more difficult it is to adjust the matter fairly and accurately.

I point out that when wages increase by 3 or 4 per cent per year, each year's increase is a percentage of the previous year's total. Wages, therefore, increase as compound interest increases, in geometric progression. If our salaries had been increased by 6 per cent every year for the last eight years, the amount would be $19,000 and not $18,000. If the increase had been 5 1/4 per cent for seven years in a row, the total amount of the increase would have been greater than 50 per cent of the original at the end of eight years. A 6 per cent increase every year for seven years is a little bit greater than a 50 per cent increase in a "slap". I am not putting these figures forward in justification of the figure suggested. I am pointing this out in passing.

Actually, in my opinion, the increase in salary is a little high; on the other hand, if there is to be another long lapse before another adjustment is made, it is not adequate, especially if the erosion of the value of the dollar continues in the future. I recognize that the government probably arrived at the figure of $18,000 because they were not completely free to go below it when all considerations had been taken into account. One consideration is that we are amending the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. The retirement allowances that were provided by the amendments to the act last year were long overdue. They are now adequate, but no more than that. I do not agree with one aspect of that legislation, but on the whole the legislation which was passed last year is reasonable.

I do not think there was any justification or logic in making our allowances for expenses, now $6,000 which will be increased to $8,000, a part of the amount on which we should be able to contribute for our retirement. That was completely illogical. Even if the government has had to raise the salary figure a little higher than it intended, by making it $18,000 and by amending the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, I am pleased that they thereby kept retirement contributions and benefits constant and now will have them only on the indemnity side of the benefits where they logically should be.

I wish to make a couple of other comments in passing. Although the minister did refer to it briefly, he did not say much about the fact that the government is not recommending any increase in the salaries of office holders, namely the cabinet, parliamentary secretaries, Speaker and others of that category. As a result of that, the differentiation between the remuneration of a backbencher and the office of Prime Minister, cabinet minister or Speaker has diminished substantially. That is as it should be.

When the very large differential was established between the sessional indemnity of a private member and a cabinet minister, it was justified because the office holders were required to remain in Ottawa and work all year. In those days, the sessions of Parliament were relatively short. at that time members of Parliament could apply some of their time in the course of the year to their ordinary occupation. That is no longer the case. The sessions of Parliament have increased to such a degree that not only the office holders but the private Members of Parliament are here virtually all year. This is a full-time job. There is not as much need for a wide differential between the two classes.

I recommend, however, that a review be made in the very near future of the pay of office holders. If and when this bill passes, a review of the position of office holders should be reviewed in the light of this legislation with a view to adjusting it upwards in some cases. I believe that the salary of the office of Speaker is not adequate. The position of members of the government should be reviewed, including the positions of Prime Minister, Leader of the Opposition, parliamentary secretaries, whips and others.

An hon. Member: And House leaders.

Mr. MacLean: It is not appropriate that the person holding the office of Prime Minister of this great country should receive roughly the same remuneration as a deputy minister. That is what the position will be in the very near future. If it is not adjusted, it will not be too far from that. I have no firm recommendations to make on this at the moment, but it is something which should be reviewed in the not too distant future.

Amendments are also being made to the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. As I have said, it was appropriate for the government to draw this bill in such a way that the increases in the sessional indemnity and allowances will not be changed with regard to the size of either the benefits or contributions to be made in connection with retiring allowances. It is appropriate that the contributions should be based only on the sessional indemnity total amount which Members of Parliament receive. That is as it should be.

Because this act is being opened, it gives me an opportunity to make an observation. There were a number of Members of Parliament in the last Parliament who for various reasons such as age and health are no longer members because they did not stand for Parliament in the last election. I am not speaking about the people who stood for Parliament and were defeated. That is their tough luck. I am referring to those who did not stand for Parliament in the last election. After long years of faithful service to the people of Canada, they forfeited the benefits which would have accrued to them had they been in this Parliament when the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act was amended. I realize it is difficult to do anything retroactive for ex-members of Parliament, but it is within the power of this government to compensate for this situation in other ways. I hope the government will examine the situation and make suitable appointments or something of that sort to a few outstanding cases in this field.

There is very little else I want to say at this time. I believe that most members of the party I represent are in agreement with this bill in principle. I hope it will be given second reading and referred to committee for detailed study within a reasonable time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin my remarks by saying to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) that I very much appreciate the tone in which he introduced the bill and the sincerity with which he obviously spoke. I appreciated his approach to it in a way that did the best that could be done for the bill which he presented. Even though I am going to express opposition to it, I hope that in my remarks I can match the same approach of responsible discussion as he did in the introduction of this bill.

Senate and House of Commons Act

The President of the Privy Council said the government was introducing this measure, not for the benefit of any particular member or members in the House, but in the best interests of Parliament. I want to say that my opposition to this bill derives precisely from my concern for the best interests of Parliament in the eyes of the people of Canada. I think it is impossible for the government or for members of this House to ignore the economic and social context in which the bill before us is being introduced and discussed. If we were living at a time of relatively full employment, with two or three per cent unemployment only, if the promises of three years ago had been even partially fulfilled and some of the inequalities in our society had been lessened, if not removed, if we could look at what Parliament and this government had done in the last three years and feel the people had really benefited from efforts to eradicate or at least to reduce the injustices in our present society, then the President of the Privy Council might have a situation on which to base his statement that he was bringing forward this proposal in the best interests of Parliament.

As things are, I do not believe the bill will serve the best interests of Parliament. I can think of no better way of putting it than the words the minister quoted from Mr. St. Laurent when he was prime minister in 1954. He was quoted by the President of the Privy Council as saying, in connection with a bill of the kind presently before us: "All of us feel a reluctance to do for ourselves what we would not hesitate to do for others." This is what worries me. Can the people of Canada really think that this is the case when they consider all we have failed to do for the poor of Canada, or the limits we have placed upon what we are prepared to do for the old age pensioners in Canada, or the deliberate creation of unemployment throughout the country as a result of government policies, or our failure to remove the slums in this country or even to affect them appreciably, or our failure to build homes for the people who so desperately need them, or the mincing steps we have taken to clear pollution from the environment of our cities, or to clean up the air and waters of Canada for the benefit of the people? Can we sincerely agree with Mr. St. Laurent that we would not hesitate to do for others what we are prepared, now, to do for ourselves? I suggest we cannot, because it is not a correct statement, and because we cannot do so I submit we cannot in conscience support the proposition placed before us today.

Too many millions of people are today suffering deprivation of an extreme kind, and we have taken only a very few uncertain steps to deal with this situation. I am not making an attack on the government only; I suspect that other governments would encounter similar difficulties with respect to some of these intractable problems. But it is in this context I am obliged to look at the bill before us. I cannot support it. I cannot support it because I can imagine what all these people will feel. And there are millions of them. I am not thinking about one per cent of the Canadian people. I am thinking about 80 or 90 per cent of the Canadian people, half of whom are living in poverty and the other half in extreme financial and economic difficulty. I am thinking about the overwhelming majority of our people, not only those in the industrial plants, in the mines and in the forests, but working people on the farms who are going through a situation of extreme financial want and inadequate cash income.

These are the people we are asking to make our situation relatively quite comfortable. I cannot agree to this. I cannot accept the notion that we have in fact been ready to do for others what we are prepared to do for ourselves, because we have not. Representatives of the government, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) himself, have gone about the country saying to the workers: You must not take more than 6 per cent. The Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission says: You must not take more than 4 or 5 per cent. The Governor of the Bank of Canada says the increases received by ordinary workingpeople are too high, that they must come down. This is the context within which the present bill is presented. This Parliament has said to the people of the country generally—and even though I disagree with these statements I am a member of the House: You will have to accept a situation of difficulty and economic pressure, of financial inadequacy. To the poor we have said: We sympathize with you, but you must continue to live in poverty and degradation. To the unemployed we have said: Because we are fighting inflation we shall create unemployment, and we have done so.

I feel it is impossible to support this bill for four simple reasons. First, because of the size of the increase, if any increase is justified. There are Members of Parliament who have been in difficulty and one must recognize that some increase is justified. But this is too much. Second, I object to continuing and increasing the non-taxable allowance. Even if we decided to leave the $6,000 where it was as a non-taxable allowance, any additional expenses that we allow members to charge to the public treasury ought to be on the basis of vouchers. I object strongly to the provision of seven months retroactivity. Seven-twelfths of the increase will go to Members of Parliament if this bill passes today; if it is passed a month from now it will be eight-twelfths of the total increase. We do not deal with public servants in this way; they must be satisfied with only part of the increase being made retroactive and the rest from the date of settlement. But in this case, the increase is retroactive to October 7 or October 8, whatever the date may be. I object, finally, to the method by which the incomes and expenses of Members of Parliament are adjusted.

Let me deal with each of these objections separately. I do not buy the idea of a 50 per cent increase in salary, leaving the allowance aside. The increase in indemnity proposed is from $12,000 to $18,000, that is, 50 per cent. I was among those who were defeated in 1963 before the increase took place and I did not come back until 1965. But I have had occasion to look at Hansard.

In 1963, the indemnity of Members of Parliament was increased from $8,000 to $12,000 and the non-taxable allowance was increased from $2,000 to $6,000. If my memory serves me aright, in the discussion at the time it was pointed out that it was difficult to make adjustments very frequently and that the adjustments that were then made would take into account future years as well as past years. If an adjustment had been made for the past only, the increase would not have been so high. Therefore, I do not buy the argument that we go back seven and a half years, because I am certain that at least half of that time was taken into account in the adjustment made in 1963.

The simple fact is that this represents a 50 per cent increase in salary for a Member of Parliament in one crack. If it is also being done for the moguls and mandarins in the public service, I object to that as well. If they can make more in private industry, then I suggest they should go out and mislead private industry instead of misleading the government and the people of Canada, as so many of the mandarins have done and are doing now. This is too large a chunk of increase for me to buy.

As for the additional non-taxable allowance, I think expense vouchers would have been preferable. I take second place to no one in this House in wishing that the facilities of members could be improved so that we could improve our service to our constituents. I do not believe that the Bri ish system is so right. There are many things in the British system upon which we have improved. I have long ago cut my apron strings from the head of what used to be the Commonwealth and Empire but what is now just the Commonwealth, of which Britain is a member like any other member country of the Commonwealth. This has brought about a great improvement in international relations.

I see no reason for following the British example regard to facilities. I find nothing more depressing than to go to Westminster and see a Member of Parliament dictating to a secretary in the hall. I think we have made some improvements in this country in this regard. When I first came to live in Ottawa in the late thirties I remember visiting Mr. Coldwell and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, who had just been elected, both of whom occupied the same room. They had no secretary but had to get a typist from the pool whom they brought to their office. Although there has been some improvement, a great deal more improvement is necessary before our work can really be as effective as it ought to be. Until very recently I, like other backbench members of the House, occupied an office with my secretary. I always found awkward the fact that she had to walk the halls of this building for at least half the day while I was being interviewed or was interviewing someone in my office. So our facilities do have to be improved.

I simply could not get, no matter how much I tried, some little improvement from the government in the amount of money allocated to research for opposition parties. The $35,000 a year allotted by the government to our party about three years ago has not been increased. We have to provide for increases in staff, or for better staff if possible, out of that amount. I have spoken to members of the cabinet many times in the past two years about making some little improvement, but have always been turned down.

I say to the President of the Privy Council that this would be one improvement in facilities that would help the members of my party as well, I am sure, as the members of other parties, including the government party. I could not even get a $10,000 or $15,000 increase in order to improve the salaries we have to pay to three people, plus a secretary, plus other expenses to which the $35,000 had to stretch. We have to provide for three researchers, a secretary and meet these other expenses out of a total of $35,000.

Our services to our constituents ought to have first place. We ought to be able to afford an office and some staff in each constituency, particularly in large constituencies. I might be able to do without in my close metropolitan constituency in Toronto which is very small in area. Those who represent constituencies that stretch over tens, sometimes twenties, of miles long and wide certainly need assistance to enable them to travel in a proper manner, adequately and quickly. Such services are essential.

I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council why the expense of providing these services cannot be met by a voucher system. This would not denigrate the position of a Member of Parliament. We would have the $6,000 non-taxable allowance as before, though the Beaupré committee objected to it and I agree with their objection. With a voucher system, additional expenses would have to be set out and only those who incurred such expenses would be reimbursed.

There is no restriction on how we use the $8,000, as was the case with the $6,000 also. The problem is in the context not of mistrust of any member but in the context of the taxpayer outside the House of Commons who, before he is allowed any deductions from his taxable income, has to show how he has expended certain moneys. He has to prove his expenses. Assuming that he donates to charity more than $100, he then has to prove every penny he has spent.

The average taxpayer of Canada has the right to ask: What is it that places the Member of Parliament in such a special position that he can get eight thousand bucks a year for which he does not have to account, and with which he can do anything. It is in the context of the best interests of this institution in the eyes of the people that I raise all these points.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Veterans Affairs—Compulsory transfer from non-taxable war veterans allowances to taxable guaranteed income supplement—Application of tax relief to 1971; the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow)—Finance—Representation of general public on banks' boards of directors.

Private Bills

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

CENTRAL-DEL RIO OILS LIMITED

Mr. Hu Harries (Edmonton-Strathcona) moved that Bill S-12, respecting Central-Del Rio Oils Limited, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to permit Central-Del Rio Oils Limited to acquire the status of a company incorporated under Part I of the Canada Corporations Act and, subject to the provisions of that act, to amalgamate with its wholly owned subsidiary Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas Limited. The circumstances are these. The Central-Del Rio Oils Limited is a public company incorporated under the Alberta Companies Act of 1947. Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas Limited is a company incorporated under letters patent under the Canada Corporations Act. All shares issued and outstanding are wholly owned by Central-Del Rio. Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas Limited is, therefore, a wholly owned subsidiary of Del Rio.

The operations of these two companies, both of which are engaged in the exploration and development of oil and gas resources, mainly in the Prairie provinces and and in the Northwest Territories, have been completely integrated for a considerable period of time. For administrative reasons only, it is desirable at this time to amalgamate the two companies. Section 128A of the Canada Corporations Act provides for amalgamation of companies incorporated under that act but Central-Del Rio is not, of course, incorporated under that act at the present time. The Alberta Companies Act under which Central-Del Rio is incorporated provides that the company, if authorized by special resolution of its shareholders and the laws of Canada, may apply to be continued as if it had been incorporated under federal law. No comparable provision is contained in the Canada Corporations Act, hence the necessity for this bill.

The bill authorizes the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), on application of the company authorized by a special resolution of its shareholders, to issue letters patent to Central-Del Rio continuing it as a company under Part I of the Canada Corporations Act. It will then have the same status as if it had been incorporated under that act in the first place. I should point out that no change is proposed in the authorized capital or in the powers of the company and, of course, all of the rights of creditors are preserved.

In addition, the bill provides that an amalgamation agreement, adopted at a meeting of the company shareholders at which the special resolution approving the application to continue the company as a company under the Canada Corporations Act was approved, shall be deemed to be an amalgamation agreement for the purposes of section 128A of the Canada Corporations Act. You will readily understand the reason for this.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard).]

The alternative would be that a shareholders' meeting would be necessary to pass a special resolution to authorize the company to apply to become a continuing company under the federal act. Then, a second shareholders' meeting would be necessary to approve an agreement for the purpose of amalgamating the two corporations. There is, therefore, a provision in this act which avoids the necessity for these two shareholders' meetings by providing that the amalgamation agreement passed at the same time as the special resolution authorizing the company to apply for continuation under the federal statute will be regarded as an amalgamation agreement under the Canada Corporations Act.

I might add, as a matter of interest, that Canadian Pacific Investments Limited is the majority shareholder in Central-Del Rio Oils Limited. Canadian Pacific Investments Limited holds 89.27 per cent of the outstanding equity shares. Out of a total of 83,074 shareholders, 72,047 are residents of Canada and hold some 29,825,000 shares. There are fewer than 1,000 shareholders who are resident in the United States, and they hold in the aggregate only 311,000 shares. The remaining group of shareholders, about 128 in number, are resident in other than the United States and Canada and hold in total approximately 319,000 shares.

The bill really contains a simple provision which is necessary if these two companies are to amalgamate. The only alternative procedure would be to disband the existing company and re-incorporate under the federal act which is a much more complicated procedure than that proposed by this legislation. I therefore urge that this bill be accepted.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to commend the hon. gentleman who introduced this bill for the clear way in which he explained its purpose. I followed his introductory remarks word for word and noticed that he stayed close to the extent, and that with one or two exceptions which are appropriate in this House as distinct from the Senate, his speech was identical to that of a great Canadian, Senator Manning.

An hon. Member: Senator Manning! Who is he?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): In any event, Mr. Speaker, there is something with which this House should concern itself beyond what Senator Manning said and beyond what the hon. gentleman from Edmonton has said. We should be concerned about the position of resources in Canada and the potential and existing relationship between Central-Del Rio, Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas Limited and foreign corporations. As I understand it, and this is not clear from either reading or listening, Central-Del Rio is considered to be a Canadian owned corporation in the sense that Canadian Pacific Investments owned it and that there are fewer than 1,000 shareholders resident in the United States holding $311,000 shares compared with 29 million shares in Canadian hands.

What we should be concerned about, inasmuch as we have just witnessed the end of one phase of the consideration by the government of the position of Home Oil vis-à-vis Canadian ownership, is the general expectation that the government will eventually get around to developing and making public a policy statement about Canadian ownership. This matter has been of concern to different governments for quite some period of time. It is a matter of tremendously increasing importance to Canadians from one end of Canada to the other. This is the activity to which I should like to refer.

Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas Limited, which is the subsidiary, has a 9 per cent investment and interest in Panarctic Oil which is, as we know, a consortium of a number of private companies, I think 20 in number, and the Canadian government, as the representative of Canadian taxpayers. This Parliament of Canada acts on behalf of these Canadian people in respect of an investment to the extent of 45 per cent in the equity ownership of Panarctic Oil. We are participants, along with Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas, Central-Del Rio and Canadian Investments Limited in oil exploration and development in the Arctic area.

In addition to our general concern about Canadianism we must consider what we should do in respect of acceding to the request of this company for the passage of this bill. It is my view that the Parliament of Canada should exact from the proponents of this bill—the owners of the company or companies involved—an admission that it should always be the case in the Canadian interest that a maximum be placed upon the degree of foreign ownership permitted in the oil industry or particularly in this segment of the oil industry of this country. In another way, and at another time, we determined this in so far as the banking institutions of Canada are concerned. There shall be a limitation on the equity ownership in banks. On two other occasions, this Parliament determined in respect of two insurance companies that there should be and is in fact, a limitation upon the extent of foreign ownership of those Canadian subsidiary companies. In those two instances as you may recall, Mr. Speaker, because I think on one of those occasions you were in the Chair when the House dealt with those matters, we started from the point that the company which sought incorporation by way of a private bill was in fact United States owned, and that in that regard it was a matter of putting a limitation that had involved in it a point of time as well as a percentage of ownership.

It was the approach of Parliament at that time to ask for a reversal of the foreign ownership situation to get to a point where Canadianism was the prominent factor in those companies. Here, we do not have that situation. We have a company which, according to the hon. gentleman from—

An hon. Member: Edmonton-Strathcona.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): —Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries)—I apologize for not knowing the proper name of the hon. member's constituency but in order to remember names of constituencies one must have the opportunity to hear them often and this has not been my privilege in this case. In any event, according to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona and Senator Manning, there is a large degree of Canadian ownership within this company. I think this Parliament should continue that large degree of Canadian ownership. I think we should incorporate some type of provision in this bill. I am not attempting to draft the words of it now because that would become a technical and legal matter. However, I believe there should be some provision in this legislation which would limit for all time the extent of foreign ownership in this particular company.

I believe a similar approach should be taken in respect of the other bill concerning Mic Mac Oils, but we have not looked at it sufficiently to determine what the inner corporate structure of that company is. This is a Canadian firm and we should be concerned about what is best for Canada. I think it would be well, through you, Mr. Speaker, in an indirect way to ask the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona if he would communicate to the principals of this company, the board of directors or the lawyer representing the company, the fact that it has been stated in Parliament—it is true by only one member so far—that this bill should have contained a provision which would limit the amount of foreign ownership in the company. In this way, it would remain Canadian by declaration of this Parliament. I am not at this moment advancing any arbitrary figure because I have none in mind. I think one would have to look at the relative percentage of ownership involved. Does the hon. gentleman from Edmonton-Strathcona desire to ask a question?

Mr. Harries: With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I suggest this bill is going to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications and at that time it would be our intention to have as many of the officers of the company as required there. I believe that would be an excellent time to discuss this particular matter with them, if that would be satisfactory?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, that would be quite satisfactory. However, I think it would be even more satisfactory if we had some indication from the hon. member before the bill receives second reading that there is a commitment on the part of the company to the proposition we are making, so that it would not be just a simple matter of answering questions. On the two previous occasions on which Parliament dealt with legislation of this nature and put some delimiting features in the legislation, if that is any precedent, the amendments were drafted before the bill received second reading. That would seem to be a reasonable way to do it in this case. I would be glad to accommodate the hon. gentleman at some subsequent time when the matter is revived for second reading by permitting him an opportunity to disclose the type of information he receives from the principals behind this bill. If there should be agreement in respect of what we propose concerning foreign ownership, then we could give second reading at that stage and proceed to the consideration before the committee.

At the conclusion of my last remarks, the hon. member leaned back in his seat probably as an indication that he is not willing to accept the suggestion I made. But I believe it would be a very pertinent and worthwhile thing to do because we are dealing with the resources of Canada. Some of these come under the jurisdiction of the provinces pursuant to the BNA Act, but none the less they are resources which should be available for the use of Canadians.

I think it might be worthwhile to look at what Central-Del Rio Oils Limited comprises in so far as its ownership of producing oil and gas wells and the leases it holds and so on are concerned. We could then see what is involved at the moment, without looking into the future to see what advances this company may make. Central-Del Rio Oils Limited has a wholly owned subsidiary Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas Limited, and another wholly owned subsidiary as well, Leduc Limited in the United States. There is also Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas of Canada Limited which carries on operations in the United Kingdom and an affiliated company, Minerals Limited in the province of Saskatchewan. At least this is the information provided by the Financial Post Survey of Oils, 1971.

Central-Del Rio Oils and its subsidiaries hold interests equal to more than 705 oil and gas wells and some 20 million acres of oil and gas rights, chiefly in western and northern Canada. The company specifically owns mineral titles, Crown and freehold leases covering 11,787,827 gross acres in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba of which 2,926,409 acres are under lease or sublease to others, with the company reserving a royalty, and are therefore excluded from a table which I have here. Unleased mineral title lands are included within the table. I did not refer to the table because I do not think it is necessary at this stage to list in detail what these holdings are. In addition, mineral titles are held on 1,800,000 gross acres on Vancouver Island, B.C., as are mineral prospecting permits covering 332,490 net acres in Keewatin district in the Northwest Territories.

The company in the first half of 1970, just about a year ago, purchased 4,160 acres for $1.1 million at West Pekisko and West Quirk Creek in Alberta; 60,000 acres for $800,000 in northeastern B.C.; and additional interests in southwestern Alberta and the Fort Simpson area in the Northwest Territories. One of the things which we could probably explore about these purchases is that presumably—and this is not clear from the Financial Post Survey of Oils 1971, I am just speculating about the possibility of what exists here—the $1.1 million which they paid for the 4,000 acres in Alberta was simply paid for the rights and not for any producing wells. If that is the case, it is almost like real estate speculation in which someone buys a lot of land or acquires leasehold rights to it and then sells those rights with the consequential sale price being reflected in whatever the commodities are that are produced later on.

In other words, I am sure that this $1.1 million which was paid for the 4,000 acres in Alberta and the $800,000 which was paid for the 60,000 acres in northeastern British Columbia will eventually show up, if it has not already, in the price which consumers pay for gasoline, for fuel oil and all other oils as well as for natural gas. Also, it will add to the inflationary trend in the price of gas and oil. In addition, it will add to the inflation which arises out of speculation, not out of the actual cost of exploration and development which is probably a legitimate cost. I say again that I am guessing that that is what has happened here, and if it is inaccurate, I am sure the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries) will correct me when he closes the debate on second reading, if that time ever arrives.

At the end of 1969, Central-Del Rio and Canadian Pacific Gas owned the equivalent of 428,000 oil wells and 266 gas wells. Since that time, some additional wells have been developed. It has a 75 per cent working interest in a 1970 gas discovery at North Bragg Creek in Alberta which has an open flow potential of more than 100 million cubic feet per day. This well went into production in the summer of last year, incidentally, and there are quite a number of other gas discoveries which it is not worth while going into at this time. I am just citing these figures to show that there are some rather extensive holdings of resources which should primarily be used for the purpose of serving the interests of Canadians. We can do that in one way, by preserving an element of Canadian ownership in the companies themselves, and it is for that purpose that I recite the information.

At the end of December 1969 there were net reserves, after royalties, of a certain number of barrels of oil and a certain quantity expressed in millions of cubic feet of natural gas as well as a certain quantity of long tons of sulphur, which were proven reserves. There is an interesting item here, and I am not that familiar with the intricacies of working relationships between one oil company and another oil company, but the phrase which intrigues me and which appears in brackets here relates to royalties. With respect to reserves, it says:

At December 31, 1969, net reserves (after royalties) were as follows:

I wonder whether or not "after royalties" means some of the royalties to other companies to which the company is indebted. I am not sure what that means, but in any event it indicates that there are proven reserves of 165 million barrels of oil.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): I wish to give general approval to this bill. There is great need for oil development in Canada, and if we are to argue for Canadian participation we have to expand our development of Canadian oil. There is a great danger at the present time if we do not do this that the development of oil on Prudhoe Bay and other fields in the North and South American complex will be taken over at a time when I think oil development is an important link in our economic need. I agree with the last speaker, however, that we must insist that every effort be made to keep not only our oil resources but all other resources under Canadian control, in so far as we can. This is impossible unless we have tax concessions which would be at least equal to those enjoyed by U.S. companies in our country. So, as the mover of the bill is on the government side, I hope he will keep this in mind and make sure that he uses his not inconsiderable influence to see that there are indeed changes in our tax laws so that Canadians can participate with their own money when they can buy these shares.

It is impossible for us to buy shares in these companies unless we can compete, and one of the reasons that we cannot compete is that the United States, with its 200 million people, has ten times as many people in the market for our Canadian industries. They have a tax advantage, of up to at least 20 per cent compared to Canadians. Of course, this is a bonanza.

The argument that to pass this bill might increase inflation makes me speechless. Quite the reverse is true. Because the oil industry is capable of reducing costs, this is what they are trying to do. They are trying to cut down their overhead, and this saving should be passed on to the shareholders of the company. If the shareholders of the company are to be Canadian, then they will receive a bigger return for the share dollars that they put into the company. Whether or not these two companies, when they amalgamate, will be more active in the exploration field rather than in the speculation field, who can say. The oil business operates under the free enterprise system. I imagine that my friends to the left would criticize this, saying that it should be entirely state owned. I am not one of those who believe that state ownership necessarily improves the efficiency of any industry, certainly not the oil industry where the know-how is in the hands of private development. Had it not been for the private development know-how of the Americans, we would have had no oil industry in Canada. So, I do not think we would be quite fair if we did not give them some consideration, after allowing them to come here and do the pioneering in this industry.

I would oppose any suggestion that we nationalize or expropriate any private enterprise. When this company receives its charter to amalgamate and cut down overheads, I hope it will proceed as soon as possible with the extraction of oil from the Athabaska tar sands. Only yesterday I heard from a man who is supposed to be an expert in this field that there is no need for us to take oil from the Arctic because there are great, known reserves in Alberta sufficient to handle Canadian needs. Apparently the reserves in the Athabaska tar sands are astronomical; indeed, I have never heard a figure of less than 200 billion barrels mentioned.

We are relying entirely on American risk capital at this time, Mr. Speaker, and I feel this is a mistake. Here is a company with a great future and a great opportunity to get into this field and develop the Athabaska tar sands for Canadians. Surely we should be the last people to stop them. Instead of nationalizing the oil industry, I think we should do all we can to put money into this endeavour. At a time of world need this reserve of oil may well become the lifeblood of western democracy, and surely it is our duty to spend the money, even on a defence budget, to make sure that it is developed. In North America it is far removed from the danger of atomic submarines and is as safe from air attack as anything can be. Surely it is up to us to see that this great reserve is developed as rapidly as possible.

Taking the long view, even looking to the days when war will be no more, we can see that the need for oil will be doubled in ten years and perhaps quadrupled in 20 years, and even with the Prudhoe Bay find we may not have sufficient to meet all requirements. We need the Athabaska tar sands with its 200 billion barrels—and that is a very conservative figure; the reserves would probably run to four or five times that figure if we did more exploration. It is easy to see what is there; great quantities of oil are staring us in the face, waiting to be extracted. It is very high-grade oil which is more expensive than oil taken from wells, but exploration costs are practically nil and the size of the reserve is tremendous: we should not ignore it.

I take pleasure in seconding the motion for second reading of this bill which still has to go through committee where the question of percentage of Canadian ownership will be thrashed out. Then we will have no need to provide this added incentive unless the two companies involved play ball with the Canadian people.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, like some other members of this House I had not anticipated the opportunity of speaking on these oil bills. Some of us were pleased that the bills had been handled in another way and were surprised to find two bills concerning oil companies on the order paper for discussion at this time. Over a period of years I have been concerned about how we should provide for the control of natural resources in basic industries remaining in Canadian hands. It has been suggested that we nationalize industries to achieve Canadian control, that we regulate for Canadian control or, as we did with Panarctic, that we buy for Canadian control. I think most Canadians are of the opinion that it is necessary to ensure that resource industries in Canada are controlled by Canadians.

I have considered the complexities of this company, Mr. Speaker, and I presume that it is really the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, Canadian Pacific has a holding company, Canadian Pacific Investments Limited, they have Central-Del Rio Oils Limited for exploration purposes and under that they have several other direct subsidiaries such as Pacific Oil and Gas and a 9 per cent interest in Panarctic Oil Limited. My colleague read from the Financial Post Survey of Oils, 1971, some of the properties held by this company. I presume they include most of Vancouver Island and a large part of all the provinces. Listed in this survey are some of their holdings in terms of areas in which they develop.

This is not an oil company, Mr. Speaker; it is a company which owns, controls and participates in a very large portion of the development of Canada. Yet we are not informed by the mover of the bill or the ex-premier of Alberta, who now is in the Senate and is sponsoring this bill, what guarantee can be given to the Canadian public that this company will remain in Canadian hands. It is pointed out that at the present time the majority of shares are held by Canadians.

It is interesting to note that the mover of the motion indicated that Canadian Pacific Investments Limited is the majority shareholder in Central-Del Rio Oils Limited. Canadian Pacific Investments holds 89.27 per cent of the outstanding equity shares. Out of a total of 83,074 shareholders, 72,047 are resident in Canada and hold some 29,800,000 shares. Less than 1,000 shareholders are resident in the United States and hold an aggregate of approximately 311,000 shares. The remaining 128 are residents of countries other than the United States and Canada and they own approximately the same number of shares as the United States residents.

Mr. Speaker, we have only recently become vitally concerned about Canadian control. As the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) pointed out, we have in a number of ways in the past tried to ensure that ownership of Canadian industry would remain in Canadian hands. I presume that in its investment portfolio the Canadian Pacific Railway has found it lucrative to keep its money in Canada. I presume that employees' pension plans are involved and that large investments have been made with moneys originally given to Canadian Pacific in the way of grants. I believe there is a possibility that control over some of these matters may be transferred to nationals of another country. This danger was forcefully brought home to Canadians recently when they tried to involve themselves in retaining Home Oil Company under Canadian control. The agonizing which I am sure the government went through resulted in the proposal that if a Canadian owner could not be found for the company, the Canadian government was willing to spend money to make sure that the company remained under Canadian ownership.

The oil industry is vital to Canadians. Only now are we becoming concerned about the environment. We want to control environmental pollution and the use of carbon by-products. We are thinking of substituting natural gas for other forms of energy. Only now are we taking steps to ensure that there will be enough Canadian companies with sufficient reserves to meet the projected future requirements of our population. Any company coming before Parliament would be remiss in its duty if it overlooked the desire of Canadians to retain ownership of Canadian companies. Any company coming before Parliament ought to consider these factors.

I am confused about what this company wants to do. The mover of the motion suggested that one could readily see the reason for this action because the alternative would be that a shareholders meeting would be necessary to pass a special resolution authorizing the company to apply to become a company under the federal act, and after that a second shareholders meeting would be necessary to approve the amalgamation of the two corporations. The provisions of this bill make it unnecessary to hold these two shareholders meetings. It provides that the amalgamation agreement passed at the same time as the resolution authorizing the company to apply for continuance under the federal statute will be regarded as an amalgamation agreement under the federal Corporations Act. Hon. Senators may readily see the reason for this action, but as a member of this House I do not see it.

I suggest that it might have been easier not to involve members of this House in the manipulations in which Central-Del Rio Oils and Canadian Pacific Oil and Gas are involved. Whenever this House has been involved it has been our contention that we ought to know what we are involved in. I should understand what I am voting for and I am under the obligation of putting in my five cents' worth in debate.

As I have said, I support the idea of Canadian control of these companies. I am not suggesting that the company in question is not under Canadian control. I am only saying that for some time I have been of the opinion that we should write into bills like this provisions which would ensure Canadian control. Despite anything hon. Senators may have said, it might have been much simpler had the two shareholders meetings been held, even though it might have cost a few bucks.

I should like the sponsor of this bill, on behalf of Central-Del Rio Oils, to advise us what additional steps the company is prepared to take in order to accomplish what I suggest ought to be accomplished. Will any clause of the bill be amended or changed in order to accomplish that purpose? It has been necessary sometimes to represent the public interest through members on boards of directors. That has been done without share capital being acquired. There have been cases, as with Panarctic Oils, where we have found it necessary to control 45 per cent of the investment and exercise control that way. I am not sure if that method accomplishes what we seek.

I believe there ought to be inserted in the bill of any company seeking incorporation a clause to the following effect: If the company ceases to be under the majority control of Canadian shareholders normally resident in Canada, its charter shall be null and void. Then we would be assured that the company would remain Canadian.

This company is not small. A company that owes the bank $22 million is not small. A company that pays out as much as this company is not small. A company that controls so much land is not small. I therefore think it should be willing, if it is interested in having this bill passed, to agree to a clause that would make it mandatory for the company to remain Canadian and to limit its shares to Canadians normally resident in Canada. Such provision would ensure that this company in the important field of oil development would remain in Canadian hands.

Although several years ago we were only worried about financial control and that Canadians should have a say in the operation of their natural resources, it has become apparent to the Canadian public that we are not really well equipped to maintain an inventory of carbon and petrochemical products and we cannot ensure that projected Canadian needs will be met. It is also safe to say that for the first time Canadians are paying attention to the ecology of their land and to the advisability or inadvisability of drilling wells in sites of aesthetic value.

Our population has suddenly decided, the young people in particular, that merely because a company wants to drill a well is not sufficient reason for drilling the well. Before the company drills, it should consider the ecology of the area, its aesthetic value and all those who will be using the area for other than oil-producing purposes. No longer will an oil well be drilled in the middle of a community simply because a company wants to drill it. The area I represent does not worry so much about oil wells as about headframes. There are headframes in all sorts of places because mines close down and other industries do not replace them. The usefulness of headframes is limited, I suppose, to anybody who wishes to open a new mine in the area. In the early days headframes were located wherever anyone wanted to locate them. The town, the streets and everything else was built around them. Oil companies believe they have the right to do as they like to the environment and the community in which they operate because they are the main employer and sustain the local economy.

There has been a recent development, particularly with regard to the young people, whereby people feel that making money and having a wealthy company producing revenue by getting more oil out of the ground is not the prime but only one of the considerations involved. The previous speaker said that the lack of desire to drill in many areas should be encouraged. We must take into consideration the Canadian interest rather than playing around with the proposition of drilling a well every so often regardless of the situation.

More than one million acres of land on Vancouver Island are under the control of this company. I do not know the total acreage of Vancouver Island. I am not sure whether they are referring to gross or net acres. In fact, I do not know the difference between a gross and a net acre. Both are referred to in some oil contracts: companies talk about owning 71 million gross acres or 22 million net acres. If any drilling is done near the shores of Vancouver Island, the problems which we are discussing with the United States will occur in that area.

The public has an interest in this matter. It must be assured that its interest is given due consideration by corporations which we set up. If it is a foreign-owned corporation, we will not have very many opportunities to protect the public interest. Our experience in other industrial fields has been that when a company is under the jurisdiction of two countries one of which is the United States, there is very little doubt about which interest will be served: it will always be the American interest. We will not be able to exercise jurisdiction over that company.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): I realize there are only five minutes left, Mr. Speaker. I wish to put on record some of my observations with regard to the bill before us. I congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries) for his imaginative speech, which I read in Senate Debates for March 23. It is just as easy to repeat the remarks made then as to make a new speech in this chamber.

I think all hon. members agree that we should have Canadian ownership and participation. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is well-known to members of this House and to the people of Canada. Canadian Pacific Railway was the main driving force in creating some of the subsidiaries and conglomerates which are now under its control. I suggest that some of the non-rail profits should be taken into consideration when Canadian Pacific Railway makes application for rail line abandonments which are invariably approved by the Canadian Transport Commission.

It is not fair to the people of Canada to pass a bill without ensuring that a commitment is obtained from the parent company that it will meet the original obligation and charter which it was given. We should not pass this bill without asking the company for an assurance that it will try to give Canada the service to which it is entitled, and meet the obligation which it has had since it was incorporated and granted vast tracts of land and moneys.

A United States Senator said as follows:

> Montana Senator Lee Metcalf insists that Congress should consider non-railroad income of carriers if it decides to inaugurate operational subsidies.

I suggest that we have operational subsidies in one area of railroad operation. If we look at the over-all operation of this company we will see that the subsidies are not given any consideration. I quote:

> Metcalf said in September, 1969, before the ICC: "The question of a carrier's non-rail income as part of its entire total financial position is pertinent to any discussion of our government's transportation policy, and more particularly so if the carrier happens also to be a conglomerate."

The bill before us puts Canadian Pacific Railway in the position of being a conglomerate. We should consider the non-rail operational income of this company and its over-all structure.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being six o'clock, this House will rise until eight o'clock this evening.

I was in deep reflection today about man's share of wealth and honour for the work he has done on earth. I came across these lines:

> How seldom, friend, a good, great man inherits honour or wealth, with all his worth and pains. It sounds like stories from the land of spirits, if any man obtains that which he merits or merits that which he obtains.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

Senate and House of Commons Act

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS' SESSIONAL AND EXPENSE ALLOWANCES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-242, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and an act to make provisions for the retirement of members of the Senate, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, at five o'clock when the House turned to consideration of private members' business I was dealing with the increase in the non-taxable portion of hon. members' expense allowance. I suggested that at least the additional expenses which were to be covered should have been based on specific allowable areas and on the presentation of vouchers in respect of them.

I say to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) that this is not an unreasonable suggestion. He told us that the services and facilities which the Beaupré committee report proposes would, if implemented, have amounted to more than the $8,000 to be allowed as a non-taxable amount. This may be so; I have not done the arithmetic and I am prepared to accept the minister's statement without question. He then went on to say that the only difference between what the government proposes and what the Beaupré committee report proposed was the method. By gad, if this is a small difference I should like to know what an important one would be, because between being paid for expenses actually incurred and being given a global amount which one can use as one pleases, and which continues to be non-taxable, lies a difference not only in method but in basic principle.

I repeat: even if the government had decided to keep the $6,000 as a global sum there was, in light of the Beaupré committee report, no excuse whatever for increasing that non-taxable sum. Why was it not possible to say that members would be paid up to a certain amount per month as rent, if they were obliged to rent a home in Ottawa, or an allowance for an office in the constituency, and provide that in either case they would have to show that these expenditures had actually been incurred before they could obtain reimbursement in respect of them?

I turn now to the retroactive aspect of this bill. As a person who practised labour law for many years and represented labour unions for many years in various parts of this country, I find disagreeable the ease with which it is possible for Members of Parliament to get total retroactivity for seven or eight months with respect to the whole of the increase. I have known strikes called by workers to get even part of an increase in a settlement retroactive. Yet the whole of this amount is to be made retroactive to the beginning of the present session, which means to the beginning of last October. Why?

In the case of an ordinary industrial situation there is a collective agreement which ends at a certain date and efforts are made by the workers concerned to get their increase dated back to the end of the former agreement. They have a contract over a certain period. What period do we have! What right have we to say that the increase provided by this law should go back seven or eight months? I say there is no moral justification for that and no social justification for it either.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The senior civil servants' increase went back two years in 1967.

Mr. Lewis: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) says the senior civil servants' increase went back two years. The only reason it went back two years is that there is a certain period to which their increase was applied. If it takes a year or so to negotiate an increase, it is logical and morally defensible that the increase should go back to the date on which the last agreement ended. But where is our agreement? We simply say: We are Parliament and we can enact it. So we make it retroactive to the beginning of this session. I suppose I ought to be glad it was not made retroactive to the first day of this Parliament; that is about the only consolation I can find.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what was done the last time.

Mr. Alexander: Did you hear your hon. friend?

Mr. Lewis: No doubt we shall be hearing from him. Finally, I want to say a few words about the method which has been used. I would have hoped that whatever increases the government might have proposed, it would also have had the courage to propose a change in the method of adjusting members' salaries and emoluments. There are two ways in which this might have been done. The bill ought to have provided for one or other of them so that within eight, nine or ten years people who are members of the House of Commons and the Senate at that time—if the Senate still exists seven or eight years from now, and I hope it will not—will not have again to go through this embarrassing and disagreeable task of voting themselves increases.

In addition to whatever the government might have wished to do in connection with the bill before us, in terms of the actual increases contemplated, they should have incorporated in the bill a new method of doing it, possibly through an independent body consisting of whoever the government chose, perhaps the Chief Justice of Canada or the president of a federal court. There are one or two other people they might choose who could by law be given authority to state periodically what adjustments ought to be made, in line with some comparison. Alternatively, I suggest that the indemnities of Members of Parliament be placed within some appropriate public service category or some average of appropriate categories; there are various ways in which it could be worked out. There would then be an automatic adjustment every year or two years.

I suggest the time is long overdue to improve the present system. We should take away from Members of Parliament the unpleasant duty of dealing with our own salaries and expenses and give this task to an independent body, or place the indemnity in some appropriate category in the public service in the way I have suggested. This proposal should have been embodied in the bill so that this would be the last time Members of Parliament had to go through this unpleasant exercise.

In closing, I want to make the point as seriously as I can that there is throughout the country widespread disenchantment with the democratic process and a great deal of dissatisfaction with the parliamentary process, particularly among young people. The slowness with which we do anything for the benefit of ordinary people, and our failure to meet basic problems in society have produced growing unhappiness with our parliamentary and democratic system. I am deeply concerned about the effect that this action now proposed by the government, in the circumstances I described earlier, will have on people who are already dissatisfied with our democratic process. I am concerned with the cynicism that it will evoke, particularly among the young, and the questions it will raise in the minds of many people in Canada.

Although I do not condemn any member who wants to support the bill before the House, I cannot but feel depressed by this further example of the double standard that our present system imposes and which Members of Parliament are willing to adopt. In our privileged position we are able to get what we ask for. The rest have to fight and wait for every niggardly improvement, be he worker, old age pensioner, farmer or fisherman. These groups have to argue, fight, demonstrate, protest, needle and threaten before getting some kind of niggardly improvement. But we in our privileged position can get because we are in a position to take. This is what worries me about our present system and the position of Parliament within that system, particularly the position in which all members of the House are being placed by the proposal we are discussing.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we are now considering Bill C-242 to increase the salaries and allowances of members of Parliament.

In the statement he made in this House on April 26 last, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that the government intended to introduce legislation to increase the salaries of hon. members from $12,000 to $18,000 and the non taxable and non accountable allowances from $6,000 to $8,000. Right then, through the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne), the Ralliement créditiste members announced they were absolutely opposed to this measure. But the mass media have practically ignored this position.

Yesterday, at the opening of the sitting of the House, the bill was introduced for first reading. There is never a debate on first reading since it is only a formal introduction according to the rules governing our debates.

Nevertheless yesterday, without warning, the news media disclosed to the public unaware of course of our procedure that hon. members had unanimously agreed to the bill on first reading and that none of them had the opportunity to speak at this stage and to oppose it.

Mr. Speaker, we can see there the narrowmindedness and dishonesty of some news media that knowingly release controlled information to the Canadian people. However, it is common knowledge that no one can judge how a member feels about a bill simply because he refrains from speaking on first reading since there is no debate at this stage.

Tonight, Mr. Speaker, we were going to make our position clear beyond all ambiguity.

This, then, is the official position of the Ralliement Créditiste.

I also want to point out that the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), and the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) give their unqualified support to our views. They both did their very best to be here tonight, but they are now tied up in Alberta and it was absolutely impossible for them to change their schedules, arranged several weeks ahead. They could not foresee that the government would proceed with such speed to the debate on this matter. In any case, whether it seems funny or not to members opposite, to whom salaries are more important than services, be it said and understood that the Créditistes have all taken the same position on this question, because they all think of their role as a public service and their devotion bears the most eloquent testimony to the performance of this task.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Langlois: Speak loud, vote against it and take it.

An hon. Member: Bunch of hypocrites!

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Does the hon. member who just called us a bunch of hypocrites—

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I rise also on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order! I see that the hon. members for Abitibi and Lotbinière are seeking the floor at the same time. There should be some order, and we should determine immediately who has the floor.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Abitibi on a question of privilege.

Senate and House of Commons Act

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to our views in this house, especially on a bill which concerns directly each and every member. The member who has just accused us of hypocrisy should be honest enough to rise and identify himself.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

An hon. member opposite saw fit not to rise, knowing that by remaining seated he would not be identified and that what he said would appear in Hansard under: "An hon. Member". Indeed, we shall never know who said Créditistes are hypocrites.

Therefore, I refuse to pursue the matter if that member is not courageous enough to stand up and withdraw.

Mr. Speaker, I humbly point out to you that we always have respect for the institution of Parliament and our colleagues. We respect the opinion of government members and we ask them to respect us.

Not only is the language of the member opposite unparliamentary, but it reveals a lack of good manners and honesty.

Knowing your integrity and fairness for minority parties, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to enforce our Standing Orders in order that our rules and our right of speech be respected.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. The hon. member has the floor and may obviously continue his remarks. The hon. member objects to the fact that some comment was expressed in some mysterious quarters of the House. He invites the hon. member who made this remark out of turn perhaps to reveal his identity. The hon. member who made the remark which was unnoticed by the Chair except when the hon. member for Lobtinière referred to it does not want to reveal his identity and it seems that the hon. member for Lotbinière who has the floor and who was speaking very ably for the benefit of the House should continue his remarks which the Chair and all hon. members will listen to attentively.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, while minding your—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must once again interrupt the hon. member for Lotbinière as the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) in turn raises the question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I shall not take too long but I think it should be recorded in Hansard that the mysterious remark which came from the floor of the House, to which Your Honour referred, did not come from the left of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to hon. members that we get on with the debate. The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) was making a very positive, constructive and interesting speech and I am sure hon. members on both sides of the House are anxious to hear him.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: I shall go on, Mr. Speaker, on your kind invitation, but I find it strange that this mysterious voice cannot be identified, whereas tomorrow the words spoken will be printed in Hansard without the speaker being identified.

I should now like to pursue my comments honestly, briefly and precisely.

First of all, we feel that the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not take into account the proposals and findings of the report of the Advisory Committee on Parliamentary Salaries and Expenses tabled in November 1970.

Quite extensive studies are made but we do abide by their conclusions.

Secondly, it is abnormal that hon. members according to the will and the decisions of the current government, should vote themselves an increased allowance. This is a ridiculous system to which exception is being taken throughout Canada. A permanent and independent commission should make such a decision jointly with the Treasury Board approximately every two years.

Third, it is inconceivable that the revision of hon. members' salaries should come every five or ten years. For instance, the last increase dates back to 1963. Moreover, this biennial increase should be governed by the very standards imposed by the government on the Canadian people under the current economic situation. We submit that our decisions must be consistent with what we require from ordinary people.

Fourth, we cannot accept that the government should propose to raise hon. members' allowances and indemnities without improving and streamlining the instruments at their disposal so that they could give better service to the people in their constituency and in Parliament, a measure which would upgrade the role of Members of Parliament and parliamentary institutions.

Fifth, it is anomalous that the government should propose an $8,000 unaccountable expense allowance without any obligation for us to produce vouchers. Members have no right to treat themselves any better than other Canadians.

It is a proven fact that a Member of Parliament has to spend such an amount within a year and even more if he wants to fulfil his tasks; there is no doubt about it. So why should we not be required to present vouchers if we really incur these expenses, taking into account, of course, the distance between our constituency and Ottawa.

The Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) have both stated that each member could choose not to spend or to spend only part of the allowance. In so doing the government is setting up a wrong principle.

There are minimum services which a member of Parliament must provide to the people. Among them, we include the salary of a secretary working for the member in his riding.

Sixth, it is unbelievable that the government does not mention, and even refuses to mention, that a research assistant will be supplied to each member so that he can better discharge his responsibilities.

Seventh, we find it unacceptable for the government to deal in the same bill with members of Parliament and Members of the other House. We sincerely suggest that the Senate should be abolished immediately. Therefore there is no question of us accepting to vote them increased salaries and allowances.

Not only do we refuse to increase the senators' salaries and allowances but we call for the immediate abolition of the Senate, for in spite of all the respect due to its members it is an antiquated institution which has no justification any more and which irritates, and we can understand that, the Canadian taxpayers by its inaction, its ineffectiveness and its uselessness. Why would the government not do away with that institution? We get no reply from the government. Instead of answering, the Prime Minister wants to increase their salaries and allowances.

Mr. Speaker, we must absolutely give new vigour to Parliament in 1971, bring it closer to the people, modernize our parliamentary and democratic institutions. We must update them and make them more modern, human and effective. Let us start right away by doing away with the Senate. Let us then provide members with the facilities they need to discharge effectively their responsibilities.

As far as we, the Ralliement créditiste, are concerned, we are ready. I quote from page 24 of the Beaupré report:

> It seems self-evident that no taxpayer would employ a tradesman or a professional man unless he were satisfied that the individual had available to him the tools with which to do the job at hand.

In other words, the 1971 member of Parliament has the same tools as the 1950 member. It should not therefore come as a surprise that the Canadian people are dissatisfied and wonder—and rightly so in most cases—what their member is doing.

Mr. Speaker, many people rightly ask this question when they are represented by people who indulge in making charges against other members without identifying themselves.

What is more urgent? Increasing salaries or improving work conditions of members? This is the question that we have to answer and the Prime Minister and his Government have chosen to increase parliamentary allowances. We choose, as honestly as these people say, an improvement of services. We must get Parliament nearer to the people by making government services available to all Canadians, and by revamping the important role of members of Parliament through a modern approach. This is why we say that secretarial support, both in the constituency and in Parliament should be improved, and my colleagues will come back to this matter during the debate. That is why we say that every member of Parliament should have at his disposal a researcher and at least two offices in Ottawa.

At present, four of us are crammed into this tiny office of mine. None of my colleagues is better off. Mr. Speaker, this must change in 1971, otherwise the member of Parliament, regardless of his party, will no longer be in a position to adequately discharge the various exacting responsibilities assigned to him in his capacity as an advisor, a protector of the people and a liaison officer, for he is here to serve the public.

Mr. Speaker, it is therefore our intention to oppose the proposal to increase salaries of members of Parliament because that in no way settles the problem and only makes for increased dissatisfaction not only of the people but of those members who want to carry out their duties.

Just think, for instance, that each member of the Quebec National Assembly has a permanent office in his riding, with a permanent secretary, in order to better serve his constituents. On the other hand, there are 75 members in the House of Commons, who come from Quebec. Now, in the federal riding of Lotbinière, for instance, there are three provincial representatives, provided with three secretaries and three permanent offices, all paid for by the government. Why? In order to provide permanent, continuing service in the riding even at times when the member is sitting at the National Assembly.

The same applies in all ridings.

At the federal level, to serve the same population and almost the same number of parishes, I am alone with my wife. To serve the population well, I had to set up an office, for which I pay out of my own pocket, because I believe in the role of the member of Parliament and because I believe the people are entitled to their member's services. All my colleagues have done exactly the same.

Every week end, I see in my office at Victoriaville an average of 40 persons,—which can be easily proven. It is also true for my colleagues. It is an important thing.

At the provincial level, the same population has six persons at its service while at the federal level, where there are over 375,000 civil servants, while we administer a budget of over $14 billion, there are only two persons in each riding, the member and his wife to look after the electors. It is ridiculous, in 1971, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure you agree with me.

Hon. members of this House upon whom rests the heavy and complex responsibility of defending the rights and the interests of the citizens and of running the country's business often lack the necessary means of action to play their roles efficiently. The government does not seem to have deemed advisable to make these means available to them. From the statements of the right hon. Prime Minister and the President of the Privy Council, once more we come to the conclusion that the government does not deem appropriate to provide the people and the members of this House with these services. Or perhaps in view of their financial situation hon. members could not afford them. In many cases, it is true.

However, I must say that my colleagues and I have given ourselves these tools, in spite of the carelessness of the government, even though we had to spend money to do so. We have led the way. We now ask that the government accept our position as a principle to be applied to all hon. members. A member should not work occasionally, as some would have it, but full time. That is what the people require from us.

Likewise, the population, and justly so, is against our giving ourselves a special treatment as opposed to other citizens. The Beaupré report suggested a maximum expense account with a voucher system, according to the actual amount of expenses incurred.

Mr. Speaker, the present proposal of the Prime Minister and of the President of the Privy Council does not take this recommendation into consideration. We grant $8,000 to every hon. member. It is for them to decide if they will spend $3,000, $4,000, $5,000, $8,000 or more.

Mr. Speaker, that system is not acceptable. It is like building on shifting sand. It is not in this way that we shall enhance the value of our parliamentary and democratic institutions and of the function of the member of Parliament. Let us remember this: the hon. member who decides against opening an office or making regular trips to his riding will be able to put $8,000 in his pocket without having to account for it to anyone. Who would ask for an accounting? And at any rate, if there is an election, the party funds will be used to help him and he will be re-elected, and the people will know nothing of this.

But the hon. member who understands his function, who decides to give proper service to the people, will spend the $8,000; that is what we are doing. The latter will be penalized while the former will benefit.

It is impossible to apply the same yardstick to all members whether they come from western, eastern or central Canada. Their working conditions are not the same, nor are distances they have to travel. To be just, the system must take this into account. Otherwise, we will be compelled to think that expenses are used as an excuse to increase salaries, all the more so as expenses will not be taxable.

Mr. Speaker, we recognize that a member's work entails a great deal of expenses, but the government should realize that they are not the same for all members. Besides, they recognize this principle in the bill by saying that the members from the North will have to incur more expenses than the others.

If the government acknowledges this principle for a certain group of members—and we commend them for it—let them extend it also to all members.

Mr. Speaker, I would have some important questions to put, to which it is urgent to have some answers.

First, what are the responsibilities of a member of Parliament, and to what extent are they likely to change in the years to come?

Another question which should be answered is the following: How does a member view his function and how does the public see it? My colleagues and myself have been wondering about it for a long time. We did something to get an answer. Several of my colleagues and myself sent more than 10,000 questionaires to each of our ridings asking people of all classes of society poor and rich alike, how they viewed the role and duties of their federal representative whatever his political party, in the riding as well as in Ottawa.

The people of my riding and elsewhere were not afraid to answer. The population considers the member of Parliament as a public servant. The position we take today is largely based on the results of this comprehensive poll.

It is obviously difficult to answer and solve those questions perhaps simply because the role of the member of Parliament is mostly what he makes it, according to his own concept of it, his competence and dedication. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people expect no less from us.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I should like to tell them what questions we put to the people, when we asked whether or not they agreed with the definition of the duties of a member of Parliament. This is what we put to them, solely to give rise to a dialoque in the riding:

1. To be aware of and interested in the problems of all the citizens.

2. To participate actively in the economic development of his area.

3. To fight against the injustices that victimize some citizens.

4. To work steadfastly to achieve security for all.

5. To protect the freedom and the rights of each individual.

—whether his pockets are well-lined or not.

6. To be always available.

—to the population.

7. To consult frequently with all classes of society in order to express the opinions of constituents.

When we proposed to the electors this definition of the work of the member of Parliament in his constituency, people gave an almost unanimous response. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, we have no other choice today but to urge the government to give the population permanent secretarial services in the constituency in order to keep the people in touch with this extremely important institution which Parliament is.

Insofar as Ottawa is concerned, we have proposed the following definition to the people so that they may comment on it, criticize it or make suggestions:

1. To sit in the House of Commons on behalf of all the people in the constituency, not only on behalf of his——supporters.

That is another point, Mr. Speaker, which is most important.

2. To advocate or support all policies favourable to the people as a whole—

—in his constituency.

3. To protest strongly and freely against the measures contrary to the best interests of the citizens in his constituency.

Finally, still in Parliament—

4. To try to build a great country meeting the wishes of the people in his constituency and his province——and throughout the country, giving the interests of a political party second place and looking first of all after those of the people.

Mr. Speaker, such is our creed, since it is the one that people have dictated to us. Generally, we are only restating today in the House what people have suggested to us both in our constituencies and in the country at large, particularly the have-nots, whose hardships are the consequence of the current economic situation.

I thank my hon. colleagues for their sympathetic attention and, Mr. Speaker, I hope that, within all parties, the members will consider positively and honestly the suggestions we are putting forward in order that this country's parliamentary and democratic institutions, as well as the function of the member recover their true value, and that the parliamentary institutions and hon. members get closer to the people and thus serve them better.

[English]

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this subject because as chairman of the caucus of this party during the period when the Beaupré report was under discussion I had perhaps more than an average member's involvement in what was taking place as the Beaupré committee worked to assess what should be the salary and expenses of a member. Moreover, I had an opportunity to listen to many of my colleagues—many of them a good deal younger than me, and with young families—discuss the problems of being a Member of Parliament, coming perhaps from a remote constituency in the west or in the Maritimes and living in the city of Ottawa, carrying out parliamentary duties effectively.

When I came first to the House in 1963 I was a member of the committee which at that time looked into the question of the increase in salary which took place in 1963. I remember how much this question involved every member of the House and what a sensitive issue it was to the welfare, the esprit de corps and the working capability of members. The question of salary and expenses was a serious matter to hon. members. So perhaps a little more than members who came here in 1968 for the first time I can look at this question with a philosophical attitude. I think every member knows from his mail and from the way the press often deals with the subject of salaries and expenses that there is much misunderstanding everywhere about the subject. For a short while I want to deal with some of these misunderstandings.

I begin by saying that a member of the Canadian House of Commons is not the best paid parliamentarian in this country, as some people, perhaps even members of the press, believe him to be. I refer to the table which appears at page 59 of the Beaupré report, called "Comparative Summary Table of the Annual Salaries and Allowances of Members and Those Holding Certain Leadership Offices in Canadian Provincial Legislatures". When we look at this table we discover that in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec the salaries are the same as ours, $12,000 in each case, and the tax free allowances are the same, $6,000 in each case. But we also know from the studies which were undertaken when the Beaupré committee was active that in addition there are emoluments for committee sittings, for services rendered in ridings and for positions on boards which make the salaries of Ontario and Quebec members much more desirable than ours.

So we may say that in positive terms we are third in Canada in pay and allowances—not first. It is much more desirable, if you live in the province of Quebec or the province of Ontario, from the standpoint of pay and emoluments to be a member of the Legislative Assembly than to be a member of the House of Commons of Canada. This is the fact in respect of the pay scales of members of legislatures in Canada.

When we move to other legislatures, the story is even more remarkable. We see, for instance that in Prince Edward Island for 15 days' work members of the legislature receive a salary of $2,666 and an allowance of $1,333. What Member of Parliament would not like to be a member of that legislature? In New Brunswick they receive a salary of $5,000 and a sessional allowance of $2,500 for a 32-day sitting. In my own province of British Columbia it is $5,000 sessional indemnity and $3,000 plus $50 a day for 40 consecutive days in 47 days of sittings, making approximately $10,000 for the 47 days.

A man with an established business in any of these provinces would find it profitable to go into their legislatures. We are really the poor cousins when it comes to pay for legislative work. No one holding a seat in a provincial legislature would want to come here on the basis of pay. That is a fact of life which we must face, and decide whether we want to change it.

The press seems to enjoy saying that a Member of Parliament has a salary of $18,000, but of course that is not so. They add together the salary of $12,000 and the expense allowance of $6,000 and call the total, salary. It implies that a member has no expenses connected with his job and can therefore take the expense allowance into salary. But no member of the press would claim that his own expense account should be lumped with salary.

What personal expenses does a member incur because of his job? If he lives outside the Ottawa area—and that means most members—he must pay two rents. He moves his wife and family back and forth across the country, puts the children in school here and takes them home and instals them in his constituency for the summer and also for the Christmas recess if he can. He pays all his car expenses no matter how much the car is used in the course of his work. He pays for taxis, entertainment, telegrams. If he wants to send a birthday greeting or a message in connection with his work, it is paid out of his own pocket, the only reimbursement being from the non-accountable expense allowance which is so condemned.

Charges for telephone calls made from his own home come out of his pocket, so do secretarial and clerical services in the riding. To get a letter typed or circulated, to buy paper or postage stamps are expenses which come out of the allowance. No account can be rendered for these expenses; the member must pay them. He pays for household mailings no matter where he makes them. It is true he can get them cheaper than the ordinary man for business or commercial purposes, but still he must pay for them and they are part of his expenses as a Member of Parliament.

All miscellaneous travelling expenses, even the expense of staying overnight in the course of travelling to his riding if the trip is so long, must come out of his own pocket. Contrary to popular opinion, he does not have an air pass to travel anywhere in Canada and must pay his wife's fare. He cannot even charge taxis between airport and his home because that comes out of the magic non-accountable allowance. He does not travel first-class, as do cabinet ministers, public servants and even executive secretaries and special assistants who carry a minister's bags on and off the plane. I hear laughter in the chamber, but I think it has been the experience of every member on the backbenches to go through the first-class section and bow to the special assistants as they sit there having champagne.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: That is the gourmet tour. Finally the member gets to the economy section and struggles to a seat in the middle where he may sit for five hours on a trip to Vancouver. Does this ring a bell with anybody in the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: The member's only travel privileges are economy air fare or free basic rail passage between his riding and Ottawa. He does not even have the privilege of being paid for climbing into an upper berth and attempting to get his pants off in there; that luxury is not accorded to him.

There is no way of describing the expenses of an average member, because there are no average members. No one in this House wants to be called an average member. Each case is different, and that is why it has not been possible for Mr. Beaupré or any member of this House to itemize these expenses as is done for a travelling salesman whose expenses can be carefully identified. I remember how Mr. Pearson and his cabinet in 1963 struggled in an attempt to identify a member's expenses. Should an Ottawa member be cut back because he does not live far from this House?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: However, one could see in the corridor outside his room the chairs lined up for people who wanted to visit him and had access to him in his constituency every day of the week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: When you considered that he had to campaign in his constituency 365 days a year, you realized that it was impossible to come to grips with what was fair for an Ottawa member, what was fair for a Vancouver member and what was fair for a Yukon member. It was extremely difficult. Mr. Pearson solved that problem by giving members a non-taxable expense allowance of $6,000 and allowing them to use it as they saw fit in administering their own peculiar circumstances—because, believe me, all members are peculiar or they would not be here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Some are more peculiar than others.

Mr. Deachman: There is one way in which it might be possible to split up these expenses: it is pretty arbitrary, though some members of this House of Commons may recognize themselves in these figures. Take rent, for instance, at $2,400 a year. Has anybody in the House of Commons been able to find accommodation in the Ottawa district for $7 a day? And car expenses: has any member who is using his car for constituency or business purposes been able to do it for as little as $1,200?

Then there is family travel. If you live in the Maritimes or in one of the four western provinces and have kids and are moving them back and forth, do you not incur expenses? Was any member of the House, for instance, able to sneak away with a travel bill that was less than $1,200 by the time he accounted for air fares or rail berths, taxis, overnight stops in hotels or motels and all those things that go toward moving a family across Canada? If those have been your expenses for those kinds of items alone, if you have spent about $1,200 on them, you will know how much you have left to take care of every kind of expense that you can possibly imagine, out of an expense allowance of $6,000.

One can see that this expense allowance in itself is hardly adequate. I do not think that even the Globe and Mail in its wildest dream can imagine that that is an adequate way of dealing with a Member of Parliament. In many cases members are living on other income as well as their parliamentary income in order to stay here. I ask, are we getting good representation when we ask people to come here and of their own charity serve the people of Canada? I do not think the people want us to do that.

Another point to observe is that there is virtually nothing left in this kind of expense allowance for any service at all in the members' riding. There is nothing left with which a member, could hire transportation which in a remote riding would enable him to get out to villages and communities he had never seen before. That would bring him in greater contact with his people, enable him to be a better Member of Parliament and make this place more representative of the people of Canada. But the expense allowance does not provide for that. It hardly provides for the kinds of essential expenses that members incur. Thus, in the illustration I have given, the increase of the expense allowance to $8,000 will permit a member to meet his personal expenses and to have a little left for service to his riding. What is wrong with that?

Now let us look at the member's salary. Mr. Beaupré suggested a top salary for members of $25,000. That was his proposal and the proposal of his colleagues. They were unanimous on this. The present proposal is $18,000. I do not know where all the figures come from which have described this increase. To me it represents a salary that is 50 per cent higher than the $12,000 we have lived on since 1963. To find out how much of an increase that is, I looked at the compound interest tables. It represents an increase of slightly less than 5 per cent per annum. I heard and read so many figures that I thought I would look at the compound interest tables. At 5 per cent per year you will have, at the end of eight years, 1.47 of the original. So that here you have an increase that is a hair under 5 per cent per annum—if we pass it. However, if as suggested in this House we do not pass it and if we employ, as we have in the past, the Chicago garbage disposal system for salaries, that is, kick them around until we lose them—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: —then the increase for members since 1953 will have been from $8,000 to $12,000, the amount we got in 1963. That will be a 50 per cent increase from $8,000 in a period of 18 years. Let us see what the compound interest tables say about that increase. A 50 per cent increase over 18 years—I want to be accurate about this because there has been very little accuracy in the figures quoted—will be brought about by an annual increase of 2.5 per cent. That will have been the rate if we do not pass this bill. If we decide to let it go and leave it to the next Parliament to decide, the yearly increment for the member who came here in 1953 will have been 2.5 per cent. That is where we stand.

The problem is that we have heaped no end of troubles on ourselves in this House by postponing the regular revision of salaries until this "shocking" increase was required to adjust our salaries to a simple 5 per cent per annum rate, which we will have achieved over the last 18 years if we pass the current increase. But the rate will remain at 2½ per cent if we do not.

There is one more point that I should like to deal with because it is pretty often distorted. The expense allowance that we receive is not unique in Canada, as some people would lead you to believe. Members of other legislative assemblies and hundreds of municipal councillors receive tax free allowances which are recognized under the Income Tax Act. There are, I venture to say, thousands of people in Canada at other levels of legislative service whose expenses are recognized in this fashion. I do not know of any immediate intention by the government, or as set out in the white paper, to remove those expense allowances. There is no mention of that in the policies of the government with respect to tax reform. There is no intention to strip these people of their tax free allowances and nowhere is it said that they must receive their expenses for rendering public service in some other form.

Some people have said that this increase is too much. Of course, even 5 per cent looks too much if we let it pile up for eight years or if we do not adjust matters for another 16 years. It is said that this increase is inflationary. If other salaries and wages in our economy had increased at the rate that ours is increasing, John Young would not have a thing to say and probably would not even have been hired.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: I do not know why there is all this applause from my side of the House, because that is so.

It is said that we are greedily using our parliamentary power to inflate our own salaries. Mr. Speaker, we hired a commission which recommended a salary of $25,000. We in this House are talking about $18,000. That has been our decision, whereas outsiders decided that our salaries ought to be $25,000. It is said that we should not raise our salaries while there is unemployment, or until we raise pensions, until we check inflation, until the next Parliament is elected or until Utopia is here.

I agree that there is no good time to raise the salary of a Member of Parliament; but we know that we cannot escape this question forever. If we wait for another two years the increase will need to be 60 per cent in order to achieve a 5 per cent per year increment. If we postpone dealing with this matter from year to year for one good reason or another that is given in this chamber, we will eventually find it almost impossible to bring parliamentary salaries in line with other salaries in the economy or with salaries in other legislatures. We are already falling behind them; we are in third place.

It is said that we should set up an independent tribunal to deal with our salaries or to hitch this increment to public service salary increases. This would not relieve us of the duty, of course, of voting for the increases out of taxes, nor would it bury parliamentary debate or public criticisms on the subject: it would still be there. On the other hand, it would put us in the curious position of accepting public service rates of increase which the public service had achieved from Parliament after bitter bargaining or even after strikes. For those reasons I believe that we must always settle our own salary adjustments in this chamber.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deachman: Perhaps we could best do this, Mr. Speaker, by building into this bill a clause which would automatically refer the matter to Parliament in the first session of each new Parliament. This would guarantee more regular revision. The automatic feature would overcome the squeamishness of members to deal with the subject or to get involved in the debate. Regular revision would quickly become understood by the public and, I think, eventually accepted.

I hope this idea will receive the attention of the committee when it examines the bill. I believe it will help to bring some reason and sanity into a discussion which has been unreasonable, unrealistic and frustrating since confederation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Senate and House of Commons Act

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest today to the debate on Bill C-242. I would like to say at the outset that I appreciate the views of those members who have spoken both for and against the bill. I thought I would wait a while before taking part in the debate, but I feel it will last a little longer than this evening and I expect to be absent from Ottawa tomorrow. I wish to express my views on this legislation in the event that there is a vote while I am not here.

I am opposed to the legislation. I fully endorse the views of the leader of our party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I feel he has fully outlined the position which I can take. However, I would like to give my views on several aspects of the proposed increases and I will take this opportunity to do so. At the same time, I would like to make some general remarks about the role of Members of Parliament under our parliamentary system. I believe that this legislation should not be on any priority list. It certainly is not on mine.

About four months ago we passed legislation raising the basic old age security pension by 42 cents per month, or $5.04 per year. When I look back at that increase I find it impossible to justify an $8,000 increase for Members of Parliament. There are many other groups in our society which should have priority over and above Senators and Members of Parliament, when it comes to spending from the public purse. Despite recent improvements in some categories, many of our old age pensioners, veterans and retired workers still live at or near the poverty line.

I would like to very briefly and concisely outline my objections to the legislation with which we are dealing. I feel that the increase is excessive—a 50 per cent increase over the salary that members are now receiving. Second, I take very strong exception to the increase in the non-taxable allowance. The proposal is to increase it from $6,000 to $8,000. The third thing I object to is the retroactive provision in the bill. Very few pieces of legislation come before this House which make salaries retroactive for a number of months. This legislation will pay the members back to October, 1970, when this session started.

Another point, Mr. Speaker, is that members have to be credible when putting forth their views. We have massive unemployment in Canada, one of the highest rates of unemployment in the history of our nation. This summer there will be many thousands of students out of work. Guidelines have been laid down by the government and endorsed by the members of this House. For the past two or three years we have heard the message that there must not be more than a 6 per cent increase in wages so far as labour groups are concerned. This year we heard the message that wage increases must be kept to 4 per cent or 4½ per cent. The House of Commons, in one swoop, will raise the wages of its members by approximately 50 per cent.

I realize that the last increase for members was in 1963, eight years ago. Some hon. members have made a pretty good case for an increase being made at this time. There is certainly a case for a number of members to receive an increase to cover various types of expenditures. I can think of members who come from scattered ridings whose expenditures over the year are far higher than those who live close to Ottawa or in an urban area. Further consideration should be given to members in this category. If they are to do a job for their constituents, they need money to get around the constituency in order to see and hear the problems. This is very difficult if much of their salary is spent for travel or other excessive expenses by those who live in these rural areas.

There are one or two points I would like to leave with the members of this House. I feel this method of raising the salaries of members is something we should not tolerate very much longer. Some members will be outlining what should be done to change the present set-up. We have heard a number of suggestions. I shall make another one. Members of Parliament should receive an adequate salary based on the job they do. I do not think that anyone here or in the constituencies would object to that. However, I firmly believe that it should not be left to periodic voting on an increase, and frequently great embarrassment to members of the various parties who take part in the debates and vote for or against salary increases.

The job of a Member of Parliament should be evaluated. A benchmark should be set, in the same way that benchmarks are set in the civil service. There has never been a proper evaluation of the job and work of a Member of Parliament. This is what a committee should do. An independent committee should evaluate the work done by a Member of Parliament.

An hon. Member: Beaupré did.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Harding: Beaupré did a partial job. We have recently been tussling with a similar problem in the Standing Committee on Public Accounts. There was a tremendous amount of debate when we were trying to find a proper benchmark as far as the Auditor General of Canada was concerned. The committee members finally came up with a solution. There is no reason why a similar evaluation could not be carried out as far as the members of this House and Senators are concerned. It might not be an easy task. We would have to take into consideration every facet of the job a Member of Parliament does and then compare it with closely related jobs in the civil service. If we cannot find such a job in the civil service we should look for one in private industry which parallels the work we do here. Find the job, find what the going rate of pay is and fix it at that level. Then, I believe, as civil servants get increases every two years there could be step by step increases for Members of Parliament and the problem would be dealt with. This is a proposal which I pass on to the government with the recommendation that serious consideration be given to carrying out an evaluation of this type.

There is one further point I wish to make before I sit down. It seems to me that the most important job an MP can do in Ottawa is to police legislation and carry out the research work which is really necessary if one is to be an effective representative here. I have not been here very long, but I find we are overburdened with a large amount of correspondence. We do a great deal of committee work and other work which often prevents our carrying out research, the task of digging down to find out exactly how legislation will affect the people. Improved research facilities are necessary. This is one of the first steps which should be taken if it is intended to give assistance to Members of Parliament. Perhaps assistance could be provided in each of the offices by way of an executive assistant who could take a great deal of the load from hon. members as far as correspondence is concerned, besides assisting in the research projects which in my opinion are so essential. This is one of the first priorities if members are adequately to fulfil the task we are sent here to perform, that is, the checking of legislation and the making of the best possible laws for the people of this nation.

I realize that things change as we go along, and no doubt we shall hear a variety of opinions expressed on the legislation which is before us. But I shall have no hesitation in voting against the legislation. The somewhat excessive amounts prescribed in it are certainly not warranted at this time. Whether the bill passes in its present form or whether amendments are made to it, I urge the government to set up machinery for properly evaluating the type of work we are doing here. Once and for all this question should be taken out of the House of Commons so that members of the various parties would not be called upon to vote for their own salaries.

It will not be so tough a job if we put our minds to it and are prepared to make a move. I hope this line of reasoning will be followed up before many months are passed. Again, I wish to assure all hon. members that I appreciate the views they have expressed. I intend to vote against the legislation, if I am here and the bill comes to a vote on second reading. I trust that some amendments will be made to it during the committee stage.

Mr. Kaplan: Would the hon. member permit a question? He criticized the Beaupré report as being only a partial study. I should like to ask him in what sense he considered it to be partial. Second, with the insight he has displayed as to the job of a Member of Parliament, what does he believe salaries of hon. members should be? The hon. member refrained from expressing a view on that point.

Mr. Harding: The point I was making is this: the Beaupré report never did compare the work we are doing here with other jobs in the civil service or in the business world. This is what I am suggesting should be done.

Mr. Kaplan: The second question?

An hon. Member: What do you think it is worth?

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, the question of remuneration of members of Parliament has always been a very sensitive one, but I want to say immediately that some members are not sincere when speaking against an increase of that remuneration. I can even say that some of them, and I refer particularly to the Creditistes want that increase badly while wishing to make Canadians believe they do not want to get it. You can't have it both ways, and here I use the very apt French word "politicaillerie", which means petty political manœuvers. That is what the Créditistes are doing. I am quite under the impression that their voters do not always believe them.

The hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) spoke a while ago. I have lived two years in the constituency of Lotbinière, at Saint-Patrice-de-Beau-Rivage, and I can tell you that the people of Saint-Patrice-de-Beau-Rivage and of the constituency of Lotbinière are not foolish enough to believe what the hon. member said a little while ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stewart: You see, the hon. member for Lotbinière—

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I would like to say to the hon. member who now has the floor that Saint-Beatrice is not located in Lotbinière, but in Lévis, a riding which is represented by an hon. member of the Liberal party.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): At any rate, Mr. Speaker, when I was in Lotbinière, people were not foolish. I know that things may have changed since, but the people's thinking has not.

I was greatly interested in a thing that the hon. member for Lotbinière said a few moments ago. He asked a question and said that an answer just had to be given. He asked: what is the role of an hon. member? Well, if the Créditistes do not know what their role as members is, they have no business in this House! As for me, I know what being a member and serving my constituents in Cochrane means. My electors know and so do I. If I was not entitled to a salary increase, I would leave politics, for I am convinced that the members who serve their constituents well are entitled to a better salary.

[English]

Just a word about what was said earlier today by the leader of the New Democratic Party. I respect his opinions and the point of view of his colleagues but I do wish they would not take a journey into the realm of fairy tale. One thing in particular that he mentioned was that the last time there was a raise in indemnity it was decided that it would be big enough to last for the next several years. I say that is a lot of nonsense.

The same thing was said by that brilliant associate editor of the Globe and Mail in this morning's editorial, which stated that for the next 10 to 20 years Members of Parliament would not have to ask for another raise. Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, my hiring a secretary in 1963 at a salary of $6,000 a year and telling her that since this was a very good salary she would not be able to have a raise for another 10 years! I suggest that the hon. member's argument is absolutely infantile and should not have been put forward.

There is no question that the members of this House require enough to be able to carry out their duties and to live in a decent way. If some hon. members want to live in a garret, that is their business. But my constituents would not want me to live that way, I have no intention of living that way and no Member of Parliament should be expected to live that way. Certainly there is a need, one that has been pretty well universally accepted.

When the Beaupré committee was first formed I recall that a very prominent journalist, Charles Lynch, wrote an article in very strong terms, in which he said the following:

> It is my view that the increases are valid, and I would have said so had the MPs voted them through forthwith, instead of taking the more considered line of turning the matter over to the new "advisory committee on parliamentary salaries and expenses." I think they should raise the wages, and put the chop on election spending.
> There is no doubt, as Stanley Knowles of the NDP said yesterday in sanctimoniously opposing pay raises, that the impartial committee will propose substantial increases, effective this year.

In the last paragraph of his article he had this to say:

> The nation expects a professional job from them—

That is to say, Members of Parliament.

> —and public expectations are rising. The MP, if he is to meet the increasing demands upon his time and his intellect, needs more money and more staff. Above all, he should not be prey to the pressures that burden a man who is forced to spend more than he is paid.

[Translation]

I represent a large constituency of northern Ontario. I have always said that it is as large as France but unfortunately someone has told me that it is not as large as France but a few square miles smaller. In any case, it is almost as large as France and certainly larger than Italy.

There is only one member of Parliament for this constituency while there are 400 deputies in France and I do not represent 50 million Frenchmen but I must serve 80,000 Canadians. I have to travel all across the constituency. My constituents are quite scattered. I know what it means to spend money on air fare and accommodations throughout my constituency. I am among those members of Parliament who find themselves short of money every month. This is why I hope this legislation will be adopted as soon as possible and I would ask my colleagues from all parties to support it.

[Mr. Stewart (Cochrane).]

[English]

It is never pleasant for a Member of Parliament to have to raise his own salary. This is something that seems to irk the public. They say, "There you are; you are just voting yourself a raise". It's not quite as easy as that and I think it is high time that the press, so ready to criticize us, explained this to the people. First of all, we do not just suddenly decide to vote ourselves a raise. Cabinet has first to be convinced that we need one, and they have to bring it forward. This is something the people do not understand.

Various things could be said on this subject, but it seems to me that since we have been discussing salaries for the past two years, in caucus, in committees and among ourselves, we should make this debate as short as possible instead of carrying it on. We have given our opinions from all parts of the House, representing all parts of the country. I suggest to hon. members that we should complete second reading as soon as possible so the bill can go to committee.

I do not think there is any member of the House who does not agree that something has to be done and that action is long overdue, though we cannot all agree on the action that should be taken. Many of us would like to take different action. Perhaps some prefer not to have a non-accountable allowance. But the point is that this is what has been proposed. It is a difficult situation and so far no one has been able to come up with a better solution. Perhaps they will in the future.

In the meantime, I think it behooves us all as Members of Parliament to stand behind the proposal of the government and to pass the legislation with the minimum of delay. We would then begin to serve our constituents in the manner they expect. We do not want to live in the lap of luxury, and that is not the idea. But we do want to be able to give proper service to our constituents. We do not want to have to say at weekends, "I am afraid to visit part of my riding because I simply cannot afford big hotel bill and the trip home." Although this should not happen, it has happened and it means we are being thwarted in our efforts to serve our constituents. I therefore implore all my colleagues to co-operate with the government on this measure so we can better serve our constituents.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak after the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), I fully endorse his stand on Bill C-242 concerning increased allowances for members of the House of Commons and Senators.

I was rather surprised tonight, Mr. Speaker, to hear the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) say to the members of the Ralliement créditiste that they were against this bill. Yet, we are only using the time allotted to us. I should like to point out to the hon. member who was asking me a while ago if we meant to engage in filibustering, that three Liberal members, two from the New Democratic Party and one from the Progressive Conservative Party have already spoken while only one representative from our group contributed to the debate. I believe the hon. member for Cochrane should address himself also to the Progressive Conservative and the NDP members because some of them will surely express opinions contrary to his own. He was right in inviting us to share his opinion but we are absolutely free and still under a democratic government.

I agree to describe the facts before voting. I am keeping to the priorities I promised our citizens I would always defend.

That is why I warn the government that I will not be able to vote in favour of Bill C-242 until it accepts the three following priorities: First, the adjustment of family allowances in keeping with the increase in the cost of living while maintaining their universality; second, the immediate increase of the basic federal income tax exemption to $5,000 for married couples and to $3,000 for unmarried people; and, third, the establishment of secretarial facilities in Roberval county to provide adequate services there.

If we are legislators we are also elected representatives of our ridings and above all social workers for all those who require our services.

Of course, this work requires dedication but also money. That is why I claim that it is incumbent upon the government to supply us with the facilities needed for our work.

We have been asking for such services for almost nine years and we have never been able to get them.

And yet the province of Quebec has set an example for Ottawa in this regard while Ottawa is getting much more taxes from our citizens.

For a long time we have also been asking that the government take over the car expenses incurred when we travel in our constituencies and, here again, we only got promises. Several members told me: Well, thanks to that increase you will now be able to set up an office in your constituency. This office already exists but it keeps going with my own money.

That increase will almost be brought to nothing because of the double taxation. Indeed, on the taxable $6,000 I will have to pay $3,000 in income tax alone. And if I take the balance to pay a salary to a young man, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) will again take $1,200 from this young worker. This shows us that the increase will have the effect of increasing the receipts of the federal treasury by $4,200 while only $1,800 will be left to me to render some services to my fellow-citizens. That approach is typical of the government. That is its way of getting taxes. It seems to promise an elephant, and delivers a mouse. But it is the taxpayers who foot the bill.

I cannot therefore go along with this hypocritical game because I have always been loyal to my constituents. As soon as these three priorities have been accepted, I will be prepared to consider new increases in parliamentary allowances.

I am amazed when I realize that the government, after eight years, suggests such an inrease. I think that it would have been much more logical to adjust members of Parliament allowances every year, as they do in the industry or elsewhere, taking into account the rise in the cost of living. But it seems that the government can never be as logical as others. Surely our expenses have increased in the last eight years, like those of other citizens, and I get a good laugh when I see a labour leader like Mr. Laberge being shocked at that increase. I will say to Mr. Laberge, that if he wants to be honest with himself for a change he should sit down with ten of his members and figure out what the increases in salary and expenses have been in the last eight years. He will not even dare open his mouth after that, I am sure.

It is not that I am not aware of the need for an adjustment, but it is a matter of principle and loyalty to my electors. In reply to those who claim that members take it easy today, I invite them, as I did last year, to follow me around just for one week. I maintain that few workers put in as many hours per week.

As for me, my week starts at 4 a.m. Monday, when I leave home, Mistassini, for Ottawa. I drive 500 miles to get here for the opening of the sitting at 2 p.m. and sit until 10.30 in the evening.

From Tuesday to Friday each week, I am on the Hill from 8.30 in the morning till 10.30 sometimes 11 at night, except on Wednesday when I leave at 6 and on Fridays when I leave Ottawa at 5 p.m. to reach my riding at one o'clock the next morning. On Saturdays I must be in my office at 8 o'clock and stay there until very late. On Sundays, when there are no receptions or meetings in municipalities, I receive my constituents in the office and finally I must be on my way at 4 in the morning to travel the 500 miles.

I apologize for having given all those details, but Canadian people must know the truth about members of Parliament. Certainly reporters will not tell them for us. Some may say that not all Members of Parliament work that hard!

With nine years' experience, Mr. Speaker, I do not dare pass judgment on anybody anymore because I know I will be 95 per cent wrong. Being better acquainted with my colleagues, the members of the Ralliement créditiste, with whom I have the pleasure of working, I can vouch that all of them give the best of themselves. And our only reason for being in Parliament is the fight for our principles and the loyalty which we must show to those who have elected us. And it is precisely because of these principles and this loyalty that we cannot accept Bill C-242 as drafted, mainly because of its Part II, concerning the increase for senators.

As I have already said and repeated in this House, I am absolutely against an increase in salary for senators; I am simply in favour of abolishing the Senate so that those who are actually governing the country may have more space.

Senate and House of Commons Act

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, it is always a very delicate thing for an individual to have to discuss a problem in which he is directly involved, as is the case with Bill C-242 dealing with allowances paid to members of Parliament. However, I feel it is my duty to take part in this debate and give my opinion as briefly as possible on the substance of this bill.

This afternoon I listened with great interest to the speech made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). I was very attentive in trying to understand every word of his remarks, and I must congratulate him for the fairness with which he expounded and defended the bill he sponsored. I feel that he stated clearly what is the real role of a member of Parliament and how this role must in fact be conceived even among the population. But, I will say this: Unfortunately, the function of the member of Parliament is sometimes despised by the people—

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): You do not mean that.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): The minister in charge of the Post Office (Mr. Côté) says that I do not mean this. It is because he knows that I mean ever word that he tells me this, by the way. I know that he is a friend and that he is saying this to tease me. At any rate he recognizes that I am a serious man.

In Quebec, when the Committee on the Constitution was holding meetings on April 19, only eight days ago, I found that French Canadians, some of our own people unfortunately were scornful of the representatives of the people.

It was useless to protest since they had already made up their mind. For them, all members of Parliament are to be despised because they are not exactly aware of their real function and of the way they are performing it.

In the past, unfortunately, some members may have failed to do a good job. But this does not mean that such failure is now general. As for myself, since I have been sitting in the House, I had the honour of meeting every member for whom I have much respect. I think their functions are really honourable. In fact, a citizen who has the good fortune of filling such a post should consider himself appreciated by his fellow men and must, in return, give the best of himself by trying to honestly represent his electors.

Mr. Speaker, I also consider that the remarks made today by my colleague from Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) were honest. And when we hear sometimes—and I know that it is neither serious nor sincere—some hon. members voicing that the Créditistes lack sincerity or that they are hypocritical, I think they speak beyond their minds. In my opinion, it is only a way of saying that we do not share the same views. I excuse them heartily, and I am convinced that, as early as tomorrow, they will be ready to tell people: These people have the courage of their convictions and say what is on their minds.

Some may say also—or at least they may think—these are members who seem ready to refuse a salary increase.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

I am not against it because we don't need it; we do, it is obvious! Nobody turns down a raise. Sometimes people will ask us the following question: If the bill is passed as it will necessarily be because the government has the majority, will you refuse what is offered to you? No, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, when I vote against taxes increases and when the bill is passed by the majority, I have to pay these taxes as a responsible citizen. The same will happen for this bill respecting increased parliamentary indemnities; and I shall go along with the law and accept the decision of the majority.

There, Mr. Speaker, you have a frank and honest opinion of the role assigned to me and of the situation as I see it.

Mr. Speaker, on February 5, 1970, the government appointed a commission to consider the matter of parliamentary allowances and expenses. The members of Parliament were invited to state their views in this regard. That is exactly what I did. I submitted a brief. So you see, this opinion of mine is not something that I made up tonight.

One only has to refer to the notes of the Breaupré Commission to see that the member for Bellechasse did answer the invitation extended by the Commission.

In the brief I submitted on May 19, 1970, I humbly stated my opinion in answer to the Commission's invitation to make our views known to them.

And this is what I said:

First, since the last readjustment of electoral boundaries, rural constituencies have been enlarged, and as a result a member has to incur heavy car expenses to travel within his constituency and maintain contact with the people.

Second, the constituency of Bellechasse, which includes almost three provincial counties, and which was represented up to June 25, 1968 by three federal members, is now represented by one member only, which has tripled the workload of maintaining contact with the people, travel and other expenses with respect to various organizations and citizen groups, as well as contributions of all sorts.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Privy Council, as government House leader, if by any miracle members should become shy and tongue-tied on this sensitive matter tomorrow, what we will be doing afterwards?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, we will continue with the present item, the amendment to the Senate and House of Commons Act, followed by the bill to amend the Prime Minister's Residence Act, followed by the bill to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, the bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act and the bill to amend the Post Office Act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—COMPULSORY TRANSFER FROM NON-TAXABLE WAR VETERANS' ALLOWANCES TO TAXABLE GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT—APPLICATION OF TAX RELIEF TO 1971

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, April 26, as recorded in Hansard at page 5222, I put a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) in the following words:

> In view of the hope that the Minister of Veterans Affairs has held out to veterans, especially those who are being forced to transfer from the non-taxable war veterans allowance to the taxable guaranteed income supplement, that something will be done this year to relieve their tax position, can the Minister of Finance give the assurance that any changes affecting the position of these veterans will apply to the year 1971?

The reply of the Minister of Finance was to the effect that he could not indicate in advance to the House what the position of the government would be with respect to tax measures. May I say quite candidly that in asking this question tonight I know that I will not get an answer. I know that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) will tell me that what I am asking for is a commitment in advance regarding a tax change. I know he will tell me that to give a definitive answer to my question would be to disclose proposed tax changes and that under the practices of Parliament he cannot do that. He may then put to me a rhetorical question, asking me why I am taking up the time of this "late show" to raise this matter. Sir, I do so because to me it is a very important issue and I think that the only way we can hope to get action on it is to keep the issue alive, to keep reminding the government of the fact that it must do something about it.

As hon. members are aware, certain regulations were passed recently under the War Veterans Allowance Act which have the effect of forcing veterans who are 65 years of age and over, and who are in receipt of the war veterans' allowance, to apply for the guaranteed income supplement that can be attached to the old age security pension. The result in terms of dollars that a veteran receives, having been forced to make this move, is the same. There is a ceiling on a single war veterans' allowance recipient of $161 a month. Therefore, if he gets only $80 old age security, he gets $81 in war veterans allowance, which gives him a total of $161 a month. On the other hand, if he applies for and gets the guaranteed income supplement along with his old age security pension, that adds up to $135 a month, whereupon he gets only $26 a month in war veterans' allowance, but the total is still $161.

Since these two totals are the same, someone may ask, why do we complain about it? Apart from other reasons for our complaining about this practice, the fact is that war veterans' allowance benefits are not taxable. Therefore, the single war veterans' allowance recipient whom I described—and I have done it in the simplest terms—would be getting only $80 a month of taxable income, or $960 a year, and therefore he would pay no income tax. But when the same veteran is forced to take $135 a month as old age security and guaranteed income supplement, that results in his having $1,620 a year of taxable income.

If he is 70 years of age or over, he has total exemptions of $1,600 so he has to pay income tax only on $20. Of course, that is not much but the fact is that he has less total income than he would have had otherwise. If the veteran is between the ages of 65 and 70 his exemptions are only $1,100; therefore he has to pay tax on $520. I suggest that this is unfair and should be corrected.

The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) has held out the hope that before the end of the year the tax changes to be put into effect by the Minister of Finance will take care of the situation, but we have had no positive or definitive assurance that this will be done and therefore a great many veterans are concerned.

I raise this question, despite the fact that I do not expect to get the answer I would like, in order to underline that concern and to keep the issue alive. I do this in the hope that it will be dealt with in a manner favourable to the veteran just as soon as possible.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has placed this matter on the schedule for debate tonight under Standing Order 39 (6), which implies either that the question was not regarded as urgent by Mr. Speaker in the original instance or that the hon. member was not satisfied with the answer. Since the first was not the case, evidently he was not satisfied with the answer and, of course, in his comments a moment ago he indicated what my answer might be. I appreciate the importance of the matter and the concern of the hon. member in underlining it. I know that with his well-known respect for the institution of Parliament and the traditions upon which Parliament is founded, he cannot, in a technical sense, fail to be satisfied with the answer.

He is asking for a statement involving a change in the tax laws and what, if anything, will be done in that regard must await a budget in the tradition of this House. I should say that the representations made by him on this and other occasions and the representations made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) with respect to the problem that has arisen for some veterans as a result of changes in war veterans' allowances, have been brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). He is aware of them, they are under consideration and the results of that consideration must await a budget announcement.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

FINANCE—REPRESENTATION OF GENERAL PUBLIC ON BANKS' BOARDS OF DIRECTORS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on April 4, in an appearance on the CBC program "Weekend," the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) made a brief statement in relation to the banks of Canada and the views of their chief officers. He made some suggestions that would indicate he was seriously thinking there should be representatives of the public on the boards of directors of Canadian banks. The Ottawa Citizen of April 5 reported the statements of the minister in some detail and I shall quote two short sections. The first reads:

> Government will have to "play a greater role" in the management of Canadian banks if their presidents "really don't care about the economic and financial independence of Canada," says energy minister Greene.

The article continues:

> Mr. Greene suggested government might have to "sit at the table where the great financial decisions are made in far greater degree than it has in the past to enable Canadian companies to have the financial muscle to play in this very tough league with the American companies."

Because there was wide comment on the statement of the minister, and much editorial comment, the minister wrote a letter to the Toronto Star on April 16. I quote a couple of sentences from that letter as follows:

> —we cannot permit the resource and industrial entities of production to be in a continuing and growing degree owned by non-Canadians.
> A new factor on this question may have been brought into focus by the recent statements of chartered bank presidents to the effect that they do not support such entities as the Canada Development Corporation to enable a greater Canadian presence in our resource and industrial complex, and further that they apparently do not subscribe to any growing degree of economic nationalism.

He ended the letter by saying:

> These factors would suggest that there should be a public discussion in Canada as to whether, as has been found beneficial in other countries, those responsible for the political direction of the country should have an adequate voice in the financial decisions which will determine the future make-up of our country.

I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on April 5, as a result of news reports of what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had said, whether consideration was being given to legislation which would give the government power to appoint public representatives on the boards of directors of the chartered banks of Canada, which was precisely in line with what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had said. I also said that I am concerned, as is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, about the tremendous power which the banks of Canada wield, a power which stems from the tremendous financial resources they have, resources made available to them by the people of Canada. These resources they hold in trust.

A report on business carried in the Globe and Mail in December, 1970, showed that the chartered banks of Canada had as of October 31, 1970, over $45 billion in total assets; that they had loans and mortages outstanding of more than $25 billion; that they had personal savings on deposit in Canada of over $16 billion; that they had other deposits, not counting moneys deposited in banks by the government of Canada, provinces or other banks, of over $18 billion; and that bank profits in the last two years had risen by more than 25 per cent. I am referring to the net profits of banks.

This is tremendous financial power and it seems to me, as it seemed to the minister when he made those statements, that the people of Canada and their government ought to have a good deal more say about how the banks operate and in the decisions which they make, decisions which will affect the well-being of every Canadian citizen. We have not done that up to now. For that reason I asked the Minister of Finance whether he was giving consideration to bringing forward legislation which would permit the government of Canada to appoint to the boards of directors of the chartered banks of Canada public representatives.

I was very disappointed with the minister's reply to my question. He said that the directors of banks are representatives of the public. I agree that they are representatives of a small section of the public of Canada, of that 1 per cent or 2 per cent who have large financial resources. I am not critical of the directors; they represent these people and represent them very well. What I am suggesting, and what I suggested when I asked my question, is that the banks are so important to the well-being of this country that the government of Canada ought to pass legislation such as I have suggested, as has been done in other countries.

As the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources suggested in his statement, the governments of other countries have power to appoint representatives to the boards of directors of banks. I put forward a relatively moderate suggestion to the Minister of Finance but it met no success. Hopefully, I shall now receive a more sympathetic response.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday of this week, on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) I responded to a question from the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) on the same subject matter but from a somewhat different angle. Rather than repeat the general comments I made at that time concerning the financial institutions in Canada, particularly the banks, I refer the hon. member to the answer given on Tuesday evening of this week.

Section 18, subsection 3 of the Bank Act requires that at least three-quarters of the directors of a chartered bank shall be Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada. At the present time the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has no intention of recommending amendments to the Bank Act, although I would point out that the regular decennial revision to the Bank Act will be a matter of urgent importance to the next Parliament. No doubt suggestions made by the hon. member and others in this regard will be considered when the government formulates the proposals it intends to put forward at that time, whatever government it might be.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.20 p.m.

GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

TABLING OF HANDBOOK, "CANADA"

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the practice adopted last year and in response to the wish that you expressed in 1968 that the publication of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics entitled Canada be made available as quickly as possible, I have the pleasure of tabling today copies of that publication in both official languages pursuant to Standing Order 41(2).

The Canada Yearbook is not yet available, but it probably will be towards the end of the summer.

CANADA CANCER FOUNDATION

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CORPORATION

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-245, respecting cancer research.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, today being the last day of April, designated as cancer month, I have the privilege to move the introduction of a private bill which I hope will commend itself not only to hon. members but to all Canadians, and particularly to the government.

The purpose of this bill is to focus the attention of all people on the necessity of research to arrest the dreadful disease of cancer. This bill establishes the Canada Cancer Foundation.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT DEVELOPMENT PLANS—ACHIEVEMENT OF FULL EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to make a statement setting forth its strategy for developing the economy of the country and providing adequate employment opportunities, particularly in view of the grave concern expressed by one of its own ministers in the most dramatic way available to him, by resigning, and the consequent creation of deep disquiet in the country on this whole subject.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we shall make a statement at the time of the budget.

Mr. Stanfield: Will the Prime Minister also disclose to the House whether the government has any timetable with regard to the achieving of full employment, whether it be defined for convenience as 3, 3½ or 4 per cent unemployment? I ask this question in view of the concern expressed by the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada and the length of time the chairman has indicated the achievement of full employment will take under the government's present policies.

Mr. Trudeau: Now that the New Democratic Party and the Conservative party have defined full employment as 4 per cent unemployment, we will consider the matter.

Mr. Stanfield: I made no such definition. I was simply giving the Prime Minister a little latitude. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, finally, whether there is as much disagreement within his government on the subject of economic policies as there has obviously been with regard to the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Leader of the Opposition's supplementary question has argumentative overtones.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Would the Prime Minister define for the House and the country what he considers to be full employment?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the hon. member's question is not in order. He invites the Prime Minister to express an opinion as to a definition. He asks what the Prime Minister considers to be full employment. It seems to me that is the kind of question which might be asked as part of a debate but not one which can be accepted at this time. The hon. member might attempt to rephrase the question.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If the government has a policy aimed at full employment, would the Prime Minister indicate what the government considers to be an acceptable level of unemployment?

Mr. Trudeau: As I said in answer to the first question, in the budget speech our views on this will be made known as they have in the past.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. David Lewis (York South): The Prime Minister knows very well that we have not suggested 4 per cent unemployment as representing full employment and he ought not to say so. In view of the resignation of two ministers in protest against the government's economic policies, is the government reassessing those policies, or does the resignation of the hon. member for Duvernay mean that the government is sticking by the policies it has pursued up to now?

An hon. Member: He is reassessing the cabinet.

Mr. Trudeau: If the hon. member wants to help us reconcile the remedies which the two members suggest for economic policy, perhaps I will accept his advice and help. But the hon. member knows that the resignations by the two ministers did not involve agreement on their part on economic policy.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT POLICY STATEMENT

Mr. David Lewis (York South): In view of some of the statements in the letter of resignation from the hon. member for Duvernay, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the cabinet has yet decided on its policies with regard to foreign ownership and with regard to the way in which the resource industries of Canada may be protected for the benefit of Canada, and when may we expect the statement which has been promised for so long on the issue of foreign ownership?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we hoped that we would get some enlightenment on this matter as a result of the New Democratic Party congress, but I can say with certainty that we are more advanced in our policy on foreign ownership than is the hon. member's party.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I had occasion to say once before that I am very much touched by the Prime Minister's humour, which at times is much more relevant than his statements of fact. May I ask the Prime Minister to answer the question when we may expect a statement on foreign ownership either from him or a member of the cabinet?

Mr. Trudeau: Sooner than we are going to get it from the New Democratic Party, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister has had three years on the job training, is he not now capable of making a few decisions on his own?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDUSTRY

MINING—ASSISTANCE FOR EXPLORATION IN NORTHERN QUEBEC

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

This week, the minister has announced the resumption of the assistance program to mining exploration and he has stated that an amount of $2,000,000 would be allotted to it. Can the minister say whether a portion of this amount may be applied to mining exploration in New Quebec?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): No, Mr. Speaker. My announcement dealt with mining exploration in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Could the minister say whether the government considers the possibility of granting asistance to mining exploration in that vast area which is also a part of Canada?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we cannot do that, because natural resources within the provincial boundaries of Quebec come under the jurisdiction of the provincial government.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—MEETING WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS—COMPLETION OF ENVIRONMENTAL STUDY—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister concerning the meeting on May 3 between United States and Canadian officials. Noting particularly the statement by the United States Secretary of the Interior that he believes that a final environmental study can be completed by mid-September, 1971, is it the opinion of the Canadian government and its officials that this very important environmental study can in fact be completed by that time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I cannot answer. The Secretary of State for External Affairs dealt with this matter yesterday and I do not have the details of it.

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask the Prime Minister, since this meeting is just a few days away, whether the Canadian government now has a point of view to present to the United States officials regarding the trans-Alaskan pipeline system?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know that Mr. Sharp has made—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: I know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has made his position known in the House and elsewhere, as have other members of our caucus. But beyond that I am sure they will have serious talks in Washington and that the policy will be further elaborated.

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs was speaking for the government at that time?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, he was speaking for the government.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE INQUIRY BE PROCEEDED WITH

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the revelations at the United States Senate hearing yesterday, where it was obvious to Secretary of the Interior Morton and others that further studies would have to be made, may I ask the Prime Minister once more whether or not at this stage he is willing to instruct the government House leader to withdraw his untimely support for the Conservative motion which prevented this House from carrying out such a study on the effects in Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have raised the matter with the House leader and we did indeed discuss it. We feel that the matter should indeed be seized by parliamentarians, but there is a committee on national resources, I believe, that is also enabled to study such matters. Consideration will be given to the form in which discussions can take place.

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the House has no knowledge whatsoever of the committee on national resources seizing itself of this problem, and as we have no advice or information that the House will instruct that committee to take up this problem, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he will ask one of his ministers responsible to give instructions through the House to that committee to carry out such a study?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the position is that there are other members of other committees who can do this job equally as well, and it is a matter of deciding which committee should be doing this job.

An hon. Member: Hard luck!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe the Leader of the Opposition has a supplementary question.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—PERSONS RESPONSIBLE FOR DEVELOPING GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the suggestion by the right hon. Prime Minister, as I understood him, that the policy of his government will be further elaborated in the course of the meeting next week in Washington, is the policy of the government with regard to the trans-Alaska pipeline system being elaborated and worked out by officials rather than by ministers of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Just like the hon. member's question, Mr. Speaker. While I am on my feet—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: What happened? Did you have a bad night?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I believe there are one or two supplementary questions to be asked on the subject.

An hon. Member: It's time for another holiday.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I asked the right hon. Prime Minister a serious question. Is government policy going to be worked out by the government officials who will visit Washington next week?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that the policy of the government is the policy of the elected representatives of the people, but surely the Leader of the Opposition knows that officials can also contribute toward this type of policy formation. It is not extraordinary that meetings at the international level be held between officials.

Mr. Stanfield: You said they would elaborate the policy.

Mr. Trudeau: I cannot quite understand what the difficulty of the Leader of the Opposition is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate that the right hon. Prime Minister is anxious to refer to another question, but before we go on to the matter the right hon. gentleman has in mind I will allow a last supplementary by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, following which the Prime Minister will be allowed to refer to the other matter. Then, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister has been struggling to maintain the floor in order to impart some knowledge to the House, I was about to ask him to give the House that information.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for Cape-Breton-East Richmond for his assistance to the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the hon. gentleman's continuing assistance.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has responded to the spirit of co-operation I wanted to have prevail.

NATIONAL SECURITY

EXPIRY OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PREMIER OF QUEBEC AND PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like the floor to table the correspondence the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster asked me about yesterday between the premier of Quebec and myself in relation to the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact the premier of Quebec has accused the Minister of Justice of a lack of logic, since the Minister of Justice said yesterday he was going to set up a joint committee of members of the House of Commons and the Senate to look into the kind of legislation which might be produced, and as the Prime Minister has now filed some material, is he prepared to file all the correspondence between himself and the premier, including telegrams, in order that when the terms of reference of this committee come before the House we will be in a position to study them and determine if they are wide enough in scope to ascertain the true situation?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I want to be helpful, but out of memory I think I have indeed tabled all the correspondence on this matter between the premier of Quebec and myself beginning with the letter he sent me early in October requesting that the federal government realize that there was an apprehended insurrection and concluding with the letters I have his permission to table today.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question and, believe me, I do not ask it in an argumentative way.

An hon. Member: Oh, no?

Mr. Woolliams: Is the Prime Minister assuring the House that all letters and all telegrams between himself and the premier and between the premier and himself have been tabled for our information? If he is not capable—I do not mean capable—if he is not able to answer at the moment because of lack of information, will he check into the matter and assure the House that he will table all correspondence?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as I said, according to my memory I have tabled the relevant correspondence. There may be other pieces of correspondence. I will ask my office to check into it. If there are such other pieces, I will see if the premier of Quebec has any objection to tabling them. If he does, I shall not table them, but if he has no objection I shall table them.

EXPIRY OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—CORRESPONDENCE FROM PROVINCES OTHER THAN QUEBEC RESPECTING NEW LEGISLATION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Have there been requests from any other provinces for legislation of this kind or letters and telegrams of this kind from other provinces and if so, will the Prime Minister table them?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no other correspondence with my office on this matter, but I know that the subject matter has been discussed verbally between the premiers and ministers of other provinces and federal ministers.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

EXTENT OF INVOLVEMENT IN NATURAL GAS PIPELINE CONSORTIUM, GAS ARCTIC

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out of information revealed in the 1970 annual report of Alberta Gas Trunk to the effect that Canadian National Railways has now become involved with the consortium known as Gas Arctic which is planning a pipeline to move natural gas from Prudhoe Bay through Canada to the United States. Can the minister tell us the nature and extent of this involvement by the Canadian National Railways in Gas Arctic?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it would be quite impossible to give the nature and extent of the involvement in order to explain it thoroughly in answer to a question of this sort. I can say, however, that at the present time it is merely, if I can use this expression, a holding action on the part of Canadian National. They are exploring new avenues for activity, investment and development, and they have participated in this group on that basis. But there are no, in a sense, deep or ongoing commitments as of the present time. If it will be of any benefit to the hon. member I can perhaps write him a letter indicating the full terms, but I think that is all I can say in answer to an oral question.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask if there is any commitment with reference to Canadian National Railways acquiring an equity position in this consortium, and what is the amount of that commitment?

Mr. Jamieson: Again, Mr. Speaker, I can only reply that in so far as I am aware it is exploratory at the moment. Conceivably it could lead to the involvement of Canadian National because, of course, pipelines are in a sense a form of transportation and they are merely maintaining the normal position of transportation companies in this regard. My memory is there is no commitment to an equity position at the moment, but I will be glad to look into the matter and reply as fully as possible later.

AGRICULTURE

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—STUDY OF CONSTITUTIONALITY OF PROVINCIAL REGULATIONS

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In view of the increasingly acute problem between the governments of Quebec and Ontario concerning the marketing of broilers and eggs, does the government intend to request its legal advisers, if it has not already done so, to carry out a study on Ontario and Quebec marketing legislation in order to ascertain whether it is in keeping with the constitution and whether it does not paralyze free movement of products within Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has had occasion to explain to the House that we do not consider that as the best way to solve the problem mentioned by the hon. member. We are convinced that through the Farm Products Marketing Agencies Act, i.e. Bill C-176, the problem can be dealt with firmly. We hope this will soon be done.

Mr. Beaudoin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the Prime Minister tell us whether he intends to request such legal advice?

AIR TRANSPORT

PROVISION OF INFORMATION TO AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS ON CHANGES IN AIRCRAFT IDENTIFICATION CODES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I should like to direct one or two more brief questions to the Minister of Transport with respect to air safety. Has the minister or his department now taken the necessary appropriate steps to ensure that any changes, either by the FAA or by the Department of Transport, with respect to identification codes used in the transponders in aircraft will be effectively transmitted prior to their coming into effect in equipment in operation in North America?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The officials have advised me that in their judgment the existing arrangement is satisfactory. However, in the event that there may be some problem or some gap in the arrangement I have asked the top officials of the department, including those who have major responsibilities for flight safety, to consult with the air traffic controllers themselves. This, I hope, will take place immediately, and as far as I know it will within the next day or two.

Mr. Forrestall: In view of the fact that some international confusion continues to exist and we have had difficulty in resolving the problem, I wonder whether or not Canada could take some lead in bringing about a system of international identification through transponders that would preclude any further confusion and the possibility of a serious accident? Could we not take the lead?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think it is generally known that on many safety issues we have taken the lead in the international field of aviation. I am happy to advise the House that the new representative of the Canadian government at ICAO, who will be appointed within the next few days, is in fact a man who has had wide experience in the air controller field. In other words, we have chosen a man who has maximum competence in this area, and he will be working on it.

SUGGESTED AUTHORIZATION OF AIR TRAFFIC CONTROLLERS TO GROUND PILOTS DISOBEYING INSTRUCTIONS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that air traffic controllers do not have the authority to ground pilots who disobey their instructions, has any thought been given to strengthening the hand of air traffic controllers with a view to providing still further safety for those who travel by commercial or private air lines?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I think that the House would agree that the ability to ground a pilot should not rest with the controllers but that the controllers should have full freedom to notify those who do have authority to ground pilots. It is this kind of technique, this kind of communications network, that we are trying to improve at present; hence the ongoing talks with the controllers. In other words, if they have ideas for improving the system we will be very glad to consider them and, if they are logical, to implement them.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—COMPLETION AND TABLING OF REPORT TO CABINET

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of National Revenue. In light of the resignation from the cabinet of the hon. member for Duvernay and of the fact that his stated reasons have some economic implications, can the minister tell us when he anticipates completing the study on the degree of foreign ownership, foreign takeovers, etc. and presenting the report to the cabinet? Will it be the intention then to table that document well ahead of the presentation of income tax changes so that we can consider the package as one?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I advised the House previously that the work I had been carrying on was work within the government for the use of the cabinet. I do not think it is appropriate to comment in the way I am invited to do by the hon. member on what is essentially a matter of cabinet business. As the Prime Minister pointed out, it is the government's intention to inform the House once the cabinet reaches a decision on this very important matter.

TIME OF INTRODUCTION OF TAX REFORM PROPOSALS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the implications that this resignation may have with regard to the tax reform proposals, will the Prime Minister confirm that the government is going ahead with its regular timetable on tax reform and will he tell the House just what it is so that we can be reminded again of the date when the tax proposals will be brought before the House this summer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, we will be going ahead with our regular schedule. I do not think the resignation to which the hon. member referred will affect the schedule adversely—perhaps the contrary. As to the timetable, I hope that by next week we will be in a position to inform Members of Parliament definitely as to the schedule so that they will be able to make whatever plans appear to them to be necessary for the summer months.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN—PROVISION OF RELIEF—DISCUSSION WITH RED CROSS

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): My question is addressed to the Prime Minister. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs stated in the House yesterday the government's general intention to assist in the relief of the people of East Pakistan, can the Prime Minister tell us specifically whether the question of such relief has been discussed with the International Red Cross?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do know that the Canadian High Commissioner is in East Pakistan rather than in Islamabad and that he has been asked to report to the government on the possibility of moving large supplies of foodstuffs and other supplies to East Pakistan if and when they are requested by the government of that country. I should also say that I have been in communication with the president of Pakistan. However, so far as the Red Cross is concerned, I am not aware of any exchanges having yet taken place.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—PROGRESS IN NATIONAL DEFENCE SECTOR

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Would the minister, perhaps on Monday, make a statement on motions to the House informing us to what extent his aspect of the summer employment program for students is working? Are all the spaces taken up or is there room for more applications? I ask this question in view of the fact that the minister's share of the program is probably the most practical one, and we would like to know how it is progressing.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I will consider the suggestion about making a statement. I can say in a general way that the program, as it was last year, has been oversubscribed.

Mr. Nesbitt: In view of the fact that the minister's share of this program has been oversubscribed, would he take up the matter with his cabinet colleagues and try to obtain more money to enlarge the program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to draw to the attention of hon. members that we are falling behind our schedule this morning.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

POWER

PROPOSED LARGE-SCALE QUEBEC DEVELOPMENT—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS ON DIVERSION OF WATERS AND EXPORT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question with regard to the suggested large-scale power development by the province of Quebec. Have there been any discussions between his government and the province of Quebec with regard to the diversion of waters, in association with any such project, under the jurisdiction of the government of Canada and any discussions with regard to the export of power as a result of such diversion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take the question as notice and ask the appropriate minister to reply. There have been none with me personally.

PROPOSED LARGE-SCALE QUEBEC DEVELOPMENT—ECOLOGICAL STUDIES OF PROBLEMS INVOLVED IN DIVERSION OF RIVERS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Earlier in the week I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry whether any officials in his department had made surveys on the ecological problems involved in the diversion of five major rivers for this project. He said at that time that he would check to see what he could find out and then would inform the House. Is he in a position now to tell us what, if any, activity or involvement there has been by his department with officials of Quebec in this problem?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): I know of no such inquiry. However, I am still checking to make absolutely certain that there have been no investigations of this kind relating to diversions.

SALE BY QUEBEC TO UNITED STATES INTERESTS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In view of the questions that have been asked with reference to this development, was there any discussion between the Prime Minister and the premier of Quebec with regard to the selling of Quebec-Hydro for $2 billion to United States interests inasmuch as the government seemed to be very interested in what might happen in regard to a company in Calgary, namely, Home Oil?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I understand that it is the sale of electricity, not of any company, that is involved. Of course the House knows that the government is favourably disposed to the sale of Canadian oil, and it is normal that it should also be favourably disposed to the sale of electricity in appropriate circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, could I supplement the answer of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I brought to the attention of hon. members a moment ago, the fact that we were running short of time. I think it should be time to give an opportunity to other hon. members to participate in this particular operation. These remarks include ministers, who might supplement their replies on Monday.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Not so far as I am aware, Mr. Speaker, but I will inquire.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED DIFFICULTIES RESULTING FROM NEW MAIL ROUTINGS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Post Office. Since new mail routings introduced by the Post Office have in many cases resulted in much slower mail service and reduced standards, is the minister planning a further overhaul to correct the mess that exists in many places?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I did not quite understand the first part of the question.

Mr. Burton: Is the minister not aware that there are many cases in Canada, such as some in Saskatchewan which have come to my attention, where mail that formerly travelled 109 miles in two days to reach its destination from a major centre now has to travel almost 350 miles and takes six days?

Inquiries of the Ministry

An hon. Member: That is a mess.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LABOUR RELATIONS

SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTE BETWEEN ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY AUTHORITY AND EMPLOYEES

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I have heard that there may have been some recent developments in connection with contract negotiations between the union and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. I wonder whether the minister would like to make a statement or indicate to the House if any developments have taken place that should be mentioned at this time?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will realize that this takes me completely by surprise.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jamieson: I am happy to advise the hon. member and the House that a settlement of the seaway negotiations was completed this morning, thus keeping the Minister of Labour's batting average pretty close to 1,000.

HOUSING

POSITION RESPECTING MORTGAGE ON ROCHDALE COLLEGE, TORONTO—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for housing and urban affairs. It deals with the overdue mortgage held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation on Rochdale College, Toronto. Would the minister say whether or not he is ready to make a statement concerning the government's plans to recover the money advanced to this institution?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am not ready to make a statement on this occasion but I hope it will be soon.

REPORT ON SEWAGE DISPOSAL AND WATER POLLUTION

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for housing. Can the minister tell the House why his department has held up for more than six months the publication of a report on water pollution? Can he tell us when we may expect the 14 recommendations contained in the report on water pollution and sewage disposal to be made public?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the report to which the hon. member refers. We have at any given time a series of staff papers on a broad range of subjects. These are internal papers, generally speaking. Some proposals we accept and some we reject. I cannot identify precisely the particular report about which the hon. member is talking.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that we might save time if the hon. member would communicate directly with the minister to identify the report in question.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

LETTING OF CONTRACTS WITHOUT COMPETITIVE TENDERING

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services. Since $1.8 million was paid to one consultant firm for federal contracts in the last two years without competitive tendering, can the minister indicate what guarantees there may be against abuses in awarding contracts on the basis of non-competitive tendering?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is putting a question which in my view is very wide in scope. I would think that kind of question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, this matter is of some urgency because non-competitive tenders are being sought. May I ask whether consideration is being given to abolishing non-competitive tendering which seems to be increasing?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the additional information the hon. member is seeking might be included in a statement to the House on motions or in a written reply to the hon. member's written question.

[Mr. Scott.]

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NATURE OF DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN MINISTER OF TRANSPORT AND PREMIER OF NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say if he had discussions yesterday in Ottawa with the premier of Newfoundland and is he able to say what matters were discussed at the meeting?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is a fact that I had discussions with the premier of Newfoundland yesterday. A wide range of matters was discussed, including how well the hon. member for St. John's West is doing in the House.

TRILEVEL NATIONAL CONSULTATION—FREQUENCY OF MEETINGS—SPECIAL POWERS FOR MUNICIPALITIES WITH OVER ONE MILLION POPULATION

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for urban affairs. As the three levels of government yesterday at the Winnipeg tripartite conference committed themselves to national consultation on problems created by mushrooming urban growth may I ask, first, whether regular meetings are planned and, if so, how often and, second, whether special powers are to be given to municipalities with populations of over one million?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the commitment to the principle of trilevel consultation was, I think, a very encouraging action yesterday. It came after two days of what I would describe as difficult and intense negotiations. It was a commitment subject to ratification by the governments represented by each of the provincial ministers attending the Winnipeg meeting. The details the hon. member is seeking I regret that I cannot give him now because the intergovernmental committees to deal with those kinds of details have just now been found. I would emphasize that we will have to move stage by stage into this area, holding to the commitment that national trilevel consultations will take place, I hope, on a full and continuing basis starting late this fall or, at the latest, early next year.

BRIDGES

OHIO-ONTARIO—GOVERNMENT ACTION FOLLOWING STUDY BY STATE INDICATING FEASIBILITY

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, this matter is of interest to several departments of government, but I have taken the liberty of giving notice of my question to the Minister of Public Works. Since a very comprehensive study initiated and completed mainly by the state of Ohio indicates that an international bridge linking that state with the province of Ontario is not only possible but practical, can the minister advise if a similar study is under way in Canada, or are we co-operating in any manner with regard to this bridge which has tremendous potential economic possibilities for the entire area?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this giant idea seems to be more of a conception than a proposal. It surfaced first in 1965 and has been discussed, I think, with Ontario. No approach has been made to my department. I am advised by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that no approach has been made to his department. If it comes to reality then, of course, it will be very important to Canada. An approach will have to be made through the Department of External Affairs because of the fact of traversing Canadian inland waters.

TRADE

ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT OVERSEAS OFFICES TO PROMOTE GRAIN SALES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the expression of views by the Canada Grains Council concerning the maintenance of permanent overseas offices to develop market information and grain sales, have there been in the past or are there now officials of his department permanently stationed in overseas offices who have a responsibility in this area?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that his question well might be placed on the order paper, or he may prefer to have it considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Benjamin: In light of the views expressed yesterday by the Grains Council, can the minister advise if the government is giving any consideration to maintaining either governmental or non-governmental, non-profit offices overseas to develop additional grain sales?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): To make it short, Mr. Speaker, I will only say that all my trade commissioners are working part-time for the Canadian Wheat Board. If more is suggested, we'll look into it.

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTE AFFECTING WORKERS BETWEEN FEDERAL AND QUEBEC GOVERNMENTS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Labour, but in his absence I shall direct it to the Prime Minister.

In view of the present problems which interfere with the construction of the airport in Ste. Scholastique, could the minister tell us today or shortly whether these problems come under joint jurisdiction or under provincial jurisdiction only?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not give a legal opinion, but I wish to be as helpful as possible to the House by explaining that we have funds available, that we have made plans for the new airport and that we have also entered into contracts to ensure the implementation of some of these projects. We want to find the workers needed by those contractors to do their work and if I am well informed such is the federal government's position.

As far as the position of the others involved is concerned, the hon. member should inquire elsewhere. I believe this issue is twofold: there is the conflict between unions and there is the conflict relating to the actual problem of the construction workers which has come up within the Quebec legislation itself.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I wish to ask the Prime Minister.

Considering that the interest of Canada is still involved, does the Prime Minister intend to meet with the provincial authorities in an effort to find a solution to this problem as soon as possible?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there have been several meetings between the federal Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Quebec ministers as well as at the official level. I repeat that the federal position is quite clear. We want to proceed with the construction of this airport and I believe that it is in the best interests not only of workers but also of the population of Quebec as a whole that we should do so, for if the construction of the Toronto airport is more expeditious than that of the Montreal airport, it is only normal that major airlines will seek to change their landing rights and I feel that trade unions especially should consider this problem as urgent.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS' SESSIONAL AND EXPENSE ALLOWANCES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Thursday, April 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-242, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and the act to make provisions for the retirement of members of the Senate, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all request that an error which appeared in yesterday's French Hansard be corrected. In fact, I am quoted as saying:

...j'ai constaté que, heureusement (fortunately), des «gens de chez nous»...

whereas I said indeed:

...malheureusement (unfortunately), des Canadiens français, des «gens de chez nous», méprisaient le rôle des représentants du peuple.

I wanted to make that correction to Hansard so that people reading later our official report may see that I was deploring the situation instead of approving it.

Mr. Speaker, at the adjournement last night I was indicating that my position regarding members' sessional and expense allowances dates back to a long time ago. As early as May 1970 I submitted a brief to the Beaupré Committee expressing the following view:

As for myself, I find inconceivable that many officials, while getting better pay than hon. members, are enjoying greater privileges. For instance, a civil servant travels at the country's expense while the member who is visiting his constituency does it at his own costs. Furthermore, many civil servants' office are more spacious, better organized, more comfortable and so forth.

It is inconceivable that a member should work comfortably in a 12-by-12-foot office, where there are two other persons as well, in addition to the filing cabinets.

The Beaupré committee deplores the fact in their report where they say on page 25, and I quote:

(1) Underlying the problems of adequate office facilities for Members and their staff,...is the drastic lack of space on or adjacent to Parliament Hill.

I had also suggested that the state provide an office and a secretary for the member in his riding that he might better serve his constituents. This is also noted in the Beaupré report, on page 25, and I quote:

(2) Staff assistance must also be improved if the Member is to adequately perform the heavy and varied tasks of counsellor, ombudsman, communicator and legislator.

(3) Another area of concern is the important relationship between the parliamentarian and the constituent. Facilities for better communication should be available and, in particular, more assistance must be given to Members of the House of Commons who represent large constituencies, which present special travel problems.

It would be quite normal for the state to establish a federal office in each constituency so that citizens may meet their member or his secretary to discuss matters conncerning the national administration, since the member is the one link between the people and the government.

It must not be forgotten that the member is first of all a "legislator". He must be given as much time as possible to discharge his duties carefully.

Speaking on the freedom of hon. members and the sense of their responsibilities, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) was saying that at any rate they ought to be better paid. I agree with him on that and were I quite convinced that, through an increase of his parliamentary salary, each member, whatever his party might be, would really become free, and this to such a point that there would not be any longer in this House a vote along party lines, whatever bill might be introduced, I would not hesitate to favour this increase, in order to secure this freedom and the sense of responsibility which are priceless. If it were to eliminate the electoral funds financed by big financial interests, it would be worth it.

Ever since I have been sitting in this House, I have very often stood for the right of the disadvantaged, without neglecting the others, by suggesting an increase in family allowances which would be useful to the mother of a family, especially during the period of unemployment we are experiencing presently which has many families worried.

I also requested an increase of basic exemptions for individuals and families. Hon. members will recall that on March 15, 1971, I moved a motion for Parliament to reject the bill respecting the continued application of the 3 per cent surtax on income, which motion was defeated by the Liberal and Progressive Conservative members.

Moreover, I have often pleaded in favour of the farmers, in order that the government might give them equal opportunities in society, thus enabling them to earn more and to live in a decent manner.

I realize that the salaries of members of Parliament do not account for such a large share of the budget, since the proposed increase will cost only about $7 million out of a budget of $14 billion. Provisions in respect of the judiciary will cost more than the legislative, since the proposed increase of the judges' salaries will cost $9 million.

Thus the legislative power takes $1 every $2,000 of the budget or 32 cents a year for every Canadian.

As far as I am concerned, I am convinced that if the gross national product makes it possible to increase the salaries of members of Parliament, it also makes it possible to improve the living conditions of Canadian families. So why not do that too?

Just this morning a building contractor of Quebec city who had taken notice of Bill C-142 called me up to make this request: Please do not forget to take the opportunity of this debate to express our concern to Parliament. It is difficult for us to get paid when we sell a house, and building operations are more and more expensive. I hope that you will also think about increasing the income of families so they can pay us. And he had this to add: For goodness' sake, please revoke the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials.

I readily transmit his message because I feel that he is right. It will also be recalled that on March 25, 1971, a former member of the cabinet did ask for the abolition of that 11 per cent sales tax, because of the harm it was doing to Canadian families.

Another thing is also very costly for Canadians: the interest on the public debt, which now stands at $2 billion per year. At least half that amount is paid to financial institutions that have the privilege of using the people's credit to their advantage. It is against this exploitation and this abuse that Parliament and the people should protest most strongly.

If the government really carried out its duties in a responsible way, it would call on the Bank of Canada to issue the credits required to finance the public sector. Canadians would pay less taxes, now used to pay unnecessary interest charges and they would more readily accept their representatives granting themselves a more substantial increase.

Considering the number of hours I give to my work as a member of the House every day of the week, I do not have to be ashamed of the salary I receive, because I really earn it. I am also convinced that my constituents are aware of this. As far as I am concerned, I believe I am working for the establishment of a just society.

Yesterday a Liberal member told me it lies with each member of Parliament to "evaluate himself" and if a member votes against Bill C-242, it means he does not think he is worth more.

Is it on that basis that the Liberal government has always refused to increase family allowances, because it did not think the dedication of mothers was worth more? Is it on that basis that the government did not see fit to increase by more than 42 cents a month the regular old-age pension?

If the people who serve the community must be paid according to the services rendered, then in view of the bad economic situation prevailing in the country, the bad financial policy followed by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the salary of that public servant should be reduced immediately.

Mr. Speaker, those were the comments I had to make on second reading of Bill C-242, but I may have more to say in due time when the bill is referred to the committee.

[English]

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about this legislation before it is passed. What I am going to say will perhaps be very unpopular in this chamber. I realize that. However, we are not here to win popularity contests among fellow members, but to do what we believe is right for our constituents and the country.

A Member of Parliament often serves his constituents and this country at a financial loss. My brother is a medical doctor. He had a fairly good practice. He came to Parliament for nine years. Every year that he was here he suffered a financial loss. He did not regret any of those years because he felt that the psychic reward of serving others was worth any financial loss he may have had during his period here.

Members of Parliament should receive a high enough salary to enable them to have a good standard of living. They must receive enough so that they will be above any temptation which may come their way to put their hand in the pot, take money illegally or accept bribes from those people who might want a Member of Parliament to do something for them.

The salary of a Member of Parliament should be high enough to attract men of proven ability, as stated by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he announced this bill. I agree with the Prime Minister that it should attract the best people possible to our Parliamentary system. However, there was no difficulty in attracting people in the 1968 election. There were plenty of candidates running in nearly every riding in Canada. There were huge nominating conventions held in many ridings for persons seeking the opportunity to serve their constituency and Canada.

If the majority of the people in Canada were of low intelligence, there would perhaps be the danger of people with low intelligence being elected to Parliament. Actually, the reverse is true. Our standards of education in Canada have risen markedly, particularly in the past 20 years. Canadian have a high level of intelligence compared with the people of some other countries. The chance of attracting Parliamentarians of proven ability and high calibre is certainly very good.

We must consider the other possibility. We are now being asked to grant ourselves a huge pay increase. Those who ran in the last election entered into a contract with their voters that they would serve them under the present conditions until the next election. It would be far more appropriate if this legislation became effective following the next election. In other words, the pay raise and other conditions for Members of Parliament should take effect after the next election. Improvements in the position, staff and facilities of Members of Parliament, as well as their financial reward, should not go into effect before the next election. I believe it would be morally correct to adopt this attitude.

We must consider the economic climate in Canada today, of which we are not proud. I think that the cabinet minister who recently resigned did so because of the economic conditions in Canada. We have a very high level of unemployment. Many people are quite depressed about the available opportunities in this country. Many young people are not able to find employment suitable to their taste and ability. This is leading to a great deal of unrest. We have hired Mr. Young to preside over a Prices and Incomes Commission to examine the economy and attempt to stem the tide of huge wage demands and price increases. After hiring Mr. Young, if we really believed he could do something, in all conscience we cannot grant ourselves retroactive pay increases back to October at this time. We could, I think, increase the pay of members but only to take effect after the next election.

• (12:10 p.m.)

A Member of Parliament going through a number of elections soon realizes that tenure of office is very insecure. A Member of Parliament does give up a lot of the opportunities which would come his way if he were not a Member of Parliament, particularly a young man in his most progressive period. When he is through he has to go back to where he started, and there is no question in my mind that many Members of Parliament find that when they are defeated or when they leave this place they have very little to go back to.

There is no question in my mind that in the 13 years I have served as a member, the workload has increased tremendously. Nowadays a member gets more work and has more issues to deal with in his office than ever before, partly because of the economic situation and partly because Canadians across Canada are far more aware of their Member of Parliament and are in touch with him far more often than in the past. When I was first elected, parliament sat for about seven months of the year. Now, it is sitting nearly full time; it was suggested today we would be here all the summer and this may be the case. So, there is no question in my mind that the workload has increased, the length of sittings has increased and, surprising as it may seem, the insecurity of tenure of office has really increased because people are changing their minds to a far greater degree today as to which candidate they will vote for or which political party they will vote for than ever before.

As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stated, to run for office takes considerable moral courage. There is no question in my mind that this statement was very correct. But I still go back to the fact that it is a matter of timing. I think it is regrettable that the government should have decided to propose such a large pay raise at a time when the economic situation in Canada is not good, when many people are unemployed. Certainly many people are working and enjoying a fair standard of living in a high-cost economy, the same economy as that in which Members of Parliament must live. I expect, though, that Members of Parliament meet many expenses which would be hard to justify for tax purposes, but all the same there has been money allowed tax-free to cover those expenses.

Many changes could be made with regard to the working conditions of Members of Parliament which would not create a great deal of expense. To my mind, the telephone arrangements for Members of Parliament are very poor. When one is at home in the riding, a member cannot telephone Ottawa without going about it in what always has appeared to me to be an underhanded manner. He phones his office with some kind of signal, the secretary calls him back and he then talks at government expense rather than his own. This, to me, is wrong. If a member has free service from Ottawa he should have free telephone service throughout his riding. This would be particularly advantageous in creating the same operating expenses for rural members as for city members. A city member can operate on the basis of a monthly charge for his telephone; it costs him very little more because he can speak to every one of his constituents in the city without incurring long distance charges. A member representing a rural riding finds that most of his constituents can only be reached by long-distance telephone calls; he does not enjoy the same conditions as his counterpart in the city does. He has to pay for them. Some changes along these lines would have been better brought in at this time, rather than the method the government has chosen to assist Members of Parliament in serving their constituents. I will follow the discussion in committee on this piece of legislation with continuing interest.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): It took quite a bit of political courage to bring in this legislation, but it does not take a great deal of political courage to speak against it because it is always all too easy to be on the side of the angels. I hope what I am going to say today I can say briefly and quickly. I shall not cast any reflection on other members of the House for the way they, personally, grappled with this problem, as I am presently grappling with it and have been for a considerable time.

I am afraid that this Parliament and Parliaments before it have failed abysmally in dealing with this question of how members' salaries, allowances and services should be adjusted. It is a degrading process for us that we must be placed in a position of deciding our own levels of salaries and our own levels of services.

I think we have also failed badly in explaining to the Canadian people that the Parliament of today is no longer a comfortable club to which the country squires used to retire for conversation in the season between the fall harvest and the spring planting. Parliament now sits 10 or 11 months very frequently and has precious little holiday in the remainder. There may be some legislatures where the old view of the country squires' parliament persists. Without calling them country squires, I should point out that in my own Province of British Columbia the legislature convenes for only 9 or 10 weeks in the winter months. But our time is long. We are engaged in a fulltime occupation here and I think we have failed individually and collectively to get that message across to the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: The press has failed.

Mr. St. Pierre: My hon. friend says the press has failed and I would agree with him.

In my observation, conscientious parliamentarians here work atrocious hours under considerable stress much of the time and with shockingly bad facilities. In my own rather short career I have not encountered anywhere else an aggregation of men who, by and large, had any higher ideals or ideas or personal dedication to their work. As for some of the prosperous publicists of the radio and some other communications media who are now delighting themselves by blackguarding this institution and the people who serve in it, I have nothing for them but contempt.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. St. Pierre: They can take their money and sleep with it in their beds at night. I do not know whether I have accomplished much here. Sometimes I think I have accomplished a little, at other times I do not. But I do know the effort that I put out and my conscience will let me sleep. I look around this House and everywhere I see members who I know put out great effort and great dedication.

To the extent that this bill improves our facilities and relieves us of some of our expenses, I strongly support it. I think the increase in the tax free allowance is justified; I shall take it and use it gladly. Like other hon. members of the House I have learned that to be in Parliament can be a costly business. Like many others, I have had to dip into my savings in order to operate here. I am not a member of any establishment and I am not a country squire. I look upon this place as a place to work.

If I consider expense allowances justified, what do I think about our salary? I do not believe that a salary increase is proper at this time. It may be justified but it is not proper. When this Parliament accepts a salary increase of 50 per cent, or 6 per cent a year since 1963, whichever way you want to put it, we set an example to the country, whether we like it or not. I say that under the present circumstances of high unemployment we are setting a bad example at this time.

I suppose I am square enough to believe that Parliament should set an example. In my own case—and I shall refer only to my own position—I was elected in 1968. Although I may not have known what my expenses would be, I did know what my salary would be. In my opinion the 29th Parliament should be the occasion when a salary increase becomes effective.

I want to reflect very briefly on members who have served in this House for a long time. Those of us who are in the chamber now know of many cases of members who have lost contact with the work they did before they came to Parliament. They have put in their time here and have watched their bank overdraft grow. Eventually they will be defeated because the rate of turnover here is very high, and I am just wondering what they will go back to. They have, sir, both my sympathy and my high respect.

I do not like to see men such as these coming under attack from university professors and other self-appointed guardians of public morals, many of whom have themselves taken far greater salary increases than this one during the past eight years and have a security of tenure which is utterly unknown to anyone who serves in this chamber.

As I said earlier, it is easy in a sense to speak against the salary increase at this time. But there is a feature of this debate that none of us can overlook. I suppose it is best summed up in the story about the old drunk who had been on quite a bender and who finally decided he would have to return to his wife, who did not approve of his drinking. He had a friend who was a doctor, and he went first to the doctor and made some private arrangements with him. Then, he went home and went to bed.

A few minutes later his wife came in and said to him: "The doctor has called and you have to take some medicine". He asked what the medicine was, and his wife replied: "I have to give you half a tumbler of whisky". So he said: "No, the filthy stuff; I will have nothing to do with it". "John, you must". "No", he said, "take it away". Eventually, he agreed and took the whisky. Then, he said: "My dear, I think I will try and compose myself for a little sleep, but by the way did the doctor say anything about further treatment?". His wife replied: "Yes, John; I am to give you every two hours two ounces of whisky until the bottle is empty". So he said: "Well, my dear, when you come in I may be sleeping. If I am sleeping, wake me, and if I won't take it, make me"!

I am not opposed to the principle of this bill, but as I have said I consider it wrong for Canada that it should come at this time of severe unemployment. Like other members, I have had to face the question of how I shall vote on this measure. It has not been a very pleasant decision, and although this debate has been conducted without rancour, it has not been a pleasant debate for us.

There are many actions that could be taken, Mr. Speaker. One is to conveniently absent oneself from the House at this time on other business. Another is to abstain from voting. But I am quite sure that the people in my constituency of Coast Chilcotin did not send me here to have me sit in my seat when votes are being taken. I have notified my colleagues in the Liberal party of my intention to vote against this measure. In recent days, however, there has been much honest criticism in the press. But as I have watched some of the forms of attack made on this House by publicists, I have found myself in the position where, if I were to vote against this measure, I would appear to be agreeing with the stronger and harsher criticisms of the members of this House. I am, therefore, very regretfully going to have to vote for the bill.

In closing, Sir, I must return to the position that we all know, namely that it is easy to vote against a bill knowing that it is going to pass. Am I in any different situation in that, even though I am voting for the bill, I have taken the time of the House to say that I think it is improper to bring in the bill at this time, knowing that it is going to pass? The answer, I feel, is no.

I do not think that when I tell the House that, in my opinion, this salary increase should not have been effective until the 29th Parliament, I have the right to take it in the 28th Parliament. Therefore I shall make arrangements, which will be a matter of record, whereby this salary increase does not flow to me during the life of this Parliament. I thank hon. members for their attention.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, like others who have spoken, I wish to pay my respects to the sincerity and earnestness of all members of this House as they participate in this important debate. In particular, I wish to pay my respects to those who will differ with me and may vote in a direction opposite to the stand that I shall take when the vote on second reading is called. I trust it is clear and no surprise that when that vote is called I shall vote against the bill, because I do not think that this piece of legislation should be before us, and I feel very strongly that it should not be passed at this time.

• (12:30 p.m.)

In the first speech the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made in this House after he had become the Prime Minister and had won the 1968 election he had quite bit to say about poverty. I am referring to his speech during the debate on the address on reply to the Speech from the Throne in the fall of 1968. The right hon. Prime Minister spoke in that debate on September 16, of that year. Having told us that the most intractable problem facing us was the continuing poverty of far too many of our citizens, and having told us that poverty could not wait, he also said something in one paragraph at page

68 of Hansard for the date I have indicated which was very true. These were his words:

> I have often mentioned the responsibility of the more affluent segments of our society toward the less privileged ones. The majority of us have already satisfied our right to a minimum standard of satisfactory living. It is those who have not who need government help.

On another occasion, on February 14, 1969, as recorded in Hansard at page 5524, he said it is useless to solve certain other problems unless we are prepared to do something about, and I quote his exact words: " the intolerable conditions of poverty in which too many Canadians now live".

I confess that when I heard those words from the Prime Minister in the first session after he became the Prime Minister of this country, I dared to believe, in spite of things I had said about him in the election campaign, that maybe he was interested in the problem of poverty in Canada and maybe he was prepared to do something about it. I liked in particular his assertion that the majority of us have already satisfied our right to a minimum standard of satisfactory living and it is those who have not who need government help. It has not worked out that way, and it is in light of that position, and any one of us can spell it out with examples, that I object very strongly to the government asking us to improve our own position when we have done so little to combat poverty or the trials of the poor in this country.

I know one of the answers to that argument is that if we did not get this pay raise, and if the full amount of money it will cost to provide it were divided among the poor it would be only a few cents per person or per family, therefore it is argued that there is no point in doing it. I know the contention that if we are free from want and worry we can do a better job for those who are in need. Things are not working that way and I want to say, speaking for myself as all of us are doing in this debate, that I think the thing which is most wrong in our society and in our world is the ever-widening gap between the poor and the affluent. This is the thing that is wrong in our world, even with all we have done by way of assistance to developing countries. The gap in the standard of living between two-thirds of the world's population and the other one-third is wider than it ever was. If this sort of thing goes on, our world could fall apart.

I say the same thing about Canadian society. We are not going to have a bright and hopeful future if we continue to increase the amount of money the poor have by only a little and increase the amount that those in the upper bracket have by ever so much more. In my view this concept of doing things on a percentage basis is basically wrong. What we have to do if we are going to solve the problem of poverty is to challenge the power structure in this country and challenge the government and society as a whole on the idea that it is proper to have an economic hierarchy in which every time there is any little improvement at the bottom there will be a large improvement at the top.

I assert that the time has come—and maybe that time has been coming over and over again in the past, but it is the present we have to concern ourselves about—for some of those who enjoy a higher standard of living than is the average in this country to say this has gone far enough. It is time to cut down this practice of the percentage principle and do something to level things up by raising those who are at the bottom of the economic scale rather than doing things that keep widening the gap.

That is what is wrong with this bill to increase our total take-home pay but which pays no attention to the basic problem facing this country, namely that of solving the problem of poverty. The Prime Minister talked in his first session in that capacity as though he was concerned about this. For a while there was even talk about a war on poverty but that soon got lost. We have seen an interesting development in another place that we are not supposed to talk about around here where a committee got into trouble because some of the people working for that committee wanted to attack the power structure and attack poverty itself. The fact is that is what we have to do.

I submit that by going along with the idea that those at the top should continue to get increases of as high a percentage as those at the bottom get, or even higher, we are widening the gap. This means that we are doing a disservice not only to the poor but a disservice to society as a whole. At some point we have to begin to show that our main objective and purpose is in the direction of equity; that our main purpose and objective must be a levelling upwards for those who are at the bottom and, for that reason, we who are at or near the top must hold the line where we are. That is what we ought to do. This is my basic philosophical approach to this whole problem and that is why I think we should let our position stay as it is. We should give a lead and some sense of direction to the country as a whole by doing just this, and that means saying no to this bill.

The last speaker pointed out that if we do not hold the line but rather vote for a 50 per cent increase in our salaries or a 44 per cent in our total take-home pay that certainly will be taken by all sorts of elements in our society as a lead. I suggest that in a year or two inflation will be out of hand again, and that the gap which concerns me will get wider. We have to start narrowing that gap. It is not up to someone else. It is up to us.

It is easy to say the other fellow should make the first move, but we are the leaders of the country. We are the people who represent the 20-odd million Canadians in Canada and we are here to give direction to the kind of society we should have. I think we can give that lead by saying no for ourselves to any further improvement in our take-home pay until something really substantial has been done to improve the position of all those who are at the lower end of the scale.

I could, of course, cite examples which have been cited a number of times. There has been that very slight increase in the basic old age pension bringing it up to $80 a month and increases in veterans pensions and allowances which were far less than should have been made. In addition, there is the heavy pressure that is being put on people seeking wage increases to hold down their demands. It is interesting that some of these pressures come from people like Dr. John Young, Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, who managed to achieve quite a boost in his income by taking on that chairmanship. And, of course, we had this same admonition a few days ago by the Governor of the Bank of Canada whose own salary was increased 50 per cent not very long ago, putting it into the upper atmosphere. If these strictures are proclaimed and if people are told they must settle, as pensioners, for an increase of 42 cents a month, and as workers for wage increases of 5 per cent and 6 per cent, we do not have in my view a moral right to give ourselves increases of the kind proposed in this bill.

As I say I wanted to mention those few precise examples, but is not so much those examples by themselves that hit me. It is this realization that in our society as a whole the gap is getting ever wider and wider, and there is no use talking about national unity in terms of provincial-federal co-operation or in terms of co-operation along linguistic or cultural liines if we have a society divided in economic terms between the ultra poor and the ultra rich. The figures show that perhaps 25 per cent of our population or 4 million to 5 million Canadians are at or below the poverty level. The things we have done may have improved the dollar position of some of those people down at that level; yes, pensioners today get more than they did 20 years ago and workers get more than they did 20 years ago, but costs have gone up and with those at the top getting more the relative position is even more disturbing. It is worse than the kind of society where everybody is poor or where nobody is away up. However, when there are a few who are away up it is more embarrassing to be poor. It is what we are doing to society by countenancing those who are at the top seeking increases in their income which I think is wrong. It is that kind of lead we should not be giving.

I should like to see others take this kind of position. There are a few around now. Jack McClelland, of McClelland and Stewart, the other night on radio or television, said that money is not everything. Dr. McClure, the former moderator of the United Church, said that what he thinks is wrong with our society is that those in the upper brackets are getting too much and that he is prepared to settle for a something less. I think this is the kind of lead somebody must give. I think those who should give it are the leaders of this country represented here in the House of Commons. Speaking for myself, I think that kind of lead should be given by all of us but, if not, I hope there are a number of us who are prepared, as I am, to see that the necessary steps are taken so that in our own position as members we do not contribute to a widening of the gap. I intend to take such steps.

As has been pointed out, Mr. Speaker, it is possible to make a case for increased pay and allowances for Members of Parliament. I do not agree with the case, but it can be made. We listened with a great deal of attention last night to the speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). He gave us quite a catalogue of the things on which a member has to spend money, or the things on which he would like to spend money, and by the time he got through that catalogue of expenditures of course not only was the expense allowance all gone but so was the salary.

This is an exercise any of us could go through. Even I could add a few things to the list that he gave us last night. What he said is perfectly true; that is, it is a very difficult job for a Member of Parliament to balance his budget on the present $18,000 a year. But, Mr. Speaker, most Canadians have difficulty in balancing their budgets. Most organizations have difficulty in balancing their budgets. Most Canadians, however, do not have the right to solve the problem of too little income and too much outgo by just voting themselves more income. It is that which makes what we are doing a practice which is offensive and which I believe must be reconsidered. Yes, I could make the argument made by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra that balancing our budget is difficult, but there still is the old fashioned practice of trying to balance a budget by cutting expenditure, by sharpening pencils and so on and not just using our own power as legislators to vote enough money to cover all the expenditures with which we are faced or which we would like to be able to incur. Most Canadians have difficulty in the economic sphere. I do not think it hurts us to have difficulty as well. We are supposed to represent the people of Canada and we are supposed to know something about their experience. Let us keep ourselves in their world of experience by continuing to cope with some of the same problems with which they have to cope.

Last night the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra also indulged in some figures and percentages from tables in a book he had, all of which was very enjoyable. I suppose one could call it the numbers game. We could all do it. I might do a bit of it myself if for no other reason than to show how ridiculous it is for the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and others to say we are really giving ourselves a lot less than would appear at first glance. When we are increasing our salary by 50 per cent and our expense allowance by 33⅓ per cent which averages out to 44.4 per cent it sounds scandalous and therefore members try to find a way to say it is not that much. The hon. member for Vancouver Quadra went so far as to say that if we were not to increase our pay and allowances now as provided by this bill and were to leave it at the present total, then compared with 1954 when the pay was fixed at a total of $10,000, $8,000 in indemnity and $2,000 in expenses, we would have gone up per year by only 2½ per cent.

That is a nice argument, if one can make it stick. One or two of my colleagues behind me, when that calculation was being made, spoke to me in friendly terms and said I must have been crazy to stay here so long, our income having gone up by only 2½ per cent per year. This let me to do a little arithmetic of my own. You see, I first came here in 1942, 29 years ago. At that time the total take home pay was $4,000 a year. It was the same in 1940 when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. McIlraith) first came here.

Senate and House of Commons Act

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question, not being facetious. Was it not $4,000 a session. You may have had only one session. Was it not $4,000 a session?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It was $4,000 a session.

Mr. Woolliams: Ah!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a minute—

An hon. Member: Try to be honest, Stanley!

• (12:50 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I know all hon. members want to hear the hon. member's speech, and I suggest that if there are questions they should be directed to the Chair.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, remarks like the last one may not be on the record since the hon. member did not make it from his own seat.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to dissociate myself from that remark. I was asking the hon. member for information, I was not trying to be facetious.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) asked whether that was not the rate per session, and it was; but it was not until 1949 and 1951 that there were a couple of occasions of two sessions per year. That did not happen in the early 1940s. At that time our total take home pay was $4,000 per year, there is no question about that. That is an actual fact, and it is stated in answer to the word "honest" that was thrown at me a moment ago.

Now, Sir, 29 years later, or 31 years later for the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. McIlraith), our total take home pay is $18,000 a year, and that is an increase of 350 per cent. If we are going to throw these percentages around, let us really be honest and let us tell the whole story. It is an increase of 350 per cent over a period of 29 years, which is about 12 per cent a year. If the present bill goes through and the total take home pay becomes $26,000 a year, for those of us who were here in the early 1940s it will be a total increase of 550 per cent or between 19 and 20 per cent per year. You can shoot that down in various ways; you can do all kinds of things with figures, but I submit that to try to tone down this present increase as thought it were only 2½ per cent a year is not really treating the matter in a factual way. It is in fact a 50 per cent increase in salary and an over-all increase of 44.4 per cent.

I would also point out that in those early years not only was $4,000 the total take home pay but there were no free airline flights. We had our railway passes and we could go back and forth as we wished to, but we got our berth and meals on the train for a trip from Ottawa to the constituency only three times a year, not 52 round trip air flights.

Mr. Comeau: Surely, we need that.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Of course we do, I am not arguing against that, but I am saying to my hon. friend that the improvement in the position of Members of Parliament over the last three decades has been tremendous, so let us not try to say that we are poor, that we do not have the facilities, that we are severely handicapped. The facilities that are made available to us today are much greater than they were, and these facilities actually add to our standard of living.

The argument is being made that we are not getting very much of an increase and that we are still hard-pressed. I have gone back and read some of the debates in the years when the pay increases were introduced. This is the fourth one that I have been through, and the same argument was always made. Members were having a tough time, and we have to pay higher salaries to attract better men. Yet, back in those early days when we were so poor that we had to raise the pay to attract better men, we did have people like C. D. Howe, James Ilsley, Mackenzie King, Gordon Graydon, R. B. Hanson, John Diefenbaker, Howard Green, M. J. Coldwell, and so on. Good and able people somehow seem to come to this place no matter what the rate of pay is.

Now, Sir, I am not arguing that we should go back to the days when there was no pay for Members of Parliament. I agree with the proposition that the salary of Members of Parliament should be such that they can do their job with at least a restricted amount of worry, but I would not restrict that worry to the point where they do not know what the life of the ordinary Canadian is. I agree that there has to be a reasonable level of pay, but I suggest that in today's circumstances, with pensions as low as they are, with wages being held down, and with the high level of unemployment facing this country, the present total of $18,000 is a reasonable level. I certainly agree with the last two speakers that if any change is to be proposed it should not apply until the next Parliament, the one that meets after the next general election.

I see it is almost one o'clock and I am just about through. One of the arguments that is frequently used for increased pay for Members of Parliament is to compare the job we do with that of civil or public servants. Let us agree that there are deputy ministers and people much lower in the public service who now get more pay than we do, and of course comparisons are also made with persons in private business, and so on. Perhaps I am alone in this, perhaps it is a queer notion I have about it, but we are not people who have been hired to do a technical job for which certain training and certain qualifications are required.

We have asked to come here as representatives of the people, and I do not think that our salary level should be decided on the basis of people who dress as we do and occupy offices and work as we do. It should be decided on the basis of what we need to do a job to represent the Canadian people. It is my judgment, whether or not hon. members accept it, that something in the order of what we are now getting is a reasonable amount. I say quite candidly that I would not have objected and would not object if there were a modest increase, but it seems to me that an increase of 50 per cent in the salary and 33⅓ per cent in the expense allowance does not fit the word "modest".

One of the main reasons for my opposing this bill is that I think that the increase in it is too great. I am hurrying on so that I can conclude at one o'clock rather than carry on after the lunch hour. It is almost a case of putting the rest of my remarks in terms of headings. May I say that another aspect of this legislation which I think is totally wrong is the continuation of a portion of our pay on a tax free basis. It is a special privilege and it should end. Beaupré was very much against this. It is what is criticized perhaps most by the Canadian people, and they have the right to do so.

I think that if the government was not prepared to recommend that the tax free $6,000 be incorporated into the total pay, at least it should not have made it worse by raising the $6,000 to $8,000. I think it would have been proper, straightforward and honest if the government had said that the present $12,000 salary and the $6,000 expense allowance is the equivalent of about $21,000 or $22,000 if it were all taxable, and should have said, this is where we will start, we will give members $21,000 or $22,000 as a base and perhaps add $1,000 or $2,000 to that as an increase, but I insist that all of it should be taxable.

I was here when Mr. King brought in his provision in 1945. We knew then why he did it. He felt that members should have an increase, but he wanted to do it in a way that would give them as much as possible without sounding that way. It was his concoction to have $2,000 tax free in our hands but taxable in the hands of Senators. However, I think that was wrong and it should be changed. Some day it will have to be changed, but the longer we put it over the larger the increase will have to be to achieve this, so the time to end this tax free special privilege is now.

I see it is one o'clock. May I say in a sentence that the other point about this legislation that I think is wrong and that is offensive to the Canadian people is to make it retroactive to last October, with the result that we will get half a year's increase in one cheque. Let us think of how working people have to struggle and wait to get increases and how little retroactivity they get, how much they wish they could have a decent amount of retroactivity, while all we have to do is to vote for a measure like this and we get it. It falls into our lap.

Perhaps I have strayed a little from my desire to speak in a low key. If that is the case I have done so because I feel very strongly about this issue, and I shall govern myself accordingly if this bill passes. I repeat my respect for those who disagree with me but I plead that this measure is wrong because the increase is far too much, because of the tax free element, and because of the retroactive provision. I plead also that what we are doing is wrong because we are giving society the wrong lead. Instead of those of us who are at or near the top in improving our own position, some of us, and I include myself, should be saying it is time for us to hold the line until those further down catch up.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being after one o'clock, I do leave the chair.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

Senate and House of Commons Act

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, on rising to speak in this debate on a bill affecting very directly the individual members of the House, and particularly where it affects them the most, that is, the pocketbook, a member has to proceed with care in what he says so that by misconstruction or misinterpretation he does not reflect in any way on the views seriously and frankly held by other members.

Before lunch I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre). He started his remarks by saying it was so easy to oppose this measure because then you were on the side of the angels. Mr. Speaker, without in any way questioning his divine guidance or relationship with spiritual bodies, I find it most difficult to speak, because closer than the angels are fellow colleagues in the House who feel very seriously about this matter. I hope therefore my brief remarks will not in any way be misinterpreted by them.

Mr. Baldwin: Besides the angels don't forget those in the other place.

Mr. Nowlan: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) refers to the other place. Well, I have something to say about the other place and it is not angelic. I intent to be brief, Mr. Speaker, because members have long awaited a salary review and any prolonged effort by any member could by inadvertence cut sharply against a fellow colleague. But while I intend to be brief, and I hope I am frank, I intent to be relevant and realistic.

Very simply put, Mr. Speaker, I am in favour of the principle of Bill C-242 which amends various acts and gives an increase in salaries, and provides an adjustment in expense allowances. But I am against the size of the increase. To my way of thinking, a 50 per cent salary increase at this time is indefensible. Because of the dire need of so many members, I give full credit to the government for having the courage to face this problem. I am afraid, however, that in trying to resolve the problem with this measure it merely postpones tackling the perennial problem that we have had from time immemorial of trying to find a device whereby we can regularly review both our salaries and expenses.

I am against the salary increase because it is 50 per cent of what I am earning now even though, as with all Canadians, any salary increase is immediately bitten into by taxes. I am against the salary increase because the same increase is provided for members of the other place. I do not have any angelical feelings about the other place. I do not believe that being a member of the other place is a full-time occupation, and I very definitely believe that being a member of the House of Commons is a full-time occupation. Because I believe this, I can see no justification whatsoever for providing an increase in salary for members of the other place.

In a general way, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the very credibility and relevance of this institution are involved in this measure. I do not intend to prolong the agony of those who are listening to my words, because I think there is a general disposition to have the measure move on to committee where there can be a more detailed study made of all the points that have been raised by various members. I do not intend to wallow in any swamp of double talk or preach any platitudes from the plateau of purity. I think that this forum is the mirror of Canada's mosaic. I think this forum personifies the Canadian personality. It is the closest thing we have to a vehicle which represents all shapes and sizes of opinion in this country.

That being so, hon. members are duty bound—no matter how painful it may be to any who are in debt, and there are not many members here who do not have overdrafts in the bank, myself included—to be realistic. They ought to know that although the public is never well disposed to salary increases, salary increases of this substantial size will be looked on with disfavour and will bring on a delayed action, regardless of what editorials say. An increase of this size will bring about an alienation and lack of respect for this institution which I do not think this institution can afford. In this day of dissent where our youth are quizzical, to say the least, and perhaps even critical, we must remember that if we pass this measure we will not enhance the stature of this institution.

I do not think any hon. member pretends to have a monopoly on conscience. Certainly, no one member and no one party has a monopoly on conscience here. I believe that this institution represents the collective conscience of Canadians and that is why we must consider carefully how we move in adjusting salaries and expense allowances. In my opinion by trying to move the way we are, we are ignoring the realities of life. I am sure that if the doctors, lawyers, dentists, unions, teachers, secretaries or any other group tried in one fell swoop to increase their salary position by 50 per cent, this chamber would order an investigation. The Prices and Incomes Commission would undoubtedly move, too, even if the salary scale of the particular group in question were lower than that of other groups. The fact this matter falls too close to home is no reason for us to ignore reaction in the country. I believe that the relevance and credibility of this institution is at stake.

The question of the credibility of this institution has probably bothered me more than any other single thing. It almost seems that the more controversial the issue or the more sensitive the subject, the more mute and mild does the chamber become. It seems that the old mores and taboos do not apply anymore. I think that the public, which is more in tune with what we are doing than ever before through the medium of television, is in a better position to assess the performances of members than ever before. Paradoxically, while the public is more in tune, I believe it is "turned off" when we play the charades of yesterday. I, personally, believe that hon. members individually and parties collectively must start taking stands on these matters, sometimes for the wrong reason, rather than adopting the sterility of no stand at all. When we pass a bill such as this we shall compromise ourselves on any future stand we may take respecting economic conditions in this country, and for that reason I believe the credibility of this institution is at stake. How, after passing a bill like this, can hon. members talk about discipline, controls if necessary, and the necessity of battling the fires of inflation in future? If I were to talk that way, I am afraid I might be laughed off the platform.

I feel that a salary adjustment is necessary. I feel that an increase in the expense allowance is necessary. Nevertheless, when I came here in 1968 I knew what my salary was to be. I cannot accept the reasoning to the effect that if we get this increase it will represent an annual increment of 6 per cent from 1963. Let me remind hon. members that there have been two elections since 1963. The problem with the expense allowance and the salary is this: we are not looking at any regular procedure. The sums involved are not tied to any cost of living allowance or to ministerial salaries, nor are they determined by any tribunal which might review this matter. Personally, I do not know that I want members' salaries tied to the salaries of deputy ministers, important though they are, or to a level very much below theirs. The bill seeks to increase salaries by 50 per cent merely because we have postponed, time after time, the perennial problem of members' salary increases. That problem has been in a sensitive area. When I was elected here I knew full well what my salary was to be, so I do not think it is honest to increase it by 50 per cent in mid-term. I do not think I can defend that. Hon. members may say that it is easy for me to say these things and that I am on the side of the angels. I have felt it my duty to make perfectly clear what I feel.

Some members have suggested that we ought to remedy poverty before we increase our salaries. If we are first to rid this land of poverty, then I suggest that every member in this institution will be part of the dust of the land before there is any adjustment. I am glad that this is a matter for individuals to decide. It should not be, and I hope will not become, a party matter. Because this is a matter for individuals, I have debated with myself whether I ought to move an amendment to the bill. My position, briefly, is this: I have no objection to the expense allowance being increased. My personal expenses in my constituency are far greater than $8,000. Yet I question the substantial size of the increase at this time. In principle, I agree that an adjustment is necessary and for that reason will vote for the measure on second reading. The motion before us is to refer this bill to committee. However, unless there is an amendment in the committee which will postpone the implementation of the salary increase until after the next election—and I may try to move such an amendment in committee—I will be prepared to vote against the measure on third reading.

Any member who dares to involve himself in this debate can be accused of many things. My position is perfectly clear. To me, the only thing more odious than preaching a double standard is accepting a double standard. I do not believe that this substantial salary increase is justified at this time. Some say that if the bill is passed without the sort of amendment I have suggested it will become an election issue in the next election. I do not see it that way, because everyone will know what is involved and the law can be amended. In any event, I suggest that the increase should be postponed until after the next election. If the increase does not become effective until after the next election, I do not see how it will become an issue during the campaign. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) quite properly pointed out when he opened the subject that this might become a danger if we delay the debate. If this measure is passed it will become the law of the land, and then all the candidates will know just what they are going to receive by way of salary.

• (2:20 p.m.)

I take exception to the substantial increase for the reasons I have stated. Many more could be stated. In order to make my position clear, if this substantial increase is granted, I will take steps to have no pecuniary interest in the salary part of this bill. I will return it to the Treasury, if that is mechanically possible, donate it to charity or make a gift to the Crown. I feel that any member who has the temerity to speak against this measure must make that absolutely clear.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nowlan: Members are only fooling themselves if they protest, argue and take exception without following that caveat. As I said earlier, the only thing more odious than preaching the double standard is to accept it. I hope that all members will govern themselves accordingly, and that this matter will be referred to a committee after others have had a chance to express their opinions.

If I decide to run again, I hope the election will be very soon so that I will not divest myself of any interest in this increase for too long. I will stand on any platform anywhere and defend the principle of this bill. There has to be an adjustment. However, because of the rate of unemployment at this time, as well as all the reasons that have been mentioned, we cannot jump our salary by 50 per cent, regardless of the need.

I think that more should be done with regard to expenses. I will not go into details. I would love to have an expense allowance and be able to account to somebody, but that is getting into the details. Whether tax free or taxable, $8,000 is not enough. As far as the salary is concerned, I cannot see any member speaking and voting against the bill, then accepting the fruits of it.

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I compliment the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) on the point he made with regard to the double standard. I am pleased to see that the front benches of the New Democratic Party are not empty because I wish to direct a statement to them later in my speech.

Many months ago when the matter of increases in members' salaries was first raised, I made a commitment that I would not vote in favour of any salary increase that would come into effect during the life of this Parliament. I intend to honour that commitment. It was made because, in all conscience, I feel I cannot vote to raise my salary without first seeking a renewed mandate.

This decision was obviously not an easy one to make inasmuch as I agree with the argument put yesterday that the raise is deserved. In fact, I believe it is not overly generous at all, especially in view of the higher recommendation made by the Beaupré commission. However, I feel that some alternate means, clearly free of Parliamentary control, must be found to adjust the rates of remuneration.

I have the greatest respect for those hon. members on both sides of the House who intend to vote for this measure. They are doing what they believe to be right and I know that they will respect my position as one that has been arrived at only after a lengthy period of soul-searching. I emphasize again that it is a personal decision and in no way reflects on any other member of this House.

I now come to the question of the increased expense allowance. There can be no doubt that Members of Parliament have a great range of expenses that are unknown to persons in other walks of life. It is also true that the rising expectations of our constituents for various services to be performed has meant a rapidly escalating cost factor which we must meet. If this bill passes, I will feel compelled, on behalf of my people, to put the larger expense allowance to use for their benefit. However, Mr. Speaker, I repeat my decision that I cannot accept a personal salary increase and I am happy to join the hon. members for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Mather) and Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) in announcing that I intend to either turn back the net increase or donate it to some worthy cause.

I now issue a challenge to the front benches of the New Democratic Party. They have opposed this bill most eloquently. They have condemned this increase as being too great. They have stated that there are others with greater needs. On the other hand, the member for York South (Mr. Lewis) has declared to the press that he plans to accept the raise if the bill passes. Mr. Speaker, I know, this Parliament knows, the people of Canada and the leader of the New Democratic Party know that the bill will pass this House of Commons. I, personally, cannot be hypocritical. In my opinion, if we oppose the increase then we cannot, indeed we must not, use the funds for personal gain. I demand that the member for York South prove to this House, and to the people of this country, that his opposition was not a sham but indeed that he was serious in his declarations to the House; that his protests were founded in something deeper than an attempt to secure television coverage and a pat on the back from the editorial writers of this country. I ask him to prove that he is sincere. I challenge him to join with the members for Surrey-White Rock and Coast Chilcotin and myself in dedicating this raise to the less fortunate in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member who just spoke made a general reference to the front benches of this party. I am pretty sure that what he said was in the plural. The leader of this party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), can and will speak for himself. I trust the hon. member heard me make a declaration this morning similar to that made by others, namely that I will see to it that so far as I am concerned there will be no personal gain from this increase.

Mr. Goode: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member is speaking to the question of privilege—

Mr. Goode: On a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest there is no question of privilege. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has clarified the point. I do not think it constitutes a question of privilege. Perhaps at this point I should recognize the next speaker.

Mr. Goode: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker; I must apologize to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I listened to his speech today, but I did not get that impression from it. Perhaps the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) would like to make a similar declaration.

Mr. Douglas: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker. If I want to make a declaration, I will make it in the course of the debate, not in answer to a half-baked question.

Mr. Goode: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Broadview.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in support of the legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilbert: Thus, I have no difficulty in answering the question posed earlier by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode). I was impressed by the tone which was set for the debate by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) yesterday when he attempted to deal with a very difficult subject in an objective way. I certainly agree with his assessment of the problem and the solution which is proposed. I also admire the courage of others who have spoken in the debate, either in favour of the proposed increases or against them. I think it is fair to say that the high tone set forth by the President of the Privy Council has been carried on throughout the discussion.

This question of an increase in salary and expense allowance has been a gnawing one for hon. members, more especially for me since I entered the House in 1965. I guess this is because of the increase in the cost of living, the heavy responsibilities of a Member of Parliament and the tremendous amount of time a member has to spend in the performance of his duties. Let me say at once that I respect the views of my hon. friends in this party, even though I do not agree with some of them. I am sure they also respect my views on this matter. There is a diversity of thinking within our party, probably due to differences in age, professional skills, philosophical approaches and so on. There is one thing I can say—and I think this is in line with the attitude taken by some of my hon. friends who have already spoken: we are all in agreement with the principle that some increase is justifiable. It may be that the main criticism is related to the size of the increase proposed.

I ask myself, and I ask members generally: Just what is a fair salary for the performance of our duties? I am sure we do not wish to make this into a political matter. When I look at the salaries of some of the public officials, I see that deputy ministers receive between $40,000 and $42,000. I notice that judges of the Supreme Court make $35,000 and that judges of County Courts will be making $25,000 shortly. Salaries of high school principals range from $16,000 to $20,000. Administrative and staff positions command a salary range, certainly in the City of Toronto, upwards of $30,000, and I ask myself: why are we not criticizing the size of the salaries received by these public officials? If I turn to private industry and private life, I notice that lawyers, doctors, dentists and business executives, with experience of ten years or more, are in a salary range upwards of $30,000.

There has been much criticism with regard to the self-imposed nature of the increase which Members of Parliament are contemplating at this time. May I remind you, Mr. Speaker, that doctors, lawyers and many business executives use the same technique with regard to increases. They're not accountable to any price review board. When they want an increase they impose it, and we have seen this happen in the medical profession, in the legal profession and in the business area.

Since the salary ranges of officials in public and private life are of the order I have mentioned, I would ask: is not the responsibility of a Member of Parliament as great as, if not greater than, some of those in the categories to which I have referred? Is not the time we spend in performing our duties as long as the time spent by them in the performance of theirs, if not longer? Why is it considered morally acceptable for those in private industry to obtain increases but almost morally reprehensible for parliamentarians to do so? Members of Parliament come from all walks of life and perform services for all members of the community. The only reason we feel so hesitant to increase our salaries, as far as I can see, is that in the past there was a history of parsons, social workers and teachers performing services to the community in circumstances in which it was thought somewhat improper that the question of salary should be considered in respect of them. I think the same is true with regard to Parliaments in the past. If we were to make a list of the men who have come to Parliament in the last hundred years, we would find that most of them belonged to upper income groups and did not encounter the problems many of us face today. I might add that the parsons, the social workers and the schoolteachers have long upgraded their salaries and I, for one, am delighted to see this. I do not believe a person should suffer financially because he is making a contribution to the community.

It has been said that the increase should be thought of within the total framework of the social and economic life of the country. I myself, along with many others, feel very uneasy with regard to the poverty and unemployment which prevails. I am most uneasy about the housing shortage. If I were to receive an undertaking that most of the professional people in Canada would roll back their salary increases to bring salaries into line with the present salary of a Member of Parliament, I would be the first to agree we should tackle the situation in that way. If our incomes are not sufficient to maintain a family in decency and respectability, are we not closing the door to men of modest means? Surely Parliament should not be the preserve of the rich. We should be able to exercise independence an not be worried about fear or favour. I am particularly concerned about younger people. I think it is necessary to attract younger people to this institution where they may reflect the views of youth today. I do not want to set up any barriers for younger married men with children, many of whom will be attending university.

Having spent seven years as a Member of Parliament representing a working man's constituency, and being on call every weekend I go home, I ask myself: how much am I charging people in my constituency? Someone better versed in arithmetic than myself has worked out that I have 75,000 constituents, and if I divide that number into $18,000 it comes to less than 25 cents per person for the services I perform to the constituents in my riding. I am proud I am available to people in my riding. I cannot go home on weekends without being faced with constituents varying in number from six to 12 come to seek advice on problems concerning unemployment insurance, pensions, immigration and so on. I am sure that the constituents of my riding would think that at a mere cost of less than 25 cents this is good service for good representation.

I would be the first to recommend that our salary increases be referred to the Prices and Incomes Commission, but I have been told today that the chairman of that commission has approved of them. Had the salary increases been referred to the Prices and Incomes Commission, I think it may well have helped us from the standpoint of public acceptance. But they were not. Therefore, I would be prepared to accept any recommendation regarding a referral of the proposed increases to the commission for study.

I do not have to remind you, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Beaupré recommended a $23,000 salary for the balance of this session and $25,000 for next session, with accountable expenses. I have no hesitation in saying that I agree with Mr. Beaupré and that I do not feel uneasy about accepting $18,000 when he recommended $23,000.

The second area of criticism relates to the increase of non-taxable allowances from $6,000 to $8,000. I agree with the President of the Privy Council that this affords a discretion to hon. members regarding how that money should be spent. May I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) operates a constituency clinic within his riding and performs a service for his constituents at great expense to himself.

Because I am a married man with a young family, one of whom is attending university, it is impossible for me out of my present salary to maintain a constituency clinic. Therefore, when I go home at weekends my home is my constituency clinic. I should like to think that I had sufficient money to operate the same type of constituency clinic as does the hon. member for Greenwood. He performs a service that is not within his own home and that certainly assists the people that he represents. I agree that there should be a discretion. I have heard it said by many members that they do not want a constituency clinic within their riding. I think it should depend on a member's own judgment whether such a clinic is operated or not.

With regard to retroactivity, which is the third criticism, as far as I am concerned this problem started in 1965. I saw my own income depreciating every year as the result of the rise in the cost of living, and so I have been directly affected, having suffered a decreasing income each year since 1965 to the present day. Probably I should say that I want retroactivity back to 1965, and I certainly see nothing wrong in making the increases retroactive to October of last year. I think this question was studied by Mr. Beaupré and others prior to October, and I think the increase should be backdated to the commencement of the session.

The fourth area relates to adjustment of increases, and at the present time there is no method of adjusting our indemnities. Probably this is one question with which we are having greatest difficulty. So many people present the problem: What should we do with regard to increasing members' salaries? What mechanism should we use? When you ask a person who raises that problem what we should do about it, he fails to come forth with the answer. Should we tie our indemnity to some category in the public service, or should we use an average of a series of categories? The whole problem is very difficult.

By the time we commence our next session, whether I am here or not, I hope that the government will recommend some specific category to which we should attach our salaries so that we can avoid a repetition every few years or so of introducing legislation to catch up on salary increases. I hope that the figure decided on will be a reasonable one, one that takes into account an evaluation of our backgrounds, our responsibilities, our performance and the amount of time spent.

At one time I thought it was possible to hold down two positions, my professional position as a lawyer and also that of an M.P. Let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, that since 1965 when I came to this House I have not practised law to any extent. My partner does 99.5 per cent of our law work. Being a Member of Parliament is a full time job, which I think is the way it should be. This must be taken into account in determining what our salary should be. To place a member in the position where his salary is insufficient and he has to look to other areas to supplement it diverts his time and his energy from his duties in the House to the making of money to meet his ongoing expenses.

When I rose I said I supported the bill. On sitting down, I also say I support the bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, it is with much apprehension that I rise today to take a stand on Bill C-242, an Act to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act and an Act to make provision for the retirement of members of the Senate.

It is always very embarrassing for a member to say whether he will vote for or against an increase in his own salary. The matter requires of course a serious self-examination, but I would nevertheless like to express my views frankly on the question.

I respect the opinions expressed by my hon. colleagues, and I will not hold their vote against them, even though I do not always share their viewpoints.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members have listened with a great deal of interest to the plea made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on April 26, during which he announced governmental proposals to increase members' salaries and allowances. One must not right away that the right hon. Prime Minister took shelter behind the recommendations of the Advisory Committee on Parliamentary salaries and Expenses, under the chairmanship of Mr. T. N. Beaupré, president of Domtar Limited. The Prime Minister summarized them as follows:

—the future of Canada depends largely upon the ability of the public to secure the services of the best possible people as parliamentarians.

—salaries should be high enough to attract persons of proven ability at a time when their earning potential may be at its highest.

—the position of the parliamentarian is essentially a full-time occupation; his working day in the House of Commons is usually much longer than the industrial average.

—the tenure of office of a member of the House of Commons is uncertain; 292 members have been defeated in the past 12 years with probably more to come.

—the nature of the position is becoming increasingly more time-consuming, more complicated, more sensitive and requiring considerable moral courage.

—a member of Parliament must meet many expenses that are not common to other salary earners and that are not deductible for income tax purposes, as is the practice in many other countries.

And the right hon. Prime Minister added:

It is the view of the government, Mr. Speaker, that the interests of Canada will not be served if Parliament fixes the levels of compensation of the elected representatives of the people at a level which is either so high as to attract candidates for reasons of financial gain, or so low as to deny effectively the opportunity of parliamentary service to all but those possessing private incomes. In the judgment of the government the second hazard is of more immediate cause for concern than is the first.

Those are the words of the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker, from a personal standpoint I think there is some good in the arguments advanced by the right hon. Prime Minister and, in another occasion, in another time and in a better economic context, I would certainly adhere to government's proposals for I really need this increase since I represent a rural riding which is about 100 miles long with some 50 municipalities and nearly 80,000 people. Moreover, I have to provide for the livelihood of ten children. But, in the present circumstances and particularly in the present economic situation, at a time when thousands of workers are unemployed, when the rise in the cost of living has not been curbed, when economists tell us the greatest danger we are exposed to is inflation, I cannot accept these proposals. Indeed, Mr. John Young, chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission stated yesterday in Vancouver that inflation had not yet been licked and that employers and workers should show some moderation in their claims for higher salaries and profits.

Mr. Speaker, I am thus under obligation to object to the raise in indemnities and allowances which has been proposed by the government. First the government pretend that such a measure will attract to Parliament men with higher qualifications and in a better position to solve the economic problems of Canada.

In the first place, let me question this assumption. Let us suppose for a moment that Parliament were "full up" with economists and lawyers. Would that solve the problem of the unemployed? If business is bad, if the economy is upside down, should it be blamed on members or on the leaders of the government who accept an archaic and obsolete financial system which deprives the consuming public of its necessary spending power. The government is advised by economists, lawyers and civil servants. These are all educated and qualifed people, as the Prime Minister said. However, they have led the Canadian economy to the brink of bankruptcy, mainly on account of their evident inability to equitably administer all the classes of our society.

Meanwhile, the government refuses to increase old age security pensions and family allowances, and to establish a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians.

In support of my statement I shall quote figures on votes taken in the House of Commons since the opening of This Parliament in 1968. Four times the Progressive Conservative members united with the Liberal members to defeat motions from the Ralliement créditiste or the New Democratic party concerning the guaranteed minimum income, increased family allowances and increased purchasing power for those whose needs are greater. On the occasion of very important votes on other proposals aimed at improving the condition of the poor, the Progressive Conservative members supported the members of the Ralliement créditiste or of the New Democratic party, but the Liberal majority always opposed such proposals. Let me make a few remarks on some previous votes.

On October 28, 1969 and on October 13, 1970, the motion on the guaranteed minimum income was defeated by the government.

On November 5, 1968, June 10, 1969 and October 28, 1969, motions to reduce taxes were defeated by the government.

On October 25, 1970, the motion to increase family allowances was defeated by the government.

On May 4, 1970, an amendment concerning the increase of old age security pensions was also defeated by the government. Legislation on young people unemployment had the same fate on December 15, 1970.

Mr. Speaker, if the government members were asked why they voted against all these social measures, they would reply that we have to fight inflation, therefore not give too much buying power to the taxpayer. To make purchasing power available to the most disadvantaged consumers, to those who need it most for food, shelter and clothing is, in the eyes of this government, bad and dangerous.

But to increase the salaries and allowances of members of Parliament and of the senators from $18,000 to $26,000 a year is not dangerous, there is nothing wrong with that. Mr. Speaker, history repeats itself: the rich administrator is getting fat on the national income but denies a minimum income to those most in need of it and mainly to those it is his duty to protect.

For all those reasons I will have to vote against increasing parliamentary salaries and expenses until such time as the government sees fit to propose some social measures to improve the plight of the poor and the plight of the families unable to live on their budget.

Let the government move to increase family allowances and old age security pensions, and I will immediately vote in favour of an increase in our salaries and allowances. But if nothing is done for our citizens, if no legislation is introduced to increase family allowances and mainly to increase the buying power of those who need it most, I will object to increasing our salaries and allowances.

[English]

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, hon. members in this part of the House, including our leader, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and, more recently, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), have thoroughly gone over the provisions of this legislation. I must say I will join with the majority of the members of this party and oppose this bill.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mrs. MacInnis: I hope the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) is not too far away. I wish to repeat for his benefit what I have already told members of the press. Whatever I net as a result of this increase I intend to give to suitable causes and charities in my constituency. My constituents will be taxed as a result of this increase, and I want to be sure they get at least some benefit from it. I feel I will be in a better position to do this than perhaps even the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). I intend to look after the disbursement of this increase myself, but I shall not keep it. Without being too presumptuous, I think it would be better if those hon. members on the other side of the House who are so anxious to divest themselves of any advantage they might gain as a result of a salary increase would use their weight to prevail on the government even at this time to withdraw this legislation.

When this legislation is fully understood, I am sure it will have a boomerang effect upon not only their own fortunes but the feelings generally of the people of this country. Let me quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail of yesterday.

An hon. Member: Oh, no!

Mrs. MacInnis: It is not a bad paper compared to some that are read by members on the other side of the House. The editorial states in part:

> It will interest Canadians, however, to discover with what speed the government is prepared to move in a matter involving its own personal pockets, when it has been so slow to move—claiming as excuse always that it was being obstructed by the opposition—in a multitude of great matters that involve the country.

This I think is the point that has most shocked the public. I refer to the fact that for so long we have been trying to get a better deal for the veterans, the aged, the young people, the handicapped, the crippled and the people on social assistance, and always the same cry has been heard—that the matter is being carefully considered, it is being studied and that it will take some time before the cabinet makes up its mind.

People have been patient; they have waited in vain for the reports to come forward. Then suddenly this measure comes forward involving a great increase in the salaries of Members of Parliament, and the government practically falls over itself in its attempt to get the measure through with all possible speed.

As I said a moment ago, members of my party have canvassed all the major arguments against this bill from our point of view. They have emphasized the fact that the amount is unconscionably large at a time when inflation and unemployment are raging across the country, the Prime Minister's opinion to the contrary; that it is very wrong for the leaders of the country, the people who are supposed to be giving the lead in Parliament, to choose this time to add to the flames of inflation and the misery of unemployment by making their own position more secure and insulated. This is rather like the situation in the old days when there was a shipwreck at sea. What if the captain and the officers had rushed for the lifeboats first, to make sure that they would get aboard, leaving the women and children to take their chances with the sea? It is a little bit that way with this legislation.

I am speaking this afternoon because I shall be away from the House when the vote is taken, if one is taken, on the first or second day of next week. I feel very strongly on this matter. Furthermore, I do not want there to be any ambiguity about where I stand when it is essential that my constituents and people in other parts of the country who write to me about this matter—I receive a great deal of mail on the question—should know my position. I realize the sincerity of people who have spoken on both sides of this question. We have just heard a spokesman from our party speaking on the other side of the matter from myself. I know the way some people look on this question. They believe it is justifiable to be taking this step. There may be amendments which they believe would be desirable, but on the principle of the bill they are in agreement. They have a perfect right to see things as they do and to speak as they wish. This is our right in Parliament, and thank goodness we have this type of Parliament.

I grant, also, that the needs of Members of Parliament vary considerably. It is impossible to tell what the needs of individual Members of Parliament may be. Some of us have hidden obligations which do not meet the eye. Others obviously have difficulties in respect of the size and type of constituency they serve. Still others have families in which children are at an age when they are receiving university or vocational training. There are a great variety of needs.

I have always been in favour, and have said so in our caucus and elsewhere, of some attempt being made to meet these varying expenses. I think the chairman of the committee which looked into this matter was correct when he spoke of having vouchers for expenses certainly in so far as these involve travel and overnight hotel accommodation for members in rural ridings. I think he was quite right. I believe there should be in this legislation some attempt to discriminate in favour of members not only in northern ridings but in difficult ridings, and discrimination also in respect of other types of expense.

I am surprised, however, by the government's attitude. When it has come to the poor people, the people on pension or the people on social assistance, this government has been very much in favour of a means test or, in more polite words, a needs test. The government has taken the position that before people can get anything from public funds if they are poor, handicapped or old, they have to lay the little cash they have on the table and make it abundantly clear that they must have this extra help because of their financial situation and economic need. I cannot understand why the government has lost all enthusiasm for that approach when it comes to the salaries and allowances of Members of Parliament. It would seem to me that if a means or a needs test is a good thing people in the lower income bracket, the government would think it to be an excellent thing for Members of Parliament. They are using one yardstick for the poor and another for those who are not so poor. This is what the public notices particularly and does not like about this legislation.

This across-the-board lavishness shows up badly, especially when it includes people in the other place. People in some sections of our community do not feel that those in the other place do a necessary job of work. It seems rather unnecessary to many people that the people in the other place should have that kind of old age consideration even if they are in a chamber which is so ornate and traditional.

It seems to me the whole question of increases in salaries and allowances of Members of Parliament depends very much on how one looks at it. Some members make comparisons between their incomes and those of senior public servants. True, I have not yet heard anyone make a comparison with the salary of Mr. Rasminsky the governor of the Bank of Canada. However, if Mr. Rasminsky could get an increase from $50,000 a year to $75,000 a year, surely some Members of Parliament who look at it in this way would consider we are mere pikers to settle for what we will be receiving under this bill. Surely they are worth what Mr. Rasminsky is worth to our country. Why should they settle for a piddling amount in comparison with his salary?

If we look at it in this way, there is no end to the value we could set upon our service to the country. However, I do not think that is the way to look at it. I know there are people who look at it in that way but I do not. I feel we are here to represent the people of our ridings. There are people in our ridings who have a different point of view from those who elected us, because they lean toward another party. But we are here to serve all of them. To my mind it is essential that there be not too large a discrepancy between what we get and what the people who sent us here are getting. If there is too big a discrepancy in income there will be too great a discrepancy in point of view. Too big a discrepancy in income means too big a discrepancy in outlook. I think this is one danger in increasing salaries and allowances of Members of Parliament away beyond the salaries and allowances of the majority of our constituents. For this reason, if for no other, I am opposed to this legislation. I am opposed for other reasons also.

I receive many letters about this matter. I received one today from and old age pensioner. He wrote protesting the increase for Members of Parliament at this time when he must get along on $80. This is a perfectly normal and logical way of looking at it, in my view. I do not think I am that much more valuable to the community than he is. He did all he could in his time, and I am trying to do what I can in mine.

If we are serious, honest and genuine when we talk about all of us having a right to equality of opportunity and to be considered worthy of sharing the things of this country in a dignified way, I think it is dishonest—if you want me to throw that word around—to say we are worth so much more than the old age pensioner and other people on low incomes. I do not think we are, and it is a crooked way of looking at society, in my view. I think we should be here to speak, above all, for the people who are not in a position to speak for themselves.

The people who are worst off should get our attention first, and the ones who need it the most should be given the biggest pay boost. You may say that this philosophy is crazy, that it belongs to the dark ages of Christianity, to the teachers and the preachers about whom my colleague spoke, who did not know any better a generation ago than to want to serve without increasing their salaries—but I do not look at it that way. I think we are here to represent the people in our ridings who most need our representations. Until we can get a proper living standard for these people we should not be cushioning ourselves, great as the need may be.

I think an attempt should be made to assess the needs of individual Members of Parliament and to meet the needs of those who need an increase more than others. This across-the-board increase does not sit well with me. I warn members of the House that when the gap between the rich and the poor in this country becomes too great, we will hear more of the type of criticism that we are hearing now, namely, that Parliament is becoming irrelevant.

Believe me, the criticism about Parliament becoming irrelevant is not made because members are not in their seats all day, as they should be according to the public; and it is not made because we do not have enough committees or because we do not have a system similar to the U.S. presidential system. That is not the basic reason for the criticism, and no amount of tinkering with the committee system, with trips here, there and yonder, or trying to make different rules in the House will do away with the criticism. The criticism stems from the fact that the poor people, the veterans, the old age pensioners, the cripples, people with big families and small incomes, feel that Parliament is completely irrelevant and cannot meet their problems or find solutions for them.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Do you think it is irrelevant?

Mrs. MacInnis: Yes, it is becoming irrelevant. The National Advisory Committee on Welfare agreed with me when they said that one of the things we should be doing now is to stop the business of patchwork welfare programs and come out with a national program for a guaranteed income, a level beneath which people will not be allowed to fall. They said that even if we had a guaranteed income of $2,000 a year for a single person, $3,400 for a family of adults, $3,980 for a family of three and $4,560 a year for a family of four, such an expenditure would be below Canada's annual expenditure on roads. It would be substantially less than the annual increase in tax revenues of $3.1 billion between 1968 and 1969.

That is the kind of raise I want to see and the kind of raise I have been trying to get ever since I came here—a raise for the people who need it most. My goodness, neglecting the roads for a while might cause potholes in them, but if we neglect the people of this country much longer we will have something much worse than potholes in people. I am deadly serious about this. What is the sense of providing $14.7 million for a do-it-yourself program for youth and then finding that you get applications involving a total expenditure of $150 million? My own province and that of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Groos) has sent in applications for $17 million, and programs to match, which is nearly $3 million more than the total amount provided for all of Canada.

I think we are making the raises in the wrong places and we are beginning the spending in the wrong places, if this Parliament is to be relevant. I want Parliament to be relevant. What is the sense of our being here if it is not relevant? I do not think we should be any longer in the position of having to raise our own salaries. Why can we not set up the next time around, which I hope will be some time in the distant future, some kind of an independent body—and I mean independent—which would go into this matter and would fix a scale and a standard in accordance with the cost of living? Even so I will quarrel with it unless at the same time we provide cost of living raises for people with less than we have.

One of the most shameful things we did in the past year was to fix old age pensions at $80 a month, with no escalation whatsoever no matter what happens to the cost of living. Yet here we are escalating our salaries and pensions without anybody being able to say "No" to us. There is the story of the little boy who came home after being punished at school for telling a lie. His father said, "You knew it was wrong to tell a lie, didn't you?" "Yes," the boy said "and, worse than that, it didn't work". This legislation is all wrong and, worse than that, it will not work because people will not put up with this sort of thing when they know what it is. In other words, if Parliament wants the confidence and trust of the people of this country, it has to deserve their trust and confidence. Has it been doing that?

Let me go back to the National Advisory Committee on Welfare. They said that welfare payments under the current legislation and regulations were modest compared with payments to the real beneficiaries of government welfare programs, the corporate rich—only these are not called welfare programs; they are called economic growth incentives. Ours is not called a welfare program either, it is called salaries for Members of Parliament; but it comes out of the same place and it is for the same purpose.

I want to be able to live with myself. I do not want to tell people that I am in favour of democracy and in favour of a fair deal for people and then tamely submit to this sort of thing and go along with it when I know it is wrong. Furthermore, I would not even be prepared to submit this question to the Prices and Incomes Commission. On a number of occasions I have seen what the commission can do with a large bucket of whitewash and I am not in favour of giving them a chance to do the same with this matter.

The House should face up to this situation and realize that the bill is intensely unpopular with the people we were sent here to represent. Even at this late date we should say "No" to this bill and cold-storage its consideration and its implementation until we have had a chance to find out how people feel when the next election rolls around.

• (3:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, a bill to increase the indemnities and allowances of members of Parliament and senators is now before us.

First of all, I should like to say that I echo the suggestions and remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin). Consequently, I do not intend to bring up again the arguments for or against the bill brought forward since the beginning of the debate. But I would like to expose my own points of view on some specific clauses.

To my mind, this is not time to suggest increased allowances and expenditures when the economy of the country is stagnating, when a large number of Canadians are up against problems of unemployment and spiralling prices. Underemployment and increased prices are the direct or indirect result of lack of action and the maladministration of the government.

In private industry, when bad management or economic conditions do not allow for dividends, they are simply forgotten. And I think that that is the position which we should take under the circumstances.

I do not mean to say that parliamentarians are the only ones responsible for the present situation. Certain officials should also take the blame for a good part of the disappointments of this administration. They would benefit from soul-searching, if they can do it.

Certain information media should also examine themselves on the nature of the information which they convey to the public whom it is their mission to inform.

The Beaupré committee report mentions the working facilities which should be available to members of Parliament so that they can adequately discharge their responsibilities. Here is an excerpt from this report:

> The Committee is satisfied that important improvements must be made in the facilities provided to Members and in the methods of financing them. The need to make these improvements is urgent and it will become more urgent and more serious as the importance of the role of the individual Member in the parliamentary system continues to expand.

The Parliament member should at least have the same facilities as those available to civil servants. How many civil servants would accept to share an office with two or three people? Very few, I think.

I also feel that the member should have secretarial services available to him in his constituency so that he can meet his constituents and provide the population which he represents the services expected of him. I believe that such facilities should be substituted for increases.

Another matter which we cannot discuss in this House and which is the target of bitter criticism on the part of the population concerns the Senate.

I have a lot of respect for the members of this institution. I am aware of the services which they have rendered to this country, over the past century.

The remarks that I have to make about the Senate are specifically directed to the institution itself. Since it is a century old, it needs rejuvenating. I would go further: a great many Canadians are even questioning the need for it. I believe I am reflecting the opinion of a majority of Canadians when I say that the role of the Senate must be reevaluated and that we should, if required, do away with it.

Without being in complete agreement with the figures proposed in the Beaupré Committee report, I should like to state clearly that I agree with the basic principles stated in the report, concerning the methods to be used for the payment of salaries and allowances to members of Parliament and senators.

In my opinion, the salaries of members of Parliament should be taxable on the same basis as those of all other Canadian taxpayers. Let me be more precise. Presently, a member receives a taxable salary of $12,000 and a tax-free allowance of $6,000 for his expenses.

The tax-free allowance should be abolished. Expenses inherent in the functions of member of Parliament and senator should be reimbursed on the same basis as those of public service employees, and according to practices prevailing in private industry.

On the matter of expenses, the Beaupré Committee simply recommends the reimbursement of expenses related to the function of member of the House of Commons or senator. This can be implemented in two different ways: either by providing directly to members of Parliament services for which they now pay out of their salaries and allowances, or by reimbursing expenses on the production of vouchers.

The fixed allowance now in existence and which the government intends to maintain in effect is not in line with recognized taxation principles in Canada. Furthermore, the fixed amount of the tax-free allowance is not logical because of the disparities due to the various distances to be covered in the different constituencies.

The expenses of a member residing in the national capital area or in any other easily accessible centre are certainly not comparable to those of a member residing hundreds of miles from the country's capital. In addition, distances within certain constituencies are another factor to be taken into consideration.

This bill in my opinion, is tantamount to extraordinary legislation which is no longer justifiable. During the last general election campaign, was it not the Liberal party, now in power, that had among other items of its platform the establishment of a just society, the suppression of privileges and the adoption of legislation fair to everyone?

We all deplore the fact that the public tends to consider as salary the fixed allowance for expenditures really incurred by the Member of Parliament in the discharge of his duties. In this respect the position of the Member of Parliament does not differ from that of any other taxpayer. The system proposed by the Beaupré Committee is more equitable than the present one and would also be more easily understood by Canadians.

We have the opportunity to correct this extraordinary situation which is not justified.

We intend to modernize Parliament and the administration. The opportunity is there to correct this situation by rejecting this extraordinary legislation.

If we continue to follow this practice, we let the people suppose that the tax-free allowance is only a disguised way to round off the indemnity paid to parliamentarians, while this is not the case.

There should also be provided a term for the periodical adjustment of parliamentary allowances as is customary in the public service. In this way, it would not be necessary to introduce, every five or ten years, an increase which never fails to draw heavy criticism. Its percentage might be determined in advance, or established according to the increase in the cost of living. Criticism would thus be avoided and everybody, those who govern and those who are governed, would know in advance what they may expect.

For these reasons, my intention is to vote against this legislation. To conclude my remarks, I will add that I am struck by the difference between standards governing those who enjoy a privileged position and the rest of the people.

[English]

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I think that the indecent haste with which this legislation is being proceeded with in the House of Commons will be noted by people in all parts of Canada. In the last couple of days the House has tried to proceed with this measure in an atmosphere of indecent haste. I have not seen the government move as fast this session on any piece of legislation as it is moving on this bill.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Let us see what took place this week. First, on Monday the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) announced in the House that this measure was the government's proposal. Also, no ice of intention to introduce the bill was placed on the order paper. At the earliest opportunity provided in the rules, on Wednesday the bill was given first reading. Then the bill had to stay on the order paper for one day until second reading could be proceeded with on Thursday. On Thursday the bill was called for second reading. I only received a copy of the bill on my desk on Thursday morning. Since then all sorts of attempts have been made to wind up this debate in one day or in two days in an effort to get the bill out of the way as rapidly as possible. There is much evidence to suggest that this has been attempted in the House during the last couple of days.

I suggest that the Canadian people will wonder, rightly so, why it has taken us so long to deal with the many problems involving unemployment, the people on fixed incomes, the farmers of this country, and so on, whereas the House has shown such an amazing burst of speed in dealing with this legislation which is in the interests of Members of Parliament.

An hon. Member: We have been discussing this question for two years.

Mr. Burton: This is the first occasion on which it has been discussed on the floor of the House. If the hon. member wishes to make comments, I suggest that he do so from his own seat and not from the front bench seat in which he is now sitting. He does not have a position on the treasury benches yet, even though he may imagine himself in such a role in the future.

Debating this issue is, of course, difficult. Intemperate remarks are bound to be made by hon. members; some have been made already. I think all hon. members of the House have made remarks which they have later regretted in dealing with this issue. They made them in the heat of the moment when feelings were running high. On the other hand, it is fair to say—I think this needs to be said—that many intemperate remarks are made by the public with respect to the remuneration of Members of Parliament. There is a lack of awareness of the needs of members and their situation and hon. members often become the whipping-post or scapegoat when the public feels unhappy about a certain matter. Of course, this is easy to understand. It is to be regretted that the government did not proceed to deal with this matter in another way.

I think the general public ought to be aware of the special situation that faces Members of Parliament. We live different sorts of lives. Part of this is by choice and part is through necessity. When I say that people lack an adequate awareness of the situation of Members of Parliament I should qualify those words by pointing out that many people in my constituency and elsewhere have acknowledged in a courteous and friendly way the very difficult sort of life which a Member of Parliament of ten has to live. When I say that there is a lack of awareness and adequate understanding of the situation of a member I must be very careful to qualify that statement by making it clear that many people do recognize the special needs and situation of Members of Parliament.

We work very long hours. This can be said of members of all political parties. Most members of the House work long and often unusual hours, although members of the public sometimes gain the impression when they visit the galleries that because members are absent from the chamber they are not working very hard. Also, I think there is a lack of awareness of some of the things a Member of Parliament must do if he is adequately to perform his job. It is fair to say, Mr. Speaker, that many Members of Parliament work exceedingly hard. Many work much harder than the average person who lives a normal, ordinary life. Of course, there are some exceptions but this applies to any group of people.

It must also be noted that the family life of a Member of Parliament is affected by the life he is called upon to live. Members of Parliament must of necessity be absent from their homes for more time than they like. This applies to most hon. members and certainly applies to me. Very real conflicts develop for a member such as myself who has small children and is trying to fulfil his family responsibilities at the same time as he is attempting to carry out his responsibilities as a Member of Parliament.

It must be noted that being a Member of Parliament is a full-time occupation today. Certainly that is the case for the member who wants to do an adequate job. The day when a member could carry on another line of work while performing his duties as a Member of Parliament is past in almost all cases.

Also, a Member of Parliament is called on to do considerable travelling in his constituency and in other parts of Canada to meet a wide variety of obligations and commitments. Members of the public look with envy on these opportunities for travel, but it is safe to say—and I am sure that most members of the House will agree with me—that after one has travelled a certain amount one does not look upon travelling in the same way as others. A saturation point is reached with respect to travelling and thereafter it is not the same enjoyable, thrilling experience that some may believe it to be. To be constantly on the go and constantly travelling away from home and one's place of regular work is not good.

It must be pointed out, as others in this debate have pointed out, that of necessity a Member of Parliament incurs many unusual expenses, some of which are difficult adequately to define if one attempts to relate them to any ordinary expense account structure. As some hon. members have said, the Member of Parliament occurs expenses which he would not incur if he were not a member, and some of them certainly do not fit the standard format of accountable expenses. This still leaves the point that there are certain accountable expenses which should be taken into account and given further consideration if we are to develop an adequate structure for the remuneration of Members of Parliament.

In looking at the entire picture of the peculiar circumstances of Members of Parliament, and considering at the same time just what sort of job they are doing, whom they are representing and whose money they are spending, we must give consideration to maintaining a balance between the very real financial needs of the member on the one hand and the member's relationships with the people of his constituency and the people of Canada on the other. This is a matter that must be kept in mind at all times.

I have a particular point of view on this matter. Some members will undoubtedly disagree with my approach. That is their right and privilege and I respect them for their differences of opinion. I ask them to respect me for my views and to acknowledge that we have a very difficult task to perform. In fact, we need to do more work before we arrive at a satisfactory solution to this problem. This is a degrading process which Parliament has to go through at intervals. I suggest that the process we are now going through, and have gone through on a number of occasions in the past 25 years, hurts and degrades Parliament and its members. Members of this chamber are placed in the very awkward position of attempting to deal with this matter in an objective and sensible fashion.

Members of Parliament should be completely dispassionate in dealing with this matter, no matter whether at some point they must assume responsibility for whatever decision is taken. It is clear that we need a different procedure than we have had up to now. This is one of the matters that the Beaupré committee was asked to study—and it struck out completely! The biggest single failing in the report of the Beaupré committee is that it does not make any suggestions or proposals for dealing with this matter in the future. In fact, the committee passed the buck on this issue and declined to make a concrete proposal. As such, they failed in part to accept the responsibility that was given to them when the committee was established.

I have reservations with regard to some of the suggestions that the salary or indemnity of members of Parliament should be related to a particular level of salary in the public service. It is difficult, if not impossible, to adequately relate the role and job of a Member of Parliament to any particular position in the public service. They are entirely different types of jobs.

I take some objection to the procedure followed by the Prime Minister when he made his announcement in the House of Commons at the beginning of the week. He said this is what the government is proposing to Members of Parliament. He then went on to outline government proposals with respect to a number of categories in the executive level of the public service. He did not attempt to establish any relationship between these two groups, but he made the announcement at the same time as though he were lumping together civil servants and Members of Parliament. This carries implications which should be questioned by Members of Parliament and examined very carefully before we go too far down the road of linking the indemnity of a Member of Parliament with a position in the public service.

As I have already noted, there is a very real need to take further account of some of the expenses, particularly those of an accountable nature, which are or may be incurred by a member in carrying out his duties, and also to ensure that more adequate services are available to Members of Parliament. What is the present situation? We have the report of the Beaupré committee which made a number of recommendations. In spite of the fact that the Prime Minister thanked the Beaupré committee very profusely for the work it carried out in preparing its recommendations, the government essentially rejected the recommendations and approach of that committee. It was a mistake to take that sort of approach.

Some aspects of the Beaupré committee recommendations merit consideration and should be further considered. Reference was made in the Beaupré committee report to the necessity or desirability of improvements in travel arrangements for members and their spouses. Generally, I find these proposals acceptable. I think they would be helpful. They do not involve a direct payment to members and their spouses; they would make more facilities and services available to them.

It should be noted on the record, for the benefit of those who look with envy on the travel-free arrangement for members, that under this arrangement not one cent passes through the hands of a member unless it involves reimbursement for car travel, for which an expense claim is submitted. For the most part, especially with respect to economy air travel which is available to us, travelling is done entirely by voucher. It does not involve funds passing through our hands directly, although these funds are legitimately charged against the name of each member of the House. It should also be noted that although such travel arrangements are available to members, members must of necessity incur more expense than they would otherwise incur. When I go to Regina for a weekend I spend more money out of my own pocket than I do if I stay in Ottawa. I am sure that many members are faced with the same situation.

The Beaupré committee proposed improvements in the telephone service available to members. It also proposed an allowance for telegrams. I agreed with the proposals for improvements in the telephone service. We already have a pretty good service, but it is just a matter of mechanics to improve it further in terms of the member's needs. I question the allowance for telegrams. I note that reference to it has crept into the legislation now before us. I think it is a very questionable type of extension of services to members.

It is also proposed that mail addressed to or from Members of Parliament anywhere in Canada be sent postage free rather than only mail to or from the House of Commons. I also have reservations with regard to this proposal. As it stands, I cannot concur with it. From reading the legislation I gather it is to pave the way to implementing this proposal. I submit the proposal will be subject to much abuse. It is not the type of service which is most essential for a Member of Parliament. This type of service is very much needed in respect of correspondence mailed to and from the House of Commons, but I question whether it should be made available to members anywhere in Canada.

The Beaupré committee proposed that improvements should be made in office space available to members in Ottawa and in secretarial and other assistance for members. I find these proposals useful and satisfactory. It was also proposed that provision be made to assist with office facilities for members in their constituencies. This proposal should have been given more consideration by the government before making its decision. It should have been a top priority matter in terms of any changes which the government proposed. At the present time I have an office in Regina which I operate jointly with my colleague, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), together with our constituency organizations and some of the interested organizations in that city.

My hon. friend from Regina-Lake Centre and myself contribute to the upkeep of this office out of our own pockets, out of our indemnity and expense allowance. We felt this would enable us to provide the useful and necessary service which members should provide to their constituents. Assistance in this respect would be warranted and acceptable. The Beaupré committee also recommended that improvements be made in office space available to members in Ottawa and that other assistance should be provided. This we certainly agree with.

A number of other proposals were put forward with respect to giving a housing allowance to members while they were in Ottawa, to do away with the $6,000 tax-free allowance, to raise the indemnity to $23,000 and, later, to $25,000. Then a range of increases was proposed for the Prime Minister, members of the cabinet and certain other members in addition to their usual indemnities. It is obvious that this set of proposals has been rejected by the government.

I agreed with the proposal to do away with the present tax-free allowance. It is one of the things to which people really object with respect to the remuneration of Members of Parliament. The proposal now put forward will be subject to just as much criticism as was the old allowance. An increase in the indemnity to $23,000 a year without any tax-free portion would have resulted in very little by way of a real increase in indemnity for members since the entire sum would be subject to income tax. Of course, this has now gone by the board. A case could have been made for a reasonable increase in indemnity but I do not think the proposal now before us is at all acceptable. I do not think it is the type of proposal the people of Canada will find acceptable no matter the merits it may have with respect to the particular situation in which some members find themselves.

I am bound to look at this question as the member for Regina East, as the member who was elected to represent some 90,000 people in the Regina East constituency and make decisions in this chamber on their behalf to the best of my ability. I am bound to keep in mind who these people are and the manner in which I relate to them. Many of my constituents are farmers. They have experienced very difficult economic circumstances over the past several years. They have also felt the brunt of government policies which have restricted their income and their income potential.

In the city of Regina many workers are earning only a very modest wage. Others are unemployed, unable to find work though they have been looking for it for months without success. Part of their difficulty in finding employment arises from decisions taken by the government. Some of these decisions came to the floor of the House of Commons. People will resent the fact that Members of Parliament suddenly find it possible to take speedy action to deal with their own particular needs.

In Regina East there are many who live on comparatively low wages. For a variety of reasons they were unable to gain anything by way of an improved education; for one reason or another they were unable to learn skills which would place them in a high-income category. They, too, have gone through a difficult time over the past few years. Along with others in Canada they have been asked to hold the line with respect to wage increases, in order to help fight inflation. Some of them who were least able to afford it were asked to bear more than their share of the burden of fighting the battle against inflation.

As in other constituencies throughout Canada, there are many old age pensioners in Regina East. Most of them live on fixed incomes. They went through the First World War and the Second World War with a depression sandwiched in between. The majority retired before the introduction of widespread pension plans and income security plans for the aged. At the present time their standard of living is minimal. There are also people in my constituency who are earning a comparatively high income. Some of them are in receipt of incomes far in excess of my salary as a Member of Parliament. They have been doing very well in many respects. Of course, they are part of the total population of the constituency. I believe it is necessary to review government policies over the past three years as they have been brought before Parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member because it is four o'clock. It being four o'clock, the House is required to consider private members' business.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS

CANADA LABOUR (STANDARDS) CODE

PROVISION FOR THREE WEEKS ANNUAL VACATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that Bill C-41, to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code (three weeks annual vacation after three years) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

• (4:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have spent the day dealing with a matter that relates to the well-being of a group of workers known as Members of Parliament. I am happy now to present a bill that is concerned with the well-being of all workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction. I think it is appropriate to discuss this kind of bill at the conclusion of this kind of day. I suggest it is also appropriate for this bill to be before us this week in view of the fact that a few days ago we gave second reading to another bill to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, a bill which we have already sent to committee. However, that bill does not include any reference to the aspect of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code covered in this bill of mine, so perhaps the House will want to be logical and consistent and send this bill to that committee as well so that the whole job can be done at once.

The purpose of this bill is to amend that part of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code that provides for annual vacations with pay. As I said the other day when we were debating the other bill, we have had for a number of years legislation providing for annual vacations with pay for all workers who are in industries which come under federal labour jurisdiction.

For many years I have initiated bills on the Order Paper asking that this be done. Finally it was made law by the government under the direction of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when his Minister of Labour, Hon. Michael Starr, brought in a bill providing for annual vacations with pay. That first bill provided for a vacation of one week after one year of service with the same employer, and then two weeks after two years' of service with the same employer.

As hon. members will recall, some of us thought that it was unfair to make workers wait for two years before getting two weeks' vacation with pay, so in due course under a Liberal government the Michael Starr bill was amended and we now have the provision that there are to be two weeks' vacation with pay for workers under federal labour jurisdiction after one year of service.

I pause to put in the word of explanation that seems to have to be made very time we debate legislation respecting workers who come under federal labour jurisdiction. Almost every time, somewhere in the press a story appears that implies that we are talking only about public servants, those who work for the federal government. This is not the case at all. We are talking about employees in industries such as railroading and other forms of transportation, broadcasting, banking, and so on, those industries of the country which by the terms of the British North America Act come under federal labour jurisdiction. Actually, the groups of employees so covered comprise only about one-tenth of the working force, the other nine-tenths coming under the various provincial labour laws. However, it is important that a lead be given in this area, and that is what has been done by the federal government a number of times.

The purpose of this bill is to make one more little improvement. It is so little that it ought not to take any time at all. One might ask me why I did not put more into this bill. If you put two, three or four subjects into a bill, Mr. Speaker, there are members who get up and say that they agree with some parts of the bill but not all. Therefore, I have limited it—

Mr. Cullen: Sounds familiar.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend who has not been here very long is already able to say that that sounds familiar. Since he is out of his place, I gather that when it comes to his turn to talk-out the bill he will have to go to his seat at the other end of the chamber. I was saying that the purpose of this bill is to provide that after three years' service with the same employer, an employee ought to have three weeks' vacation with pay. How can anyone say "No" to that? How can anyone, even my genial friend from Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), talk-out such a proposal? I am sure he agrees with it.

There is one amendment that might be made to this motion for second reading which would not be offensive, and that is that instead of reading the bill for the second time the subject matter might be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration so it can be dealt with at the same time as we are dealing with the other amendments being made to the labour code.

Each time this bill has come up for debate it has been "loved to death" by those who say it is a good idea. I hope today that the love for it will not be quite so fatal but, rather, that the House will agree to refer either the bill itself or its subject matter to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, the mover of this bill is an expert manipulator of the rules and procedures of the House of Commons. Realizing that a private member cannot introduce a bill which would impose upon the treasury an expenditure, he has moved that Bill C-41, an act to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code to provide for three weeks' annual vacation after three years of service for all workers, in addition to the statutory holidays to which everyone in the federal goverment's employ is entitled, be referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration which would study the bill and decide on whatever recommendation the committee would wish to make to Parliament.

I cannot help but commend the hon. member for his persistence in introducing measures year after year to give workers additional time for leisure and recreation. I am sure all hon. members are genuinely sympathetic to the objective that Bill C-41 seeks to achieve. A similar bill to this has been introduced by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on several occasions, as he intimated in his remarks, and in each case Parliament did not see the immediate need for such a measure when more pressing needs were awaiting government legislation.

While the principle of the bill may draw some sympathy, the proposed standard in Bill C-41 is three weeks' holiday with pay after only three years' service. It is, to a great extent, unusually ahead of current practice in government and industry generally. A recent survey of conditions indicates that in industries in the federal jurisdiction only 12 per cent of the non-office employees surveyed worked in establishments where three weeks' vacation with pay was granted after less than ten years' service. The proportion working in establishments where three weeks' vacation was granted after less than ten years was about 15 per cent.

In the booklet "Labour Standards in Canada" issued by the Department of Labour, and dated December, 1965, there is listed at page 50 vacation periods and the vacation pay requirements in the various provinces. I should like to quote from that page. In the federal service the length of annual vacation is two weeks or vacation pay amounting to 4 per cent of annual earnings. In Nova Scotia it is one week or 2 per cent of annual earnings; New Brunswick, one week or 2 per cent of annual earnings; Quebec, one week's regular pay if paid by the week or longer period, otherwise 2 per cent of annual earnings; in Ontario, one week or 2 per cent of annual earnings or 4 per cent, as the case may be, in the event of there being more than three or four years' service; Manitoba, two weeks' regular pay; Saskatchewan, two weeks or three weeks after five years' service. In Alberta it is two weeks' regular pay, and in British Columbia it is two weeks or 4 per cent of annual earnings. On page 50 we also find this passage:

In Quebec, if a worker has worked less than a year, he is entitled to a half-day of vacation for each calendar month of employment; in Saskatchewan, a worker with less than a year's service with his employer may be given one day of vacation for each month.

These changes were effective July 1, 1966. Saskatchewan is the only province with legislation to provide three weeks' vacation with pay, but after five years of service. Having regard to all the circumstances surrounding the numerous difficulties arising in applying this bill, if passed, to the small businesses employing only a few persons, I wonder whether it would not be better to leave the question of three weeks' vacation with pay to the bargaining table and the collective agreement rather than imposing a law which would in some cases work hardship.

Annual vacations with pay have been provided for by law in industries subject to federal labour jurisdiction since 1958. The first federal law, the Annual Vacations Act, required employers within its scope to grant their employees one week's paid vacation after one year of employment, and two weeks after two years' service. This act was replaced by part III of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. The code provides for vacation with pay of at least two weeks after every completed year of employment. Vacation pay is 4 per cent of wages for the year in which employees establish their claim to a vacation. A year of employment, under the federal law, must be continuous with one employer and may be a 12-month period commencing with the day the employee began to work for the employer or any subsequent anniversary of that date; or it may be a calendar year or another year approved by the Minister of Labour.

The Canada Labour (Standards) Code applies to industries within federal jurisdiction, and the only employees excluded are those who are managers, superintendents or persons who exercise management functions, members of the medical, dental, architectural, engineering and legal professions. The provincial laws govern employees in employment within the jurisdiction of the province, with the exception of the classes of the following employees. Farm workers are excluded in all provinces. Also excluded are persons employed in horticulture in British Columbia, in growing flowers, fruits or vegetables in Ontario, and in ranching and market gardening in Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Domestic servants are exempted in all provinces but Manitoba and Saskatchewan. Professional workers are excluded in British Columbia and Ontario, employees of municipal and school corporations in Quebec, and members of family undertakings in Saskatchewan. Salesmen are excluded in Alberta, Ontario and Quebec, but in Quebec the exclusion is limited to those with less than three months' service and those who work for two or more employers at the same time.

Part-time workers employed four hours or less a day, or 24 hours or less a week, are not covered in New Brunswick. Those working three hours or less a day are excluded in Quebec, and those employed for eight hours or less a week are exempted from the Alberta legislation. In addition to the groups already mentioned, excepted are workers employed in lumbering and commercial fishing in Nova Scotia, persons engaged in funeral directing and embalming in Ontario, and apartment house janitors, caretakers provided with free lodgings and home-workers in Quebec. The large group of workers governed by decrees under the Collective Agreement Act are also outside the scope of the Quebec vacation legislation. Workers governed by a collective agreement in British Columbia are exempted from the act if the Minister of Labour approves the vacation provisions of the agreement.

Under the Canada Labour (Standards) Code an employee is entitled to two weeks' vacation with pay after a year's service. In New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec the vacation with pay to which a worker is entitled under the law is one week after a year of employment. In Alberta, British Columbia and Manitoba it is two weeks after a year of employment. The Saskatchewan act provides for an annual paid vacation of two weeks after each of the first four years of service and for three weeks after the fifth year and each year thereafter.

The period of five years of employment with the same employer necessary for an employee to qualify for three weeks' vacation may be continuous or may be made up of accumulated years provided that no break in employment exceeds six months, 182 days. The Saskatchewan act also provides that a system of cumulative vacation may be established by regulation, under which an employee may by agreement with his employer and with the approval of the minister postpone one week of his vacation each year for a period not exceeding four years.

Our Canada Labour (Standards) Code seems to be working very well, and though there have been some deferments, particularly with reference to hours of work, these deferments have been relatively few and I have every reason to believe that these problems will be equitably solved within a reasonable period of time.

In this bill the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has seen fit to reduce the length of service from five years to three. If he had been consistent he would have left it at five years, in which case I believe it would draw greater sympathy. We of course agree that there are minimum standards and that the federal government has a responsibility to introduce legislation to see that labour receives fair treatment at all levels, and even though the standards may not affect all the people in the country the government's responsibility is to set standards that should be followed. Provincial governments, as I have indicated, have the power to set their own standards and nearly all provinces have done so with respect to vacations with pay.

Labour naturally feels that in periods of prosperity it is the time to seek gains, to catch up with what it regards as its legitimate objectives. Being human, we should not be surprised at this. We should, rather, be grateful to the hon. member if in some cases he did not persist in unrealistic demands at times when the Canadian economy cannot afford it. The Canadian working force—that is, the average Canadian worker—is well aware of the state of the economy and workers are encouraged to seek their share of the general prosperity. I do not blame them for this.

I do not deny that it is within the authority of the federal government to legislate on labour matters, which includes regulations with respect to vacations with pay. And I am all for it, especially since we live at a time when technological advances in all fields of human endeavour leave our people with more time for leisure and recreation; at a time when we stand at the very threshold of even greater potential that will produce more with less work and, consequently, more time to spare.

I do not deny that a prolonged vacation is desirable and useful. In fact, I admit that it is increasingly useful in view of the technological advances in industry, in manufacturing and in the offices of the nation; and the time may be near when we will be able to implement measures envisaged in this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is a bit early.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is a bit loud; I can hear him away down here at the end of the House without benefit of a microphone. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has been here for a considerable time and has fantastic experience. He seems to have the happy knack of taking the attitude that if you agree with him you are on the side of the angels; if you "love something to death" that is not good, and if you are opposed to him you are not singing with the angels but are probably in a different choir. I have watched the hon. member work through the question period, notices of motions and private members' bills. Much of what he does is good because it prods what he may think is the sleeping giant, namely, the government. But sometimes he holds out what I feel might be false hopes to the general public. It is at times like these when we feel we should participate or perhaps draw rein.

Mr. Speaker, during World War I there was a group known affectionately as the Old Contemptibles. I am not suggesting the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre fits that particular phraseology but I suggest it might be more appropriate, when I hear him talk from time to time, to refer to him as the "old predictable." I might even be kind enough to remove the adjective "old". I say "predictable" because the hon. member, in respect of bills, motions, questions or suggestions, invariably takes a piece of legislation that is already on the books and suggests changes such as more money being spent, longer or shorter qualifying periods depending on which happens to suit the mood, longer and larger benefits, higher standards, and so on.

In so far as the hon. member is concerned, he is on pretty safe ground by taking this approach because he and his party, at least until this time, have no financial accountability to this House. His party does not have to raise the revenue to pay for the kind of things that he would like to see. Quite frankly, many of the things he would like to see I would like to see also.

Another somewhat unhappy response to some of the hon. member's suggestions—I am not suggesting it is true of this one—is that they fit a particular mould and hold out a kind of false hope to individuals who, when they get a certain figure or grant, a certain raise or receive a certain pension may, through hearing the hon. member and because of the respect and esteem with which he is held in this House, feel that in effect that is what they should have received in the first place. This holds out the kind of false hope which may make them feel a little unhappy about their present circumstances.

Whether it be this particular piece of legislation or others, all of us have hobby-horses which we like to ride around. Sometimes we like to try them out on a political platform, when speaking on radio or television, at committee meetings or during what are referred to colloquially as "bull sessions." I doubt if there is anyone in this House who would not like to see the basic income tax exemption go up to $2,500 for single persons and $5,000 for married couples. But when you look at what this would cost in terms of revenue and, more importantly not so much what it would cost the taxpayers of Canada but what it would cost someone in the $6,000 tax bracket, you realize you have to separate the wheat from the chaff and that you have to make difficult decisions which, unhappily, do not appeal to the single man making $2,500 or the married man making $5,000. Sooner or later a responsible decision must be made.

There are other suggestions which are analogous to the bill before us. There are suggestions that old age pensions should be increased to $125 per month and that the guaranteed income supplement should be over and above that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): One hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. Cullen: Well, I think the hon. member just spent about $3 billion in that little phrase. I do not think he or anyone else is irresponsible in suggesting that this is a target at which we should be shooting. But I think we must remind the average citizen of the other side of the coin, that is, that there are 800,000 or 900,000 people over the age of 65 who are probably drawing the guaranteed income supplement now, and if my statistics are correct I would say there are in the neighbourhood of 1,800,000 or 1,900,000 over age 65. So in recognizing our responsibility not only to the older generation but to the taxpayer who is footing a large portion of the bill, we must be realistic.

Mr. Speaker, we have a suggestion which I believe is a good one. It is the kind of representation or presentation for which the hon. member is well known because it is the kind of move that prods the government. It is not the sort of thing that would cost the taxpayer any great amount of money, and it would not be prohibitive in so far as the employer and people operating under these standards are concerned. This is the kind of legislation I am happy to see our Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) looking at. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already said that the legislation in respect of which he has moved an amendment has been given second reading and has been referred to the committee. So taking the subject matter of this bill, or the bill itself, and referring it to the committee is in my submission somewhat redundant because, in effect, if amendments are to be made, worked out and suggested by the hon. member, I suppose they could be made without the necessity of placing more paperwork before the committee but simply by his being there and making the suggestions or recommendations.

When the federal government moves in this area it is, after all, making moves regarding minimum standards. I emphasize the word "minimum" because, surely, we are setting up a framework for employers who, unhappily, in the past have not seen their way clear to do the kind of things suggested under the minimum standards legislation because had they done so there would not be any necessity to move this kind of legislation. I am not so young that I cannot think back to the 1930s when my father worked for a mining concern. He worked seven days a week during the winter. He never saw the light of day, because he went underground at a particular hour in the morning and came up at a particular hour in the evening. At no time did he see daylight. It was not portal to portal; it was from the time you reach your working place until the moment you leave it. Holidays were based on the Scrooge-like idea that you might get Christmas, but very seldom Boxing Day unless it fell on a Sunday.

So by dint of good legislation we have set down that no employees in Canada, particularly those under federal jurisdiction, have to worry about the Scrooge-like approach of the employer to the employee. Through the kind of legislation that we have before us—I am not referring specifically to the hon. member's bill but to the bill he chooses to amend—we are in effect setting minimum standards. These standards have to be set in conjunction with those set by the provinces. It is not our wish to unduly embarrass a province. In effect, we could move that certain action be taken which might prod a provincial government into moving in the right direction. If we do that in appropriate fashion, I think it is more beneficial to the worker: we will not have antagonism between the provinces and the federal government but the kind of co-operation that I would like to see when we deal with something as basic as minimum labour standards for the work force.

When I refer to minimum standards, although in effect we are only dealing with those who come under federal jurisdiction, the provincial legislation of course covers the other 90 per cent. It may be that through taking the lead with that 10 per cent our action can have a profound effect on the benefits which will eventually accrue to those in the provincial field.

I expect that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, after this legislation or something akin to it is passed, will be looking at ILO reports, as I have looked at them, and endeavouring to find other areas where our legislation might be a little weak and where we might try something new, not necessarily new to other countries but something that is new to Canada. When I was doing my research I was interested to find that one of the new developments in some countries is the practice of granting longer holidays based on age rather than length of service. This is the kind of innovative approach that I would like to see governments take. I would like to see them study it, as ILO and other organizations do and as our Department of Labour does.

My information is that when the Minister of Labour took over this portfolio he called in most, if not all, people from the department who then tried to figure out how we could grant the maximum possible benefits to the workers for whom we are responsible. All kinds of ideas were produced and splendid legislation came before the House and, I am happy to say reached the committee stage. They came before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration, where there seemed to be little controversy: the principle was accepted.

The Minister of Labour, through such legislation as the bill on unemployment insurance which is before us now, has taken an innovative approach. I was particularly impressed with the most recent legislation where he made provision for areas involving massive lay-offs and severance pay in a minimum standards bill, which would have been unheard of not too long ago.

I understand that in the Federal Republic of Germany—I assume it is the western section—the holiday legislation entitles workers over 35 to three extra days, and many collective agreements provide for further increases on the basis of age. In Luxembourg, workers over the age of 30 receive three extra days, and those over 38 six extra days.

So although the kind of legislation that I would like to see is not new, it could be new for Canada. As I said, I would not be the least bit surprised to see on the order paper very soon this kind of innovative legislation which is geared to helping the working man and to which I would lend my support. However, after the Department of Labour has made its study and brought in its recommendations for the length of annual vacation that is to be given and the qualifying period required—this must have taken a fair amount of study and probably much more research than I could have carried out—I would be interested to hear the recommendations made by departmental officials.

We must bear in mind that it is minimum standards at which we are looking, a guideline for employers, and anything we can do to prod the employer to help the working man would be to the good. No one would be opposed to that kind of approach.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has demonstrated a rare perseverance in once more advancing this proposal to provide workers under federal jurisdiction with three weeks' annual vacation after three years. I know that there would be a great deal of support in Canada for this concept. In some parts of our country such a proposal may be economically viable. It is certainly in line with our concept of social justice.

As other speakers in the debate have pointed out, consideration is being given at present to further amendments to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code in so far as it calls for holidays with pay. I thought the hon. member made a very useful speech the other day when he spoke to us of his concern for and, happily, of his general support for the amendments before Parliament now to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. He made one observation which is to be found on page 5241 of Hansard, referring to the amendments to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, which reads as follows:

> We must also remember that once this legislation is on the books, it will not apply to all the workers of Canada. It will only apply to those who are in industries that come under federal labour jurisdiction. This represents about 10 per cent of the work force. Perhaps it is a little higher if the public servants who are brought in by regulation are included, but it is still a very small section of the labour force of this country.

I think he made a useful comment when he said:

> For this to be universal, it would require constant agitation in all the provincial legislatures in order to get those bodies to bring in comparable legislation. It is quite true that it is in this place that a lead can be given. I hope the improvements that are before us tonight in this legislation will be noted by the legislatures of all the provinces and that they will make similar improvements.

Here is recognition by the hon. member that what we do here can give a lead to the country, particularly in the establishment of labour standards. We have seen this happen time and time again. A number of hon. members pointed out in an earlier debate the very beneficial effect that the establishment of a federal minimum wage in 1965 had on minimum wage standards from coast to coast in Canada. But the very fact that we create legislation here whose ultimate effect ranges totally beyond the workers under our federal jurisdiction means that we must bring to our development of such legislation an attitude of responsibility.

The other day we had a debate about the federal minimum wage which came under rather violent criticism from members of the socialist party. One hon. member said that $1.75 an hour was a totally inadequate minimum wage and that we had not even attempted to bring the Canadian worker up to the poverty line, or words to that effect. Hon. members are fully aware that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) would like to see a minimum wage very much higher than that, as would most members of the House, but we also know that in Canada as it exists today there is a diversity of economic problems. An unrealistically high minimum wage in one part of Canada might, if applied to another part of Canada, represent a realistic level. We know that if we peg the minimum wage at the level that most of us would support, this would create very great economic difficulties in some provinces. Apart from our own political difference here, we know this to be a fact.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The hon. member who is a former Premier of Saskatchewan knows that the Prairie provinces generally do not have as high wage levels as those which exist on the Pacific coast or in the province of Ontario. This is a fact that he had to live with as Premier of that great province. The other day, one of the Winnipeg hon. members became very self-righteous and alleged that $1.75 an hour is totally insufficient as a federal minimum standard; yet the province of Manitoba, I note, has a minimum wage of only $1.50. The same hon. member is critical of proposed increases in indemnities for Members of Parliament, yet a committee of the Manitoba legislature has just come out in support of a 100 per cent increase for members of that legislature.

We have to be logical; we have to be realistic; we have to be candid in some of our attitudes, and so it is with the standard that we have under discussion now. In some parts of Canada it is no doubt true that three years' service with the same employer could well support three weeks' annual holidays with pay each year, and most of us appreciate that fact. Certainly it is one of the hopes of the government, in respect of the amendments to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code which were given support in principle the other day, that the present standard will be improved. This is a matter which should come under discussion at the committee stage when we are considering those amendments to the code.

With only about one-tenth of the labour force in Canada coming under federal jurisdiction, we know that what we do in this place can have an influence with respect to the 90 per cent of employees who come under provincial jurisdiction, and we know that what we do here with respect to guaranteed holidays will be influential. While we want to be in the vanguard of social and labour reform, we must not set unrealistically high standards which cannot for the foreseeable time be emulated by many of the provinces.

I am rather bewildered by an apparent contradiction in some of the statements made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) in this debate and in the contribution that he made to the debate the other day in this House on second reading of the bill amending the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. I believe that at page 5245 of Hansard the hon. member is recorded as saying that his bill, C-41, was asking for 3 weeks' holidays after five years' service. Actually, his bill refers to three weeks' holidays after three years' service.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker; I wonder if the hon. member is aware of the fact that the error was mine? I got up the next day—and it can be seen under the item "Contents" of Hansard for April 27—and said that while I said five years, it should have been three years, and I had pleasure in pointing out it was not Hansard's error and was not a printer's error. It was actually mine, believe it or not.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, it is nice to know that the hon. member is fallible, as all of us are.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Stick around and you will learn quite a bit.

Mr. Perrault: In Bill C-228 amending the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, while it is true that the number of weeks of vacation is not modified—that is, two weeks after one year of service—in future employees who are terminated before 30 days of attachment to the employer would be entitled to 4 per cent of their earnings, while under the present wording of the code an employee receives nothing if he leaves his employer before the completion of the 30-day period.

While that improvement in the status of the worker is not of the type advanced in the bill that we have before us now, it does mark progress, and this is the essence of Bill C-228. It represents a number of important steps forward and it is encouraging to see how it has received the general support of the members of the House.

A review has been made on some of the standards that exist in the provinces. To indicate the great diversity of standards as they exist now perhaps it would be useful to review them briefly once again. Annual vacations with pay have been provided for by law in the industries subject to federal labour jurisdiction since 1958. The first federal law, the Annual Vacations Act, required employers within its scope to grant their employees paid vacations of one week after one year of employment and two weeks after two years of service. This act was replaced by part III of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code which provides for a vacation with pay of at least two weeks after every completed year of employment. Vacation pay is 4 per cent of wages for the year in which employees establish their claim to a vacation. We are moving now, through the proposed amendments to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, to improve many of these code provisions.

A year of employment under the federal law must be continuous with one employer and may be a 12-month period commencing with the day the employee began to work for the employer, any subsequent anniversary of that date, or it may be a calendar year or another year approved by the Minister of Labour. All provinces have annual vacations' legislation although, as we know historically, we have not had recognition of the social desirability and need for vacations for all that long a period of time.

The Newfoundland act, as I understand it, has not yet been proclaimed in effect. The provisions regarding annual vacations with pay are contained in the Alberta Labour Act and in two orders under it, a general order and a special order for the construction industry; in the Ontario Employment Standards Act and regulations, in Quebec minimum wage orders and in the Saskatchewan Labour Standards Act, part I, and regulations.

British Columbia now provides for annual vacations with pay and public holidays in one statute, the Annual and General Holidays Act. The other five provinces have separate annual vacations laws. Vacation with pay provisions are also contained in most decrees under the Quebec Collective Agreement Decrees Act and the Construction Industry Labour Relations Act. Some industrial standards schedules make provision for pay in lieu of annual vacations.

The Canada Labour (Standards) Code applies to industries within federal jurisdiction and the only employees excluded are those who are managers or superintendents or who exercise management functions, and members of the medical, dental, architectural, engineering, legal and scientific professions.

The provincial laws govern employees in employment within the jurisdiction of the provinces, with the exception of the following classes of employees. The Newfoundland act provides for the exemption of employees or classes of employees by order of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. No regulations have yet been made. Farm workers are excluded in all provinces. Perhaps that is an area in which we will have to move in the future, just as we have moved in the matter of unemployment insurance. In addition, British Columbia excludes persons employed in horticulture; Manitoba and Saskatchewan, in ranching and market gardening. In Ontario, workers in certain occupations related to farming are covered—for example, raising of fur-bearing animals, egg-grading, greenhouse and nursery operations, the growing of flowers for the retail and wholesale trade, silviculture, tree trimming and surgery.

Similarly, in Saskatchewan the act applies to egg hatcheries, greenhouses and nurseries, and bush clearing operations.

We have reviewed the situation all across the country. We can see the great diversity of economic pursuits in this country and the difficulty which often exists for a federal government to establish norms which can be emulated at some time within the foreseeable future, and just as in the matter of federal minimum wages we have to establish realistic standards relating to holidays with pay. We are making a good deal of progress in this field, despite the feeling we all have at times that we are not going quickly enough and despite the frustration of those impatient for change.

The movement in favour of the granting of annual holidays with pay is characterized by a very slow, initial period starting some 60 or 70 years ago, followed by a period of rapidly spreading recognition of the right of workers to paid holidays. The practice of granting vacations to state officials and public employees, which was current in a number of countries in the nineteenth century, began to be followed at the turn of the century by certain private employers on an extremely limited scale.

These early measures were soon reflected by the adoption of holiday legislation applying to some categories of workers such as apprentices, women workers, salaried employees or persons employed in shops. Following the First World War came the first legislation entitling workers in general to an annual holiday with pay. Yet by 1934, really a short time ago relatively speaking, there were only 12 countries with holiday legislation applying to wage and salary earners in general, and in countries where these matters were regulated by collective agreements it was not by any means the general practice to grant holidays by such voluntary action.

However, from 1936 on—the date of the adoption of the first, trail-blazing convention on the subject—there was a pronounced impetus in the movement favouring entitlement to holidays. Since then the right to annual vacations has come to be recognized by law or has become part of the normal practice in practically all countries, except in some small territories or countries where there are few wage earners. This progress in regard to annual holidays has not been limited to the geographical extension of the principle. Considerable advance has also taken place during the past 30 years in the minimum duration of annual leave. Increases from one to three weeks or even more are not unusual, and there has been considerable advance in the conditions subject to which holidays are granted.

I know that it may not be possible at this time to implement the meritorious proposal which has been advanced by the hon. member. Surely in the future we will need to evolve a method to distribute the undoubted benefits of the new technology and of cybernation so that the workers of Canada and elsewhere will benefit from these great advances. We may find, 20 years from now, that three weeks' holiday for three years of service with one employer will be regarded as conservative in the extreme. I spell "conservative" there with a small "c".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear! It is not even "liberal" with a small "l".

Mr. Perrault: One writer said the other day that in the future we face oceans of leisure time. But we must distribute that time. Inevitably that will mean shorter working hours and more holidays for the worker. Nevertheless, I am not standing here as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour and attempting to advance the proposal that Canada, now, should unilaterally provide for infinitely longer holidays and a massive redistribution of "leisure time" for workers. Unilateral action is clearly impossible because of the competitive economic situation and because of the competitive aspects of world trade. Nevertheless, we must come to grips with the fact that more and more people are going to be on the planet and that more and more technology will be applied to the productive process. We must come to grips ultimately with these economic facts of life, and we must be able to equate technological progress with better living conditions for the people and with more opportunities for people to enjoy the world into which they have been born. Unless we can do all that, we shall face a very real crisis indeed. Those facts must be recognized.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been made this afternoon about the idea that although only about one-tenth of the labour force in Canada is under federal jurisdiction and the remaining 90 per cent under provincial jurisdiction, labour legislation passed here in Ottawa nevertheless has far greater mathematical importance in the country than those figures would indicate, because not only does it affect the one-tenth of the labour force that it governs but it shows the way to the provinces and generally establishes the lead for the provinces to follow in a fairly short time.

I was interested in the opening remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who spoke of the appropriateness of dealing with a bill like this immediately after the government business which the House has been considering during the last two days. I was quite struck by the appropriateness of the circumstance that federal legislation in this field may give a lead, and I hope that the government of Manitoba—which is not considering an independent report dealing with the indemnities of members of the provincial legislature—an independent report that recommends an increase of 100 per cent—will consider that lead. That government is led by that great Social Democrat Ed Schreyer.

Mr. Bell: Explain.

Mr. Mahoney: I hope that that government will follow the moderation that the federal government has taken in its approach to the problem of salaries of members of this place. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we will observe with interest the way in which the Manitoba government deals with the report that it has in its hand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Mahoney: The report recommends salaries of $14,400 a year for people who, generally speaking, sit for about ten weeks, although last year, admittedly, they had a five-month session.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is only a report.

Mr. Mahoney: Yes. The Beaupré report was only a report, too.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That report was thrown out.

Mr. Mahoney: As I say, I hope that the government of Manitoba in dealing with that report will exercise the discretion and moderation that the federal government has shown in dealing with the report that it considered.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. Since we are coming to the weekend I wish to make a few remarks, if hon. members will bear with me. First, may I remind hon. members of the grim reality that April is ending and that the deadline for filing income tax is approaching. May I urge hon. members, in view of what will take place tomorrow, to have a restful evening, to go to sleep early and to sleep long and then to join the thousands of citizens of Ottawa and the district who will march from Parliament Hill tomorrow morning at nine o'clock in the March for Millions. Finally, I express the innocent wish that the coming days of May will prove that spring is not far away.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

NATIONAL SECURITY

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE ON LEGISLATION TO DEAL WITH EMERGENCIES CAUSED BY LAWLESSNESS OR VIOLENCE

On the order: Government Notices of Motions:

April 30, 1971—The President of the Privy Council:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons be appointed to examine, inquire into and report upon the nature and kind of legislation required to deal with emergencies that may arise from time to time in the future by reason of lawlessness or violence in Canadian Society and that endanger the existence of government or the maintenance of the peace and public order:

That twelve members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the House at a later date, be members of the joint committee on the part of this House;

That the committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House;

That the committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee;

And that a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours thereof.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21, this motion is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders at the next sitting of the House.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

MILITARY SHIPMENTS TO SOUTH AFRICA

Question No. 175—Mr. Rowland:

1. What was the total value of military spare parts shipments from Canada to South Africa in each year 1963 through 1969 inclusive?

2. What is the projected total value of similar shipments for 1970?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. In accordance with its responsibility for administering the Export and Import Permits Act, the following are total values of the export permits issued, approving the export of material described under Group 7 of the Export Control List (Arms, Munitions, Military, Naval or Air Stores), during the years 1963-1969:

Year	Value (Thousand Dollars)
1963	$1,223.2
1964	124.4
1965	547.1
1966	1,813.5
1967	1,113.7
1968	3,735.0
1969	1,904.8

The Department does not maintain records of actual shipments made against these export permits.

2. The total value of military spare parts for 1970 for which export permits were issued amounted to $1,249.7 (thousand).

SUGAR INDUSTRY

Question No. 657—Mr. Watson:

1. Have two citizen's recourses been filed by Jacques Carrière et al under the Combines Investigation Act and, if so, will the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs expand the scope of such enquiry into the sugar industry to cover the competitive role in the Canadian sugar trade by Cartier Refined Sugars Limited prior to and after 1965?

2. How is the amount of the Canadian supply of raw sugar determined and using the 1969 supply of raw sugar, what percentage was supplied by (a) Australia (b) Mauritius (c) the Republic of South Africa (d) Cuba?

3. Was the tonnage of raw sugar supplied by Cuba to Canada in 1969 close to the tonnage supplied in the year that legal action was taken against the Eastern Canadian Sugar Industry under the Combines Investigation Act?

4. Will the Minister consider requesting the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to investigate this situation?

5. Is the Minister considering changes in anti-combines legislation to deal more effectively with cartel and restrictive trade practices taking place outside Canadian boundaries and which affect Canadian pricing arrangements?

Questions

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: 1. It is not the policy to disclose either the names of applicants or applications for inquiries under the Combines Investigation Act. However, in response to question No. 2039 (Hansard, April 30, 1969, at pages 8161-8162) it was stated that since it was a matter of public knowledge, an application by Roberta Gray et al relating to the sugar industry in Eastern Canada had been received. To the extent that coverage of the competitive role in the Canadian sugar trade by Cartier Refined Sugar Limited prior to and after 1965 is relevant to the subject of the application, it will be given consideration.

2. The Canadian supply of raw sugar is determined by companies processing this product based on consumer demand in Canada. The percentage of raw sugar imported in 1969 was as follows: Australia, 23.2 per cent; Mauritius, 21.5 per cent; South Africa, 22.9 per cent; Cuba, 7.6 per cent.

3. No. Quantity of raw sugar imported from Cuba in 1962 when proceedings were instituted and 1963 when convictions were registered was 15,904 and 69,726 short tons respectively. In 1969 the quantity was 79,379 short tons.

4. See answer to 1.

5. Such matters are receiving consideration in the revision of the anti-combines legislation which is presently under study.

RCMP FILES ON COMMUNIST ACTIVITIES

Question No. 790—Mr. Harkness:

1. Are RCMP files on communist activities in Canada kept permanently or are they destroyed after so many years and, if so, what is the time period?

2. Were any of these files destroyed in 1966-67-68 and, if so, on whose orders?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): 1 and 2. It is not in the public interest to disclose this information.

SECONDING MEMBERS OF CANADIAN UNIVERSITIES AND INDUSTRY TO MISSIONS IN ASIA

Question No. 1,066—Mr. Rowland:

Is the government, in its intention to devote greater attention to nations on the Pacific Rim, considering any or all of the following programs (a) financial assistance to universities to enable them to establish Pacific Rim area study programs and courses of instruction in the languages of the Pacific Rim nations (b) incentive grants to students enrolled in intermediate and advanced study of Chinese, Hindi, Malay-Indonesian, Bengali, Japanese, Vietnamese and other languages of the area (c) seconding appropriately trained faculty members of Canadian universities to Canadian missions in Asia (d) seconding promising young executives from commercial, industrial and financal concerns to trade missions in Asia?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of the Secretary of State, External Affairs and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: (a) and (b) No. (c) Yes. (d) As stated in the papers entitled "Foreign Policy for Canadians" tabled in Parliament on June 25, 1970, the Government is considering programs that would provide for secondments between the foreign service, government departments and the business sector.

[Mr. Watson.]

PEI—GRANTS UNDER PEI DEVELOPMENT PLAN

Question No. 1,081—Mr. McQuaid:

1. Since March 7, 1969, what was the total amount paid by the Government of Canada to the Government of Prince Edward Island under the Prince Edward Island Development Plan?

2. What amount was by way of (a) loan (b) grant?

3. Were the payments made by the federal government earmarked for any particular purpose or for any particular department and, if so, what are the details?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The answer for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to February 28, 1971, is: 1. $18,145,930.

2. (a) $1,891,000; (b) $16,254,930.

3. Yes.

	Contributions	Loans
Resource Adjustment and Development	$2,611,781	$ 891,000
Social Development	435,318
Resource Supporting and Commercial Services	3,708,391	1,000,000
Implementation	1,649,440
Development Grant	7,850,000

REBATE OF DUTY COLLECTED ON IMPORTED GOODS FROM CARIBBEAN COUNTRIES

Question No. 1,090—Mr. Robinson:

1. Is there a program in operation whereby duty collected on imported goods from Caribbean countries is rebated to these countries and, if so (a) since what date (b) how much has been rebated during each year since the inception of the program?

2. On what commodities is duty rebated and what is the amount rebated on each?

3. What is the estimated rebate on each commodity for (a) 1971 (b) for the duration of the present system of rebate?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1, 2 and 3. There is no program in operation whereby duty collected on imported goods from Caribbean countries is rebated to these countries. However, since 1967 Canada has made payments to Governments of those Commonwealth Caribbean countries that export sugar to Canada equal in value to the amount of customs duties collected on raw sugar imported therefrom to Canada. Payments have been made each year in the following amounts: 1967, $1,126,904.95; 1968, $1,148,259.63; 1969, $823,735.10; 1970, $262,496.04. The level of the annual payment is determined by the amount of duty paid by Canadian sugar importers on Caribbean sugar during a particular year. It is not possible to give an accurate estimate of the size of payments which may be made in 1971.

ADMINISTRATION OF CANADIAN SALTFISH CORPORATION

Question No. 1,105—Mr. Peddle:

1. What was the breakdown of the cost of administration of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation since its inception?

2. Who are the employees of the Canadian Saltfish Corporation; their positions; their salaries?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): 1 and 2. It has not been the practice, nor is it considered to be appropriate to require Crown Corporations to divulge information that is basically related to their internal management and administration. This is quite distinct from giving information with regard to general policy which the Corporation may follow in major matters. It is expected, however, that information on the cost of administration in its first year will be reflected in the first annual report of the Corporation. Publication at this time of that information would be premature in view of sales negotiations now in progress.

NUMBER OF RCMP INVOLVED IN ARREST UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

Question No. 1,198—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. What is the number of Royal Canadian Mounted Police personnel who participated in the arrests relevant to the War Measures Act and the Public Order Act in 1970 and 1971 to date?

2. How many actual arrests were carried out by RCMP personnel under the War Measures Act and the Public Order Act?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): 1 and 2. Up to 190 members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in co-operation with the Montreal City and Quebec Provincial Police and under the authority of the Director, Quebec Provincial Police, assisted in the relevant arrests. Only two arrests were made directly by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

RCMP—OPERATIONS OF SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE DIVISION

Question No. 1,199—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

1. Is there a budget item or operational description of the operations of the Security and Intelligence Division of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and, if not, for what reason?

2. What is the total cost of security and intelligence operations within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

3. Are there other agencies of government which carry on similar activities or assist in this regard?

4. What is the official and general description of the operations of Security and Intelligence?

5. What is the number of prison security officials who have been remanded or suspended for reasons of discipline or incompetence on their behalf during the 1969, 1970 and 1971 operating years?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): 1, 2, 3 and 4. The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the main federal operational and investigative body in the field of security. Such authority—there is no explicit statutory authority—as does exist is derived from certain sections of the R.C.M. Police Act. It would not be in the public interest to divulge any further information in this connection.

5. January 1 to December 31, 1969, 100; January 1 to December 31, 1970, 98; January 1 to March 15, 1971, 32. Total, 230.

DREE—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO QUEBEC

Question No. 1,227—Mr. Rodrigue:

Has a $37.5 million loan been granted to the Province of Quebec by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to finance new projects in special areas and, if so (a) at what rate of interest (b) what is the duration of such loan?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Not one loan, but the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will provide loans for individual projects totalling up to $37.5 millions. (a) The rate of interest on these loans will vary according to a formula specified in Section 9 of the Special Areas agreement with Quebec. (b) The duration of loans will vary for individual projects, ranging from 15 to 30 years.

PORTNEUF CONSTITUENCY—INVESTMENT IN HOUSING

Question No. 1,257—Mr. Godin:

For each of the past ten years, how much did (a) Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (b) Industrial Development Bank invest in housing in the constituency of Portneuf?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): (a) See table attached. Note: Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation statistical data are not recorded on the basis of Federal Electoral Constituencies. The table, therefore, presents data for the Municipal County of Portneuf. (b) None.

Net loans for housing[1] approved by CMHC under the NHA Municipal County of Portneuf 1961-1970

INFORMATION CANADA

Question No. 1,263—Mr. Mather:

1. How does Information Canada intend to carry out its "Federal Presence Program"?

2. What specific research projects, publications or other devices are being used to inform the public better on federalism and federal services?

Orders for Returns

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): 1. The object of the "Federal presence" or "federalism" program is to encourage Canadians to take a more active part both in informing themselves on the nature and operation of social ond political structures of the country and in participating in their development. To this end, Information Canada, will produce some information through exhibitions, films and the printed word to focus thought on Canada, its regions, its people and its national institutions. It will also give any encouragement within its power to the federal service, to business and industry, voluntary organizations or individuals concerned with achieving a greater public awareness of Canadian identity.

2. No research projects in this field are under way. In course of preparation are: (a) a publication on how parliament works being written in consultation with representatives of all federal political parties; (b) a series of pamphlets on services of the federal government; (c) an animated film being produced by the National Film Board which touches on themes of government in a pluralistic society; (d) a series of exhibitions touching upon pluralism, the federal constitution and federal services.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INADEQUACY OF GOVERNMENT POLICIES IN PROVIDING EMPLOYMENT ALLEGED BY MEMBER FOR DUVERNAY

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 26 I ask leave to move the adjournment of the House to discuss a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration. This matter arises out of the statement made yesterday by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Kierans), in further explanation of his resignation from the government, that the policies of the government are completely inadequate for the purpose of providing employment for the hundreds of thousands of people without jobs. The resignation of the hon. member and the reasons given by him for that resignation accentuate the urgency of an immediate debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Peace River has filed with the Chair the notice required under Standing Order 26. In the brief statement which the hon. member has just made he proposes an emergency debate on the policies of the government in respect of unemployment, or employment, as the case may be.

As hon. members know, there have been many occasions during the current session when hon. members have debated the government's economic policies and in particular the employment situation. In the circumstances, I do not think that the matter proposed for discussion relates to a genuine emergency calling for immediate and urgent consideration, as required by the Standing Order.

As the hon. member knows, the Standing Order also requires the Chair to take into account the opportunity of debate within a reasonable time by other means than an emergency debate. It seems to me that there will be many such opportunities and that there is a probability that the matter will be discussed within a reasonable time by other means.

The Chair must rule, therefore, that Standing Order 26 does not apply to the circumstances alluded to by the hon. member for Peace River.

WANT OF CONFIDENCE IN GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC POLICIES EXPRESSED BY MEMBER FOR DUVERNAY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I am a little fearful about moving this motion in view of your ruling, but I will none the less. I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the want of confidence in the government's economic policies raised by the former Minister of Communications in statements following his resignation from the cabinet.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South has also given the Chair notice of his intention to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26. With respect, I think I should suggest, as he has already gathered, that the comments just made by the Chair are in many ways applicable to the motion proposed by the hon. member.

The hon. member proposes a debate which is essentially a non-confidence motion. In this respect I would think his proposal is different from that of the hon. member for Peace River, but again I would not think that in itself makes it more justifiable under the terms of Standing Order 26.

As the hon. member knows, want of confidence motions are normally proposed for consideration by the House on the occasion of the Throne Speech debate, on budget debates, or in connection with supply motions. Since a budget debate can reasonably be anticipated within the very near future, and since there are still a considerable number of supply days available to hon. members between now and the end of the current supply period, I do not think the Chair would be justified in suggesting that an adjournment motion ought to be entertained for the purpose of a debate which would be essentially a non-confidence motion.

Inquiries of the Ministry

As hon. members know, I do not normally like referring to the fact that these supply motions are still available to hon. members, but it may be that we have just about reached that point in our proceedings where it becomes difficult for the Chair not to take into account the fact that between now and the end of the current supply period there are 13 supply motions available to hon. members.

I have also indicated the possibility of a budget debate. The Chair has no special knowledge that other hon. members who are not members of the government do not have, but I have to rely on some of the suggestions or statements which have been made in this respect by the Minister of Finance.

For these reasons I would not think it would be in order to accept this motion under Standing Order 26 for debate today.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON EXPORTS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question relating to the level of the Canadian dollar as it is now almost a year since he announced the floating of the dollar. I do not think it is at all argumentative to suggest that this has had serious consequences for our exports, particularly of manufactured goods. Is it the minister's policy to let nature take its course with respect to the level of the dollar or does he intend to announce a policy regarding the level of the dollar in relation to other currencies?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, any statement regarding the repegging of the Canadian dollar would, of course, be made in the normal manner.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I remind the minister that he has been saying this for nearly a year. While I understand his position, I should like to ask whether in the near future the House can expect a statement of government policy by the minister regarding the Canadian dollar in order that hon. members and the country, particularly people in business, will have some indication as to what the aim of the government is? Will he be making such a statement?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend can normally expect me to make comments on this when I make a budget speech in the House.

Mr. Stanfield: When may we expect the minister's budget speech, and will the minister give the assurance that in the course of his speech he will make a statement as to the aim and policy of the government in respect of the level of the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Benson: I do not think my hon. friend can expect a budget speech this month. When I do make the budget speech, presumably next month, I will be making comments on this very important matter.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—QUEBEC BORROWINGS IN UNITED STATES—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIER

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, in view of the problems associated with the position of the Canadian dollar I should like to ask whether the Minister of Finance has had any direct communication with the province of Quebec, particularly in view of the program announced by the Prime Minister of that province over the weekend involving a potentially large inflow of United States dollars which might very well affect the status of the Canadian dollar?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not had any direct contact with the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec on this particular matter. However, I have urged all provinces to do as much borrowing as possible in Canada. With regard to the particular matter raised by my hon. friend, of course the influence on the Canadian dollar would depend on the period of time over which there was an inflow of capital in this regard.

LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT OF TAX PROPOSALS—DISCUSSION WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS AT FORTHCOMING CONFERENCE

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that a number of provincial premiers are very concerned about the value of the Canadian dollar and because so many of the tax proposals the minister may bring in will certainly affect the dollar, is it the intention of the minister or of the government to discuss any of these tax proposals and any questions concerning the dollar at the next conference with the provincial premiers or is the conference to be limited to constitutional matters?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at this time I have not seen the agenda for the meeting of the prime ministers and premiers. However, this matter will be discussed with the provincial treasurers when I meet with them. With regard to the matter of tax proposals, it is our intention after the budget speech and the legislation are presented to have a meeting with the provincial treasurers and ministers of finance at that time in order to discuss the specific proposals included in the budget presentation of the government.

METHOD OF MAKING INCOME TAX CHANGES

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he can now indicate when the amendments to the income tax legislation will be introduced in the House or will they be related to the budget presentation to which he has already made reference?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I think they will probably be related to the budget presentation I have mentioned which would be some time after the end of this month.

[Mr. Benson.]

LEVEL OF FOREIGN CURRENCY RESERVES—USE TO PURCHASE PROVINCIAL AND MUNICIPAL SECURITIES HELD IN UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Finance. Since one of the reasons given for unpegging the Canadian dollar was the large amount of foreign currency reserves we were required to maintain and as those reserves are much larger now, is the government planning to make any use of these reserves? I understand we have already purchased some of the federal securities held in the United States. Is the minister planning to ask for any amendments to permit the government to obtain provincial and municipal securities held in the United States?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, although these reserves have risen somewhat beyond the level at the time the dollar was unpegged, they have not risen materially in this period. If one takes into account the forward commitments of the government at the time the dollar was unpegged, the government has not interfered materially in the valuation of the Canadian dollar as it would in the foreign exchange markets. With regard to the changes in the legislation for use of these reserves, I have no present intention to ask Parliament for this.

TIME REQUIRED TO ACHIEVE FULL EMPLOYMENT ON BASIS OF PRESENT POLICIES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance to tell the House whether the government has some estimates as to the time it will take to arrive at full employment, as defined by the Economic Council of Canada, on the basis of the policies the government has undertaken?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I am not sure the Economic Council of Canada did define full employment, although I understand one of my hon. friend's colleagues did define it as 4 per cent. We will work toward this throughout this year and the following year.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I corrected the Prime Minister on that the other day and I would have thought the Minister of Finance would have heard it. He ought not to suggest that we suggest 4 per cent. On the basis of the Economic Council of Canada's suggestion of 3 per cent as the maximum unemployment we should have in Canada as a full employment policy, I think it is important for the House and the country to know whether the government has any estimates to indicate how long the Minister of Finance thinks it will take us to reach at least a 3 per cent unemployment rate?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, when one is talking in this area one is forecasting into the future in a way the Minister of Finance does not normally do in the House of Commons except during his budget presentation. When I make my budget presentation I will indicate what the expected unemployment should be throughout the year, just as I did last year.

Mr. Stanfield: Just as clearly?

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the Minister of Finance whether he intends to produce amendments to the existing Income Tax Act or to produce a completely revised act, and whether that is the reason for the long delay in the presentation of the budget into the month of June, which is not usual?

Mr. Benson: All I can say is that there will be substantial changes to the present income tax legislation.

Mr. Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Huron on a supplementary question and then go to the hon. member for Bellechasse and next to the hon. member for St. John's East who wishes to ask a supplementary to a prior question.

ASSISTANCE TO EXPORT INDUSTRIES BECAUSE OF FLOATING DOLLAR

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Can the Minister of Finance advise the House whether or not the government has approved and provided any financial assistance to those export industries which have been severely hurt by the floating dollar, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said the government would?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): What I have indicated is that there are assistance programs in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to aid industry which is hurt by particular actions of the government in this regard.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF TAXES TO INCREASE PURCHASING POWER

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance.

Following the statement made by Mr. Arthur Smith, chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, that Canada should find new programs to increase the spending power of Canadians, will the minister recommend a reduction in taxes which affect chiefly the small taxpayers so as to improve their spending power?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I think that the programs we announced last December, including the putting of $200 million this year into the hands of old age pensioners, will help the purchasing power of consumers.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

While realizing that some progress has been made in this field, would the minister recommend another policy, in addition to the $200 million already announced, to give small taxpayers a better chance?

[English]

Mr. Benson: In my proposals put forward in the white paper on tax reform there was a substantial shift in the tax burden from the taxpayer in the lower bracket. We have not had very many useful suggestions beyond that from the opposition.

LEVEL OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—CONSULTATION WITH GOVERNMENTS OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES ON ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In light of the evidence produced by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council to the effect that the appreciation of the Canadian dollar is a major deterrent to the economic recovery of the Atlantic provinces, does the government intend to consult with the governments of the Atlantic provinces with a view to assisting affected industries which are currently being inhibited in their growth plans as a consequence thereof? Perhaps the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion could assist the minister in this regard.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The reason for the strength of the Canadian dollar is the extreme success that this government has had in its policy of encouraging exports, and for the first time in recent history we are running a current account surplus in Canada, so there is pressure on the Canadian dollar.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—WASHINGTON MEETING—SUGGESTED FORMAL PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs in either capacity, whether the government officials at today's talks in Washington are expressing the position that Canada must be a formal party to the discussions on the initiation of the TAPS route or any other route?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the meetings that are being held in Washington is to discuss the concerns that we have about the ecological dangers that arise from the building of this pipeline, and we will be discussing with the United States how best the interests of the Pacific coast of Canada and the United States can be protected.

Mr. Woolliams: Perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs did not quite get the import of my question. What I am asking is whether those officials are expressing the position that Canada must be a formal party—I mean formal party—to the discussions on the initiation of the TAPS route or any other route?

Mr. Sharp: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, this is a decision that has to be made by the United States. We are making our representations on the dangers that arise out of the building of that pipeline, none of which will pass through Canada or through any part of Canadian waters. Therefore it is important that the United States should know now what the views of the Canadian government are about the dangers involved in the pollution of the seas and probably the pollution of Canadian land.

Mr. Woolliams: In view of the 210,000 gallon diesel oil spill on the west coast of the United States, with evidence of traces of the oil being found as far north as the Juan de Fuca area, I would like to ask the minister whether the government officials are expressing the position that the Canadian government cannot give its support to the TAPS route on the basis of any present research, particularly since the Acting Prime Minister's former colleague says it will take several years to come up with a decision in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I understand the purport of the question, but if the hon. member is saying he shares the views of the Canadian government about the dangers connected with building the TAPS line, then I am all with him.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—NEGOTIATIONS ON CONTINENTAL ENERGY POLICY

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the United States is very keen on a continental energy policy, and in view of the fact that on the other hand we are very much concerned about the effects that the TAPS line will have on the ecology of Canada, will he indicate to the United States authorities that if they proceed with this line this will jeopardize any negotiations we may have on energy?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that in a matter like this threats get one very far. I am quite sure that in the United States there is the same concern about the ecological dangers of building that line as there is in Canada. It is most important that all of us should make this concern known which, as I say, I think is shared by the people of the western United States as well.

Mr. Saltsman: Since wringing of hands has not done much good, perhaps the Acting Prime Minister might do well to try something more positive.

EFFECTS OF PROPOSED QUEBEC, JAMES BAY HYDRO-ELECTRIC PROJECT

Mr. Jacques-L. Trudel (Montreal-Bourassa): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Does the government intend to appoint a commission to inquire into the possible environmental damage as well as pollution resulting from the construction of the dam, a project which will probably affect more than one province in the Far North and which has been announced by the premier of Quebec?

ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION

DISCUSSION WITH CHAIRMAN OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON EXPANDING TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the President of the Privy Council, as government House leader, whether, following the intervention of the Prime Minister on Friday, he has had the usual frank and fruitful discussion with the chairman of the Special Committee on Environmental Pollution with regard to expanding the terms of reference of that committee to include not only an examination of the situation on the Pacific coast along the TAPS route but the alternative route along the Mackenzie Valley and the problems affecting the aboriginal rights of the native people, and if not that committee has any other committee been selected?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to discuss the matter with the Prime Minister since he made his answer in the House on Friday. I will look forward to that discussion with anticipation.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON WASHINGTON MEETING OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN OFFICIALS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, since I am sure the Acting Prime Minister will agree that information is one of the things required with regard to the proposed TAPS route, will he assure the House that a report will be made to it this week as to the findings of the group of officials who are representing Canada in Washington at these discussions?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I can undertake to make a report on their behalf.

NATURAL RESOURCES

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Would the Acting Prime Minister indicate whether any progress has been made in the negotiations with the provinces on the question of offshore mineral rights and, if so, would he indicate whether we may expect legislation on this matter prior to the end of this session?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take that question as notice.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the President of the Privy Council. In view of his interest in this matter and in view of the fact that he is responsible for the programming of government business, can he tell the House whether legislation will be introduced before June on the question of offshore mineral rights?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, at present there is no plan to introduce legislation on offshore mineral rights before the end of June.

INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT OF LE DAIN COMMISSION—INVESTIGATION OF NEWS LEAK INVOLVING INTERIM REPORT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Can he give the House any indication when we may expect the final report of the Le Dain commission to be made public?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I cannot, other than to indicate that I did have a conversation with Dean Le Dain and he indicated that his projection that it would be available some time during June has turned out to be premature. I am not expecting it until later.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary relates to a question I have had on the order paper since October 8, more than six months ago, relating to an investigation that I presume was conducted by the minister into a news leak of the interim report of the Le Dain Commission. I have raised this matter a number of times in the House, and on each occasion I have been promised that it would be looked into. Can the minister indicate when the report of that inquiry will be made public?

Mr. Munro: I will endeavour to have that question answered very shortly, Mr. Speaker.

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

ALLEGED PARTICIPATION OF MEMBER IN SOCIAL CONTESTATION IN LAFLÈCHE

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Has he received a telegram from Laflèche Mayor Gerard Philips protesting against the behaviour of an official of the Company of Young Canadians, on the South Shore of Montreal, and, if so, can the minister say what position he intends to take concerning this matter?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Indeed I have received a message, Mr. Speaker, and I met with the Director General of the Company of Young Canadians at noon today.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Godin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Secretary of State a supplementary question.

Can he tell us whether it is really the policy of the Company of Young Canadians to occupy lots and buildings not belonging to them merely in order to express what they call social dissension?

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, the question does not seem very appropriate in view of the fact that out of several hundred people there was exactly one volunteer from the Company of Young Canadians and it seems to me that one person alone cannot occupy very much space.

HEALTH

FINANCING OF NURSING HOMES—INCLUSION ON AGENDA OF FEDEDAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—AMENDMENT OF ACT

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In his absence last Thursday his parliamentary secretary took it as notice. Will the financing of nursing home care be placed on the agenda of the upcoming federal-provincial conference, or is the government going to introduce an amendment to the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act so that there will be federal assistance for nursing homes across the country?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act provides for cost sharing for the chronically ill and the convalescent, so that can be taken care of now. So far as custodial care in terms of nursing homes is concerned, there are no plans for cost sharing in that regard, nor have I had any request that it be placed on the agenda.

Mr. Ryan: Will the minister consider taking some initiative on the matter in the immediate future in view of the action taken by the province of Ontario?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would indicate that in terms of the discussions that are now going on between the federal government and the provinces on cost sharing across the whole health field, this matter is bound to arise.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

TIME OF INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Would the minister say whether he is prepared to introduce legislation to reform the family allowance system, and if so, when will this legislation be introduced and will it be introduced in time to be enacted by September?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, as I have announced on many occasions we do plan to introduce legislation to revise the family allowance system, and no, I do not anticipate that it will be enacted soon enough to be operative by September.

FINANCE

SELECTIVE FISCAL AND MONETARY MEASURES TO STIMULATE ECONOMIES OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): My question is supplementary to that asked by my colleague the hon. member for St. John's East of the Minister of Finance. Does the government share the conclusion drawn by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council that there will be a considerable time lag in the Atlantic area's participation in the over-all recovery of the Canadian economy in the next two years? If so, is the government considering selective fiscal and monetary measures to assist in stimulating the Atlantic region?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust the minister can reply to this question briefly. The question is rather wide in scope and normally it should be answered by way of a general statement. If the minister undertakes to reply briefly he will be given the floor.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to say that through the area development program we are materially helping the development of the Atlantic provinces vis-à-vis other areas of Canada, and that I am studying the report of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council.

SUGGESTED MEETING WITH REPRESENTATIVES OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES ON SPECIAL BUDGET MEASURES TO IMPROVE ECONOMIES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the very disheartening and pessimistic report of APEC on this matter, would the minister at this late date be prepared to have special meetings with representatives of the Atlantic provinces so they may suggest special measures in the budget that would deal with this problem that is so discouraging?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): If I have requests from various people in Canada to meet with them before the budget I usually try to accommodate them, especially if they come from provincial governments.

CO-ORDINATION OF REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT AND MONETARY AND FISCAL POLICIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): This is by way of a related question but it is also a supplementary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the statement made on national television last night by the honourable, distinguished and learned member for Duvernay to the effect—

[Mr. Marshall.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: —that government economic policies were not properly co-ordinated within the government, and since this is especially so with respect to government regional development policies, can the minister assure the House that he will take steps to ensure that the policies of his department are properly co-ordinated with the monetary and fiscal policies of the government?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member is passing the same judgment as he used to pass on the member for Duvernay when he was in the Post Office.

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): He is the same person. We can tell the House that our policies are co-ordinated.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—INCREASE IN AMOUNT ALLOCATED—EXPLANATION OF REFUSALS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is directed to the Secretary of State. In view of the large number of applications coming in for the Opportunities for Youth program, can the minister tell the House whether he has been successful in obtaining more funds for that program?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Not yet, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: Can the minister state whether refusal notices have gone out to unsuccessful applicants and, if so, are these people told which criteria they failed to meet?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: No, Mr. Speaker. As far as I know, all that has been sent out to date is a small percentage of good news to promotors of projects which have already been accepted.

[English]

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF FUNDS TO MILITIA TRAINING COURSE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the summer militia training programs have had to be cut in half because of lack of funds, and that this was a very successful program last year, would the minister consider transferring some of his departments funds in order that this course could be continued?

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—NUMBER OF PROJECTS TO BE TURNED DOWN BECAUSE OF LACK OF FUNDS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister indicate to the House how many projects he anticipates will be turned down if he does not receive the increased funds he is asking for and what number of potential jobs is represented by these projects?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member's question is highly detailed. He is asking for the type of information which I suggest to him should not be sought at this time. In view of the importance of the matter the hon. member might ponder the advisability of having the matter debated at the time of adjournment.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

BONNYVILLE, ALTA.—ACTION TO ALLEVIATE DISCORD—INVESTIGATION BY LANGUAGE COMMISSIONER

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. In view of the racial strife which has developed in the town of Bonnyville, Alberta, over the implementation of certain segments of the Official Languages Act, is the minister planning any action to help alleviate this unhealthy situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised that the hon. member should say the problem at Bonnyville resulted from application of the Official Languages Act. There is indeed some possibility that Bonnyville, like several other localities, might become a bilingual district, but it is not now part of a bilingual district since no bilingual district under the Official Languages Act has yet been established, and most probably none will be established until midsummer.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: In spite of the minister's answer there still is great difficulty, and I wonder whether he would be in favour of asking the language commissioner to investigate and report on the problem?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I should need to check the act on that point. I believe that any citizen has the right to ask for the help of the Official Languages Commissioner. I wonder, however, if the Secretary of State would not be the only citizen without the privilege of invoking this right.

[English]

Mr. Yewchuk: I would like clarification of the first part of the minister's answer. Can he indicate when he expects this will officially become a bilingual district?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This question should be placed on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF RYE, FLAX AND RAPESEED UNDER WHEAT BOARD—MEANING OF STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I address a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board in view of his statement in a release dated April 21, 1971 referring to the decision to bring rye, flax and rapeseed under the Canadian Wheat Board. He said:

> This is a wrong interpretation and I can only say at this point that the government has taken no decisions to change the present marketing system for rapeseed or any other grain.

Does this mean that the minister is not going to proceed with the bill to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act or that he is going to withdraw it? Do we put this interpretation on the statement he made?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it would certainly be wrong to put that interpretation on the statement instead of the plain interpretation which is that the clause in the legislation is simply enabling legislation and that no decision has been made to make use of that power.

Mr. Gleave: May I then ask the minister, since he has stated he does not intend to put any teeth in this section, whether he is satisfied with the manner in which the rapeseed market has been operating?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question as asked is in order. The hon. member has asked whether the minister is satisfied with a situation and in this respect the question is not acceptable.

POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF RYE, FLAX AND RAPESEED UNDER WHEAT BOARD—HOLDING OF PLEBISCITE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): A supplementary question. May I ask the minister whether, before he puts any teeth in the legislation, he proposes taking a plebiscite to give him the necessary teeth?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I made it clear that no move would be taken in regard to the marketing system unless it were with the fullest support of the producers who are most directly involved. I have said nothing about the form of ascertaining that approval or support although I am conscious of the fact that the oilseeds marketing committee, in making its recommendations to me some months ago, did indicate that a plebiscite was an appropriate route.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NEWFOUNDLAND—ACTION ON PROJECTS

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): My question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Will the minister consult with the premier of Newfoundland and try to get the various DREE projects moving in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador and try to prevail upon the premier to stop hoarding up these projects in order to spring them at the propitious political moment in this provincial election year?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOREIGN AID—INQUIRY AS TO SHIFT IN POLICY AND ASSISTANCE TO NORTH VIET NAM

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Was Mr. Gérin-Lajoie stating government policy when he announced last weekend that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking whether an official of the government is stating government policy when he makes a statement. I have to tell the hon. member that a question asked in those terms is not in order. It has long been a recognized rule of the House that it is possible for an hon. member to ask the Prime Minister whether a statement made by a minister represents government policy, but I would suggest that if hon. members ask questions on whether statements made by public servants represent government policy we may get ourselves into difficulty. From day to day the whole question period might be used for that purpose. Would the hon. member rephrase the question?

Mr. Nesbitt: I realize Your Honour is quite right but I thought a question about a statement by such a senior official might be accepted. Is it government policy to have a large shift in emphasis in our foreign aid programs and, in particular, is it government policy now to advance foreign aid to North Viet Nam?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any proposals to grant aid to North Viet Nam.

GUYANA—STONING OF CANADIAN HIGH COMMISSIONER'S RESIDENCE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I wish to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. Does the minister have any information to impart to the House and the country on the stoning of the residence of our ambassador in Guyana over the weekend and, in particular, has any communication come from the Guyanese government? Also, are the property and lives of Canadians in danger?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I understand that our High Commissioner has been in touch with us and has said that he was completely unharmed. He said he got a little less sleep than usual.

[Mr. Peddle.]

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ATLANTIC PROVINCES' UNEMPLOYMENT—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS ON BASIS OF NEED

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State regarding the Opportunities for Youth program. In view of the recent information that projects worth $150 million had been submitted up to that time and as only $14.7 million is available, will the extremely high unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces, the highest in the country, be taken into consideration when projects are approved?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, it was always understood that the funds available for this program would be distributed in such a way as to provide greater help to those areas of the country where unemployment among the young is greater. And that is what we are doing at the present time with regard to the distribution of available funds.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSION WITH UNITED STATES ON BUILDING OF DAMS ON PEMBINA RIVER

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs of which I have given him notice. It concerns the building of a series of dams on the Pembina River as a joint effort by the Canadian and American governments. Is any action being contemplated to reintroduce discussions on what has turned out to be a very important matter?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have an answer somewhere to this question. Perhaps I might be permitted to search for it.

COMMUNICATIONS

ALLEGED SUPPRESSION OF FREE EXPRESSION OF VIEWS BY PRESS IN QUEBEC—SUGGESTED INVESTIGATION BY COMMITTEE OF HOUSE

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): My question is directed to either the government House leader or the Minister of Justice. It arises out of the conference of the news media, the press, over the past weekend and the controversy surrounding the question of the suppression of free expression of views in the province of Quebec put forward in a document entitled "Dossier F". Has the government considered having this general question studied by a parliamentary committee, perhaps the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, so that these charges can be examined in some depth?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rose: In this same general area, has the government considered the establishment of a press council for Canada or assisting in the establishment of such a council?

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice on the same subject. Because of the allegations of serious suppression of fundamental civil rights alleged by these journalists at their weekend meeting, is the minister or his department going to make an inquiry into these matters?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to study the question of whom these allegations were directed against. Having done that, I would perhaps be prepared to give an answer to the hon. member later.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED APPEARANCE OF PRIME MINISTER, MINISTER OF JUSTICE, SECRETARY OF STATE AND PREMIER OF QUEBEC BEFORE SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I would like to ask the government House leader, in whose name the motion for the establishment of the special joint committee appears, if he would discuss with the other party House leaders the matter of facilitating the appearance before that committee of the only true experts on apprehended insurrection—the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice, the premier of Quebec and the Secretary of State who has written about it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

JUDGES ACT

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO ESTABLISH JUDICIAL COUNCIL—POSSIBLE FIRING OF JUDGES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice arising out of a bill which has received first reading. Did the minister obtain or try to obtain the consent of all ten provincial Attorneys General or have any discussions with the Chief Justices of the various provinces with regard to setting up the judicial council and did the minister receive a recommendation from them that would make it possible for the minister or the cabinet to fire judges in this country?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I completely reject the declaration in that question. I want to assure the hon. member that they were consulted with regard to the bill in so far as it related to the Canadian judicial commission. It was discussed with all ten provincial Attorneys General at the meeting we held in Halifax last summer and with all 22 Chief Justices in this country.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question. In order to obtain information, I ask the minister whether it is a fact that if the council made a recommendation to him as Minister of Justice he could make a recommendation to the cabinet and a judge could be fired?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter for debate when the bill comes before the House. I want to say to the hon. member that the purpose of the Canadian judicial commission is to ensure that the separation of powers as between the executive and the judiciary is properly maintained.

Mr. Woolliams: That destroys their independence.

PROPOSED AMCHITKA UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TESTS—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Bearing in mind the severe earthquake registered in the north Pacific over the weekend and also the scheduled large-scale United States nuclear tests in the same general quake prone area, will the government renew its representations to Washington in opposition to these scheduled underground nuclear blasts?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As the House is aware, Mr. Speaker, ever since the hon. member for Victoria raised this question we have been very concerned about it. We have made a number of representations, the last of which I tabled in the House. The President of the United States has promised to give very careful consideration to our representations. As long as this is the situation, I see very little point in renewing these representations. However, because this matter was raised in the House it will no doubt again be brought to the attention of the United States government.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN HUDSON BAY MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY AND EMPLOYEES—STATE OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): My question is for the Minister of Labour. Can the minister offer any real encouragement with regard to the possible settlement of the strike involving the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company and the union at Flin Flon?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I understand that both parties will be resuming negotiations on Thursday in the presence of a federal mediator. This morning I met with officials of the Hudson Bay Mining Company. I feel their position is now flexible enough to at least give encouragement that a settlement may be available provided both parties approach the bargaining in the proper mood.

Mr. Korchinski: Does the minister now have a man on the scene at Flin Flon?

Mr. Mackasey: When the negotiations resume on Thursday there will be a representative of the Department of Labour on hand.

Senate and House of Commons Act

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUPPLYING OF INSURANCE NUMBERS OR FILES BY HEALTH AND WELFARE TO OTHER DEPARTMENTS OR AGENCIES

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Health and Welfare. Does the minister's department supply social insurance numbers or files on individuals to other departments of government or Crown agencies, particularly the Solicitor General's department or any agency responsible to the Solicitor General?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe so. I will check on it, but I am sure we do not.

IMMIGRATION ACT

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the delays with regard to interviews and appeals concerning immigrants, when will the minister be introducing the legislation to amend the Immigration Act and regulations thereto? Will it be before the end of June?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I expect so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS' SESSIONAL AND EXPENSE ALLOWANCES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Friday, April 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-242, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowance Act, and the act to make provisions for the retirement of members of the Senate, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, prior to the adjournment of this debate on Friday afternoon, I discussed a number of considerations involved in dealing with the question of remuneration for Members of Parliament. I related the considerations that I have to take into account as the member for Regina East in terms of the effect that this legislation will have on the people of Regina East, as well as the effect of other legislation which has been passed during the life of this Parliament.

I have in mind a letter I received from a farmer in my constituency enclosing a copy of a letter he had sent to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) who is in charge of the Wheat Board. The farmer who wrote this letter has a small farm; he has a half-section of land, but it is highly productive land. He was affected by Operation Lift in 1970 and because of the small acreage he was cultivating, his operation did not leave much room for flexibility. He put 50 or 60 acres to wheat and seeded some coarse grains as well. He was fortunate enough to harvest a good crop, wheat yields as high as 40 bushels an acre. When it came to delivering the grain he found himself boxed in by the regulations set out in the Lift program; he encountered great difficulty in moving even minimal amounts of the grain he had produced in 1970. The minister in charge of the Wheat Board was good enough to send me a copy of the reply he had sent to this farmer. In effect, it said: We shall be introducing all sorts of programs shortly, and the stabilization plan will not hurt small farmers. The minister also indicated he did not believe Operation Lift had done this particular farmer any harm at all.

I am speaking, now, from memory but I believe this man had to live on a cash income of some $3,400 during 1970, out of which he had to pay his operating expenses as well as buy food and clothing for his family. This is shameful. Government programs have adversely affected people like this man. For this and many other reasons I intend to oppose the bill. I would oppose it even if it were designed to take effect only after the next federal election. I say this because I believe a new approach is needed to this whole matter.

Some question has been raised whether or not members should accept this money. That is academic. I want to inform the House that I shall take steps to ensure that whatever extra amount may accrue to me will not result in personal financial gain for myself. This will apply, as far as I am concerned, for the balance of the life of this Parliament. I do not accept arguments that it is up to members to refuse to accept part of the funds available to them. Whatever decision is reached on this matter by the majority of the House of Commons, each member should be treated equally. I am certainly not willing to accept any proposition that my services are worth any less than those of other members; the people of Regina East will pass judgment on that in good time. My situation is not related to any contractual concept involving the life of this Parliament. I have said for some time that I do not think there should be any increase in the indemnity of members during the life of this Parliament. This statement was related to the present level of pay, the general situation of hon. members and the general nature of government policies as they have affected people in my constituency and throughout Canada.

I am unhappy about some of the references which have been made to the percentage increase involved in the changes proposed by the legislation before us. The effect is unfortunate because it tends to minimize the real significance of the changes. Thinking in terms of percentage increases has the effect of accentuating inequities in our society. For a man living on $2,000 a year, 6 per cent is far different from 6 per cent to a man with an income of $12,000 a year or more. A different approach is needed. Many companies and trade unions view such changes in terms of percentage increase rather than on a more equitable basis. They are going to have to change their approach.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) ought to be unhappy about some of the changes proposed. I draw attention to the fact that members of the other place will receive the same increase in indemnity as is proposed for Members of the House of Commons. This is in direct conflict with the principle the minister put forward during the debate on the Labour (Standards) Code. He embodied in that legislation the concept of equal pay for equal work. By no stretch of the imagination could it be argued that the work involved in being a member of the other place compares with the work involved in being a member of this chamber.

This is poor legislation, and its introduction is untimely. It does not reflect the type of thinking needed to deal with the problems of society today or of tomorrow. Consequently, I intend to oppose the bill.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to make some painful speeches before, but they have always been far more painful to my audiences than to me. Today, I find the situation reversed. This speech hurts me more than anyone who may be listening.

I am sorry I was not in the House last week to speak during the early part of this debate since it might appear I was waiting to see which way the political wind was blowing. That is not so. I might be said to find myself in a position similar to that in which Jack Benny found himself when confronted with a burglar carrying a gun. The burglar said: Your money or your life. And then there were five minutes of dead air on the radio.

Without commenting on the position other members or the government have taken in connection with this matter, I would like to go on record as saying that I cannot accept any increase in my salary as a Member of Parliament during the course of the present Parliament. As far as I am concerned, having made a commitment to my constituents long before the government decided its policy in respect of this issue, I am not in a position to accept the increment. To my mind, the only way in which I can dispose of the increase, should it be granted, would be to make a gift back to the Crown and pray to God it is not used in another attempt to refit the Bonaventure. I cannot see that it would be possible to accept the money, and then make donations to charity without deriving some benefit politically or personally from such a course. My position is that the commitment I made to my constituents prevents me from voting in favour of this bill. Accordingly, I shall abstain throughout. In conclusion, I can only say: Thanks, but no, and—ouch!

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to say a few words about Bill C-242.

Mr. Speaker, first of all, I should like to suggest to this House that the bill is untimely, even though many hon. members certainly need a salary increase. In fact, the cost of living has increased for them as well as for others, and the expenses in their ridings are getting higher and higher. Consequently, the parliamentary allowance, decent as it is, is not sufficient to allow them to provide people with the services they need, and it is not very important if we take into account members' expenses, both in this House and in their ridings.

But, while I have a great deal of sympathy for those who need a salary increase—I do myself—I find it most unfortunate that 75 per cent of the citizens in rural and urban ridings have to tighten their belts so terribly, because they are far from receiving a suitable income.

Therefore, I must say I find it impossible to support this bill because there is still too much to do to balance the economy, and I believe that we have not taken the necessary steps to enable everyone to have a fair share of the goods and services available in our society. I blame hon. members for not having discharged their duties in order to reach that goal.

In such circumstances, where the economy is crumbling, where it has lost its way, I believe that we do not deserve a higher allowance.

• (3:10 p.m.)

A salary increase for us would be justified and the population would be only too happy to accept it had we given them a chance to live reasonably well.

Because of present conditions, we are only aware of inflation, poverty, indebtedness and tax increases. Some 45 per cent of our fellow citizens are living on social welfare; they are living at somebody else's expense. We are stealing from one class of people to provide for the needs of another. There is nothing there to justify whatever the members are now asking for.

If we had a prosperous economy, our population would also be prosperous and indeed we could be. We all can get along with the salary we are now being paid. We can spend less and do without a few luxuries, as other people do, if we have not enough money.

The people do not ask for promises, wishes, words, laws, heaps of white books, slogans or inquiries, but a just distribution of the magnificent annual production of Canada, according to the needs of all citizens. This is not what exists now.

Members of Parliament have not done their duty and their work, for 34 commissions have been created since 1957. One was set up to determine whether there exists any poverty in Canada. We know that poverty exists in Canada, but do we know what to do to eliminate it? Have we put an end to poverty? These inquiries were financed with the money that would have been used to increase parliamentary allowances. If we had done our work, we would not have given all these millions to investigators. The reports of all these commissions of inquiry gather dust on shelves and in the long run all this amounts to nothing since one cannot implement the good recommendations they contain. Some are good, others are bad. Several good ones should have been implemented. We knew beforehand what they were. We did not need all these enquiries to know. This is why I say to my colleagues that we have not discharged our responsibilities. We are blaming other bodies for the shortcomings and the ill-effects of the system, to try and get off the hook and we say that it is not us but the commissions of enquiry which make the decisions.

For instance, there was the Glassco Commission on government organization which cost $2,791,000. The Carter Commission cost $3,350,000, the Commission on Pilotage, $1,500,000. The Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism which cost $9 million. This was one of the most expensive commissions. Let us mention also the Royal Commission on farm equipment which cost $1,500,000 and the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada whose tag price read $1,900,000. We knew that women were not recognized according to their real value. We did not need all these commissions and that is one of the reasons why we do not deserve an increase in our allowance. In fact we gave to the members of those commissions the money which was earmarked for our increase. We took guys who already had fantastic salaries, who were very well paid and we gave them in addition a lot of money. Doing this we are not assuming our responsibilities. Members of Parliament are in the House to do their job.

It seems to me that we are quite as competent. Among hon. members there are economists and lawyers. There are quite a few lawyers here.

We have accountants among hon. members, but it is not enough. We have to establish other committees and appoint other allegedly more competent individuals. However, since we refused to assume our responsibilities, we do not deserve that rase, even if we need it. Let us do our job and we could then ask for a raise. The people would then be pleased to approve it.

We are asking for better salaries than those of the people, while they must tighten their belts. Poverty is spreading and the number of poor people is increasing at an alarming rate in spite of all kinds of inquiries and recommendations. Family allowances have been at the same level since 1945. Income taxes have increased disheartenigly. Canadians have lost confidence because of the record rise of the cost of living.

The bill also provides for an increase in the salary scale of a great many public servants, and it is unacceptable to increase our allowances in such an unbalanced economy.

If it were only a matter of increasing the allowance of members of Parliament, the proposal might be acceptable, but we take this opportunity to increase the salaries of public servants who should also tighten their belts because, considering the present situation, they are getting a decent income.

We should oppose this increase members of Parliament have been asking for a long time. True, many could use it, but as the economic situation is unhealthy, let us also tighten our belts and, in every possible way, remedy the economic situation in every sector of our society; then, we can be justified in asking for increased allowances.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

With higher unemployment, accumulated deficits, 40 per cent of the people on welfare, the frightful increase in debts and taxes, the right to live is frustrated. The young cannot even find a roof. People cannot build a house without paying "a tribute to Ceasar" and they pay their house five or six times over before really owning it.

Mr. Speaker, the members of this House have accepted to remove the ceiling on interest rates and we are now feeling the consequences of this decision. Instead of taking concrete action in favour of the people, we are going against their interests, we exploit people and become accessories to their undeserved poverty. I stand guilty as all others here, but I should not accuse myself because I have always done everything I could in the past to have our cripple economy corrected.

In a civilized society, the first right of every citizen is the right to live. This is the first right which should be protected by law. It is a matter of elementary justice to all citizens but when they are no longer able to build their own home, can we say that they have access to justice and the safeguards of human dignity? These laws and regulations work instead against the individual's well-being and they can only be used to exploit the individual.

Production of goods and services is meant for adults, and should be divided into consumption and capitalization. Excessive capitalization has been made possible, but not so consumption. We produce a lot more than we consume; we capitalize 25 times more than we ought to. And all this is realized by members who have not done their job.

There is the reason for a well balanced economy, through simple means geared to economic facts and realities. We have not adjusted our economy to the physical realities and possibilities of this country. We have worked against that; we have completely unbalanced the economy. So, we have not done our duty. We should legislate so that goods and services satisfy the needs of the people, and if we achieved this, citizens would be glad to pay their servants adequately. Services are not appropriate to needs. Instead of helping people, of being of service to them, huge developments exploit them. This is where we have generally directed our efforts and we are getting the results that we deserve.

Nations must develop an awareness of national problems and of conditions necessary to their solution. Have we done it? Problems must be defined and localized. We have problems which were defined and localized by commissions of all kinds. All their wise recommendations which we should have proposed ourselves but had proposed by others, we have never put into practice.

We have not done our job. Agencies produced reports and carried out investigations of all kinds to pinpoint poverty and unemployment and we are still worse off than ever. Malaise and dissatisfaction prevail in every walk of life. Members of Parliament and ministers do not seem prepared to face their responsibilities.

We do not deserve an increase of our indemnity because we have not done our job, because we are paltry servants who take advantage of our employers, vilipend them, throw them into the arms of socialism, drive them to bankruptcy, anarchy, rebellion and destruction. Rebellion is rife, unions are demanding all kinds of impossible things because the government has not done its job. We are being penalized because civil servants and members of Parliament have been remiss, have not faced their responsibilities.

Mr. Speaker, there are extremely serious concerns for those whose responsibility it is to govern. Hon. members do not appear to be fulfilling their responsibilities. Several seem to find the matter amusing, and the responsibilities are not being assumed.

The policy for individual freedom and equal opportunities remains far behind the kind of social justice advocated under the slogan: "Let us establish a just society!" A large number of Canadians are living in slums. What about the taxes levied on building materials and the excessively high rates of interest which increase the cost of living?

Our just society, through its taxes and its housing policy, deprives the individual of his rights to be a property-owner. We ourselves have organized such a diabolical system, let us suffer the consequences! In the absence of any proof to the contrary, Canadians have the right to refuse to forgive us.

If we do not assume the very serious responsibilities that are ours, we suffer the direct consequences of our inaction in not providing the people with a guaranteed personal income and with sufficient and adequate purchasing power, having regard to our production. In 1970, the gross national product reached $90 billion and consumption $50 billion. Notwithstanding a capitalization of $36 billion, 50 per cent of Canadians could not participate in the national production.

Now, were we to capitalize $36 billion in 1971, we could easily distribute among the people $1 billion a month under the form of a compensated discount on prices or a national dividend in order to put in their hands the purchasing power which is necessary to boost the economy.

Instead, this government is content with creating further fiscal restraint, imposing taxes to those whose pockets are already empty, those people who are no longer able to pay taxes. Yet the government lets our major financial institutions accumulate reserves. Have government members done their job? I have done mine because I have been talking about this for a long time.

Nothing is balanced. Can some members suggest that the economy of Canada is balanced and that this justifies an increase in salary for public servants?

There would be many things to do and say. We have often said these things, but the Conservatives and the Liberals remain silent. They seem to think that everything is all right, that everything is going smoothly, while in effect nothing is working right. Our economy is falling off as it has never done before. It is "jammed"; every piece of its machinery is at a standstill. Industry is operating at only a quarter of its capacity. Plants are all closing up; almost all industries, generally speaking, are on the verge of bankruptcy. Some 50 per cent of Canada's lesser industries have become bankrupt; the same could be said of half of our retail outlets. And we hear some people say that the economy is faring pretty well, that everything is getting along fine, that the Liberal party is the party of the future, and so is the Progressive Conservative Party. The economy is being gradually thrown out of balance.

In this respect, I would like to quote from an article published in La Presse on Thursday, April 29, 1971:

THE COST OF LIVING

The steadfast rise in the cost of living is providing economists with interesting topics for arguments and ought to give terrible headaches to any serious politician.

Are there still serious politicians? Where are they? Let them stand up and prove it once and for all to the population. I continue to quote:

Let us not take somebody else's place. Did the federal government contribute to the unemployment increase in seeking to fight inflation? Did the Prices and Incomes Commission really fail in its attempt to convince labour and management to curb wage demands and profits? Is the consumer price index a valid criterion of national economic health? All those are questions for experts—who, besides, are far from unanimity in their answers—but there is no evidence on which to base a reassuring opinion.

The commission chaired by Mr. John Young is still making commendable efforts to prevent the effects of inflation by a close control over increases in wages and prices of products offered to Canadian consumers.

• (3:30 p.m.)

In spite of all that, recent figures published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics make us think. Retail prices have increased by 1.2 per cent during the first quarter of 1971, the highest increase in the last ten years. Everything costs more: food, clothing, housing, travel, leisure. This means that the dollar is being devaluated and with the same income, a family can buy fewer products . . . or go further into debt. This statement, though rather short, gives a true picture of every day life, does it not?

The car owner who pays 3 cents more for a gallon of gas, the mother of a family who pays one cent more for a loaf of bread, the Montrealer who will pay $20 to $50 more a year for the same amount of water he normally consumes does not have the time any more to ask himself where the evil is coming from: he just pays. In addition to these increases must be added school taxes, banks' service charges, railway tariffs. Those who have to pay certainly look for solutions to their financial troubles elsewhere than in their bottom drawers. Their reaction is normal: as they are unwilling or unable to live on a lower scale, they are ready to demand salary increases which will allow them to take advantage of services or to buy products which are offered at higher prices. And who can blame them for wanting in their turn to enjoy the advantages of free enterprise?

Governments that increase taxes, companies that raise prices always put forward sound arguments: expenses cannot be reduced, services have to be improved, production costs are going up, salaries have become astronomical. Let us forget about governments, which are not long in giving explanations when votes are at stake. On the other hand, one may wonder whether some firms are not too prone to hold their employees responsible for increases in the price of their products, several of which are essential. Because those employees are also consumers who draw from their work their main if not their only means of subsistence. This increase in prices and wages is surely a vicious circle. Who will venture to call upon the small wage-earner to put an end to it?

It is enough to justify increased allowances? Far from it. I continue.

> From that point of view, substantially increased salaries for federal members would have an appreciable psychological effect just before a round of negotiations. Considering their increasing responsibilities and the fact that many among them are not rich, this raise is understandable. It is out of the question to suggest to the representatives of the people to be hypocritical and to find in shady activities the money they need to maintain a proper standing.
> And freed from the first concern of so many Canadians, could they not coolly find a solution to inflation and unemployment?

That is what we have to work out. Had we solved that problem, we would be justified in seeking what we are asking. But we are far from having solved it. We have aggravated it, and if we increase the allowances of certain officials and representatives of the government, we will again create new headaches for the population. We will have to increase the cost of living, and thus boost taxes. Such is the administration we have. If we are unable to do better, instead of asking for an increase in our allowances, let us resign and leave our job to others whose philosophy or techniques are more sophisticated, more consistent with the situation. Then, we will perhaps be able to correct our limping economy which is no longer operating, and which must absolutely be made to run smoothly.

[English]

Mr. Ian Wahn (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, the Beaupré committee which was set up to study members' pay, pointed out that there had been no adjustment in members' pay since 1963 and that an increase is overdue. It is not necessary for me to review all the well known arguments or to state the obvious. I simply say I strongly support the basic principles set out in the Beaupré report. It is for that very reason that I am concerned with one aspect of the bill now before us, the $8,000 expense allowance. Certainly, the amount is not excessive, particularly for members who must themselves bear the expense of maintaining and staffing a riding office to serve their constituents. But I think it is important that we accept the principle set out in the Beaupré report that any expense allowance be for the purpose of paying expenses actually incurred by members in connection with their duties as Members of Parliament rather than as a tax-free allowance in lieu of expenses.

• (3:40 p.m.)

I am fully aware that reimbursable and accountable expense accounts have some disadvantages. Indeed, they are sometimes popularly referred to as swindle sheets. A reasonable allowance in lieu of expenses is free of that particular disadvantage. But I do not think that argument is conclusive or even very convincing. Surely, if we argue against the Beaupré recommendation of payment for actual expenses we face a dilemma; if we actually spend $8,000 in connection with our duties, the Beaupré formula would allow us to be reimbursed. But if we do not spend the $8,000 a year in expenses for carrying out our duties as Members of Parliament, then we are getting a tax free allowance not available to any other taxpayers. The dilemma is complete.

[Mr. Latulippe.]

I understand the argument has been advanced that it would not be appropriate to force Members of Parliament to submit expense accounts for approval or for checking by public officials. This is somewhat similar to an argument which has been made with almost equal eloquence throughout the years by businessmen and professional men who often complain bitterly, to the accompaniment of appropriate profanities, that these so-and-so public servants have no knowledge of running a business or of carrying on a profession and that they have never had the experience of "meeting a payroll". This argument has been made frequently but it has never prevailed, as the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) knows very well. In any event, if there is a problem here, I suggest that it could easily be met by having members submit their expense accounts to officials of the House, possibly acting under the supervision of Mr. Speaker or his deputy.

My point is simply that we are entitled to be reinbursed for our actual expenses, reasonably incurred in carrying out our duties as Member of Parliament, but anything in the nature of a tax free allowance in lieu of expenses is undesirable in principle. This was the finding of the Beaupré committee, but it was also, according to my recollection, the finding of the Carter commission and of the Smith commission in Ontario. All these commissions which investigated the problem very carefully came to the same conclusion. Apparently they felt that a tax free allowance in lieu of expenses for Members of Parliament would be discriminatory as compared with other taxpayers who did not have the same privilege.

It is also discriminatory as between various Members of Parliament. It is much more advantageous to members who live in Ottawa than to members who live out of Ottawa. It is more advantageous to members who do not incur much expense in serving their constituencies than to members who have ridings which require the expenditure of a great deal of money in order that the constituents may be served. It is also much more advantageous to members who have other income and are subject to a high income tax rate as compared with members who have only their parliamentary pay on which to live.

As members of this House, we hold a position of trust, and under our existing law, unfortunately, we are required to fix our own pay. Every time an adjustment is made, we are in a position where our duty conflicts with our interest. In such circumstances we must lean over backward. Not only must we not take advantage of the position, but we must also make it quite apparent in the legislation that we are not taking advantage of the position. Although annual expenses of $8,000 may be quite reasonable for the job, it will appear that members are taking advantage of their position if they are given a tax free allowance rather than merely reimbursed for expenses actually incurred.

Under the existing arrangement, we have been often accused of having a salary of $18,000; in fact, we are almost invariably accused of having a salary of $18,000 and of giving ourselves $6,000 of that tax free. Already since this bill has been introduced, we are being accused of proposing for ourselves a salary of $26,000, of which $8,000 is tax free. There is no reason at all why we should lay ourselves open to this type of misrepresentation. It is imperative, therefore, that the legislation should make it entirely clear that we are entitled to have our expenses actually incurred in the course of our duties reimbursed, but that we are not giving ourselves anything in the nature of a tax free allowance which is not available to other taxpayers who are just as heavily burdened as we are.

I realize that the point I have made is not new, that it must have been considered by the cabinet and must have been rejected by the cabinet before the present bill was introduced. This poses of course the difficult question as to how to vote on second reading. I understand that the bill is going to be referred to a parliamentary committee and that changes in detail such as I have mentioned can be made before that committee. This may be a vain hope, but there has been a refreshing degree of independence shown from time to time by some of our parliamentary committees. I hope that the parliamentary committee to which this bill is referred will show a degree of independence, particularly in view of the nature of the legislation. I hope the chairman and the vice chairman, and all the members will adopt an objective and independent point of view. There is little use referring a bill such as this to a committee if members, when they consider it, merely rubber stamp views laid down for them by their party.

So, I hope that this bill will be given careful and independent consideration by a parliamentary committee. I will vote to send it to that committee, while reserving my right to urge as strongly as I can before that committee that the provisions for the tax free allowance be changed to make it entirely clear that members are only entitled to be reimbursed for expenses actually incurred by them in connection with their duties.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): The debate on Bill C-242 to provide increased pay and allowances for parliamentarians has been conducted on a fairly high level, and I think this has been partly due to the very moderate and restrained manner in which the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) introduced this piece of legislation. It would be very easy, in a debate like this, for hon. members to descend into mutual recriminations and an imputation of motives. It would be very easy for those who are supporting the bill to be accused of being greedy moneygrabbers and those who are opposed to the bill of being hypocrites because they know that if the bill passes they will get the money and, therefore, they are merely grandstanding. Fortunately, there has been very little of this, except in a few isolated instances.

I begin by conceding to those who are supporting this bill that they are sincere in believing this bill is in the best interests of Parliament. I hope they will concede to those of us who are opposing the bill the same degree of sincerity. Those on the government side who may question our sincerity can test it, either by allowing the bill to drop, or when the bill is before the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization bringing in some of the changes which I am going to suggest in the course of my remarks.

The first thing which is apparent from this debate, Mr. Speaker, is that we very much need some better method of dealing with the periodic adjustment of members' salaries and allowances. Almost all members who have spoken have indicated that this is a very unpleasant task. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) himself said on April 29, as recorded at page 5355 of Hansard:

> This is a difficult situation and makes the advocacy of this particular bill not the most pleasant task for a minister like myself, who usually has come into the House in support of measures affecting a broad class of people other than Members of Parliament.

I think that all of us feel the same way, that it is humiliating and embarrassing that periodically we should have to go through this soul-searching when determining what we should be paid out of the public purse. I had hoped that the government, which started out three years ago to break some new trails, would have brought some technique before the House by which it would be unnecessary to deal with parliamentary pay and allowances in the House of Commons itself. The government has not done so. It referred the matter to the Beaupré committee, but they have completely failed to deal with it. One page 43 of their report, paragraph 143, we find the following:

> Our terms of reference invite us to suggest a procedure for the periodic review of financial arrangements for parliamentarians. In view of the great emphasis we have placed on the evolving role of the individual member, we do not see fit to recommend that salaries be tied to changes in certain economic indicators such as the Consumer Price Index, Gross National Expenditure or the Industrial Composite of Weekly Wages and salaries. Further, we do not accept the proposal that parliamentary salaries should be related to the salaries that the government establishes for the executive category in the Public Service.

The committee does not give its reasons for believing that salaries could not be tied to some category in the public service. I certainly would have been interested in knowing why it rejected that idea because it seems to me it has some merit, although there may be obstacles to it of which I am not aware.

Paragraph 145 of the Beaupré committee report reads:

> Primarily for the reasons outlined in the previous two paragraphs, we recommend that another advisory committee, similar to the present one, be established within two years of the convening of the 29th Parliament. We also recommend that the government concurrently appoint an all-party committee from both Houses to act in an advisory role to the proposed review committee. We are of the opinion that it would be more appropriate for the next committee to consider a method for the future review of salaries, allowances, services and facilities for members of parliament.

Well, Mr. Speaker, that does not help us very much. I am hopeful that when this bill is before the Committee on Procedure and Organization some thought will be given to this matter. I think there are two or three possibilities. One is, as I have already suggested, that the salaries and allowances of members could be tied to some category in the public service. Another is that some independent body outside of Parliament might periodically review parliamentary remuneration.

I know that in one province a committee was set up, headed by the Chief Justice of the province, and its recommendations were accepted without question, not only by the members of the legislature but by the public generally. It may be that the President of the Exchequer Court could head such a committee, or that the Chief Justice of Canada could head such a committee. I think we ought to apply ourselves at this time to the problem of how we can remove from the House of Commons this responsibility which all of us find most distasteful.

I am opposed to this legislation for two main reasons. The first is that the proposed pay hike comes at an inopportune time when the government is asking the people of Canada to tighten their belts. For three years, the government has been following a policy of austerity. The government has frozen old age security pensions at $80. Sometimes people say to us, with some scorn in their voices, that we raised the old age pension by 42 cents. We did worse than that, Mr. Speaker. We actually reduced the pension by $1.17, an amount by which it would have increased on January 1, 1971, if we had left the legislation alone. We did even worse than that. We removed the 2 per cent cost of living bonus which the old age security pensioners had been receiving. The result is that they are the only group of pensioners who do not have a cost of living bonus.

In spite of what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said last December, to the effect that inflation no longer exists in Canada, unfortunately it still exists in this country. The increase in the cost of living for the first three months of this year was the greatest in the past decade. If the cost of living continues to rise the $80 a month old age security pension will steadily diminish in terms of what it will buy in the stores. The government and many of its officials are calling for restraint by wage and salary earners. Dr. John Young, the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, is asking that wage earners keep their demands for increases this year down to somewhere around 4 per cent or 5 per cent. Mr. Louis Rasminsky, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, has gone one better. He suggests that salaries and wages ought to be reduced in order to wage war against inflation. I ask the members of this House what sort of image will Parliament create if we are asking wage and salary earners to restrain their demands while at the same time we endorse an increase of around 44 per cent in the remuneration which parliamentarians receive?

How much credibility will the government have when it makes appeals, as it undoubtedly will in the next few months, to organized labour to be more moderate in their demands? And what about the unorganized workers? Two thirds of the workers of this country do not belong to trade unions, and they have no economic leverage to off-set inflation. These days many people are saying that parliamentarians are out of touch with reality, that Members of Parliament live in an ivory tower, that we are untouched by the woes and tensions which beset the average citizen. I ask members of this House to what extent will the passage of this bill disabuse their minds of this unfortunate attitude?

I think we must also look at this measure in the light of that great section of the Canadian people who are poor and disadvantaged. About 100 years ago Benjamin Disraeli wrote a book about "The Other England" in which he referred to the two nations, the nation of the well-to-do and the nation of the poor. In the same way, Mr. Speaker, there are two Canadas. There is the Canada that we often tend to forget. The Economic Council of Canada, the National Council of Welfare and other bodies have pointed out that between 20 per cent and 30 per cent of the Canadian people live below the poverty line. In other words, there are between four and six million Canadians who do not enjoy even a decent standard of living. The National Council of Welfare has pointed out that of this number some one and a half million of the poor are members of families which have no employable member or which are fatherless because of death, desertion or divorce. There are another half million members of families of which the breadwinner has no job, and there are between two and four million people who are employed but earning less than is required to meet the needs of their families and themselves. When we add to this total the aged, the veteran pensioners—with whom we have been most niggardly in my opinion—and the primary producers, such as small farmers and fishermen, particularly from the east coast, it means that probably one-third of the population of this country lives either in a state of poverty or in a state of deprivation.

I am not suggesting for a moment, Mr. Speaker, that MP's salaries can be set on the basis of the income of the poor, but I do suggest that until we take steps to remedy their condition we present a poor image in dealing with our own income. What has the government done? The government's so-called welfare program and the white paper on income security are predicated mainly on redistributing poverty, taking from the not-so-poor in order to give minimum aid to those who are very poor. The government has never recognized the need for a redistribution of income as a means if stimulating effective economic demand. We spend hundreds of millions of dollars in assisting large corporations instead of putting purchasing power into the pockets of potential buyers. It is noteworthy that the Canadian Labour Congress has been urging the government to set up a guaranteed annual income. The last report of the National Council of Welfare indicates that a guaranteed annual income is not only desirable but is economically possible and feasible. I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that eventually in Canada we will be compelled to set up a guaranteed annual income, if not on humanitarian grounds at least on economic grounds, because automation is steadily eroding job opportunities.

The Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, Dr. Arthur Smith, has said that even if we can increase our rate of growth to 6.75 per cent in constant dollars, it will take three years to reduce unemployment to 4 per cent. I do not believe anybody in this House would accept 4 per cent as a reasonable level of unemployment. The reason for that, Mr. Speaker, is that economic recovery may cure some of the cyclical unemployment but we will find that structural unemployment, because of cybernation and automation, will still be with us. Much of the money the government is granting to large corporations is going into equipment which will require fewer employees, and the problem of the future is how to provide income for the many individuals for whom there is no place in the work force.

If Parliament had dealt effectively with the problems I have outlined, Mr. Speaker, we as parliamentarians might, in good conscience, have turned our attention to our personal financial problems. Since we have failed to do so, I am afraid we present a poor image to the country when we do for ourselves what we have failed to do for the much more needy groups in our society.

My first reason for opposing this pay hike, therefore, is that I think this is the wrong time to pass such legislation. In view of the policy of austerity which the government has been pursuing this is not the time to substantially increase the remuneration for parliamentarians.

My second objection to this legislation arises out of the fact that I am completely opposed to the $8,000 tax free allowance. One of the things that pleased me about the report of the Beaupré committee was that it suggested doing away with the tax free allowance. I think much of the complaint by the general public is not so much against increasing the remuneration of Members of Parliament, providing it is a modest increase, but rather it is with the fact that Members of Parliament are being given a privilege not enjoyed by any other group in our society, namely a stated sum of money which is exempt from income tax. This is a special privilege not enjoyed by other professional groups such as doctors, lawyers, or dentists nor is it enjoyed by self-employed persons. It is a special privilege which parliamentarians have given to themselves. Governments have usually been chary of tax exemptions.

Under the Income Tax Act, the tax exemption is $2,000 for a married couple and $1,000 for a single person and, in my opinion, this is a ridiculous situation. Prior to World War II, when a dollar had two or three times the purchasing power of a dollar today, the exemption under the Income Tax Act was $3,000 for a married couple and $1,500 for a single person. We have kept these very low exemptions with the result that even old age pensioners who get the supplementary income find themselves paying taxes. I think, Mr. Speaker, that we ought to abolish, as the Beaupré committee report recommended, the granting of any tax-exempt sum of money to Members of Parliament. If that were done, I think a small increase in the $12,000 indemnity which we now receive would be justified.

I think the figure recommended by Beaupré is too high. A modest increase would be justified, but I do not think we could justify continuing to have a tax free allowance of $8,000, $6,000 or any other figure, particularly in view of the fact that the Beaupré committee recommended its removal. The Beaupré committee's recommendation was much more sensible. They suggested that Members of Parliament be allowed certain expenses which would permit them to service their constituencies, but only that which they had spent and could prove by the submission of vouchers. This would have been fair for two reasons. It would have put us in the same position as other groups in society. Doctors, lawyers, dentists and others who hire a secretary and an office are allowed that expense. Firms are allowed to reimburse travelling salesmen, book agents and insurance agents for their travelling and out of pocket expenses provided they supply vouchers. We would be in the same category as other taxpayers. I think this procedure would commend itself to the people of Canada.

It would also be fair as between the various Members of Parliament. There are great differences in constituencies. There is a great deal of difference in the cost of looking after the interests of constituencies in the rural areas, such as those represented by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre), the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson) and the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). These constituencies cover several thousand square miles. The communities are inaccessible and can only be reached by boat or chartered plane. There is a great difference in the cost of servicing that type of constituency and an urban constituency that may only be one or two miles square. There are expenses in urban constituencies, but they are of a different kind. The only way to make it fair to all concerned would be to pay for the actual expenses incurred.

The same is true with reference to the distance that a member's constituency is from Ottawa. There is a great deal of difference between looking after a constituency where you would have long distances to travel, two homes to maintain, two light bills, two telephone bills and two cars and a constituency that can be serviced from Ottawa with no great difficulty. In fact, members in Ottawa can service their constituency from their homes and the Parliament Buildings. I do not say that to criticize any member or any group of members. I simply ask, why should we treat the expenses alike when the costs of servicing the constituencies are not alike? Why not reimburse the members for what they actually spend in servicing their constituencies?

The Beaupré committee report recommended that the expense of travelling within the constituency, providing office accommodation and some staff in the constituency ought to be covered. Most of the cabinet ministers I know are able to maintain an office and staff in their constituencies. I do not complain about that. I think they need it. The members also need it. The constituents would be better served if there were an office to which they could send their complaints, where the member could meet them and where there would be staff to arrange for interviews with members when they are in the constituencies over a weekend or during a recess.

There should be provision, up to a maximum, for sending out reprints of Hansard so that constituents are aware of the position which their members take on various questions debated in the House. There ought to be greater facilities for research if members are to make a useful contribution to this House and, particularly, to the standing committees of the House. Members ought to have research facilities and assistance.

In saying these things, I am not unmindful of the fact that all these facilities have been tremendously improved since the time I first became a member of this House. However, instead of giving to the members a flat sum of $8,000 which will be tax free, we would be better advised to follow the recommendation of the Beaupré commission and say that there should be certain sums of money from which a member may draw in servicing his or her constituency and that he or she will be reimbursed for any such expenditures on a voucherable and accountable basis. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) took the opposite view on this matter. He said, as recorded at page 5353 of Hansard:

> In my judgment, in view of the other responsibilities we exercise daily, it is not too great a responsibility to give this opportunity to a member to decide how he will determine the allocation of the $8,000 and not oblige him to come back and have his accounts vetted by a member of the bureaucracy who normally is interrogated, questioned and brought to heel by elected Members of Parliament.

Most of us have just gone through the experience of filing our income tax returns. These, of course, are vetted and examined by the bureaucracy. Several million Canadians have their requests for tax exemptions vetted by the bureaucracy. I do not think there is any reason that Members of Parliament should be treated differently. Professional and self-employed persons who must spend money which is not income, but is used to enable them to perform their functions, must submit vouchers. They must give an account of any money which they spend. I see no reason why members of Parliament should not be required to do the same. The only way the public can be sure that the money which we receive for the purpose of servicing our constituencies is properly used is to have it accountable and voucherable. They will then know that the money which we receive, ostensibly for servicing our constituencies, is actually spent on servicing our constituencies.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Some controversy has arisen as to what members will do with the extra remuneration if this legislation passes. The other day the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond-Delta (Mr. Goode) challenged me and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party to make a statement as to what we propose to do. I can understand the hon. member feeling that perhaps he has to pay some conscience money to atone for the government's inconsistency in its treatment of parliamentarians as compared with other sections of the population. This is a matter which each hon. member has to decide for himself. I do not propose to criticize anyone else; each member will have to decide what he will do with the extra remuneration in the event that this legislation is passed. As far as I am concerned, I do not propose to follow the example of one hon. member who spoke earlier this afternoon and turn it back to the Crown; I am not anxious to help finance the refitting of another Bonaventure or the construction of a port which nobody is going to use. But I am determined in my mind to ensure that no additional income will accrue to me, personally. I propose to use this money, if it is made available, to do the things which the Beaupré committee recommended should be done, namely, to see to it that additional services are provided to my constituents so that I am able to serve them more effectively and more efficiently. I hope to be able to provide increased services in my constituency, to provide for an office and a staff and to do a greater amount of coverage by sending constituents reprints of Hansard and other information at my own expense. That is what will be done if this legislation passes.

However, I do not think we ought to take it for granted that this legislation will pass. I should like to make a plea to the government not to move with any indecent haste. The worst thing that could happen to the image of Parliament would be for this legislation to be hurried through the House and whipped through subsequent proceedings in the standing committee and in this chamber. After all, we take time in which to discuss many other questions which will have less impact on the public than the one before us. I should like to plead that when this bill goes to the standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, we should seriously consider two things. First, we should seriously consider removing the tax-free allowance, and draw up a list of constituency services in respect of which a member would be reimbursed, services which would be voucherable and accountable. Of course, limits would have to be placed on the amount which could be paid to any member, but money would be made available in order that members could be more effective, offer greater services to their constituents and be more available to them. Action along these lines would, I believe, receive general support from hon. member on all sides, besides removing much of the public opposition to this legislation.

Second, I urge that the standing committee studying this bill should give thought to recommending a method for dealing with changes in the salaries and allowances of Parliamentarians in the future. The Beaupré committee was silent on this aspect and the government has not made any recommendation. I believe a committee of the House, while studying Bill C-242, might give a good deal of thought to this question and make recommendations which the government would then have ample opportunity to study before it arose again. One of the difficulties which succeeding government have faced is that, since no one wants to tackle the problem of parliamentary increases, it is always left for a number of years. A substantial amount is then involved and there is always a reaction from the public. It would be much better if indemnities were tied to some objective criteria so that they could be dealt with on an annual or biennal basis. It would not then be necessary for us to conduct this agonizing and embarrassing appraisal of our own work. If the committee would do this, and if the government were prepared to accept a recommendation in favour of some technique of dealing with parliamentary salaries and allowances in the future, Members of Parliament in years to come would not be required to go through the embarrassing and humiliating experience we are called upon to go through in this debate.

I would urge the government to consider this proposal very seriously. I honestly believe that if we were prepared to remove the tax free allowance and work out a technique by which parliamentary salaries were dealt with by some independent body, we would be helping to improve the image of parliament and make the government more credible when it deals with some of the economic issues facing the country.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have here the report of the Advisory Committee on Parliamentary salaries and Expenses, report which preceded the bill before us, namely Bill C-242. That report is called the Beaupré Report in honour of the committee chairman, Mr. T. N. Beaupré. At the beginning there is a letter dated November 16, 1970, addressed to the Hon. Allan J. MacEachen, President of the Privy Council, House of Commons, Ottawa, which reads thus:

Dear Sir:

We, the members of the Advisory Committee appointed pursuant to Order-in-Council P.C. 1970-230 of February 5th, 1970, have the honour to submit the following Report.

Yours sincerely,

T. N. BEAUPRÉ

That report was presented on November 16, 1970, following a request made in February 1970.

The least I can say is that, contrary to the slow pace of other investigators hired by the government to work with many commissions, the members of the Beaupré commission did not waste much time and for this they deserve congratulations. But I do not quite understand some of the ensuing recommendations.

In fact, Mr. Beaupré, who is also president of Domtar, sees quite differently the needs of his own employees. Domtar is a company whose importance is recognized both in Canada and in the rest of the business world. In addition to owning several plants and controlling several others, this company is a fairly big stockholder in several areas of the Canadian economy. Among the Domtar plants, there is first the Quévillon plant which I heard about from the people of the Portneuf riding who were hired when this plant was built and who are still working at the production of paper.

In Donnacona, where I live, we are particularly aware of the Domtar plants. We have two of those plants; the first one manufactures newsprint and the other building materials which are well-advertised on television. These plants are rather important and yet, in the field of salaries, the same war between employer and employees is going on. Every second year, the employees must negotiate for two to five months to get what they want. In the case of one of those plants, the last salary increase was granted two years ago. At that time, the employees won a 24¢ an hour increase, to be granted progressively. The 24¢ an hour increase granted by Mr. Beaupré to his employees is to be put in effect in three stages for people whose income is only $6,000 per year.

Strangely enough, whereas hon. members already earn $18,000, Mr. Beaupré recommends for them a $7,000 increase at once.

Thereby Mr. Beaupré contradicts himself, I think. And one wonders where he is heading and what he wants, for he has advised the Donnacona employees in writing that though the time has come for negotiating better working conditions, the former agreement having just expired, it is no use seeking any increase this year.

While reading Mr. Beaupré's report, one wonders whether the $7,000 increase in parliamentary allowances which he deems appropriate for hon. members is not some form of acknowledgment of the grants he has already received from the federal government, or a manœuvre to obtain favours in the years to come.

I find inconceivable a policy under which the government increases members' allowances without worrying at all about parliamentary services. I shall quote from the Beaupré committee report, since it contains parts quite favourable to the constituents. First, it recommends equitable financial provisions in respect to the members of Parliament. Moreover, the committee suggests to restructure the said provisions so that each member may provide the Canadian taxpayers with services as efficient as possible.

The minister's proposals disregard completely the second aim suggested by the Committee and deal with the first somewhat inadequately. Perhaps the parliamentarians need an increased allowance but I am not in full agreement with its timing. The government is requesting manufacturers and workers in private enterprise to limit their demands for higher wages to the productivity growth rate; however, can we do less than those men? Can we vote ourselves this increase without giving a single thought to our constituents? I do not believe so.

Since 1965, except in unemployment and taxes has this government proposed other increases? To ask the question is answering it.

I would now like to quote excerpts of the Beaupré report because I feel that we might perhaps get to the core of the problem:

In our opinion, the conditions under which parliamentarians are required to conduct the business of a nation ... are completely inadequate. Members of Parliament ... are often deprived of even the most fundamental facilities requisite to the efficient performance of their duties.

The committee is satisfied that important improvements must be made in the facilities provided to members and in the methods of financing them. The need to make these improvements is urgent and it will become more urgent and more serious as the importance of the role of the individual member in the parliamentary system continues to expand. New types of social and technical legislation will present members with the need for additional research facilities in order that they may be better informed. We were struck by the fact that so many able and dedicated members who wished to make positive contributions to issues and legislation both as individuals and in committees were unable to do so because of the lack of adequate administrative and research assistance. This can lead to frustration and loss of motivation in even the most dedicated member. An increasing involvement of government in the lives of the citizens and the increasing awareness, sophistication and participation of the public in positive democratic government will require improved communications between the member and each segment of society. It is our belief that the individual member is the most important link in the communication chain that joins government to the public it serves. The committee visualizes the role of the member as becoming more onerous, more complicated, more responsible and more time consuming. Consequently, it will become increasingly important that provisions be made that will permit him to respond quickly and adequately to the requirements of the people.

Mr. Speaker, the bill we are now discussing does not provide for the services needed so that a member can better respond to these requirements.

In my colleagues' opinion and in my own, the most important recommendations of the Beaupré committee were related to the field of services.

The committee suggested that each member should have an assistant "to help him cope with his substantial and complex duties both in Ottawa and the constituency". The government is doing nothing of the sort. It has kept its former position on the committee's recommendation that members who so desire should be assisted in setting up a permanent office in their constituency.

Since I represent one of the largest constituencies in Canada, I believe I have reasons to require that some services be provided.

Last week, in support of his request, the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) did compare the services he provides with those rendered by the representatives for the three provincial ridings that make up his own federal constituency.

In my case, comparisons may be made on the federal level since even if the constituency of Portneuf is not the largest in Canada, it is gradually becoming one of the most heavily populated; there are now 115,000 people living in Portneuf and this is more than Prince Edward Island which is served by four federal representatives.

Out of those 115,000 inhabitants, some 60,000 will be entitled to vote at the next election. This means that even if only one out of every thousand constituents wishes to see me, I have to meet 40 or 50 of them every weekend at my two offices located in different places in the constituency of Portneuf. And all this is in addition to the many letters addressed to me and the telephone messages my wife receives.

If a citizen of a 2,000 family locality writes to me, I just cannot say that is abusive. I cannot blame anyone for writing me, since I specifically ask people to get in touch with me whenever they feel it is necessary, whenever they feel I can be of use to them. Nevertheless, the fact that I have 115,000 constituents multiples those requirements. As I say again, Portneuf is represented only by one member, whereas Prince Edward Island, with a smaller population, has four representatives.

I also want to discuss the $6,000 now allowed for our expenses, tax-free. Under the present system, this allowance can be used either as such, or as a salary.

[Mr. Godin.]

Some members, whose expenses are minimal, have no need for such an allowance; it all depends on the territory to be served.

For instance, the Minister of Justice is really very lucky. He does not need his extra $6,000 and I am truly glad for his sake.

• (4:30 p.m.)

But some need a much bigger allowance than others. It is another matter to which paragraph (b) of subclause (S) clause 44 offer a partial solution. In my view, the only possible solution to such a problem is to request vouchers for all expenses. In this way, members of Parliament would be treated on an equal footing and would no longer be penalized, instead of having this unfair system, and genuine expenses would be paid to each member.

Moreover, I object to the extension of this system with regard to the non taxable allowance. I believe that no member of Parliament has the right to have a different tax system than other Canadian taxpayers. The actual allowances are not imposed according to the taxation principles generally admitted in Canada.

I would like to see this procedure rejected immediately whereby members review themselves their salaries and expenses. Let us settle this problem. I think that it would be better to establish an independent commission which could evaluate and review the sessional allowance every two or five years.

However, it is true that, occasionally, we have to work 80 hours a week; but let us not think that we are the only group in society to make efforts.

In the riding of Portneuf as well as in others, but in Portneuf more particularly, where the footwear and slipper industry, for instance, has managed to hold its own in spite of the adverse effects of imports, it is not infrequent to find men who, in order to hold on, put in countless hours of overtime.

In several fields where salaries are not high, workers often have to hold two jobs in order to make both ends meet.

Among those who are also dedicated enough to put in long work weeks, are lumberjacks, farmers, in short, people from all classes of society.

This does not meant that they are the most highly paid. If, for instance, we compare the work of a mother who toils hard day in and day out without pay, with the achievements of successive CN presidents who earn $75,000 a year and still show deficits, you will agree with me that a high salary does not mean competence.

It is evident that some members feel justified in receiving a more substantial allowance on the ground that it is hard for them to make both ends meet. But how many of their electors are not facing the same problem? How many Canadian industries can boast of an easy success? How many tradesmen are not facing financial problems at the present time? How many Canadians are subsisting on hope alone and are awaiting the effects of the just society?

Like every one of us, I cannot ignore the 70 per cent of the Canadian people who are unemployed or earn less than $4,000 per year. There are also those whose annual income is $5,000 or $6,000. In that group, there are also the farmers who worry about the situation in which the present government has put them.

I recall, in that regard, the motion proposed by the leader of the Ralliement créditiste (Mr. Caouette) in May 1967, asking for subsidies in order to raise the price of industrial milk to $5 per cwt. The answer given is known to all. The motion was rejected on the pretext that no money was available.

On December 17, 1970 I moved an amendment to Bill C-202, an Act to amend the Old Age Security Act. This amendment was simple enough as it proposed a monthly amount of $150 to be paid to every citizen of 60 years of age or over. This amendment was deemed unacceptable by the Speaker because such action would have necessitated disbursements on the part of the government. If we cannot make payments for the benefit of senior citizens, of people on pension, I do not see very well how we can today increase parliamentary salaries and allowances.

On three occasions I urged in this House the establishment of a guaranteed annual income for Canadians. Under the pretext that this would cost too much, Liberal members who spoke on such occasions felt a compulsion to stifle my proposals which meant a step toward better justice. All those who wish to refer to speeches concerning this matter may find them in Hansard of October 2, 1968, April 20, 1970 and April 19, 1971 where I moved a motion to this effect.

Right after my election to Parliament, on the occasion of the Speech of the Throne, that is on January 24, 1966, I had hastened to move an amendment for an increase in family allowances. Once again, all Liberal members present voted against it, again for the same reason, lack of money.

When we consider that there are 700,000 unemployed in the country, and when we see every day, under the present administration, factories that have to close down, whether this takes place in La Tuque, Grand'Mère, Montreal, Saint-Hyacinthe, Quebec City or Rimouski, we cannot but question the formula used by the present administration.

When we see young people looking for work throughout the country, we can be doubtful about the efficiency of this administration.

We have already experienced a depression in the years 1929 to 1939. Great experts at that time had succedeed in making us believe that we were slightly to blame since we were uneducated. However, today conditions are different. Young people are afraid of the future; they must wait for better days and see what the Liberal party has to offer. Finally, each spring, each autumn indeed each season, the Liberal party frankly declares to the Canadian people: We have nothing to offer at the present time, but be patient. So the people are waiting especially the young.

If they do so, especially the young people, it is not because they lack training, because we all know that we have now reached the period of the educated unemployed.

Mr. Speaker, the way a country is run is predicated upon its leaders and the failure of the present administration is a clear indication that our leaders are not up to their task.

It is ridiculous that the Canadian people should lack everything because of our affluence and I will not be in a position to support the bill now before us as long as this situation will prevail.

On January 12, 1969, our present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), then in Britain, stated that his most cherished economic formula was communism.

Mr. Speaker, if parliamentary indemnities are increased as much as provided by this bill, the Prime Minister's indemnity will be raised to $53,000 from its present level of $45,000. I suggest such a high compensation should not be accepted by a communist leader.

An article by Pierre Elliott Trudeau, titled "Fluctuations économiques et méthodes de stabilisation", appeared in Cité libre of March 1954 on page 34. It reads as follows:

> The problem still is to find out whether there is any limit to unemployment other than utter misery.
> The most obvious solution would be to level off income among the various social classes so that the poor will have more to spend and the rich less to save.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the misery of Canadians, I do not think it is time to pocket but rather to share. As long as the government and members of Parliament will not make better services available to Canadian electors, bills such as Bill C-242 will be unacceptable.

[English]

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I originally had no intention of speaking on this bill and I will not detain the House more than a very few minutes. My attitude toward the bill has already been expressed by my colleagues, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). I agree with them, that the problem of narrowing the gap between poverty and affluence is the major problem of this society. It seems to me that this bill is not consistent with that purpose. Frankly, I would have a hard time facing the old age pensioners and others on the edge of subsistence in my constituency if I supported this particular measure.

I do think that there are no objections in principle to an increase in the salaries and remuneration of Members of Parliament, but this bill does it in the wrong way and at the wrong time. I think an admirable case can be made out and, indeed, was outlined in the report of the advisory committee on parliamentary salaries and expenses headed by Mr. Beaupré, for a complete change in the practice regarding expenses and allowances for Members of Parliament. An allowance of $6,000 or $8,000 for expenses, income tax free but not accountable for by the members, creates a serious injustice. Some members have actual and clearly accountable expenses of very large amounts, while others have minimal actual expenses. Some members of this House have constituencies so large that travel expenses alone could eat up that expense allowance. Some, such as those with families and younger children, face the difficulty of double residential expenses, while others do not. Some members, and I must admit I am one, have expended considerable sums to maintain at their own expense offices in their constituencies for the service of their constituents. Others do not do so. The result is that the equity of treatment theory, that is giving the same salary to all and the same allowance or expense to all, produces serious inequities among members.

I would be in favour, Mr. Speaker, of increasing accountable expenses which would enable Members of Parliament to do a better job in the service to or in communication with their constituents. However, that is not what this bill does. This bill substantially increases salaries and non-accountable expenses. It fails, however, to provide for the principle of accountability of expenses. I am quite sure there are members in this House whose obligations are such that they need the money involved in the proposed increases, but the plain fact of the matter is that this substantial increase is proposed at a time when every public interest and every public exhortation by the government stresses the necessity of restraint in respect of wages, prices and salaries. I ask this question: how on earth can we, as elected representatives of this country, expect restraint from others which we do not practice ourselves? In short, Mr. Speaker, I think the proposed increase is simply wrong. I know there are sincerely held opinions to the contrary, but I feel obliged to act according to my own judgment and my own conscience and vote against this bill.

Some months ago when this matter first came up for public discussion I made it quite clear to my constituents, and shall do so again, that I do not propose during the present Parliament to accept any personal benefit from the increased salary if it is approved by Parliament.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether I may be the last speaker in this debate. I do not know, either, whether an arrangement had been made to perhaps end the debate. I can only say that I have wrestled with this problem for a long time, and perhaps that is the reason I have not risen before now to participate in this debate. On matters affecting my constituents, I try to speak for them in this House. On matters affecting me as a person, I think I owe it to my constituents to allow them to speak for me. I realize there are many members who require a pay increase. I do not think any person really realizes what each Member of Parliament has to go through, any more than I know what type of business operation is behind the store I see as I walk down a street. One day I see a beautiful store. The next day I notice that it is closed down, although I had the impression that it was making a lot of money.

I know people look at the present salary of $18,000 and are influenced by that figure. This is what they throw back at us. In the past I have supported pay increases and have taken the brunt of the attack in this regard. However, I have not suffered too badly as a result of my stand. I believe I owe an explanation to the House, and perhaps to my constituents, concerning the course of action I intend to take. I realize that my position is different from that of anyone else. I have found it necessary to supplement my income from the income derived from my farm, whenever it has made money. I can honestly say that during the past three or four years it lost money. At the same time, people on farms in the same area suffered the same fate. I have a young family which I must consider. I must also consider the electorate and remind myself that some day they may ask me to stay home.

I realize that the situation may be different in respect of a bachelor because I was in that position myself as a member of this House over a period of four years. I know how easy it was for me to get around the constituency when I had no other obligations. Now, however, the situation is different. I have a constituency which is perhaps different from most constituencies. In addition, I know the difficulties involved in trying to get around my constituency and still maintain some semblance of family life. I realize there should be a better system of pay increases than we have at present. The bill does not set out a formula which would avoid the necessity of our having to go through this same procedure again. I believe the constituents in my area have perhaps a different attitude from that of constituents in many other areas. In many urban areas where there are many doctors, lawyers, successful businessmen and the like, it is conceivable that the people accept the principle involved in this legislation. I, however, must walk up and down the streets of nearly deserted towns.

My constituency has been expanded to the point that it is almost impossible to serve it properly. Many Indians and others who populate the northern part of my constituency have not been visited because it is most difficult to do so. The area is very great. As I have said, the constituency has become larger and larger after each redistribution. The population in this area has become smaller because there is no money to be made in that area. I noticed an announcement in the newspaper the other day that bricklayers are to receive something in the order of $6.69 an hour. In areas where such salaries are not unusual, it is perhaps easy to obtain a measure of support for an increase of this kind. In my situation, this is not the case. Also, in a rural area campaign funds are pretty difficult to obtain. I have been involved in seven campaigns and I know who has had to foot the bill. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, quite freely that there would be some political advantage in my supporting this bill because I could easily use the extra money to my own advantage. But I believe there are other important considerations.

Because there are many people in my area who have low incomes, it is possible that rather than having volunteers come forward to see what might be done, people might come forward to see how much they could get from a member in view of the increase in pay. Try to divide this amount among constituents and then see how much you have left. As an experienced Member of Parliament I believe I have some contribution to make in this House and to the welfare of our country, at least more than was the case 13 years ago when I came here as a greenhorn. Therefore, I wish to set out my views on what I believe is a very difficult situation. I realize there are members here who sincerely need this increase in pay because they have no other source of income. I wish to state also that I believe most members so far have indicated—

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Hamilton Wentworth (Mr. Gibson)—Elections—Provision of right to vote to Canadians residing outside country; the hon. member for Humber-St. George-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—National Parks—Bonne Bay—Letting of contract for survey work; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland)—Youth—Opportunities for Youth Program—criteria used in considering applications.

Mr. MacEachen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should like the consent of the House to revert to motions for a moment in order to move a reference to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which has been requested. This is a reference I promised the committee some time ago. If I had the consent of the House, I would move it.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

AUTHORITY FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO HEAR MINISTERS OF NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SUPPLY AND SERVICES IN RESPECT OF "BONAVENTURE" REFIT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): I move:

That the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be given authority to hear the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Supply and Services in respect of procedural changes made and action taken in accordance with item 5 of the report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts on paragraph 101, refit and improvements of HMCS Bonaventure laid before the House May 13, 1970.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The House has heard the motion of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business, as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

EDUCATION

REQUEST FOR NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON UNIFORM STANDARDS AT PRIMARY AND SECONDARY LEVELS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government of Canada should consider the advisability of taking the initiative in securing to collaboration of the provinces in the convening of a national conference on uniform standards in primary and secondary education.

He said: Hon. members will recall that this subject was debated on March 2, 1970. I do not intend to repeat the arguments that were put forward then, nor do I intend to repeat my own arguments. However, I am very concerned about this matter, and it is for that reason I have again included this motion on the Order Paper in this session.

Last year the motion was talked out, and it will probably receive the same treatment this year. But if I can achieve one purpose, that is to get the provinces along with the federal government, but particularly the provinces, to look at this problem and to consider it at any future conferences, then I will have achieved something. So I am certainly glad to have another opportunity to debate this matter. It is a very important matter because it affects both youth and the movement of families. This debate also gives me an opportunity to respond to some of the objections raised by hon. members in the last debate on this subject. At that time, some hon. members felt, for one reason or another, that they could not support the motion while others felt they could. So, my argument today will be a rebuttal of the arguments put forward by hon. members on March 2, as recorded at page 4242 of Hansard of that date.

I wish to make it very clear that I believe educational matters are the responsibility of the provinces. Section 93 of the British North America Act sets this down very clearly. I am not advocating that the federal government take over this responsibility. The motion simply calls for the convening of a conference for the specific purpose of trying to work out a deal whereby our students will not lose credits by moving from province to province. I am simply advocating a greater co-operation between provinces rather than that the federal government take over education because, while education is a provincial matter, surely we agree that the federal government is also involved in it. Grants and loans are made to the provinces for educational purposes. We are very involved in student loans, in vocational training, in the program of training and retraining through the Department of Manpower and Immigration. These programs make it clear that the federal government is involved in an indirect way in education, and for this reason I have no hesitation in moving this motion which simply calls for a conference to be convened to inspire co-ordination and co-operation among the provinces.

In this motion, I ask the government of Canada to convene a conference, in view of its involvement in education, because of the inequalities that exist in the educational systems of the different provinces, in equalities that existed last year and continue to exist this year.

True, representatives of provincial governments meet at times to consider certain problems which come up in the field of education.

But I am not satisfied and that is why I would like the point on which I want to insist to be brought to the attention of provincial ministers of education in order to satisfy young people who travel across Canada.

Last year, I quoted figures, and I do not want to recall them. But I said that more than 100,000 young people who moved many times from one province to another are facing different education systems, which is no doubt likely to delay their progress.

It is therefore important to know that over 100,000 young people go from one province to the other every year.

[English]

I stressed the point previously that Canadians are very mobile, and last year I produced statistics to prove it. I emphasized the point that yearly over 50,000 families move from one place to the next, and on the average there are two children to a family. Young families are moving and jobs do not last long. I suspect that this year more families will be moving to try to find employment. The government wants youth to move, since it is subsidizing their travels this summer. Young people want to go to study in various provinces. So, there is cause for concern about this particular problem.

As I said, my remarks today are simply a rebuttal of the arguments put forward last year because I did not have a chance at that time to answer the comments made during the time allotted to private members hour. The hon. member for London West (Mr. Buchanan) made the following remarks, as recorded at page 4245 of Hansard for March 2, 1970:

> In conclusion, I should like to suggest that this motion has the effect of making more rigid and stratifying our structure, when really the solution and outcome should be more freedom at the individual and municipal level, giving the teacher more power to develop and design programs which fit in with these students who move from province to province.

Some valid arguments have been put forward, and I respect them, but my argument in presenting this motion is that I certainly do not want to limit the freedom of our youth. I respect the right of the individual to develop. I do not want to limit the initiative of the individual provinces, school boards and teachers. I just hope that the programs which are developed by the individual teachers, school boards and provinces will be recognized by other provinces. This is all I am asking.

The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) spoke somewhat along the same line, pointing out that there are many arguments nowadays in favour of individual rights and freedoms, and that these would be limited if we had uniform standards of education. Mr. Speaker, I am not calling for uniform standards of education. I am simply asking that what an individual province does in the field of education will be recognized by the other provinces, so that our young people will not lose credits when they move from one province to another.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Blair) and the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) agreed with me that this is a very essential matter. I would point out that many of their constituents are people who moved from other areas of the country, and who have been faced with this problem.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) pointed out that there are ten different approaches to curriculum questions. Mr. Speaker, I want the classroom curriculum to be geared to the individual considering his unique environment, his unique hereditary background. I do not want to stifle the individual. I do not want uniform courses to be offered across the country, but I do want the various curricula to be recognized across the country. I want the credits earned by young individuals to be recognized by each province. I do not want children to suffer the loss of a year of schooling because individual provinces may be proud of their systems and have a superiority complex.

I have only a few minutes left, Mr. Speaker, but I want to point out that since March 2, 1970, when we debated this matter I have received many letters from mothers and fathers whose children lost school years because their credits were not recognized in other areas of the country. They were the children of people in the Armed Forces, or of public servants who had been transferred from their home provinces. I have also read letters to the editor in various newspapers supporting my stand that an effort be made to recognize the credits given by the different provinces.

Recently, I wrote to each provincial minister of education asking for their co-operation in this regard, and for their comments on the matter. I have received a couple of replies, one in particular from the Manitoba Minister of Education, but I am afraid I will have to send him another letter because I do not think he really understood what I was seeking. In his reply he said:

> We have generally tended to consider that a little more uniformity in school programs would be helpful but the trend in Canadian schools and the pressure from both teachers and community, and nowadays from students in the high schools, is in the opposite direction.

I recognize that. I do not want to stifle the individual. I simply ask that what the individual does in one province be recognized in another province. I do not want one history course for the whole of Canada. I do not want a conference to discuss one geography or one mathematics course. I simply want the authorities to come together and realize that people are moving across this country, and that the credits given by one province should be recognized in another province. This is all I am asking, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

I therefore trust, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will understand my objections and the purpose of this motion.

[English]

Therefore I hope that hon. members who participate in this debate will recognize the spirit in which I am moving this motion. I am not seeking a uniform standard in the sense that the same courses should be offered in all provinces, but simply to have the credits given by each individual province recognized by all the other provinces so that our young people will not lose their credits when they move from one province to another.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) is to be congratulated on his perseverance in bringing this matter before the House today because the uniformity of education at approximate levels across the country is a matter of great concern. The constitutional committee has been travelling across the country recently, and I understand there is hardly any matter which comes up more frequently at its hearings than the uniformity of educational standards across Canada.

Section 93 of the British North America Act sets out that education is a provincial responsibility. I am sure that when the Fathers of Confederation sat down to draft that document in the years immediately preceding 1867 they thought of education in terms of small red brick buildings along concession roads throughout rural Ontario and the other provinces which were to become Canada. In this day of computers, modern technology and rapid transit, education has become an all-encompassing part of our way of life. We are involved in education from the age of three or four years right up to adulthood. If we were drafting a new BNA Act today, it seems to me it would be a far different document from the old one. I believe that most Canadians, if they had a chance to vote in a plebiscite, would opt for education being a federal matter so that people moving from one province to another would be able to move freely, without their children having to move back a grade in school or having to wait for a year while the students in their new class caught up with them.

Many representations have been made to the Constitutional Committee, and I am sure the hon. member for South Western Nova has received similar pleas, by people who believe that our educational standards should be more unified. Senator Cameron, who is an outstanding educator in our country, particularly experienced in the adult level of education, has often advocated the establishment of a national office of education which would be a sort of clearing house for the provincial departments across the country. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this would be a very valid start on providing a more uniform system throughout the country.

National Education Standards

Even though the federal government has no responsibility for education it is deeply involved in education, not only at the adult level through the Canada Manpower programs but even at the post-secondary level. Recently, Mr. Speaker, I placed a question on the order paper asking how much was spent by the federal government on the various universities throughout Ontario, and the reply listed the grants made to these institutions. It pointed out that grants were made through three programs, the first being health resources fund which assists the province towards the capital cost of health training facilities at various universities. The second program is the Medical Research Council grants, and the third is welfare grants, both of which consist of funds for a combination of capital and operating expenses, and are given to individual investigators rather than to universities.

The total for Carleton University for the last five years was given as $170,377. Another example is the University of Toronto which received $32,879,745 over the past five years. The list totals upwards of $50 million in this area of health grants alone for post-secondary education. As I say, the hon. member is to be congratulated for bringing this motion before the House. Certainly, within our provincial boundaries we have trouble maintaining the same quality and level of education. Before I became a Member of Parliament, I had considerable experience in establishing district school boards which would provide an equivalent standard throughout a small area. When this project is moved to the national scene in an attempt to provide equivalent standards across the whole country, it poses some problems but this does not mean we should not strive toward this end. Perhaps a national conference would be the first step.

In the area where I was active on the school board, for instance, there were very few kindergartens. When the new district board was established, which combined ten small township boards, then we had kindergartens throughout the area. This was a rural area where it was difficult to provide transportation and busing. It seems to me when larger units of administration are established the level throughout the district tends to rise to the top level, so perhaps this would be the case throughout Canada. If we were to have national levels and a grant system to support this, I am sure we would find that the level of education would move upwards in the provinces from the lower standards toward the highest standards which exist in the country.

Surely, education and training combined are the most important factors in the standard of living of any country. We used to believe that national resources or capital were the key to providing a high standard of living, but I am not sure that this is the case today. We know of countries which are very rich in natural resources, but which have a very low level of education and usually their standard of living is low. In other countries with large amounts of capital, if the education level is low then the standard of living tends to be low.

I like to use the term "training" as well as "education" because it seems to me that we tend to relate the word education to academic subjects whereas training tends to encompass more. When we raise the level of training and education in a country, we automatically raise the standard of living. So, Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to support the motion of the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau). I think he was wise in bringing this motion before the House this afternoon for debate during private members' hour. I am sure this is one of the most worth-while motions we will be debating in this House.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, admire the motivation which prompted the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) to move this particular motion this afternoon. I find myself in somewhat the same position as the minister of education for the province of Manitoba. The member for South Western Nova indicated that perhaps the minister did not understand what he was seeking, I am not quite certain either what the member is seeking.

Mr. Comeau: You didn't listen.

Mr. Rose: In his motion he makes the point that he would like the federal government to convene a national conference on uniform standards in primary and secondary education. In his speech he went on to say that he really did not desire uniform standards at all, but really was favouring the more individualized instruction. I do not know whether this means that he supports what he has said in the motion or whether he has qualified that in the speech we heard this afternoon.

In previous speeches I, too, have pointed out the desirability of some sort of uniform minimum educational norm across Canada. Perhaps this motion is quite modest in its extent because it calls for a conference on the subject. I am going to commit the supreme act of egotism and refer to a press report of my maiden speech in which I made some points on this very subject. At that time, I suggested that we should have a permanent national office of education. I agree with the member for South Western Nova and also the member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) that education is assuming a much larger role in our present society than it did when the constitution was first framed. I also agree that the constitutional picture would be quite different if this matter were before us now. I should take a mild excursion here to point out that, although education in the United States is a state matter there has been a federal office of education there for nearly a century. There is nothing to prevent us from having the same thing in Canada.

I suggest that a national office of education would give leadership in establishing some uniform minimum grade equivalents and subject norms across the country; it could stimulate and co-ordinate education research so that we would not remain dependent upon the importation of foreign educational research, money and skills; it could effectively help administer grants, directly to institutions if necessary, and hasten the day when post-secondary education at public expense would be accepted in the same way as secondary and primary education and, finally, it could handle education matters at the international level. We have had a number of embarrassing moments because education comes under provincial jurisdiction, when provincial representations at certain conferences have been taken as representing all of Canada. An office of education could co-ordinate such things as the Canada Council and other agencies in programs to make our cultural identity and cultural life much more meaningful.

I can go along with the member for South Western Nova from that point of view. Perhaps he has thought about it since presenting his original resolution last March and is beginning to recognize that what he suggested, that is uniform standards across the country, really means a return to the lock-step approach in which every child is taught the same thing in every classroom at the same hour of the day. I think he now realizes that this is contrary to the trends in education outlined in the excellent Ontario Hall-Dennis report, moving away from all kinds of rigidity, inflexibility and superimposed external structure. Instead, educators are concentrating upon a much more humanitarian and individualized curricula and methods in a modern way which is more in tune with the child's unique talent, interest and needs.

I recognize that support of minimum norms across Canada is only a halfway house. I also recognize the problem of mobility of people. Many people with children face a great deal of difficulty in the educational system when they move from one area of Canada to another. The minimum norms might be useful there in a number of ways, but only as a halfway measure to the day when each school system will have an individualized type of instruction for each child.

One of the reasons we talk about standards of norms is that each school system is hung-up with screening devices. In order to achieve academic respectability, each child has to be successful in jumping certain prescribed academic hurdles. The only way to academic sense is through the five holy roads, which include English, social studies, mathematics and a foreign language. It is about time our universities and schools got away from that type of thinking. There are many more meaningful things for young people, and certain intellectual interests, than this recipe which is not necessarily nourishing for all children. Uniform standards in the extreme are very wasteful in terms of manpower; they are grossly inconsistent with the objectives of the modern state.

As I said earlier, I recognize the problems of co-operation. Canada is recognized as a country with vast regional variations. I support the statement made by the hon. member that the people of some regions are permanently disadvantaged because of an impoverished educational system. This is certainly true of many rural areas in all provinces. It is true in terms of parts of the Maritimes, parts of Quebec and mid-Canada.

As the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) pointed out, there is a strong correlation between educational standards and affluence. The poor areas do not have enough money to spend on teacher training, buildings, equipment, curricula, development, and so on. The students are disadvantaged because of this, and the gap is growing wider. The same can be said from country to country and, as in our case, from province to province within a country.

About one year ago the Globe and Mail contained an excellent article about the lack of educational opportunities for Métis and Indians and how the lack of a suitable educational system had a negative effect on the future they could build for themselves. I would have been much happier to support this motion if the word "norm" had been used instead of "uniform standards". I think a standard applies undue rigidity. It also applies an autocratic superimposition upon the student of a particular area. The public regard it as a box in which all children, regardless of ability, are squeezed. We stamp-out a particular product, like cookies. If we had a minimum norm for all children it would be extremely useful to students, parents and teachers.

As long as we look upon norms as being voluntarily accepted, they will be valuable as objectives. They are of value to parents and students to compare the quality of education in a particular district with the national minimal norm. If one area is below the norm, parents can bring certain pressures on the local educational system to have it at least brought up to the minimum standard. It would be useful to have this pointed out.

When talking about norms, we should consider special norms for disadvantaged groups. Children in some areas do not have the same educational advantages nor the social, domestic or home advantages. This is reflected in their level of achievement in school. If we had minimum norms for these people it would be very useful. There could be a special norm for certain ethnic, immigrant minorities. We cannot expect everybody to jump over the same hurdle at the same time. We do not expect this in athletics, nor should we expect it in education. There could be special norms for Métis and Indians who are so often out of their own depth. It is very tragic when Indians and Métis, who have reached a certain level in their schools, come to an urban school and find that they cannot "hack it" because their educational background is insufficient. This would be helpful in assisting these disadvantaged groups.

I do not agree with the hon. member for Algoma that education per se will solve the problems of all people. I do not agree that a high educational standard necessarily means a high economic standard or high standard of living. I do not know whether it is a cause or effect. It may be that a high economic standard produces a high standard of education. It is like the chicken and the egg. I am not convinced it is necessarily so.

We have tended to oversell success through education. In the past few months many people have placed their faith in being highly educated, only to find that the economy of our country is not sufficiently developed to absorb them. Ph.Ds and others with high academic qualifications are joining the ranks of the unemployed. The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) is nodding in agreement. I know that he believes in this because he has mentioned it in the House many times.

There is a fundamental disillusionment with universal literacy. We thought that when literacy became universal everybody in our country would suddenly become very interested in politics, that they would become leaders, and that sort of thing. However, people are becoming influenced, not by the press but by the listening media. Mr. McLuhan has had some interesting things to say about this subject.

I think the motivation behind this motion is positive and goes in the right direction.

Mr. Comeau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Rose: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Comeau: Does the hon. member think that grade 11, for example, should be recognized as grade 11 from one province to the next? This is what I think is meant by uniform standards in the sense that credits are not lost in moving from one province to another.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Rose: I am pleased the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) has risen on this point. He asked whether I believed this. I was not certain, after his speech, what he believed. I would be prepared to say that grade 11 is grade 11; it should mean 11 years in school. We should not rule that grade 11 means the successful passing of one particular course as opposed to another when one course might not be suited to a student's particular talents. I should like to go into a great deal more detail on that point, but time will not permit.

Employers have been unduly impressed by certain documents such as certificates and diplomas. I do not believe education makes a person intelligent. I do not think education has anything to do with intelligence. Education provides a certain amount of verbal facility, perhaps, but it does not make a person smart. There are many young people who do not possess the standard academic qualifications yet they are capable of making an excellent contribution to society. Too often they are ruled out because they do not possess a union card or a certificate of education. Employers deduce from this that they lack ability. I do not think this is necessarily so. Moreover, school is often not the best place in which to store people for 11, 12 or 15 years. We are foolish if we suggest that education ends when we leave school. Frequently, far more education takes place out of school than inside it.

An hon. Member: You are talking it out.

Mr. Rose: I shall not talk the motion out. I cannot, in any case, because I am limited to 20 minutes. If there are no further interruptions, I shall end in a few moments; otherwise I shall ask the Speaker to substract the time taken by interruptions from the total time available to me.

In addition to considering the interchange of educational levels from province to province, we might give some thought to the interchangeability of teaching services. I see no reason why a teacher should not be able to move, freely across provincial boundaries. For example, if a person wishes to teach in my own province of British Columbia rather than in the hon. member's province of Nova Scotia, he should be free to do so.

Mr. Woolliams: It would be quite a benefit.

Mr. Rose: The contempt shown by some provinces for certificates issued by others is something we could do without. I support the concept dealt with by the hon. member in his explanation, but I do not support what the hon. member has put down in the written part of his motion as it appears in Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day. Nevertheless, he has explained his proposal satisfactorily to me and in these circumstances I think the conference he proposes would be a tremendous step in the right direction. Incidentally, the hon. member may not know this but there has been a secretariat of ministers of education in existence for the last three or four years. It is not the most energetic body in the world, and if it has done anything in that period it has failed to impress me by what it may have accomplished.

Mr. D. Gordon Blair (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I shall be brief because I know other hon. members wish to speak, including the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams.)

I had the privilege of speaking on this subject when it was raised by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) last year. I simply wish to report to the House that the problem he has raised for our consideration today is a very practical and important one in Canada. We have an extremely mobile population and in the course of a lifetime many families move not only within provinces but from province to province. This presents an extremely serious situation for many of those who live in my constituency in the suburbs of Ottawa, members of the public service who are obliged by the nature of their occupation and in the service of their country to move from province to province. I have found in all my dealings with my constituents that one of the problems which is most real in their minds is that of the proper education of their children having regard to the fact that they must move from province to province.

My main reason for speaking in this debate is not to repeat what I said last year, but simply to report that our debate at that time struck a very responsive chord in my constituency and elsewhere in the country. I see the hon. member for South Western Nova nods his head; I am sure he received a similar response. I was amazed at the number of letters I received from people telling me about the difficulties they had encountered in the education of their children because of the necessity to move from one educational system to another.

I was delighted that the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) qualified his contribution toward the end of his remarks. I say this because there has been in the discussion of the matter before us a certain academic prissiness; I might say, a degree of pedagogic rhetoric. The idea has been put forward that because there are new theories of pedagogy apparently designed to concentrate on the individual characteristics of each child, it would be a step backward for a conference to consider the better co-ordination of educational systems in this country. As the hon. member for South Western Nova made very clear, the mere fact that we now have new theories of pedagogy makes it all the more important there should be close co-ordination; children who move from one province which might still be operating under an old educational theory to another operating on the newer theory would suffer an even greater disadvantage.

I am not at all concerned whether we say that our aim is to secure more uniform standards, to establish what are called norms, to bring about co-ordination, or simply to recognize the fact that in Canada we have a unique problem arising from the extreme mobility of our population. The truth is that there is a problem which Parliament ought to recognize. It is not one just for pedagogues, boards of education or Members of Parliament: it is a problem for children whose education has been impeded—some of them, indeed, have suffered grave disadvantages likely to affect their future simply because we labour under a disorganized educational system.

In my opinion we should compliment the hon. member for South Western Nova on bringing this motion before us, and we should urge with all the force at our command that the proper authorities meet to consider what might be done.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I shall not speak at any length because in my opinion this motion is of such importance as to justify the House approving it before private members' hour ends at six o'clock. I support wholeheartedly the motion put forward by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau). It is obvious that the hon. member has worded his motion with a great deal of care. The motion reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government of Canada should consider the advisability of taking the initiative in securing the collaboration of the provinces in the convening of a national conference on uniform standards—

That is, uniformity of curricula.

—in primary and secondary education.

• (5:50 p.m.)

So he is talking about uniformity across the country in education, whether in the province of Quebec, Alberta or Ontario. Why has the hon. member worded it in that way? The reason goes back to the British North America Act and to the question of constitutional jurisprudence. In order to bring together Upper and Lower Canada, the province of Quebec—and properly so—asked that in the terms of confederation the question of education be left to the provinces. I suppose this is also the reason we had the B and B Commission.

I do not think our constitution is going to be changed in this regard, and perhaps this is why the party to which the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr.

Rose) belongs has had such a lot of trouble ironing out their Quebec policy. But I am confident that no matter how many conferences or committees study our Constitution, the provisions relating to education will remain intact.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Woolliams: The motion does not say that we cannot get the ten provinces together at a conference in order to iron out—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) rising on a point of order?

Mr. Rose: To ask a question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my time is limited. I have listened intently to the distinguished member for Fraser Valley West and I do wish he would give me a few moments. As far as his argument is concerned, every member of this House climbs the political ladder. Although he endorsed the motion, like many politicians he was climbing the ladder but proving himself wrong by wrong by wrong. As far as this motion is concerned, he defeated his own argument by his own intelligence—his highly-developed intelligence, I might say, since he is one of the best scholars in this House.

So the reason the motion was worded in this way is because of the Constitution. To the provinces was delegated jurisdiction over education. Therefore, I submit the motion is properly worded. The gist of both speeches on this side is that the hon. members were asking for the same thing but by a different method. The hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) was absolutely correct in putting the motion in the way he has.

I support the idea that has been put forward in the motion. We are becoming more nationalistic today. We are entering a period where people move much more from place to place. Members of Parliament who have young families have to move from British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, as I did myself some years ago. My children are a little older now, of course, and I have grown a little older myself; but when students from Alberta come to Ontario they almost have to start a new course of study. This is what the motion is trying to cure. Perhaps I am being disrespectful to my own province in saying this, but when my daughter came to Ottawa, although she had been an accelerated student in her class in Alberta she found she was at the bottom of the heap here and had to work hard to catch up. The elementary curriculum in Ontario is of much higher standard than it is in Alberta. This is what the hon. member is seeking to cure.

I hope that government members will endorse this motion and not talk it out. Uniformity is a matter that is important to the welfare of our youth, particularly to the education of our youth. This is why I endorse the motion. It is drawn in accordance with the terms and conditions of the agreement reached at confederation; it is in accordance with the terms and conditions of our constitution; it is also in accordance with the needs and demands of our young people who require uniform standards of primary and secondary education across the country.

In view of the arguments put forward, I hope the House will now move to adopt the motion so that the government is moved to gratify the desires of the hon. member who was motivated to prove it.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the intervention of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) has inspired me to say a few words on this motion, though not with any intention of talking it out. However, I have been left with so little time that perhaps I shall not be able to complete all my remarks in the time allotted to me, in which case I shall look forward to continuing them the next time this important notice of motion comes before this chamber.

My opening remarks are to express the gratitude of the House for the thoughtful care with which the hon. member for Calgary North clarified the careful thoughtfulness of the motion moved by the hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau), and we are indebted to him. Most of us understood the motion before the clarification, but since we have had this clarification we can now deal with the motion itself.

In his remarks the hon. member for South Western Nova was correct when he pointed out that whenever we in this House embark on a discussion of education we are always careful to point out that jurisdiction over this field is clearly with the provinces. He made that point and all other speakers have confirmed it. He also made a fairly good case for common standards of education across the country—not, as he said, where there is one history book and one geography text. Like the rest of us, he claimed that he would support a system which allowed for the maximum degree of diversity along the lines suggested so cogently in the Hall-Dennis report.

He then went on to make a very interesting and fairly compelling case for the calling of a conference to discuss such standards. I share the views of the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose) that a conference is perhaps not the best forum. I suggest this would really fall to the council of ministers of education. I think that the step the hon. member took in the interval between his previous address to the House and his speech today, namely, if writing to provincial ministers of education and making the submission to which he referred, is a constructive and useful one.

The hon. member also made the point, and made it very well, that in a federation children raised in one province should not be penalized academically if for one of a variety of reasons the head of the household is transferred. I feel strongly that this is the sort of thing that could well be discussed by a council of ministers of education.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The private members' hour having expired, I now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

[English]

On a rainy day, in troubled times, the following lines might be consoling to some hon. members:

Be still, sad heart! and cease repining;
Behind the clouds is the sun still shining;
Thy fate is the common fate of all,
Into each life some rain must fall,
Some days must be dark and dreary.

Longfellow wrote those words in his poem "The Rainy Day".

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING MEMBERS' SESSIONAL AND EXPENSE ALLOWANCES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen that Bill C-242, to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, and an act to make provisions for the retirement of members of the Senate, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, just before private members' hour I was attempting to point out that each constituency is different and that each member must therefore see things from a different point of view. I attempted to indicate that in many urban areas a great many people such as bricklayers, electricians, plumbers, and so on, earn more than the salary of a Member of Parliament. I represent a riding which is faced with a different situation: the average salary in my riding is much less.

There are many Indians resident in my riding, and I do not have to tell anybody what their average salary is. I represent a riding in which the miners are involved in a strike. Hon. members will appreciate the effects a strike situation has on a community which is almost solely dependent upon the payroll of one industry. For a consecutive number of years there have been crop failures in my area. This has caused a great deal of difficulty because the area is dependent upon the sale of grain. These are the types of people I deal with and live among.

To these people a large increase in the salary of a body of legislators is difficult to explain. Very few people really know the problems of others, but the salary an MP receives is public knowledge. People often get the impression that an MP is able to save his salary. Many have the impression that we still have the first nickel we were paid; they feel they have expenses, but we do not.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard).]

This situation remains difficult because the government has not devised a formula of increasing the salaries and allowances of Members of Parliament. Within one, two, three, four or five years, this or another Parliament will again be faced with a similar problem. The public seems to accept the fact that civil servants deserve increases. I think there is a time and place for this. In any event, I have to explain to my constituents an increase such as is proposed in this bill.

Perhaps to some extent this increase is justified. Like everyone else, my banker and I know what the situation is. I think a partial increase on the basis of a formula would have been far more acceptable. Even if I were to go along with the proposed increase—and there may be some justification for it—it is difficult to explain. In my federal riding there are no less than eight provincial constituencies. Each member of the Saskatchewan legislature receives $9,000, and the legislature may sit for only six or eight weeks per year. During the remainder of the year these representatives can be gainfully employed at their own occupations. In addition, these representatives are within easy reach of all parts of their constituencies: perhaps within an hour's drive they can visit all the areas they represent. They do not have to maintain a second residence because they are away from home only three or four days each week and can climb on a bus in Regina and travel home each weekend. When I compare this situation with my own, I wonder why I should apologize for any action of this type which the federal government sees fit to take.

Many of the Members from Saskatchewan represent northern ridings and have to fly into these areas in order to keep in touch with their constituents. In order to do so, one is lucky to get by on less than 50 cents per air mile. Hon. members can imagine how quickly this expense will grow. On such a trip a member might visit 50 communities where he sees some very shy children and a few squaws who have not accompanied their husbands to their jobs in the bush or on the fishing lakes, whatever the local employment might be.

You find out how fruitless and wasteful the expenditure of money can be in such areas, as well as how politically ungainful these things can be—because the money can be spent in many better ways. But, I believe these people have as much right as anybody else to be represented. When I realize that eight members of the provincial legislature take home something like $72,000 for representing the same area which I represent federally, and realize also that I am about 2,000 miles away from home, I think of the frustrations I have in attempting to maintain a farm for the future benefit of my family and myself should I be asked to stay home.

When I think of such things I have no hesitancy in respect of this increase. Most people, however, are very reluctant to accept it because when they look at the size of someone else's farm they believe that farming operation makes money while their does not. This is an automatic point of view. When I consider that some public servants, as I understand it, have had an increase from 1963 until the present time from $12,000 to $28,000 a year, I see some justification for our increase. But I think there must be a limit in respect of this whole matter.

In my final assessment of this question, I hope the government will take a hard look at the subject of salaries and place it in its proper perspective. I believe this question should be taken out of Parliament because nobody wants to talk about his own needs. I suppose our job is to talk about everybody else's needs but not our own. I suppose our families should tell us about our needs. This is not a very pleasant subject. It is not very pleasant to be involved in an argument about what we should or should not get, because each of us has his own requirements. All one needs do is become involved in a poker game with people who each have $100 to realize that pretty soon one or two individuals will have all the money and the others will either be in the hole or will have no money. This is the way of life.

However, if I should decide to vote against this bill I do not think I have any obligation to turn the money over to the government or to any other organization. I realize some members have committed themselves to such action. On reflection, I believe they may find in a year or two that their situation has changed and they will find things much more difficult than they do today. Whenever I vote for an issue which is voted down by the House, I have to live with it because it becomes the legislation of the land. If it should involve a tax increase, I must pay it whether I voted for or against it.

If, for instance, I should vote against Bill C-176 and Parliament should vote it in, I would have to live with it. I was in this House on the day when to all intents and purposes we voted down a government and one day later another vote was taken and the government was given another chance. Those were the rules that were established. I had to live with that decision. I voted for personal income tax exemptions, and they were not accepted —but I had to live with it. So I do not believe I must commit myself to anything. If Parliament in its wisdom says there will be an increase, so shall it be. But if it should say there will not be an increase, so also shall it be. I believe it is necessary that some of us stand up and object to these things. It will be a sad day in Parliament when someone does not rise and object to some of the actions being proposed.

I do not think an increase which can be interpreted to represent a 50 per cent salary boost can in any way be justified. We have lived through a period of several years and I believe we may be able to survive during the next year. I believe a better time for any increase would be after the next election. Perhaps a partial increase would have been acceptable at this time, but not a final one. I think that would have been a wiser course to have followed.

A formula should have been adopted in which rules would be set up to take this whole messy business out of this House. If it were taken out of this House, perhaps a commission could be set up either under the Auditor General or the Public Service Commission so that if an increase should be granted to the public service we would receive whatever increase might be applicable to the category in which it was decided we should fall. Although this is detail in which I do not wish to become involved, I believe it would have been a wiser course to have followed.

Another thing which might be noted at this time is that most of the objections to this increase have come from members from western Canada. It must also be noted that western Canada is the area of greatest frustration at this time under the present government. It is because we reflect the feelings of our constituents that we must speak out now to indicate that there is grave concern in the minds of many people about the course of action now being followed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, this debate, which has been going on for three days so far, is a very important one in that it is a touchy matter for members to vote themselves a raise.

This matter has been thoroughly aired over the last few weeks and it seems that this publicity has not brought about a clear understanding of the situation so far. This is why we have been receiving—for I believe my colleagues also have received a lot of mail—numerous protest letters on the subject of a raise in indemnities for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), for ministers and for members of Parliament in general.

A recurring argument advanced in these letters as well as in private conversations is that members should not be entitled to a big indemnity since they are not working. When people say that members are doing nothing, they do not mean so much that members are not working, but rather that they do not produce, that they produce little or badly, that is to say that most of the laws they enact, as is the case for that matter in most provincial legislatures, are not wanted by the electorate. In all their operations, Parliaments seem to be a knack for passing laws which people do not want. Therefore it is not surprising that there is a great deal of protest against the increase in the allowances and expenses of hon. members and senators.

Mr. Speaker, is a ticklish situation for hon. members to have to decide on their own allowances, but it seems that nobody else has the jurisdiction to do so. When an employee seeks an increase in salary from his employer, the latter considers first of all whether the employee is hard-working, qualified and efficient. Then, he will analyse the financial situation of the concern. If it is flourishing, the increase will likely be granted. But if it is in deficit, or on the verge of bankruptcy, I doubt that the employer will accept to grant the increase.

The situation being what it is, I feel the question is timely. Are all hon. members competent, industrious, efficient? That is what the public must ask themselves.

In addition, is the business of the country that prosperous, especially in the largest industry in the land, that is the Canadian Parliament?

The present economic situation leaves much to be desired. Indeed, were an industry as deep in debt as the Canadian government is, it would not go very far. Were that industry to pay as much interest to financiers as the largest industry in Canada does, I am afraid it could not continue to produce and sell at a profitable price. Yet that is the situation of the largest industry in Canada. The Canadian Parliament must bear that monumental debt and pay $2 billion in interest this year. Yet, the administrators of that large industry are asking, in addition, that their allowances and expenses be increased.

When the last increase was voted in 1963, the main argument of the right hon. Prime Minister Lester B. Pearson was that in order to attract men of high caliber as prospective members of Parliament it was necessary to offer them a decent salary. I agree, but that same reason was given by the present Prime Minister, at least at a press conference following the introduction of the bill before us.

But did many men of value get closer to the present Liberal Party? I have no doubt that men of worth became interested in the Liberal party as in any other political party. However, have those talented men been fully efficient? Have they had the opportunity to let their constituents or the Canadian people benefit by their ability? This answer is quite simple. No. The system does not enable them to do so.

When we consider the actions of our government since 1963, we can ask ourselves if the laws enacted show the merits of the elected representatives. Do they represent what the people had asked from their representatives or from the government?

The repeal of death penalty for qualified murder, the legislation on divorce and homosexuality the liberalizament and inflation, were those measures asked to the representatives of the people? Do we deserve, in their opinion, this raise?

I have here a recently established newspaper run by one of the former colleagues of my hon. friends opposite, the Hon. Yvon Dupuis. This week, he asks the following question:

Are our Members of Parliament worth $30,000 a year?

According to Mr. Dupuis, the remuneration of $26,000, of which $8,000 are tax-free, is equivalent to a salary of $30,000 in other fields of the Canadian industry.

Do they deserve such a salary?

If each citizen asks himself the following question: "Is my MP worth $30,000 a year?", he may draw favourable or unfavourable conclusions according to the type of MP who represents his constituency in the Commons. Indeed, there are at least two kinds of MPs who have a different way of exercising their mandate. For instance, certain representatives of the people owe their election to the mere fact that they were candidates of the best party running or under the banner of the best leader—

Mr. Dupuis should have added "especially of the party with the biggest slush fund." There, he would have been on more familiar grounds.

He went on to say:

—our parliamentary system allows this kind of phenomenon even though this is basically unacceptable.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Then there are the members who were elected above all on the strength of their individual ability or of the prestige they enjoy in their communities. It is therefore easy to say that the former are overpaid while the latter deserve the greatest consideration.

Mr. Speaker, the best answer to that question is to be found in that paragraph. Many members have succeeded in getting elected only because they had the support of their party and they have spent some thirty years here without once opening their mouths. They are like fish. Do those members deserve a raise in salary such as the one now proposed?

• (8:30 p.m.)

On the other hand, there are many others in all parties who work hard for their constituents. Some give up 70 to 80 hours per week to the service of their electors. Those deserve a decent salary, at least as much as in the building trades in the large cities such as Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. Dupuis also speaks about the noodles, and I quote:

The late André Laurendeau and Gérard Pelletier (former newspaperman and editor of La Presse) were fond of saying that many of our members, especially in Ottawa, were noodles.

It is easy to describe the member who is a noodle. He is the one who never sees his electors, who does not take part in debates in the House, who does not belong to any committee, who is never seen anywhere during his four-year term and who only comes back before his electors once every four years to ask for re-election on behalf of this great leader or that great party.

Mr. Speaker, I have often heard a Liberal member of Montreal say that the best way to get elected is to be known as little as possible by the electors. Today this hon. member holds a certain post in the public service. He is now quite prosperous. And God knows that such members are numerous enough to be talked about.

We rely on our electors to find these ghost members who are not doing much in Ottawa. Of course, $30,000 a year is much too much for them. Is it not paying rather a lot per pound for noodles?

While reading an article in a newspaper called Défi, a newspaper of the people for the people, written by the people, where everybody may express freely his opinions, I remembered that in the index of House of Commons Debates for the current session, from October 8, 1970 to March 11, 1971, that is 94 sessional days, there were 13 Liberal members who had not yet made any comment. On the other hand, there were 12 who had made comments only once, 12 who had made comments twice, and nine who had made comments three times. It is a rather poor record!

Mr. Speaker, I would rather not name these hon. members. I think it would be deemed unparliamentary. At least, objections would be raised somewhere, I think. If it is agreeable to the House, I am ready to table the list which could be published as an appendix to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should know that, under Standing Orders, it is forbidden to table such a document. I will suggest to him that this is quite elementary.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I will comply with your recommendation and go on with my remarks.

Considering this much too high unemployment rate, the uncontroled inflation, the destitution, poverty and worry of those who still have a job, I feel this is not the right time for members of Parliament to grant themselves such a substantial increase at one fell swoop. When a third of our fellow Canadians are enduring hardships, with little hope of an improvement in their situation under the present system, they are justified in being dissatisfied.

I have here, Mr. Speaker, two or three letters from my constituents. I could quote from hundreds of that kind Here is one:

Mr. Minister,

The writer is not addressing the Prime Minister, or any minister. She just calls me "minister".

This is to ask you to peruse the notice of acceptance I received from the Quebec Pension Plan.

I am writing you because I have faith in your ability and in your efficiency within the government. This is why I would ask you to plead on my behalf with the provincial government so that they review the amount of the widow's pension they want to allow me.

Just a few weeks ago, her husband was killed in an accident and she received a notice to the effect that the Quebec Pension Board will pay her a monthly pension. The notice reads as follows:

We are pleased ...

They are tickled pink—

... to inform you that the Board has approved the application for benefits which you have made. Payments will begin at the under-mentioned date.

This is the glorious amount of $43.52 a month!

They are tickled pink indeed to inform the widow that she will be the recipient of this amount. She has a dependent crippled daughter. The widow will receive $43.52 a month for the winter of her years.

Mr. Speaker, I think that this lady has cause for concern. I think that she has grounds not to be satisfied with the increase in salary that we are about to vote for ourselves.

Here is another letter that reads as follows:

This is to ask you to help us. I appeal to you because you inspire confidence and I also know that you are very influential.

Do you think it possible to live decently on a meagre pension of $160 per month, which is the amount that I have been receiving as welfare until now, but the officer in the La Sarre office advised me that from now on I shall receive only $130 a month; I do not see how we shall be able to make it, as with this amount we must pay food, clothing, school and municipal taxes, electricity, everything; this is nonsense, do you not agree?

My husband is handicapped, I am sick myself, we must take a great deal of drugs the cost of which is prohibitive, and we cannot possibly pay taxes on our house.

This family has to live on $130 a month and thousands of other families are in the same predicament, not only in my own constituency but all across Canada. This situation is not exclusive to the province of Quebec. One merely has to read the proceedings of the Senate Committee on Poverty and the briefs submitted to them to know of the extent of misery everywhere in Canada. While we do nothing to stop the sufferings of people who did nothing to deserve it, we are considering a raise in our own salaries.

The importance of our representation here in this House certainly justifies an adequate salary. Our expenses run higher than those of the head of any industrial establishment, or of any store manager, or of any public servant because we have to fulfil so many requests from our constituents. But to make everybody understand that is hard enough and I believe that before thinking about the administrators we should think about the administered. There is one thing however the government should have considered in drafting the bill before us, namely to facilitate better contacts between members, electors and departments. That is why the right hon. Prime Minister should have provided for the services of a secretariat in every constituency. People say that we can afford it with our expense allowance. Yet everybody knows that is not the only expense a member has to make.

In a riding as large as mine—there are others also that are very large—at least three offices or more should be opened to give satisfaction to all my electors.

The Abitibi constituency is larger than any other, except that of the Northwest Territoriesî In fact, it is bigger than the four Maritime provinces together and greater than France.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, needless to say that the $6,000 granted for expenses or the $8,850 granted to meet the needs of two or three offices in a constituency like that one, where one has to travel through the whole of New Quebec in order to visit remote communities, are absolutely inadequate.

The establishment in every constituency, like in the province of Quebec, of a well-equipped secretariat to meet the electors' requests, should have been provided for. Every weekend many people call on me or many others write to me during the week to ask me to plead their case with certain departments. Some people tell me that after writing four times, they have received no reply.

Therefore, if we had a well organized office, staffed with people in a position to contact the electors, the public servants and the departments during the week, with the help of the member, this would render a service not to the member but to the electors. The bill should have provided for the establishment of the services required.

Secondly, those who call on their member here are astonished to see in what conditions he must work. There is not a single civil servant, even among those earning only $6,000 per annum who would accept working in the conditions imposed on the member.

Imagine that the member who gets a phone call from an elector or must communicate with some department while two typewriters are running close by. Can the member have an interesting conversation while he is deafened by the noise of two typewriters?

When some visitors call on us, we have to ask the secretaries to wait in the hall.

This situation should have been foreseen long ago. However, very little progress is being made.

I do insist on those points in order to have the situation corrected as soon as possible. In the Beaupré report, mention is made of those conditions. However, all the recommendations put forward therein have been ignored in the drafting of the bill before the House. This is one thing that surprises us and it will surely surprise both the authors of this report and the public.

We are often asked this question lately: "Will you accept this salary increase if the bill is passed? Of course, we will accept it. At least as far as I am concerned, I will accept it. When we vote against tax increases and that the majority, the government steam roller, votes in favour of those tax increases, we agree to pay for them. This is why we accept these salary increases if they are granted. The news media are already reporting that it is an accomplished fact. Such is not the case. Once we have accepted this increase, if it is adopted, we will use this money as we please. You can be sure that no member will be at a loss to dispose of this money. The numerous demands made upon us will make it quite easy for us.

I intend to vote against this allowance and salary increase because the government should have thought first of the people instead of their elected representatives.

[English]

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I shall not be long in my remarks. My purpose in speaking is to register my opposition to the legislation now before us which, among other things, provides for a rather substantial increase in the indemnity and expense allowance paid to Members of Parliament and Senators. I have two real difficulties in so doing. First of all, I do not want my remarks to be interpreted as an attempt at a public display of virtue. My objection is not to a pay increase as such but, rather, to the fact that the pay raise is being provided in the worst possible manner in a piece of legislation that could not be much worse if its drafters had been instructed to make it as bad as human ingenuity could devise.

My second problem is related to the first, in that I find so much wrong with the legislation that I hardly know where to begin criticizing it. I have taken note of the Prime Minister's invitation to amend the bill. I am not taking him up on that invitation because as legislation, this bill is so bad that it needs not so much amendment as total rewriting. The ineptitude of its sponsors is unbelievable.

I have sat in this House for only a year, but I have been able to supplement my limited personal experience on this touchy question of salaries by conversation with my colleagues in all parts of the House. There remains no doubt in my mind that the present salary and expense allowance works severe hardship on many members of this House. Such problems have been well documented in earlier speeches, so I need not go into them again. I am also convinced that the manner in which expenses, especially, are paid creates injustices and inequalities none of which are corrected by this legislation.

Thus, my first objection to the bill is that it does nothing to correct the inequities and injustices in the present method of payment—I shall return to this idea in a moment—and that it attempts to meet the financial problems of some members in a manner which can only suggest to the electorate that their representatives have their hand in the till up to the elbow.

I think it unacceptable that the Liberal government has once again chosen a course of action the end result of which can only be to further debase the reputation of this institution in the eyes of the public. I do not say it is unacceptable because as a member of this House the government's action will also cast discredit on me, although to be honest I do not like that effect one bit; rather, I say this legislation is unacceptable because it is short-sighted and wrong-headed to bring down a piece of legislation which can only further detract from the credibility of the central institution of Canadian democracy, and to do so at a time when powerful social currents are already placing in doubt the utility of the institution. So doing may cause more people to seek other channels of influencing the way in which they are governed, some of which may have the decidedly adverse effect of intensifying the aura of societal confusion and disintegration which characterizes this decade.

This rather unsavoury aspect of the legislation could have been avoided by the simple expedient of having the increase come into effect, not last October but, rather, at the beginning of the next Parliament. I know the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said that this approach was rejected because he felt it would have the effect of making the next election centre around the issue of MP's salaries and that, in effect, we would be treated to the ridiculous spectacle of candidates for Parliament bidding for office on the basis of how much lower than their opponents' would be the salary they would accept. Undoubtedly, some of the more simple-minded candidates would adopt such an approach but I have enough confidence in the good sense of the Canadian electorate to believe that it would get them very far.

On the other hand, making the raise take effect at the beginning of the next Parliament would give the Canadian public the sense that they do have something to say about the remuneration their representatives are to receive—an opportunity denied them by this legislation. Moreover, it would enable them to view candidates with an eye to determining which of them would be worth the increased emolument, and it would meet the argument—which to me has considerable validity—that we agreed to run for the office knowing what the salary would be and we have no business altering the agreement midway through the term of our contract.

My second objection to the legislation is that it offers no formula to spare Parliament from having to go through this ridiculous and degrading exercise in the future the legislation contains no provision for regularizing the process of reviewing salaries of Members of Parliament. In a letter to all members of this House, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Reid) drew to our attention the procedures for review employed in New Zealand. The leader of my party has suggested relating MP's salaries to those paid to a selected salary classification in the public service. Many other suggestions purporting to have a similar effect have been put forward, but none of these is included in this legislation. Because this legislation makes no attempt to regularize the salary review procedure, and because it has the effect of perpetuating the currently entirely unsatisfactory method of salary review, it is bad legislation and I am opposed to it.

My third reason for opposing the legislation is that it does not meet our most pressing needs as members of this House. It does not provide us with the services, the accountable expense allowance—I emphasize the word "accountable"—nor the staff necessary to adequately discharge our duties as Members of Parliament. It does not provide us with the means necessary to provide our constituents with the kind of services they have a right to demand of us. Nothing could do more to assist us in re-establishing this institution as a relevant, important and central institution of our democracy than providing Members of Parliament with the tools properly to do their job. If we were able properly to do our job, I am sure there would be few objections raised to our receiving a salary commensurate with the responsibilities and the demands of our position. However, this legislation makes no provision for levels of service to members necessary to enable them effectively to do their job.

Finally—and this is not my final objection to the legislation but merely the final objection I wish to inflict upon the House this evening—this legislation does not rid us of the very distasteful practice of placing Members of Parliament and Senators in a special category by providing them with a non-accountable expense allowance. As long as the expense allowance remains non-accountable, the public will continue—with every reason—to view with a jaundiced eye our protests of virtue that this money is spent on doing our job. As long as expenses remain unaccountable, the inequities and injustices within this chamber will persist.

Because of the nature of my constituency, it costs me more to represent it properly than it does the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to represent his, while the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Simpson), whose constituency covers two-thirds of the land area of Manitoba, encounters more expenses than I do. Yet we all receive the same expense allowance. That is unjust. A fully accountable expense allowance incorporating the substance of the recommendations for classes of expenses, maximum limits and differentials, according to the type of constituency, included in the recommendations of the Beaupré report, would have helped overcome these injustices and inequities. There are no such provisions in the legislation before us; therefore I oppose it.

I now come to the awkward part. I intend to vote against the legislation; but what will I do beyond that, should the legislation pass? I can only say I will ensure that I receive no financial benefit from the increased indemnity for the duration of this Parliament, nor will I collect it in the form of back pay should I be re-elected. How I will dispose of it, I have not yet determined, although it will probably be in the form of a gift to the Crown in right of Manitoba because that government at least makes the kind of mistakes which I would be likely to make myself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rowland: I realize that what I intend to do is merely a gesture and, beyond that, a gesture which is a luxury some members simply cannot afford. For various reasons, including the fact that my children are still too young to involve much in the way of additional expense, and because my parents are still willing to support me to the extent of supplying me with a room and a free car when I am in my constituency, I can afford to make this gesture and thus reinforce my protest against the legislation. Because it is bad legislation, and because I can afford to do it, I am doing it.

I do not feel particularly happy about taking this action. I do not even feel particularly virtuous. I simply feel that this is one of the few occasions presented to me where I can do something meaningful to register my protest against yet another act of stupidity on the part of this government, and I intend to take advantage of it.

As this legislation concerns me directly and no other class of citizen, for once I am placed in the situation where I do not have to vote for an essentially bad piece of legislation because it has some good points and will help some people. For a change, I can say it is bad legislation and I want no part of it. That is what I am doing.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member permit a question before he resumes his seat?

Mr. Rowland: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): In view of the sincerity of the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland), I would ask if he is in favour of the increases that the NDP government of Manitoba is giving the total membership—an increase from $7,600 to $12,000 per year—in view of the fact that the provincial governments sit approximately two and one half months per year? Does the hon. member favour that?

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, I can say quite frankly that I think the legislators in Manitoba are underpaid.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rowland: I have not seen the details of the legislation to which the hon. member has referred. If the legislation is framed in the same way that the legislation before us is framed, I would have the same objections to it, but I doubt very much that it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Just one short supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member does not have the floor. The hon. member can make a speech if he wishes to do so. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) can be deemed to still have the floor and allow a further question from the hon. member.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I would also like to thank the hon. member for Selkirk. In view of the proposed increase in the province of Manitoba, and in view of the fact that over and above the $12,000 salary they are proposing to pay $40 per committee meeting, I would ask the hon. member for Selkirk whether he favours that idea of the NDP government of Manitoba.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Rowland: By virtue of the fact that I have not seen the legislation, I can only repeat what I have already said to the hon. member.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, like many other members I am very concerned about this matter. I am concerned in the same way that I was in 1963. At that time we probably did not hold-out long enough to make any major change in the legislation. I am not sure whether we can do that at this time. It may be very well for a board of directors to arrive at a salary increase with the agreement of five or six of its members, knowing full well that the company they are operating belongs mostly to them: in most cases the directors control the majority of the stock, so it is not unreasonable for them to vote an increase in their own salaries. The other shareholders probably do not care very much about it.

• (9:00 p.m.)

In our case the shareholders care very much indeed, and their attitude is a reasonable one because they assess the situation in terms of their own wages and responsibilities. It is very hard to determine the responsibilities and duties of a Member of Parliament because they vary so much from one constituency to another. Many members over the years have given a great deal of themselves and sacrificed a great part of their family lives in representing their constituencies. They have gone much beyond what would normally be considered the normal call of parliamentary duty. On the other hand, there are members who don't do a damn thing in return for the money they get—and that is a fact. There are members who seldom, if ever, are here. I am sure we can all look around and think of people we only see a few times a year.

Mr. Baldwin: And there are some we see too much of.

[Mr. Rowland.]

Mr. Peters: That may well be true; but as long as this is a place for talk, anyone doing that is fulfilling part of his duty. My hon. friend who just finished speaking left me with the impression he would favour leaving the matter up to the voters. This would be an excellent way of doing it after an election, but I can imagine the chaos it would cause during an election. There are some who are sufficiently well-off to get on the negative side—"If you vote for me I will give the constituency $50,000."

Mr. Hogarth: Arnold, take your money and sit down.

Mr. Peters: That is the easy way. That is what is wrong with this legislation. Some are saying the constituencies should have a voice in this, and I think they are right. For a long time the hardest wage negotiations in the unions were those conducted with their own staff. I have sat a number of times in talks with two large international unions when these matters were up for discussion. These are the people who negotiate on behalf of all their membership. They negotiate for all kinds of trades and they take whatever the traffic will bear. But when they start negotiations with a district director or national director, the shoe is on the other foot; it is a case of how cheaply they can run the organization and how much they can get away with.

When these representatives were negotiating with their own staffs they said: Let us be reasonable and fair, but let us keep it as cheap as we can get away with. This is partly the trouble we have in Parliament. I would be pleased to support this legislation if I were sure the committee would insist on doing something about the kind of negotiations we carry on. Surely we can attach ourselves to some segment of the civil service, not deputy ministers because the government decides what their salaries should be, but we should be able to attach ourselves to some senior division of the civil service on whose behalf bargaining is conducted by outside agencies. I realize the idea is not new; it has been mentioned by a number of others.

No doubt the government will make something of this debate, but I think the House is likely to do what the hon. member on the other side said, that is, sit down and take the money.

An hon. Member: You are going to take it.

Mr. Peters: Certainly I am going to take it. That is the part I don't like. The hon. member says I am going to take it. I represent one constituency of this country and as its representative I will get the same salary as any other member. It will be equal to any other. That remark was an insult; the kind of insult you always get from nincompoops. But I do not want to be sidetracked. Let me make it clear that in my opinion it is cheap politics for any member to say he intends to take less for his riding than other members who are paid to represent their constituencies. What I am suggesting is that we are doing a lousy job of deciding how to arrive at a suitable arrangement. But whatever is decided in the end will be the result of a majority decision in the House, and every constituency is entitled to the same amount of money no matter where it is situated.

Mr. Hogarth: And you will tell them you voted against it.

Mr. Peters: I intend to vote against it, against the system. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) has arrived very late. I have gone over this before. I assure him that if he can change the system, if he will arrange for our salaries to be linked with those of civil servants on whose behalf bargaining takes place, I will support the bill on third reading no matter what the conditions are. I went through this once before. I told my constituents: That is the amount of money which will be paid. I voted for it and all you have to do now is indicate who you think is going to earn that money for the riding. And that is the way it will be after the vote is taken.

For some time now our interests have been diversified. Many of us are in the House less often than we used to be. We attend committee meetings and take part in the work of Parliament in other ways. But listening to many debates recently, especially about nine o'clock at night, I have noticed there has only been about one person in the press gallery. Tonight there are quite a number of people in the press gallery.

Mr. Gleave: Probably they ran out of booze.

Mr. Peters: I shall not make a pitch to the press gallery, but one of the difficulties about deciding the pay of parliamentarians is that we must do it in a fishbowl while great agonizing goes on in the news media. This matter will be discussed for years. It is only recently that I have gone back to earning $12,000 a year; for a long time it was $18,000 a year. Now, to make the increase appear larger, it is $12,000. When the members of the Ontario legislature got as much as they did, I was surprised to find there was very little said about it in the press. But when we get any concession there is a great deal of coverage, most of it adverse.

There are other questions which must be answered before the question is settled. One is the idea of making crooks out of Members of Parliament simply because the commissioners of internal economy reached a decision regarding the interpretation of one word in an act which was already on the statute books. When a member of Parliament is out of Ottawa he telephones his office, asks for himself, and his secretary says that he is not there. When Bell Telephone makes the connection with the member's office they are given the number from which he is calling, the office then phones that number back and as a result the call costs nothing.

We are proposing to pay Members of Parliament $26,000 indemnity and expenses, but surely to God we can make honest men of them! It is rather like the prostitute who wants her customer to pay for the bed; it is a small consideration. But after all, if I get $26,000, why steal nickels from Bell Telephone?

An hon. Member: What do you want, double the amount?

Mr. Peters: I am sure every member does. If not, he must be nuts. After all, Bell Telephone pays the bill and we have not yet nationalized that company.

There are other considerations. Many of my colleagues have referred to improved accommodation, and I think there is a great deal to be said in support of that argument. But I am going to oppose this bill just the same. If there is no real issue for the next election campaign, someone will make an issue of our pay increase and some members will be defeated because of it. In 1963 only ten of my colleagues voted against similar legislation, as did the former Leader of the Opposition—and only three of those ten are still in the House, the right hon. member being one of them. So I do not have much sympathy—I say this sincerely—for those who oppose this legislation on the ground that they will run into problems in the next election campaign.

There is no doubt that we need an increase in indemnity, but we should not have had to wait ten years for it. Colleagues of mine in all parts of the House are in serious financial difficulties. It may be their own fault in that they have been overly generous, but you are always asked to be fairly generous when people are trying to raise money for charitable purposes. It is very nice if you are affluent enough to make a hand-out as a sort of emergency measure. I remember that prior to the 1963 increase I was getting a further $1,000 into debt to the bank each year and, like every other hon. member, if I was out of town I tried to get someone to buy me a meal. I simply did not have the three bucks for the price of a meal. I am not suggesting that I am badly off. My family has mostly grown up now and I do not need as much as some other hon. members. Certainly I do not need as much now as I did when I had a family of five or six children at home who were growing up.

An hon. Member: Well, which was it?

Mr. Peters: The hon. member laughs when I give the number of children I have had. Some people have a set number of children, but at my own home this was not necessarily so. One night I went home and found we had added another 15-year-old. My other young boys found him sleeping in a car and since it was getting cold decided to bring him home, and he lived with us for about a year and a half. So the number varied. I thought I should explain that, Mr. Speaker.

I do not oppose this legislation on the question of amount. I oppose it because I am afraid that unless some of us take a very strong stand we will again find ourselves passing the same sort of legislation some time in the future. I do not think it is fair to ask Members of Parliament to vote their own increases. We should not be put in this kind of position. There is a rule that we are not allowed to participate in something that is to our financial advantage, and with the exception of increasing our salary it is true that we do not.

I think a government that has pledged itself to providing leadership should appoint some person outside the government to negotiate our indemnity so that the public is made aware of how the negotiations are carried on.

Without this we will again find ourselves agonizing over similiar legislation. No matter the outcome of this vote, I strongly urge that we attempt to solve this problem and that in doing so we make no distinction between the remuneration paid a member from one riding as opposed to that paid a member from another riding. The indemnity should be the same for all members. If an hon. member wishes to give large grants to charity, that is his affair. We each represent ridings which are equal in terms of this Parliament and in terms of the law. Therefore, I strongly urge that no attempt be made to change the situation.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the hon. member a question. I was impressed by what he said and I have the same problem as he, but would he be more inclined to support this legislation if the government House leader were to indicate, when he winds up the debate, that it is the intention of the government to establish a committee charged with the responsibility of examining the question? Such committee could examine ways and means of dealing with the specific problems to which he has referred, such as arriving at some formula by which our increases are dealt with automatically from now on, and the question of expenses which has bothered a lot of members. If the government House leader would indicate that it is the intention of the government to refer the question to a committee, would the hon. member change his mind on this bill?

Mr. Peters: I should like to be able to say yes, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Don't waffle.

Mr. Peters: Waffles from all sides of the House come in different shapes and categories. I should like to say yes, but I do not believe that the minister will say that, because the matter has already been referred to a committee. I am sure that that committee will make some decisions in this regard. If the minister can give that categorical assurance, I would support the bill; but I do not believe the President of the Privy Council can do so, even though he might be willing to try. I will wait until third reading, which is acceptance of the bill, and if that kind of proposition is put forward I am sure a lot of other hon. members as well as I would be pleased to support the bill, though doubtless many others would not.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Before I recognize the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) I should advise the House that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I hope not to take too much time in making some comments and that I will maintain the generally moderate tone of the debate. I congratulate hon. members who have participated and who almost without exception have resisted partisan considerations when making clear their positions.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Having listened to all the speeches, my impression has been reinforced that this is a very difficult issue. Almost every member who has spoken has had a somewhat different approach. While most members of the NDP who spoke were generally opposed to the bill, there was a very distinct difference of opinion within that party on certain details.

I begin by saying that foremost in the minds of most hon. members was the effect that the passing of this bill would have on the image and credibility of Parliament. That is a real concern, and it seems to me something ought to be said on the other side of the issue. It is true the image and credibility of Parliament will be judged in part by what we do on this issue, but it will also be judged by the people of Canada on what Parliament has done in this and previous sessions to assist broad classes of people in the country. It would be unfortunate if we supported the impression that no progress had been made in other fields during this session. We have dealt with old age pensioners—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Forty-two cents' worth.

Mr. MacEachen: We have dealt with retired civil servants, we have dealt with retired CNR pensioners, we have dealt with adult members of the labour force, through unemployment insurance amendments and amendments to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, and we have dealt with a major summer program for students, costing $57 million, bearing in mind that the cost of this measure represents a small part of the total program for that group. We have on the order paper a number of measures dealing with assistance programs for the farmers in Canada. I make this point in order to clarify for my own benefit and for others that Parliament has been occupied all this session with issues affecting the people of Canada generally, and we have for these three short days been dealing with an issue that is very troublesome but does affect Members of Parliament.

The leader of the NDP, I am sure mistakenly and not deliberately, made a point in his speech which I should like to mention. It had been mentioned earlier that day in an editorial in one of the daily newspapers. It was to the effect that in making the last increase in 1963 it had been intended that the increase would take into account future years as well as past years. I have read the entire debate of 1963 and nowhere can I find any reference by any member of the House, let alone of the government, that the increase made in 1963 was to be projected into the future. In fact, the opposite case was made by the then Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, who stated that the increase was large because the government and Parliament had failed to act for a long period of time, and because of the increase in the cost of living and the general cost increase. For those reasons the increase made in 1963 was very large.

Hon. members have said the timing of this measure is wrong. Of course it is wrong. There will never be a good time to increase the salaries and allowances of Members of Parliament in this way and the timing will continue to be wrong in the future. In 1963 the action was taken at a time when the economy was on the upswing and unemployment was relatively low, or at least declining. Yet the increase was criticized by many of the same people who are questioning the present increase as being unwarranted and inappropriate. I agree that the timing is wrong. It will never be right; and it will never be right because there will never in my lifetime be a time when all the needs of the Canadian people will have been met, when every aspiration will have been realized, when every goal will have been reached in social and economic fields so that at that moment we could say: Now is the time, because everything is fixed up in every field and members should have a raise.

When I was speaking earlier I remembered a speech made by the late Clarence Gillis who spoke in favour of the pay increase of 1954. He said, in effect, "I have fought all my life to improve social security and to eliminate unemployment, and I continue to fight. I do not see that my efforts will be reduced if I now recommend that the salaries of Members of Parliament be increased."

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) took the view that it would be better to eliminate poverty entirely and it would be better to reduce unemployment or remove it altogether before taking action on this issue. I seriously suggest to him that this applies to every sector of the economy. Carried to its logical conclusion, a well-organized group of workers should not increase their own wages through collective bargaining and should not be permitted to do so under that prescription, unless those less fortunate and the weaker in the economy are brought up to their level. I do not foresee when it will be possible to totally reach our social goals making it possible to do something about members' salaries.

That places all of us in the unfortunate dilemma of admitting that everything is not 100 per cent in our society but that we are taking this action. I do not see much comfort, either, in the solution advanced that we should not decide on this question until after another election, that is, that we should do the job at the next Parliament. That suggestion has a certain attraction but one could question its validity. It would almost certainly make the question of members' indemnities a matter of partisan debate. It would certainly make the level of remuneration an election issue.

Do we want to make it an election issue? It would be bound to encourage candidates and prospective members, who were well-heeled, to offer themselves to the electorate at a lower rate of pay in the hope they would be elected instead of persons of modest means who needed all the income in order to carry out their responsibilities. Is this what we want? Is this our objective? Do we think this would improve the credibility or the image of Parliament? As was pointed out by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland), if we pursued that possibility the government would probably state its future policy before the election.

In any event, the pay and allowances proposed in this bill, if carried, will be subject to the strictures of the electorate at the next election. We cannot escape that responsibility. They will know what has happened, and if they wish they will bring this government to task if they feel it has gone too far. Suppose, however, that the government did take a position and held it over until the next election. Members and candidates would be free to choose their own course in the election campaign, by the very nature of things.

If, by the way, the proposals were to take effect only after the electorate had passed judgment—a situation which does not often happen in our system because verdicts on legislation are usually given by the electorate post facto—under what circumstances is it to be concluded the proposals have been sanctioned by the voters? I wonder how one would determine that the proposals had been sanctioned by the voters. Would this be determined by the re-election of the government which proposed the increases and, if so, would it apply even though that government did not receive 50 per cent of the votes cast? If the majority of members—this is probably what would happen—of all parties spoke out against the increases during the campaign, would this mean that the increases would not take place even if the government which proposed the increases should be elected?

I see nothing but difficulty in this course of action. We can talk about a problem at the moment, or talk about a dilemma—but this is what we would bring about if we put this issue before the people in an election campaign. That is my personal opinion. I believe it is much better, in the interest of Parliament, to do the job now and take our responsibility as a government and as Members of Parliament. I have said the government is not selling this legislation to anybody. We do not think we have much to gain politically by bringing in this legislation. There are a few politicians on this side of the House as on the other side, and they know there is not much to gain. But we do it because—

An hon. Member: It is a matter of principle?

Mr. MacEachen: No. We do it because, as the hon. member for Selkirk said, there are members in this House who are suffering severe hardship. That is our difficulty. The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) has stated in somewhat similar terms the difficulties faced by members of the House of Commons. That is why the government is bringing in this measure. We have been told by our supporters what their difficulties are, and we have been told by members in other parts of the House what their difficulties are. It was only after we had heard that and after we had appointed an independent committee that we decided to bring in this measure.

Remember that before we had the committee we thought everything would be a lot easier if an independent body recommended what we ought to do. We said that if an outside body looked at us and told us what to do, we would accept it, the public would accept it and it would be a lot easier. We had the independent examination by the committee and we did not have—I do not know what to call it—the courage to go all that way and decided to give, on the salary side, a little better than half what the independent body said we were worth. That is what is before the House on the salary side, and members are not satisfied. Members still ask for an independent body. It would not help us to have an independent body make recommendations in the future, because we would still have our own misgivings. The only way that would work—and I refer to the comments of the former leader of the NDP, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas)—would be not only to give that independent body the right to examine but also the right to fix the rates. That is the only way it could be taken out of Parliament.

But having made the canvass of members themselves, having had the Beaupré report tell us what we ought to get, and having had consultations in our own caucus and with all the opposition parties, we finally came forward with what we thought was probably the best and most acceptable arrangement considering the diversity of views which exist. Everybody has a different idea about what should be done. Some say the raise is all right but the expense allowance is wrong. Some say the raise is fine but it should come after the next election. Somebody must take the responsibility. The government did take the responsibility and placed the bill before the House, and the House now must take its responsibility and accept it or reject it. That is the way our system works.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: We have had a very good debate. I believe any person who wishes to read the debate will find that every point of view has been canvassed. I am sure that nothing I say will convince hon. members who have made up their minds to go a certain way. I am satisfied nothing I say will change their point of view. That is fine, but I believe it is important to have all points of view on the record.

I wish to conclude by referring to comments made by a number of members, the most recent of which is a comment by the hon. member for Timiskaming. He wondered why we did not provide a formula for the future. It is not that we did not think of it or consider it; it is simply that we did not have the conviction that we could devise a formula that would fit the situation. Is Parliament ready to give an independent body the right, not only to consider what the remuneration should be but also the right to fix the rates in the same way we have given the Representation Commissioner and his group the right to fix electoral boundaries? Many Members of Parliament would say we went too far in giving that right to an independent tribunal. Do we want to do that?

We considered the idea put forward by the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Lewis) which was supported by others and which has a certain value, namely, that we tie our rates in the future to an appropriate public service category or to a range of categories. We were on the verge of accepting that idea. Why did we not accept it? The government at some point is obliged to set rates for the public service. It might be better to attach these rates to the bargaining groups, but at some point the Treasury Board, the representatives of the government, must agree on what the final bargain is to be. That is understood. We wondered whether there would be a ground for criticism to the effect that the government, in setting the rates or in agreeing to certain rates might have had in the back of its mind a way of increasing the rates for Members of Parliament.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: Not even your government would do that.

Mr. MacEachen: Perhaps we have been much too punctilious and much too perfectionist—

Mr. Peters: Could I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may ask a question if the minister is in agreement.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to complete my remarks. I will answer the hon. member's question later. I want to say that we are still interested in this proposal, and if in the committee members generally feel that this is a common ground by which we can set rates in the future for allowances and expenses, we will honestly search for that solution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: If members generally feel that tying it up with some appropriate category—I do not know what it will be—that will be generally accepted is the right way to proceed, then we will search honestly for that solution, because we have not ruled it out and I told hon. members quite frankly why we did not put it in the bill. I think it would be much better to have it come this way than through a government recommendation before the debate commenced.

I have nothing to add to what I have said, except to refer to the comments I made on the non-accountable, tax-free allowance. That has been subject to considerable discussion. I will not repeat the arguments I made. I said when I introduced the bill that it was an arguable point and we decided to move in the direction we did on the basis of the argumentation which I gave in introducing the bill and which I will not repeat at this time. So we are not rushing this bill forward. If it goes to the committee following the vote, the committee can examine the details of the bill, and certainly, speaking on behalf of the government, let me say that we are ready to search honestly for a future formula.

Mr. Peters: May I now ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) a question? In referring to bargaining in the public service he indicated that bringing in bargaining units from outside would have some effect on that bargaining unit. Was he referring to the fact that if there were any serious difficulty in those negotiations, Members of Parliament might line up on the side of the civil servants for strike action?

Mr. MacEachen: What I was saying is that I have full confidence that no government would use this route to improperly effect increases for Members of Parliament. The question I raised was whether our critics might not say that a certain bargain may have been influenced by the fact that Members of Parliament might need a raise or might welcome a raise. If we can remove that possible criticism, then we would search for that kind of formula.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) a question in order to clarify this matter? Is it not true that bargaining is not done by members of the government but, rather, by the top civil servants on the staff of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), and that the top civil servants are as much affected by increases that might be given to the bargaining unit because eventually, as sometimes happens, everyone else might be? Is it not true that that is the point which the President of the Privy Council should have in mind, that it is not bargaining between Members of Parliament and bargaining units but, rather, between senior civil servants and the bargaining unit?

Mr. MacEachen: It is quite true, but in the final analysis the stamp of approval and the responsibility for any final bargaining must be taken by the Treasury Board, by members of the government. That is the point I have been making. I am delighted to sense that perhaps my fears in that direction were not as well-founded as I had thought earlier.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. MacEachen) which was agreed to on the following division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

ELECTIONS—PROVISIONS OF RIGHT TO VOTE TO CANADIANS RESIDING OUTSIDE COUNTRY

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, the question I raised before the House tonight involves the enfranchisement of Canadian residents outside Canada when an election is called. Our election laws have been progressively improved, augmented and modernized, and I submit with great respect that the time has come to enfranchise all Canadians who can in practice be included on the election list before writs are called.

This question is prompted by my attendance at the United Nations as a parliamentary representative. I discussed this subject with many of the staff at the United Nations, Canadians employed there more or less permanently? They were distressed that they did not have the right to cast their ballot. I understand some steps have been taken to improve the situation and that they may be included at the next election: some progress has been made.

There are other employees at the United Nations in New York, particularly—I understand there are about 250 of them—who are concerned about this issue and I suggest polling arrangements should be made for these people. Possibly a special advertisement could be placed in one of the New York newspapers. I do not confine it to New York; I realize it is a long-range plan.

I understand France has a system of enumeration under which some attempt is made to give every French citizen, no matter in which part of the world he lives, the opportunity to vote. This is the direction in which we should be moving, and I commend the government for the action they have already taken in regard to the Canadian staff at the United Nations. It seems to me that in these days of fast communications, and with the type of government we have at present, with a real push we could make the effort to see that non-resident Canadian citizens are given a chance to cast their ballot at election time. After all, all Canadians are equal in the eyes of the law; that is a simple rule of law which is enshrined within the Bill of Rights. All Canadians have the same rights.

I have often wondered what would happen if the agent of, say, a resident in London, England, applied to the courts of one of the provinces for an order of mandamus regarding his placement on a residence list in Canada. There might be a technical flaw to such an application, but I would rather see the law changed now than wait for this sort of situation to arise. I can envisage a judge having a very difficult time struggling with a case brought under the Bill of Rights where through oversight or lack of planning a Canadian citizen had become disenfranchised.

I realize that this is not the sort of matter that can be remedied overnight. Nevertheless, I submit that in large centres outside Canada arrangements could be made for polls to be transmitted through the mails. For example, we could examine the French system and in time evolve our own system under which all Canadians who left the country would know what their rights were. I submit that this would be a worth-while reform and I hope action along this line will be taken.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, at the present time only members of the Canadian armed forces and those persons considered as public servants may vote outside of Canada. The Canadian armed forces have their own polling stations on their installations, and public servants may contact the nearest Canadian embassy and see the officer responsible for handling the vote. Persons employed by the United Nations and who are considered as public servants may vote, which is a point that the hon. member would like to see clarified. At the present time there is no provision under the act for those other Canadians living outside of Canada who are not in the above two categories to vote.

The hon. member's representation is a thoughtful and serious one and I shall be pleased to bring it to the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

NATIONAL PARKS—BONNE BAY—LETTING OF CONTRACT FOR SURVEY WORK

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for having to bring back the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan). I wish to inquire into the letting of a contract for survey work in regard to the establishment of a national park in my district on the west coast of Newfoundland. I am not so concerned about the letting of the contract for survey work as I am with the effect it will have on the people living in the area. There are many Newfoundlanders living within the boundaries of the proposed national park and I am concerned for their future.

Tonight I am asking the parliamentary secretary to say what are the implications for these people. I have offered the government many suggestions in this regard, on many occasions. I feel that the department responsible should send experts to the area to advise every family living in the vicinity what the future holds in store for them. These families have lived in the area for a number of years and if they have to change their livelihood they may suffer. Many communities within the boundaries of the national park at Bonne Bay will have to be resettled, and therefore it is incumbent upon the responsible department, in liaison with other departments who are involved, to advise each and every family of their future once the park is established.

I am an advocate of the creation of a national park on the west coast of Newfoundland which is a remote and isolated area. Everyone knows that development there will mean very much to the future of this community. The future of citizens is my concern, and I should like to obtain an answer to my question. I have not been able to obtain an answer from the provincial government. Because of the interest of the federal government in the creation of national parks, I am sure it will give me the answer I seek.

I feel sincerely that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development should send a team of experts to the area to advise and support the statements of the ministers of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The people who are to be involved should be allowed to participate in the development of their future and the advancement of the economy of this area for the benefit of their families and children. I humbly request the parliamentary secretary to provide me with an answer to this question.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that we are also very concerned about the residents of his constituency, particularly those who will be resident within the boundaries of the park. We intend to do everything possible to minimize the hardships and the inconvenience they will suffer. Let me refer to the question posed by the hon. member, which was:

> —would the minister indicate whether a contract has been let to do survey work on the national park in western Newfoundland, Bonne Bay park?

The specific reply is that a call for tenders for the boundary survey of Gros Morne National Park has recently been concluded. Twelve interested firms were contacted and six bids were received. The bids have been reviewed in concert with the Surveyor General and a recommendation has been forwarded to Treasury Board, where it now rests. A contract is presently being prepared and an announcement of the successful bidder will be made shortly.

YOUTH—OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—CRITERIA USED IN CONSIDERING APPLICATIONS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, when the Opportunities for Youth program was announced, members on this side of the House took exception to the very short period of time available for applicants to prepare projects, submit them and have them approved or rejected. The program was announced so close to the termination of the university year that we felt adequate treatment of potential projects would be impossible before university students were looking for jobs. This has proven to be the case. The vast bulk of funds allocated to the program has not even now been assigned, and university students are looking for jobs.

The government took some pride at the time in the fact that it had prepared its program for students three weeks earlier than last year. I see this as no cause for self-congratulation since, to be really useful, employment opportunities for students should be announced prior to the new year in order that unsuccessful applicants may have the chance to look elsewhere. It is not as though the government did not know there would be a problem of student unemployment this summer. The government's own policies created the conditions which have produced potentially high unemployment. Having created these policies, it should have been prepared to deal with their side-effects.

Opposition critics of the program suggested the program's funding would be inadequate to meet the demands placed upon it. This worry has again proven to be valid. The program is already vastly oversubscribed. I should like to know, as I asked in the House this afternoon, how many projects will be rejected, which would otherwise have met the program criteria, on the sole ground the government has run out of money; and how many jobs would have been created by the projects rejected on this ground alone? If I do not receive an answer to my question this evening I intend to place it on the order paper, because I consider the answer to be part of the information the public will require in order to judge the efficacy of the government's program.

Another worry the opposition critics had at the time of the introduction of the program was that the criteria upon which a judgment of the acceptability of projects would be based were too vague. We were worried about applicants having to recast their applications at the eleventh hour because of their failure to meet some standard they did not know of in advance. That is why myself and others repeatedly asked the minister specific questions about the criteria being employed. That is why so many of us attended a meeting convened by officials administering the program to explain it to Members of Parliament. We asked questions about the criteria even though the meeting was held only a week prior to the effective deadline for applications.

Our concern about the lack of published criteria has been justified in the event because projects are now being returned to their sponsors to have them recast to meet criteria which they were not aware existed, or returned because of confusion about the meaning of published criteria. A number of such examples have come to my attention. I have referred them to the minister for inquiry and have no reason to believe he will not be conducting the requested inquiry.

My point this evening is to bring this specific principle to the attention of the House. I am asking now for assurance that the criteria created after the program was announced—criteria never generally known to the public and not included among the published instructions to applicants—have no part in establishing the acceptability of a project submitted for consideration.

I await this assurance with interest. Because this program was introduced so late in the day, because it is so inadequately funded and because its administrative apparatus has not yet had time to properly take hold, the program is bound to be a mess. I am simply requesting that the government not make it worse and more unjust than it need be through an attempt to enforce criteria which no one, not even the minister, knew about in advance.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on April 5 the hon. member raised a question about criteria and it is precisely that with which I shall deal tonight. The criteria applying to the summer youth program have been carefully planned in order to achieve the greatest student participation at all levels.

Student participation means several things: first, that the greatest number of students should be employed in meaningful and worth-while projects both to the students and the communities they wish to serve. This implies that the cost for each job is limited, but in no way to the point of creating cheap labour. Second, large segments of the population should benefit from these projects and regional disparities should be taken into account. Third, young people have to be involved in planning and carrying out projects. This aspect is particularly important to show the vigour, the perseverance and the capability of young people to carry out and terminate what they have started, thus demonstrating the responsible manner in which young people can identify problems which face their community and their ability to respond to them in a satisfactory manner.

Fourth, projects should reflect creativity by introducing new services, programs and activities. In this respect the extension of already existing programs, whether federal, provincial or municipal, are not to be accepted: first, because there is the danger that the students might not be sufficiently involved in the process-making and because this program was never designed to be involved in transfer of funds from one government level to another.

Fifth, funds will not be allocated to purely leisure projects, for which reasons are obvious. Sixth, funds will not be allocated to organizations whose only goals are to make profit, since this program is designed to avoid competition with the private sector and is primarily set up for social and not financial benefit.

All in all, the criteria for this program were set up to answer the needs, aspirations and goals of a young generation that threatens to drop out if governments do not make an effort to work with them on their own terms. For the first time a government is financing creativity, not enclosing it within its own structures but permitting it to be as it is—in other words, providing youth with a genuine role in society.

Motion agreed and the House adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MacDONALD (EGMONT)—ANSWER TO QUESTION CONCERNING SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE DIVISION OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights of every member of the House. Yesterday an answer was tabled by the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) in response to a written question that I had submitted on March 25. In this written question I asked for information as to the budgeted amounts for the security and intelligence division of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, for a statement on the cost of security and intelligence operations within the RCMP, and also for a description of the operations of the security and intelligence division.

In response to these questions the minister replied in the following terms, as reported at page 5423 of Hansard:

> The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the main federal operational and investigative body in the field of security. Such authority—there is no explicit statutory authority—as does exist is derived from certain sections of the R.C.M. Police Act. It would not be in the public interest to divulge any further information in this connection.

When I first received this answer today—I should explain that I was not here yesterday because I was attending to public business in Prince Edward Island—I was shocked to see the way in which the Solicitor General had seemingly set aside the traditional rights of members of this House to know the disposition of public funds and the public policy that is in effect in regard to such an important operation of government as that of security and intelligence. The reason this question was placed on the order paper in the first instance was that in the annual report tabled some time ago by the Department of the Solicitor General there was absolutely no statement and no information in respect of the cost or the policy of the security operations of the RCMP. I believe this to be a basic contravention and denial of the rights of Members of Parliament. Citation 113 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition states in part:

> Libels upon members and aspersions upon them in relation to Parliament and interference of any kind with their official duties, are breaches of the privileges of the members.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I point specifically to the latter part of that sentence which states that an interference of any kind with their official duties constitutes a breach of privilege. Surely it is an obvious infringement upon the rights of all members of the House when the minister does not reply to a direct and specific question put with regard to the disposition of public funds and the amounts of expenditures which take place as a result of the exercise of well-known responsibilities of that department. This affects the right of all members of the House and the people to know what the government is doing with the public funds it has at its command.

I would not have raised this question at this time had it not been for the fact that over the past few weeks oral questions along this same line have been asked by hon. members and the minister has been almost completely reluctant to provide the House with the information necessary in order that members can properly exercise their duties and responsibilities. Members of this House must be increasingly alarmed, as I think the general public is, about knowing whether in fact as a result of our security procedures there is security in this country.

I would be prepared to move, if you view this question as a prima facie case of privilege, as I do, that this whole matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member did give notice of his intention to raise a question of privilege, but it might be better if the Chair had an opportunity to look into the matter and make a ruling in due course, perhaps tomorrow. At this time it was my thought that hon. members would want me to bring to their attention the presence of visitors in the Speaker's gallery.

MR. LA SALLE—DECISION TO SIT AS INDEPENDENT MEMBER

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

For three years, I have believed that I could, at the same time, serve a political party and the interests of the province of Quebec. Today, I must bow to the facts and recognize that it is impossible to carry out those two objectives simultaneously.

As I am still interested in finding a viable formula for Quebec within the Canadian Confederation, I have decided to continue to work in co-operation with the other hon. members, and I reiterate my intention to sit, from the time the Chair recognizes my right to do so, under the label of an "independent".

Finally, I wish to thank the Chair for its many kindnesses to me and to express the hope that it will deem it reasonable to let me take the floor as often as it has done so previously.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a correction to yesterday's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This correction should be made on motions.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—DETERMINATION OF EXTENT OF POSSIBLE DAMAGE TO WEST COAST AREAS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the report in the press, attributed to the leader of the delegation of Canadian officials to Washington, that the officials have been unable to ascertain how much oil would be moved from Alaska or where it will be moved, I should like to ask the Acting Prime Minister where the government of Canada intends to go from here with regard to that question and whether there is any plan to determine the extent of the possible danger or damage to west coast areas, particularly the area inside the Strait of Juan de Fuca?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a report I would be prepared to give the House on the discussions that took place yesterday which would help answer the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition. I would be prepared to revert to motions if that is the wish of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that we return to motions to allow the minister to make a statement?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—REPORT ON WASHINGTON MEETING OF UNITED STATES AND CANADIAN OFFICIALS

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the consultations in Washington yesterday enabled officials of the two countries to examine risks of pollution which would be entailed by the movement of large volumes of oil from Valdez, Alaska to the Pacific northwest. The Canadian delegation made clear the very serious concern of the Canadian government regarding the substantial damages which would result from a major oil spill. The Canadian delegation also raised questions regarding compensation and damages in the event of a massive spill, basing its position on the Trail Smelter decision which provides a firm legal precedent for compensation in the event of damages in Canada resulting from an oil spill in United States or international waters. The principal Canadian concern, however, is not for compensation after the event but to see that oil spills shall not take place. The Canadian delegation pressed the point that, whatever precautions might be taken, oil accidents are likely to occur as was recently shown in the spill of diesel fuel in Puget Sound and in the collision of two tankers in San Francisco Bay.

The Canadian delegation stressed the high cost of cleaning beaches, fishing gear, pleasure craft and the loss entailed from oil-fouled timber and pulpwood. They also pointed to the long-term damage to the growth prospects of the tourist industry which would obviously result from a change in the environmental quality of the waters off the west coast.

The United States side accepted that further information was required in a number of areas before the risk of damage could be adequately assessed. More research, for example, is required on the effects of an oil spill on the spawning of herring and the migration of salmon.

• (2:20 p.m.)

It is the Canadian view that it would be irresponsible to take a decision which would result in the mass movement of oil by tanker until all areas of potential risk have been fully assessed. It is time to ensure that the protection of our natural heritage becomes a major priority of public policy. Large, new engineering projects should not be undertaken before adequate information is available on the environmental risks which would be entailed.

For our part, we will wish to hold further talks with the United States in regard to areas where more information is required on the damages which could result from oil spills off the Pacific coast.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we find ourselves now in the position where a group of Canadian officials have met with a group of United States officials for the purpose of holding certain discussions and seeking certain information. I would like to emphasize to you, Sir, that although the question of approving the TAPS route has been before the U.S. authorities for some time, this discussion is the first, I believe, that has taken place between representatives of the two countries with regard to the problem, and this only at the official level.

The Acting Prime Minister pointed out that the officials discussed the dangers and the question of compensation and apparently secured the admission that further information is required before the dangers can be fully assessed. I would like to know, and I am sure the people concerned on the west coast of Canada particularly would like to know, whether the Canadian officials secured any assurance from the United States that in fact a decision will not be taken by the United States authorities to approve the TAPS route until this information has been obtained. The Acting Prime Minister did not tell the House today that the officials had received any such assurance. Therefore, I think I am perfectly correct in assuming that the Canadian officials have not received any such assurance that in fact the United States decision will be held up until all the information has been gathered which would enable a full assessment to be made of the dangers involved in this project. I think the House is entitled to know where the government intends to go from here.

The Acting Prime Minister spoke generally about further conversations with people in the United States. I certainly hope they will be at the ministerial level so that our American friends will know that we are at least taking this matter seriously and are not content simply to discuss it at the official level.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I hear some gentleman opposite calling for a question. As I understand it, we are on motions. I will not keep the House too long, but there are one or two things I want to say.

I think it is fair to say that, as far as we could tell from the Acting Prime Minister's statement, the officials reported nothing new. We are now in a position where we do not know, the Acting Prime Minister not having told us, what the government of Canada proposes to do, if anything, in these circumstances. We have not been told what the government of Canada proposes to do to bring this home to the government of the United States.

We do not know whether the government of Canada intends to seek an assurance from the government of the United States that in fact a decision will not be made until these dangers have been fully assessed. We do not even know whether the government of Canada is actively pushing the Canadian pipeline as an alternative. In other words, Sir, I suggest it is time that the Acting Prime Minister and his colleagues stopped fooling around with this question and told the House and the Canadian people exactly where they stand and what they intend to do.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, the government has shown an amazing timidity in protesting against the proposed transportation of crude oil by sea from Valdez, Alaska, to the west coast of the United States.

For many months people on the Pacific coast have been perturbed and disturbed about the prospect of huge tankers transporting oil down the Pacific coast, and particularly into the Strait of Juan de Fuca and Puget Sound. It was only after months of prodding that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) finally agreed to get in touch with the United States government and ask for discussions.

I think most of us took it for granted that these discussions would take place at the ministerial level, and that the Acting Prime Minister himself would make representations to the government of the United States protesting against what could be a very serious pollution hazard to the people who live on the coast of British Columbia. Instead, we now have discussions going on in Washington between officials of the Canadian government and officials of the United States government. From the report the minister has given today it is perfectly clear the discussions were mainly about how to reduce the risks of pollution, what kind of navigational aids would be required, what standards of ship construction, what emergency and contingency plans would be ready in the event of an oil spill, and who should be held responsible in the event of a disaster. Mr. Speaker, discussions of this kind presuppose an acceptance of the TAPS program. We ought not to be discussing how we are going to reduce the risk of pollution in the event of crude oil being brought down the Pacific coast. We should be making strong representations and presenting data to show that the program should be abandoned.

The Canadian officials who have been attending the meeting in Washington have not been able to secure the information they want, if one may judge by the statements of Mr. George Wardroper, Director General of Science and Environment in the Department of External Affairs. He says they have not been able to receive from the American authorities any information as to how much oil will be transported daily down the Pacific coast, nor have they been able to receive any information as to what the destination of the oil tankers will be.

Mr. Speaker, one would have to be very naïve to think that this type of information is not available. Those who have stockpiled the pipe in Alaska know the dimensions of that pipe. They have an estimate of how much oil they will be putting through that pipeline. They know how much oil will have to be transported by tanker. For them to say they cannot tell the Canadian officials how much oil they will be shipping is sheer evasion.

The time has come for the government to take this matter seriously and to have direct talks between Canadian cabinet ministers and representatives of the United States cabinet. The government should be presenting the kind of data which will convince the American authorities that a tanker route down the Pacific coast of the magnitude envisaged will be a menace not only to the Canadian fishing industry but to the American fishing industry, not only to Canadian coastal waters but to American coastal waters.

I remind the minister that twice in the last 12 months members of this party have presented amendments to the Canada Shipping Act asking that the Canadian government establish a 100-mile pollution control zone on the Pacific coast in the same manner that Parliament did over a year ago with respect to the Arctic. The time has come to talk to the American authorities in fairly blunt and specific language, to say to them that we want this TAPS program stopped and that if it is not stopped we propose to take the necessary measures to protect the coastal waters of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the question raised is currently of the highest interest. I have just returned from a trip to British Columbia and the question of the movement of oil from Alaska to the United States is creating presently a state of anxiety among the people of British Columbia.

I happened to meet representatives of fishermen associations and companies as well as fishermen and, everywhere, people seemed very anxious about the movement of oil. We do note also that the government is in no hurry to assure the people of British Columbia that it is possible to sign an agreement with the United States in order to eliminate any danger of pollution to Pacific waters. In fact, should these waters become polluted one day, it would be the end of British Columbia fisheries.

I said, Mr. Speaker, that British Columbia was concerned with this situation and I believe that the U.S. should have the decency to think twice before launching activities which would contribute to further pollution of Pacific waters. As I said previously, this government has showed no haste in publicizing the results of its discussions with the U.S. In my view, it is urgent that we, as parliamentarians, should know what the score is.

In addition, it is important that the people of British Columbia, as a Canadian province, be assured that our neighbours will respect our territorial waters and be held responsible for any pollution of our waters caused by oil shipments from Alaska.

I urge the government to act expeditiously and assure British Columbia and Parliament that our rights will be preserved when agreements are signed between the U.S. and Canadian governments.

Mr. Speaker: The House will now return to the question period.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—OBTAINING OF ASSURANCE BY UNITED STATES OF NO APPROVAL PRIOR TO FULL ASSESSMENT OF DANGERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might return to the Acting Prime Minister and ask him whether the government of Canada intends to seek from the United States authorities an assurance that a decision with regard to approval of the TAPS route will not be made until the dangers involved have been fully assessed?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that has been the intent of all the representations we have made.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister a straightforward question in the hope of receiving a straightforward answer. Is the government of Canada directly asking the United States government not to make a decision with regard to the TAPS route until the dangers have been assessed? Has that request been made and, if so, what answer has been received? If the request has not been made, will it be made and, if so, at what level?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether this is one question or a number of questions, but I would suggest to the minister that he might reply as briefly as possible. We have to go on to another question.

Mr. Sharp: At the present time, Mr. Speaker, hearings are going on about the building of the TAPS line and the United States government has not yet received advice from the advisory body that will be advising it. That is one of the reasons I have felt it most desirable that the full scale of the dangers involved in building this line should be known before any decisions are made by the United States government. That is why I said in answer to the first question that this has been the intent of all our representations. On the question of whether we should seek an undertaking from the United States that it will not make a decision until we are satisfied, I would hope that would be the situation but of course I could give no guarantees.

Mr. Stanfield: Has any machinery been established for a joint assessment and joint examination of the dangers by representatives of the two countries?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, in a sense that was what was going on yesterday and I hope will be continuing today. Our officials, who carry the full authority of the Canadian government in all these negotiations, have been making known to the United States government our concerns about the ecological dangers. So far we have not been satisfied with the replies we have received, and I do believe we have pointed out to the United States government some of the inadequacies in the consideration they have given to this project.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—WASHINGTON MEETING—USE OF ECOLOGICAL STUDIES IN CANADIAN PRESENTATION TO UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, some days ago I asked the Minister of Transport if ecological studies had been made by his department regarding the danger of the pollution of the coastal waters of British Columbia and he indicated that such studies were going on. I now want to ask the Acting Prime Minister if the results of these studies, and any others that were carried on by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry or the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, were part of the presentation made yesterday by the Canadian officials in their meeting with the government representatives of the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman may not have listened very carefully to the presentation I made. If he will read it in Hansard he will see that it is precisely these points that our officials brought to the attention of the United States authorities.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES PRESIDENT OR CABINET MEMBERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the statement made by Mr. George Lincoln, chairman of the president's oil policy committee, to the effect that the Canadian government had not been very enthusiastic about supporting an alternate route and that the American government would welcome direct contacts with the Canadian government regarding the whole question of transporting oil from Alaska to the United States, does the government intend to have direct discussions? Does the minister himself intend to meet with Mr. Rogers, or does the Prime Minister intend to have direct negotiations with the President of the United States regarding this whole question of moving oil from Alaska to the United States?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the present time there is no application for building a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley. I am quite sure the hon. gentleman would be the first in this House to rise in his place and say that he hopes the Canadian government is protecting the environment of the north of Canada as well as the Pacific coast before any plans are undertaken to build a pipeline. I am quite sure that this is the position he would want us to be in. Therefore I would suggest that he, no more than the government, is saying, "a pipeline at any cost down the Mackenzie Valley".

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members are seeking to ask supplementaries, including the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I think in fairness to all hon. members I should at this point recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue and return to the hon. members in a moment.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister is seeking to direct my remarks in an entirely erroneous direction. At no time did I suggest that the choice was between the TAPS program—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that what he is raising now is not a point of order. Perhaps he will have an opportunity in a moment to clarify matters by a supplementary question, but I think the time has come to give an opportunity to the hon. member for Témiscamingue to ask a question also.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—SUGGESTION OF ALTERNATIVE ROUTE BY CANADIAN OFFICIALS AT WASHINGTON MEETING

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in light of what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said about the meeting in Washington between Canadian and United States officials, may I ask if the Canadian delegation in its official capacity suggested any alternative route or method for transporting this crude petroleum? If they did, on what study did they base their recommendations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the short answer is no, the Canadian government did not suggest an alternative route. The delegation that went with the authority of the Canadian government went to discuss the ecological dangers of building the TAPS line, which I think is the correct procedure at the present time.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. What knowledge and studies did the Canadian officials use in discussing this question with the United States officials? What study did Canadians use? Did they use an American study or one of their own?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government has had considerable experience in cleaning up oil spills on the ocean.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the Leader of the Opposition on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. We have been deep in oil for the last 40 minutes and perhaps we should then go to another subject.

INVITATION BY MINISTER OF INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT TO UNITED STATES TO BUILD PIPELINE THROUGH NORTHERN CANADA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development was speaking for the government of Canada when he apparently invited the Americans to come in and build a pipeline through Northern Canada? Was this the expression of a government invitation? If so, has the government had second thoughts about it?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would have to check what my colleague said before I could answer that question.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES PRESIDENT OR CABINET MEMBERS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, while all members would agree with the Acting Prime Minister that Canada should not build a pipeline through the north as an alternative to TAPS without very wide discussion and investigation, since Mr. George Lincoln's statement would appear to be a refined form of blackmail I return to the question I asked the Acting Prime Minister: Has the time not come for direct ministerial discussions on this very important matter instead of leaving it to officials until such time as the American government has made a decision?

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Parliament of Canada enacted the National Energy Board Act which gives that board authority to deal with applications for the building of pipelines. I am quite sure the hon. member would not wish the Canadian government to intervene before the National Energy Board has had the opportunity of looking at any application for the building of a pipeline, because the National Energy Board can take into account all relevant factors.

EAST PAKISTAN CONFLICT—DISCUSSIONS WITH INDIAN AND PAKISTANI REPRESENTATIVES—PROVISION OF RELIEF SUPPLIES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Has he now had conversations with representatives of the governments of India and Pakistan and can he advise about the situation in East Pakistan, particularly with reference to the acceptance by the authorities there of relief supplies?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have had extensive conversations in recent days at several levels about the situation in Pakistan. The Canadian High Commissioner has been for some days now in East Pakistan and he will be submitting a report shortly. We have also been in touch with other governments which have been co-operating in the economic development of Pakistan and with international organizations like the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. The World Bank has a senior representative in Islamabad. The Canadian government is trying to obtain a balanced assessment of the situation quickly. I have said many times that we are ready to contribute relief assistance and what we need to do now is to determine how to make this aid effective.

If you will permit me just a moment, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should say that the League of Red Cross Societies over the weekend appealed for relief assistance for refugees from East Pakistan who are now in India. The government is making an immediate initial contribution through the Canadian Red Cross in response to this appeal. This particular contribution is expected to be spent largely on medicines, in addition to any contributions already made by the Canadian Red Cross. We have been in touch with the world food program and we hope that we can provide help in that way.

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask the Acting Prime Minister if the Pakistan authorities are now accepting the aid of these relief agencies and allowing them into East Pakistan?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have had no requests whatsoever from the Pakistan government as such. The announcement that I was making was about the relief of refugees from Pakistan who are now in India.

EAST PAKISTAN—CONDEMNATION BY CANADIAN GOVERNMENT OF ATROCITIES

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Is he in a position to tell the House whether the Canadian government has made known to the government of Pakistan its vigorous and unequivocal censure of the atrocities perpetrated in East Pakistan?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I have said in the House, we have made it known that we favour a political settlement of this situation and not bloodshed, some of which unfortunately has already taken place.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the government consider sending independent observers from this parliament to the scene, as other countries of the Commonwealth have done, possibly a member of the opposition and one of those parliamentary secretaries who are lying around and not doing anything?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

USE OF NET SOCIAL BENEFIT RATHER THAN GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT AS INDICATOR OF PROGRESS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I would refer him to the concept advanced by the Prime Minister of using net social benefit as a better indicator of economic progress in this country than gross national product. Can he tell us whether the Dominion Bureau of Statistics or Statistics Canada, for which he is responsible to the House, has undertaken a study of its efficacy as a measure of economic progress? Also, has this been referred to the Economic Council of Canada as a useful tool, or is this idea merely some speech writer's pipedream?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is a new concept. Since the Bureau of Statistics is interested in moving with the times, I presume they will study it and try to find out how it can be defined in statistical terms.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister to inform himself whether this is a concrete fact and whether Statistics Canada is actually considering net social benefit as a tool in measuring economic progress, or is this merely some speech writer's pipedream?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I will try to satisfy my curiosity and that of my hon. friend too.

GRAIN

WHEAT—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO COMPENSATE FARMERS FOR LOSS IN NET INCOME—TWO-PRICE SYSTEM

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. Since the government of which the hon. gentleman is a member took office in 1968 there has been a drop in net farm income of over $500 million.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly ask his question?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, since the proposed $100 million acreage payments will be mostly, if not all, made with money which the government has saved on grain storage and losses in grain pools, can the Acting Prime Minister advise the House whether the government will now consider supplementary or deficiency payments particularly to the grain industry in western Canada to make up some of the $500 million loss in net income?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a very complicated question. My short answer is that the payments that are going to be made exceed anything that has been done in the past.

Mr. Benjamin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the drop in net farm income in Manitoba of over 100 per cent, and of nearly 100 per cent in Saskatchewan, will the minister now advise whether the government of Canada will agree to a two-price system for grain?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HARBOURS

AMENDMENT OF ADMINISTRATIVE STRUCTURE

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to direct to the Minister of Transport.

Could he tell this House whether he intends to announce significant changes to the operating chart of the Canadian harbour administration at the seminar on transportation to be held May 13 next at the Sheraton-Mount Royal Hotel, or whether these changes will be announced in the House of Commons?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the whole question is now being examined. I had not up to now given any thought to just where the announcement might be made. If a new policy is involved I shall show what I hope hon. members will agree is my usual respect for the House and make it here.

Inquiries of the Ministry

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—EXPEDITING OF DECISION ON SITE AND CONSTRUCTION OF NEW FACILITY

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the delays at Ste. Scholastique, is the government prepared to speed up the decision on and construction of the new international airport for the Toronto area?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I am happy to say that the delays at Ste. Scholastique have now been eliminated. The work stoppage is at an end, and if the weather co-operates we shall move ahead very quickly at that site. I do not think it has any relationship to the Toronto question. I am happy to say that I met yesterday with Mr. MacNaughton, the representative of the province of Ontario, and I can say progress is being made.

Mr. Scott: Is the government close to a consensus with the provincial and municipal parties on the question of the Toronto airport site and, if so, will an announcement be made this month?

Mr. Jamieson: Sometimes I may display a large amount of confidence but I would not dare say how close one government ever gets to consensus with another.

TORONTO—CONSULTATION ON SUITABLE AREA FOR HOUSING NEAR NEW FACILITY

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. In view of the hon. gentleman's expressed interest in satellite cities, has he held discussions with the Minister of Transport in order to provide an area for the housing of the 50,000 to 100,000 people who will be involved in this project so that the problems which have arisen at Malton will not arise in this case?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): The whole question of the pattern of urban growth and development and the effect on that of the placement of such major transportation facilities as airports is the subject of ongoing consultation and co-operation between myself and my officials and the Minister of Transport and his officials. Such consultation is constant now. We are part of that discussion.

TORONTO—ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW SITE IN HOUSE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether the announcement of the location of the New Ontario site will be made by him in the House?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I would assume that if the negotiations with the province of Ontario proceed satisfactorily the announcement might even be made simultaneously.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Oxford with a last supplementary question on this subject.

[Mr. Jamieson.]

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question for the minister in charge of housing. Did the minister consult with the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State who is in charge of the youth program for the summer with respect to the new northern city which is to be constructed overnight by 100,000 young people, or whatever it was, and can he give us more details?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a supplementary.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. It arises out of his answer to a question regarding the airport in Quebec vis-à-vis the proposed Toronto airport. I would ask the Minister of Transport whether in referring to this question he would check out the statement made by the Prime Minister, as reported at page 5391 of Hansard on Friday last, in which the inference is left that they had to go ahead with the Quebec airport in order to take business away from the proposed Toronto airport?

Mr. Speaker: Order. While the minister is doing all this checking, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Joliette.

FINANCE

ESTABLISHMENT OF CREDIT INSTITUTION FOR MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Could he tell us if the government has received an official request from the Union of Canadian Municipalities in order that special funds be earmarked for the development of specific municipal projects? If so, I should like to know the position of the government in this regard.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take that question as notice.

AGRICULTURE

FARM MACHINERY—INQUIRY AS TO FINAL REPORT OF BARBER COMMISSION AND INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of continuing concern on the Prairies about the high cost of farm machinery, can the minister now tell us when he expects to table the final report of the Barber Commission on the price of farm machinery?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I have been advised that the report will be available in both official languages by about May 17. I should also advise the House that no decision has been taken by the government whether it will be tabled on that particular date.

Mr. Nystrom: Is the hon. gentleman's department preparing legislation to implement some of the recommendations of this commission as soon as possible?

Mr. Olson: We are taking the findings and recommendations of the commissioner very seriously.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): In a previous report the Barber Commission recommended that an investigation into farm machinery prices be undertaken under the Combines Investigation Act. Will the minister initiate such an investigation now without waiting for the final report?

Mr. Olson: I would think that question should be directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. If my memory serves me correctly, the minister indicated that he was considering that course several months ago.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): In view of the fact that this report was anticipated several years ago and that since then inflation has thrown an entirely different light on the value of any final report which may be presented, is the minister prepared to set up another commission to determine the extent to which the situation has changed?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker.

AIR TRANSPORT

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN AIR CANADA AND EASTERN PROVINCIAL AIRWAYS RESPECTING ROUTES

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland-Colchester North): My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister in a position to inform the House concerning any negotiations between Air Canada and Eastern Provincial Airways regarding air routes between Montreal and the Atlantic provinces and within the Atlantic provinces in consequence of which present Air Canada routes would be transferred to EPA?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, not in a specific sense, although, of course, as I have reported to the House on previous occasions, Air Canada is carrying on discussions with a number of regional carriers throughout the country with a view to the rationalization of the route structure. I do not know of any specific plans or talks at the present time, but I shall be glad to make inquiries.

Mr. Coates: Has the minister examined the recent Air Canada schedule relating to these routes, a schedule which sets back many years the type of service which has been available within the Atlantic provinces, and will he endeavour to secure the reinstatement of the type of service which was available up to April 24?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's supplementary is in the form of a representation and he has to assume it has been noted.

AIRPORTS

POSSIBLE CLOSING OF MURRAY BAY AIRPORT

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

I learned during the weekend that in view of a new policy of the Department of Transport which is no longer willing to make up deficits of local airports, the Murray Bay airport would be closed next summer thus causing considerable loss to the tourist industry in the Charlevoix constituency.

Does the minister intend by such a procedure to express a new policy of the Department of Transport under which municipal airport deficits would no longer be made up?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, there has not been a major change of policy yet with regard to assistance in the establishment of the type of airport to which the hon. member refers. We are working on one with the objective of making a greater amount of assistance available. If the hon. member would care to give me the details of this particular case I would be glad to look into the matter and report.

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCES ON OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS—INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I wish to direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister. I would also ask the minister whether legislation on this important matter will be laid before the House before the end of this session?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I regret I am not in a position to answer today. I will see whether an answer can be got for tomorrow.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TIME OF CONFERENCE ON LAW OF THE SEA—GOVERNMENT INITIATIVES RESPECTING MARINE RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT AND CONSERVATION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what the latest position is with regard to the possibility of a conference on the law of the sea being held within a reasonable period. Is there still a possibility of this conference being held in 1973 as was indicated some weeks ago?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I believe that is still the intention.

[Later:]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that indications now, contrary to what the Secretary of State for External Affairs has just said, are that the Law of the Sea Conference may not take place until 1975, can the minister indicate whether his department or the government has any plans to take any new Canadian initiatives in the area of marine resource development and conservation?

Mr. Speaker: The minister's response should be as brief as possible. It seems to me this question covers a very wide area and should normally be answered by way of a general statement on motions, but the minister might reply briefly.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I agree with you that it would take a long time to answer this question adequately.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I raised the question several months ago with the Prime Minister and the Minister of Fisheries. I ask the minister whether he can enlighten the House and the Canadian people by making a statement on motions giving us the clear, definitive position of the Canadian government on the conservation of our marine resources, preliminary to any international discussions which will take place several years from now.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, this may be worth doing. I should say by way of preliminary answer that no country in the world has been more progressive in the position it has taken with regard to the law of the sea and the conservation of marine resources than has Canada.

POLICY RESPECTING SUPPORT PRICE OF WOOL

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

Can the minister say whether his department's policy on support price for wool of acceptable categories is re-established every year? If so, do the support price and supplementary payments vary each year, when is this announced to the people concerned and what is the price for the year 1971-72?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we made an announcement on February 8 substantially moving up support prices for skim milk powder and cheese. I indicated before the dairy year started on April 1 that those prices would be maintained.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Bellechasse wish to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I think that the hon. minister did not understand my question correctly; it was related to the support price for wool, and not for cheese and butter. I asked what was the policy of the department as to adjustment payments, and what support price had been established for 1971-72?

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, here again I either tabled in the House or issued a press release respecting the wool support price for last year's clip, which was 45 cents a pound.

CHURCHILL—REPRESENTATIONS BY NORAD RESPECTING BUILDING OR PROPERTY REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister in a position to advise the House whether the federal government has received recently any representations from NORAD regarding building or property requirements at Churchill or Fort Churchill, Manitoba?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we have made an agreement with the government of the province of Manitoba with regard to Churchill, and two or three aspects of that agreement are coming along fine. Contracts will be called shortly.

Mr. Simpson: Is the minister in a position to say whether any representations have been received from NORAD in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should indicate to hon. members that we will be running out of time shortly and that we might limit the number of supplementaries from this point on.

I wish to ask him whether the agenda for the constitutional conference to be held in June has been formally announced and whether the government intends to make it public in the near future.

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the general nature of the subjects that will be discussed at the conference is pretty well known as a result of the preparations that were made at the last meeting. When the Prime Minister returns I will ask him when the agreed agenda can be published.

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether the discussion will deal only with the amendment or also with the sharing of taxing powers between the provincial and federal governments?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the agenda for such meetings is, of course, a matter of agreement between the federal government and the provinces. I cannot give a precise answer to the question, but I do know that the principal subject of discussion will be the continuation of the discussion that took place a few months ago.

PENITENTIARIES

CENSORING OF INMATES' LETTERS CONTAINING CRITICISMS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might direct a question to the Solicitor General. Inasmuch as it seems to be general practice and policy within the penitentiaries service not to permit inmates to write letters of criticism either of the institution or its administration, and that such letters are returned to the inmates for rephrasing, would the minister see to it that this imposition of censorship is removed so that inmates may freely communicate their criticisms to people, especially to Members of Parliament?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have already received a similar suggestion during consideration of departmental estimates by the standing committee and I answered that we would study it. Today I give the same answer. ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING SURVEILLANCE OF UNIVERSITIES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the Solicitor General which relates to surveillance of university campuses. Has the government taken a decision to change the policy enunciated by the Right Hon. Lester Pearson in 1963 about police surveillance of universities in this country? If so, will the minister discuss the matter with the Association of Universities and Colleges and the Canadian Association of University Teachers, with a view to preserving academic freedom?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter has been under careful consideration. We must remember what the right hon. Prime Minister said, I think, in January.

It is now a matter of deciding whether students and professors are ordinary citizens and whether university campuses must be treated as sanctuaries impregnable to routine police work. That is the way in which we are considering the matter.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister indicate whether there has been any consideration given to changing the policy regarding surveillance procedures on university campuses?

COME-BY-CHANCE, NFLD.—PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE IN CONSTRUCTING DOCKING FACILITIES

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. On March 30, in reply to a question put to him, the minister indicated that the government of Canada had requested from the provincial government of Newfoundland a guarantee to cover the amount of the government's involvement in the wharf and docking facility project at Come-By-Chance. Can the minister indicate whether the guarantee has been received? If not, is it the intention of the government to continue to press for the guarantee?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we are continuing to work toward negotiations with the Provincial Building Company Limited and the Provincial Refining Company Limited but so far have not concluded an agreement. In order to secure the kind of undertaking we desire and insist upon, we shall see to it that we leave nothing to chance.

Mr. Carter: Was the request made directly to the government of Newfoundland, to one of its Crown agencies, or to the company involved?

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I have so many questions to ask that I do not know where to start, but I will raise a local matter with the Minister of Agriculture. I understand that the minister has received a number of representations from strawberry growers concerning the threat posed to their industry by foreign imports. Can he tell the House when he will be in a position to give a decision on this particular matter so the people in my riding and in nearby ridings who are engaged in this industry will know where they are going in the future?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Very soon, Mr. Speaker, but the hon. member will realize that it is very difficult to prove injury before injury has occurred.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, in light of the minister's reply let me say the difficulty facing the growers is that the processors who buy their product are not willing to purchase for markets east of Winnipeg because of this threat, and that seems to be proof enough of injury.

Does the minister have solutions to that problem? Does he intend to adopt programs to help the industry and its workers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I trust it is not suggested that the minister make this known to the House at this time. The minister might want to indicate whether this can be done on another occasion.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the report the hon. gentleman referred to the other day did not register with me under the description he gave, and for that I apologize. There is a report we commissioned under the direction of Mr. Seaton. It is one, as I indicated generally the other day, of half a dozen or a dozen different policy examinations we are conducting in respect of housing and urban policy through both CMHC and the new urban secretariat designate. At an appropriate time when we are able to deal with and make decisions in respect of all of these, we will put them together in a package and probably make them public.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PRIME MINISTER'S RESIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO CHANGE NAME AND PROVIDE RESIDENCES OF LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION AND SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved that Bill C-241, to amend the Prime Minister's Residence Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill requires little explanation. It proposes the maintenance by the Crown of the three residences described therein for the Prime Minister of Canada the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons and the Speaker of the House of Commons on a rent-free basis.

The provisions of the proposed act would be effective as of January 1, 1970, but the present financial outlay to be payable on the Prime Minister's residence will continue at the present rate until the day following the next general election.

The government's decision to seek legislative authority to provide and maintain residences for the holders of these parliamentary offices is in keeping with the report of the Beaupré advisory committee on salaries and expenses which recommended that neither the Prime Minister nor the Leader of the Opposition should be required to pay rent for publicly owned residences provided for their official use.

In accepting this particular recommendation, the government also felt that the bill should include provison of rent-free accommodation for the Speaker, and that the application of the principle should be contained in a single piece of legislation. Since existing legislation provides for the operation and maintenance of the Prime Minister's residence at 24 Sussex Drive and at Harrington Lake, I think I might confine my remarks largely to the subjects of the residences for the Leader of the Opposition and the Speaker. I am sure hon. members will be interested in the background to the acquisition of the two properties by the government of Canada and the proposal to make them part of the official residences act.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) occupies a property called Stornoway located in the village of Rockliffe Park. To a Scot that is a very good name. The title to this property has been held since 1950 by the Royal Trust Company in trust to provide, and I quote from the agreement between that company and the trustees of the property, "a suitable residence for the use and occupation of the leader of the Conservative party or of the Liberal party, whichever shall be in opposition."

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. MacEachen: No rent is paid for the occupancy of Stornoway. In addition, the trustees have paid for the maintenance of the property, including the property taxes, and have provided about 60 per cent of the furnishings.

In 1969, the Hon. Grattan O'Leary, chairman of the board of trustees of Stornoway, approached the government with the proposal that the property be transferred to the government at no cost and maintained in the future by the government as an official residence for the Leader of the official Opposition. At that time Senator O'Leary explained that the purchase of Stornoway was made possible by a group of citizens representing all parties and residents in all of the provinces, who felt that the holder of the office of the Leader of the Opposition, an integral part of our parliamentary structure, should be provided with a residence consistent with the meaning and dignity of his position. These citizens, with others who were added over the years, have continued their contributions to maintain the property in a fitting manner. Senator O'Leary pointed out that Stornoway had been occupied successively by the Hon. George Drew, Right Hon. Lester Pearson, Right Hon. John Diefenbaker and, of course, by the present Leader of the Opposition. It was also made available to the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent for the short time he was Leader of the Opposition in this House.

Having carried the cost and care of the administration of Stornoway for some 20 years, it was the trustees' conclusion that the ownership and administration of the property should justly pass into the hands of the government and, as Senator O'Leary put it, become a part of the parliamentary structure. Negotiations have been completed by the government for the transfer of Stornoway to Her Majesty in right of Canada subject, of course, to the enactment by Parliament of legislation enabling the government to maintain the property as a residence for the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. members are aware, I am sure, that the Speaker of the House occupies a residence called The Farm in Kingsmere Park which is part of certain properties in the Gatineau Park bequeathed to the government of Canada by the Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King as a public park in trust for the citizens of Canada. In May, 1961, Parliament enacted the Kingsmere Park Act to provide for the administration of this property in accordance with the will. The Act made provision whereby the Governor in Council may, by order, set aside any part of Kingsmere Park for use as a country home for the Prime Minister.

It has been the custom for a number of years for the Speaker of the House to occupy the building and the associated grounds known as The Farm on a rent-free basis. The government proposes, by this act, to give statutory recognition to a custom which, I am sure, reflects the high esteem in which all of us hold the office of the Speaker of the House. It is fitting that provision should be made in this legislation for this residence, along with those for the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition.

Hon. members will observe that, in addition to providing for the rent-free occupancy of the residences concerned, the bill stipulates that the benefits thereby received by the occupants shall be considered as a living expense allowance and, as such, exempted from income tax.

The present provisions affecting the Prime Minister's residence, as I mentioned, will continue in force until the next Parliament. What will happen now, if this bill is enacted, is that there will be an Official Residences Act providing for the arrangements I have mentioned relating to the residence of the Speaker of the House known as the Farm at Kingsmere, the residence of the Leader of the Opposition, Stornoway, and the residences of the Prime Minister at 24 Sussex Drive and Harrington Lake.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be the spokesman for my party on this very important measure. I believe I was selected because I was considered to be the least likely person ever to occupy any of the residences under discussion at the present time. For that nomination, I return the thanks which are due from a modest man.

I am very happy that this is being done. There are other Beaupré report recommendations which I would have greeted with some pleasure as well. I think it is important that all public men be accorded such dignity. I believe it is important that the nation show some respect in a permanent, and indeed practical way, for those who by the choice of their fellow countrymen or fellow parliamentarians in one case are elevated to positions of authority, respect and leadership.

It was an atrocious thing that this country for so many years had its Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition renting quarters or taking suites in hotels or what have you. The British have had No. 10 Downing Street and Chequers for as long as many of us can remember, and perhaps our parents before that. The United States has had its White House from the days of Jefferson, the first occupant. This is a demonstration that the office is indeed transcendent to the occupant. We never make a mistake, I think, in a country to emphasize the continuity of those institutions which make the country run and to which we pay allegiance. So, the democratically chosen chieftains of our land deserve the honour and respect which goes with the setting aside for them of official residences.

I would hope that as the years go by tradition will build into these residences and that they will become an essential part of the warp and woof of Canadian history as well as its greatness, its variety, its political structure and its variability mingled with its permanence.

The details set out by the minister have been set out well. He has been Gallic and sparse in his words, but I think adequate in his explanations. I do believe provision should be made for an official residence for the Leader of the Opposition. I am sorry that the original statement excluded any party but the Liberals and the Conservatives, but the realism was not unborne-out by the facts. However, it was a public spirited move on the part of those private citizens in Canada who acquired the fine residence, Stornoway, and although I might prefer the name ULVA House to Stornoway I agree with the minister that Stornoway is a pretty good name.

So, it is a very fine move which is being made. As a result, this matter will rest not with a group of public spirited citizens who from their own means provided a house for the Leader of the Opposition but with the state which recognizes the role of the Leader of the Opposition. In some ways this provision is one of the most important because it underlines the importance of the man who is the number one critic of those in power, and the number one contender for succession when the people's will is expressed in another way. Of all the variations of the democratic parliamentary system, I think the one whereby the Leader of the Opposition is made, in fact, an official part of the system is a fine move.

The changes involving the Prime Minister's residence are long overdue. We should have had them a long time ago. There are certain anomalies in reference thereto which have been discussed in this House before, such as the nonsensical requirement or tradition that the Prime Minister remit a certain amount of rent. This was based on the particular wish of a former occupant. It was a ridiculous thing which ought not to have recurred.

I think it would have been better had those charged with the responsibilities of discussing the fate of Stornoway given thought to the acquisition of other residences. I believe it would have been better had they been a little more historically minded. I advised the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chretien) months and months ago that the beautiful residence of the former Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden, was to be destroyed by some development group. It was mentioned time and time again, and I have a feeling that at the same time discussions were being held about Stornaway the wreckers hammer was being poised to destroy the beautiful home, Glensmere, in which Sir Robert Borden lived for a third of a century. He was a great Canadian, the architect of Canadian independence, our first and greatest nationalist. What a magnificent home that would have made for the Leader of the Opposition!

• (3:30 p.m.)

While I am talking about the historic value of historic residences and the propriety of their being utilized to the full, I still believe that the Prime Minister of Canada should be living in Earnscliffe, the home of Sir John A. Macdonald who was the father of this country in every real sense in so far as our political institutions are concerned. I am sure, and I know this to be the case, that it could very easily have been arranged, because the British are very amenable and understanding about this.

So my suggestion would be that the Prime Minister should be in Earnscliffe, the Leader of the Opposition should have been in Glensmere, and Mr. Speaker in Stornoway. What has been done in reference to The Farm, a beautiful place, very well presided over with great charm and hospitality by our present Mr. Speaker and by preceding speakers, is fine, but I do believe that it is not enough. I believe that the Speaker of this House, the first commoner, the great defender of our traditions, the most important man on the hill, the Speaker, should have a residence right here in the city of Ottawa. I think the government should make moves to provide him with one. Kingsmere, The Farm, is a delightful place. We all love to go out there in the summer, and Mr. Speaker is very generous with his hospitality. Someone mentioned booze, there. I do not know what he means by that word, but perhaps he means the lovely band which is often there to charm us with the spirited airs of some of the great waltz kings of the past!

As I said at the beginning, Sir, I was chosen to speak because I have no personal interest in this, but perhaps I do have a personal interest once removed. I am looking forward to the day when my leader will be in the Prime Minister's residence, and I expect him to invite me there once in a while. The pleasure that should come to the long suffering people of Canada will be many times greater even than mine when I go there as his guest. So, that is my only personal involvement.

I do not propose to discuss this measure overlong. I have a feeling it is one on which there is a good deal of unanimity, or at least consensus in the House. I grasp the rare opportunity to congratulate the government without much qualification, and I say that we should move forward. I think we should not be satisfied with the provisions which we have made for Mr. Speaker. I congratulate the government for moving as it has in reference to the residence for the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this bill is in one sense a companion piece to the bill we discussed the last two or three days. At least it is before us in the name of the same minister, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), and it is going for detailed study to the same committee, the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. But it is quite a different bill so far as the response of the House to it is concerned. Indeed, it is already clear from what has been said by the sponsor of the bill and by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), that this bill will receive the general support of the House.

It was interesting, as it always is, to listen to a bit of history about some of these things that we take for granted. I think the item in the history that the President of the Privy Council gave us which was not interesting was the fact that when certain private individuals established Stornoway as an official residence it was to be limited to the leader of the Progressive Conservative party or the leader of the Liberal party. As hon. members are aware, we called order at that point, but we were soon corrected by a later stage of history which was recited to us, namely, that when the property was taken over by the government, or at least when government money was put into it, it was made clear that it was to be the residence for the leader of the official opposition. It would have been most unfortunate in historical terms if it worked out that our leader, while he was leader of the official opposition, would have to find a residence somewhere else but nevertheless would move into 24 Sussex Drive when he became prime minister. Now, it is clear that during that interim period when he would be leader of the opposition he would be an occupant of Stornoway.

Mr. Stanfield: Does he not plan to go directly to 24 Sussex Drive?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As a matter of fact I accept the rebuke that the Leader of the Opposition has just given to me. If I heard him correctly he asked if the leader of this party does not plan to go directly to 24 Sussex Drive. Perhaps if he were here he would make the same comment. I remember, in fact, that once upon a time a leader of the opposition refused to go into Stornoway saying he was not going to waste any time there, he was headed for 24 Sussex Drive. Believe it or not, he made it, so maybe history will repeat itself.

Mr. Caouette: Not with the same party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am not hearing all the interjections that are being made, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps they should be on the record. There was one which I heard a moment ago when I rose. One hon. member from across the way—at least he was across the way, but now he has moved into the Prime Minister's seat—

Mr. Benjamin: The only way he will get it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —in any case, I heard him say "Stanley will want a house for everyone in this country". Well, that is right. Now we have that clear, may I move on to the bill itself.

Actually, the bill does not make any real changes except for one that will come into effect on the day of the next election. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is already a resident of 24 Sussex Drive; the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is already a resident of Stornoway; and the Speaker of the House already has the privileges and the occupancy of the residence up in Kingsmere which we know as The Farm. I believe it is clear that what this bill does is simply to legalize certain things that are already taking place. It makes it legal, proper and constitutional that public moneys be put into the maintenance of these residences and that their occupants be entitled to any benefits that they enjoy because they are living in them. I think that it is good that any doubt there might have been as to their right to enjoy the benefit of living in these residences has been cleared up or will be cleared up when this bill passes. That is the main purpose of this legislation, and we approve this being done.

I said there was one specific change that is made by this bill. It has to do with the $5,000 per year that the Prime Minister is required to pay for board and lodging at 24 Sussex Drive. The hon. member for Hillsborough is quite correct that this provision was put into the bill because when 24 Sussex Drive was purchased during the time when Mr. St. Laurent was prime minister it was his own, personal insistence that he be required to make a payment to cover his family's board and lodging in that residence, and at his insistence it was put into the legislation. A case can certainly be made for our not requiring that, for if we are going to provide the Prime Minister with a residence in which he can live and in which he must do a fair amount of entertaining, in which he must be one of the nation's hosts, it does seem proper that we take care of the cost of it.

However, I am interested in the fact that the proposal to discontinue the requirement that this $5,000 a year be paid by the Prime Minister does not come into effect until the end of this parliament. It comes into effect on the day of the general election following the dissolution of the 28th Parliament. No one knows who will be the occupant of that house at that point, but at any rate here is a clear case of deciding that a certain monetary benefit to one of the members of this House shall not accrue to him until after the next election.

It is very interesting that this bill will be going to the same committee to which Bill C-242 was sent yesterday. Perhaps in that committee we might try to do a little harmonizing between the two bills. If it is proper to say in this bill that a monetary benefit to one member of the House shall not accrue to him until after the next election, then maybe we should say the same thing in the bill that raises the salaries of all members. Mr. Speaker, I see you are looking at me and wondering if I am out of order, and therefore I will desist. We will deal with that matter when we get into the committee.

We are not surprised that, His Honour, the Speaker has asked one of his able assistants to take the Chair while we are debating this measure, and the main thing I want to say in this debate is that I wish the bill did something more for the office and the person of the Speaker than is being done by it. Actually, it does not do anything at all for him. He has had the privilege of living in the residence of The Farm for a long time. He has had the privilege of using it to entertain us, and so on, and when this bill is passed and becomes law the situation will still be the same, except that things will be legalized. But it really does not add anything to the perquisites and privileges of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

Like the hon. member for Hillsborough, who spoke just a few minutes ago, I think we ought to be providing an official residence for the Speaker here in the city of Ottawa, within easy reach of the House of Commons. I would be most happy to support the suggested moves that he proposed, the musical chairs that he suggested. I think Stornoway would be a delightful place for the Speaker of the House of Commons.

The reason I press this is not for any financial benefit that might accrue to His Honour to have a proper and permanent residence fully paid for in this way, but rather because I think we should show the fullest respect that we can for the office of Speaker. And I also think we should say in very clear terms, and mince no words about it, that we like the Speaker we now have, that we like the Hon. Lucien Lamoureux; that we think he has done an excellent job as the Speaker of this House in two parliaments, and that there should be a clear indication to him on the part of this House that we want him to continue as Speaker of the House of Commons. That gets us over into another bill that I have on the order paper that would provide the basis for a continuing Speakership. It also gets us over into a matter that was under discussion between the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and me on a late show a while ago, which ended rather inconclusively. And that is what bothers me about this now, that it is being left in an inconclusive state. All sorts of tributes are paid to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and he deserves all of them and more, but tributes that are not backed up by some real gesture, that are not backed up by an effort to take those steps that will make it possible for him to continue as Speaker, are subject to the charge of being a bit empty.

This is not the first time that the question of an official residence in Ottawa for the Speaker has been raised. The government has had reason to look at it for a few years. The proposal was made in very concrete terms by some of us in the House of Commons, and so it is not a new idea. In fact, when I first heard there was to be a piece of legislation regarding official residences, including an official residence for Mr. Speaker, for a moment I was delighted. I thought we had won. I thought that what we were going to get was an official residence in Ottawa for Mr. Speaker. But no, we are not getting that. Let us not pat ourselves on the back and say we are doing anything by passing this bill because we are not doing anything for Mr. Speaker at all. All he will have is the right to continue to make use of the Farm, several miles from here, at Kingsmere.

I hope the House will take this and other opportunities to make clear to the government that we think there should be an official residence here in Ottawa for the Speaker. Further, we think a move in that direction should be made while the present incumbent is in the Chair, so that he will know the House wants him to continue. And I think we should match this with other changes, or with discussions amongst the party leaders or house leaders, so that steps can be taken to make sure that the gentleman we have had as Speaker, who has done such a tremendously impartial job, will not be faced with the dilemma either of dropping out of the life of the House of Commons or of going back into a partisan contest when the next election is called.

He has graced this chamber in a manner that does pride to this institution of Parliament. I think that members in all parts of the House want him to continue. This bill does not say that. We could say it if we were establishing a residence for him and his successors here in Ottawa, and we could say it by taking the necessary legislative or constitutional steps so that a continuing Speaker of this institution would become one of our traditions. In my view the time to start that tradition is now while we have the present Speaker, who is such an outstanding occupant of the Chair of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, we now have before us Bill C-241, an Act to amend the Prime Minister's Residence Act. To make a long argument short, what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is trying to put across in this four-page bill is merely that he does not want to keep paying rent.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Although the number of people who can settle their rent problem in such a way across Canada is quite limited, hon. members will agree that it does not take a genius to come up with such an idea. I even thought about it myself, since apart from the rent I pay for a room here in Ottawa, I have still some outstanding payments on my own home. As most Canadians are in a similar situation, sometimes I think how nice it would be to stop paying rent and frankly, there are months when I would be better off if I did. But in order not to sleep in the open air in Ottawa, I pay the rent for my room, and to avoid having my house taken away from me, in my riding, I make my payments.

I do not say that that provision of Bill C-241 could not be applied, for instance, in the case of a prime minister without any means. But it is known that such is not the case of the present Prime Minister, for besides having a personal fortune, his name appears on the payroll of the Canadian Treasury. I will no doubt be allowed to quote page 34 of the Beaupré report on the matter:

> From 1867 to 1873, the salary of the Prime Minister was equivalent to that of other Ministers of the Crown, namely $5,000 per year. In 1873, legislation provided for a salary of $8,000 per annum for the office. This amount was increased in 1905 to $12,000 and in 1920 to $15,000 per annum. The current salary of $25,000 per annum was authorized in 1954. An amount of $2,000 as a tax-free motor car allowance was first authorized in 1931 under an appropriation act and this same amount was incorporated into the 1963 amendment to the Senate and House of Commons Act. Since 1950, the law has provided for the operation and maintenance of a residence in Ottawa for the Prime Minister for which he pays an annual rental of $5,000. The Prime Minister is also provided with a summer residence and motor car. In summary, the current salary and allowances of the Prime Minister are as follows:

Sessional Indemnity as a Member of Parliament	$12,000
Sessional Allowance as a Member of Parliament	6,000
Salary as Prime Minister	25,000
Motor Car Allowance	2,000

All that amounted to $45,000 under the old law. And should Bill C-241 be passed, then the Prime Minister would receive $53,000 a year. This means a little more than $1,000 a week. I think that it is not so bad.

As it may be noted if we read clause 5 of the bill, to all these advantages, others are added, and I quote:

> 4. (1) The Governor in Council may appoint a steward or housekeeper and such other employees as he deems necessary for the management of the Prime Minister's residence, and may fix their rate of remuneration and conditions of employment.

Mr. Speaker, paying the rent of a man who earns $53,000 to be at the head of a government that asks people to tighten their belts, this is somewhat ridiculous. While he has a motor car at his disposal, for which gasoline is provided, and the use of a summer residence, we should have to pay for his rent on top of that!

To pay the rent of a Prime Minister who can also use government aircraft to travel across the world, appears rather surprising. To pay the rent of a Prime Minister who has an allowance of $53,000 in addition to his capital gains, when all Canadians who want to own their homes continue to pay the 11 per cent tax on building materials, when 70 per cent of Canadian families must do with an annual income of less than $4,000, that, in my view, could be called disgusting.

To ask the less affluent to pay the rent of the most affluent, when inflation is rampant, to ask them to pay the rent of the Prime Minister when factories are closing down and people are thrown out of work in Canada, to pay the rent of the Prime Minister in order to solve his housing problem when close to one million Canadians are looking for jobs, to pay the rent of the Prime Minister when pensioners aged 65 and over, who have lead an honest life, must be satisfied with an increase of 42 cents per month, is that really, Mr. Speaker, the just society that we have been promised?

I have here a summary of the Prime Minister's life as reported in part in the Canadian Intelligence Service of September-October 1969. It is in bulletin No. 36. It says about the Prime Minister, and I quote:

> 1940—He is expelled from the Canadian Training Officers' Corps for insubordination;

I have also an account of the life of another member of the Armed Forces, a guy discharged for health reasons after 23 years of service. In October 1970, he bought a small 26 x 40 bungalow for $16,000. Having made a down payment of $1,900, he will have to pay a monthly rent of $118 until the year 2000, for a total of $44,000.

The rent of a soldier discharged for insubordination is paid, but a model soldier must pay three times the price of his house. Frankly, this is a bit too much! If this is what we are coming to, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether we will not be able to brag of having beaten the world record for hypocrisy.

We are paying the Prime Minister's rent while unemployed couples must manage with $133 a month and the disabled must do with a monthly $75 allowance to live and pay their rent.

At this stage, I would like to quote from a letter sent to me by the Québec Department of Social Affairs, directly from the office of the Minister of Health. Everybody knows that in Quebec, the Liberals are in power. Here in Ottawa, the party in power is also the Liberal party. If hardship exists, the federal government is also a bit responsible, since it agrees to pay 50 per cent of the cost of all pensions paid out in Quebec: disability pensions, needy mothers' pensions, unwed mothers' pensions and social welfare pensions. As far as the pensions for the blind are concerned, the federal government pays as much as 75 per cent of their cost in Quebec. Then to show you just what the situation is in Quebec where the federal government is concerned, I will quote from a letter I received from Mr. Richard Rivest, private secretary to the provincial Minister of Health. Here is what it says:

Dear Sir:

Further to your telegram of April 2nd instant, with respect to the above mentioned subject, I am forwarding under cover, for your information, a copy of a letter I am sending this very day to Mr. Larose.

I hope the enclosed information will prove helpful to you.

Yours truly,

There comes a time after two or three months of unanswered correspondance when I send telegrams. That is what I did in this case on April 2. I received a reply on the 23rd of April. You will admit with me that in Quebec, even under a Liberal administration, people are in no hurry to reply. Then the man concerned received the following answer:

Following the representations made on your behalf by Mr. Roland Godin, member for Portneuf, I am in a position to convey the following information in regard to your request.

According to the standards and regulations of the social assistance legislation, here is the detail of your financial situation.

Requirements: $101

For a married couple

Income: $133

You will therefore note that you are not eligible for the requested assistance since your income exceeds your requirements.

I regret that I cannot be of any more help to you.

Yours truly,

Richard Rivest,
Assistant Private Secretary

Mr. Speaker, that is what happened. That family was just about to lose its small home—

[Mr. Godin.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. I must remind the hon. member that we are considering Bill C-241, "An Act to amend the Prime Minister's Residence Act". I realize indeed that one may state some facts to support an argument, as did the hon. member for Portneuf at the beginning of his remarks. However, since the hon. member is talking about a particular case of an individual who is trying to assert his rights to welfare, it seems to me that his remarks could be much briefer concerning this case.

Mr. Godin: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Finally, we would pay the rent of a prime minister who grants interest-free loans throughout the world to build sewage systems, while Canadians must borrow from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at 8½ per cent to build their own house. It is preposterous.

We can read in the bill and I quote:

RECOMMENDATION

His Excellency the Governor General has recommended to the House of Commons the present measure to amend the Prime Minister's Residences Act to change the name to the Official Residences Act; to provide that certain lands and buildings shall be maintained as residences for the person holding the recognized position of Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons and for the Speaker of the House of Commons respectively; to provide for the furnishing, maintenance, heat and keeping in repair of the buildings and for the maintenance and improvement of the lands; to provide that the Governor in Council may appoint staff for the management of the Prime Minister's residence and fix their rate of remuneration; to provide that any benefit received or enjoyed by the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition or the Speaker of the House of Commons under or by virtue of this Act shall be deemed to be received by him as a living allowance expressly fixed by this Act; and to provide for consequential and related matters.

That is what the Governor General recommended. Again I think this is wonderful but I claim it is simply a gesture of generosity on the part of the Governor General. He is almost obliged to do that since he simply recommends for the Prime Minister the allowance he himself gets.

In the case of the Governor General, we tolerate that since he is the representative of Her Majesty the Queen. Moreover, we know that Her Majesty has financial difficulties at the present. And if we provide for the maintenance of the Governor General's residence, it is a favour on our part—

Mr. Ryan: Ah, dispense!

Mr. Godin: —since Canada pays all the expenses of our representatives throughout the world.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Another point I should like to touch lightly concerns the Leader of the Opposition that we find in and is referred to in clause 3 of the bill. Here again, it is easy to see that the proposal is interesting enough for him. Now, I will quote from issue No. 39 of the Minutes of Proceedings of the special joint committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on consumer credit which had been appointed to inquire into poverty in Canada. This was recorded during its meeting of Tuesday March 21, 1967. I quote from page 3137 which states:

BRIEF SUBMITTED TO THE JOINT COMMITTEE OF THE SENATE AND OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS ON CONSUMERS CREDIT (PRICES) BY THE DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC COURSES OF SAINT-FRANÇOIS-XAVIER UNIVERSITY SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. Chairman:

My name is Duncan MacIntyre and I represent the Department of Public Courses of the Saint-François-Xavier University of Sydney, N.S.

I have the honour of submitting this brief on behalf of the Department of Public Courses of the Saint-François-Xavier University and in the name of low income families of the eastern counties of this province.

The problem of housing in Nova Scotia

Generally speaking, Nova Scotia is confronted with the same problem as the other Canadian provinces. Statistics show that:

One fifth of our houses accommodate an excessive number of people and are without running water, bath and shower;

More than one fifth of our houses are deprived of water-flushed lavatories and we have twice as many dilapidated houses as the national average.

Finally, the author of the brief has this to say:

We have endeavoured to show that neither the private sector nor the governments, whether through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the Nova Scotia Housing Commission, can meet adequately the needs of our many poor families. We have also endeavoured to show that the dwellings subsidized by the federal and provincial governments cannot solve the problem once and for all, especially at the financial level.

In the light of this brief that was prepared by a representative of the University of Nova Scotia, one can realize what the housing situation is in Nova Scotia.

Those accepting to live in such conditions must really be peace-loving people. And I am sincere when I say that in the province of Quebec, people would not have tolerated a similar situation for so long. In the province of Quebec, given such circumstances, everything would have blown up long ago. However, the people of Nova Scotia are peace-loving. To wit, they put up for fifteen years with the Leader of the Opposition as prime minister. While for people to be peace-loving is a commendable trait, nevertheless I believe that a political leader should behave in a rather energetic manner. This one left his province half built and still dilapidated after fifteen years of administration. Thereby he simply proved that he was retreating and had misgivings about the results of his proposed reforms.

Should he accept that his rent be paid by this country, the Leader of the Opposition will but deserve the additional name of "deserter" besides those already applied to him.

The Standing Orders stipulate that an opposition member does not have the privilege of introducing a measure involving the expense of public funds. In this case, I did not find any provision that would prevent the hon. leader of the opposition from asking that the bill before us be withdrawn.

On the other hand, if the leader of the opposition persists in seeking cover from the inconvenients of the capitalist system—that is scarce and high-priced living accommodation—and taking advantage of the proposals contained in the bill, I shall be obliged to move an amendment at the committee stage.

In fact, if the country is financially capable of paying the rent of its Prime Minister, who will be making $53,000 a year, and capable of paying the rent of the leader of the official opposition, I feel that same country, with all the wealth we know it has, should pay the school and municipal taxes of all Canadian family heads who own a small house and earn less than $5,000 a year.

If we can spare the Prime Minister his rent when he earns $1,000 a week, the government should see to it that a system is set up whereby help could be given, where municipal and school taxes are concerned, to all those Canadians who already own a small house and make less than $5,000 annually.

I also believe it would be in order to take advantage of the generosity offered by the bill to claim reimbursement by the government of the annual rent of all heads of Canadian families earning less than $5,000.

I want to join the previous speaker in commending the Speaker of the House, whom I hold to be a perfect individual who carries out his duties very well. I know the Speaker's job is unrewarding and so demanding as to require the incumbent's fulltime attention. Whether this is realized or not, I am sure the Speaker does not have the time required to look after his constituents. I therefore propose that the office of Speaker become permanent as it is second in importance to no other in the country, in my opinion.

As a Créditiste, and in favour of security for all Canadians, I feel it to be in order also to point out that the present bill, dealing only with the welfare of leaders, is inadequate. As I have mentioned before, I intend coming back to that matter at another stage of the bill. That is all I have to say at this time Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Godin: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Carried, on division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization.

Prairie Grain Stabilization Act

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT

PROVISION FOR PAYMENTS TO WESTERN CANADA PRODUCERS IN YEARS WHEN RECEIPTS BELOW FIVE-YEAR AVERAGE

On the order:

April 29, 1971—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Agriculture of Bill C-244, An Act respecting the stabilization of prairie grain sale proceeds and to repeal or amend certain related statutes.—The Minister responsible for the Wheat Board.

Mr. Gleave: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I draw to your attention the fact that this bill actually carries within it two separate proposals. For that reason, those two proposals ought to be separated and two bills ought to be prepared accordingly.

In support of my request, may I draw to your attention that clause 32 of this bill deals with the payment that will be made directly out of treasury funds. It will be a payment made for one year, on an emergency basis, to meet the situation which the government recognizes as existing, whereas the rest of the bill deals with the long term proposal for prairie grain farmers. The long term proposal will be reviewed in 1976 and at that time we shall determine whether the amounts, deductions and so forth are adequate for the program. It is, therefore, an ongoing program which will last not for five years but for a number of years thereafter. I, therefore, submit to Mr. Speaker that this House should have the opportunity to examine carefully that long-term, ongoing program in the light of its implications for the future of the farmers of western Canada. In view of the urgency of the farming and economic situation on the Prairies, the short-term program should receive the immediate consideration of this House so that the distribution of moneys involved in clause 32 can be undertaken without delay. I say that because we are very close to and, indeed, into the costly planting period in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta and that part of British Columbia which is affected by this bill. I, therefore, ask Your Honour to give this matter urgent consideration and permit us to deal with this bill in the manner suggested.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Lang: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker. Points of order urging the separation of bills have been argued from time to time before Your Honour, but rarely, I would think, on a ground more tenuous, less substantial, than in this particular case. The total content of this bill has been before producers for discussion for some six months, now. The transitional feature to which the hon. member referred is tied into this legislation and is totally based upon the stabilization provisions contained in the body of the bill as well as the repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act, which is likewise provided for in the measure. The contents are tied completely together, as I had occasion to indicate to the hon. member when he raised this matter in the House earlier. It would be a great disservice, and most misleading in some ways, to separate these issues, to indicate that the payment was separate and distinct rather than part of a total plan, a total package, as it is.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard).]

Mr. Korchinski: In support of the argument presented by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, may I say that though I cannot quote the particular reference in Hansard, I did on one occasion ask the minister whether the amount of money involved here was tied into any particular plan or program. He replied that it was simply a figure which had been accepted and that it was no way contingent upon anything else; it was simply a transitional payment. This being the case, the operation of the bill before us is not, as a whole, contingent on the existence of clause 32 at all. The clause serves no useful purpose, though it did so on one particular occasion. An item in the estimates would have served the same purpose. It is true a vote would have been necessary in the House. But it would not have been necessary for the House to accept all the other clauses of the bill, subject to the modification of certain clauses to which hon. members might for one reason or another take objection. The difficulty here is that one has to accept the measure as a whole, together with one clause which is not necessarily related in any way to the operation of the legislation.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you take time to consider whether this particular clause is in any way related to the operation of the stabilization provisions, or whether the stabilization bill might not stand without the inclusion of that clause.

Mr. Horner: I, too should like to support the point of order raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. Basically, this bill is a long-range income stabilization program for farmers in the Prairie provinces. The transitional or temporary payment with which clause 32 deals is intended merely to meet a situation of short-range need. I urge Your Honour to consider the separation of those provisions, particularly in view of the desperate situation Prairie farmers face and the seeding expenses which will need to be met early this spring.

The bill before us has just begun its long progress through the House and the committees. If clause 32 is contingent upon this bill passing, as I understand to be the case, payments could not go out to farmers until July 31 at the earliest when the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act expires. I see the minister shaking his head in a negative manner. I am pleased to note this response. I hope I am right in reading his negative shake correctly. In my judgment, the transitional payment dealt with in Clause 32 would be readily accepted by the farmers as a means of bridging the short-term gap. But if it is tied in with the other long-range proposals, it would appear to be a bribe, an inducement for farmers to accept the long-range proposals as a price for obtaining the benefits of temporary financial assistance. I do not believe this is the proper way in which legislation should be submitted. It should stand on its own feet, and in these circumstances I believe the Chair should seriously consider separating the two aspects of legislation before us.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the point of order raised by my hon. friend from Saskatoon-Biggar is, as the minister pointed out, not a new problem for the Chair. It has arisen repeatedly over the years. I suppose the most recent case which did create a dilemma for the Chair was that of Bill C-207, a bill which was obviously an omnibus bill.

I recognize that, having given the matter due consideration, the Chair took the position on that occasion that it could not direct the government to divide the bill. However, I believe there was a suggestion from the Chair that this kind of thing would need to be looked at more closely in the future. The same issue has been raised in connection with other bills this session. Though the position is not completely on all fours, I might perhaps mention the dollar items in the supplementary estimates a short while ago, because there is a certain parallelism. In that case, the Chair did rule that these items could not properly be embodied in the particular bill and they had to be taken out and covered by separate bills.

The last thing I would claim would be to assert, I am an expert on the bill before us. I suppose, Sir, you would join with me in a similar pretension of modesty. But it seems to me that the essence of the bill is to be found in the first 31 clauses, and perhaps in one or two clauses at the end. These relate to a clear proposition, namely the establishment of a stabilization fund, stabilization levies, a stabilization account and so on. Without going into the substance of the measure, I note it all hangs together: farmers are required to make certain payments, certain rules are laid down about the levying of those payments, and benefits are received under certain conditions.

Clause 32, on the other hand, does not involve the principle of payments on the basis of which one receives benefits. It refers rather to payments to be made in one specific year out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. I submit it is a totally different proposition, and that it is quite improper to have these two totally different propositions combined in what we have to call one omnibus bill. So far as members are concerned, what bothers them most of all about this kind of thing—this is a complaint that we have made about most omnibus bills—is that they are called upon to vote for the bad because they want to vote for the good. I make no apology for complaining about that sort of situation. We had it last year with a bill that did something about pensions of retired civil servants and something about pensions of Members of Parliament as well. We were put on the spot, having to vote on "apples and carrots" at the same time.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Here again, we have two separate proposals. I heard no objection to my attempt to describe them. I repeat that the long term one is a kind of insurance scheme. You are required to make certain payments to establish certain benefit rights, and you get those benefit rights on the basis of what you have paid in. But tucked into the same bill is the special provision for one year which does not follow the rules of the general stabilization plan. I detect, certainly among members from western Canada, a keen desire to support the special transitional payments clause of this bill and to get it made law first.

Mr. Korchinski: Thatcher, bill 16.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Someone makes reference to Thatcher, whoever he is, but that is beside the point.

Mr. Lang: It is a variety of wheat, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Good humour aside, these two propositions are completely different. I also have the feeling that the omnibus character of this bill goes a step further. Clause 33 calls for the repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. My special assistant on agriculture, the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin), tells me that it has nothing to do with what is in the bill, that it has to do with storage and that sort of thing. Then, I look at clause 34 which seeks to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. In that clause there is a kind of cross reference to the prairie farm emergency fund; but any proposal that alters or repeals parts of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which is a long term piece of legislation, should surely also stand on its own feet.

It may be that somebody can establish a relationship among these three or four provisions, but I submit their only real relationship is that they all deal with agriculture. This is the kind of problem that has arisen with other measures. For example, all the clauses of Bill C-207 had something to do with the government or aspects of government, but it was obviously a bag of many things, and that bill has not gone through yet simply because of the difficulty of dealing with an omnibus measure.

I have pressed my point in procedural terms. I have tried to reveal enough awareness of the substance of the bill to be able to talk about it; but as I say it strikes me it is quite unfair to face the House with a bill that has in it provisions that are totally different, particularly when we may be desirous of passing one of its provisions as it stands and the House may want to examine very carefully the other or long term provisions.

I think the Chair should consider giving the direction that this is another omnibus bill that ought not to be before us in this form but should be withdrawn and presented again as at least two bills, possibly as three.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the contentions made by hon. members on the point of order. I confess immediately that I am not an expert on the rules. I fully agree that up to clause 32, plus clauses 35, 36 and 37, the provisions are properly an item of legislation. In addition to the comments made on clause 32 I should like to add, in as reasoned and concise a manner as I can, that special transitional payments bear not the slightest resemblance of relation to what is envisaged in the main portion of the bill in regard to a Prairie grain stabilization fund.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has drawn into the discussion clause 32, and I defy anyone to tell me how the provisions of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act relate in any way, shape or form to the prairie grain stabilization proposals in the main portion of the bill. That Act has to do with storage paid on grain to elevator companies. It has an indirect relationship to grain producers in the sense that it would save them some grain storage costs, but it is a completely separate item.

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act might have some vague relationship with levies, and if the minister were bringing in some amendments to our crop insurance law then it would be proper for him to couple with those amendments some amendments to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, or a provision to repeal the act. But again it bears not the slightest resemblance to or has not the slightest relationship with the Prairie grain stabilization fund.

I submit that we have here a bag of tricks. I think this bill plays fast and loose with the rules. Further, it plays fast and loose with the ability of Members of Parliament to judge each of these separate items on its own merit, and to vote either for or against. Placing all of these into the one package inhibits, and I suspect will prevent, many members of this House from dealing adequately with the bill. I respectfully suggest, request and urge the Chair to curtail this practice by ruling that it be not allowed to continue any further. I submit, with all respect, that this practice has been followed too many times during the life of this Parliament. Being a new member, my impression is that it has been followed much more frequently in this Parliament than in any other, though I stand to be corrected on that.

The three clauses of the bill, clauses 32, 33 and 34, are in fact separate from each other and different pieces of legislation. They are put in this bill as a package, and I submit that this procedure is completely unjustified. These clauses should be separated from each other so they can be dealt with on their own merit as separate items of legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I regret to inform the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar that since he has already spoken he cannot take the floor again.

I have heard the very lengthy and interesting arguments presented both by the minister and hon. members. The point that has been raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is not entirely a novel one. As one who has been in this House for quite a few years, it is a point which I have been expecting to crop up again and again, since the bills presented during the past few years are somewhat different in form from those which some of us have debated in the past.

• (4:30 p.m.)

On the other hand, I quite realize that within our rules there is very little authority for the Chair, at this stage of the proceedings, to divide a bill or ask that it be withdrawn. As one who likes some finality but also likes to avoid making hasty decisions, I suggest that the subject matter be referred to the Speaker for consideration and for a ruling which might affect similar bills in the future.

This is a suggestion only, but the minister might consider the suggestion that this matter should be left in abeyance and another matter proceeded with until such a decision has been presented by the official Speaker of this House.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order which has been raised, and I appreciate what you have just said in respect of this matter, I wonder if I might have a moment to draw to your attention, for consideration while this matter is being reviewed, a statement made by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board which has a very substantial bearing on the point raised by my colleagues.

I should like to briefly draw attention to one paragraph of the statement made by the minister on March 15. I am sure it will be recognized that this does have a bearing on the point. When the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board presented his revised proposals on March 15, which form the basis for the legislation now being considered, he said in part, "there are very many substantial social and economic questions to be answered before appropriate government action to deal with total returns to grain and oil seed producers can be determined. The special payment of $100 million this year, combined with improved sales, will assist grain farmers markedly this year and permit time for the careful consideration and discussion required." Of course, the latter part of this statement refers to the permanent features of the plan contained in Bill C-244.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise essentially on a question of privilege in order to clarify the comments of the last speaker. I should like to indicate that his suggestion that the last statement had anything to do with this bill is erroneous. Rather, it was a reference to the total question of the income position of farmers, without specific relation to the bill itself. As has been made very clear on many occasions, the bill is a totality, and the urging of hon. members to drop the transitional feature would, in effect, practically eliminate it. The totality of the stabilization fund and the repeal of the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act are basically essential to the total position taken in the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it agreed that consideration of the point raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar be deferred and that we proceed with the next order of business?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING RATE PER BUSHEL, EMERGENCY PAYMENTS, EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO RYE, FLAXSEED AND RAPESEED

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration) moved that Bill C-239, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

He said: The bill before the House to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act is a further step in attempting to rationalize and improve the situation of the grains industry of this country. Over a period of recent months, we did a significant number of things to allow the farmer to put his remarkable efficiency to better use by improving the system which faced him and over which he had no control. Perhaps the most notable thing done which is related to this bill was the alteration in the quota system announced for next year by the Wheat Board, which was in part also in effect this year.

As a result of that change in the quota system, the ancient special bias toward wheat compared with other grains has been removed in order that the farmers' decisions about which grains to grow might be more directly related to market conditions and the conditions of their own farms rather than to special incentives, disincentives or other biases which might be put into the system by the government or agencies under its direction.

The amendments to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act are designed in part to do the same thing in relation to grain; that is to say, they are designed to remove the bias in favour of wheat which clearly existed in the cash advance system up to this time. That is done in the bill by changing from a fixed bushel amount, that is an equal bushel number for wheat, barley and oats, to numbers of bushels which will vary from grain to grain, reflecting as accurately as possible the likely delivery of those grains during an ensuring crop year.

The amount of advance on any particular grain will, therefore, be related to the delivery opportunities and the likely delivery value of the grain for that year. Under the existing law, the farmer is basically faced with a $6 maximum per acre if he is obtaining his advance based on wheat, $4.20 if he is taking his advance on barley, and even less for oats. Under the proposed formula, the amount per bushel which he may obtain by way of an advance will be related from year to year to the initial price for the various grains, so that the amount per bushel will vary as between wheat, barley and oats. However, the number of bushels will also vary. In the ordinary course of events, the delivery prospect for barley is significantly higher in bushels than wheat, and the number may in turn be significantly higher for oats.

The general provisions in terms of requirements of grain on hand and delivery will be maintained. The other main proposal by way of change relates to the assurance that in any normal year advances will be repaid in the year in which they are taken. The repayment amount for each of the grains will be set at a per bushel rate in the same amount as the advance, so that as delivery occurs during the course of the year the advance will be repaid. This will restore the cash advance system to its originally intended purpose. It will be available to farmers during those periods of time when delivery opportunities are limited or slow, in order that they may obtain cash, interest-free, when they require it by way of advances on delivery of grain later in the crop year.

Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act

The change which was made in the last set of amendments to the cash advance legislation was of notable importance to the prairie producer over this last difficult period. It did, in the course of the very worst year in a series of years, allow the prairie grain farmer to obtain by way of advance a very significant amount of cash, many millions of dollars. I believe the maximum figure reached in the course of the advances of a year ago was $272 million, and this at a time when delivery opportunities were very limited because of total world marketing conditions. The farmer's position, therefore, at that time in terms of cash from grain sales was at its very worst.

That accumulating cash advance situation, of course, could not be allowed to go on very long. Indeed, I believe it is fair to say farmers themselves were wary of the growing total of advances in their hands and recognized the need to bring the amount back down into repayable ranges. In the course of this year, because of the very significantly increased exports of grain, cash advances are being reduced significantly so that at the present time something between $90 million and $95 million is outstanding in advances compared to a much higher figure a year ago.

Mr. Horner: In the hands of how many farmers?

Mr. Lang: I do not have the figure in front of me, although I am sure I can turn to it in a moment. The cash advances, therefore, with the rate at present at $1 for wheat with repayment at half the initial price, did serve a purpose in that period when no other stabilization system existed and when therefore there was really only this alternative within the system for attempting to even out the very low points in a producer's grain income. It was the rather undesirable means of bringing more grain into the system, more than was required for any commercial reason, which therefore would be in the system at the expense of the total income of the grain industry. The cash advance system at least was a far more sensible system of getting cash into the farmer's hands, although it was there in their hands in the form of a loan. The loan aspect, of course, was of some concern to the farmers.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) asked how many farmers held advances. As of April 23, the last report I have in front of me, a total of 51,285 advances had been issued in the 1970-71 crop year for a total of $90,605,350 for that year. At that point of time, on April 23, the total of the advances outstanding for that year and the previous year was $95,845,992. In the approximately comparable period of April 24, 1970, a similar report would have shown 121,092 advances having been made for the crop year 1969-70 for a total of advances of $270,754,372. The total amount of advances outstanding on that date, April 24, 1970, was $228,291,024, a difference of $130 odd million in the two years. It is true that repayment had to come out of this year's income that is one of the very important cash factors facing the grain farmer at this time. But this does demonstrate, in the absence of any other stabilization program, why the cash advance system as it then existed was available to provide farmers on an interest free basis to tide the mover at least to a little extent in some of the very worst periods of 1969-70, which would have been infinitely worse if the advances had not been available.

Now, with a different form of stabilization, such as an outright payment to farmers in the difficult years when the amount of cash flowing is lower than the previous average, or the use of cash advances, which was never really intended at the beginning, will no longer be necessary. The bill, therefore, in my view brings the cash advance system in these respects back to the original intention of relating the advance in the initial period to a proportion of the income which the farmer expects to obtain from the sale of grain during the course of the year. These amounts will be set from year to year according to the best information available as we enter a crop year.

Another significant change being proposed in these amendments which, likewise in an important respect, brings the bill back to its original intention is one which indicates the requirement of interest to be paid by those farmers who use the cash advance legislation not as an advance on money for grain they will deliver later in the year but rather simply as a way to obtain an interest free advance because they are permit holders. The bill provides, therefore, by way of amendment that interest will be payable on only those cash advances taken by farmers who, instead of delivering grain as would have been expected because they had grain as security for their advance, pay the advance off in cash at some point in the year.

Two other changes in the bill deal with situations which have arisen in the past where farmers have been in special difficulty, and where the cash advance system can be used to avoid the difficulty of the moment. I refer to the clauses which would permit the extension of cash advances in the exceptional circumstances of the requirement of money for the drying of damp grain, as well as when there are climatic conditions over which no one has control and when the grain cannot be harvested as we go into the winter but remains on the farms under the snow in fairly harvestable position but not yet in the farmer's bins. In both cases, where required by the circumstances, it will be possible to extend the cash advance system to farmers along the lines of the extensions which have been legislated by the House in those circumstances in the past without going back to the House for such legislation. This will mean we may be able to act more expeditiously in such circumstances to meet the needs which themselves are frequently very significant and a burden when time is clearly of the essence. I, therefore, am pleased for these purposes to move that the bill be read a second time and referred to the committee.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question before he resumes his seat?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The minister has time remaining and may answer a question if he is prepared to do so.

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask the minister a question concerning his reference to the charging of interest on cash advances where farmers simply repaid the extended cash advance in cash rather than by way of deductions from grain delivered. Has the minister taken into account the situation of farmers in various circumstances, such as that of a farmer who may attempt to grow registered or certified seed but who may not know until sometime after he has taken the grain off whether or not that grain will be acceptable as registered seed grain. Thus, the farmer may deliver his grain as straight commercial grain or he may eventually sell it as registered seed. In the meantime, however, he takes a cash advance. Is there any way in which the circumstances of such a farmer can be taken into account, and would such a measure not fall into conflict with the proposed subclause (2) of clause 5?

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lang: We certainly did give consideration to the sort of situation to which the hon. member and others referred, where the farmer may quite properly change his intentions in the course of the year in regard to the use of his grain, although he originally intended to deliver it. These situations are relatively rare, especially in circumstances when the farmer is left without deliverable grain on hand. I will be very glad to discuss with hon. members in the committee the detailed problems that arise in trying to cope with the specific situation, which ideally we should like to do.

The real balance to be drawn here is between ruling out any special treatment for those very special cases because of the difficulty of dealing with them in order not to create tremendous difficulties for the administrators, the Wheat Board, and the agents of the Wheat Board who have to administer the cash advances. I will be very glad to discuss possible solutions to that problem with hon. members in the committee, and to go over with them in detail the problems we see in the administration. I agree with the hon. member that in principle, if the administrative difficulties were not there, it would be useful to have a device for separating those who are in this legitimate position as compared with those who are really using the advance as an interest free loan without any intention of delivering the grain later. Intention is a difficult thing to determine, however, and that is part of our problem.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I think that this legislation has perhaps been brought about by the changes in the quota system to some extent. I think also that the changes that have been proposed were a result of the government having reflected upon some of the changes that they had made in previous years, and realizing that they had been in error in the first instance. They realized that cash advance legislation was not functioning as it had been intended to function. I remember the debate on that particular occasion very well. It was pointed out at the time that the government was going to run into a snag in that no farmer could repay his loan in one year in view of the amount he could draw and the amount of grain that he could deliver. The original intention of the government was to bring in legislation which would provide immediately, and under pressing circumstances, $6,000 to producers who might require it. Perhaps that saved the government the embarrassment of having to provide some other funds to tide the producer over the difficult situation. In the absence of any other idea, they hit upon the cash advance legislation, but rather than make it functional they simply doubled the amount of the advance. As a result, they ran into a snag. However, the doubled amount which was made available was not recoverable in one year, which simply meant that in the subsequent years the amount of income available to producers was reduced by the amount that had to be recovered. That compounded the problem. Now, after several years of toying with the idea, the government finds itself in the position of having to recover the funds which were made available to the producers.

I do not find much objection to the principle of the legislation. After all, it was our party that introduced it. I can well recall the days when it was said that the Wheat Board would have to resign because they would not be able to recover these sums. This is an old story which is well remembered by many producers. I was very concerned about the reports that people had made submissions to the task force, which accepted the idea to some extent, that eventually the practice of cash advances should be eliminated. I would hate to see the day when this might happen simply to satisfy a few bureaucrats who think that farmers are toying with this money. This is not the case, and I think the minister would be the first to agree with me, because whenever these loans are taken out they are needed. This money has served the rural agricultural communities of western Canada very well over the years.

I am glad the minister has introduced the amendments and thereby dispelled to some extent the fears that were building up in western Canada that this legislation would be thrown overboard, as has happened with many other useful pieces of legislation. I commend the minister for acting on the advice that he has received, and also for listening to the pleas of the farmers that this legislation be continued. Also, I agree that the section of this bill which deals with unharvested grain is a useful provision to have on our statute books, because every time such a situation arises as a result of weather conditions over which there is no control we know that the government is prepared to act, rather than have these people come cap in hand to ask for some assistance.

As we know, legislation is slow in being passed at times. In the meantime, there is a great deal of anxiety and concern among the people involved. They do not know what the government will do. They are at the mercy of governments. Having this type of legislation on the books simply means that the people of Canada are prepared to assist in any emergency situation which may develop in any part of Canada. In this case, the legislation deals with the agricultural situation in western Canada.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton)—Post Office—Alleged difficulties resulting from new mail routings; the hon. member for Lotbinière (M. Fortin)—Regional Economic Expansion—Quebec—Application for interest-free loans from federal government.

It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

• (5:00 p.m.)

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

THE FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENT TO EXTEND CONSUMER PROTECTION AGAINST HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS AND FRAUDULENT ADVERTISING

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved that Bill C-39, to amend the Food and Drugs Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill was first put on the order paper in 1966 following the hearings of the Joint Committee on Consumer Affairs which was chaired by the hon. Senator Croll and the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). During the hearings of that committee we found that our consumer protection legislation in Canada was very inadequate, and in order to do something at that time I put forward several measures, one of which was this bill.

This bill proposes certain amendments to the Food and Drugs Act, to extend the coverage of that act to do two things. The first is to protect the consuming public from products which are hazardous and might cause some harm, and the second is to protect them from misleading advertising. As I say, the bill has been on the order paper through several sessions since 1966, and as I have spoken on it previously I will not take up too much time today.

Since I first introduced the bill there has been considerable improvement in our consumer protection legislation. To begin with, following publication of the report of the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Consumer Affairs, a Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs was established to promote legislation for consumer protection, and generally to serve the interests of the consumer.

Following the establishment of that department, several items of legislation have been passed, and some of them have covered some of the matters which I have in my bill. Among those pieces of legislation, we have the consumer textiles articles act, which was passed in the last session. We have the Bills of Exchange Amendment Act, which was also passed in the last session which protects the consumer against recourse on promissory notes when there has been a defective product sold. We have had the bill to produce more competition in the drug business, which was known as a bill to amend the Patent Act, Trademarks Act and the Food and Drugs Act. We have had the move by the government to transfer administration of section 33 of the Combines Investigation Act from provincial to federal administration. That is the section which deals with misleading advertising. I might say that since the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs took over administration of that section of the law, there have been many more prosecutions and many more convictions. We have also had the Hazardous Products bill, which was passed by parliament, and which does some of the things proposed in my bill. We have had the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Bill, C-180, which was passed by the House this session, and the federal bill on co-operatives, Bill C-177.

All those items of legislation to which I refer were the result of recommendations of the Joint Committee of the House and the Senate. Since I was a member of that committee, I feel a bit encouraged by the fact that many of our recommendations have been put forward in law. Many of us who are backbenchers try to promote new ideas or reforms in several ways. We work on committees, and try to bring in committee reports which will do some of the things we want done. We introduce private members' motions and bills, hoping that the ideas in them will be picked up by the government, by certain ministers, by the press gallery, and that by promoting them in this way we will eventually have them adopted by the government, and adopted as legislation by this House.

In the area of consumer legislation, a lot has been done since we had that committee in 1966. Many of the items I have in my bill, C-39, have been adopted and so the bill is not required in the same way as it was when it was first prepared. However, there are still certain matters that have to be covered, and certain reforms that have to be accomplished. Some people in Canada will argue that we do not need consumer legislation. They feel that with a free market economy all we have to do is guarantee that there will be the freedom of contract, and that the consumer will be protected against fraud and other criminal practices. But, Mr. Speaker, things have changed a lot in the market place, especially in the consumers' market place, since those laws were originally introduced.

Today, the products which are for sale at a retail level are extremely complex. It is not like the days when our parents went into the corner butcher store or corner grocery store. They knew the owner of the store. The products were simple and they could rely upon the merchants with whom they dealt. Today most consumers deal through large supermarkets or department stores. They are dealing with clerks who are part of a long chain of responsibility within those large stores. The products, as I have said, are very complex and have many additives.

For example, in the grocery business we have what are called convenience foods, prepared foods. They are not simply produced as they were in the old days. You are not getting just a basic piece of meat or vegetable. There are many chemicals and additives put into the package or tin. You have many products that are partially cooked, or that have been cooked and frozen, and so forth. As a result, the consumer is confronted with large, impersonal retail businesses, and he is confronted with products which make it difficult for him, as a layman, to understand everything connected with them.

In addition to that he is confronted with a massive advertising program, a type which was not seen 20 or 30 years ago. Of particular importance is the impact of television advertising, magazine and newspaper advertising, advertising over the radio, and even door-to-door selling. When you put all these together, that type of advertising with that type of retailing, and the type of products being sold I submit, and I think most hon. members would submit that we need much greater protection for the consumer who, even if he is diligent when he goes to make a purchase, cannot possibly deal on an equal basis with the person who is selling to him.

For this reason, I urge the House to pass this bill, particularly those items in it which have not been covered by present government legislation. And I also urge the members of the House to push for further reform in our consumer legislation. Unfortunately, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is not here today. I presume he is in British Columbia meeting the British Queen, but I hope these remarks will be brought to his attention. As I said, Mr. Speaker, this bill has been before the House previously and I do not have too much to say about it, but I merely put it to the House that this is an important matter. It covers a lot of important transactions with which the ordinary Canadian has to deal, and I urge that the House accept the principle of this bill.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to get into this debate, having been castigated by the press and some other people because I took the side of the manufacturer and the big bad business man in the debate on the packaging and labelling bill. I do have a lot of sympathy for these people, however, and I bemoan the fact that so many people are down on those who run the stores and operate the businesses, who are twisting and turning and doing their utmost to find a product that the consumer will like. There are graveyards filled with products that these merchants have tried to sell but which have had to be thrown aside when not accepted by the public.

I do not think all business people are guilty of fraudulent practices or of trying to put down the consumer. I admit there are areas where there should be more consumer education and better understanding of the products presented, then perhaps mistakes would be avoided.

There is great confusion in the marketplace, but I think some of it is created by the way in which we want to live these days. Twenty or 30 years ago, all the meat was sold in the butcher shop, the groceries in the grocery store and the drugs in the drugstore. Now, we go to the market and see groceries, meat, drugs and clothing all in the same store, so there is reason for consumer confusion.

I realize there are areas in which this bill is an advantage. I refer to the things I have been talking about for so long in this House and in committee with regard to hazardous products. We had a hazardous products bill and I pressed the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) to do his utmost to find a container for hazardous products. Each year in Canada over 50,000 children are poisoned. Some of these children cannot read, so it is important that it be made more difficult for them to get at the bottle of aspirin or pills that is going to be harmful. This is an area where we should be more definite.

In the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs about a week ago I asked the minister about these containers. He said, "We have sent directives out to the drug companies that they should consider putting pills that might be dangerous to children in these specially capped bottles." I do not think that is good enough. There should be regulations covering this type of thing. We have regulations for a lot of things, and if we are going to protect children we should have regulations covering these containers. I do not think it is enough just to label the package. I do not care what kind of symbol is put on it, a child of three or four years of age does not know what it means. They see mommy or daddy take a pill out of a bottle in the medicine cabinet, so they think that is the thing to do. Next, they climb up, get the bottle and take the pills.

The same situation applies to bleaches. Clause 40 reads:

> No person shall sell any soap, detergent, or cleanser that has in it any substance that may cause injury to the health of the user when it is used according to the directions or for such purposes as are customary or usual.

We know that there are bleaches which would be injurious and that is where the difficulty is. A child may drink bleach, feel pain and even die from the effects. The next time the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) brings in this bill, he might include some regulations with regard to hazardous products in order to ensure that these accidents can be prevented.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few brief comments on Bill C-39, to amend the Food and Drugs Act as brought forward by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand). The explanatory note to the bill is rather interesting. It reads:

> At present the Food and Drugs Act protects consumers by making it an offence punishable by fine and prison to sell hazardous substances and to use fraudulent advertising and sales promotion with respect to foods, drugs, cosmetics and devices. This bill would extend that protection to include these additional consumer products:
> (a) Soaps, detergents and cleaners.
> (b) Fabrics and cloth.
> (c) Paints, dyes and tints.
> (d) Mechanical household appliances.

The hon. member is to be congratulated on bringing forth this kind of bill which deals with consumer legislation. Certainly, there is a very enlightened section of our society today which is concerned with this subject. It seems to me that as our society goes forward and becomes more sophisticated, regardless of how we may oppose this, people want and expect more protection by the state. They expect protection from bad drugs, dangerous products or dangerous equipment.

This Parliament has been notable for the amount of legislation brought forward in this field. Back in the first session, there was a bill which dealt with reducing the price of drugs and there was the Hazardous Products Act which did many of the things suggested in this bill to cover items that really are not drugs but are found in the home and can be dangerous if improperly used. In the present session of Parliament, there has been the packaging and labelling bill as well as changes to the Weights and Measures Act, and the many other bills which dealt with consumer protection.

The present technological age has brought great benefits to mankind. At the same time, however, man is now faced with a great variety of complex materials including foods, drugs, medical devices, household chemicals, appliances and wearing apparel. The general public is not in a position to assess the hazards associated with the use of many of these products, or to appreciate whether or not they are presented in a fraudulent or misleading manner, so hence must rely, to some considerable extent, upon government bodies for protection.

Bill C-39 proposes that the authority of the Food and Drugs Act, in protecting the consumer, should be extended beyond that of foods, drugs, cosmetics and medical devices to include the items I have mentioned. In speaking to Bill C-39, perhaps it would be desirable, at the outset, to comment briefly upon the matters presently contained in the Food and Drugs Act. The Food and Drugs Act is a consumers' act intended to protect the consumer from health hazards and fraud or deception in the use of foods, drugs, cosmetics and medical devices.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The basic provision about foods is that no foods shall be sold if they have in or upon them a harmful or poisonous substance or if they are filthy, putrid, disgusting, rotten, adulterated, diseased or were manufactured or stored under unsanitary conditions. Another provision about foods relates to fraud or misrepresentation. This section provides that: "No person shall label, package, treat, process, sell or advertise any food in a manner that is false, misleading or deceptive or is likely to create an erroneous impression regarding its character, value, quantity, composition, merit or safety." This is a very wide and strong prohibition indeed. In the food section of the food and drug regulations considerable space is devoted to the control of the chemicals which may be added to foods and to the amounts of pesticide residues which may remain on foods without constituting a health hazard.

With regard to drugs, the Food and Drugs Act requires that "No person shall label, package, treat, process, sell or advertise any drug in a manner that is false, misleading or deceptive or is likely to create an erroneous impression regarding its character, value, quantity, composition, merit or safety." Another important section of the Food and Drugs Act pertaining to drugs requires that all drugs sold must meet a standard of composition, purity and potency.

The Food and Drugs Act deals rather briefly with cosmetics. It is forbidden to sell a cosmetic that is harmful when properly used or that is filthy or contains decomposed substances or foreign matter or that was manufactured under unsanitary conditions.

With regard to medical devices, the Food and Drugs Act forbids the sale of devices that might be injurious to the health of the purchaser when properly used. There is the usual section which forbids the selling, packaging, labelling, advertising, etc., of a device in a false, misleading or deceptive manner.

One activity of the Food and Drug Directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare which may be mentioned here is the establishment of poison control centres and the role which they play in protecting the Canadian public. In 1957, the Food and Drug Directorate established a central bureau which now contains information on the treatment to be prescribed for some 20,000 drugs and household chemicals if they are accidentally ingested or come in contact with any part of the body. This information is transmitted to some 250 poison control centres in hospitals across Canada and is readily available to doctors who need it. The poison control centres report regularly on the numbers and types of poisonings which come to their attention. During 1968, 41,722 such reports were received by the Food and Drug Directorate. Almost 75 per cent of the reports involved children under five years of age. Of the total number of reports, 20.2 per cent involved the ingestion of acetylsalicylic acid, 38.2 per cent involved other drugs; 40.2 per cent were concerned with household products, and 1.5 per cent involved miscellaneous substances.

In order to reduce the number of poisonings of children due to acetylsalicylic acid, the following regulations were inserted into the Food and Drug Regulations in April, 1969:

No person shall sell a drug containing acetylsalicylic acid or any of its salts unless

(a) the inner and outer labels thereon carry a caution or warning to the effect that the drug should always be stored in a safe place out of reach of children;

(b) where the package of the drug contains, in excess of 30 grains (1.944 grams), acetylsalicylic acid or the equivalent quantity of any of its salts, both the inner and outer labels of the package carry a caution or warning to the effect that there is enough drug in the package to seriously harm a child;—

Where a drug containing acetylsalicylic acid or any of its salts is specially formulated or specially recommended for children, no person shall sell a package of such drug to the general public unless

[Mr. Foster.]

(a) the package contains not more than twenty-four single doses of the drug;

(b) each single dose contains not more than one and one-quarter grains (81 mg.) of acetylsalicylic acid or the equivalent quantity of any of its salts; and

(c) the inner and outer labels of the package carry a caution or warning to the effect that the drug should always be kept out of reach of children, and the caution or warning is preceded by a prominently displayed symbol acceptable to the Director and designed to draw the attention of the consumer to the caution or warning.

In addition to the above regulations, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro), together with other interested Canadian organizations, is currently studying other ways and means of making drugs and other substances less available to children. These studies include the development of a closure which cannot be opened by young children.

Another piece of federal legislation which is primarily intended to protect Canadian consumers is the Hazardous Products Act which was assented to on July 27, 1969. This Act, administered by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, with officers of the Food and Drug Directorate providing advice on the health aspects of the use of these materials, provides for the complete prohibition of the sale of certain products and the sale, under specified conditions, of other products.

Part I of the Schedule to the Hazardous Products Act, which lists those household products which may not be sold in Canada, includes the following items:

1. Jequirity beans;

2. Furniture and other articles intended for children painted with material containing in excess of 0.50 per cent of lead.

The latter item immediately reminds one of lead paint which at one time was used on children's furniture. Sometimes, after chewing the furniture, children would suffer from lead poisoning. They would come into contact with the lead in the paint or in other covering material, and suffer from an overdose.

Other products which may not be sold in Canada include:

3. Liquid coating materials having a flashpoint of less than 0°F.

4. Any material which has been rejected by the U.S. Federal Trade Commission because of flammability;

5. Sweat shirts and chenille berets that have the burning characteristics of Class 3 textiles;

6. Spectacle frames that are made of cellulose nitrate;

7. Toys made of cellulose nitrate other than ping pong balls;

8. Toys containing carbon tetrachloride, methyl alcohol, petroleum distillates, benzene, turpentine, boric acid or ethyl ether;

9. Toys treated with lead pigments; more than 0.5 per cent lead in the coating; any compound of antimony, arsenic, cadmium, selenium or barium under prescribed conditions; or mercury.

10. Toys emitting excessive noise;

11. Kite strings made of material that is a conductor of electricity.

Certainly, we see at this time of the year that this is a good provision, because children have been flying kites. Sometimes they come too close to hydroelectric wires and the danger of electrocution is always present.

Part II of the Schedule of the Hazardous Products Act refers to those household products which may only be sold if they meet the requirements, including labelling, of the Hazardous Products Regulations. Part II includes:

1. Bleaches, cleansers and sanitizers.

Here may I say that the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe) has already mentioned the danger of bleaches that are in improper containers. It is necessary to protect children from inadvertently coming into contact with bleaches, some of which contain caustic soda. These materials are harmful to the skin and dangerous when taken internally. Other products include:

2. Corrosive chemicals such as acids and bases;

3. Petroleum distillates;

4. Adhesives, cleaning solvents, thinning agents and certain dyes;

5. Certain polishes and cleaning agents containing carbon tetrachloride, chloroform, etc.

6. Fire extinguishing fluids composed of any halogenated aliphatic hydrocarbons;

7. Certain antifreeze preparations;

8. Turpentine;

9. Methyl alcohol;

10. Pressurized containers;

11. Polishing agents containing hydrocyanic acid;

12. Toys;

13. Dolls and soft toys;

14. Pull and push toys that have soft-lie handles three-eighths of an inch in diameter or less;

15. Toy steam engines;

16. Finger paints;

17. Rattles;

18. Elastics;

19. Batteries.

• (5:30 p.m.)

The hazardous products regulations clearly specify the conditions under which the substances mentioned in part II may be sold. With regard to the labelling of hazardous products, it might be pointed out that both the French and English languages must be used. In addition, reference might be made to sections 7 and 8 of the hazardous products regulations which read as follows:

Information required on principal display panels

7. (1) The principal display panel of each container of a regulated product shall show such of the following graphic matter as is required by these regulations to be shown for that regulated product:

(a) the degree of hazard symbol;

(b) the nature of hazard symbol, superimposed on the appropriate degree of hazard symbol;

(c) the signal word Danger, Warning or Caution; and

(d) a statement of the nature of the primary hazard immediately following the signal word.

(2) All graphic matter required by these regulations to be shown on the principal display panel of a container shall be placed parallel to the base of the container and centred around a vertical line bisecting the area of the principal display panel.

Information required on containers:

8. Each container of a regulated product shall show such of the following graphic matter as is required by these regulations to be shown for that regulated product:

(a) a statement of the nature of the secondary hazard;

(b) statement of precautions; and

(c) the words 'First Aid Treatment' in boldface capitals and, immediately following such words,

(i) the source of the hazard,

(ii) the first aid treatment antidotes, and

(iii) directions for the proper and safe use and storage.

The hazardous products (toys) regulations prescribe the requirements regarding the following potential hazards associated with toys: packaging, electrical, mechanical, thermal and toxicological hazards. These regulations also specify the conditions under which the following toys may be sold: dolls and soft toys, pull and push toys, toy steam engines, finger paints, rattles, elastics and batteries.

Another federal act dealing with a matter referred to in Bill C-39 as the Textile Labelling Act, also administered by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. With regard to misleading or deceptive advertising of any product, action may presently be taken under section 33(d) of the Combines Investigation Act.

In summary, Bill C-39 proposes that the Food and Drugs Act be extended to include the following: soaps, detergents and cleaners; fabrics and cloth; paints, dyes and tints and mechanical household appliances, in order that these items may not present a health hazard to the user or be presented in a fraudulent manner. An examination of federal legislation would suggest that provision already exists in the following acts, together with the relevant regulations, to control adequately those products referred to in Bill C-39. Specifically, I would refer to the Hazardous Products Act together with the hazardous products (hazardous substances) regulations and the hazardous products (toys) regulations, the Textile Labelling Act and the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member was speaking in support of Bill C-39 when he ended by saying that everything mentioned in this bill was already controlled by other legislation and regulations. From the numbers of letters I have received calling attention to hazardous products which are mentioned in the bill before us, it would appear that the department is doing a very poor job of exercising control if, in fact, legislation to correct such a situation already exists. It seems to me no good reason exists for members on the government side attempting to talk out a bill introduced by one of their own hon. friends in these circumstances.

It would appear as though the consultation process between manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers has virtually come to an end. If we are really concerned about consumer protection, the least we can do is refer this bill to the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to ascertain whether we do in fact have any control over the substances and products mentioned in the bill. It appears to me that the regulations so far issued in connection with detergents and soaps, for example, have not solved the problem. In my view there has not been sufficient consultation between government agencies and manufacturers of the products concerned.

If the intention is to continue importing the vast quantity of toys and other products we are importing now, then the quality of those imports should be strictly supervised. The controls already in existence are sadly lacking. The only conclusion is that the legislation needs revising so that the protection about which we have been talking this afternoon can be provided in a meaningful way as the sponsor of the bill before us intended it should be.

If we continue to import toys and products such as are mentioned in the bill, we should never relax our concern for the safety of consumers in this country. It is not good enough to recite a list of the legislation already in existence, when each of us in the House of Commoms realizes that the situation is not in fact under control. This is an argument for extending recognition to a bill which would bring the necessary control provisions under the food and drugs legislation.

I urge hon. members not to talk out this bill but to give it due consideration, realizing that Canadian consumers are entitled to protection and that we are the only people who can refer a bill of this kind to a committee where it can receive proper attention and where recommendations as to the necessary revision of present legislation can originate. I, for one, support this bill and urge the House to let it go to the committee at least. If similar legislation is already in effect, perhaps it would be a good thing to hear from those who are supposed to enforce it, and shake them up a little. They must become more concerned, because the consumers themselves are concerned about this issue and it is up to us to protect the public.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to state my views on the motion proposing that Bill C-39 be read the second time and referred to the Standing committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

The purpose of this bill is very important, for it aims at protecting consumers against the potential hazards of certain products and devices on the market.

Here is an excerpt of the bill in question:

> At present the Food and Drugs Act protects consumers by making it an offence punishable by fine and prison to sell hazardous substances and to use fraudulent advertising and sales promotion with respect to foods, drugs, cosmetics and devices. This bill would extend that protection to include these additional consumer products:
>
> (a) Soaps, detergents, and cleaners.
> (b) Fabrics and cloth.
> (c) Paints, dyes and tints.
> (d) Mechanical household appliances.

Let me give an example showing the importance of protecting people from some hazardous products.

One lady came to see me recently and expressed her opinion on some bills that were being considered by the Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. She insisted on the importance of passing legislation to provide that the chemical formula of detergents be indicated on the containers. She told me that her four-year-old daughter had drunk detergent from the container. The mother had been very much worried, of course, not knowing what to do to help her daughter. There were no indications on the container; she did not know what toxic substances were contained in the detergent, and she had much difficulty in reaching a doctor, and finding a hospital that was equipped to handle such cases.

Had the ingredients of this detergent been listed on the container, with an indication of the proper antidote, perhaps she might have had less reason to worry and could have given her children the proper care much sooner.

I wish to congratulate the mover of this proposal for having once again emphasized this problem and for having introduced a bill which in my opinion is primarily designed to provide the general public with adequate information on such an important matter. However, it does not seem to me that this bill would add very much to the existing law.

Until now, a good number of measures have been taken in this field by the government, its agencies and the provinces. The cabinet or the Governor in Council can very easily correct this legislation by bringing in the necessary amendments, which would be very simple.

We are all aware that the present era of scientific developments has rendered great services to the consumer in putting at his disposal all kinds of products, the use of which may favourably influence his health, and his welfare in general. This is the good aspect of scientific and technological development in our age.

However, as it is often said, there are two sides to every issue. This constant evolution, this progress does not go without some danger. The products now at our disposal, drugs, cosmetics, domestic products, tools, medical equipment or any other devices, all these things in general result from scientific principles which brought about the use of more active products and improved, more powerful and efficient devices. It is unavoidable that the increased use of these products and devices should involve for the user a certain danger. He has to take the necessary precautions to eliminate the dangerous effects of uncontrolled use.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Until now, this seems to corroborate the view expressed in my first remarks, namely that it is always advisable to recall to consumers as best we can can the hazards of certain products.

Publicity in particular shows another inconvenience. In fact, in his endeavour to increase sales as much as possible, the advertiser can be carried away by his enthusiasm, magnify the products' value and even attribute to it proprieties it has not and thus promote it in a way which, consciously or not may be considered misleading or fraudulent.

However, because of this double possibility it behooves the authorities to protect the public against health hazards and fraud by controlling under adequate laws standards governing contents manufacture, labelling and advertisement of these products. Obviously, such measures cannot suppress all possibilities of more or less serious accidents, as can be deduced from annual statistics. I believe that besides passing laws the government must also help inform the public on measures to be taken both to prevent accidents and to correct their effects.

I believe that so far the government has carried out its responsibilities in this field, not only to protect the public through legislative measures but also to inform the people on the dangers of poisonings and on the aid to be given when they occur. For instance, we can recall that the Department of National Health and Welfare, in co-operation with the provincial health departments, established poison control centres a few years ago. It is said that there are about 250 of these in Canada and around 1957 the Food and Drug Directorate established a central information bureau for poison control. This bureau collects information to be used in the fight against accidents by poisoning.

We know that the government has taken a great number of measures in order to counteract the dangers created by the use and abuse of drugs.

There are some facts which are interesting to recall. For instance, the statistics for the year 1968 showed that nearly 75 per cent of the reports received from control centres concerned children under five years of age and out of a total of 41,700 cases of poisoning, 20.2 per cent had been due to headache tablets, 38.1 per cent to other drugs; 40.2 per cent to domestic products other than drugs; and 1.5 per cent to products of an unspecified nature.

In view of the high percentage of accidents caused by headache tablets, namely those containing acetylsalicylic acid, the government took special steps to protect the public, and particularly children, with regard to the use of such drugs, either by indicating the contents with special symbols, or by advising the users about special precautions.

Obviously, as the member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Howe) said a while ago, a child of five cannot understand what is written on the container, or read the warning on appliances. But we know that the parents, and more particularly the mother, watch the child. The mother is more than anyone else interested in reading what it written on containers or equipment. She is the one we can bank on to take precautions and keep the children away from danger.

We know the government took adequate steps to protect the public against drugs.

Recently, a letter containing commercial information was sent to pharmacists, asking them to use containers and locking devices in accordance with applicable standards when they are selling drugs prescribed by doctors.

Some of the provisions I have just mentioned apply only to drugs but they can show the way for effective control of various products to protect the public against health hazards by making them aware of deceptive information.

As I was saying, the bill introduced by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), does not seem to provide any further protection since all the devices covered by the bill are already adequately covered by the Hazardous Products Act.

It seems to me also that the household products and appliances covered in the bill are not food, drugs, cosmetics, medical devices, and that consequently, they should probably not come under the Food and Drugs Act.

It is obvious that there was a serious gap as far as the protection of the public against those products is concerned, but I think that it has been filled by the passage of the Hazardous Products Act in 1969. We know that it is administered by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Since the carrying out of various measures comes either under the Department of National Health and Welfare or the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, this can give rise to complications at the public level. However, there seems to be very good co-operation, the Department of National Health and Welfare acting as scientific adviser to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

I could also refer to Part I and Part II of the Hazardous Products Act. For example, the products referred to in Part II of the Annex can be sold to the public, provided that they are labelled in French and in English, in accordance with the regulations, so that all Canadians may understand.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair to resume the same at eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING RATE PER BUSHEL, EMERGENCY PAYMENTS, EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO RYE, FLAXSEED AND RAPESEED

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-239, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned this debate at five o'clock I had covered several areas of the legislation in order to remind the House, first that we do not object to the principle and, second, that I do not believe any of us would object to the idea that legislation should take into account contingencies such as snowed-under crops, and so on. I do not believe this legislation would be objectionable to anyone in this country, particularly since it would place farmers in a position where they would not have to come forward hat in hand asking for help, any more than the person who finding himself unemployed should have to appeal to government or anybody else for temporary assistance. I believe this type of assistance is an acceptable way of life in Canada.

What we find objectionable to some extent is the situation which might occur when a farmer is in error in estimating the type of crop he will have. A farmer may believe he will have a crop and on that basis he may take an advance. In all conscience he believes he will have a return on his crop and therefore applies for the advance, yet there are provisions which require him to pay a penalty from the day he applies for the advance.

Second, the farmer may have overestimated. In an area like mine, for example, it is not very easy to overestimate, but there are areas of southern Saskatchewan and southern Manitoba where floods occur in the spring and the whole crop may be lost. There should be provision to cover that type of situation. Farmers have to rely on the good will of the people to whom they apply, namely, the Wheat Board, who appeal to the minister and if the minister feels he should be generous then that is the order of the day. I think this should be a provision of the bill in cases where special conditions warrant it.

After all, we must accept the possibility of an emergency arising which means a crop is not harvested. To except people who have suffered loss to repay the advance when obviously the crop loss was not their fault, and they have to make a special appeal to the minister, is wrong in my opinion. I think we should go a little further and consider the fact that farmers might not be able to harvest their crops as a result of flooding in the spring. This type of hazard generally does not occur in my area, which is a rolling area, but I do know that it happens occasionally in southern Manitoba, southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta. It happens only once in 10, 12 or 15 years, but we should take it into account.

There are other aspects of this bill which puzzle me. First, the simple 6 per cent interest for those in default used to apply. This is no longer to be the case. Farmers are at the mercy of the cabinet, by Order in Council, and we do not know what rate of interest will be applicable. I do not think this is acceptable. I think there should be a fixed rate. The fact that the cabinet may vary the interest rate means that it has absolute control over the individual. Surely we are not yet in this position in our country.

Let us consider the expression "the Governor in Council may authorize". We find this expression objectionable. I would like to see ground rules set down and lived by. I do not want to see Governor in Council authorizations just because a Prime Minister happens to be annoyed one day, because the minister in charge happens to have a bad day with his wife or anyone else, or because a member of the opposition annoys the minister that day and he decides to zero in and fix the guy. This is the kind of provision to which Canadians in general should object. I object to it not only in this legislation but in any other piece of legislation.

Let us set down ground rules. Let us not leave it to regulations or to the Governor in Council. We have a Constitution and we want to abide by it. We want to know what the rules are. We do not want to be at the mercy of a few men who may be powerful but who are very weak in many ways. I think that this is a fair request to make of the cabinet. I do not think that any minister would want the responsibility of raising the interest rate all of a sudden, following which accusations would be made against him. We can figure out averages over the long term. Let us not equivocate. We can set down these rates. The civil service is loaded with economists. They can figure out a fair average which we can accept. We do not want to be at the mercy of a few men who may have a feud.

The bill provides for cash advances on crops. It seems to me the minister is simply using this bill in order to pass other legislation. When he says that farmers may take cash advances on rapeseed, rye and flax, all he wants to do is make other legislation more acceptable, such as the measure covering rye, flax and rapeseed under the Wheat Board Act, so that he may eventually put forward another bill—that is, the stabilization bill about which he is really concerned—because he will then have an absolute count of the number of bushels produced and sold on which farmers will pay 2 per cent. That is all the minister is interested in.

As a result of this situation we find that one bill is contingent upon another. At present all these bills are lumped together. If one fails, the others will not work. The minister shrugs his shoulders. I say to him that once farmers take cash advances on rapeseed, they are obviously committed to the Wheat Board. How does the government collect the money from the farmers? We are not dealing here with one bill; there are about three or four bills tied together. He might just as well have thrown them all in together. This is typical of the government. It reminds me of former Prime Minister Pearson who once asked, "Do you eat a half-rotten egg?" On this occasion we have to eat the whole egg even if half of it is rotten.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Despite many pleas made by other hon. members, no provision is made in this bill for the retired man who may want a cash advance and who has to rely on the mercy of the Wheat Board to obtain a special permit. The owner of the land may be in another country. How does he obtain the signature of the owner? The minister has not dealt with that kind of problem. He has not made an in-depth study of all the requirements. It might be easy enough in such a case to deal with it on the basis of fractions, one-half, three-quarters or five-eighths, making that amount available to the actual producer and having repayment on that basis. I think the department should look at this kind of problem. Older, retired people are often faced with this need. On occasion they tell me, "We have to wait for a special permit until we have made delivery." If it is fair enough for an active producer to take an advance, why is it not fair enough for the individual who has retired? His need may be just as great or greater. He may have just retired and his requirements may be more urgent. I have spoken about this problem previously and I do not know why the minister and the department shrug it off as though it were inconsequential.

A man may be a farmer for 30, 40 or 50 years. As long as he is a farmer we say fine, we will legislate for him. But the minute he quits farming is his need any less? He may have an accumulation of grain. How, then, does he dispose of it? He may have to dispose of it, as I say, in fractions. Why can he not take an advance on that basis? I think the minister should examine this matter more thoroughly.

I shall not speak any more at this stage, Mr. Speaker, except to say that this is a piece of legislation which the minister will have one of his easiest times piloting through the House.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, as the minister noted in his remarks when introducing this bill, some aspects of the legislation do restore the situation to its position prior to some of the amendments which were introduced by the government and adopted by the House in 1968 and 1969. Obviously, some of the changes made at that time did not work; they created more problems than they solved.

I recall that when hon. members on this side of the House repeatedly asked the government what it was going to do about farm problems, the continual answer we received from the government was one of falling back on a reference to the cash advances legislation. I suggest this was like a drowning man grasping at a straw. We said that this was no answer to the basic problems of agriculture. We approved of some of the changes and agreed they were useful, but I suggest other changes created real problems and the government now is in the process of correcting the situation.

I noted implications in the minister's remarks which left the impression that the minister and the government consider that cash advances are declining in usefulness and that they anticipate they will not be used as much in the future. In some respects this suggests a reduced priority in the government's thinking on this matter. This, of course, could have some validity if there are new programs which assume greater importance than this one or which supersede or add to existing programs. But I suggest that no matter what programs are introduced, there is still an important role for cash advances to play in the over-all grain marketing situation and they must be retained.

It is essential that cash advances be retained as a permanent feature of our marketing structure; but on the basis of his remarks this afternoon it seems to me that the minister almost hoped for a reduced use of the cash advances system. Of course, he has some basis for this hope in that on a number of occasions he has drawn attention to anticipated changes in the pattern of deliveries of grain throughout the crop year. The minister now anticipates that there will not be as heavy a movement of grain into storage near the end of the crop year, which now can mean some slowing up on deliveries in the early part of the new year and thus a greater use of cash advances at that time.

I would be happy to be corrected if I am wrong, but it seems to me the implications of his remarks were that he is looking to some point in the future when we will see an end to cash advances. I hope this is not so because, Mr. Speaker, I suggest cash advances involve some degree of acceptance of national responsibility for the grain marketing situation, a situation which in fact has national implications. It affects all of the Canadian economy. It has implications and consequences for the entire economy. In fact it is a recognition that some conditions are beyond the farmer's control and for which he should not be expected to bear the entire burden.

I also suggest that the cash advances system makes possible a greater degree of flexibility in the marketing system because it does not produce the same pressure on farmers to deliver their grain to the elevator as soon as there is a bushel of space available. It also means that the government and the Canadian Wheat Board can introduce measures which can assist in the movement of grain further down the marketing chain. At the same time, I think all of us will recognize that the cash advances system must be adjusted to keep up with changes in the marketing situation, to take advantage of new proposals, new ideas, and also to take account of new problems.

I note the changes in the act proposed by this bill. For instance, I note that the fixed advance price as set out in the act is being changed to a more flexible formula type of price, giving some discretionary powers to the Governor in Council. This is certainly suitable in many respects and the formula which suggests that the cash advance price should be related to an approximate two-thirds of the anticipated final price has some merit. I hope that this new mechanism as used and also the safety valve contained in it, whereby there is an escape clause in the event that the amount of the advance that could otherwise be recovered is less than the farmer would be able to receive, and relating this to the repayment schedule I hope it does not mean that the Wheat Board is anticipating further reductions in grain prices.

This afternoon the minister drew our attention to the removal of the bias favouring wheat. This is acceptable, as is the proposal to place permanently in the legislation help for drying damp and tough wheat and the possible provision of advances for unthreshed grain when circumstances warrant it. The changes proposed with respect to repayment provisions on cash advances are also useful.

The minister correctly noted a decline in confidence regarding the cash advances system. I think this arose out of the very difficult marketing situation which prevailed in recent years and the feeling of hopelessness among many farmers that the existing system would enable them to repay their cash advance in the foreseeable future.

I also noted the minister's remarks concerning the plan to charge interest on defaults in payments and on repayments which are made in cash rather than deliveries of grain. I acknowledge that some problems have arisen in this regard and agree that action is warranted to deal with them. But other problems could be created as a result of the action proposed by the minister, some of which may not be fully recognized at this time. I urge the minister to keep an open mind on the problems that may arise. There should be some flexibility to take into account unforeseen problems.

I appreciate the minister's response to my question earlier today regarding the problem of farmers who may grow registered seed and who, for a variety of reasons, may be unable to sell it as such and in the end have to sell it as commercial grain. They do not know what the outcome will be at the time they harvest the crop and put it into storage. I think this is a situation where a farmer quite honestly may be in a position where he needs cash. Certainly he can honestly say that he may deliver that grain as commercial grain rather than as some form of registered or certified seed. I raise this problem simply by way of example of the situation that can arise. No doubt there are other problems encountered when attempting to introduce the restrictions which the minister has proposed.

I have noted a number of areas in this bill with which I am in basic sympathy and agreement. My real quarrel is with the proposal to remove all references to the unit quota. I acknowledge that there have been problems with respect to the administration of the unit quota. When originally introduced, its purpose was to help the small farmer. I would agree to its removal if there were something acceptable to replace it. The unit quota did help the small farmer and I think the minister recognizes this.

Most of them live in the more productive grain producing areas of the Prairies and many also have a smaller acreage of summerfallow than the average. Operation Lift really hurt these small farmers who had little room for flexibility. The large farmers with 1½ or two sections or more had room for flexibility when planning production for 1970 to take into account the proposals contained in Operation Lift. The small farmer did not.

The minister is well aware of some of these problems. He will no doubt recall a letter which I drew to his attention, received from a constituent of mine. It was addressed to the minister and a copy was sent to me. This farmer pointed out that he had a half section of land and had cut down his wheat acreage in 1970 to 50 or 60 acres, and he had some summerfallow as well. Under the quota system he was only able to make a very small amount of deliveries. He pointed out that under the quota plan it would take something like three years to deliver all the grain he had produced because he had a bumper crop. The minister was good enough to send me a copy of his reply to the farmer, in which he seemed to deny the suggestion that the government's program had harmed the small farmer at all. I argue with that contention.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Burton: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Lang: I wonder if the hon. member appreciates that those farmers without surpluses who took the advice of the program last year and grew barley and rapeseed because of the discouragement of wheat, are in fact better off than they would have been under any other circumstances.

Mr. Horner: Did you encourage barley production last year?

Mr. Lang: For those without surpluses, yes.

Mr. Horner: When?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) has the floor.

Mr. Burton: This farmer grew something like 50 or 60 acres of wheat out of 320 acres of land. If that is not sufficient response to what the government did, then I don't know what the minister expects. If he expects this farmer to live on nothing at all, he is mistaken. At the same time the minister urged farmers not to increase their acreage of other crops. Operation Lift seriously hurt the small farmer.

Mr. Horner: Hear, hear!

Mr. Burton: By his interjection this evening, the minister has again demonstrated that he fails to understand the serious problems faced by small farmers in the Prairie provinces and the serious situation in which government policies have placed them. They simply cannot sell their production. There are many examples of the same sort of thing in the Prairie provinces. Just who is the small farmer?

Mr. Horner: The backbone of the nation.

Mr. Burton: Often he is an older man who still has some years left of his working life. Farming is the skill that he possesses, it is his life, he likes it and wants to continue in it for the remainder of his working life. Many of these farmers have a very useful contribution to make to the economy and to society. Some of them know that for one reason or another they will not have a son to carry on, but nevertheless this is the life they want and they can make a useful contribution to society by continuing to farm with a reasonable degree of assistance.

• (8:40 p.m.)

I received a letter today from a small farmer north of Regina who points out some of the problems he faces. He points out that he has written to Premier Thatcher, a good friend of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang). I am sure the minister knows him very well and I expect he will go along with these remarks since they are political colleagues and get along very well together. This farmer wrote to Premier Thatcher and asked, "What shall I do? I simply cannot make a decent or adequate living under present circumstances and policies." Premier Thatcher replied, "Diversify." The farmer said, "I am 58 years old. I have had a heart condition for the past year. I cannot go into livestock at this stage of life. I should like to carry on my farming operation for the remainder of my working life." That reply is the type of nonsense we are hearing in response to some of the difficulties which are brought to the attention of public officials.

We want to know what the minister intends to do about the problems of small farmers. It has been pointed out that there are to be adjustment programs. That is good and fine. If we can implement some adjustment programs, they will help. There may be farmers on small or uneconomic farms who want to retire. If that is their wish, help ought to be provided to enable them realize their wish. Some of them may want to continue their farming operations, and they can make good, useful contributions to our society. I suggest that we must be humane as well as making good economic sense or making dollars and cents sense, or nonsense in some cases.

I want to hear what the minister will do to replace this feature of grain marketing policy. Is he going to do something by way of income policy, price policy or production policies that will be of help to the small farmer, the man who faces a special set of problems? The minister ought to be well acquainted with these problems and he should show a greater degree of responsiveness than he has up to the present with respect to the problems faced by these people.

The feature of the legislation having to do with the elimination of the unit quota, in the absence of any acceptable or suitable alternative mars and scars an otherwise acceptable and useful overhaul of the act. I again remind the minister that we want to hear from him. What is his course of action? In which direction is he moving? Is he in the process of phasing-out the cash advances system, or is it still considered an integral and essential feature of marketing policy? Mr. Speaker, you can kill legislation by squeezing it out as well as by repealing it. I urge the minister not to underrate the importance of cash advances in the grain marketing system, because they are an essential component of that system.

The Liberal party, of course, historically has displayed a lack of understanding of the value of cash advances. I recall that years ago—I wonder if the minister recalls this—the then Liberal government resisted all attempts to introduce cash advances. It was not until they were turned out of office that cash advances legislation was introduced. Of course, the Liberal government has been riding along on the coat-tails of that legislation for some years since. We now wonder what is its future. Does the government plan to continue it on a long-term basis? Will it continue to be a permanent feature of grain marketing policy?

That pretty well sums up the comments that I wanted to make on this bill. I am looking forward to the minister's response to the proposals and problems which I have raised. I hope he will acknowledge that we have pointed to a number of features of the bill which are acceptable and useful. The minister is rather hard put sometimes to get his point across in western Canada. I ought to know, because today an interesting copy of the Hi-Way 15 Gazette dated April 29 came across my desk. That is a newspaper published in Semans, Saskatchewan.

Mr. Lang: It is an annual.

Mr. Burton: It is a weekly newspaper. That remark shows how much the minister is out of touch. I usually write a column in this weekly newspaper because it covers part of my constituency. Occasionally the minister horns in as well. Sometimes he sends out a little column which is printed in some weekly newspapers in Saskatchewan and, probably, in those beyond the Saskatchewan border.

Mr. Benjamin: It is a column which he does not write.

Mr. Burton: I looked at the column headed, "Ottawa Report" in the copy of the Hi-Way 15 Gazette which came across my desk this afternoon. I like to look at my column and check it, and I was amazed to see, "Ottawa Report, by John Burton, MP, Regina East Constituency". It began as follows:

> I have now introduced into the House of Commons a bill to amend the cash advance legislation. This is one more step in the total overhaul of grains legislation and policy—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask the hon. member if he had the consent of the Governor General to do this?

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I was very much concerned about the matter because I have been tutored on procedure by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

An hon. Member: You're heading for trouble.

Mr. Burton: I quickly ascertained that this column had been submitted by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. He went on to say what the legislation contained. That was a fair enough article describing the legislation. I sometimes wonder what the minister is up to. Is he so hard put to get people to read his columns, or the material that he puts out, that he must try to steal somebody else's byline?

I must take it as a compliment that the minister chose to use my byline in attempting to put before the readers of the Hi-Way 15 Gazette his views about the cash advances legislation. I can understand the minister's position because many people in the west have been caught and now they do not have much faith in the minister's views. I do not object, so long as the minister does not do it too often. I take it as a compliment that the minister used my name in order to obtain greater reader coverage for his column.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Burton: As I have said, we feel there are some useful proposals in this legislation. We are very concerned about the implications concerning the unit quota and the future of the small farmer. I am also concerned about the future of the legislation and hope to hear the minister on these matters.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on the amendments to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act I would like at the outset to say that I am in general agreement with the changes proposed. Because of the drastic lack of action over the past few years, changes such as the ones proposed, coupled with the advance notice of the minimum quota levels for wheat, oats and barley are, I believe, generally positive steps.

The extending of the cash advance payments from June 1 or, as the bill describes "at such later date in the crop year as may be prescribed" is welcomed by most producers because it will enable them to become more flexible in using the cash advances allotted to them. This, coupled with the repayment schedule, will keep farm cash advances down to a minimum and, hopefully, we will not see situations such as those we saw this year in which, although the grain was moving, there was not any great amount of money going back to the producers. A good deal of the grain that was sold was taken up in paying off the previous cash advances and very little money found its way into the hands of grain producers.

The solution, of course, is to have a much better record of selling grain than we have had previously. Farmers, through no fault of their own, had to borrow money on the grain only to find that because of poor sales they had no chance of paying it back. The value of the cash advance program to prairie grain producers during years when they are unable to make deliveries cannot be doubted. However, the cash advance program should be designed to cope with periodic or cyclical surpluses, and not for perennial overproduction caused by low marketing of grain. The program should not be used to insulate farmers from the realities of the marketplace or to encourage a chronic surplus of unmarketable grain, nor should it be employed to offset the harmful effects of other marketing policies or programs.

One thing which struck me while I was reading the legislation was the phrase "Governor in Council". This term is becoming increasingly more prominent in legislation introduced by the government. The changes in this act bring the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board more closely under the control of the minister or the government. This is in direct contrast to the desires of the people who are affected by it, mainly prairie grain producers.

There is a general feeling, and rightly so, that had the Wheat Board been more accountable to producers, it would have done a much better and more aggressive job of selling our grain products. As things stand, decisions are left to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board; it is he who has power to make decisions. We saw an example of this a week ago when the minister decided to introduce enabling legislation bringing flax, rye and rapeseed under the control of the Wheat Board. This, I suggest, is in direct conflict with the wishes of the producers and the marketing groups involved. We shall have more to say on this subject when we come to the proposed amendments to the Wheat Board Act.

Getting back to the bill, I would like the minister to give a more complete explanation for the advance payment rate of 66⅔ per cent. Why and how was this rate decided on? The chief feature of the bill is that the per bushel rate of payment is to be on the same basis as the per bushel rate of advance. This, as has been mentioned before, is commendable because producers must not be caught in the same predicament as they were in past years. The emergency advance payments for drying grain, the advance for unthreshed grain and all the other amendments to the legislation are of no consequence if we do not intend to adopt a positive marketing approach. That is really the critical point.

The key note which should persist throughout all agricultural recommendations is that the government should intelligently assist in achieving an orderly and planned transition which would encourage agriculture to adjust and achieve the largest possible gains at the lowest possible tangible and intangible costs. I believe the government should reduce its direct involvement in agriculture, thus encouraging farmers, farm organizations and agribusiness to improve their management and leadership functions and be more self-sufficient.

The organizational structure of agriculture both in government and in the private sector should be rationalized. Canadian grain marketing bodies need to look into trade promotion and trade development. Support and encouragement must be given to joint endeavours by farm groups, by federal and provincial governments, by trade associations and private business. In association with this, export credit and export insurance must be made more readily available to other countries. I say this to reinforce my point that all our deliberations are to no avail unless these steps are also adopted.

We must try also to place greater emphasis on continuity of the supply for export markets. If a contract is signed with a foreign country, we must be able to guarantee delivery of the product on the date and in the amounts specified. To do this requires the revamping of existing facilities at our ports. If we are to compete in the export markets, continuity of supply is vital. Market research must also be greatly expanded. The research that is needed, should be designed to reveal the size of the markets, the quality of the products demanded, how the markets are changing, and market strategies for Canadians.

I firmly believe the primary and continuing role of any government should be to produce a desirable economic and social climate for people in agribusiness. I say this in talking on the amendments to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act because I have grave doubts whether this is the direction in which we are moving. It is my opinion that as we move into the seventies this must be our primary goal and objective. This role should not include managing agriculture any more than it is the role of government to manage the steel industry or the pulp and paper industry. Because agriculture is peculiar in many respects, social as well as economic aspects of all policies must be kept in mind. Governments must always be aware that they are dealing with human beings and not abstract problems.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the amendments proposed in this legislation do lend a greater degree of flexibility to the act, but they will work only if they are coupled with a much more aggressive marketing approach.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House have experienced some frustration lately because there have been no agricultural bills before us to give us an excuse to scold the minister. We do not want the minister to think he is doing a good job, or anything like that, because obviously this is not the case. Many farmers tell me that things are not good and that it is time the government did something.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The farmers are always right.

Mr. Thomson: It seems to me that Liberal politicians do not always listen to what farmers have to say. I do not know whether this is because they are not farmers themselves or because they have never suffered hurt. Those who have suffered hurt or put up with a little hardship have a better understanding or what it is to go hungry.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Cash advances have helped farmers solve some of their problems. In addition, they have helped the economy of western Canada as much as they have helped the farmers, because farmers have no money over by the time they have paid their bills. Most rural municipalities have a good collection record as far as repayment of cash advances is concerned. To give credit where credit is due, this program has served a useful purpose in keeping municipalities, school units and the like viable.

Cash advances were first introduced because there was a need. I suggest that if our economy had been kept in gear and we had maintained our wheat sales as we should, and some of the changes required in the farming scene had been made a little sooner with proper leadership from the government, there would not have been so great a problem as later developed. The real reason for introducing cash advances was that we were not selling sufficient grain.

Now we have the situation where farmers who took the full advance last year are delivering grain, and with the low price of wheat and other grains at the moment they find they have very little money to last them the winter, and this leaves them a little disgusted. I have checked into the situation to see how things are in my part of the country, and businessmen tell me that although things are better and there is a more optimistic mood on the part of farmers and businessmen, actually there is no great flow of money.

The prime reason for this lack of money is that much of what the farmers receive from their grain sales goes to re-pay their cash advances. In addition, expenses are at a high level. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) suggested that we needed a more positive sales approach, and I agree. But in addition to a more positive sales approach we need some understanding of the cost factors in this country. It is not enough just to sell grain. You have to sell grain at a reasonable price. Not only that, but we need to control prices of goods so that incomes are kept steady. If we cannot do this, we will have to look around for additional sources of income.

There will be a number of agricultural bills before the House in the next few weeks and I shall have many more comments to make about the position of our farmers. I have no desire to make them all at the moment. I favour the changes proposed in this bill; for the most part I think they are helpful and needed and will make the legislation more effective.

I want to make one further comment about elevator agents who have frequently been asked to make cash advances. For the most part they are good, solid citizens who know their people. The record of collection of cash advances has been relatively good in the past, and we hope it will continue to be so. If it is not, I suspect it will be because the problems in this country have become so acute that the farmers have no alternative but to renege on some of their economic commitments and find themselves looking for some way of evading obligations that have become too onerous for them to meet. Having said that, I close by saying I favour the cash advance amendments and I wish the minister well in their administration.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise only to add a few remarks that I was hoping the minister would make earlier today since it is not too often that this particular law of the land, namely, the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, comes before Parliament. We should refresh our memories and remind the public, particularly in eastern Canada—and those who roost in yon gallery should be able to do a better job than they have in previous years—that cash advances are not taxpayers' money. Very often people in central Canada and in the extreme east and west of the country have had the impression that these payments were some kind of gift to the grain growers in the three prairie provinces.

I suppose this could have been called the original grain stabilization income plan. It was a measure that advanced a farmer's wages to him at the time he most needed them, namely, long after he had earned them. He had to repay them as and when he delivered grain. That was one of the reasons this act was passed. The second reason for this legislation was the complete failure of the old line parties and governments, and the transportation system over which ultimately they had control, to do a proper job of allowing the grain producers to deliver their products and to receive the income to which they were justifiably entitled.

Cash advances were interest-free and varied in amount—I am only guessing, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong—from $4 million to $15 million a year, if I can make a wild guess. However, the cost was justified simply because one particular segment of our society was unable to receive the income it should have received. As my colleague from Battleford-Kindersley (Mr. Thomson) has said, the advances that were made cost the taxpayers nothing in relative terms. I suspect less than one-hundredth of one per cent of cash advances since 1957 ever went bad; they were repaid promptly on time.

If the plans of the minister, both present and future, in connection with quotas and deliveries work, this means there will be less need for cash advances, certainly compared with the late 1950s and early 1960s, a period when we were the victims of the same sort of government as this. Nevertheless, if the minister's proposals work, there will be less demand and need for cash advances. Certainly, if he meets his delivery objective as a result of the proposed quota system, there will be less use made of cash advances.

Therefore, it is only logical that the minister should bring in amending legislation of the sort we now have before the House, and one cannot quarrel with that. One might be able to quarrel after waiting a year to see how his proposals work out, and we might have more fun in one year's time than we are having tonight. Having said that, I am afraid I must now get a little mean and impute motives to the minister and his government.

Mr. Rose: You cannot do that!

Mr. Benjamin: I have to; I have no alternative. There is a very crucial additional reason for bringing in this legislation, especially in view of the kind of government we have and the kind of minister who is in charge of the Wheat Board. The task force on agriculture has stated that direct intervention by the government in agriculture must be resisted, indeed eliminated. This particular change, one of many we are being asked to approve, will save the government money. When you deliver grain and repay your cash advances 100 per cent as you deliver, instead of 50 per cent, the interest charges that the government had been paying before will be substantially reduced. This measure will allow the government to implement what the task force on agriculture has been advocating and what I believe now to be government policy. That results in a further erosion of rural Canada and the loss of tens of thousands of people to those areas.

• (9:10 p.m.)

I am afraid I must be mean and say this is the reason behind it, because the minister could not possibly know, however confident he might be about his proposals on quotas and deliveries, whether this legislation will work or how successful it will be. This amendment to the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act will save several millions of dollars in interest charges which the government would have to pay.

The minister has been advising farmers, as did his predecessors, and my colleague the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) listed some of the results of this advice. I can only say that a number of the farmers in my constituency deliberately choose to do exactly the opposite of what the minister advises. I understood the advice of the minister several months ago to be that farmers should not get excited or carried away and sow too much flax, mustard, rapeseed or Durum. I phoned a grain farmer in my constituency who raises other things besides grain, including a bunch of kids, the morning following the minister's statement and asked him what he thought of the minister's advice. He said he went out that morning and put in another 40 acres of Durum. In effect, he did exactly the opposite of what the minister suggested. I might add that he is not doing too badly in respect of Durum deliveries this year, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lang: Oh, come on!

Mr. Benjamin: He did exactly the opposite. The minister and his government should realize that their credibility is in such a bad state, and has been for many years, that it is now the practice of practical farmers to either do half as much as he suggests, or exactly the opposite. Farmers who follow that course are more often right than they are wrong.

My colleague, the hon. member for Regina East, mentioned the confusion of the editor of the Hi-Way 15 Gazette. If the farmers are confused about the minister's advice, you can imagine the state of confusion in which the editors of weekly newspapers find themselves. The minister contributes a weekly column to newspapers in my riding and in the riding of the hon. member for Regina East. As that hon. member has suggested, he is butting in. That is not the only area where he butts in. He writes to newspapers in my constituency urging that post offices be closed down. I do not mind the minister attempting to be helpful, but this sort of thing is a little ridiculous.

Let me refer to another problem. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) would like to have a desk in the minister's office in his riding. The minister's office is in the riding of that hon. member. Private members cannot expect to get that sort of privilege but they can get an increase in wages.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

Mr. Benjamin: I am sure the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar would appreciate some aid, assistance and comfort of this type. Perhaps he could sit in a corner of the minister's office in his riding.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's remarks are interesting but I have some doubt as to their relevance to the bill before the House.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to let my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar, in on the advances to the office space fund. Actually, this is just a sort of warm-up to what is to come in the next few weeks; it is only preliminary to what will happen in respect of legislation the minister has on the order paper. I suppose one could say we are all practising or rehearsing for what is to come. This is infield practice in advance of the more serious part of the game to come.

We will go along with the amendments proposed by the minister, but God help him if his prediction falls short during this or the next crop year. These amendments will save the government several millions of dollars in interest charges. No doubt this makes the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) very happy and puts the minister in charge of the Wheat Board in his good graces. I cannot say the same for his position so far as the farmers of the Prairie provinces are concerned. We will now sort of rest a while, but we will not rest easy. We will wait to see what happens as a result of the minister's amendments. We will wait to see what happens this fall following his proposals regarding quotas and grain delivery. We look forward with great anticipation to seeing what will happen.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I believe that Bill C-239 is the result of a debate which took place in this House of Commons on October 28, 1968.

An hon. Member: Read my speech.

Mr. Horner: I do not have to read any member's speech made during the fall of 1968 to know what gave rise to the proposals contained in this bill; I can only suggest the relationship between what happened in 1968 and the proposals contained in four agricultural bills, namely, Bill C-239, Bill C-176, the bill pertaining to grain marketing and the grain storage bill.

Let me refer hon. members to a speech made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on June 2, 1968, in which he enunciated Liberal policy on agriculture. His speech was made in the city of Winnipeg.

An hon. Member: He said, "Why should I sell your grain?"

Mr. Horner: Yes, he said that. I well remember that remark. I could quote his remarks on a number of other subjects. However, at this time I shall refer to the remarks he made about cash advances' legislation. I quote from the Winnipeg Free Press of June 4 in reference to his speech of June 2 in which he enunciated the Liberal government's policy. He said:

> This, of course, is a long-term attempt to solve the problem.

I underline those words. He went on to say:

> To tide farmers over the immediate situation, it is proposed that the amount of cash available to farmers as interest-free loans on farm-stored wheat doubled from $3,000 to $6,000 and that the rate of repayment be reduced.

• (9:20 p.m.)

This was enunciated by the Prime Minister on June 2, 1968, in Winnipeg. We have also heard the minister's remarks regarding the necessity of doubling the amount and reducing repayments. We have heard that they have done this in order to tide over the farmers and what a great benefit this program has been to producers during their worst possible delivery years. He said the government doubled the amount available and reduced the repayment of cash advances. What has this led to?

Before continuing I should like to point out to the House that the Prime Minister of Canada made these remarks when the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) was not in charge of the Wheat Board; he was just arunning, just an also-ran in the election of June, 1968. He was not in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. He was not in charge of the advance payments program or in charge of sales of wheat until six or seven months after those statements were made by the Prime Minister. Let me make it abundantly clear to the House and to the country that one man is running Canada, and one man only. That man is the Prime Minister of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I hear some cheers. I point out that that man happens to be on holiday today. I hope he is enjoying his holiday, because the country is not enjoying the holidays he is having. The country has not enjoyed the repeated holidays that man has taken since he laid down the program that his yes-men must follow. I think we as Canadians must be appreciative of the fact that Canadians are not yes-men.

An hon. Member: Yes, man!

Mr. Horner: Someone sitting very close to the former mayor of Toronto—I believe his name is Givens; he does not speak very often in this House—said, "Yes, man". I appreciate there may well be two of them from Toronto who do not like the way this government is carrying on its business.

I wish to bring to the attention of the House that we are thankful the former Minister of Communications has said he has had enough. He has found it necessary to go across the country and say he will no longer be dominated by this dictator who was prepared to lay down what would be available in cash advances to western farmers even though he was a teacher of law in Montreal and knows absolutely nothing about grain production. Still he could pick from his authorities and from his advisers and determine what was best for Canada on June 2, 1968, and lay down exactly what was to happen in Canada.

The cash advances legislation is an example which I will record in this House of Commons. We will examine the master's words and dictates. On June 2, 1968, in Winnipeg the master dictated that cash advances would be doubled and repayments reduced. He said this before the present minister was even elected, let alone designated as minister in charge of the Wheat Board. This minister would like to portray to western Canada that he alone speaks for the Canadian Wheat Board and has taken under advice the Menzies report in respect of wheat marketing. He would have us believe he had that under advice as far back as October, 1968, and that he did in fact double the amount available under cash advances.

Today, before six o'clock, he told us that a real job was done in this regard and that it assisted the farmers through a difficult period. In fact, he said it was the worst marketing period in Canadian grain history. Let me read, however, the advice he received from the opposition on October 28, 1968, after the cash advances legislation of today was introduced in Bill C-113. I repeat "113" because perhaps it was an unlucky number since the legislation did not last very long. I pointed out that in Winnipeg the Prime Minister enunciated this policy and that the person who was picked from Saskatoon indicated that he carried it out even though he was not the minister in charge of the Wheat Board at the time the policy was initiated.

As recorded at page 2133 of Hansard for October 28, 1968, the minister was advised what would happen. At that time I said:

> Now, if I may turn my attention more specifically to Bill No. C-113, I may say that back on October 4, which is quite a while ago, I directed a number of criticisms at this measure. However, I am not going to remain rigid or fixed in the positions I took at the resolution stage. On October 4 the minister and I got into a discussion with regard to the availability of cash advances and the ability of the farmer to repay those cash advances. I keep referring to the measure as cash advances, which is the common expression in western Canada, but actually it is the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.
> The interpretation of the act in the past was that a farmer would receive 50 cents on the dollar per bushel of wheat delivered, the other half dollar going to repay the advance under the legislation. On October 4 the Minister without Portfolio, who in effect is an honorary parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), said that under the proposed bill farmers would be paid a cash advance of $1 per bushel, and that the repayment would still be at the rate of 50 per cent of that amount. The minister will correct me if I interpret his remarks wrongly but I think that he said that the farmers would repay at the same 50 per cent rate per bushel delivered under their quota. I and a number of other members of the opposition fail to comprehend how this system would fully repay the cash advance within the year, particularly if the quota remained at a staid and solid six bushels per acre.

Mr. Speaker, history has proven that I and a number of speakers from the opposition parties were right when we said there was no possible way in which cash advances could be repaid by farmers if they obtained all that was available to them. The ultimate question in that regard which might be asked by you, Mr. Speaker, or by any other member is, why take it if you cannot repay it? I have mentioned the date on which the first remarks in this regard were made by the Prime Minister. In his Winnipeg speech, in respect of cash advances he said interest-free loans on farm-stored wheat would be doubled from $3,000 to $6,000 and that the rate of the repayment would be reduced. This was on June 2, 1968, before the June 25 election. It is obvious to anyone within the sound of my voice that the Prime Minister made those remarks purely in an effort to entice western farmers to vote for the Liberal party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did they?

Mr. Horner: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asks, "Didn't they?"

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I said, "Did they?"

Mr. Horner: I am sorry; he said, "Did they?" I would say that 75 per cent of them did not and that the other 25 per cent regret they did.

An hon. Member: That isn't time.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Somebody on the other side of the House said that is not true. I would like to hear that said a little louder.

Mr. Lang: It is your usual—a half-truth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister himself, the great man who left the farm when he was 18 years old to study law and promised his father that he would never return again, has become the great adviser on Canadian agriculture. He said that my statement is half true. As I look across at him today I can see that he only half-shaved this morning, but only because he only half-looked in the mirror. He only half-faced himself in the mirror, perhaps because what I said was absolutely true. There is not a farmer in western Canada today who does not hope that an election is called immediately so that they can set the record straight and can prove that they never voted for this government. There is not a man on the other side of the House who can deny this.

I notice that the minister is very quiet in that regard, and I point out that the House leader of the Liberal party is in the chamber at present but he says nothing; he does not say that the Saskatchewan farmers want to vote in favour of this government. Not a word is heard on the other side; there is silence. Even the hecklers have died down. I wonder why. I wrack my brains to determine why. But then I come to the conclusion that perhaps it is because there are four by-elections to be held before May 31 and there is one empty seat in the province of Saskatchewan, so that a by-election may never be called there. Why is that? It is because they cannot find a candidate. And if they found a candidate, his sons or his wife would not vote for him if he ran for the Liberal party. He would have nobody voting for him. That is why they are so silent.

Prairie farmers have caught on to Liberal proposals. On June 2 of last year the Prime Minister promised them that cash advances would be doubled and repayments reduced. "Get rid of the small farmer; get rid of every farmer; get them out of our hair," is what they are saying in this government—and western Canada has caught on. Within the last seven days, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield)—

An hon. Member: Which leader?

Mr. Horner: —the Leader of the Opposition received 35,000 coupons objecting to the Liberal government's proposal with regard to agriculture. But that does not stop them. They are going to proceed with it. What does the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) have to say about the matter of cash income, which is related directly to cash advances? We heard the person in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and responsible for cash advances say that wheat farmers have just gone through the worst period in their history. He said that they need to have cash advances doubled and repayments reduced. What did the Minister of Agriculture, who fell asleep during today's question period, have to say on December 3, 1970? He said:

—one wage earner in three draws a pay cheque either directly or indirectly from the agricultural industry.

The agricultural industry is an important industry when we consider all the wage earners. What else did the Minister of Agriculture have to say? He said that cash advances are an indirect form of aid. Then he said that about 51,000 farmers from the three prairie provinces have not repaid their loans. But believe me, Mr. Speaker, they are trying to repay them. I should like to quote the Minister of Agriculture as reported in the Western Producer of December 3, 1970:

Mr. Olson said the federal government spends about 3.3 per cent of the total federal budget on agriculture—the Canada Department of Agriculture spending $281 million and other departments and agencies spending an additional $142 million. The totals do not include the "indirect aid" to agriculture through such programs as farm products purchased as food aid to other countries.

Admitting the difficulties of making exact comparisons, he said Canada spent about $350 per person employed in agriculture in 1968, and this compares with $675 in West Germany, $980 in France, $1,059 in Britain, $1,287 in the United States and $1,502 in Switzerland.

That is what the Minister of Agriculture said regarding what is directly spent on agriculture in Canada, in comparison with what is spent on agriculture in other countries in direct and indirect aid. What does the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board have to say about this whole proposal regarding aid? He said before five o'clock today that we went through a very difficult period in agriculture and that we had to double the cash advances and reduce the repayments, but he said there is still $95 million outstanding in western Canada. There are 51,285 farmers who have taken advantage of this loans program and who have not paid them back, but he said that this is a great reduction from the previous year and that the loans will eventually be paid back.

He also said the following, as reported in the Western Producer of Thursday, February 4:

Mr. Lang said a new quota system, "designed to avoid a bias in favour of the highest price grain, which in the past has been wheat", will be announced within the next month.

That is in essence what he said a few minutes before five o'clock with regard to this program. He said that the whole bill is designed in such a way as not to create a bias in favour of wheat. We are now going to include grains such as rye, flaxseed and rapeseed, the production of which would make farmers eligible for cash advances once this legislation is passed. Under this bill, farmers would be entitled to receive $1 a bushel for wheat and this in essence would encourage the production of wheat. But I point out to hon. members that under the old legislation farmers were entitled to receive 40 cents a bushel for oats and 70 cents a bushel for barley. Under the present bill it is up to the Governor in Council to determine what amounts shall be made available, and for what periods.

How can the cash advances' legislation be used to encourage the production of any kind of grain if the Governor in Council does not have the guts, the determination, the fortitude or foresight to say, "We encourage the production of such-and-such commodity"? The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture have said in this House, "Last year we did encourage the production of barley." I would like the minister in charge of the Wheat Board to stand up and tell us when, before May 4 a year ago, he encouraged the production of barley. I would like the Minister of Agriculture to say when, before May 4 last year, he encouraged the production of barley. I say May 4 because now in western Canada the farmers are preparing to seed. At no time before May 4 last year did either minister encourage the production of barley.

I see the minister rearing his head; I would say "his ugly head" but I have no personal objection to it and therefore I would not want to say "his ugly head." But at no time did the Minister of Agriculture or the minister in charge of the Wheat Board rise in this House before May 4 a year ago and say they wanted to encourage the production of barley. But they say that this legislation has in fact encouraged the production of wheat. That cannot be substantiated, but what can be substantiated—I want to emphasize this before I close—is that they deliberately doubled the cash advances available under western grains, wheat, oats and barley last year and they did it because the Prime Minister said they would before the June 25 election. They did it and they were advised on October 28, as recorded at page 2123 of Hansard, that this would result in the farmers incurring debts that they would not be able to pay.

The minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board at that time was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He will remember the argument that I had with him. I told him, "You are going to bring farmers deeper and deeper into debt. This will severely hurt the small farmer." I said that in October, 1968. I said it later in 1968 and also in the early part of 1969. I said that the legislation would result in small farmers incurring debts that they would not be able to pay.

If one studies Bill C-239 one can clearly understand why they are increasing the interest rate on the amount eligible for repayment. It is because they have sunk the small farmer into debt. They have driven him from the farm. And then only within the last few days the Prime Minister stood up in Vancouver—the same man who made the speech in Winnipeg two years ago—and said we have to gear ourselves to a policy of net social benefit. Is it net social benefit to drive small farmers into the cities to live on welfare? I would think not.

The small farmer enjoys more psychological security living on his small farm than he ever will living on welfare in the air-polluted, water-polluted cities. On the farm he enjoys a better quality of life. He certainly enjoyed a better qualify of life on the farm in 1968 before he was enticed and led to his own destruction by the Prime Minister, aided by the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board.

What does this bill suggest? I would like all members to look at clause 12. What does clause 12 suggest? Higher interest rates—that's what it suggests. Who will pay them? It is not the farmer who can afford to pay, but the farmer who is already behind on repayment of his cash advances. That is when we soak him. We catch him when he is down and put him out of business. We force him to go into the cities, make him take a job or go on welfare. In any event, he must leave his farm. That is the purpose, the object of most of the farm legislation that has been introduced by the government and this cash advances legislation is a perfect example. If one studies the chronological order in which the government has proceeded with its farm legislation, you can see this is the way it is aimed, right through from October, 1968, up to Bill C-239.

Does a farmer get any indication from this bill as to how much he will be able to get as a cash advance on wheat? The farmer is now going into the seeding period. This bill covers rye, flax and rapeseed. Mr. Speaker, I notice this ugly head is rearing itself once again and paying attention. Does the farmer receive any indication of what he will receive as cash advance on the grain he is preparing to plant this month? I see the minister mouthing the word "Yes." I have to say the word "Yes" because I know from my experience in this House that mouthed words do not appear in Hansard; therefore, I have to interpret the words that the minister mouths. He mouthed the word "Yes," meaning that before spring planting farmers will know how much advance will be available under the six crops covered by this bill. Am I correct in that statement? I would like to see him nod his head on that statement.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Lang: Half right.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, if I were an American politician I would say I was in the ball-park, but I am not and I want to be right. Before this legislation passes I want the minister to stand up and say what is 100 per cent right. Will the farmers know how much in cash advances will be available to them with regard to the various crops, before spring seeding? Will there be half the value with regard to flaxseed, which runs in the neighbourhood of a little less than $3 a bushel? Will that be available to them as a cash advance, now that flaxseed is coming under the bill? With regard to rapeseed—a very speculative crop, I might add—has the minister the foresight to predict that half the value of rapeseed under today's prices will be available through cash advances to farmers, before they plant rapeseed this spring?

How much will be available? If $1 a bushel isn't available under wheat, how much will be? If 45 cents is not available under oats, how much will be? If 70 cents isn't available under barley, how much will be and how much will be the repayments of the farmers? Will they be increased, or reduced as the Prime Minister stated on June 2, 1968? These are questions that the farmers are asking themselves. But we are being asked to pass this legislation without any answers, and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board suggests I am half right. This is not good enough when you consider the problems the farmer has had in the past year.

The farmer has taken the advice the Prime Minister gave on June 2, 1968. He has taken the cash advances. He has taken more than half the price of the grain sold, in cash advances. He has accepted a reduced repayment. He stands in debt. As of April 24, 1970, the Canadian farmer had received $228 million under cash advances. Since that date he has been attempting to repay it. How successful has he been?

Mr. Woolliams: How could he be successful, under this government?

Mr. Horner: How could he be successful, under this government? That is the crux of the problem, because this government has prohibited the farmer from delivering his grain. The minister must admit the facts. Let us take wheat, for example. Wheat is a major crop. The normal amount of wheat in commercial storage at this period of the year ranges up to 440 million bushels. What is the present situation, Mr. Speaker? It is down, in the neighbourhood of 340 million bushels; and that is 100 million bushels of empty storage.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Can the minister suggest that the cash advances would be as large and outstanding if they allowed the farmers to fill the commercial storage? Does he want me and other members of this House, no matter what they have to do with the agricultural industry, to believe that the agricultural industry could not repay their advances if he accepted the grain to fill the storage available? He cannot answer that question, Mr. Speaker, because he knows in his heart that the $51 million advanced could be repaid, down to at least $15 million or $16 million, if he were prepared to fill the storage available in western Canada—available, that is, in the commercial storage space on the Prairies, on the coast and at the Lakehead. But he has deliberately kept that storage empty.

Why, Mr. Speaker? Many farmers are asking this question. One could answer that the government want to collect the higher interest rate proposed in this bill. I do not really believe that is the case, though it might be a political answer.

I think they want approval to remove the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. They want to be able to say, on July 31, "The Temporary Wheat Reserves Act is nothing. It did not really do much good and it has been reduced from a $40 million normal payment to something like $20 million. The opposition is completely wrong in advocating that the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act not be done away with."

What have we to say with regard to grain in storage? Do we need it in storage or not? It is interesting to note that on March 15, 1971, I put the following question to the minister:

I have a supplementary question with regard to grain sales for the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. Can the minister inform the House whether the additional 10 cents per bushel for barley is bringing in the required amount of barley or are we still turning down sales requests?

Disregard the last part of the question and consider the first, where I asked if this program was bringing in the necessary amount of barley so that quotas would be available to the producers. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration who is in charge of the Wheat Board, at page 4252 of Hansard had this to say:

The flow of barley is stepping up. We hope it will continue to increase. There is space available in some provinces where there are also significant barley quotas available. We are therefore urging the farmers to deliver the grain because—

I emphasize the word "because" Mr. Speaker.

—because the Wheat Board would like to see the flow of barley established before it makes additional sales.

In other words, the Wheat Board was not prepared to make additional sales until it had the grain in storage. I see the minister shakes his head in a negative manner. I would be pleased to see him stand in this House and correct my interpretation of his words. But now can one misinterpret those words on page 4252 of Hansard when he said—

Mr. Lang: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Horner: Fine.

Mr. Lang: I wonder whether the hon. member can notice the distinction between the words "until the flow of grain is established" and the words "until the grain is in storage"?

Mr. Horner: Well, Mr. Speaker, I never was much for being—

Mr. Lang: For being accurate.

Mr. Horner: —picayune about words, but let me explain to the minister the meaning of the words, "We are therefore urging the farmers to deliver the grain". Let me just go that far. These are his words, not mine. Now he wants delivery. We have come that far. Every farmer in this House could deliver his grain. Let's go a little further, "—because the Wheat Board would like to see the flow of barley established before it makes additional sales." I emphasize the word "before"—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do so to advise him that the time allotted to him has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Horner: In light of the clock, I wonder if I could request—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent. It is impossible for the Chair to determine whether there is unanimous consent unless I am given an opportunity to hear. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Horner: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I realize the position the clock is in and I will take only a few more moments. Let there be no misunderstanding of the minister's statement on March 15, 1971, found at page 4252 of Hansard when he said, "We are therefore urging the farmers to deliver the grain because the Wheat Board would like to see—". I emphasize the word "see," meaning availability. How else can you determine the meaning of the word "see"? He continued, "—the flow of barley—", and I emphasize the word "before", "before it makes additional sales". Additional, meaning plus; something that you do not have now but you will have if you see the flow.

I say to the minister that we cannot afford to have empty storage space, because if that storage space is full we will then see the flow, know the flow and go out and make sales. Because of the empty storage space, the minister has cost the farmers of western Canada money because the sales representatives of the farmers, the Canadian Wheat Board and others, could not see the flow, did not know the flow, did not know the availability of additional grain and therefore they turned aside sales of barley. This is true of grain of all kinds, including wheat, oats, barley, rapeseed, flaxseed and rye.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

POST OFFICE—ALLEGED DIFFICULTIES RESULTING FROM NEW MAIL ROUTINGS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I asked the minister who is apparently in charge of the Post Office the following question:

Since new mail routings introduced by the Post Office have in many cases resulted in much slower mail service and reduced standards, is the minister planning a further overhaul to correct the mess that exists in many places?

The minister replied:

I did not quite understand the first part of the question.

This is not an unusual occurrence with respect to the minister in charge of the Post Office, so I asked this further question:

Is the minister not aware that there are many cases in Canada, such as some in Saskatchewan which have come to my attention, where mail that formerly travelled 109 miles in two days to reach its destination from a major centre now has to travel almost 350 miles and takes six days?

Mr. Speaker, the occasion for this question was a letter I received from a resident of Raymore, Saskatchewan. Some of the people who get their mail in Raymore live in Regina East. The letter reads:

• (10:00 p.m.)

We are on rural route mail delivery twice a week, Tuesdays and Fridays.

We used to get the Western Producer on Fridays. Since they changed the mail route from Saskatoon we don't get our mail till Tuesday.

Why are all the detours? Saskatoon is around 100 miles from Raymore. The way the mail travels, it is around 400 miles.

Can't we get a better mail service?

Then the letter reads:

This is what we call a poor service, getting week-old news.

The sender of that letter included in the envelope a letter he had received from the circulation department of the Western Producer dated March 30, 1971. It reads in part:

With reference to your recent letter, please be advised that the Western Producer for your area goes out each Wednesday but on occasion it may go out on Thursday morning. In checking in the mailing room we find that since the mail now has to go to Regina, then to Melville then to Raymore, this would explain the reason for the delay.

Let us look at the picture. Raymore is approximately 109 miles southeast of Saskatoon. From Saskatoon to Regina the mail travels 161 miles, but at Regina it is only 74 miles from Raymore. It travels from Regina to Melville, another 93 miles, so that it is then 90 miles from its final destination, Raymore. Finally, it makes its last journey of 90 miles and arrives in Raymore after having travelled 340 miles.

I could cite many other examples. One came to my attention within the last couple of weeks. A lady in Ottawa had sent a letter to her mother in Weyburn, Saskatchewan. It was mailed early on Wednesday afternoon, April 7, and arrived in Regina on April 8, as is evident from the postmark. The mother received the special delivery letter in her mail-box on Easter Monday, April 12, five days later. I remember that 25 years ago we had a one-day service from eastern Canada to Saskatchewan for regular, first-class mail.

The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), who represents the constituency of Saskatoon-Humboldt, ought to be familiar with this further example. The village of Lake Lenore is located approximately 20 miles northeast of Humboldt, which in turn is 70 miles straight east of Saskatoon. Instead of there being a direct service between Lake Lenore and Humboldt, mail from Lake Lenore now travels to Saskatoon, almost 100 miles, and then 70 miles back to Humboldt. Certainly this is no improvement and it is not an efficient operation.

These new routings may speed up some mail services but they seriously hurt rural mail service and service to small centres. The post office is a vital institution in rural communities and it is important today in terms of service in respect of modern agricultural requirements. There are concerns about the future of rural Canada. The process of disintegration of communities and of rural life is evidenced in many parts of Canada.

Hundreds of post offices have been closed in the past couple of years. The hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) earlier tonight recalled that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the member for Saskatoon-Humboldt, interfered with respect to a post office on the border of Regina East and Regina-Lake Centre. This was the post office at Serath. The minister passed on the message, acting as a messenger boy, that some people who would like to see the Esk post office kept open but wanted the Serath post office closed. I suggested, without contradiction, that those people were the Last Mountain Liberal executive, the local Liberal executive in that area of Saskatchewan.

I think this matter is too serious to be passed over lightly. I know that probably the reply will point out that there have been improvements in mail service as a result of new groupings. With that I probably cannot argue. However, I suggest that there have been other detrimental effects as a result of new programs introduced by the Post Office, such as these routings, closure of post offices, reductions in service, and so on. These are hurting rural life in Canada and in the process are hurting Canada as a nation.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond on behalf of the Minister without Portfolio, in charge of the Post Office (Mr. Côté) who is unable to be present this evening. The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) has drawn our attention to certain delays in mail deliveries in Saskatchewan. He described the circuitous route followed by some mail. The principal source of the problem in southeastern Saskatchewan, for example, arises from existing trucking schedules in relation to the changed receipt time for incoming mail, which has been caused in turn by changes in railway services.

I assure the hon. member that in this particular situation, as in other, similar situations, a solution is under consideration. This solution will involve an extensive change in truck routing and schedules, one which we trust will not unfavourably affect other locations in the general area. These changes will be implemented as soon as a balanced trucking network is established in conjunction with the assured mail program due to start early in August.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—QUEBEC—APPLICATION FOR INTEREST-FREE LOANS FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on April 21, as reported at page 5120 of Hansard I asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) whether the government of Quebec had applied for assistance from the federal government not only to finance the public sector of the Quebec economy, but also the government of the province of Quebec and municipalities which, it is well known, are facing tremendous financial problems.

Furthermore, I asked the Prime Minister whether the federal government was considering setting up some sort of Canadian development agency corresponding to the CIDA, through which the federal government grants interest-free loans to foreign countries. Therefore, I requested the creation of a Canadian development agency that would distribute new credits issued by the Bank of Canada in order to finance the public sector of the economy and develop the municipalities in Quebec. Provincial and municipal authorities could then set up priorities which would enable them to insure a certain economic development.

As it is reported in Hansard, the Prime Minister answered by a joke as he thought the question was quite funny. Once again, he found a way to evade the question. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I asked that this matter be discussed later.

For instance, the Prime Minister said, and I quote:

—the federal government pays to developing provinces huge amounts which will nearly reach one billion this year.

Then he said:

These are not interest-free loans—

These are his own words. He is confessing—

—but grants taken from the other provinces' taxes.

First, this is hardly the case because Quebec contributes as much as any other province to the equalization system and, second, with his elusive tactics, the right hon. Prime Minister did not answer the question. He even added, Mr. Speaker, that the taxpayers' money should contribute to economic progress.

Mr. Speaker, it is not the Canadian taxpayers' money which contributes to the development of foreign nations, but lines of credit with the International Monetary Funds which are issued to Canada and redistributed by the Canadian International Development Agency. Why? To stimulate the public sector of developing countries. We agree that Canada assists those countries. Since the government considers that policy useful to other countries, as he suggests it is, and we agree on that, I wanted to know whether he would accept under that same policy to assist provincial and municipal governments, particularly in Quebec?

I asked that question because Mr. Bourassa, the premier of Quebec, was then on a pilgrimage in Europe on hands and knees before financiers while a little earlier he had been crawling at the feet of United States tycoons. Why? To sell Quebec to American and foreign interests.

At the same time, we give our money to foreign countries for their development. Taking into account that inconsistency, I was expecting an intelligent answer from the Prime Minister, but it did not come.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, only recently a meeting of municipal representatives asked the federal government to help them develop their long-neglected areas. The mayor of Victoriaville, a municipality in my constituency, was recently refused through referendum large amounts that were to be used to establish recreation centres and organize the public centre in that city, because people said: We are already paying too many taxes. On that account, they were right. But can anybody blame the municipal council which does not receive any help from the provincial government nor from the federal government, which is pure nonsense.

Thus municipal and provincial authorities are placed in such circumstances that they must either refuse to act or sell our province or our natural resources, because we sell them—we give them I should say—to foreigners in order to develop this country.

Mr. Speaker, my question was simply as follows: What does the Canadian government intend to do? Does it want Canadian provinces, especially Quebec, to benefit from its policy on developing countries? If so, is it its intention to enter into discussions with provincial authorities? Mr. Speaker, the government could show at least enough logic and intellectual honesty to accept such a proposal and to discuss the question.

I therefore repeat my question to the hon. parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Economic Regional Expansion (Mr. O'Connell), who is, I know, a very public-spirited and conscientious man! May we expect the federal government to present as soon as possible an investment policy that would be based not on taxes, but on new lines of credit issued by the Bank of Canada, to provide for the sound and normal economic development of the provinces and municipalities and get them out of stagnation?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will recognize that some aspects of his question are arguable.

A distinction should be made between the government's programs for the economic expansion of developing countries and those aiming at reducing disparities between the various regions of Canada. Those areas are not completely unconnected but they are not identical and the government's programs in favour of developing countries should not be compared with those concerning the economic development of Canada.

The federal government is not considering setting up a new organization to accelerate our economic expansion since, as already stated by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), replying to the hon. member on April 21, all the required bodies are already existing.

For example, the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will allocate this year more than $330 million to our economic development. Since most of this amount will be paid in the form of subsidies, it is in my opinion better than a loan. In addition, the transfer payments to the provinces will amount to over $1 billion. Moreover, this year, the federal government has granted $150 million to the province under a special development loan program, so as to accelerate the implementation of job-creating projects.

I could keep on with this enumeration but I think that I have demonstrated that the government has granted priority to the economic development and to the amounts required by this thorny problem and that it is neither necessary nor desirable to add new organizations to those already existing.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.17 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MACDONALD (EGMONT)—ANSWER TO QUESTION CONCERNING SECURITY AND INTELLIGENCE DIVISION OF ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Egmont rose on a question of privilege in relation to an answer given by the Solicitor General to question No. 1,199, which was reported in Hansard of May 3 at page 5423. The question asked by the hon. member for Egmont related to the security and intelligence operations of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The minister replied as follows:

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the main federal operational and investigative body in the field of security. Such authority—there is no explicit statutory authority—as does exist is derived from certain sections of the R.C.M. Police Act. It would not be in the public interest to divulge any further information in this connection.

The hon. member for Egmont claimed that the refusal of the minister to supply the specific information which he sought was a breach of his parliamentary privileges. In support of that contention the hon. member quoted citation 113 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition as follows:

Libels upon members and aspersions upon them in relation to Parliament and interference of any kind with their official duties, are breaches of the privileges of the members.

I cannot agree with the hon. member's interpretation of that citation. It is correct, of course, to state as a general principle that a member should not be impeded in the discharge of his parliamentary duties. I suggest that this in itself does not create an obligation on the part of the government to supply any and all information sought by a member, either by way of an oral question or a written question. Indeed, there are many precedents to indicate that from time to time ministers have refused to answer questions on the ground that it would not be in the public interest to do so.

Citation 181, section 3, of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition states that a refusal to answer cannot be raised as a question of privilege. A similar opinion is expressed by Bourinot in this fourth edition of his Parliamentary Procedure at page 314, which I would like to quote:

An answer to a question cannot be insisted upon, if the answer be refused by a minister on the ground of the public interest, nor can the question be replaced upon the notice paper, nor the refusal of the minister to answer be raised as a question of privilege.

The same principle is expressed by Sir Erskine May in the seventeenth edition of his Parliamentary Practice at page 351. Again I quote:

An answer to a question cannot be insisted upon, if the answer be refused by a minister, and the Speaker has refused to allow supplementary questions in these circumstances. A question to which an answer has been refused, like any other question which has been fully answered, cannot be replaced upon the notice paper. The refusal of a minister to answer a question on the ground of public interest cannot be raised as a matter of privilege.

It may well be that the hon. member has a grievance. He may want to seek information by some other means, perhaps by way of a motion for the production of papers or in the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs which has before it the estimates of the RCMP. In any event, the Chair has to rule that the hon. member has not made a prima facie case of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CAOUETTE—CHANGE IN OFFICIAL NAME OF PARTY

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege to draw the attention of the House to the fact that on April 3 and 4 last, Créditistes from all provinces of Canada assembled in a National Council in Ottawa.

It was decided on that occasion to change the name of our party from "Le Ralliement créditiste" to "Le Parti Crédit Social du Canada" in French and "The Social Credit Party of Canada" in English, or for short "Crédit Social" and "Social Credit".

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this change will lead the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to give more consideration to Social Credit.

Questions

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[English]

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

POLLUTION—SOLID WASTE DISPOSAL

Question No. 765—Mr. Alexander:

1. Which department, if any, bears primary responsibility for the development of research or demonstration projects to deal with solid-waste disposal?

2. On what dates and by whom were recommendations made to the Department of National Health and Welfare advocating research studies into the problem of solid-waste disposal as indicated by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance on December 14, 1970, in Hansard at pages 2026-2027?

3. Are studies concerning any of the 28 items falling under the headings of Management and Regulation of Disposal Practices, Disposal Methods, and Environmental Effects referred to by the Parliamentary Secretary currently in progress and, if so, (a) by whom are they being undertaken (b) when are they expected to be completed (c) will these studies be available to the public upon completion?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. It is anticipated that the new Department of the Environment will bear primary responsibility for the development of research or demonstration projects to deal with solid-waste disposal.

2. In October 1968, the Advisory Committee on Public Health Engineering instructed the Public Health Engineering Division to assemble reference material on the subject of solid-waste disposal for use by its subcommittee on Solid Wastes. After a thorough search of the current scientific literature, a Divisional manuscript report, "Research Needs for Solid Waste Management in Canada" was issued in December 1968. This contained all the recommendations cited by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance on December 14, 1970 in Hansard at pages 2026-2027.

3. The following research projects are sponsored by the Policy and Planning Branch, formerly of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, but now transferred to the Department of Fisheries and Forestry: (i) Ground Water Technical Services, Montreal, P.Q. Pollution of Ground Water due to Municipal Dumps. This has been completed and is being prepared for publication. (ii) Dr. K. L. Pinder and Dr. R. M. R. Branion, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, B.C. "Fermentation of Industrial Wastes." (iii) Dr. E. R. Hayes, St. Mary's University, Halifax, N.S. "Treatment of Kraft Pulp Mill Effluents". (iv) Dr. R. A. Gallop, University of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Manitoba. Conversion of waste by-products in food processing to activated carbon, which can be used in wastewater treatment. (v) Dr. C. M. Cornwall, Waterloo University, Waterloo, Ontario. Dewatering of Sewage Sludges. In addition, a Public Health Research Grant has been approved by the Department of National Health and Welfare to: Prof. W. K. Oldham, University of British Columbia, Vancouver, B.C. "Anaerobic Treatment of Animal Wastes". All the above are ongoing projects, unless otherwise indicated, currently supported by grants for the fiscal year 1970-71. On successful completion of the studies, the results would normally be published in scientific journals by the investigators.

[Mr. Caouette.]

NEWFOUNDLAND—ACCIDENTS INVOLVING CANADIAN NATIONAL BUSES

Question No. 836—Mr. Peddle:

How many accidents have there been involving CN buses in Newfoundland since the inception of the bus service (a) on what dates (b) at what locations (c) were there personal injuries and, if so how many persons were injured (d) was there property damage involved (e) what was the dollar amount of such damages?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: Since the inception of bus operations in 1968, 22 buses have covered a total of four million miles, carrying in excess of 300,000 passengers. During this period there have been accidents and incidents of varying degrees but none of a major nature involving the operations. There have been a total of 19 persons slightly injured and approximately $15,000 in personal injury and property damage claims filed against the Company. As settlement of some of these claims is still outstanding it is not considered appropriate to reply to the question in the detail requested. It may be said, however, that since 1968, 20 accidents have been caused by other parties and 24 other incidents resulted from poor weather or road conditions.

CANADIAN YOUTH HOSTEL ASSOCIATION

Question No. 863—Mr. Comeau:

1. Does the government provide grants to the Canadian Youth Hostel Association and, if so, in what amount?

2. Does the government intend to increase such grants and make use of this Association to apply its program for transient youths?

3. Did the government make use of this Association in operating its armouries last summer for transient youths?

4. Has the government consulted with the Canadian Youth Federation on its program?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. No.

2. Discussions are currently in progress between officials of the Department of the Secretary of State and the Canadian Youth Hostel Association, regarding that organization's possible role in the Summer '71 Program.

3. No. Hostel facilities last summer were co-ordinated by the National Hostel Task Force, established by the Canadian Council on Social Development (Canadian Welfare Council).

4. Such an organization cannot be identified. If such an organization exists, the Department of the Secretary of State has had no contact with it.

PUBLIC WORKS—OTTAWA LEASES

Question No. 886—Mr. Sulatycky:

1. How much floor space does the government lease in Ottawa above the tenth floor in buildings in the area bounded by Wellington, Elgin, Somerset and Bronson streets?

2. (a) Who are the owners of each of the buildings in which such space is leased (b) what amount of space is leased above the tenth floor in each such building (c) what is the total amount of space leased in each of such buildings?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works):

1. 1,568,939 square feet.

ADULT VOCATIONAL TRAINING PROGRAMS—PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Question No. 987—Mr. Caouette:

During each year 1967-68, 1968-69 and 1969-70, what amounts were paid to each of the ten provinces and to the Northwest Territories for adult vocational training programs?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In so far as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is concerned the answer is:

Province	1967-68	1968-69	1969-70
British Columbia & Yukon	$595,407	$ 818,250	$1,270,077
Alberta	342,200	208,389	747,680

The figures quoted are not payments to Provinces but rather are expenditures within the Province.

*These figures represent moneys spent in all of the Maritime Provinces since they come under the jurisdiction of one regional office.

In so far as the Department of Manpower and Immigration is concerned, the following amounts were paid to the provinces for the provision of occupational training:

CANADA CENTRE FOR INLAND WATERS

Question No. 1,213—Mr. Sullivan:

1. What is the estimated cost of the plans for the Canadian Centre for Inland Waters?

2. How many persons are employed at the Centre and what is the breakdown of their classification of employment?

3. What is the proposed date of completion of the Centre?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): 1. The estimated total construction cost is $23,550,000.

2. Research Managers, 6; Research Scientists, 22; Physical Scientists, 4; Chemists, 4; Engineers, 11; Scientific Officers, 9; Ships Officers, 6; Computer System Analysts, 4; Administrative, Clerical and Stenographic Support, 39; Engineering and Scientific Support, 123; Librarian, 1; Drafting and Illustration, 3; General Labour, 12. Total 244.

3. October 1, 1972.

[Mr. Jerome.]

TURBO TRAINS

Question No. 1,215—Mr. Sullivan:

1. How many Turbo trains for the Toronto-Montreal run were built (a) by whom (b) what was the total purchase price (c) how many are now in operation (d) where are the remainder?

2. How much has been spent to March 21, 1971 on repairs and modification of design?

3. Is the said cost of repairs and modifications increasing the practicality of a profitable operation?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. (a) Five Turbo trainsets were constructed by United Aircraft of Canada Limited and are owned by that company. (b) Canadian National did not purchase Turbo trains. (c) and (d) None, as a result of an accumulation of operating problems the reliability of service declined to a point where schedules had to be changed and ultimately to the withdrawal of all units from service. The trains are located at the Montreal maintenance facility in Central Station.

2. and 3. The maintenance and modification of the trains were carried out during revenue service pursuant to an agreement between United Aircraft of Canada Limited and Canadian National and as elements with respect to the future of the trains are now in the course of discussion, it is not considered in the best interests of Canadian National to disclose this information at this time.

CBC—ALLOCATION OF TIME FOR PROVINCIAL CONVENTIONS

Question No. 1,219—Mr. Caouette:

1. How much time did CBC allocate to the provincial conventions of (a) the Parti Québécois in February 1971 (b) the Ralliement créditiste—Quebec in March 1971, on both national networks (radio and television)?

2. In each case (a) what was the dollar value of the time offered free of charge as compared to the rates for such airtime (b) how many technicians did CBC use to produce these programs (c) what was the cost (i) of salaries (ii) of equipment (iii) for transfer expenses, for these programs?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The Parti Québécois convention was a leadership contest and as such it was given more coverage than the Ralliement créditiste meetings. Actual convention coverage, excluding various interviews and other items in the framework of regular news and public affairs programs was as follows: Parti Québécois: French Radio network: 3 hours 50 minutes; French TV network: 1 hour 15 minutes; English Radio and TV networks: No live broadcasting from the convention.

Ralliement créditiste: French Radio network: 40 minutes; French TV network: Nil; English Radio and TV networks: No live broadcasting from the convention.

2. (a) The CBC does not sell time for broadcasting coverage of political conventions and does not place a monetary value on such coverage. It would therefore be unrealistic to attempt comparisons on the basis of commercial rates for such air time and difficult to arrive at meaningful figures. (b) 27 television and 3 radio technicians for the Parti Québécois leadership convention; one radio technician for the Ralliement créditiste meetings. (c) It has not been customary to require the CBC to disclose such details of its internal management and administration.

FEDERAL RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,221—Mr. Barnett:

How much more, or how much less, did the federal government spend than it collected in each of the provinces in the fiscal year 1969-70 based on the same criteria used in the reply to Question Number 741 made Order for Return July 22, 1964?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): An answer was possible to Question No. 741 made Order for Return July 22, 1964, because not long before, a special working-group had concluded several man-years of work accumulating and analysing the information for other purposes. A similar analysis has not been made for the period referred to in this question, and the information requested is not available.

TEMPERATURE CONTROL ACTIVITIES BY PHYSICAL OR CHEMICAL MEANS

Question No. 1,235—Mr. Laprise:

Have any corporations, agencies or persons undertaken research, studies or any activity for which the federal government granted a permit or licence, to affect the temperature by physical or chemical means since 1958 and, if so (a) what corporations, agencies or persons (b) has the federal government alone or in co-operation with any provincial government taken part (c) to the knowledge of the government, has any firm engaged in such activities?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): No.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

Question No. 1,239—Mr. Harding:

1. What was the total federal expenditure on the Alaska Highway for the fiscal years 1967-68, 1968-69, 1969-70, 1970-71 and, what is the estimated expenditure for 1971-72?

2. What is the total length of the Alaska Highway (a) how many miles are paved (b) where is the paving located (c) is any paving program planned for 1971-72 and, if so, what is the program?

3. Have surveys been made for relocation of any sections of the present route and, if so, what mileage is involved?

4. Have discussions regarding cost-sharing of paving the Alaska Highway been held with other jurisdictions and, if so, with whom have discussions been held and with what results?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1.

Fiscal Year	Expenditure
1967-68	$7,147,000
1968-69	8,131,000
1969-70	8,277,000
1970-71	8,870,000 (estimate)
1971-72	9,027,000 (estimate)

Questions

2. The total length of the Alaska Highway from Dawson Creek to the Yukon-Alaska boundary is 1,221 miles. (a) 102 miles. (b) Mile 0 (Dawson Creek) to Mile 84, Mile 300 to Mile 301 (Fort Nelson) and Mile 904 to Mile 921 (vicinity of Whitehorse). (c) Mile 921 to Mile 928 is presently under paving contract and will be completed this year.

3. Reconnaissance surveys for relocation have been carried out for Miles 206 to 278 and Miles 315 to 496. Detailed surveys have been completed only on Miles 206 to Mile 232. No reconstruction program planned for 1971-72.

4. No discussions have been held with other jurisdictions for cost-sharing of paving of the Alaska Highway. The recent U.S. Federal Highway Act authorized the President of the U.S.A., acting through the Secretaries of State and Transportation to undertake negotiations with the Government of Canada. It is expected that an initial meeting will be held in May or June this year.

*POST OFFICE—THORNCLIFFE PARK, EAST YORK, ONTARIO

Question No. 1,243—Mr. Kaplan:

1. Does the government have any plans to locate a post office facility in Thorncliffe Park, East York, Ontario and, if so, what are they?

2. How many locations has the government considered in the area?

3. What steps have been taken with respect to any such locations?

4. Has the government established any deadline for obtaining such facility?

5. Has any budgetary allocation been made or sought with respect to such facility?

6. When may the people of Thorncliffe Park expect an announcement?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): There are six questions asked in this one question. The replies are brief. 1. Yes, accommodation for a front office operation to replace the previous suboffice now closed.

2. Only one available location is considered suitable.

3. Negotiations for a lease are under way.

4. No.

5. No.

6. When results of negotiations referred to in part 3 are known.

PAYMENTS UNDER PFAA

Question No. 1,253—Mr. Thomson:

VANCOUVER INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Question No. 1,255—Mr. Goode:

What was the number of aircraft movements at Vancouver International Airport for each year 1968, 1969 and 1970?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The number of aircraft movements at Vancouver International Airport for the following years were: 1968, 152,642; 1969, 169,602; 1970, 149,521.

COMPLAINTS UNDER THE FEMALE EMPLOYEES EQUAL PAY ACT

Question No. 1,265—Mr. Fairweather:

1. How many complaints have been made by virtue of the Female Employees Equal Pay Act since Parliament passed the Act in 1956?

2. What is the average period of time taken to settle claims under the Act?

[Mr. Thomson.]

3. What is the longest period of time taken to settle a claim under the Act?

4. Are plans being considered which would facilitate processing and disposition of claims?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): 1. Eighteen.

2. Average period of time elapsing from receipt of complaints to date final action is taken: approximately 23 weeks.

3. Fifty-one weeks.

4. Bill C-228 now before Parliament proposes to repeal the Female Employees Equal Pay Act, and include equal pay legislation as an amendment to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. These legislative changes, and related administrative changes, will facilitate the handling of complaints.

HALIFAX HARBOUR—FIRE BOATS

Question No. 1,285—Mr. McCleave:

1. Is a fire boat being built for use in Halifax Harbour and, if so, what design will be used?

2. Who is the owner of the design, and what was paid for its use by the government?

3. What is the age of other vessels built on this design?

4. Were Canadians approached to determine whether designs were available in this country and, if so, who are they?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): 1. No.

2, 3 and 4. Not applicable.

COST OF BUTTER STORAGE

Question No. 1,294—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

What was the total paid by the Canadian Dairy Commission for the storage of butter during the fiscal years 1968-1969 and 1969-1970 to (a) Coopérative Agricole de Granby, (b) Vermette et Fils, Saint-Agapit, Québec?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): The total paid for storage of butter was $972,493.93 in 1968-69 and $1,659,645.68 in 1969-70. Details of payments to individuals or firms are confidential.

LIFT PROGRAM

NATIONAL DISASTERS

ST. JEAN-VIANNEY—EXPRESSION OF SYMPATHY TO STRICKEN FAMILIES—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before voicing my first question, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he would make a statement concerning the disaster which occurred last night at St. Jean-Vianney, near Chicoutimi?

On behalf of the official opposition I wish to extend our most sincere sympathy as well as our pledge of solidarity to the stricken families.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I certainly can answer this question.

As soon as the federal government heard the news, I sent a telegram to the mayor of St. Jean-Vianney, in which I stated the utter dismay of this government and of the Canadian population generally. I discussed the matter at length this morning with the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Marceau) and with the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Macdonald) and it seems that units of the Canadian Armed Forces are already there busy with rescue operations. There are helicopters and medical support staff on the scene. They are acting on a voluntary basis for the moment, since specific requests have not yet reached the federal government.

I should say also that the affected homes are insured for the most part under the National Housing Act. The minister responsible for Housing and Urban Affairs is aware of the situation and has sent representatives there.

For the moment, the government has indicated its complete desire to help the victims. Units of the Canadian Forces are on the spot, as I said earlier, and we are expecting further reports from our staff. And if, of course, requests come in from the municipal or provincial government, the federal government is ready to help as much as possible.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like—

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for York South have a supplementary question?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my colleagues and in my own name I would like to express our sympathy to the families of the victims of this disaster.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, may I also proffer my sincere condolences to the afflicted families of St. Jean-Vianney. I know that locality very well having visited it on several occasions. I also express my condolences to the representative for the riding which includes St. Jean-Vianney. I am sure the whole population of Canada was dismayed this morning on learning the bad news.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues, on behalf of the people of St. Jean-Vianney, who will certainly appreciate very much the fact that the members of the House of Commons sympathize with them in the terrible disaster they have just suffered.

I should like to extend officially my heartfelt condolences to the stricken families and to inform this House of the magnitude of the disaster. There were 34 houses completely buried, 25 casualties and more than $2 million worth of damages.

Therefore, I urge the government to take speedy action, in these circumstances, and I intend to ask as soon as possible for financial assistance from the government.

FINANCE

CO-ORDINATION OF ECONOMIC IMPACT OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether, in view of the emphasis given to the matter by the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada and others, he proposes to adopt any new measures to assure a greater co-ordination of the economic impact of the various departments of the government in which he is Minister of Finance?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the economic impact of the various departments that are in the economic field, the government believes that there is ample co-ordination at the present time in that there is constant consultation between the ministers involved and they are on a committee which deals with economic matters.

Mr. Stanfield: In view not only of the emphasis placed on this question yesterday by the chairman of the Economic Council but also the emphasis placed on it by the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council, will the minister not treat it as an urgent matter to re-examine the co-ordination, or is he in fact satisfied to have the efforts of his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, offset by his own rather hamhanded efforts?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, without referring to hamhanded efforts, on which the hon. gentleman across the way is an expert, I would simply like to say that we are constantly looking at the co-ordination of policies.

INCLUSION OF LONG-TERM PROJECTIONS OF ECONOMIC TARGETS IN BUDGET

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the remarks of the chairman of the Economic Council may I ask the Minister of Finance whether it is his intention when he brings down his budget to make in addition to short-term projections, long-term projections of economic targets?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to say that the hon. member will have to wait for the budget speech.

POWER

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDRO-ELECTRIC PROJECT—DISCUSSIONS WITH QUEBEC FINANCE MINISTER ON METHOD OF FINANCING

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I realize that the development of the James Bay project which is being discussed is a provincial matter, but in view of its importance to the entire economy I would like to ask the Minister of Finance whether there have been any discussions between the federal and provincial governments, and particularly between himself and the Minister of Finance of Quebec regarding the method of financing this very expensive project over the next ten years?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there have not been such consultations to date but I should indicate that the government is very much interested in the matter and I presume we will be discussing the financial effects on the Canadian economy in due course.

Mr. Lewis: Will the minister inform the House whether he will take the initiative to have such discussions in view of the project's importance to economic conditions generally and particularly to the monetary situation? Would he also consider using his Canada Development Corporation, the legislation for which is now before a parliamentary committee, for the purpose of assisting this development with Canadian funds?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, before I could answer such a question I would have to know a great deal more about the project than I presently do. My knowledge is limited, as is the hon. member's, to what has been printed in the newspapers.

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—RESEARCH INTO ECOLOGICAL AND ENVIRONMENTAL CONSEQUENCES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry who, according to the Prime Minister's roster, was scheduled to be here today—I am sure he is away for good reason—may I ask the Prime Minister whether the government, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry or some agency of government has gone into the ecological problems involved in the James Bay development and the way in which some research might be done, as suggested by one of the members of the Quebec cabinet, I think Dr. Goldbloom, into the ecological and environmental consequences of the project?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is engaged in British Columbia in receiving the Queen and helping her see that part of our country.

As far as relations between the government of Quebec and ourselves on this matter are concerned, I believe the only contact to date was with regard to the matter of energy itself. I know there has been some involvement between the National Energy Board and provincial officials on some aspect of this matter. As far as the ecology is concerned, like the Minister of Finance I am not aware of any request having been made by the province to the federal government. I do know, as does the hon. member, that Dr. Goldbloom has indicated the interest of his government from the point of view of the ecology. Certainly the federal government will also want, in so far as it is under its jurisdiction, to involve itself in any matters relating to the ecology.

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC ON DIVERSION OF WATERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether there has been any discussion with the province of Quebec about the diversion of waters and also whether it is the intention of the government to refer this whole matter to the committee of the House chaired by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich?

[Translation]

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Joliette wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Roch LaSalle (Joliette): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In view of the importance of the James Bay project, could the minister at least assure the Quebec government that representations will be made to this government with regard to the issuance of special credits for the construction of the substructure required for this project?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, if the province so requests, we will doubtless study the matter carefully.

[English]

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): A supplementary question. Having regard to the example of co-ordination of government policies, my question has been partially answered by a couple of the supplementaries but from the answers of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion are we to understand that there has been no specific request, especially involving the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, in regard to this rather large project?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): No, Mr. Speaker.

PROPOSED JAMES BAY HYDROELECTRIC PROJECT—PROTECTION OF RIGHTS OF INDIANS

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in his capacity as protector of the rights of Indians. In light of the objection by Chief Maxwell Gros-Louis, Secretary of the Indian Association of Quebec, that the James Bay power project will encroach upon the territorial and aboriginal rights of the Indian people there, will the minister on behalf of the government of Canada intervene to protect the rights of the native Indian people in that area?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have asked my officials to look into the matter and as the hon. member knows, there is a committee composed of Indians and provincial and federal officials which studies all problems pertaining to Quebec Indians, and I hope that this tripartite committee will be in a position to study the problem as quickly as possible to ensure that Indian rights are preserved.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize a last supplementary on this subject and then go to the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

[Translation]

In a few moments, the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Skeena.

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): With respect to the committee to which the minister referred, are there any plans for that committee to meet immediately to go into this question?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether an immediate meeting is scheduled between the parties concerned, but since the Quebec government announced this decision only a few days ago, I have not had time to contact the members of the committee. I shall, however, ask the government to place this item on the orders of the day.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

TIME ALLOTTED TO CONVENTIONS OF PARTI QUÉBÉCOIS AND RALLIEMENT CRÉDITISTE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Secretary of State, but I believe that I should perhaps rather make this a question of privilege.

On March 25, I had question No. 1,219 put on the order paper. It reads in part as follows:

1. How much time did CBC allocate to the provincial conventions of (a) Parti Québécois in February 1971 (b) the Ralliement créditiste—Quebec in March 1971,—

Now, I have just received the answer which prompts me to ask the Secretary of State the following question:

To Quebec separatists, the CBC granted five hours and five minutes of television and radio time compared with only 40 minutes of radio time to the Créditistes, and I would like to know whether the minister is willing to tell or request the CBC to give the various Canadian political parties at least as much consideration as the Canadian separatists?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the latter part of the question is obvious. It is "yes". The answer to the first part of the member's question is that the CBC only gave facts without any sort of expounding and I believe it is my duty, as spokesman for the Corporation in the House, to ask first what is the explanation for the disproportion noticed by the hon. member, disproportion with which I myself was struck, when I let him have the answer.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): I should like to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker.

Since he considers himself the spokesman for the CBC in the House, could he not take the same opportunity to inquire how come there were 27 technicians at the convention of the Parti Québécois, and only one at that of the Ralliement créditiste?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I should like to put a supplementary question to the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker.

I would ask the minister responsible for the CBC whether the broadcast time allotted by the CBC on the occasion of a convention, is primarily based on the importance of each political party?

AGRICULTURE

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—FEDERAL POSITION IN PROCEEDINGS BEFORE SUPREME COURT RESPECTING VALIDITY OF PROVINCIAL REGULATIONS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether the government has yet come around to making up its mind as to the position it will take in the forthcoming reference in a few days before the Supreme Court of Canada involving provincial regulations which improperly restrict the free interprovincial flow of agricultural commodities? Will the government, as the guardian of the constitution for all Canadians, reassure them that it will clearly and unequivocally oppose such regulations?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the federal government will be represented by way of intervention in that case, as I told the House last week, and I can assure my hon. friend that the constitution will be well represented by counsel.

Mr. Baldwin: Since the current crisis has come about because of the government's failure to act courageously, will it not state what it intends to do?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Egmont.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF MONEY ALLOCATED—METHOD OF ANNOUNCING ACCEPTANCE OF PROJECTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. Earlier a number of questions were directed to the minister with regard to the adequacy of funds for the Opportunities for Youth program. Can the minister report whether more funds will be made available in light of the very large number of submissions and indicate the amount of funds needed in order to make possible the acceptance of at least some greater number of the submissions that have been placed before the government?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, in a very short while, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Egmont on a supplementary.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My point of order is that many times in your rulings, with great respect, you say that our questions are argumentative. I say to Your Honour, with respect, that, when answers are argumentative and evasive and we try to ask further supplementary questions, surely your rulings should apply to all equally.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member may make this argument. The hon. member will recognize that it is the responsibility of the Chair to indicate when he thinks an answer or a question is argumentative. The hon. member sought the floor a moment ago to ask a supplementary question. He will be recognized in a moment. The Chair had recognized the hon. member for Egmont and I will, with pleasure, return in a moment to the hon. member for Calgary North. The hon. member for Egmont.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my supplementary question to the Secretary of State. Since a number of projects are now being announced on a day to day basis, can the minister indicate whether they are being announced at random or whether there is some system under which these projects are being publicly announced, in order that some of the uncertainty related to these projects may be dispelled?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether I understand the import of the member's question, but I can say that the announcements are made in a systematic way. In the first place, we communicate with the promoters of a project and send them a form for the conclusion of an agreement under which they undertake, for a grant, to perform certain works included in their project and it is only after conclusion of the agreement that a public announcement is made. However, as I have just said, there is some hidden meaning to the hon. member's question which I did not catch.

[English]

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ALLOCATION OF FUNDS TO CONSTRUCT SATELLITE CITY IN NORTH

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question either to the Secretary of State or to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Have any of these funds been allotted to the idea expressed by the Prime Minister in Vancouver, the construction of a satellite northern city to be erected by 10,000 young Canadians? If so, can the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development indicate what purpose that city would serve and whether the location has been selected?

Mr. Baldwin: That is for net social benefit.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, since neither of the ministers responsible in this area is prepared to answer, perhaps the Prime Minister would inform the House whether the government has seriously considered his idea of the erection of a satellite city in northern Canada? If so, have funds been allotted for this purpose, and what purpose would the city serve?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, the matter has not been seriously considered by cabinet, but if the hon. member wants to submit any projects we will study them seriously.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member for Calgary North has a supplementary to a previous question.

AGRICULTURE

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—INSTRUCTIONS TO FEDERAL COUNSEL IN PROCEEDINGS BEFORE SUPREME COURT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of the answer given by the Minister of Justice to the hon. member for Peace River. I am sure the Minister of Justice appreciates that it is his responsibility, as he suggested, to see that counsel represents the Department of Justice in the case in question. Has the Minister of Justice instructed that counsel, and what are those instructions?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has accused me of being argumentative and the hon. member for Peace River of being noncommittal. In any event, they can work that one out.

Mr. Baldwin: Evasive is a better term.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): My role is to instruct counsel, and the role of counsel, as the matter is before the Supreme Court of Canada, is to present the case before the court because the matter is before the court. The hon. member will understand the government's position when counsel pleads the case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North on a last supplementary. There are not many minutes left before the end of the question period and perhaps we should move on.

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate what the Minister of Justice said about his responsibility, but is there anything confidential about the instructions he has given to the counsel in question? What are those instructions? That is the question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Inquiries of the Ministry

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

USE OF NET SOCIAL BENEFIT RATHER THAN GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT AS INDICATOR OF PROGRESS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of his speech in Vancouver in which he suggested that we should place less reliance upon the gross national product and replace it with a more revealing figure, a new statistic which might be called "net social benefit". I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the government is preparing such an index for determining progress and development in this country, and have instructions gone to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to set up the machinery for producing such a criterion?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in a general sense the answer is yes, of course. When the government makes economic decisions, it always tries to put into the balance the social effects of its decisions and not only the economic effects. We do this every time we make a decision. I hope it is not a new notion to the hon. member. I can recall that more than 25 years ago economists were telling us about net national benefit. Apparently it was a surprise to some members of the press too. It is not a new motion. It is one which is very much in the mind of this government and has been for some years.

As to the second part of the question, whether it could be the subject of instructions to the Bureau of Statistics, the answer is that this is a very difficult suggestion. We do not think that the Bureau of Statistics is the source empowered in Canada to decide social or human benefit. This is the business of the government and, I hope, of the opposition. I am glad they are discovering this even though they are some 25 years late.

Mr. Baldwin: Can you seasonally adjust it?

Mr. Douglas: No one is quarrelling with the idea of having a measure of special progress and social benefit. What I am asking the Prime Minister is whether this is to be merely a nebulous hypothesis which the government uses from time to time—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas: —or whether the government is prepared to produce in some statistical form the net social benefit and whether items like unemployment and pollution will be factors which will be contained in such an index?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the supplementary question, and to some extent the answer given by the Prime Minister, is more in the field of debate. Perhaps the matter might be considered on an occasion other than during the question period.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

[Mr. Speaker.]

[English]

Does the term "net social benefit" come from the economist Keynes, Samuelson or Eric Kierans?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Later:]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): My question is supplementary to one asked earlier by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. I think I understood the Prime Minister to say that consideration was given to social benefit in government decisions. In view of the drop in net farm income by over $500 million since he became Prime Minister, was due consideration given to social benefit in the programs of the government on agriculture?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I should point out first that I did not use the term "social benefit" in my speech. I said "human benefit", but I cannot blame hon. members for believing what they have read in the newspapers. With regard to the second point, the answer is yes. Of course there has been a vast increase in social benefits to all Canadians as a result of many of this government's welfare measures.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

INQUIRY AS TO INTERIM INCREASE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that family allowances will not be increased in September, is the minister or the cabinet considering any interim increase to help needy families?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not under consideration. As I indicated, we are now having discussions and weighing various proposals for changes in family allowances which have been submitted by the general public, interested organizations and the provinces. We hope to use this as a basis to introduce legislation later in the fall.

HEALTH

INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON BIRTH CONTROL

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the question just asked, when will he be making his statement on birth control and contraception?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I hope to do that tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION

SEPTEMBER TORONTO HEARING—CONSIDERATION OF APPLICATION FOR VHF TELEVISION BROADCASTING

Mr. Hyl Chappell (Peel South): My question is for the Secretary of State. Can the minister say yet whether the CRTC hearing set for September in Toronto will be widened so as to include an application for VHF by television channel 13 which would serve the area much better than the one that will presently be considered?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, instances were made to me by several representatives from Toronto in that regard. I could certainly discuss the matter with CRTC authorities, but I have serious doubts that myself or the government could do anything to change the date of a scheduled hearing by the CRTC.

In any event, I shall talk to the chairman about it.

CHARLOTTETOWN—ACCELERATION OF IMPROVEMENT PROGRAM

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I wish to direct a question to the articulate and erudite Minister of Transport. Noting the announcement about the great improvements at Wabush airport in Newfoundland, can the minister now advise what he is doing to accelerate the acquisition of an instrument landing system and new property for the Charlottetown airport where the demand is really great and the need pressing?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I agree with the conclusion reached by the hon. member. I cannot answer the question as to dates but I will look into it and give him a written reply.

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—REPRISALS BY QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS OF JUSTICE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

In view of the restrictive measures taken by Ontario with regard to Quebec's FEDCO marketing board for eggs, the Quebec Minister of Justice, Mr. Choquette, has announced that his government would exercise reinforced reprisals against the neighbouring province.

My question is: Has this matter been referred to the Minister of Justice or has he entered into conversations with his Quebec counterpart about this matter?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not discuss the matter with the Quebec Attorney General. This question falls in the same category as those recently asked by some Alberta members. The government maintains its position that this problem will be solved with the passing of Bill C-176 by Parliament.

INFORMATION CANADA

REASON THAT FACILITIES NOT USED TO PUBLICIZE CENSUS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question is for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Information Canada. In view of the fact that Information Canada was established for the purpose of communicating government plans to the people, will the minister explain why the government felt it necessary to contract out the job of publicizing the census to two advertising firms at a total cost of $820,000?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, Information Canada has never been given a mandate to be the spokesman for the government nor to run the government's advertising program.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a question for the Prime Minister. When is the Prime Minister going to set aside a day for a debate on the report of the Royal Commission on Security so that we can discuss these matters?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): When we get to the debate on the resolution now on the order paper on the matter of security and relating to the matter which was dealt with by the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, I expect the government will be able to participate in this debate and use the time available to make its views known on the matters covered by the Royal Commission on Security.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

I wish to ask him whether he would wish to consider with sympathy the idea of establishing a Social Affairs Council in line with the Economic Council of Canada, in view of his deep interest in all matters relating to social justice.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROVISION OF SHORT-RANGE ECONOMIC FORECASTING ORGANIZATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance which I have asked him very earnestly previously. When may we expect the minister to act on the recommendation which has been made for several years by the Economic Council of Canada that a short-range economic forecasting unit should be provided for Canada? I am sure there is no need for me to emphasize the importance of establishing such an organization.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is referring to an organization outside the government. We have ind cated that we would be willing to give limited support to the establishment of such an organization outside the government. We have indicated that we would be willing to give limited support to the establishment of such an organization but that basically it should be supported by industry in this country.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member is not suggesting to the Chair that the question is in order. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Nickel Belt.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Mackenzie would like an opportunity of rephrasing his question.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether we can expect a decision within the next week on whether Saskatchewan will be given a grant for the pulp mill so that the premier may call an election?

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he has already had two chances to ask his question.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member for Mackenzie, who has had two strikes at the same question, might be allowed a third attempt provided it is the same question.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I hope it will not be strike three. I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. May I ask him whether the calling of a by-election in Assiniboia is contingent upon a general election in the province of Saskatchewan?

Does the minister intend to follow up in the near future the recommendations included in the Bilingual Districts Advisory Board report, which was tabled in the House yesterday, and, if so, when can we expect the official creation of a bilingual district in this country?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the government intends to study in the most diligent and the most attentive manner possible the report which was tabled in the House, but I should like to bring to the hon. member's attention paragraph 5 of section 13 which reads in part as follows:

> No proclamation...shall be issued...before...at least ninety days have elapsed from the day a copy of the report was laid before Parliament pursuant to section 17.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General.

For well over a year the Lapalme boys have been parading on Parliament Hill in an atmosphere, shall I say, of frustration and humiliation. Does the minister intend once and for all to settle this conflict which in my opinion has become more of a social and humanitarian problem than a mere union conflict?

Is the minister in a position to tell this House that he intends to take the necessary action to re-open this file and to give some kind of satisfaction to the families of these people who are living in misery?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Acting Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, the file is still open. Whenever I have the opportunity, I hire one or two of the Lapalme boys. Some 50 of them are already in my employ. Last December I made an offer whereby just about all of them could have been integrated into the public service, but they refused. Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as I heard the question I can tell the House that I believe almost two years ago the federal government did make some propositions to the provincial governments regarding the administration and division of profits or revenues from the exploitation of offshore mineral rights. Since then there has been a very long series of consultations with the provinces. There has been some progress, but I think it is fair to say that many provinces have not yet stated their position clearly. Therefore we cannot introduce any legislation until we know the final position taken by the provinces on this matter.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING RATE PER BUSHEL, EMERGENCY PAYMENTS, EXTENSION OF APPLICATION TO RYE, FLAXSEED AND RAPESEED

The House resumed, from Tuesday, May 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Lang that Bill C-239, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to participate in the debate simply to say that this bill represents yet another of the government's measures which will add insult to injury for the farmers of western Canada. I was amazed when the minister talked about the government's great revolutionary provisions to assist western farmers. This bill is consequential upon the inherent policy the government has adopted; it is simply another measure to sink the western grain farmer into complete oblivion.

This bill is based upon over-all government philosophy which is designed to remove two-thirds of the farmers from the agricultural industry by 1990. That is the government's solution or cure for the ills agriculture is suffering today. This has been spelled out abundantly by the task force on agriculture and is closely related to the philosophy expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the ministers responsible for discharging agricultural policy. As a result of this policy announced by the task force and the Prime Minister in June of 1968, we were faced with Bill C-176. That was more than a year ago. It was misleading in that it suggested it would cure the major difficulties faced by the producers, particularly in the field of marketing. By reading between the lines one can realize that this was nothing more than another form of bureaucratic control with the decisions of farmers being abridged and placed in the hands of an all-powerful council appointed by the minister.

We note in this bill also an adamant attempt by the government to gain control of the beef industry. This industry is one of the few which has survived without government interference. In spite of the promise of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to cattlemen that he would protect the industry, we find that as a result of the provisions of Bill C-176 the industry can be taken over. This was either a deliberate attempt to mislead the cattlemen or an indication that he has lost the confidence of his colleagues. We now witness massive public concern by the agricultural industry toward this bill. People are writing to members of the House urging us to detain its passage. They are concerned because this is another deliberate attempt to interfere with their right to make decisions.

The stabilization program announced some time ago by the minister was headlined by the statement that western farmers were to receive $100 million. This was misleading in that the program was designed on the basis of a rearrangement of payments. The minister must know very well that in 1968-69, as a result of revisions to the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act and the covering of losses in pool accounts about 130 million were put into the federal treasury. I suggest this is simply a rearrangement of financial affairs respecting the storage and sale of grain. For one to go about this country suggesting that farmers are getting an additional 100 million is downright misleading; it is sheer nonsense. The farmers will not be misled or trapped into believing this. The new quota system disregards the small family farm. We are basically concerned about these entities. I am sure many others in this House share my view that a small, mixed farm operator is still the most efficient farmer and contributes greatly to society.

In this bill we note, in addition to the new quota system, provision for the removal of the unit quota system which was a safeguard to the small producer. The 400-bushel unit quota gave the small operator breathing space in which to meet his current expenditures. This is being withdrawn. This is further proof that Bill C-239 is another step toward the eradication of the small farm operation in Canada. This can be compared with the policies of the Canadian Dairy Commission which became effective in 1967-68 and resulted in a decrease of about 50 per cent in registered dairy producers. In addition to this reduction and because of regional rationalization we have experienced the phenomenon of 80 per cent of our dairy products being produced in the two central provinces. This has caused severe hardship to the farmers of western Canada.

Let us also consider the application of the Lift program. At the commencement of this scheme farmers were to receive somewhere between $100 million and $150 million. We now find that there has been only some $55 million distributed under this program, resulting as well in huge administrative costs. In my own constituency some 40 per cent of the producers have participated in the Lift program. This program was, again, designed to help the large producer to the detriment of the small producer. Again we find in the program now being considered by the government another step toward the reduction in the number of small farm producers. This is spelled out very clearly. Obviously, this government wants to get rid of the small farm operation. This is also true of the farm adjustment and consolidation program announced some time ago by the minister.

We are frightened by these government policies because we envisage emerging from them a form of collective or communal-type farming. Under the adjustment program we will have more counselling and information services than we can shake a stick at. We will have rural counselling services, management farm services and agricultural adjustment services. The services provided by the farm adjustment program is different from the counselling provided by management specialists. Farmers need advice on how to maintain their small operations rather than having them taken over to facilitate the build-up of large entities. We envisage these programs as nothing more than a means of legislative merging. It becomes obvious that this government is dedicated to a program designed to eliminate the small farm.

There is no secret that there is a critical shortage of cash available to farmers in western Canada. We see the desperate shortage at this time when many producers are faced with heavy expenditures in respect of their planting and cultivating operations. Repayment of cash advances has caused them very severe hardship. I urged the minister to consider placing a moratorium on these advances until the movement of grain and sales were such that there would be sufficient capital generated to meet the advance payments, but the minister chose to embark upon another course.

• (3:10 p.m.)

With this measure we see a further strangulation of the small producer. Rather than his position being improved, we see any measurable benefit that was contained in the original legislation being removed. Under the present act the producers know what they are entitled to, because it is spelled out specifically and categorically. Under the proposed legislation they will not know this. Here again we see the Governor in Council emerging as the all-powerful authority: decisions are not always based on economics and in many respects are political.

Producers will not know exactly what they will get. On page 6 of the bill we see that the Governor in Council shall prescribe as the advance payment rate per bushel for a kind of grain in a crop year a rate that in his opinion approximates 66⅔ per cent of the initial payment that will be payable in that crop year for the prescribed grade of that type of grain. We do not know what the maximum will be because we do not know what the quotas will be. This creates a mood of uncertainty which makes it very difficult to embark upon any program of planning. In agriculture today one of the greatest pitfalls is lack of planning in production and the economic balance of each farm unit.

Under the present act the interest rate is fixed. Now we see the Governor in Council is to prescribe the interest rate. This, again, makes planning difficult. As I mentioned before, we now see that the unit quota is gone forever. The bill makes specific mention of that. I reiterate that the unit quota was the salvation of the small producer. For example, in my constituency of Vegreville, in answer to this question which I had circulated, "Do you feel the unit quota should be retained?" 71 per cent of the respondents said "Yes." Mine is a mixed farming riding and this response is an indication of the feelings of the farmers in respect of the unit quota system. It has been a good thing. I would urge the minister, throughout the debate on the stabilization program which we shall have in the near future, to give serious consideration to incorporating the unit quota system in one form or another, because failure to do this will speed-up the rationalization process which we see taking place so obviously today and which is playing havoc with the rural communities of western Canada.

In his press release the minister said that another season for amending the act was to give producers a better opportunity to repay advances in the crop year in which such advances were obtained. If sales and deliveries had been made, the advances would have been repaid. That is the problem. The producers who have obtained advances have found themselves in the position of prolonged indebtedness. Why? The answer is very clear: the farmers are desperately short of cash because they have not been able to sell grain. It is that simple.

Let us consider the Canadian Wheat Board annual report for 1969-70. I hope the minister in his remarks will be able to throw some light on this problem. We find that a number of contracts remain outstanding. I would be interested in knowing why some of these contracts are outstanding, whether they will be fulfilled and just what position the Canadian Wheat Board is taking. For example, in 1966 Russia negotiated a three-year agreement calling for the sale and purchase of 336 million bushels of wheat and flour, yet as at July 31, 1970, 66.1 million bushels remained outstanding under that contract. The contract has expired.

The People's Republic of China has 66.2 million bushels outstanding from a total commitment in 1969 of 82.1 million bushels. With regard to Eastern Europe we find that Bulgaria, with a commitment of 7.3 million bushels in October, 1969, has outstanding purchases of 5.4 million bushels as of July 31, 1970. We see that Poland has a 33.1 million bushel contract which was due to expire on November 4, 1969, and yet 6.6 million bushels are still outstanding in that commitment. The German Democratic Republic continued in default of its long-term agreement with 5.3 million bushels of wheat outstanding.

We have heard a great deal about the resurgence of sales made possible by the government's new credit program. Under this new program we have made a few agreements but very little in the form of deliveries, and as a result very little cash has been distributed among the farms of western Canada. For example, Peru failed to meet its commitment of 8.4 million bushels. This information is found on page 14 of the Canadian Wheat Board report. Brazil, which negotiated an agreement for 33.1 million bushels for the period June 1, 1970, to May 31, 1974, has not yet exercised its delivery option for any part of the contract.

The Philippines were to have purchased 5.6 million bushels between January 1 and December 31, 1970, yet no portion of this delivery has been made. Syria agreed to purchase 29.4 million bushels for the three years ending March 31, 1973, but 25.4 million bushels remain outstanding. The United Arab Republic, out of a total commitment of 18.4 million bushels which was to have terminated in October, 1970, still has an outstanding commitment of 15.2 million bushels. In total this amounts to 186 million bushels of wheat most of which is outstanding over and beyond the contracts.

These long-term contracts were splashed over the press and other news media. We were told that Canada had made another great sale. In view of this I was asked by farmers why they only have a four or five-bushel quota. The answer is simple: many agreements are being made, but not too many sales. What is happening? Are these countries using Canada as a hedging device? Are they making long-term agreements and then going out and purchasing elsewhere because they believe Canada is a good country and if they go beyond the expiry date of the contract they will still be able to get delivery at the original price? If this is what is happening, I suggest the minister should look into the matter. I hope he has some answers, because I believe this is another misleading device which has been perpetrated upon western farmers and leads to a false sense of optimism.

• (3:20 p.m.)

You cannot distribute the cash if you are not delivering the goods; you cannot ring it up on the till. I suggest that it is high time we got rid of the public fanfare, the gimmicks and the falsified sales promotions which have taken place. We should start talking about the genuine sales, the genuine deliveries, those for which we are receiving payment and then we can institute a more realistic program of planning.

I was speaking on the telephone yesterday with the president of the Palliser Wheat Growers' Association. He told me it is now common knowledge throughout the international marketplace that Canada is no longer the logical country from which to buy wheat because of our inability to deliver and to fill the ships when they arrive. I also understand from the Palliser Wheat Growers' Association that the Canadian Wheat Board is now turning down sales of wheat because of their inability to deliver. I think the minister should comment on this situation and the facts should be placed before us.

A trade group has been studying the handling and transportation of prairie grain. What has happened to its report? Is it too embarrassing for the minister to reveal? Perhaps it is. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the problem with the grain trade today is not one of advances but of sales. I understand, also, that Iraq was in touch with the Palliser Wheat Growers' Association to see if they could assist them in the negotiation of an agreement involving 100,000 tons of wheat to be shipped to their country because they could not break through the crust of bureaucracy surrounding the Canadian Wheat Board.

This is a shame, because the success or the failure of the Prairie economy is to a large degree contingent upon the sale of wheat. When we look at the export figures for 1969, we find out that Canada for the first time in history became a net importer of agricultural products to the tune of some $35 million. This is a horrible situation for a country like Canada, a country which has the agricultural potential, the resources, the know-how and the technology. The source of the problem in handling facilities lies with our railroads, terminal and collecting facilities.

Mr. Lang: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I apologize for interrupting the hon. member, but the minister is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Lang: I think I should draw to Your Honour's attention the manner in which the hon. member is straying from the bill before us. I recognize that there are three bills before the House in a group. If it is his intention to speak on them all at once, that would be a special situation. But what he is saying has nothing to do with the subject before us.

Mr. Mazankowski: May I say with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, that the sale of wheat certainly has something to do with the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, because if we had a minister in charge of the Wheat Board who would get off his fat fanny and provide the necessary leadership to sell and promote sales, we would not need this legislation.

Mr. Lang: We are having a record year.

Mr. Horner: Why don't you fill up the storage space?

Mr. Mazankowski: It is not a record year for the farmers of western Canada, believe me. It is a record deficit year for them. I suggest that the minister should go out west and do a little appraising. I am sure he would find that I am speaking the truth. The matter with which I am dealing has a great deal of bearing upon our ability to deliver.

Another thing that affects the whole question of advance payments and items relating to the sale and marketing of wheat is the Menzies report, this government's proposal, which indicated a desire to decrease the amount of grain in commercial storage and terminal storage positions. This, again, reduces the amount of cash available to the Prairie economy. I do not know exactly by how much the amount has been reduced, but it is probably in the order of 75 million to 100 million bushels, which means there is roughly $150 million less in the Prairie economy today than there was a year ago.

The Menzies report recommends the reduction of 250 million to 300 million bushels to be carried in commercial storage positions. This might be well and good if sales were made in fact, but if they are made simply on paper, such as those to which I have referred, it will not do the western farmer much good.

This bill, as I have said, is completely in line with other pieces of agricultural legislation. These pieces of agricultural legislation, this bill included, are not in conformity with the wishes of the vast majority of producers. I warn the government that a bill like this will do very little to placate the western farmer, to alleviate the apprehension, the frustration and the disenchantment that he is experiencing under this government. A bill like this will merely disturb him.

I urge the minister responsible for the Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture to very seriously consider the impact that these pieces of legislation will have on western farmers, because they are experiencing a deep feeling of anxiety and of alienation. We can ill-afford such feelings at this time because we are fast approaching the situation wherein rural communities will be destroyed, and I am sure the majority of Canadians do not want to see that happen.

Both ministers responsible have a moral obligation to avert this trend. All hon. members have that obligation. These measures, including Bill C-176 and the bill that will be introduced to include rapeseed, flax and rye under the auspices of the Wheat Board are not necessarily in accordance with the wishes of the producers and I urge the minister to consider the performance of the Wheat Board and its auxiliary agencies because I think therein lies a great part of the problem. Unless the problem is solved, we can have all the cash advances in the world and we will not be a darn bit better off.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on second reading of Bill C-239 I should like first of all to refer to a statement made by the Canadian Council of Rural Development to the Canadian Agricultural Congress as follows:

> Rural Canada is currently going through a period of radical adjustment.
> What happens to agriculture in the 1970s will not only affect the destinies of all rural Canadians, (but will also) have considerable influence on the lives of all Canadians whether they live in the country or in the city.

• (3:30 p.m.)

It appears to me that if you look around the House today and see how few members representing other parts of Canada are in their seats to listen to what is happening in the rural areas of Canada, the words of the Canadian Council of Rural Development ring very true. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that too many hon. members of this House fail to realize that from 50 per cent to 52 per cent of Canadians are directly or indirectly connected with the agricultural industry. When we see a bill of this nature before us to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, in effect it means that the government has not looked after the basic agricultural economy of the country, because if it had it would not be necessary for it to introduce such a bill.

I suggest that the government takes a cold, heartless approach to the whole agricultural economy. I believe that the agricultural economy must be helped by a government that cares, thus removing the necessity for introducing bills of this kind. In former years it was always the case that farmers formed a major part of our nation that was self-reliant. Farmers and fishermen combined formed one of the basic ingredients that went into making up our nation and in most cases they were self-reliant people. Now, when we see bills of this nature introduced we can only believe that self-reliance has become a vague, political term and the government does not really care whether the agricultural economy is self-reliant. It used to be the case that the vast majority of our people—this was true of thousands and thousands of farmers—could consider themselves to be very independent. Now the government has to bring in measures such as this to offset the errors it has made in planning the economy. Its planning has attached government strings to many sectors of the economy and the result has not been good.

I believe that the majority of Canadian agricultural producers would not wish to have this legislation if they could do without it. They would rather be paid a fair return on their investment and not have to rely on an advance payment in order to continue in the agricultural industry. In this connection I wish to quote from an article which appeared in the Moose Jaw Times-Herald on February 13, 1969, because it bears directly on the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act:

> Saskatchewan farmers are getting four cents more per bushel than it costs them to produce the wheat, a regional short course on the economics of farming was told Wednesday.
> J. F. Hickie of the provincial farm management bureau said that current price is $1.67 a bushel—

This was in February, 1969.

> —including an estimated final payment of 19 cents a bushel compared with production cost of $1.63 a bushel.
> He said the cash cost of producing wheat is $7.50 per acre with $2.80 per acre depreciation of equipment and $4.70 per acre labour return.
> Added to these costs is the investment cost of $6.40 per acre which made $21.50 per acre for production. The investment cost is a book entry which shows what the farmer could make if he invested money at 6 per cent interest instead of putting it into the production of wheat.
> With an average of 60 per cent of cultivated acreage seeded, production cost of wheat is $35.63 per acre which, with a yield of 22 bushels per acre, worked out to $1.63 or just 4 cents less than current prices—
> However, when evaluating current value of grain, it isn't even worth that much because of the market situation which results in some wheat not being sold for several years.

I relate those remarks by Mr. Hickie to the legislation now before us, because in the past Prairie farmers have always been self-reliant but now they are in a position where even those with the most efficient means of production have to admit they are not completely self-reliant and must depend on prairie grain advance payments. When farmers have to repay these advances they get themselves deeper into trouble because their costs are constantly rising and they cannot themselves keep up with the ever-rising cost of living.

Last November, in one of the areas that I visited I spoke to a hardware merchant who told me that it was the worst month in the history of his business. Despite all the big talk by Members of Parliament from central Canada about how much was being given in assistance to the agricultural economy, this merchant told me that November was his worst month ever. At that point, Mr. Speaker, some of the cash advances already had been paid and grain was moving into elevators, but despite that farmers could not pay this merchant for the credit they had obtained from him. That is a typical illustration that the government is really not concerned about the situation which exists in the rural areas of Canada, whether in the east, in central Canada or on the Prairies. The majority of members of this House represent 80 per cent of the large, urban centres in our country. I plead with them to give ample consideration to the rural areas.

When we look at this legislation, Mr. Speaker, we have to admit that the original act did help farmers in many areas when they needed assistance in times of stress. At the same time, I agree with hon. members who preceded me in this debate and said we must ascertain whether any attempt has been made by the government to keep up with changing marketing conditions which have been met and overcome by other trading countries. I am sure the minister is well aware of the fact that the President of the United States recently said he was going to pour more millions of dollars into that country's agricultural economy to make sure that the farmers, who are the backbone of the nation, realize a fair return on their investment. The time has come for our government to accept the fact that it, too, has an obligation and cannot rely just on bills like this which by their very nature show that the government is trying to evade its responsibility to make this a great trading country.

We must have good grain selling missions abroad. Farmers in the United States are not in need of legislation like this which provides a petty amount in cash advances which in the long run do not do the agricultural industry any good. The United States has always had a large number of concessional sales. I am pleased to note that our government has moved to a better position in this regard and that we have made some concessional sales. But in the interim we have lost a tremendous number of markets, a fact which is well documented by the private planning commission which submitted an excellent report on this matter.

At the same time as the United States was making concessional sales it was developing cash sales. Over the past ten years Canadian agricultural exports to the European Economic Community and to the United Kingdom rose 10 per cent, while U.S. sales rose 37 per cent and were four times the value of ours. This does not speak well of our government's performance in those years. We also know that Canada concentrated on a slower growing product, wheat rather than coarse grains, and on a slower growing market, the United Kingdom rather than the European Economic Community. I suggest that the government has a responsibility to do something in this area.

The reason for the bill now before us is that in the early 1960s more U.S. wheat moved through concessional sales and it is suggested that these sales were used as an unfair bargaining lever to force countries to purchase a higher proportion of commercial wheat from the United States. This had a tremendous impact on world markets and adversely affected the Canadian wheat market. If the government had moved at that time or in the last few years to make more concessional sales before it lost the market, we would not be faced with this bill. At the same time, the United States passed Public Law 480 which depressed wheat exports, especially during the 1955-60 period and perhaps again in the past three years as large Soviet and Chinese purchases tapered off. Public Law 480 was one of the main reasons Canada lost markets when she was urgently in need of them.

I am sure we all hope that we can assist the agricultural economy. We know that farmers in Canada have never received their fair share of the national income. This is not a myth, it is a fact of life and the most recent DBS figures indicate how true it is. We also know that in order to provide assistance to people who have no cash input, we must provide some type of legislation such as the bill before us. This is not the whole answer, however.

As we go through western Canada in particular we find that the elevator men have been made bill collectors, because if the farmer does not pay his municipal taxes the elevator man must not accept his grain; and if he does accept it he must deduct the municipal taxes from the delivery. I hope the minister will comment on this situation. This type of policing regulation should be taken out of the elevator man's hands. We know how difficult it is for the farmers to bring their grain to the elevator and receive only half the amount they should receive because of the amount of their cash advance, and then to repay the loans they had to obtain in order to keep going.

No consideration is given to income and return on investment. I am sure the people in rural Canada are looking to this House of Commons and wondering whether we are obsessed with the situation in large urban centres and have forgotten the problems of rural areas. It is high time we looked after the basic industries, which of course includes the fishing industry. If we did, then this type of legislation would not be necessary.

All this planning which we thought was so necessary could have been brought about not too many years ago. Our brokerage firms are not very concerned with selling Canadian grain. If they have a ship sitting in Australia, they will fill it before bringing it back to Canada to haul grain to an export position. The manner in which brokerage firms handle grain should come under review. This is the type of situation that lends itself to the provisions of Bill C-239. It would not be necessary to debate it today if we were really concerned about the over-all cash input of our prairie economy.

When we look at this bill, Mr. Speaker, we must ask why the farmer is not getting his fair share and has to be assisted. When we consider, for instance, the cost of farm machinery, we realize that the government has not taken any steps to institute an investigation under the Combines Investigations Act into this question even though Dr. Barber suggested that this should be done. People are having to use their cash advances to pay exorbitant prices for machinery. When the agricultural producer next marks his ballot he will remember this situation and how little this government has done to bring about the type of programs needed to ensure a return on his investment.

I am sure many other members wish to speak on this bill. As we look at the entire agricultural area we wonder whether bills of this nature are introduced only to get votes. In an address to 250 people, the Premier of Saskatchewan said that he did not want to tip his hand on when an election would be held in Saskatchewan, but that "it would be very nice to have those cheques in the hands of farmers before an election." I suggest the politicians are playing with the lives of the rural dwellers of Canada when they make this type of statement. It makes me think there is collusion between federal and provincial parties to ensure more votes at election time.

We all know that one of the greatest needs is to obtain a viable, economic farm unit. To obtain this the farmer must receive a reasonable price for his produce. While we will no doubt support Bill C-239 in order that it can go to committee—probably with many amendments to be made there—it is not the answer. It cannot be the answer to say, "We will give you more money today" and then vote it back, saying, "You are not getting a fair return on your investment". A short while ago I illustrated that in 1969 the breaking point was 4 cents per bushel of grain.

How can rural Canada remain in existence with the legislation before us? At one time it was said there are various ways of being a successful farmer, and I suppose it is the same thing when we look at cash advances. Many farmers will not take cash advances because they know the implications. It used to be said that all a farmer required was a strong back and a weak mind, but nowadays we know that a farmer must have a good head and a wide education in order to understand the advice offered by city men and to select only that which will do the least damage.

In considering the legislation before us I sincerely say it is high time that practical and realistic people involved in the agricultural economy were brought into the picture. In his deliberations and consultations with various groups throughout the country I hope the minister will use their practical knowledge. Though we may pass Bill C-239, I would suggest that the regulations are most important. Unless practical people are consulted, all the legislation in the world will not help and we will go merrily on our way taking a hard approach to the rural agricultural producer.

• (3:50 p.m.)

It is high time everybody appreciated that the agricultural producer is the backbone of the nation. It is high time those who draw up legislation looked at the situation to see what return the agricultural producer is getting. The people who draw up the regulations should go into the rural areas of Canada before they attempt even to draft a bill of this kind. These remarks apply also to other bills that we deal with in this House, but particularly to the people concerned with Bill C-239. It is high time those people obtained the necessary knowledge in the field; they should not rely on university degrees only.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak on this bill to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. I think almost all hon. members of the House, certainly those concerned about agriculture, agree in principle with these amendments. Cash advances on stored grain have assisted farmers over the years and have allowed farmers to obtain interest-free money on grain on hand. That money has tided them over until sales have been possible.

I believe some areas of the bill could be changed to the advantage of all. Certainly changes should be made to the bill to make it more workable from the standpoint of the farming community. Clause 6 of the bill, on page 4, is one area that gives me concern. It speaks of interest rates that may be charged back to the beginning of the loan if the loan was made in cash instead of taking the usual form of an advance against grain deliveries. If I am wrong in my interpretation, I hope the minister will correct me.

I wonder if the following situation would not be possible under this clause. Let us suppose a farmer took a cash advance against his grain and then decided, because of market conditions, to buy cattle or other livestock. Let us say that he fed the livestock with grain and did not sell his in the usual manner through the elevator system. If he fed this grain to his livestock and then repaid the advance in cash, would he not be penalized and possibly have to pay interest from the beginning of the loan? Would he be penalized because he fed the grain to his livestock instead of selling it through the elevator system? If he had not gone into the livestock business he would have sold the grain through the elevator system.

I do not think that there should be any discrimination in this area. I think a permit holder or bona fide farmer who has taken a cash advance should have the opportunity of repaying the loan in any way he may wish. After all, that would help the diversification of agriculture and bring about the flexibility that we need: it would be brought about if farmers had the privilege of paying these loans back in whatever way they wished.

Turning to clause 7 of the bill, I wish to say a word about the flexibility that is to be allowed to the Governor in Council with regard to the amount that may be paid against a bushel of grain. I am referring to loan repayment rates. I suggest that it should be a fixed rate. I do not think it is good to have a flexible rate, because the farmer must be able to plan ahead like any other businessman.

The farmer plans his credit as he plans anything else, and when he makes plans for the purchase of fertilizer, equipment and that sort of thing he must know how much of his income will come out of the grain that he delivers. If that item is too flexible and if the Governor in Council can vary the amount of the return, I think the effects will be undesirable. They might be disastrous for an operator who had made a long-term commitment and then found that his repayment terms had been altered. I suggest that this area of the bill ought to be looked at before the bill reaches its final form.

The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) referred to the regulations that are enacted with bills of this kind. In that regard, this bill is no different from any similar bill. Often the regulations and the bill are interpreted differently than was intended, possibly, by those who drafted the legislation. I think the regulations ought to be placed before the House together with the bill in its final form so that we may be aware of what we are dealing with. Too many times have regulations thwarted the real intent of a bill.

I suggest that the regulations ought not to be interpreted by people who lack the required background and an awareness of the situation which exists. Too often these people are more concerned about whether a bill is workable and about its drafting from a legal standpoint, than about its effect on the producer and the credit arrangements of the farmer. Before this bill reaches its final stage we ought to know what will be the regulations under it. There are certain hazy and hairy areas in this bill that might easily lend themselves to misinterpretation. The regulations could be interpreted in a manner detrimental to the farming community.

The whole business of cash advances has always met with ready acceptance in this House and across the country. I think we have come to realize that increasing and improving farm credit facilities, whether by way of cash advances, improved farm credit arrangements or farm improvement loans, have benefited the agricultural community. It all boils down to the fact that we must be more aware of the importance of agriculture on the national scene.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Improved credit facilities are not enough when we consider the real necessity, which is a higher price for the product. I attended meetings this past weekend in my constituency. When talking to farmers, machinery dealers and a cross-section of people from rural areas it was never so evident to me that time is running out for these people. They have extended their credit as far as they can. Their resources are stretched tight. They have borrowed as much money as possible from the banks. This is very evident from their arrears with the Farm Credit Corporation, which are well over the 20 per cent mark. Everywhere credit facilities are stretched to the wire.

Further cash advances and credit extensions will not be of value much longer. We are coming to the end of the rope and approaching the day of reckoning in the farm community. It is folly to say that any measures before the House will alleviate this situation. The government, through the FCC, banks, farm agencies and other organizations will not help the owners of a great many farm enterprises in the near future. There has not been any legislation before the House this session to alleviate the situation. We have been debating this bill for only one day, but we spent more than a year on the farm products marketing bill. There is not anything in that bill which spells out that producers will receive even one cent more for their products. If we look at the bill we can only assume that the administrative costs of the bureaucracy may be an additional charge on this product. The charge will probably be on the producer rather than the consumer.

I urge the minister to look at this situation where credit has run out across the country. Many people have gone broke already. I can stand here and say these things. Maybe it will sound like politics, maybe it will not. However, if we talk to the people in the farm communities they will tell us that they can only go for another six months, the banks are closing down on them and they are in arrears with the FCC. When we hear this, we know that we are coming to the end of the road as far as agriculture is concerned.

During the past weekend the National Farmers Union staged demonstrations in Edmonton, Regina and, I think, Winnipeg. A few years ago I did not go along with demonstrations. I do not really believe in government by demonstration, but when I look at the demonstrations staged today I think the situation is entirely different. The government has not shown any awareness of the problem. It has not responded to mere words and warnings. It has continued its course of grinding-out legislation but this has not improved the farm picture. I say to the minister that one day the farmers of this nation will rise in anger and fall upon him. Unless he does more than he has in the past, he will deserve anything that happens. We cannot be responsible for their actions because their farms, businesses, life savings and dreams are disappearing. We in this Parliament merely talk about it and extend them a little more credit when they have already gone over the wire in that area. It is just like applying a band-aid to an amputated leg.

Some figures were quoted in this debate yesterday which indicated the amount of money funnelled into agriculture by governments of various countries. It was pointed out that Canada is spending approximately $350 on each person employed in agriculture. I gather that the figures quoted were for the year 1968. At the same time, the small country of Switzerland was spending approximately $1,502 on each person employed in agriculture. A little country like Switzerland funnels over $1,500 per person into agriculture, while Canada is only funnelling about $350. Compare the performance of these two nations over the years. Switzerland has continued right in the middle of a hornet's nest. Governments have fallen, governments have gone bankrupt, there have been wars and strife and yet Switzerland has remained stable. These figures indicate that the Swiss have read their history books and realize the importance of agriculture to a nation that hopes to survive.

It may be said that the main business in Switzerland is banking and that agriculture is not very important when looked at from an objective point of view from our distance from them. However, they feel it is important enough to funnel almost five times as much per person into agriculture every year as we in Canada—and Switzerland is not a forming nation; that is not their main business. If one looks at the relative importance of the gross national product of agriculture in Canada compared with that of Switzerland, he can see what I mean. It can be seen that they have read their history books well. They realize that any country or civilization must have a healthy agricultural economy in order to survive. Countries which have chosen to ignore this fact have disappeared into the dust, and the sands of time have swept over them. If the minister has put any effort into this matter, I feel he must put in three times as much effort. This country will rise or fall on the basis of our agriculture. Our farmers do not have much time left.

The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) quoted some very interesting figures from the Wheat Board's report. They show the difference between announced and actual sales, and the amount of sales that are uncommitted in contracts which we have with other countries. I was shocked when I heard these figures. The minister has made announcements in the House about the great grain sales that have been made to the Arab Republic and to Russia, yet according to the hon. member for Vegreville only a small percentage of the grain has been delivered. What these sales really amounted to was an open-ended contract with these countries. If these countries could buy their grain cheaper elsewhere, they shopped around and did so, whereas we were tied to the arrangement we had made.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Lang: Could I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Downey: I would be very pleased to receive one.

Mr. Lang: I should like to ask the hon. member whether he would care to read the pages of the Wheat Board report referred to by his colleague. Perhaps he will understand them in a way that his colleague did not, since in many cases the dates clearly show that the grain was to be delivered at a later period in the crop year. The hon. member then might realize that in almost every case the grain has been delivered under those contracts, some of which have been completed. But in almost every case the grain is going out, with the one exception where much longer time has been taken, the one referred to by the hon. member, the contract with the U.S.S.R.

Mr. Downey: Fortunately, I did look at the figures in the report, and when you speak of the time limit—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that he should direct his remarks to the minister through the Chair.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Speaker, since the minister asked me a question, might I be allowed to comment on it? I think it is more likely that you have not studied the figures very closely, Mr. Minister. The time limit for deliveries of grain to the bulk of the countries listed in the report has expired. I think only two had extensions of time, one until 1973, and I forget the other extension. But do not lead the House astray by saying that the delivery periods in the Wheat Board report did not expire in the case of the bulk of the countries named.

I was speaking about the difficult situation we are facing with our grain sales and relating this to cash advances. No matter what party a member belongs to, we all know that he does his work to best advantage. Nevertheless, at times we were disappointed by some of the provisions of the marketing board bill and various other pieces of farming legislation which we attributed to the various ministers who brought the bills forward. However, in a speech in June, 1968, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) set out all these programs even before he had appointed ministers to the various portfolios.

With all due respect to the Prime Minister, coming from an area like Westmount we cannot expect him to have an agricultural point of view and to formulate practical policies for grain marketing, and that sort of thing, in the same way as somebody like yourself, Mr. Minister, or the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). I feel sorry that you gentlemen are forced into the position where you have to try and perpetuate unrealistic policies put forward by the Prime Minister before you had anything to do with your present portfolios.

Another undesirable feature of our grain sales is the reduction of terminal storage. Over the long run I do not think this will prove to be a healthy situation. The Prime Minister is an intelligent man. However, knowing that his policies are not working—though I do not know that he cares about that—and bearing in mind some of the places he visits on his trips, I can only assume he is going to Russia within the next week or two to get some more ideas on how to run this country. Certainly if any member of the House spent as much time in iron curtain countries as he does, there would be quite a large dossier on him in Ottawa.

I contend that if the credit difficulties on farms to which I have referred are ignored, then the government will end up owning the farms of this country by default. The government itself will be in the farming business. The measures brought before the House are designed to give the government control, control and more control. If the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) brings in legislation that is anything like the proposals contained in his white paper, then the government will control other segments of industry.

There was an interesting article in yesterday's Edmonton Journal regarding an announcement made by the Prime Minister in Vancouver. The article is headed "PM suggests city for youth in the north" and reads as follows:

> Prime Minister Trudeau suggested Monday that 10,000 Canadian youths could begin a new city in Canada's northlands.
> In a television interview the Prime Minister said building such a city would test the values of Canadian youth. He also suggested the government would be willing to help.
> "You've got some engineers, you've got some doctors, you've got some groovy people—people who want to live in communes—go and stake out a new city up there."
>
> Mr. Trudeau said that building roads in Newfoundland or paving the Alaska Highway would not satisfy Canadian youth today because they want to find different types of projects. He said he is sure the government will help set up such structures if there is a real desire for it.
> Mr. Trudeau was in Vancouver for the beginning of a royal tour marking the British Columbia centennial.

Although the Prime Minister is talking of starting a beautiful city in the north for youth, he does not say how that city is to be supported. I do not know whether he plans to support such a city with welfare, or whether he plans to send all the farmers who are going broke to the north to populate this new city.

Mr. Baldwin: Not one; we need five.

Mr. Downey: Yes, at least that many. Most urban dwellers would go along with the idea of putting more money into the agricultural industry if they realized the consequences of its failure in terms of social costs, the decrease in the cost of living and the associated problems. It is far more important that we maintain the price of farm produce, giving these people some real income rather than loans or cash advances. This must be the cheapest and most logical form of assistance we can provide in order to continue our success as a nation.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), although I was under the impression he had spoken. If that is not the case, he now has the floor.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I do not intent to take up too much time but there are one or two points in the bill that I think are worthy of note. I think it is good that it makes provision for cash advances under circumstances of crop failure because of an early snowfall. This provision regularizes something which has been done on two or three occasions when such action was necessary to handle the marketing of tough or damp grain. I hope this measure will correct some of the errors which were encountered as a result of the last amendments made.

While payments under this bill will be severe as far as farmers are concerned, hopefully the farmer will not find himself in a position of obtaining cash advances and not being able to deliver grain until a succeeding crop year, hence not being able to make repayment. Farmers often find themselves in the very difficult position of having received advance payments on a year's crop, then not being able to make deliveries and ending up with an extremely limited income. Whether or not the provisions of this bill will avoid that difficulty, only time will tell. I suppose this will depend to a large extent on the volume of grain sold.

When looking at the present level of wheat quotas I am concerned whether we will attain the projected eight-bushel quota at the end of this crop year. If we do, it will only be on a lower acreage basis than that which existed a year ago. I have not looked up the figure, but I suspect it will not be more than two-thirds of what it was before the Lift program came into effect, with the consequential slowdown on wheat acreage.

Mr. Horner: This will involve 50 per cent.

Mr. Gleave: As I say, this depends on the ability of farmers to deliver. The deliveries in April have been much higher than they were last year. This will take care of some of the outstanding advances. The sooner those advances are paid up or dealt with in some manner, the better off farmers will be. I agree with the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey). If you get out into the country and talk to farmers, credit unions and bankers you will find that things are in tough shape. This situation will continue until the question of cash advances have been cleaned up and there is sufficient cash to take care of immediate needs.

I am somewhat concerned about clause 6 of this bill. It proposes that if a producer pays in cash instead of paying through the delivery of grain, interest will be charged. As I remember, the minister said there might be producers who would borrow money through cash advances with no intention of paying it back in grain. They might market their grain in some other way or perhaps use it as feed. This was the argument advanced by the minister in respect of this clause. I do not think this is a good idea. If a farmer obtains a cash advance and finds another way of selling his grain instead of putting it through the elevator system, why not encourage him to do so?

A farmer might decide to buy feeder cattle. That farmer might be able to obtain up to $6,000 in cash advances. This would not go very far toward the purchase of the feeder cattle, but if a farmer can accomplish this and pay back the $3,000, $4,000 or $6,000, why should we worry about it? I do not really see the point. There may be some justification for worry or concern about an individual who is able to borrow this amount of money and invests it in a trust company. There are some people who do this, but anyone who is in a position to follow this procedure is indeed in the minority.

I believe this measure will be discriminatory as between a farmer who chooses to market his grain and the farmer who decides to use it to feed cattle. Another farmer may very well decide to obtain a cash advance and sell his grain to a feed company. Such a farmer would no doubt be selling grain to the company at a discounted price. Very few farmers manage to sell grain to a feed company or mill at a price equal to the price they might eventually realize. The farmers who do so are prepared to accept a discounted price in order to move the grain. Grain sold in this way does not go through the system. For these reasons I do not think the provision under clause 6 in respect of the amount of money it would bring into the coffers of the treasury would be worth the trouble of including it in the legislation. This, of course, is a matter of opinion and it is my opinion for what it is worth. We have many opinions in this House, but at least this is how I see it. I suppose when we get to the committee we will be out of order in moving such an amendment because it will have to do with the provision of government funds. But if I were able to move an amendment I would move that this provision be deleted.

I hope in the future the government will treat this cash advance legislation and such a proposal exactly as it is. It should not be treated as a substitute for sales of grain but merely as a convenience or device to allow some flexibility in the flow of grain to market, thereby relieving the pressure on the farmer who for a temporary period is unable to get his grain to market and realize money on it. That was the original objective of this program when it was proposed, incidentally, by the Farmers Union, accepted by the Conservative government and put into effect. This was the original objective of the proposal and this is what should be expected of it. It should not be expected that this proposal is a substitute for doing a good and effective job of marketing grain and getting it into the hands of those who can sell it and return the cash to the farmer.

It might help to slow down to some extent the depopulation of our rural areas which is taking place. I spoke to a dealer in a small town the other day and he informed me that in his area 21 farmers had closed out this year. This is not a large area. It is not as large as Biggar or Humboldt in the minister's constituency. It is a relatively small town with a more or less normal trading area. I know there are those in government—in fact, policy papers have been produced on this subject by the government—who believe we should drastically reduce the number of farmers. In fact, the methods have been set out. If I might quote from one of their papers, they say the problem becomes one of increasing the rate of adjustment and of finding ways and means of facilitating adjustment both within agriculture and between agriculture and the rest of the economy. On another page they say these policies depend for their operational efficiency on the effectiveness of the first set of programs, those designed to increase the mobility of the resources and grease the wheels of the adjustment process. What they really mean is to grease the skids of the adjustment process.

Let me take this opportunity to say to the government that it is much easier to get people out of agriculture than it is to get them back in it. The trend in practically all industrialized societies such as our own is for the population to move from rural areas to the cities. It is very rare—at least, I do not know of any such example—that there is a trend to move from the city back into farming. People go from the city to the country in order to indulge in a hobby, or something like that, but not for the purpose of operating a farm. So I take this opportunity to say that the government should get a few practical people to sit among their advisers before they go completely overboard on this course which they obviously have set for themselves.

It is much easier to destroy the structure of a rural society than it is at some later point in time to rebuild it into a structure which the planners think is desirable. It is much more difficult, for example, to plan a totally rural society than it is to plan an urban society, because in one case we are dealing with the forces of nature which are not under our control. In the city we have much greater control over the forces of nature and therefore much more control over any plan thought to be desirable. This is not always, in fact very rarely, true of the farming community. So, Mr. Speaker, having said this I shall close by urging the minister to give consideration to reviewing the position taken with regard to interest being paid on cash advances in the circumstances described in Clause 6.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in general I must support Bill C-239 as being necessary at the present time for our agricultural community in the west, although I deplore it in the sense that it is too bad we have to have it. This means that the products of the farm do not move fast enough and in large enough volume to provide the income necessary to maintain a viable farm economy without the assistance of legislation such as this. This type of legislation has been around for some time. I have been a member only since 1968 and therefore am not too familiar with the previous regulations. However, the advent of the new quota system or new regulations has no doubt meant that there must be considerable change in this piece of legislation. In general I would have to support it.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the grain farmers of western Canada are entering the most regulated period they have ever experienced or since the advent of farming in western Canada. The other day I spoke to a farmer 77 years of age who is still active. He has been farming since the First World War. He told me he had never seen such a regulated period when there was so much uncertainty concerning what a farmer should do and what he should sow in the coming year.

Although the aim of the regulations is to assist farmers, presumably, in planning logically, I should like to inform the minister that my experience is that this spring the farmers are more at sea than ever before. When I ask them what they are going to plant this year, how they feel the regulations will affect them and how the quotas will affect them, the answer I receive is, "I don't know". Then I ask what they are going to plant and they say they intend to plant a little of everything no matter whether they should or not, because they will have it on hand and hope they can sell it in order to get by and remain alive on the farm.

The advent of these regulations is very important. Just the other day the minister brought forward an amendment to the Wheat Board Act which will give the board jurisdiction over the sale of flaxseed, rye and rapeseed. Rapeseed in particular has been a very important commodity in the last few years and certainly in my area it has spelled the difference between an almost disastrous year and one which has been reasonable for many farmers.

The unfortunate announcement of the minister was made apparently without discussion with the rapeseed producers, the provincial Rapeseed Association of Canada and the crushers in western Canada. This would allow the government to take over rapeseed and put it under the Wheat Board. I believe the minister has stated publicly that the government does not intend at this time to bring rapeseed under the Wheat Board. Regardless of this, everyone knows—even those members of the public who are unfamiliar with the government—that this legislation enables the government to put rapeseed under the Wheat Board without referring the matter to Parliament, and indicates the government's intention.

What has been the effect of this announcement on the industry? So far, the cancellation of open contracts has been considerable. On May 3, 101 contracts were cancelled, representing 5,000 bushels, and on April 30 there were 418 fewer contracts. This means that there has been a sharp drop in open contracts for rapeseed on the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, with a consequent drop in sales and pricing.

Notwithstanding the fact that the minister gave the assurance that there was no intention at this time to bring oilseed under the Wheat Board, his announcement has had a bad effect at a time when we are most anxious that rapeseed production be expanded. I think everyone is hopeful that it will be expanded but we must remember that the market in rapeseed is very competitive. We are competing against soybeans and safflower oil throughout the world.

I hope the minister can give a firm assurance to the trade and to our exporters that the placing of rapeseed under the Wheat Board will not be detrimental to our trade and will not impede in any way either the selling or the buying of rapeseed on world markets. Some people believe that the Japanese exporters and crushers have been in favour of having rapeseed under the Wheat Board. Others have stated that it is not so. It would be most interesting to know just what the facts are.

There is another item in the bill which I think is important, that is, the provision regarding the phasing out of the levy for PFAA. I am sure that over the years the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has been a very useful piece of legislation. It has been almost social legislation in that it has helped small producers and small farmers to keep going for another year. I know of a considerable number of small farmers who have benefited from PFAA. I do not know what program, if any, the government intends to put forward in place of PFAA but I would like to remind the minister that the grain stabilization program does not in any way assist small producers who experience a crop failure. This program has not always been favoured by the large and efficient producers but it has assisted small farm units to stay viable and it has kept families on the farm for another year.

Now I would like to make a few comments on the bill itself. I should like to say a few words on the setting of interest rates. The bill mentions that the prescribed interest rate is to be set by the cabinet. I hope that the interest rate on advance payments will not be any greater than the interest rate on farm improvement loans. I am afraid that the interest rate on cash advances may be increased to such an extent that it would become a hardship to the individual producer taking out an advance payment, particularly at a time when he may be in difficulty.

There are plenty of precedents for the setting of a maximum interest rate and I am sure it could be worked out satisfactorily. My suggestion is that the interest rate on cash payments should be no higher than at present, and lower if possible, because we are dealing with an individual who is taking a cash advance at a time when he is in financial difficulty.

Turning now to the matter of repayment, it seems to me that an attempt is made to close a gap that should not be closed. I am referring to a farmer repaying a cash advance which was taken out on another product, for instance cash from the sale of cattle, or hogs or of other products, the interest on which he would have to pay from the day he took out the cash advance. I think this provision indicates that the government is overzealous. I think that the producer who thought he would not be able to deliver his grain and turned his attention to a feeding program should receive the benefit of the doubt.

I would point out to the minister that a producer could well get around this provision by horse-trading with a neighbour and suggesting to him that in order to avoid paying the interest he would borrow barley. They would then split the interest, and although each of them would be out by a small amount the government would not recover anything. I think this provision lends itself to manipulation and it does not make for good business. We have to assume that those who take cash advances do so in good faith and will be reasonably honest in fulfilling their commitments.

I also think that the interest rate should not be charged from the day the cash advance is made, but from the day the farmer is declared in default. It is only fair that this should be so. It seems unfortunate that when a farmer is in default, interest must be paid from the day when the cash advance was made. Most people who are in default are in this situation not through any fault of their own but because they guessed wrongly and are genuinely poor business people. They are not in default because of some illegal transaction. Therefore, I strongly urge the minister that the legislation be reconsidered so that interest is charged when an individual is declared in default.

The formula on which advance payments will be estimated seems to be quite complicated and presents some difficulties. I will be glad to hear what the minister has to say about this in committee. So far as the Wheat Board is concerned, presumably by August 1 they will have to estimate how many bushels of grain they expect to sell. Then they will have to estimate the number of acres that will be designated by the producers and, finally, according to my interpretation of the legislation, they will have to estimate the grade which will contain the largest number of bushels and which they will be able to sell. But turning to the individual producer, Mr. Speaker, presumably by August 1 he will be able to apply for a cash advance based on his own designated acres. However, it would appear that during the ensuing fall, as I understand the quota system, the suggestion is that a farmer will be able to redesignate his acres, partly on the basis of what he has grown that year, how his crop has turned out, and presumably also on what basis he hopes the particular grain will move.

I can see some difficulties for a producer in not being able to supply the grain required that he has designated, if for instance he took a cash advance on his permit book as designated on August 1 and yet in October he had a chance to redesignate his acres. As a result, it might be hard for him to deliver the grain. Individual producers may find themselves in an unenviable, almost impossible situation in having their advances repaid by the end of the current crop year.

Like other hon. members who have had experience with the Lift program, I would not say that operation Lift as conceived, particularly so far as the regulations were concerned, was an unqualified success. I think history will show it was of less value than other programs which might have been introduced. All hon. members have had cases brought to their attention where the regulations seemed to work a hardship even upon the farmer who had studied the matter carefully, planned his acres in 1970 in order to get the benefit of the program and yet found himself unable to realize the benefit because of the regulations.

I urge the minister to supply each individual taking a cash advance with a booklet or folder, written in layman's language, giving an explanation of the regulations and the law. I do not think it is enough that the elevator agent be the one who is in charge of the regulations on a local level, or the agricultural representatives, because even they became confused about the meaning of some of the Lift regulations. This at least would give the farmer something to hang his hat on. It would give the individual farmer a chance to make sure that he would not be caught-out contravening the regulations.

In my area some farmers were left out of the Lift program and suffered loss of income even thought they applied to the so-called experts. Due to the late spring and fall in 1969, wheat acreage in Manitoba dropped considerably. In other words, Manitoba farmers did in 1969 what farmers in Saskatchewan and Alberta did in 1970; they reduced their wheat acreage. In recognition of the 1969 drop in wheat acreage and of the unfairness in taking only 1969 as the yardstick, the department, the minister and the Wheat Board agreed to allow 1968 to be used. In brief, the agricultural representatives, or ag reps as they are known everywhere in western Canada, and other people in the Manitoba Department of Agriculture met with the officials who were administering the Lift regulations and most of them were under the impression, particularly one in my area, that if 1968 wheat acres were to be used then the 1969 summerfallow and forage acres had to be used.

This went on all through the summer of 1970 and farmers who were working under the Lift program and hoping to benefit relied on this. However, a problem arose and was referred to the department for a ruling and a ruling was made in November or December, 1970, that if 1968 wheat acres were to be used then the 1968 acres of summerfallow and forage also had to be used. Farmers who were under the impression that the 1969 summerfallow and forage acres had to be used had planned their 1970 crops and plantings on that basis, but now sadly found they were out of luck. A good many of them were out as much as $300 or $400. Many of them were farmers who could have planted rapeseed and done much better by doing so. I suspect there are still some farmers who are unaware that they were eligible to use their 1968 summerfallow and forage acres and as a result have not applied.

I am sure that the Lift officials, who have been most helpful in making sure that those who qualified have received the utmost attention, are aware of this situation, but I deplore the fact that the ruling was not made until November. It should have been made before March or April of 1970. For this reason, again I urge the minister to supply people taking cash advances with an explanatory folder or other document to prevent unnecessary mistakes being made and consequently unnecessary suffering for individuals. I hope answers will be given to some of these questions in the committee. I also think that improvements can be made to the bill.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at length on this bill. I can well imagine the thoughts that are going through your mind as well as the thoughts of hon. members whose constituencies are not greatly concerned with agriculture. It may seem strange to a number of hon. members who represent urban ridings that we on this side of the House seem to be opposing most of the agricultural legislation that the government is putting before parliament.

Hon. members have heard my colleagues say today that there are many good features in Bill C-239 regarding cash advances for farmers. It is right that they should say that, because in the first place this legislation was put on the books by a Conservative government at a time when the Liberals said it could not be done. It was done and it did work. But I am at variance to a slight degree with some of my colleagues because, if I understood the minister correctly, this bill does impose another restriction on the farmer.

In the first place, the government has control of what the grain farmer sells, and later I will have something to say about the cattle industry and this government's legislation in that regard. As most people here and anybody who reads the newspapers know, the grain farmers have had many problems. Coming from the area he does, the minister is in an ideal position to realize that and he must know that the problems are the result of the agricultural legislation introduced by the present government. When I read this bill it seems to me that the minister is handing out a few kudos but is changing the agreement with the farmers in regard to cash advances which were satisfactory to the farmers, to make them demand notes.

As any businessman knows, one of the prime requisites of establishing a business is operating capital. Without this he would be bankrupt. It may well be that this government is endeavouring to bankrupt people engaged in agriculture. Their whole agricultural policy is based on the idea that agriculture in Canada must be reduced. The reason I say this is because with state control, which I think all this legislation is directed toward, production can be controlled to the markets you want. However, I do not think this is what our western farmers want.

The explanatory note of this bill reads:

> This amendment is consequential on the proposed change in the rate of interest payable on an advance payment in certain circumstances from a fixed rate of 6 per cent to a top rate prescribed for the crop year in which the advance payment was made.

Is this prescribed rate a bank rate, an international, stabilized rate or is it a rate set by some bureaucrat in Ottawa? There are many clauses in the bill which relate to interest. The minister has said, and I assume this to be the case, the main part of the bill is an adjustment of interest and method of payment. It must be remembered that it is through no fault of their own that farmers cannot pay the interest and principal. They have the grain stacked up to the eaves, but because this government is negligent in getting rid of that grain the farmers are without a cash return. I blame the government because, unlike other countries, they have control of the marketing of grain and have accepted that responsibility. We know that markets exist and wonder why they are not selling the grain. Surely the government's policy should be oriented toward marketing and production, not reduction.

The minister has tried to tell us that there are no markets for our grain. In a moment I shall ask him whether this government has turned down any sales this year. We understand that if the transportation system were reorganized there would be markets at the points of delivery. When the strike came there was no grain in position and sales had to be turned down. The farmers are trapped by the inaction of this government and now it is trying to penalize them by increasing the interest on the money they owe and by trying to make a demand note out of an existing agreement. This agreement is to be cancelled because the government has the power to do it. That is what they have always wanted—power.

Just yesterday the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) asked where this whole thing had started. It started in 1963 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a speech to the Liberal party down east and said they wanted power. The people of Canada gave them that power. I hope the people engaged in agriculture understand the result of it, and I am sure they are sorry. If the coupons I receive daily are any indication, I am sure former supporters of the government have changed their views. I doubt if any Liberal, including the minister, could be elected dog-catcher in western Canada right now. I know what has happened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) in his riding in southeastern Alberta because I receive many letters from his constituents asking me to oppose the legislation that he is trying to put through the House.

My whole argument, Mr. Speaker, is that this government is doing its utmost to destroy the agricultural industry, and I ask why this is so. I am informed that their premise is based on the analysis that of the 430,000 farmers in Canada, some 200,000 are redundant. Farm organizations and farm economists are coming to the conclusion that the policy of the government—I have already said that their policy is one of reduction—is not to raise the productivity of these 200,000 farmers but to get them out of agriculture.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, if you have heard all the arguments and will listen to other arguments as these agricultural bills come before the House you will understand that is the reason the government is implementing these measures at the present time. I do not really blame this minister for what he is doing to agriculture, any more than I blame the Minister of Agriculture for what he has done, because I believe both are just puppets. They are not even good front-men. The whole thing goes back to the philosophy of the Prime Minister. I will say this about the Prime Minister; I do not think he has told an untruth but it has taken some of us a long time to catch on to what he meant. At a meeting in Toronto he was trying to explain the white paper on tax reform and said:

> We will not be bullied or blackmailed by hysterical charges and threats. Such tactics will not distract us from the fundamental objective of our reform. In many ways our white papers introduce a new concept of government for Canada.

He has diligently followed that course ever since. What is that new concept of government for Canada? Surely the people are entitled to know, rather than to be hoodwinked by this piecemeal legislation, this destructive legislation that the minister is trying to introduce in regard to agriculture. Do not forget that one of the quickest ways to put people out of the agricultural business is to take from them any operating capital they might have. I suggest that this bill is designed to take away from them any operating capital that they have.

This bill says that interest will be charged on loans right from the beginning, from the time the loan is taken out. The previous legislation said that farmers would be given a certain period in which no interest would be charged. That has been changed. As one of my colleagues in the House has said, the government is trying to legislate people off the farms. It is doing a good job in getting them out of agriculture. That is what is happening and that is the purpose of this government. As the Prime Minister said, we need a new concept of government for Canada. What is that new concept? I have a good idea: I suggest that it involves government control, state control, social control or whatever you want to call it. In short, it is government control.

The hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) said, without touching on this subject in quite the same way as I have, that the government is forcing farmers out of business. I wish I had been sitting close to the hon. member when he spoke, because I would have suggested to him that that is the purpose of this government. They are pursuing their purpose. They are trying to force 200,000 farmers off the land and making a good job of it. The minister tried to correct the hon. member for Battle River and suggested that he did not understand the situation. I say to the minister that we do not understand his philosophy or that of the government. When he goes back to his constituency on the Prairies he will have difficulty in making the people he represents understand his philosophy. I dare say that many things have changed since he first came to this House.

May I now talk about the income of farmers. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the Dominion Bureau of Statistics shows that at least 85 per cent of a farmer's income goes toward operating costs on the farm. If this legislation is passed, a farmer's operating costs will rise by another couple of percentage points and he will be left with between 12 or 13 per cent of gross income for operating his farm. Farmers today will tell you that it cannot be done. Their gross income is not large enough, and the reason is government inactivity or activity in the wrong direction. I suggest that the government should be bending their efforts toward marketing and production.

Mr. Horner: Hear, hear!

Mr. McIntosh: Is it not strange that within the last few years Canada, with its great prairies and great potential, with its eastern regions and its north, and so on, has become an importer of agricultural products if one excludes grain. We have imported more than we have exported. The net income of the livestock industry has been over $1 billion, yet the last figures I have of imports and exports suggest that Canada in 1968 imported over $1 billion worth of agricultural products. To me that is ridiculous. It is ridiculous that a country like Canada, with only 22 million people and the potential of producing all the agricultural produce we want, should import agricultural produce.

I say again that the task of this government ought to be the search for markets. The markets are there, if we want them. If our transportation and handling systems are inadequate, then for gosh sakes let us change them. I am sure that the people of Canada will not mind any money we vote to rectify that situation.

We have made suggestions from time to time which the government has ignored. We have suggested the building of all-weather terminals in positions which will enable ships to come to them in winter and summer and take away our produce. The government has ignored these ideas. We ought to build terminals in Europe and elsewhere near our markets so that we have ready access to any customer. Also, no customer ought to be too small. The minister ought to learn from some of the business people operating in that part of the country he represents. Let him look at the subsidiary of a large company, the Canadian subsidiary of Imperial Oil. That company handles millions and millions of dollars' worth of products. The people on the Prairies know that Imperial Oil is concerned about small markets as much as big markets. I th'nk all oil companies are. I have mentioned Imperial Oil because I know about it. Practically every oil company on the Prairies will send a service truck to a farm at almost any time to deliver any number of gallons of gas or oil that the farmer wants. The oil companies are hungry for business.

That reminds me of what happened when we had surpluses prior to 1957. The attitude of the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Howe, was this: If customers want our produce, let them come and get it. Anybody with any experience in business knows that the customer will not come unless you entice him or invite him to come and see your product. We produce the best agricultural products in the world right here in Canada, and the minister says that we cannot sell them. I would hate to let some American salesmen in here and get hold of our products. They sell an inferior product but they get markets for their grain. American salesmen have gone into the world markets with an inferior product and taken away our customers from under our noses. This is ridiculous.

Perhaps I am finding too much fault with the minister. Presumably he is an intelligent man. He has been a member of this House for some time and dealing with our wheat problems. He knows the problems that are encountered in the selling of wheat. What excuses has he made? At one time he blamed the government's failure on the cold weather which froze the trains and did not permit the grain to be put into the correct positions. The next time he said it was a strike and once more it was impossible to get the grain into position. Similar problems have been encountered by previous governments.

Surely this government can learn its lessons. If we ought to be searching for markets, I wish the minister would say why he is not doing so. Why is he not putting his efforts forward in that direction? Surely there must be some merit in our suggestions. As I said before, if the minister supports the Prime Minister's policy of reducing the number of farmers, he is going about it in the right way. I do not know what the advantage of that action will be, Mr. Speaker: I fail to understand it.

May I refer for a few moments to the minister's remarks on introducing this bill. He said, as reported at page 5491 of Hansard:

> The bill before the House to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act is a further step in attempting to rationalize and improve the situation of the grains industry of this country.

I cannot understand how he could make a statement like that. He went on to say:

> Over a period of recent months, we did a significant number of things to allow the farmer to put his remarkable efficiency to better use by improving the system which faced him and over which he had no control.

He admitted that farmers have no control over the way grain is handled at present, that it is the responsibility of the government to sell the grain and that it is not living up to that responsibility. He went on to say:

> Perhaps the most notable thing done which is related to this bill was the alteration in the quota system announced for next year by the Wheat Board, which was in part also in effect this year.

I remember what he said when introducing the Lift program legislation. What that program was to do for the western farmer! What it was to do with regard to the enormous surpluses we had on hand! I am sure the minister now realizes that that program backfired. Certainly, its purpose was to reduce the production of grain and it reduced that production. But why was that done in an expanding market? Has anybody ever heard such a thing? That is hard to understand. He went on to say:

> As a result of that change in the quota system, the ancient special bias toward wheat compared with other grains has been removed in order that the farmers' decisions about which grains to grow might be more directly related to market conditions—

What market conditions was he referring to? The market conditions that he has created within Canada? Or was he talking about worldwide market conditions? If he was talking about worldwide market conditions, I would ask him to take another look at them. Either he is getting wrong advice from his advisers, reading the wrong books or acting in the wrong manner.

• (5:20 p.m.)

I ask the minister who represents western Canada to change his philosophy with regard to marketing grain to one which will be beneficial to those engaged in agriculture. Do not put these people off the farms. They are going to be necessary. One cannot pick up a paper today that does not deplore the fact that there are many starving people in this world. I don't know how we should get the food to where there is a problem, but we have the food and are capable of producing much more. This is one matter in which the minister should be interested.

Contrary to the belief of most people in Canada, there are very few subsidies paid to the agricultural industry in this country. This industry has less protection here than it has in any other country. The European Common Market is having difficulty trying to control production. Possibly the European Market is based on the same idea that the present government has, namely, the control of the industry. I am told it is not what you know about agriculture, but who you know and whether you can get a licence. I hope it does not come to that, but I am afraid it might.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McIntosh: There will be more said about this matter in a few moments. All the legislation which this government is bringing forth on behalf of the agricultural industry points toward that type of trend—control, control, control. Canadians are asking the purpose of this. Is this participatory democracy? If so, we do not want it.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): We agree with the need for cash advances at this time, Mr. Speaker, and admit that the climate in which producers operate is far from ideal. If this were not so, there would not be any need for cash advances. I remember the good old days when the farmer's produce could be sold. When a producer is forced to accept cash advances because he has no other way of obtaining cash, he is put in a position of being in debt to the government. With these amendments, this will be done at an increased rate of interest. I am sure it is rather frightening to the producers to realize that they are becoming more and more dependent upon the government as well as more in debt. This seems to be in line with the government's take-over policy, its desire to get control of this industry and to take over the land. This is something which must be watched in the future.

When discussing farm legislation in Canada we are always at a disadvantage when we realize one fact. This was ably pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey). The fact is that this government is niggardly in its policy of assisting agriculture in comparison with governments of other countries with which our producers must compete on the world market.

I have some interesting DBS figures respecting the grain growing provinces of Canada. If Your Honour will bear with me, I will quote the figures for the three Prairie provinces. Farm cash receipts from farming operations in Manitoba dropped from $351 million plus in 1969 to $336 million plus in 1970. In Saskatchewan, farm cash receipts dropped from $709,703,000 in 1969 to $690,996,000 in 1970. In Alberta, they dropped from $727,471,000 in 1969 to $694,104,000 in 1970. These are the total farm cash receipts for those provinces. They are very significant figures.

I would like to comment on the point made by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) concerning the regulations for any government program. I emphasize the fact that the regulations sent out to farmers with regard to the Lift program were not clearly understood. If they were clear, they were not understood. In fact, they were misunderstood to the extent that there was confusion and a resultant loss of income.

In the former legislation, specific advances of $1 a bushel for wheat, 40 cents for oats and 70 cents for barley were allowed. This is no longer the case. This bill contributes to the government's argument for having rye, rapeseed and flaxseed under the Wheat Board. I wish to read the following passage from the May 1 edition of the Free Press Weekly:

> Canadian-Wheat Board Minister Otto Lang put his head on the chopping block of prairie farm opinion last week by introducing a Commons amendment that could give the board marketing control of flax, rye and rapeseed.
> If it became law, the proposed amendment to the Wheat Board Act would give Ottawa order in council power to lump flax, rye and rapeseed together with the three grains the CWB now controls, namely wheat, barley and oats.
> Despite Mr. Lang's statement that no such permissive legislative provision would be implemented without "thorough discussion" between the federal government and those affected by a possible changed status of flax, rye and rapeseed, the prairie grain trade—and especially rapeseed grower groups—made their opposition crystal clear.

It is interesting to note what was said by a former member of this House, the former member for Assiniboia who was a grain farmer and quite knowledgeable on these matters. I quote from page 3403 of Hansard of February 15:

> If farmers themselves were making decisions about the level of initial payments, it might be defensible to suggest that they be held responsible for any consequent losses; but since the Wheat Board is not a producer-controlled board the government should continue to stand behind the initial prices they set.

Clause 7 of this bill has removed the statutory amount that the government may advance to farmers for their crops. In his speech yesterday the minister stated that listing the amount available for a cash advance would tend to encourage certain production. By not having anything listed or available, the farmer is left in the dark about what to plant this spring. It has been my experience that if you take the advice of the government through the Department of Agriculture you can be in more trouble than if you had not heard the advice in the first place.

These changes are hard on the small farmer. We might say, "What else is new?" First, there is an increased rate of interest. There is no guidance as to what to grow. As I have said, we might be better off if we did not know. It is also possible that prairie farm assistance will be withdrawn. All of this discourages farmers from becoming flexible and at the same time seems to make the powers of the government more flexible. It all seems to be aimed at the removal, even the eradication, of the small family farm in this country.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, as I view this piece of legislation I consider it to be part of the government's grand design to take absolute control of the agricultural industry. It is merely one part of several legislative items, the most important of which is probably Bill C-176, also before the House at the present time. There is also legislation dealing with the stabilization of incomes in the western agricultural economy, and legislation proposing the expansion of control of the Canadian Wheat Board over rye, rapeseed and flaxseed. As far as I am concerned, none of these proposals will have the effect of aiding the western agricultural economy.

I was interested in the minister's description of this proposal as one further step in allowing the farmer to put his remarkable efficiency to better use. This appears to me to be another example of the government's perversion of words, probably the best example of which is its use of the word "reform". The classic example of this is the government's white paper containing proposals for tax reform. Most people consider a reform to be a change for the better. In my view there is nothing in the tax proposals—which are really an attempt to gouge more money out of the people—that changes things for the better.

With regard to the present proposal to allow the farmer to increase his efficiency, on a fairly close look at the legislation I can find nothing that allows the farmer to do anything, though I do find that people other than farmers are allowed to do certain things. For example, this legislation allows the government to change the present 6 per cent interest rate to a rate that is euphemistically called the appropriate prescribed rate. The people of Canada have had experience before of Liberal governments which started to fiddle around with interest rates. The Bank Act was amended during the last Parliament so as to permit an increase in interest rates from 6 per cent. A great many of us have had cause to regret this change. I cannot say that I had any responsibility for it because the change was made before I came to this Parliament, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the action taken by the former Parliament has had an adverse effect on my pocketbook.

The argument was used at that time that, although there might be a temporary increase in interest rates, competitive forces would prevail and in the long haul the economy would be better off with the freeing of the interest rate. As we all know, the tight money situation continued to prevail after the interest rate was freed and the interest rate went up. I can only look on this proposal to change the fixed rate to a varying rate as an effort by the government to increase the interest rate on loans made under this legislation, which I do not think is an appropriate thing to do at this time, particularly in this segment of the economy.

The legislation would also allow the government to decide, after an advance has been made, how the money will be repaid from deliveries, that is to say, what proportion of a delivery will have to be taken by the government in repayment of any advance. At least, that is how I interpret the legislation; if I am wrong I am sure the minister will correct me.

The legislation also allows the government to direct the farmer to deliver the kind of grain that it wants delivered. I really cannot see, as I have already said, how this legislation allows the farmer to do anything. It simply allows the government and its bureaucratic servants, who do exactly what they are told by the executive, to direct the farmer in the discharge of his occupation. It allows the government to vary the rate per bushel and the number of bushels per quota acre on which advance payments may be based. So that we do not know with certainty what will be the effect of this legislation.

This brings me to another point and it is the question of certainty. In his introductory remarks I believe the minister said that this legislation would help the farmer decide what he was going to grow. The bill provides that the decision as to the rate per bushel and the number of bushels per quota acre will be set by the Governor in Council immediately prior to the commencement of the crop year. If that is the case, I think serious consideration should be given to changing the date of the commencement of the crop year since August 1 is surely well into the growing season of any crop that is produced in western Canada.

If these rates are set during the month of July, which would be immediately before the commencement of the crop year, then seeds will long since have been put into the ground and the setting of the rate will be of no assistance whatever to the farmer in determining what he should plant in order to enable him to take advantage of this legislation. This is assuming that the legislation is in fact designed to benefit the farmer, though I doubt that it is. There is no way in which the farmer can intelligently plan a crop on the basis of an announcement that is going to be made in the month of July, a time when seeding has been completed. At the very latest, seeding is completed by the middle of June, though in most cases earlier than that.

The minister says that this legislation is another step in rationalizing and improving the grain industry. In my view it is another example of the government's perversion of words and their proper meaning. Just what has this meant in other cases? In the case of the railroads it has meant a reduction in service, and in many cases no service. In agriculture, this process of rationalization has produced a catastrophic situation that is seriously straining the strong and destroying the weak.

The rationalization program relating to agriculture also envisages a reduction in the number of elevator delivery points to which farmers can take their grain. This rationalization program has in fact resulted in a swelling of the welfare rolls in our cities and the ranks of the unemployed in general.

What about some of the steps the minister seems to be so proud of, many of which form the basis of this legislation? Quite frankly, I have not yet met one farmer in my riding who has anything good to say about this government's approach to the agricultural economy. In an effort to find out the true facts of this matter I sent out a questionnaire to every farm home in my constituency. On the basis of a 25 per cent return it disclosed the following points. The first question I asked was, "Do you feel the federal government's attitude towards rural Canada is satisfactory?" In answer to that question 6 per cent said they were satisfied and 86 per cent said they were not satisfied. During the last election the Liberal candidate in my riding received about 30 per cent of the votes. It is gratifying to see that this support has been reduced.

Dealing directly with what this government has done and is proposing to do, I asked a question regarding approval of the block system of handling grain. As a result I found that 61 per cent of the residents indicated they thought this was an improvement over the old system and only 19 per cent were of another opinion, leaving 20 per cent undecided.

The program which is causing most disappointment in my riding at the present time is Lift. The question asked was, "In your opinion was Lift a successful program?" Some 25 per cent answered yes, 67 per cent answered no and 8 per cent were undecided. The government has also taken steps in respect of what it refers to as the reform of the quota system. The question asked was, "Do you approve of the new quota system?" The response was more evenly divided in that 39 per cent said yes, 47 per cent said no and 14 per cent were undecided.

The matter of rye, flax and rapeseed is very important in relation to the legislation before us, in that it proposes to bring these grains under the provisions of this measure. The question asked was, "Do you feel rye, flax and rapeseed should be brought under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board?" In response to this question 32 per cent said yes, 57 per cent said no and 11 per cent of the respondents were undecided.

The government has also indicated it is going to make changes in handling charges for grain with a view to increasing these charges. In response to a question, 84 per cent were opposed to this step, 9 per cent approved and 7 per cent were undecided. The stabilization program envisages the termination of payments under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act. In response to a question in this regard, 30 per cent approved, 47 per cent disapproved and 23 per cent were undecided.

The major legislative proposal of the government is to be found in Bill C-176. This questionnaire was conducted during the month of March and I believe the figures would be somewhat different at this time. In any event, I give the government the benefit of the doubt because I am sure its position has not been improved as a result of this legislation. The next question asked was, "Are you in favour of national marketing boards administered by the government controlling production and sales?" In response, 11 per cent said yes, 84 per cent said no and 5 per cent were undecided.

Another interesting fact disclosed by this questionnaire was the attitude these people have in respect of the Canadian Wheat Board. No one used to be critical of this board. In fact, it was something of a sacred cow in western Canada. Anyone who had the temerity to criticize it was running quite a risk because it was a popular measure at one time. As a result of the administration of this government, I find that the feeling in my constituency has changed. The question asked was, "Do you feel the Canadian Wheat Board is doing a satisfactory job?" The response was 37 per cent in favour, 55 per cent opposed and 8 per cent undecided. That is a very sad commentary on the administration of this government; 55 per cent of the farmers in my riding are not satisfied with the job they are doing.

This legislation creates uncertainty. Farmers will not be aware at seeding time of possible advance payments or what grains should be grown to satisfy repayment of advances obtained. This measure does not assist farmers very much. According to the minister's remarks it is designed to discourage wheat production. I do not know how the minister can reconcile this with the government's own assessment of the situation regarding wheat. In "Mini Outlook March '71", a publication of the Department of Agriculture, economics branch, we find this statement at page 26:

> For the first six months of the 1970-71 crop year (ending January 27), Canadian exports were 192 million bushels compared with 120 for the similar period in 1969-70. Sales opportunities have improved this crop year. In addition, Canadian wheat is competing strongly on world markets and the government's expanded credit program has been facilitating sales to developing countries. Quantities needed for seed are likely to increase by 10 million bushels.

On page 27 of the same publication we find that there is a continuation of Canada's more competitive policy. It is very gratifying to find an admission in a government publication that we now have a more competitive policy. This would indicate that last year, the year before that or even the year before that we did not have a very competitive policy. We never could get the government to admit it was sitting on its butt at that time. The facts, however, certainly indicated that is what happened. In any event, it is nice to see it is admitted that we now have a more competitive policy. This document states, further:

• (5:50 p.m.)

> With the continuation of Canada's more competitive policy, exports in 1971-72 even without the special circumstances this year, should be 350 to 400 million bushels. Total wheat disposal could, therefore, average 550 million bushels a year in 1971-72 and 1972-73. There is a good chance of high yields in 1971 because of the substantial acreage of summerfallow in 1970. Thus, 20 million acres are likely to provide adequate supplies of wheat with possibly a small reduction in stocks. An acreage exceeding 20 million could result in an undesirable increase in carry-over and also a smaller quota per acre. Unless new circumstances arise, the 1972 acreage should remain the same.

I suggest the indications are that we should be doing substantially better in respect of selling our wheat. The government probably is proving by this proposal that it is still a little behind the times concerning what will be the true situation in respect of wheat, and we could find ourselves in the same position with regard to that commodity as we did with barley. As a result of the government's action last year, we are short of barley this year and are unable to meet possible sales which would do a great deal to improve the western economy. The same authority has this to say about rapeseed, at page 34:

> Rapeseed production in Canada, by November estimates, amounted to 71.3 million bushels, more than double the 1969 production of 33.4 million. At February 10, exports for the crop year were 19 million bushels compared with less than half that amount during the previous year. With Japan lifting its quota in April 1971, the prediction of last November of 35-40 million bushels seems quite a reasonable one. Prices of Canadian rapeseed have been higher than expected in late 1970 and early 1971. Vancouver cash prices in late February 1971 were about $2.95 per bushel for No. 1 rapeseed.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) referred to rapeseed as the cinderella crop of the western agricultural economy. Surely the foregoing quotation confirms his description. As we all know, this success has been achieved without recourse to any of the so-called steps the government has taken to improve the farmer's efficiency. I would urge the minister to reconsider this attack. I consider this legislation to be part of a concerted attack on the most healthy sector of our grain industry. We have never had to worry about quotas on rapeseed until this year, when somehow or other the farmers are having difficulty in the handling of rapeseed.

It has always been understood that because rapeseed did not come under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board, it was not subject to quotas and could be sold on the open market. We find that a futures market was maintained on the west coast until interrupted recently, probably largely at the instance of this government. In any event, I know several farmers in my constituency who have done quite well on rapeseed. They have entered into contracts, for example, with western Canadian seed processors at Lethbridge.

The regulations issued by the Canadian Wheat Board, so far as these farmers are concerned, did not appear to hamper practically unlimited sales to these oilseed companies. In one case I am thinking about, the farmer delivered 12 bushels per acre of his rapeseed crop to the Lethbridge receiving plant. He hauled it there with his own vehicle and therefore did not interrupt the railway situation or deprive other farmers of the ability to deliver their wheat by tying up boxcars. The quota book was left at the elevator. It appeared that he was able to deliver 12 bushels to the elevator when the quota conditions permitted such delivery. So he took that step. Much to his surprise, however, and to the surprise of the elevator agent, after he finished delivering the 12 bushels to the elevator the Wheat Board representative came around and picked up his quota book at the elevator and he was without it for about three weeks. He had no prior notice that he had done anything wrong.

Since that time I have been in contact with the Canadian Wheat Board to determine under what authority they took such a step. To add insult to injury, this farmer was visited by a corporal of the RCMP and asked to make a statement. After he had had conversation with the RCMP corporal, the corporal said that he could not see how he had done anything wrong and that he did not know why he had been instructed to come to see him. In any event, I asked the Canadian Wheat Board under what authority they took this step and I have been awaiting an answer for over a month.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed Bill S-18, an Act to implement a Supplementary Income Tax Convention between Canada and Finland, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

[English]

In following this debate, as a farmer myself I was greatly encouraged to see, either due to the eloquence of hon. members or due to the subject under discussion being agriculture, that the galleries had attracted, at least for 15 minutes, a very large number of distinguished ladies who seemed to be very much interested. I am very thankful for this diversion.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.
