There was another area about which we had a good deal of discussion in the committee yesterday. Possibly hon. members will remind me that we went around in circles. We cannot do that in the House of Commons because we are only permitted to speak once. I am thinking of what is being done in respect of widows of war veterans allowance recipients. As the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) pointed out, there has been considerable confusion concerning benefits that veterans lose when they come off the war veterans allowance. It does not take very much extra income to make a veteran ineligible for war veterans allowance. A veteran may be getting the old age security pension and guaranteed income supplement. The war veterans allowance he can get, if he has nothing else, is only $26 a month in the case of a married veteran and only $16 a month in the case of a single veteran. Any veteran who has other income, say a small civil service pension, a pension from some other source, an annuity or what have you, may become completely ineligible for the war veterans allowance.

We were concerned about this, and concerned that this would result in the loss of all ancillary benefits available to a veteran being paid the war veterans allowance. The minister made it clear in a statement yesterday that there are two benefits which will not be lost. One of those would be the benefit under the treatment regulations and the other under the burial regulations, if you can call that a benefit, which you do not lose. The minister made it clear that if a veteran required treatment, he could get it, just as if he were in receipt of the war veterans allowance. If he is not on the war veterans allowance because he is getting the guaranteed income supplement, he will get the treatment, and that benefit will be available to him as long as he lives. That is good. He also made it clear that if a veteran is not receiving war veterans allowance because he is receiving the guaranteed income supplement, and that veteran dies, no matter whether that is one year from now or 20 or 30 years from now, he will be given the benefit of the burial regulations just as if he had been on the war veterans allowance. That is good, too.

Now, we come to the position of the potential widow. We were informed yesterday—and all this, I point out, has been done under the regulations governing the War Veterans Allowance Act—that if a veteran, who is not in receipt of war veterans allowance by reason of his being on the guaranteed income supplement, dies within a year of the time when he went off the war veterans allowance—and I emphasize that deadline—the widow will get the same consideration that she would have been given if the veteran had been in receipt of war veterans allowance. That brings to her one very important benefit, the married rate for a full year. But if he dies after a year has passed from the time when he went off the war veterans allowance, then she does not get that benefit at all. She may still have the rights that all other widows of veterans have, the right to a widow's allowance under the War Veterans Allowance Act, but the particular right giving her one year's benefit at the married rate is taken away from the widow of a veteran who went off the veterans allowance more than one year before he died.

Today is April 1, the day when the new legislation comes into effect. Therefore, effective as of today, many veterans will no longer receive the war veterans allowance. Many of those veterans are married. If any such veteran dies during the next 12 months, his widow will get the benefit of one year's allowance at the married rate. If however, one of those veterans who is to come off the allowance today were to die 13 or 14 months from now, his widow would not get the benefit of the married rate for the full year. Granted that the allowance is only a stop-gap for one year, it is a right which has been of great assistance to many widows. Granted that she has the other rights, and so on; I know all the arguments we went into yesterday about putting people over 65 in the same position as those between 60 and 65, and so on. The fact of the matter is that we are taking something away that existed for years. We are taking away a right that was good and I do not think that should be done. It will not be necessary to bring in legislation to make this change. It can be done by regulation. I hope that one year from now, when complaints start coming in and other hon. members start asking questions, the minister will reconsider this whole matter and change the regulations to maintain for widows the same benefits that are available to them now.

I confess that the whole operation is one I do not like, and I have already said so. The operation of pushing veterans from the War Veterans Allowance Act to the guaranteed income supplement, which I think could quite properly be defined as being in the area of general welfare, I do not like.

Mr. Francis: The war veterans allowance is welfare.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) says that the War Veterans Allowance Act is a welfare measure. That is quite true. But it is a welfare measure for veterans, whereas the other is a welfare measure for the general population. As I tried to say when making my first point, it means something to veterans, even though some of them may have to go on welfare, if they are covered by their own legislation instead of by the general legislation.

I believe we should be moving in the other direction. In these days of unemployment all sorts of suggestions are being made. One of them is that, in order to permit more employment opportunities for young people, older people should retire earlier. In my view, this idea is sound, and I think we ought to make a start in the area of veterans and make it possible for veterans, because they are veterans, to retire early. A war veterans allowance program or special pensions for veterans at 55 or even 50 is the direction in which we should be moving. Instead, we are narrowing such welfare benefits as are already provided and I register my protest.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand, I am glad to see this 15 per cent increase in war veterans allowances. I wish it were more. I am glad to see the 10 per cent increase that will come in the bill that follows, which we do not plan to debate at the third reading stage. But I plead with the minister to do a great deal more in recasting these regulations to give our veterans the full benefits that I believe the Canadian people would like this Parliament to give to them.

[Translation]

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on Bill C-233 now before the House which deals with war veterans allowances.

I fully agree with the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As a matter of fact, he has dealt with this matter in a very detailed manner with the adroitness of a master.

Mr. Speaker, we are very happy to find that the government has yielded to the pressures of war veterans and is giving them a little more justice, because they certainly have rights and prerogatives which must be considered in order to take the required decisions.

I fully appreciate the decisions of the hon. Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) and I should like to congratulate him heartily for his courage and his open-mindedness in doing justice to this oppressed social class.

We are happy that the government should grant these pension settlements which represent an approximate amount of $43 million, part of which will be absorbed by old age pensions.

Mr. Speaker, this is money just the same. Money paid out as old age security pensions even if it does not come out of the budget of the Department of Veterans Affairs, is still money. So, this will cost the Treasury $43 million more.

It is not the veterans' fault nor the hon. members' fault; but that of the system if the cost of living has increased and pensions and grants have to be increased again and again. There is no end to this. Everything increases, and eventually taxes have to be increased too.

I am glad that veterans' pensions are being increased, but I am dissatisfied that we have to increase taxes accordingly to pay our veterans what is rightfully theirs.

However, I agree concerning our veterans and all those who have given much of themselves, who have made countless sacrifices, and who have forsaken part of their existence to save the nation and to establish a certain priority with respect to justice and freedom in our society. They are the ones who fought for that. I still wonder though whether they were justified in doing so but, in any case, it was for the sake of freedom, of civilization, of Christianity, that they sacrificed part of their lives and it is for the sake of all that also that we have increased their pensions.

Such increases cost money but still there are other groups of citizens in Canada who have needs that ought to be fulfilled, who would require increases in pension or income but there are only tax increases for them.

We must be fair and ensure equal opportunity in all of this. The increase in pension which is offered the war veterans by the minister of Veterans Affairs will draw their gratitude, all the more so since other citizens who also have the right to live are victims of certain disadvantages forced on them by the economic system.

I would like once again to state my admiration for the wonderful work done by the minister, and also by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knnowles) who fights so well for the rights of the veterans, of the oppressed and of all those who are in need. I support him in his demands, even though we live in a system where we must often limit ourselves.

I believe, therefore, that the veterans will understand the situation and will be that much more satisfied with what the government grants them. We hope therefore that with higher pensions they will be a little happier, because while receiving a little more from the state, they will see that the latter saw their problems and decided not to forget them.

[English]

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) have said, there will not be a protracted debate on these three bills. I join with the two hon. members in wishing my colleague, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Legault), a speedy recovery.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cullen: I stated yesterday in committee that I visited the chairman of this committee in hospital when he was quite ill, but it was not possible to go into his room. Notwithstanding this, he sent out the message that there were three pieces of veterans' legislation that he was most anxious to see passed. That is the measure of the hon. member for Nipissing.

Some of the points made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre are well taken. The fact that the minister has brought forth these splendid pieces of legislation speaks well of him. The nitty-gritty attacks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, some of which I support, must not serve as a smoke screen to hide what is, in effect, three splendid pieces of legislation. I believe they will put an additional $40 million to $50 million in the hands of these veterans.

I was very pleased yesterday to receive a letter from the Royal Canadian Legion asking that this bill be passed as expeditiously as possible. I thank the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand for his kind comments on the manner in which I chaired the committee yesterday. My job was made much easier by having been a member of this committee under two former capable chairmen, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) and the hon. member for Nipissing. I was also assisted by the fact that these are three pieces of good legislation. More important, we received the complete co-operation of the opposition members sitting on that committee.

This piece of legislation should and will be passed expeditiously because all members of this House want to ensure that the veterans receive justice. I say to the veterans, do not rest on your laurels because of these three great pieces of legislation. Be ever vigilant and keep our committee informed of the improvements you would like to see in this and new legislation.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I only propose to make a very few brief remarks on this important piece of legislation because, although I do not like to admit it, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has already made most of the speech I would have made under these circumstances. We have similar views on a number of subjects which I find important and the hon. member has covered them carefully and accurately, so I do not propose to be repetitive.

However, I do want to say that all members of the Veterans Affairs Committee regret the fact that our very capable chairman, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Legault), was unable, for health reasons, to be present while these bills were being considered. We wish him a rapid and complete recovery. At the same time we express our appreciation to the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) for filling in so capably as chairman of the Veterans Affairs Committee.

I have been a member of this committee from time to time over the last 20 years or so, and I might say it is a committee that has functioned on a non-partisan basis. It is one that recognizes, regardless of party affiliation, one mutual concern of all its members, and that is that the veterans of the country who have fought in World Wars I and II, the Korean war and some other minor military engagements should be treated in the way that Canadians generally felt they should be treated at the time of these crises.

I regret one aspect of consideration that is given to the war veterans allowance legislation. It is true there is a philosophy that because of their service veterans age prematurely, and that war veterans allowance is, in fact, an old age pension that the veterans receive at an earlier age than is the case with civilians. However, as years go by it seems a grateful nation—if that nation is accurately represented by this government—wants to forget its obligation to the veterans as such. There seems to be a tendency to hope that the veterans will fade away into the general age group to which they happen to belong, and that their needs will be looked after by the general benefits available to all citizens within that age group.

I think this is a very unfortunate attitude to adopt. We are seeing the relative benefits that our veterans have had under veterans legislation being eroded in several ways. For example, old age pension was payable at the age of 70; war veterans allowance was payable in a general sense at the age of 60. The veteran had a ten-year advantage. The old age pension recipient now receives the old age pension at the age of 65, the age having been lowered from 70 to 65. But there has been no corresponding lowering of the qualifying age for war veterans allowance.

Then, as has already been pointed out, it would seem there is a desire on the part of the government, where the benefit is a similar one, to treat the veteran as a civilian in cases where he has an option between either the old age security and income supplement or the war veterans allowance.

War veterans allowance carries with it a number of subsidiary benefits. But the most important point of all is that the veteran feels he receives war veterans allowance as of right. Even if it is in the form of a welfare payment to which is attached a means test, he still looks upon it as something to which he is entitled because he served in the armed forces in time of war. He receives it only because he served in two world wars, either in Canada or in an actual theatre of war overseas. He may be in receipt of a very small disability pension to compensate him for the deterioration in his health due to illness or to wounds sustained during his military service. But as I say, he looks upon his war veterans allowance with pride, as something that sets him apart from the ordinary citizen.

I think the veteran resents having his pension replaced by old age security and the general income supplement, even if his total monetary benefit is unchanged. There are a number of fringe benefits to which a veteran is entitled. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) listed these so accurately that I will not repeat them now, but I should like to say this: Most of these benefits are either dispensed or withdrawn by regulation. I should like to impress upon the minister, as forcibly as I can, that in cases where a veteran is in receipt of old age security, the income supplement plus some small additional third source of income, which thus disqualifies him from receiving war veterans allowance, none of the fringe benefits to which he would otherwise be entitled should be taken away from him, regardless of what these are.

Further, I strongly recommend that in every case where regulations such as those enumerated by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre apply, they be amended so that war veterans are placed in no worse position in receiving the old age security pension and the income supplement than they were when their income was derived from the taxpayers through the Department of Veterans Affairs. I see no reason why the veterans, who have their own department as it were, should not have all their needs met by that department. This would mean a corresponding reduction in expenditure on the part of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I submit the government should refrain from attempting to make the old veterans fade away into the general age group of the population into which they happen to fall.

[Mr. MacLean.]

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has very adequately covered the questions relating to war veterans allowance but I did want to make a few points in respect of a problem that is not being resolved in this legislation, namely the lowering of the qualifying age for widows of veterans for war veterans allowance.

It seems to me that there is a very solid principle here, and it is this. The capacity of men who have served in the armed forces in a theatre of war, and have suffered disability therefrom, to earn their own living and to make adequate provision for their families has undoubtedly been impaired. Yet if their disability is not in excess of 50 per cent of their total capacity, or if their death is not due to war service, their widows are ineligible for war veterans allowance unless they are 55 years or over, or unless they are medically unfit. I am not quarrelling with the minister or his department about the decisions which have been handed down, because under the Act and under the regulations, these are the decisions required. But I hope the minister will be prepared to give consideration to lowering the age at which the widow of a veteran would be eligible for war veterans allowance.

Here is an example which illustrates what I have in mind, the case of a woman who is the widow of a Canadian serviceman who served in the Korean war. Her husband, I understand, was the first Canadian to be wounded in that theatre of war. When he returned to Canada he was granted a 15 per cent disability pension. His disability undoubtedly affected his earning capacity and resulted in the deterioration of his health to the point where he was scheduled for reboarding at a hearing which would probably have resulted in his disability pension being increased. He had come to the point where he realized he would have to quit the heavy work he was doing and seek lighter employment. Unfortunately, he was killed in a car accident, leaving a widow and a young son to face the future without adequate means of support.

The department, under the regulations and terms of the act, ruled that this woman was not eligible for a pension unless she was proven to be medically unfit. She was not medically unfit. The case was appealed to the appeal board which pointed out that she was not eligible, first, because she was only 50 years of age, and second, because she was neither permanently unemployable nor incapable of maintenance. It is true, I suppose that in physical terms a woman 50 years of age is not permanently unemployable or incapable of maintenance, but in actual fact, where does a woman of 50 years of age, without any particular training, get a job to maintain herself and her child? True, she can get odd days clerking in a store or do housework for someone on a day to day basis, but it is virtually impossible for her to maintain herself and her child adequately. This means that the particular woman I have in mind will be forced, eventually, to go on welfare.

As a Canadian, I resent the fact that the widow of a man who was wounded while serving his country should be required to go on welfare. Given the circumstances of today, there is real justification for lowering the age of eligibility from 55 to 50 or even to 45. If we were in a period when it was easy to get jobs, when there was a demand for labour, this difficulty might not arise. But today there are thousands of young people looking for jobs, and the chances of a widow, 50 years of age, without any particular skills, securing employment, are virtually nil.

If the minister and the government want to face the realities of the present situation, then surely they ought to give consideration to lowering the age from 55 to 50. Not only do we have a responsibility to veterans but we have a responsibility to the families of veterans. The average veteran I talk to is more concerned about the people of Canada discharging their responsibility to veterans' families than they are about veterans themselves. When I talked to veterans in the last war, my impression was they were worried not so much about what would happen to them as about what would happen to their families if they failed to come back or if they came back in an incapacitated condition. I think the widow of a man who served his country in a theatre of war, who suffered a serious disability, deserves something from this nation; we have a responsibility toward her and her children.

The other thing I should like to say to the minister is this. I hope he will be giving serious consideration fairly soon, since he is not going to do it in the legislation before us, to providing for a cost of living bonus in war veterans allowances and disability pensions. We are already accepting this principle in connection with pension plans, superannuation plans for civil servants, the Canada Pension Plan the old age security pension provisions when combined with the guaranteed income supplement. If, in all these programs, we recognize that an increase in the cost of living automatically reduces the purchasing power of a pension, I see no reason why we should not accept the same principle with respect to those who are in receipt of veterans disability pensions or war veterans allowances. I hope this is one of the matters which the minister and his colleagues will take under favourable consideration, so that when this subject is again discussed in the war veterans committee they will be prepared to provide a cost of living bonus to all those in receipt of these pensions.

Mr. Jack Bigg (Pembina): I am anxious that this legislation should pass, Mr. Speaker, but I think I would be remiss if I did not make a comment or two about the wonderful work the Canadian Legion has done in seeing that this bill of right for veterans was brought to its present state. I should also like to draw particular attention to the work of the Hong Kong veterans organization, on behalf of those who carried the greatest burden during the last 25 years. I should like to put on record on their behalf a commendation of Dr. Richardson for his able work in demonstrating the big difference between the situation of Hong Kong veterans and that of other veterans who served their country. I have in mind, of course, the effects of malnutrition and the tropical diseases experienced by those confined to Japanese prison camps.

I am pleased that the benefit of doubt rule has finally received full attention. If this rule is followed properly, many of the things which have bothered veterans and the friends of veterans will disappear. The Veterans Affairs Committee has been active over the years. It would be wrong, I suppose, to mention anyone by name. Several people have worked very faithfully in this regard. I might say that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. McIntosh) carried this particular section; I think we almost got tired of hearing about it, but it must be a great satisfaction to him to be present in this chamber today to see the benefit of doubt rule is now being looked after properly.

You often hear on some corner, not too often but sometimes, the argument that we have done too much for veterans. I am glad to see the minister does not feel that way and that the committee does not feel that way. If there are people who still have this idea, I might mention the fact that the veterans rehabilitation program we had after the war apparently cost a good deal of money, but this money has been repaid to the nation many times over in the form of income tax. Many of these veterans returned to school after they came home. It is true they did so through the generosity of the taxpayers, but they did have a desire to upgrade themselves. They showed us that they did not want to rest on their laurels as veterans but wished to get back into the stream of life. A great many of these veterans distinguished themselves in college. I understand they were the best students the faculty had. They were not busy burning down schools or asking for something for nothing. Through income tax they have paid back the people of Canada many times the full cost of the veterans rehabilitation program. If we traced it through, I believe we would find they have paid back the full cost of the veterans programs up to the present day.

I do not think we have reached the end of the road in respect of veterans affairs. There are still a few untidy corners to be cleaned up. The Committee on Veterans Affairs will have to be kept together and revitalized. This committee has always had fine chairmen. The last two in particular have been outstanding, although they are not alone in this regard because there were very fine chairmen before them. I do not think we have succeeded completely in giving proper attention to those veterans with multiple disabilities. I am pleased there has been a breakthrough, but I am quite sure improvements are required in this regard.

I am not too happy that there has been no change in the attitude in respect of the provisions concerning misconduct, particularly where a widow is deprived of a pension because of some presumed misconduct on the part of the serving member. If the benefit of doubt rule had been properly applied in the old days it would have looked after the situation, but this was not the case. We need not be discouraged about this because with the new system of hearings I understand there will be no such thing as a closed case. If a veteran feels he has had improper treatment in the past, he will be able to re-open his case. I am sure such people, under the veterans charter, now receive proper attention.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to limit my brief remarks on Bill C-233 to the increase in the war veterans allowance. I regret that when bringing in a bill to amend the act in order to increase the rates, the minister did not take to heart the suggestion I put to him, I thought rather vehemently, in respect of those veterans who I believe are unjustly being denied access to the War Veterans Allowance Act. I should like the Minister to give careful consideration to this point. I refer particularly to those veterans of World War I and World War II living in the United Kingdom who, because they have not put in one year's residence in Canada since the war or since their war service, are not entitled to apply. I cannot think of any greater discrimination than this particular restriction. I have repeated this suggestion time and time again. We have been given the answer that there are administrative or bureaucratic difficulties dealing primarily with Canadians who live in the United States. The benefits to Canadian veterans living in the United States, under whatever entitlement they may have, are in excess of what they might get in Canada or at least that was the case in the past. So, we were given an artificial reason for it being impossible to pay these men.

I invite the minister to really look into the case of those veterans who are residing in the United Kingdom. I am sure he has received briefs and letters from the Canadian Veterans Association of the United Kingdom and also personal representations from persons who had been officers in the department in the United Kingdom as well as from Canadian veterans who were in London and who are aware of the hardship. Yet, for some unknown reason we have had a continuation of the refusal to consider these people as being eligible. I say there is an omission from this bill because it would have been very simple to include an amendment to rectify this situation. My regret is that despite all the good things that have been done, not only under Bill C-203 but under these three particular bills dealing with an increase in the rates, the minister has failed to do something for these people. There are other cases in respect of which I could make suggestions, but in this particular case I say there has been a very serious omission and I would hope we could see our way clear before long to make the change.

As we all know there is the difficulty that once both the Pensions Act and the War Veterans Allowances Act have been amended in a major way, the administration will have a closed mind with regard to re-opening these acts. We will be put off for perhaps another five years before any change is made. I can think of circumstances under which it might happen much quicker, but if one follows the present thinking any further changes will take that long. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, this is one point on which I can tell the minister I will keep dogging him until I see some hope of improvement in this situation. I hope it is not the position of the department that by just hanging tough they will wear out this category of veterans through the passage of time, because many of them now are on in years.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed at the outset to join with the hon. members who just spoke, in wishing a speedy recovery to the most capable chairman of the Committee on Veterans Affairs, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Legault). There is no doubt in my mind that he carried out his work with distinction.

I should also like to avail myself of this opportunity to congratulate his successor, the hon. member for Sarnia (Mr. Cullen), who was also equal to the occasion and succeeded in conducting the committee's proceedings promptly and efficiently.

I would not forgive myself if I failed to mention the first of those three chairmen, the one who presided over the committee at the beginning of the proceedings which are coming to an end today, namely the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis), who also showed not only ability, but also patience and great comprehension during those lengthy proceedings.

I also feel it is my duty to thank very sincerely all the members of the Committee on Veterans Affairs, whatever their political party may be. They are all good fellows friendly, pleasant, which made the work very interesting not only for themselves and the officials, but also for the minister who had to appear on many occasions and try to reply as well as he could to the very relevant questions that were put to him. Most of the questions and issues brought up during the proceedings were raised again today, first by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as well as by his namesake from the Progressive Conservative party, the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), and other members.

I tried when I gave evidence and during my previous statements before the Committee on Veterans Affairs, to reply to most of the arguments and objections and I was under the impression that I had succeeded in convincing the committee members, but I know it is their duty to remind me again of all the things that they would like to see done for veterans.

Of course we have a high opinion of those bills but I know that nothing is perfect in this world. The generosity of any government must necessarily include limitations determined by the country's resources. However, we have recently passed a number of laws which I find quite generous and justified and which are to the credit of Parliament and proof of the gratitude of Canadians towards our veterans.

For example, the 15 per cent increase in the disability pensions will cost the country more than $22 million. The increases contemplated in this bill will also cost $22 million more to the government. These two bills and the legislation based on the white paper and passed by the Senate last Tuesday represent a yearly expenditure of $50 million. Such an amount is an indication of the generosity of the government, but above all of the Canadian taxpayers. I am sure that the Canadian people will not resent our spending that money in order that those who served their country in the Armed Forces can enjoy an honourable old age and end their days with dignity.

Some objections that were raised a while ago might if not confuse the recipients at least give rise to some doubts in their minds. I do not intend to counter them once more today, since this was done in committee. However, we shall take the necessary steps to have the periodical Legion publish a special page explaining exactly what steps the veterans should take to get their pension increase. I myself can assure them, as they will be assured in the announcement published in that periodical, that there is no question taking privileges or rights away from them; but only of increasing the amounts already available to them.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I consider that these two bills, like the previous one, are true memorials from the Canadian Parliament expressing the Canadian nations' gratitude towards its veterans. They will ensure that our legislation respecting veterans is actually the best in the world, and we are right in being proud of it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Would the minister allow me a question?

Mr. Dubé: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. minister to elaborate on the subject which I raised concerning veterans living overseas and who are not eligible for allowances, since the regulations provide that the veteran must have resided in Canada at least one year between his period of service and the time of his application. It is known that at the present time there are thousands of veterans in Europe.

I have often raised that point and I was hoping that the hon. minister could answer it. Would he indicate what is his intention at this time?

Mr. Dubé: The thing is this, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to start answering all the questions because we would find ourselves exactly in the same position as during the sittings of the Committee on Veterans Affairs and I have no intention whatever to kill my own bill.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is not the first time that that happens.

Mr. Dubé: But the point raised by the hon. member has already been raised in the past. It is not a requirement which the present minister has imposed, for others before him could have abolished it had it been so burdensome and cruel. Actually, it is a matter of allowances which constitute a social measure and any social measure has its limitations.

I think that the requirement to reside one year in one's own country is not a very heavy one to impose on somebody who wants to benefit from Canadian taxpayers' money.

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 31, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. When the committee rose yesterday clause 14 of the bill was being considered.

On clause 14—Establishment of Ministries of State.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, when this bill was introduced for first reading one could definitely hear the strains of that old Liberal theme song being played in the background, a song we are all so familiar with, "Roll out the barrel." There is no doubt what that barrel contains. It is the old-fashioned Liberal pork barrel, because this clause we are dealing with is nothing more or less than the introduction of patronage on a grand scale.

We are being asked, under the provisions of this clause, to authorize the establishment of five ministers of state. This means that if the clause is passed, the government would be quite justified in establishing, without further reference to Parliament, five new departments, and without demonstrating any need whatsoever for any one of them. When you realize that the cost of doing the work which these new departments will do, over and above what it is costing now to do that same work in the existing departments, will be untold millions of dollars each year, untold millions that the taxpayer must pay, then you have to look very carefully at what we are being asked to approve in this clause.

• (4:20 p.m.)

When you establish a single new department you establish a new minister, deputy ministers, assistant deputy ministers, associate deputy ministers, and a whole host of directors at high salaries. Then, there are large public relations staffs employed as image makers, many of whom are lured from the press gallery. Heaven knows the image of the ministers needs building up but not at public expense. As well, you have private secretaries, associate private secretaries, assistant private secretaries, executive assistants, parliamentary secretaries and all the paraphernalia that goes with a separate department. We know from experience that these things cost the taxpayer millions of dollars, and in the end exactly the same amount of work is done.

We must ask why this proposal is being made at this time, Mr. Chairman. I say it is being made for one reason and one reason alone. The government will not wait until the need for a new department can be justified, rather it comes with this proposition now in order to provide opportunities for the Liberal faithful, the elected and the party workers.

A good example of how this works, Mr. Chairman, happened in 1963. The chief organizer of the Liberal party, Mr. Walter Gordon, had promised that he would provide jobs galore to the Liberal faithful so he set up the Department of Industry. There was no more need for that separate department than there was for a hole in the head, Mr. Chairman. The work had previously been done by the industrial section of the Department of Trade and Commerce. A brand new department was established in its own separate building with a minister, deputy minister and all the other paraphernalia costing the taxpayers many millions of dollars.

Before 1963 the work of this new department had been looked after by the industrial section of the Department of Trade and Commerce in a most satisfactory and efficient manner, as will be obvious to anybody who has talked to the businessmen of Canada. It took three times as many people to staff the new department, however, as had run the industrial section. A great many of the new staff members were high priced directors from every facet of industrial life—they were recruited in hordes. The new department cost untold millions of dollars each year to operate.

Then, why was this new department finally disbanded and put back exactly where it had been prior to the election of 1963? It was for a very simple reason. The businessmen of Canada became so frustrated and furious with the confusion of having to deal with two departments instead of one that they demanded this nonsense to be stopped. The government had to swallow its pride and put the Department of Industry back into the Department of Trade and Commerce.

As any businessman knows, Mr. Chairman, firms which export also produce for the domestic market and most producers for the domestic market also sell to the export market to help cover their overhead, to increase profits and sometimes to reduce their prices. Anybody knows that. You do not have one group of people producing for export who want to deal with an export department, and another group producing only for domestic consumption who want to deal with the Department of Industry. All companies of any size want to deal with just one department. Prior to 1963 they were able to do this and were happy about it. I challenge any member of the House to tell me one incident of a businessman who was not extremely happy with the operation of the Department of Trade and Commerce, both from the point of view of export sales and domestic industry. The division of this department into two was done solely to provide patronage jobs for the Liberal faithful.

We in the opposition are doing everything we can to persuade the government to stop this nonsense at public expense. Even when a department is split in order to provide jobs for the party faithful and then is brought back to the original position, the waste does not stop. It did not stop when the Department of Trade and Commerce was divided. When the businessmen of this country forced the marriage of these two departments again, this government did not let out a single employee of the Department of Industry. Since that time they have been falling over each other and getting in each other's way, causing inefficiency and confusion. The businessmen of the country are not as happy with the operation of the department as they were prior to 1963. You cannot right a wrong by bringing the two departments back together.

This government, Mr. Chairman, has no right to ask this Parliament for a blank cheque to create five new departments for which it cannot justify the need. If it could justify the need, the government ought to come before Parliament and say what that need is. Instead, it is asking Parliament for a blank cheque. The government wants to spend literally hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayer's money on changes that are not justified. They are not needed and they are only excuses for providing jobs for the faithful. As another election approaches, we see the old pork barrel coming out again. The government is saying, "Boy, we are creating five new departments and all sorts of jobs for you if you get elected. We will make you parliamentary secretaries; we will make you ministers; we will make you almost anything you want; but run and win. Come in and join the Liberal party. Help us to win, because we love power and we want to enjoy it."

An hon. Member: And the hon. member does not?

Mr. Hees: That is what the government is doing. Mr. Chairman, we feel that this is completely wrong, and I say that because we have a responsibility to the people of this country in the supervision of the spending of their tax dollars. We see this proposal as a colossal waste, justified only by the government's great desire to expand its patronage and the power it has in its hands. That is the only reason for this measure. So I say this expansion should be stopped here and now.

If the government wants to establish new departments, it ought to come before the Parliament of Canada and explain why it wants them. The government has come before the Parliament of Canada and asked for a new department of the environment. That part we will pass, Mr. Chairman. We of the opposition think that a department of the environment would be a good department. We think we need it, and therefore we would pass that part.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: If the government were to bring forward suggestions for establishing departments that could do a good job, just as that department could, we would say, "Yes, establish your new department; appoint the new minister and all his staff. This expenditure is justified." Until the government can do that, it has no right to come before Parliament and ask for a blank cheque with which to establish five new departments at one time and do anything else that pleases it. I say to the government, you have no right whatever to do that. You know it, and there is not a minister sitting in his seat today who can stand up and say that the government has that right. I challenge any of them to do that.

Mr. Drury: I will.

Mr. Hees: They are not standing up, therefore they are agreeing with me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: They are agreeing with me, for the very good reason that they know what I am saying is the truth.

Mr. Drury: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman has just thrown out a challenge. I will stand up and say that I disagree with him. I will say it at the appropriate time, later, in a more logical and coherent fashion. It is quite clear that the hon. member is not familiar, despite his period of service in the ministry, with the sort of constitutional arrangements prevailing in the British parliamentary system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, was that not an outstanding contribution! This minister said as much as might be expected, absolutely nothing. He said nothing to justify the bill that is going through and nothing to justify our giving the government carte blanche to create five new departments. He has confirmed everything I have said. He has nothing to say on behalf of the government to justify what the government is asking us to pass, and the minister knows it.

An hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Hees: That is right, you can bet your sweet life. Having said that, especially since there has been no response from the government, and I see that a few ministers across the isle are red in the face because they know that what I say is true, I say, for heaven's sake even at this late date have the good sense to withdraw this bill. If the government proposes establishing departments that are needed, Parliament will pass those measures, just as we will pass that part of the bill for setting up the new department of the environment. We believe that department is necessary. We say to the government, do not ask for a blank cheque to establish a lot of departments for which you have no need and which you only want for political reasons, in order to provide plenty of jobs for the Liberal faithful in the future.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall clause 14 carry?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, earlier today, in an exchange between the hon. member for St. John's East and the government House leader, it was pointed out with great force and accuracy by my colleague that a larger number of committees than usual are sitting today, and that a great many hon. members serving on them wish to be present in this committee to participate in this particular debate. As usual, we find that the members of the opposition are doing their duty in staffing these committees.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: That is not the case with respect to government members.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Look around you.

Mr. Baldwin: Not as many of our members are present as we should like, because they are doing their duty in the committees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: Hon. members opposite are hearing the truth, and do not like it.

Mr. Baldwin: The government House leader, while giving a firm guarantee, said that when we get to the committee of the whole stage of Bill C-207, and I am paraphrasing what he said, it would be desirable if the committees would then adjourn. I am asking at this time if the government is prepared to do this. Will they not agree to adjourn this debate until the committees have been advised of the situation and have adjourned their meetings so this debate could proceed on the basis agreed upon. This is an extremely important debate and a large number of my colleagues wish to take part.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: I do not expect any contribution from the government side, of course; as I said yesterday, government members are not allowed to get up and speak.

Mr. Hees: That is right, and if they were they would not have anything to say, anyway.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member for York East spoke, but he might as well not have. I, therefore, wish to make a proposal.

An hon. Member: We will not fall into that trap, that's for sure.

Mr. Baldwin: I wish to ask, therefore, if the government will carry out what was the implied undertaking of the government House leader and now adjourn this debate—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: —in order to permit the committees to be recessed so that hon. members attending those committees can attend the committee of the whole as their duty compels them to do.

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Chairman—

[English]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The Chair can hardly take notice of this representation at the present time. I understand that an hon. member wishes to speak, and he may do so if the hon. member for Peace River does not wish to speak. As hon. members know, within 20 minutes we shall begin private members' hour.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, on the same point of order—

An hon. Member: There is no point of order.

Mr. McGrath: Then, I will raise a point of order, with your permission. My point of order relates to the fact that the House is now sitting in committee of the whole on an important bill concerning the reorganization of the Government of Canada, which affects every member of the House. I submit that since the House is meeting as a committee of the whole House, it is clear that other committees are precluded from meeting.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. McGrath: According to today's Votes and Proceedings, almost all the committees are continuing to sit. I think it would be useful to place on record the numbers of hon. members who are involved in those committees. On the Standing Committee on Agriculture, there are 30 members of this House.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: On the Standing Committee on Election Expenses, there are 12 members.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I think the hon. member for St. John's East will appreciate that it is not necessary to give this information which is available to all hon. members. In any event, in my opinion the question which has been raised ought to have been raised before the committee began sitting this afternoon. In about 15 minutes, we shall begin private members' hour. One hon. member has indicated that he wishes to speak. Perhaps, he will speak until five o'clock.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, in order to bring this matter to a head, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West:

That this committee rise and report progress and request leave to sit again later this day.

The motion is in handwriting and may not be too clear. The Chair may have difficulty in reading it.

• (4:40 p.m.)

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The question is on the motion of the hon. member for Peace River. All those in favour of the motion please rise. All those against the motion please rise.

Motion (Mr. Baldwin) negatived: Yeas, 12; nays, 30.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Yesterday, when I rose—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière has the floor.

Mr. Fortin: I apologize, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to give my friends an opportunity to say all they had to say so that they might in turn show the same courtesy we apply to them, in other words, listen.

Yesterday I was speaking on Part IV of Bill C-207 concerning the establishment of ministries of state and appointment of the corresponding number of ministers of state, or a maximum of five.

At that time, my major argument was to determine the links between the three separate powers which govern Canada, i.e. the judiciary, executive and legislative powers.

My remarks were rather academic and I was suggesting that when one of the powers wants to arrogate certain rights of the two other powers, serious conflicts occur with far-reaching effects for the powers involved.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw the attention of the committee to more general considerations. For example, I would like to know what the government is trying to achieve in establishing ministries of state. It is said in Part IV of this bill that the government is proposing the establishment of "ministries of state for specified purposes".

Now, upon reading the relevant clauses, one becomes aware that the purposes mentioned in the title are not included in Part IV of the legislation. This is an incomprehensible shortcoming which is greatly responsible for the imbroglio this House is in now.

Now, I wonder, why does the government want to create ministries of state without telling us what fields they will cover? Why not say what these ministries will do, or what problems they will deal with?

Mr. Chairman, the government does not give its reasons. It would like to have the overall authority to create ministries of state at will, for reasons it does not want to reveal. This is a dangerous principle, because the House not only does not know why certain amounts of money are spent, but it does not know if these ministries will endeavour to solve the problems it might want to refer to them.

Thus, the government is asking for a blank cheque, without revealing its reasons, without stating its intentions. It is useless to say that we object to this scheme.

As the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) stated yesterday, when he took part in this debate, Canada is an over-governed country. There is no dearth of directors in Canada! There is a profusion of ministers and parliamentary secretaries who keep themselves busy doing we do not know exactly what. When they are asked questions about what is going on in their departments or about their position or policy in any specific area, their answers are evasive, vague or else facetious. If serious answers are needed to serious questions, the situation is hopeless, they cannot be obtained.

This goes to show once again to what extent this government is making Parliament look ridiculous. For sure, there are departments that are doing a good job. Let us take for instance the department of the Secretary of State. What sort of information can we get out of this department? Whenever a member of the opposition directs a question to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), the latter always unmistakably begins like this: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of this, but I shall look into it. Mr. Speaker, I am not responsible for this, but I shall inquire. Mr. Speaker, I did not know this, I have not been informed of this problem, but I shall find out and report to the hon. member.

First of all, we always have to wait for the said reports, and then it is inconceivable that a minister of a responsible government should not be responsible for the CBC, for example, to Parliament. It is nonsensical.

Here is an example. Some people ask for the establishment of a commission. I call for the creation of a royal commission of inquiry into the CBC's activities in general. The Secretary of State rises and, as he is the minister responsible for this organization, replies: I am not responsible. The only part I have to play is to run errands between the government and the CBC.

As for parliamentary control, this means that hon. members of any party not only have no influence over the CBC, but must be content with what the Corporation is ready to give them, albeit ungraciously. So hon. members who must report to their constituents on the CBC's administration are unable to do so. They are handicapped in their informatory and participatory duties either because the responsible minister refuses to fulfil his obligations or because he is truly not the master at the CBC. Who then is the master of that Crown corporation that is financed through public funds if it is not the Secretary of State?

Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw the committee's attention to a specific point in the bill before us. If in the case of the CBC Parliament has no direct control over public funds, and if the Secretary of State who is responsible for this corporation does not control it either and does not know how the funds are spent, how can Parliament hope to have a control over ministers of state and ministries that Parliament will not even be asked to establish, or over ministers that Parliament will not be called upon to judge? Moreover, Parliament will be unable to properly assess the work of the ministers because the latter will not have to answer to Parliament.

That is how the executive weakens the legislative power so as to turn it into an ivory tower parallel to the legislative power, in such a way that some day, we will reach the point where parliament will be a tower of Babel where we will do nothing but talk, with no accounts to render to anyone.

On the other hand, there will be a unilateral, dictatorial power which will take decisions while ignoring what can be said in the tower of Babel, that is Parliament, and so our democratic institutions will keep on depreciating in the eyes of the public, particularly of the young people.

We all agree on rejuvenating Parliament and we want the executive power to have all means available to carry on effectively the task that the people have entrusted to it. But from that to squashing one power to the benefit of another, to neglecting to exercise parliamentary control over the various creatures of the government, it does not make sense.

We cannot normally operate with that system. At the present time, it is easier for government members to uphold their position and I understand them. However, if those same members who want to increase the executive power under the pretext of making it more efficient were sitting on this side of the House, they would speak as we do. They would defend Parliament, because for them it would be the sole satisfactory institution to convey the representations of the people to the government. This is one of the basic reasons why Parliament exists.

As for the creation of ministries of state about which we did not obtain any specific information—my hon. friends opposite will admit it—we cannot honestly accept it. We have nothing—and we want it to be well understood—against the creation of ministries of state. We object to the motivation, the responsibilities and the power given to those ministries or ministers of state. We especially object to the eventual lack of relations between those ministers and Parliament.

Mr. Chairman, I deemed it important to once again bring up those issues during the debate with the hope of prompting the government members to change their minds about the creation of those ministries of state.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, we are not here to hinder the government in their business, but to help them. We are here to show them the dark side of the picture, which they may forget at times.

Mr. Béchard: It does not show.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, one of my friends, the hon. member for Bonaventure says: "It does not show".

Mr. Béchard: From Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine!

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry for my mistake in the name of the constituency of the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine, but since we do not here him very often in this House it is not very easy to remember the name of his constituency.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this attitude towards us is negative. When members from the opposition make proposals to defend parliament while encouraging government action, they are accused of delaying business and it is with such a pretext—because according to them parliament has become an old-fashioned institution where the business of the House is delayed—that the government leaves unsolved the unemployment problem, the unemployed students' problem, that of regional disparities, and what have you.

Mr. Chairman, ministries of state will be created. Is it in order to solve those problems? No. Is it in order to meet with the request from the opposition? No. Is it for election reasons? Yes, Mr. Chairman, because those ministries of state, unless we are given proof to the contrary, will be ghost institutions, like the white papers or royal commissions of inquiry, used to hide the lethargy, the torpidity, the lack of activity of the government or their failure in a specific field.

Mr. Chairman, since then, the government—

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question of the hon. member?

The hon. member has been criticizing royal commissions one after the other but, a few moments before, he asked for a royal commission on the CBC which has already been the object of several commissions. Could he explain this illogical request?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, this is not illogical. I can explain my position quite simply: on all subjects for where there is no danger of the government being unmasked, royal commissions are set up, but on all subjects which would require a commission to unmask the true masters of this government, as for instance the banking system and the CBC, the government hides its head in the sand like an ostrich and refuses to take any action. This is why I request, as I do as well on the banking system, the setting up of a royal commission on the CBC to put some order in this corporation.

It is much easier for government members to criticize, shout and disturb the members who have the floor rather than take a stand. This is why I wonder about the use of these ministries of state. Mr. Chairman, I would like to conclude with this.

We have today a fair number of departments, crown corporations, parliamentary secretaries and ministers and what is the result? They cost millions in administration expenditures. We have one of the most costly administration in the world as compared with the mall number of inhabitants in Canada. And not only they do not solve our problems but they aggravate them. Instead of providing human services to the individual in his relations with the government, he is given an inhuman and "numbered" service and finally there is no service.

Mr. Chairman, communications between the government and the Canadian people are non existent because the government has retreated to an invory tower and does not care a rap about the people provided it can exercise power. That is all it wants instead of seeking to serve the nation. However, it should remember that when the people entrust a man or several men with power, they expect it to be used for the good of the people and not for personal profit.

Mr. Chairman, this is the reason why people entrust power to a particular party. However, they realize more and more today—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, may I call it five o'clock.

Mr. Fortin: —Mr. Chairman, in doing so, they always show the same partisanship to one party, so that they are both in the pay of high finance. Therefore, no matter how many ministries and ministers of state we give ourselves, if we do not wish to really serve the population, irrespective of high finance, we will not solve the problem.

The population has given the government power, not to create even more ministries of State or bestow favours on hon. members, but to serve the population and put the money at its service.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External Affairs—Israeli-Arab conflict—suggested representations to Israel respecting peace negotiations; the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding)—Health—paramedical services—negotiation of cost-sharing agreement with provinces.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, Notices of Motions (Papers).

REQUEST FOR COPY OF REPORT OF C. B. HAVER ON COST BENEFIT EVALUATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North) moved:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the report by C. B. Haver of Montreal for Northumberland Consultants Limited regarding a review of the cost-benefit evaluation by Stanford Research Institute for a Prince Edward Island causeway as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,832 reported in Hansard, July 21, 1969 at page 11374.

• (5:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I think the motion I moved for the production of papers, a request was rejected by the government, speaks for itself. What is involved here, as far as I am concerned, is the question of how governments make decisions, on what information they make them, how much of that information should be made available to the public in general, what information should be kept private and confidential, and what reasons the government has for keeping such information private and confidential.

The subject of building a causeway from Prince Edward Island to the mainland of Canada has been debated for many years. I will leave it to members from the Maritimes, and from Prince Edward Island in particular, to discuss in greater detail, and with a good deal more knowledge than I, the necessity for such a causeway and the advantages to be gained from its construction. Suffice it for me to say that it was a Liberal government that promised the people of Prince Edward Island that, if elected, it would proceed with the building of a causeway which would thus obviate the necessity for moving from Prince Edward Island to the mainland of Canada by way of the ferry.

Estimates were made of the cost of constructing such a causeway. I speak from memory, but I think I am not far wrong in saying that the original estimate given to the public was for an amount in the neighbourhood of $140 million to $150 million. Subsequently, the government announced that a new estimate, amounting to $200 million or more, had been made of the cost of constructing a crossing. The cost was so high, and the benefits to be derived so slight, that the government felt it could not proceed with the project. Whether the fact that an election had been held and the Liberal party had been singularly unsuccessful in electing members from Prince Edward Island was a factor that influenced the government's decision I leave to members of the Liberal party to discuss if they so see fit. But the fact is that the decision was made not to proceed to construct the crossing.

I am not here today to contend that the original proposal to build the causeway was correct. I am not here today to say that the subsequent decision not to build the causeway was incorrect. I am not here to say that if a causeway could have been built for $140 million it would have been proper to build it. I am not here to say that if the causeway cost twice $140 million it is too expensive, and that we should not proceed with its construction. What I am saying today, and what in effect I am saying in my motion for the production of papers which I moved at the beginning of the session, is that I believe if meaningful decisions are to be made on this or on any other question, that if the ordinary residents of Prince Edward Island—in this particular case—are to know how such decisions are arrived at, and that if members of Parliament both in government and opposition parties are to be encouraged to reach any sensible conclusions, then surely the fullest information possible must be provided. Otherwise, members of Parliament, and I include government members who are not in the Cabinet as well as opposition members, merely become rubber stamps or ciphers. Without the fullest information on this or any other question, the public cannot be expected to make any meaningful, realistic and sound judgments.

We pride ourselves on living in a democratic society. I say that a democratic system of government cannot really be democratic or function effectively unless and until government, whether federal, provincial or municipal, is prepared to give to the people, who in the final analysis should make the decision, all the information they can properly be given. Of course, there are certain cases where information should be withheld. For example, the government is proposing to build new airports near Montreal and Toronto. The government therefore has the responsibility for purchasing the hundreds of thousands of acres of land which are required for the construction of the modern airports of today. No government could be expected to announce the precise location of such an airport, because to do so would be an invitation to the land speculator to squeeze every dollar he could out of the government. Thus, I recognize there are occasions when the government cannot disclose the details of a particular plan to the members of this House.

In this particular case the government, in its wisdom, made a promise to build a causeway to Prince Edward Island. Much as I disagree with Liberal governments, I cannot believe that this government promise the people of Prince Edward Island that it would build a causeway only because it was thought that in this way some Liberal members from Prince Edward Island might be elected. Even with the feelings I have about the Liberal party and Liberal governments. I cannot believe that. The government must have had some pretty detailed plans and comprehensive cost estimates with regard to the building of this causeway. They must have had some pretty complete documentation and cost benefit ratios in relation to this causeway to back the former government's promise to the people of the Maritimes that the causeway would be built. Later they decided not to build the causeway. I shall leave it to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and others to discuss the details of the causeway since they are much more competent and knowledgeable about it than I.

However, when the government decided not to build the causeway, members of the government must have had all the details concerning what the latest cost-estimate was. They must have had some information concerning the new cost-benefit ratio. Having made the decision first to go ahead, and later not to go ahead, I cannot see any reason why a government which has spoken so often about participatory democracy, a government led by a Prime Minister who so often has said he believes in dialogue or a government which has set up a whole new department, Information Canada, so that ostensibly the people can be told what government departments do and how government decisions are made, should always say no to any request made by any member of Parliament for such information. Unfortunately, it is usually only opposition members who ask for information.

I say this is unfortunate because I believe it indicates that government backbenchers are not doing the work they were elected to do. They function really as office boys for the government instead of members of Parliament. Few, if any, requests for the tabling of documents are agreed to by the government. In this session, as in every other session, there is a long list of motions for the production of papers on every aspect of Canadian life and dealing with questions which are of vital importance either to this country as a whole or to one area. Time after time we get from this arrogant government a simple, flat no. The government will not give to members of Parliament or to the people of Canada the information which they have every right to have. I say to the government that if it believes in the democratic system, if it believes in the kind of participatory democracy about which government members have spoken, if it believes in the right of the ordinary citizen to have all the knowledge he requests in order that he may make the kind of decisions about government policy which one would hope would be made in a democratic society, it should stop functioning within a mantle of secrecy.

The government should face up to the very simple proposition that instead of everything being private, every report, every study made by the government or for a government department should be made public. Then, the people of Canada will know more about those matters in which they are interested and will be able to decide how they should act on the basis of complete information rather than on the basis of the kind of misinformation we so frequently receive in this country when the government says no to the type of request I made in connection with this motion.

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult to find a constituency farther from the Prince Edward Island causeway than mine, but perhaps I may be permitted to enter the debate this afternoon for a few minutes as a member representing a coastal constituency. In my province, we have had to deal with island to mainland transportation over many years, so we have had some considerable experience with it. I know that later on the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) will bring to the debate his own first-hand knowledge and his feelings concerning the matter of transportation between his beautiful island and the mainland. I am not altogether unfamiliar with the territory involved. I have taken the trip across on a few occasions. In fact, I took a trip across to the island on one memorable occasion. When I was asked if I would enter the debate this afternoon, I looked up my office diary for 1968 in which I had put down some notes about that trip. I should like to recall them to mind this afternoon. As the scene unfolds it will perhaps become familiar to hon. gentlemen of this House. These diary notes read as follows:

> Monday, February 19, 1968. Arrived Moncton about noon. Cold—9 degrees below. Windy. Had lunch and left by bus for Tormentine to take the ferry to P.E.I. Many cars waiting. Went aboard to find angry crowd held up for hours while we drove from Moncton. Many others including kids and farmers with animals left in the cold. Ferry Abegweit, a 25-year-old railway ferry, all brass and mahogany. Car deck taken up with many rooms down both sides.

There were little brass plaques on the doors. I read the wording on them and noted it in my diary because it was very interesting to see so many rooms and cabins on the car-deck of a ferry which traverses a 9-mile gap. These rooms accommodated pantry stores, crews' mess, carpenter an boatswain stores, engineers' and officers' mess, crews' galley, seamens' mess, provisions stores, waiters, caterer, chief restaurant steward, stewards' smoking room, quartermaster, deckhand, second steward and oilers. The mystery was that any passengers were able to get on board. This was hardly a ferry, I found; it was a floating city which travels between Prince Edward Island and the mainland of New Brunswick.

My notes in the diary continued as follows:

> Lots of ice in the strait. Miserable facilities at both ends. Telephones between the terminals have been out of order for two months. Radio on the ship not working. Costs $1.65 to use the ship-to-shore telephone.

Then, the diary note concludes:

> Caught in snowbank for seven and a quarter hours and arrived Charlottetown midnight to hear the government had been defeated on its tax legislation.

I have never spent as memorable a night on the ferry services of British Columbia, Mr. Speaker. Let me contrast that with what has taken place in British Columbia. But first, may I say that if I were a regular user of this ferry service, were I a native of P.E.I., I too would be asking for a causeway. As I say, let me contrast that with what has taken place in the province of British Columbia. For many years, stretching back to the early days of the settlements on the west coast, we had a ferry service between the city of Vancouver on the mainland and Victoria on the southern tip of Vancouver Island.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I apologize to the hon. member, but I think I owe it to him and to all other hon. members to remind him and them that we have before us a motion which is limited in its terms. It calls for the tabling of certain documents. That is the motion that has been put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) for consideration by the House

For many decades it has been agreed and recognized that such motions provide for a debate which is narrow in its scope, and that hon. members participating in the debate ought to limit their contributions, within reasonable limits, to the question that the motion places before the House, namely, whether certain documents ought to be tabled or not. That is what we have to consider, and on which there should be a decision eventually.

I would think that even debate on the question of whether there should or should not be improvement in the ferry service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland would to some extent be out of order. What we should be discussing is whether documents should or should not be tabled. When we go to the other end of the world, the other side of the continent, and consider whether there should or should not be additional or improved ferry services between Vancouver Island and the mainland, I would think we are going far from the motion which is before the House. I appreciate that the hon. member is making a very interesting speech. We were all fascinated by his travelogue, but I would think an effort should be made, before the 20 minutes allotted to the hon. member expire, to come back to the motion which is before the House.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to continue just a little further, you will see how this connects up, and in a very pertinent way, with the motion that is before the House. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) said, we are here to urge the government to make sure that all the considerations were placed before the experts making the survey so that they could make a judgment in respect of the causeway. I think one of the judgments they would want to make, and which the government would want to see them make, is whether or not elimination of the ferry service and the building of a causeway are necessary, simply because there is not a competent ferry system which could be operated in that particular location.

My argument today is that when those documents are tabled, we should have tabled with them a competent examination of the ferry services to determine whether or not a causeway is in the best interests of the people concerned, and whether or not a competent ferry service could give the people what they require. I think that is pertinent to the argument being made, and is narrow enough to adhere to the point that is before the House. If such a study does not come forward with the documents, then I think the government has not properly instructed the experts on carrying out their survey, or the experts themselves have not gone far enough afield in their survey to determine whether or not adequate cost-benefits exist in a causeway. The experts should be prepared to point out other alternatives, and to present documents to the House in order to demonstrate those alternatives.

Following along this argument, I point out that in British Columbia we had experienced a ferry service quite akin to the kind of service that has existed for a long time between P.E.I. and the mainland. That ferry service was operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think this is germane to the argument I am making because in this instance we are speaking of railway operated ferry services. On the west coast, the ferry service grew old. The vessels grew old. The Empress Hotel in Victoria, one of the famous Canadian hotels, was beginning to run down. The CPR was considering whether or not it could maintain service to the hotel. People began to disregard the ferry service and to use air service. Air service expanded until 17 planes a day were running between Vancouver Island, Schwartz Bay airport and Pat Bay airport serving the city of Victoria.

Eventually, the provincial government decided to build its own ferry service, prompted first of all by completion of a tunnel which enables traffic to move very swiftly out of the heart of Vancouver to the ferry landing area, which is about at the 49th parallel. The ferries are of the most modern kind. They are end loaders. Cars roll off and on with great speed. Fast highways connect the ferry with the two cities at either end, and so what we are looking at, as compared with the former railway service, is a highway oriented ferry system designed to serve automobiles and trucks, and in no way connected with rails. It is based on having excellent highways open at all times for traffic, and fastloading and unloading. This leads one to believe that if a system such as this existed rather than the railway oriented system of Prince Edward Island, it might very well meet the needs of that island, and meet them for a long time, because the Canadian people will have to look at the very, very heavy cost of a causeway to serve that area. If legitimate alternatives exist, then those legitimate alternatives should be explored.

What happened after the highway-oriented service between the mainland and Vancouver Island went into operation? First of all the old Empress Hotel in Vancouver, which the CPR had thought it would have to phase out, suddenly became prosperous and today is being updated to take care of the additional service. Tourism has increased as a result of the improved traffic. What happened to the fast and cheap air service—17 planes a day to the island? The fast highways and fast ferries gave it competition. With the time needed for the drive to the airport, the air flight and the journey at the other end, the demand for air service has decreased to a few planes a day.

In considering the question of a causeway the very large cost involved must be considered. Is it possible that the people of Prince Edward Island would find that their needs could be satisfied with a highway-oriented road service and a ferry service, roads that were open year round to the main points served by the ferry, and terminals adequate to house people in subzero weather? Our experience shows that traffic expands when good service is provided, so there should be good maintenance. Ship-to-shore telephones should remain open, terminal telephones should operate efficiently, and in every way an excellent service should be provided.

If these conditions were made part of the study, I think we could compare this service with the cost of operating a causeway. The people of Prince Edward Island might find that they could have the enjoyment of their island without really connecting it to the mainland by a causeway; that they could have excellent service to and from the mainland to supply their needs and improve the tourist traffic. They might find this a better solution to the problem than waiting for the day when the people of Canada could find the quarter of a billion dollars to build the causeway they dream of.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the ever diligent and thoughtful member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) for taking an interest in this question. I congratulate him for two reasons: a diligent member should be seeking inportant information, especially information relevant to decisions regarding financial expenditures, and I commend him for correctly assessing that this important matter for which the report is requested is not regional or provincial but is a national issue. By bringing forward this motion he reveals himself as a good parliamentarian. I hope the motion will pass.

We are at a stage now where information concerning the causeway project is vitally important. In this respect I should like to refer briefly to the statement of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman). I know that his heart is in the right place and that he wishes us well, but I should like to cover a few points where his information might be inadequate.

In Prince Edward Island our greatest cash crop is not readily transportable by truck and so far has required a tremendous movement of reefer cars from the railway. So we are not in a position to abandon the railway at this stage of our economy or technology. I can think of no trucking company which would be in a position to send down the vast number of trucks and transfers required to market such a perishable and market-sensitive product as potatoes.

I would also point out that a comparison of the ferry service in the hon. member's province and mine must include one important ingredient, the fact that we have very heavy ice conditions. For this reason we must have powerful icebreakers to provide continuity and efficiency of service. The hon. member mentioned the ferry boat Abegweit which we crossed on together in 1968—not a luxurious vessel by any means. When one considers how many times that boat has to cross the strait in winter conditions, bucking ice, and that many of these men are on double shift, the fact that they have a little cabin to rest in between shifts cannot be regarded as luxury. It is an old ship, and the people of Prince Edward Island are concerned that it is the only icebreaker that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) is leaving with us. It has been in service since 1947. The people are not overjoyed either, with the government's decision to remove the largest and newest car ferry, the John Hamilton Gray.

The people of Canada, and particularly the Maritimes, have been given many conflicting stories about the cost of the Northumberland crossing. I would have thought the government would have welcomed the opportunity to produce this data. At first we were told that the causeway could be built for $105 million, then we were told $146 million. When the project got under way with magnificent spur railways and highways pathetically leading to the open sea and almost $20 million expended, we were told the cost would be well over $300 million.

When doubt was raised, Colonel Edward Churchill was engaged as a consultant for the Department of Public Works to study the project on the spot, to engage staff to investigate the matter and give an estimate of the cost. Colonel Churchill is a most eminent engineer and was involved in the construction of the Expo site. His recommendations are found in report No. 26 of the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, first session of the twenty-eighth Parliament. In answer to a question about the cost of the highway he said, as reported at page 443:

The $300 million figure was not mine, I do not know where it came from, and I think that I cannot make any comment other than to say it is a silly figure. I do not know where it came from.

A diligent member from Prince Edward Island, whose name I will not mention, then asked, "Silly because it is exaggerated?" Colonel Churchill, said "Because it is not true—and it certainly did not come from us." An hon. member then asked, "In your view, is it an exaggerated figure?" Colonel Churchill answered, "Yes." I then said, "Thank you very much." Sir, with this uncertainty, this confusion, this evasion and this repudiation by the government of Canada of a solemn commitment to build a permanent land link, is it any wonder that I should join with great sincerity in the matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North and ask this House for further information on this tremendously important matter?

Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North, I am concerned. In the age of Information Canada there seems to be a growing tendency to regard almost any document as being one which should not be revealed. Time after time that is the answer we receive in response to motions for the production of papers. I cannot believe that a democracy can be healthy if it is not informed. Thomas Jefferson enunciated that great truth many years ago. The denial of information surely cannot contribute to the effective and efficient dispatch of our business.

It is particularly important today that we know the true story and what is to be done about the Northumberland crossing. It is important because it may well be in the interests of the financial welfare of Canada that this permanent land link be built now. The particular ferry service which the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra talked about is a most expensive service and the subsidy required every year is rising at a rapid rate.

I have always believed, and Colonel Edward Churchill also stated this when being questioned, that it would be good, sound economics to build a permanent land link. If you incur year after year deficits of between $7 million and $10 million, you will soon reach the stage at which a land link, with a toll which would amortize its cost in a reasonable time, will be the better course of economic valour and political wisdom. Yet the people of Prince Edward Island today are uncertain about the cost, despite the fact that the surveying and studying of this great project began in 1956, quite a while ago. Some of the finest experts from three or four countries undertook that study.

Just two days ago I asked the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) if he had received proposals from the government of Prince Edward Island or private interests suggesting that they might build this land link with suitable co-operation from the government of Canada. The minister's answer was no. The press and other media in my province have indicated that such proposals are in the offing. Surely these people must know the financial facts. It is just as important for them to be known by the people for whom decisions are being made.

The people of Prince Edward Island are undergoing a severe diminution in the number of vessels provided for their transportation and for the transportation of their goods between the mainland and our province. The removal of the John Hamilton Gray, our fine, new ferry, was a backward step. So far as winter travel is concerned, we are now back to where we were 20 years ago and depend only on this old boat which the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra remembers so well from that stormy night.

It has been a long time since our province entered confederation on the promise that the dominion government would provide us with continuous and efficient transportation to the mainland. It has been a long time since we were reduced to one ship. That is why I believe it is most important for the government to comply with the motion and let the people of Canada, particularly the people of our region, know the facts.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, once again I rise to speak on a notice of motion for the production of papers. Frankly, I am surprised how many such motions appear on the order paper. Some hon. members opposite have suggested that this government acts secretly and it does not make information available. That is not in accordance with the facts. There are all sorts of sources of information available to us. I submit that rather than not getting enough information, those of us who want to do a good job are getting a surfeit of material to study. We are inundated with information. It is also not correct to say that none of these papers asked for are produced, because many of them are.

We are dealing with a specific motion in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) which asks for a copy of the report by C.B. Haver of Montreal for Northumberland Consultants Limited on a certain matter. When I read one of these motions for the production of papers of one type or another, my first reaction—I would be less than candid if I did not say this—is, "Why not?". For that reason I have made it a point to listen to reasons advanced by ministers or parliamentary secretaries as to why a particular letter, paper, document, study or report should not be produced.

By the same token, I have paid careful attention to reasons advanced by hon. members for having a certain paper or document produced. Unhappily, many of the reasons advanced by hon. members seem to be lost in other comments which they see fit to bootleg into the debate. The comments do not deal specifically with the notice of motion to produce papers but relate to the pet project of the hon. member speaking. I think it is only fair to say that hon. members on this side of the House probably take as much advantage of that opportunity to bootleg remarks into debate as do members of the opposition parties.

Those who have listened to these debates instead of taking part in them have found that some reasons for not producing papers are fairly obvious and are readily acceptable to the mover of the motion. I refer to the situation in which the production of papers, in the opinion of the minister, would affect the security of the nation. To be fair to hon. members moving motions of that kind, almost without exception they agree to withdraw them. Sometimes it is obvious that the hon. member is only fishing. He has heard a rumour or it has been suggested to him that a particular document exists, so he has put on the order paper a notice of motion for the production of the document, only to find when the minister or parliamentary secretary answers that the document does not exist or it is not the property of that minister.

Of course, the other reasons are also advanced by ministers, namely, that the document is a privileged communication between governments or that the federal government or the minister concerned has given the minister or officials of another government an undertaking that such document or documents will be treated as confidential. There are other reasons. This is the grey area into which we get and the reason we have this kind of debate. When a minister receives a report on study, or a document which is needed for internal use of the department, he is called upon to make this decision. He uses this as his reason.

There are times when an individual is asked to prepare a report. That individual, who may be a professor or an expert in a particular field, undertakes the study and reports to cabinet on the understanding that his conclusions will be treated as confidential. If the minister breaks this confidentiality he has broken faith with the individual to whom he has given his word. The minister finds himself in a difficult position. He feels he must honour the undertaking and not reveal the contents of the report because he earlier indicated he would not do so. Surely this is necessary so that the individual who is making the report can feel free to express himself in many areas although he may not be completely in accord with them. He tries out ideas on the minister or department which are, hopefully, backed up by the studies he has made.

Many documents are produced, but not particularly in fulfilment of notices of motions because for one reason or another in the opinion of the minister these documents cannot be produced. I was a member of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts when it was studying a particular subject. Approximately 1,400 contracts were made available to the committee which was studying only one phase of the matter. We have been told that 12 committees of this House are sitting today. From time to time motions are made in committee for the production of papers, documents, contracts or agreements. These are brought forward by the witnesses and made appendices to the minutes of the committee.

I believe other members wish to speak on this subject. There are other comments I would like to make; however, I have tried to make my point and stay within the four corners of the hon. member's motion. The minister has already indicated why this particular document cannot be produced. He stated that the report was prepared, in this instance, for use within the department and in his opinion at least it is a privileged document.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the motion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) relates to a notice of motion for production of papers, namely, the report by Mr. C. B. Haver in connection with the Prince Edward Island causeway. The motion reads:

> That an order of the House do issue for a copy of the report by C. B. Haver of Montreal for Northumberland Consultants Limited regarding a review of the cost-benefit evaluation by Stanford Research Institute for a Prince Edward Island causeway as mentioned in answer to question number 1,832 reported in Hansard July 21, 1969, at page 11374.

Hon. members have argued whether papers of this nature, which are internal working documents, should be made public. The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) has argued that many of these documents, especially those which relate to a purely internal matter, should not be made public.

Surely it is cabinet ministers and the government who have to make the big decision. If all the working documents prepared for them by civil servants were made public, both the cabinet and the civil servants would be put in an impossible situation. The cabinet has the overall responsibility to decide, whereas the civil servant only has to prepare a report on one specific aspect. The civil servant does not have to take the over-view of what will be the cost of government needs.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North said he was not arguing with the decision that was taken, or the cost of the project, but only the need for these papers to be made public. He argued that members of Parliament must have all information available. Surely this is a time when we want a great deal more background information. When making decisions, we are not prepared to fly blind without the necessary information. In this case the government has made a decision based on the economics of the situation which existed in the spring of 1969. It felt that this was the best course to follow, whether the cost was $140 million or $300 million to which it later escalated. The government had to decide whether it was worth while to spend that amount on that particular project at that time.

When the government decided not to proceed with the project, it announced a development program for the province of Prince Edward Island. The regional development committee met last year and had an opportunity to review with the officials of the province the effect of this program on the province.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hour for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair. This is April 1st.

> The sun was warm but the wind was chill.
> You know how it is with an April day;
> When the sun is out and the wind is still,
> You're one month on in the middle of May,
> But if you so much as dare to speak,
> A cloud comes over the sunlit arch,
> A wind comes off a frozen peak,
> And you're two months back in the middle of March.

I think it is good to remember that April is much more than April Fool's Day.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Richard in the chair.

On clause 14—Establishment of Ministries of State.

Mr. Hymmen: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity of making a few remarks on clause 14 at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hymmen: I shall be very brief.

An hon. Member: No; take your time.

Mr. Hymmen: I accept the invitation implicit in the statement of the hon. member for Peace River that no one on the government side could explain or express an opinion on this clause. Before I continue I should like to reply to what was said earlier today by the hon. member from Northumberland. We on this side of the House appreciate the hon. member from Northumberland, a former cabinet minister. We have missed him in the last couple of weeks, with his ready disposition and the jack-in-the-box way in which he directs questions to the Minister of Finance. Today he was talking about the Liberal pork-barrel. With all due respect, Mr. Chairman, I have not seen a Liberal pork-barrel. The only barrel I have seen is the one which was rolled out at the Kitchener Oktoberfest last year and which will be rolled out again this year in recognition of the presence of an important ethnic group from Germany.

The hon. member is not here this evening but I will ask him through you, Mr. Chairman, whether, speaking of pork-barrels, he would not care to approach his neighbour, a former member of the cabinet of the province of Ontario, Mr. Simonette, and maybe through his good friend, the hon. Mr. Davis, the hon. member for Northumberland could be appointed vice-chairman of some commission in the province of Ontario. Patronage is very evident in the province of Ontario, although I have not seen much Liberal patronage here.

I am reminded of a private member's bill introduced by the hon. member for Cochrane which suggested there was merit in appointing members of the House of Commons to places on boards and commissions. There is a good deal of merit in this idea—

An hon. Member: What about the Transport Commission?

Mr. Hymmen: —because it might result in better liaison between the legislative body and the various boards and commissions which, as we all know, are at arm's length from the government. Of course, the Hon. John Robarts who recently retired as Premier of Ontario was not able to solve this problem any more than we have been able to solve it. All the appointments to boards and commissions in Ontario have been made from the Conservative party, the government side. I think there are only about seven, or perhaps nine, supporters of that party in the legislative assembly who do not enjoy an additional appointment to some board or commission in the province.

Possibly this is done to provide extra income to the members of the legislative body in the province of Ontario, but I would remind hon. members that those who sit in the provincial legislature are in receipt of the same allowances and salary as we receive in the federal House. Moreover, many of them are not required to support two residences and incur all the extra expenses which Ottawa members have to meet.

Mr. Francis: Would my hon. friend permit a question? Is he aware that according to press reports, of all the members on the government side of the Ontario legislature only eight fail to receive additional income above and beyond their $12,000 emolument? This is in the last fiscal year.

Mr. Hymmen: This is the point I am trying to make. My hon. friend says there are eight. I suggested there were seven or nine. The number is in that area, and I am sure Mr. Davis will make some arrangement for the remaining eight or nine.

Mr. Yewchuk: Order. The hon. member is out of order.

Mr. Hymmen: I realize that, Mr. Chairman, and I do not wish to carry on in that vein. I wish to deal with the clause itself.

Mr. Yewchuk: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the discussion should pertain to Parliament rather than to the Ontario government's problems.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Yes. Having completed his introduction and perhaps laid a basis for his argument, the hon. member for Kitchener should now proceed to discuss the bill before us.

Mr. Hymmen: Yes, Mr. Chairman. At this point may I apologize to members of the opposition? On two occasions I referred to Northumberland. This was in error. I believe the constituency is Prince Edward-Hastings, not Northumberland. But that does not detract in any way from the remarks I made.

As far as clause 14 is concerned, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings and other members of the opposition, whether intentionally or otherwise, have completely missed the point. So has the right hon. member for Prince Albert who presided over a very important administration some years ago. These hon. members know that with increasing changes in our society today, it is becoming extremely difficult to govern. How many bills to reorganize the government did the former Conservative government bring in? We have been criticized for bringing in two. I say to the right hon. member for Prince Albert, whom many in the House admire—I admire him for his tenacity and for the fact that he has been many years in this Parliament—that had he followed the former leader of this party and taken his retirement, perhaps with the co-operation of this government he would have retired to the other place where he could have been placed on a pedestal for all of us to admire for the rest of his years. We have been criticized for the dictatorial attitude of our Prime Minister. We on this side of the House do not know who the leader of the official opposition is; certainly it is hard to know at the present time who does lead the official opposition.

If I may return to clause 14, I think the members of the opposition are missing the point. I have said that there are increasing problems confronting government in this twentieth century. Reference has been made to the number of parliamentary secretaries in the government. There are many very qualified ministers, respected in all parts of the House, who have no parliamentary secretary. I think, for example, of the Minister of Public Works, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Veterans Affairs, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs—a very important department—the Minister of Communications, the Minister of Supply and Services, the Minister of National Revenue—a new appointment—and also the Solicitor General.

The other day an hon. member accused me of trying to force my way through an open door. That is not my intention at all. I am just being goaded by the hon. member for Peace River and by other members of the House, whom I respect, to make a few brief remarks in support of clause 14 of this bill.

Mr. Baldwin: When are you going to start?

Mr. Hymmen: The idea of ministers of state has been borrowed from the mother of Parliaments at Westminster. A minister who sits just in front of me, the Minister without Portfolio who is responsible for housing, has been suggested, I believe, as the new minister of housing and urban affairs. The new Premier of the province of Ontario has just announced a very important housing program. He did not say what amount of federal funds would be involved, but housing and urban affairs is a very important responsibility of the provinces.

Some time ago the Prime Minister stated, during all the deliberations, meetings and conferences held on the subject of the Constitution, that we should live by the Constitution until we change it. Through the establishment of a minister of state with a secretary instead of a deputy minister we can perform a very important operation within our Constitution that will assist the provinces as well as ourselves without the creation of a large department of the kind the opposition seems to fear.

Another very important problem in this country is evidenced in the first report of the Senate Committee on Science Policy. This report suggests that the government appoint a minister of science. I suggest a minister of state for science would be very appropriate. Such an appointee could work with the Science Council and other bodies, with the assistance of a secretary within a small operation, rather than creating a separate department to design science policy. The same suggestion can be made with regard to the recommendations in the report on the status of women. In this way many other areas could be handled very nicely within our Constitution. Additional responsibility could be given to these people who would work with provincial authorities and others in the country, thus making a useful contribution to Canada.

I made this interjection because the hon. member for Peace River, who has done an excellent job as House leader for the official opposition, suggested that we in the backbenches are a bunch of sheep, that we are rubber-stamps for government bills.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Hymmen: I am very much sold on this government bill, and in the interest of passing clause 14 I shall now desist from making any further remarks.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, we are very pleased to have heard the intervention of the hon. member for Kitchener.

Mr. Schumacher: He is the only Liberal who has spoken today.

Mr. McGrath: Yes, the only supporter of the government who has had the nerve, the fortitude and courage to rise in his place today and make a contribution to this debate. I think the hon. member for Kitchener deserves a great deal of credit. Without his contribution we would have gone through the day debating this very important bill before us without any participation by members on the other side of the House. One might almost suspect that the legislation is meeting with the unanimous support of hon. members opposite.

Mr. Boulanger: Yes, that is right.

Mr. McGrath: I do not think that is so. I see on the other side some of my hon. friends who were former parliamentary secretaries but have now been demoted, put out to pasture. They sit there through this debate with long faces. I know they do not support this legislation. It is a matter of some regret to me that they do not see fit to make a contribution to the debate, as the hon. member for Kitchener has.

I also see the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry who is waiting patiently and anxiously to get the commendation of Parliament to go forth across the country on his white charger and be the Mr. Clean for all Canada. He is waiting to be proclaimed minister of the environment, when he will forget all about the department that gave him his start in public life—the Department of Fisheries and Forestry. The minister will go forward with all his new powers wrested from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—who is not here and is heartbroken at losing some of his powers—from the Minister of National Health and Welfare and from other ministers. I wish the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry would follow the hon. member for Kitchener and participate in this debate.

I observe the assistant government whip now leaving the chamber. He is one of the aspiring parliamentary secretaries who is hopefully waiting for the passage of the bill so he can receive his emolument. If he were to stay in the committee and listen, he might learn something and perhaps be provoked into making a contribution to the debate. He knows in his heart that Members of Parliament are concerned about what this government is doing.

Members of Parliament are concerned over the fact that this government by proclamation can set up new ministries of state, something which has been unheard of in the history of the Parliament of this country. The government will be able by proclamation to set up a ministry something akin to a department. This minister in this ministry of state, under the terms of this bill, will be in charge of policy. He will be formulating the development of policy, something which heretofore was strictly within the purview of the government. This, Mr. Chairman, is a matter of a great deal of concern even to the hon. member for Kitchener who just made a very brilliant intervention in this debate. What concerns me is that by the creation of these new ministries of state the government is giving a licence—I am glad the President of the Privy Council is in his seat—to still more members of the House to be absent from the House under the obnoxious and illegal roster system.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: This is a basic denial of the very fundamentals of responsible government whereby the government of this country must, on a day to day basis, be responsible to the elected representatives of the people.

An hon. Member: Where are the members?

Mr. McGrath: Where are the members? That is a very good question and one which deserves to be dealt with. Where are the members of the House today? Apart from the question period, when members of the ministry are absent due to the illegal roster system, members of the House are required to be in committee. Today 12 committees of this House met at a time when the House is in committee of the whole, which should indicate that this Committee would preclude any other committee of the House sitting because this is a committee of the whole House. Yet we have 12 committees scheduled today, comprising a total of 198 members of the House.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. McGrath: We have 30 members in the cabinet, which would give a total of 228, and Your Honour, the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker, which would give a grand total of 231. Then there are the absentees and the vacancies in the House. Mr. Chairman, who is to man this committee of the whole House when 12 committees are sitting with a total membership of 198? I will tell the hon. member for St. Boniface who will man the committees. Yesterday we sat with him in the Committee on Regional Development while hearing the estimates of the department. He was the only government member present. The only reason he was present is that he is vice-chairman of the committee. Today 12 committees met, and I know of committees of this House which met when there was nothing akin to a quorum. I know of one committee which sat today and heard evidence with just two members present. Now we are talking about creating five new ministries of state and increasing the number of parliamentary secretaries.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for St. Boniface on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I should like to tell the House that such was not my reason for being present at the committee meeting. I always attend meetings of the committees of which I am a member and I had reasons to believe that the hon. member who just had the floor would not be there and that for a while we could hear other members speak.

That is the reason why I insisted on remaining in the committee all afternoon.

[English]

Mr. Hees: It would be better if you were there now, Joe.

Mr. McGrath: So, Mr. Chairman, they make a mockery of this place; and by bringing in this particular amendment in this omnibus bill which would create still more ministries and which would give the government the right to create ministries by proclamation, the government is further adding to the erosion of the rights of the Parliament of Canada. Let us for a moment take a look at the roster system. What do we have on the government's roster system about the presence of members of the cabinet? On Monday we have 14 per cent of the cabinet present; on Tuesday we have 19 per cent of the cabinet present; on Wednesday we have a big day, with 20 per cent present. I am sorry; it should be 20 ministers present, which is 69 per cent. I will read those figures again. I am sure even members opposite will allow me to make that mistake.

An hon. Member: They did not know the difference.

Mr. McGrath: They did not know the difference. Only the assistant government whip was smart enough to know it. I would say that in itself should qualify him for one of the new parliamentary secretaryships: I hope he gets one. On Monday we have 14 ministers present, or 48 per cent; on Tuesday we have 19 ministers present, or 65 per cent; on Wednesday we have 20 ministers present, or 69 per cent; on Thursday we have 19 ministers present, or 65 per cent; and on Friday we have 15 members present, representing 52 per cent of the cabinet. That would be very fine if even all the ministers who were supposed to be here—

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River on a point of order.

Mr. Reid: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question. Would the hon. member give us the percentages in terms of the ministers who are supposed to be here, on the roster system, instead of the absolute figures which do not mean anything?

Mr. McGrath: All I can say to the hon. member, who is one of those who aspires to be a parliamentary secretary, is that under Standing Order 5 of this House every member is supposed to be in his place. That includes members of the cabinet. But let us stop for a moment and look at the new ministries of state which will be set up under the provisions of this particular part of the bill. There are to be five ministries of state set up by proclamation of the Governor in Council. There are only three of which we know, the Minister without Portfolio who is to be designated as the minister of urban affairs, the other Minister without Portfolio who is to be designated minister responsible for Information Canada, and a third Minister without Portfolio who is to be designated as the minister responsible for the Post Office.

Are we to assume that this is only a temporary situation? Are we to assume that by this innovation, this new designation of a ministry of state, we have a temporary situation? If we are to assume that, then are we to assume that the government looks upon urban problems in this country as a temporary situation? I suggest to you, Sir, and to the members of the committee that the problems facing the cities of Canada today, the great problems of urban transportation, housing and urban renewal, warrant the designation of a permanent department of urban affairs.

Why do we take this half measure? Why do we set up a minister of state for urban affairs whose responsibilities are somewhat less than those of a minister who presides over a full department of government? Is this to be a surreptitious way of changing the Constitution of the country? Is this something on the line of the government's roster system? Are we to have an inner and outer cabinet, as in Great Britain where they have members of the cabinet and junior ministers? If so, why doesn't the government say so, instead of trying to do it by this back door method?

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, may I have permission to ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I have but 20 minutes in committee of the whole.

Mr. Boulanger: It will be a short one.

Mr. McGrath: The hon. assistant government whip will be able to contribute to this debate later, or perhaps he will ask his question after I have used my 20 minutes and in that way I will have another 20 minutes to reply to him.

Mr. Boulanger: My question will not take 20 minutes to answer, if I have the hon. member's permission to ask it. Also, it will help him.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order.

Mr. McGrath: If the assistant government whip, who aspires to the full title, is prepared to guarantee that I will have unanimous consent of the committee to speak for additional time, I will entertain his question.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Boulanger: I do not think you will need any more time to say what you are saying now. But what I want to ask, in this English that I have been learning for the last ten years in this House—I hope it is getting better—is, what would you call a member being on duty in the House of Commons? What would you call a member being on duty in a committee, on duty in the House or working up on the Hill? Would you agree that when a member is doing these things he is on duty?

Mr. Bell: Explain.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I would invite the hon. member, for whom I have great respect, to make his own contribution to this debate and enlarge upon the very ambiguous question that he just put to me. What I am concerned about is that here we are considering a bill to reorganize the whole government of Canada, setting up new ministries of state, setting up additional parliamentary secretaries, setting up new departments, bringing in amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act, and yet we have so few contributions to the debate from members of the government. That is one of the reasons I entertained a question from the hon. member and it is one of the reasons for my hoping he will enlarge upon what he tried to say; and may I say I am sure he is intent and sincere about it. Let him contribute to the debate just as the hon. member for Kitchener did, who has now probably gone up to correct the blues since he is no longer in the Chamber.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Three of the five ministries of state are already designated, and Parliament is being asked to give the government a blank cheque with regard to the other two. I would like to ask, is Information Canada, established by government edict and proclamation, just a temporary thing? This is what we assume, since it is to come under one of the new ministers of state. Why doesn't Information Canada merit the attention of the Secretary of State? More particularly, if the government places so much, emphasis as it appears to place on Information Canada, why is it not made a complete department of the government?

I suggest that the government is trying to do what other governments, provincial governments, have already done. Here I think of the Liberal government in the province of Newfoundland which ensured the support of its own caucus by appointing a majority of its members to the cabinet. It appears that is what the federal government is intent on doing.

I emphasize the question that I put to the government House leader at five o'clock and which I repeat now. If this place is to mean anything, if we are to take our work seriously, does he think in his own heart, as a great parliamentarian, that this institution can be effective by having 12 standing committees of the House meeting on the same day and at the same time as the House is meeting in committee of the whole on a very important bill to reorganize the whole government structure?

Mr. Boulanger: There is only one committee tonight.

Mr. McGrath: The government House leader knows that there were committees meeting today and that there were committees meeting yesterday. He also knows that these committees are meeting without the benefit of a quorum. Mr. Chairman, these committees in most instances, if not all instances, are meeting illegally. Most of these committees are hearing evidence from important witnesses, including ministers of the Crown.

I point to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry who had the humiliating experience of having to sit in front of his own committee, the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, to consider a very important bill, the clean air bill, when there weren't even five members present. He had to listen to the senior officials of his department, including his deputy minister, give evidence on the bill without even five members present.

Mr. Corbin: When was that?

Mr. McGrath: That was a few days ago. The parliamentary secretary probably wasn't even present himself.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I have to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. McGrath: I was of the opinion that when I was interrupted by the assistant government whip with his question, I would be given extended time.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The Chair has already allowed three minutes for that.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The hon. member for Athabasca.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I was waiting for the light to go on.

Mr. Hees: You will never get the light on over there.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I know it is not the duty of the Chair to hurry debate in order to see bills passed, but the Chair does wish to hear arguments which may be in favour of or opposed to the bill. I have been trying to follow the thread of the arguments presented but there have been so many deviations that I have had trouble doing so.

Mr. Hees: That is because of the rude members on the Liberal side. They keep on interrupting, which is something we never do.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Chairman, I hope all members opposite are settling down because I do not want them to miss any of my very important comments. During the portion of the debate dealing with the establishment of ministries of state, as well as ministers of state, the debate has also touched upon a successive clause dealing with the establishment of a larger number of parliamentary secretaries. Throughout this debate the most visible and obvious contributions made by members on the government side were the continuous broad smiles on their faces during the course of the debate, particularly in dealing with part IV.

As I did not pay close attention to this bill at the onset of the debate, I became curious to know the reason for these large smiles. The reason becomes very obvious when we look at part IV and part V of this bill. The Prime Minister has finally come through with the bonanza that all these fellows have been waiting for for three years. I hope they are able to continue smiling when this bill is passed.

I notice, in particular, the hon. member for Kitchener was not only smiling but was drooling all over his necktie and on the front of his shirt. The hon. member for Sarnia is drooling, and the hon. member for St. Boniface as well as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. It might be reasonable to stop at this point and pass some supplementary estimates to buy bibs for these fellows to use until this bill gets through. I hope all those members who are smiling on the government backbenches will continue to smile when the bill is passed, and that their smiles will not turn into a look of guilt when they sit down and assess what they have done, namely, stuck their fingers into the people's piggy bank and come out with substantial loot to be used for their own personal gain at the expense of the already overburdened taxpayer.

As has been pointed out on several occasions during this and other debates, Canada already pays the highest per capita tax of the countries of the free world. On looking at part IV and part V of this bill, the first question that came to my mind was: What for? What possible reason could there be, in addition to the present 29 or 30 ministers and with the freedom to appoint an equal number of ministers without portfolio, to want a free hand to appoint an additional five ministers of state at the discretion of the Governor in Council, without consulting Parliament and without necessarily indicating the reason for such appointments.

Part IV states that these ministers will be responsible for formulation and development of policies. If this job is turned over to the ministers of state, what will the existing ministers be doing? What will all the civil service people be doing who are charged with this responsibility? What will the Prime Minister's burgeoning supportive staff be doing? It seems to me that this bill in part IV and part V is proposing to promote a shameful waste of public funds at a time when our economy is in very dire straits as a result of the government's actions. This is not the time to be wasting public funds.

This may be considered an effort by the government to solve in part the unemployment situation, but I wish to point out to the Prime Minister and his gang that the proposed additional ministers are already employed as members of Parliament and there is nothing stopping them assisting ministers on formulation and development of policy as members of Parliament. I cannot see that appointing them as ministers of state would increase their intelligence or their ability to develop and formulate policy.

However, if the government can show me that an appointment such as that would increase the ability of a member to formulate and develop policy, I would suggest all members of Parliament should receive such appointments to the great benefit of the country as a whole. Unfortunately, it appears at present that the great advantage will only be to the majority of Liberal members who will benefit from an extra salary of $15,000 per year. It is very questionable that they will be able to justify such an increased government expenditure.

Mr. Chairman, unless the Prime Minister, in whose name this bill stands, can offer an explanation besides the obvious one, namely, mercenary considerations on behalf of Liberal members, I cannot see any way in which we can support this bill. I would find it much easier to justify a decrease in the size of the cabinet. As an example, the minister responsible for Information Canada cannot really justify the existence of his department to the people of Canada. That department, along with the ministerial post, should be abolished.

The job held by the Secretary of State is hardly one that needs a separate department and minister. That ministerial post could easily be abolished and the department combined with another. The communications ministry could easily be abolished and combined with the Post Office. The three ministers involved in Treasury Board, finance and revenue could easily be cut down to two. The Department of Justice and the Department of the Solicitor General could be joined into one. There are many other examples of too many ministers. When one looks at this bill there are only two possibilities: they are either doing this to give themselves more high-paying jobs or they just do not have people with sufficient talent to handle the posts. Probably it is a little of each. It appears that there is nobody with sufficient ability to carry the responsibility, so it must be spread over the entire Liberal side of the House.

I would find it much easier to support this bill if government reorganization were in the direction I am suggesting. That could be much more easily justified to the Canadian people, in view of the massive unemployment and the need to keep government expenditures down in order to reduce taxation. This government has shown a greater and greater desire to turn responsibility over to Crown corporations, thereby decreasing even more the amount of responsibility by individual ministers. That, again, speaks for decreasing rather than increasing the number of ministers.

I also see part IV of this bill as a further effort to downgrade Parliament in law and in reality. The reason for this statement is that ministries of state may be estabished by the Governor in Council, by proclamation, without reference to Parliament. What the Prime Minister is saying, in effect, is that he does not feel Parliament has anything useful to contribute in deciding whether a new ministry should be established, and by this bill he is giving himself the authority to bypass Parliament completely and virtually make the decision on his own. This, along with the rule changes, along with the roster system which allows ministers to be absent from the House half the time, is very telling evidence that the Prime Minister is waging a cold and sinister war against the institution of Parliament.

A year or two ago the government made political capital by suggesting that they would cut down on civil service staff and on their expenditure, yet since that time the bureaucracy has been spreading at an ever-accelerating rate. In the past year the government has also attempted to make political capital from the war on inflation. Nevertheless this bill, which clearly involves a continuing enlargement of the bureaucracy, will vastly increase the inflationary process of this country. As many hon. members have said, part IV of this bill enables between 110 and 130 members on the government side to increase their pay and their status in Parliament. I want you to know, Mr. Chairman, that I object to this surreptitious and underhanded method which hon. members have used for raising their own pay by way of the back door, so to speak.

Mr. McGrath: Shame!

Mr. Yewchuk: If they are interested in that, they should be prepared to say so and face the consequences. Nevertheless, the fact that Liberal members will be getting an indirect pay raise is not our only great worry. Another great worry of mine stems from the fact that if they are given these appointments and these titles, they may feel in their minds that they must justify their existence and they are likely to do this by dreaming up more ways of spending huge amounts of the taxpayer's dollars. I do not need to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that this is the last thing Canada needs at this time. Furthermore, it is quite likely that each one will build up his own oversized, bureaucratic pyramid on top of which he can sit. That, again, will mean greater and greater expenditure of public funds. In view of these facts, I think the only logical solution regarding the difficulties connected with this bill is the withdrawal of parts IV and V, after which we may find it a little easier to support the measure.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman—

An hon. Member: This is a filibuster.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, since I was not given an opportunity earlier to finish my remarks, I should like to finish them now.

Mr. Boulanger: The hon. member was given that opportunity.

An hon. Member: He was offered three minutes.

Mr. Hees: Now he will probably take 20.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I asked the government House leader, who is now conferring with the President of the Treasury Board, what the situation will be when five new ministers have been added to the ministry. New parliamentary secretaries are to be appointed. In view of the already excessive number of committees that are meeting at present, I should like to ask, who is to look after the House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boulanger: Hon. members will.

Mr. McGrath: I think it would be worth while, for the edification of the assistant government whip who makes such brilliant interventions, to place on record the fact that while the House has been sitting in committee of the whole to consider an important bill affecting the entire organization of the government of Canada, 12 standing committees of the House have been scheduled to meet. That is a complete contradiction, Mr. Chairman: when the House is sitting in committee of the whole, how can other committees of the House sit at the same time?

Mr. Boulanger: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, there are not 12 committees sitting tonight. Only the Standing Committee on Agriculture is sitting. That does not mean that more members supporting the hon. member's party will be here tonight. Only one committee is sitting tonight and not 12.

Mr. McGrath: I thank the hon. member for that intervention. I refer him to Votes and Proceedings No. 108 for March 31, 1971, which indicates that the following committees are to meet on Thursday, April 1: the Standing Committee on Agriculture, which is scheduled for Thursday, April 1.

An hon. Member: It was to meet this morning.

Mr. McGrath: It is scheduled for Thursday, April 1.

Mr. Francis: For what time of day?

Mr. McGrath: The Standing Committee on Election Expenses is scheduled for Thursday, April 1.

Mr. Francis: At what time of day?

Mr. McGrath: The Standing Committee on Environmental Pollution is scheduled to meet on Thursday, April 1. That is a special committee.

An hon. Member: That was this morning.

Mr. McGrath: The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs is to meet on Thursday, April 1.

An hon. Member: At eleven o'clock in the morning.

Mr. McGrath: The Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry was to meet on Thursday, April 1, and the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs was also to meet on Thursday, April 1. The Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development was scheduled for Thursday, April 1.

Mr. Francis: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Chairman: Order, please. Will hon. members kindly resume their seats so that we may have order. The hon. member for Ottawa West is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, I understand that at this stage of the bill the debate must be relevant to the clause before the committee. I invite the hon. member to explain how his remarks are relevant to the matter before us.

Mr. Hees: That is not a point of order.

An hon. Member: That is a point of debate.

Mr. Francis: How relevant are his remarks to this clause?

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Ottawa West has raised a point of order. I hesitate to agree with him. I think the hon. member who has the floor has raised points that are relevant to the subject under consideration. His intervention related to the organization of government and how hon. members distribute their time. I think he may be nearing the point where his remarks are not relevant, but I think he is still within the bounds of relevancy.

Mr. Hees: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. May I continue? The Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is scheduled to meet today, Thursday, April 1. The Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Estimates is scheduled for Thursday, April 1.

An hon. Member: The Justice Committee was to meet at eleven o'clock this morning.

Mr. McGrath: The Standing Committee on Public Accounts was scheduled to meet on Thursday, April 1. Then, as if those were not enough, a subcommittee has been scheduled to meet. The subcommittee on Public Accounts was scheduled to meet today, Thursday, April 1. Then we have travelling committees, Mr. Chairman. The travelling, Special Joint Committee on the Constitution of Canada was to meet today in the ballroom of the King Edward Sheraton Hotel, Toronto. The same committee, dealing with the Constitution of Canada, is to meet again tomorrow.

Mr. Bell: One committee is in New Zealand.

Mr. McGrath: As my colleague says, Mr. Chairman, an ad hoc committee of this House at present is visiting New Zealand and is scheduled to visit Australia.

Mr. Baldwin: Right now they are rubbing noses with the Maoris.

Mr. McGrath: What is to become of the House of Commons? We have lost the right to grant supply. Supply is no longer one of the prerogatives of members of Parliament. All the estimates of the House of Commons will be passed by a certain hour on a certain date. Now we have even lost the right to examine the estimates and to examine all the legislation coming before this House. No member of the House, Mr. Chairman, can be in more than one place at the same time. Yet members of Parliament are expected to examine every bill that comes before this House, including this important measure which at this moment is before committee of the whole.

At the same time they are expected, in committee, to examine the estimates of the various departments of government. They are expected to examine the clean air bill in the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, and the marketing bill which is presently before the Standing Committee on Agriculture. They are expected to consider the Constitution of Canada, which is being dealt with by a special committee of this House. They are expected to do all these things at the same time. I ask you, Sir, what is the role of the House of Commons which is meeting now in an exceptional session of committee of the whole?

An hon. Member: To be a rubber-stamp.

Mr. McGrath: The House is meeting in an extraordinary session in committee of the whole.

An hon. Member: With three ministers present.

Mr. McGrath: With three ministers present. The President of the Treasury Board is here. He has taken responsibility for this legislation. It is in the name of the Prime Minister of Canada, who has not seen fit to attend on a single occasion when this legislation has been debated in committee of the whole.

Mr. Baldwin: Shame!

Mr. McGrath: Although the legislation is in the Prime Minister's name, the Prime Minister has not seen fit to attend. Mr. Chairman, the President of the Treasury Board has had to carry the load by himself.

Mr. Bell: He is the Joe-boy.

Mr. McGrath: He is the Joe-boy of the cabinet. He has been expected to deal with matters concerning energy, mines and resources, fisheries and forestry, the environment, the ecology and pollution. He has had to deal with the Public Service Superannuation Act, and now he has to deal with ministers of state, a whole new area in the organization of the government of Canada. He has to deal with the section of the bill covering parliamentary secretaries.

• (9:00 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: All that talk, and we are going to the dogs.

Mr. McGrath: As a consequence of the attitude of this government, the House of Commons is going to the dogs. That is what bothers and concerns me. Day after day we are examining this most important omnibus bill which concerns seven major statutes. Any one of them would require from one to three days' debate. All this time the government and, more especially, the supporters of the government, sit passively as though they were members of the presidium of the Soviet Union which is only there to rubber stamp legislation.

Are we to assume that this legislation received the debate in the caucus of the Liberal party that we are now trying to give it? That is the only way we can reconcile the attitude of members opposite who sit passively and make no contribution to this debate. Members opposite accuse us of mounting a filibuster.

Mr. Francis: This is your second speech tonight.

Mr. McGrath: If giving legislation as important as this the time and attention it deserves is a filibuster, all I can say to those members opposite who make that accusation is that they have a very poor attitude toward the Parliamentary process.

Mr. Baldwin: We need more filibusters.

Mr. McGrath: As my colleague has just said, what this House needs is more filibusters.

Mr. Drury: We have a good one now.

Mr. McGrath: If that is what members opposite call a filibuster, I say what this House needs is more filibusters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Before passing this very important part of the bill, which will allow the government to set up five new ministries, something akin to new departments, by proclamation without the due Parliamentary process, I hope that the relatively few who have some backbone will express their reservations and grave concern about what this government is doing to Parliament.

Mr. Francis: You are breaking my heart.

Mr. McGrath: My heart goes out to the chief government whip because he has to face the people of Ottawa, including the thousands of civil servants in this city, notwithstanding this bill, the superannuation amendment, to which he gave consent, and the amendment of the hon. member of the New Democratic Party which he voted against.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Hees: And he is the whip.

Mr. McGrath: He deserves our sympathy because he is going to need it. He is going to need all the sympathy he can get when he faces the public servants who reside in his constituency and who sent him here to represent their best interests.

Mr. Hees: And are they ever disappointed!

Mr. McGrath: I suggest to the government whip that these public servants have been shortchanged.

Mr. Boulanger: He will be back here and you will not.

Mr. Hees: That is not what the people tell us.

Mr. McGrath: The fact that we have this omnibus bill before us is cause for great concern. To bring in this provision allowing the setting up of ministries of state by proclamation is unknown in our constitutional process. We have ministers without portfolio and ministers in charge of departments. We are now going to have ministers of state. Obviously, urban affairs do not warrant the attention of a full department; nor does Information Canada warrant the attention of a full department. We wonder exactly what the government has in mind for the others. We are concerned because it is a bad parliamentary principle to ask legislators to give the government this blanket endorsement, a blank cheque. I will now return to where I began.

Mr. Boulanger: Do you remember where you started?

Mr. McGrath: I come back to the iniquitous practice of the roster system and the practice of this government of having standing committees of this House meet while the House is in session. By design or accident, both provisions have the end result of depriving the members of this House of their fundamental rights.

Mr. Jerome: That is not right.

Mr. McGrath: That is true, and the hon. member knows it is true. He is a student of the rules of Parliament. He is the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. He knows it is true. If the hon. member quarrels with that argument, he should get to his feet. He knows that these two provisions, coupled with the new rules of the House whereby the House no longer has the right to withhold supply, have virtually killed, destroyed and made a mockery of Parliament. The Parliament of Canada is supposed to be responsible. With this government it is nothing more than a pale imitation of the presidium of the U.S.S.R.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I am now going to give the other side of the story.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: That is what we have been waiting for.

Mr. Boulanger: In order to practise my English, I will speak in English. I may make a few mistakes, but I have the courage to do it so that my predecessor will understand what I am trying to say. The last remark in the hon. member's speech was a very old one—mockery of Parliament. If hon. members want an example of mockery, they have it in the hon. member who just resumed his seat.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boulanger: Any member who makes a speech and then two minutes later speaks for another 15 minutes, saying things which do not relate to the bill and only trying to prove to the Canadian people that members of this House do not work or do practically nothing, is very close to being dishonest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boulanger: This is April 1, April Fool's Day. The hon. member is trying to fool us. I will give the true story with regard to the committees which met today. The hon. member stated that 12 committees met today. That is not true. While the House was sitting today, the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs met at 3.30 p.m. There were more members in the chamber at that time than there are at present. The other committee which met at 3.30 today was the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. The third committee sitting while the House was sitting, at 3.30 on April 1, was the Public Accounts subcommittee, and tonight the only committee which is sitting is the Agriculture Committee. This is the situation in plain English.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Where was the Committee on the Constitution?

Mr. Boulanger: You see, Mr. Chairman, they ask us to speak and when we do get up they are afraid.

Mr. Schumacher: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. In all fairness to the committee, the hon. member who was enumerating the committees which were sitting at 3.30 should call attention to the fact that the Agriculture Committee was sitting and that the subcommittee of the Public Accounts Committee was sitting.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boulanger: I am surprised at the hon. member. I thought my English had improved. Apparently the hon. member does not understand good English either. If hon. members opposite talk about mockery, I must say I have not seen so well-organized a filibuster as we have witnessed in the last two or three days. I have nothing against the opposition. Most of them are good friends of mine. I chum around with them. They are good people. But when they come into the House they seem to be completely changed. I say this because the public has to know the truth.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boulanger: We all work hard here, the opposition included. We work as legislators and do our best to carry out a responsible job. When hon. members get up and make speeches like the one we have just heard, it is not the government they are harming, it is themselves. Speeches like the one we have just heard destroy the image of this Parliament. They ignore the fact that when a member gets to the Hill on Monday morning he is on duty all the week until Friday night. That is truth. That is what you should tell people.

Very often a member has visitors. His electors come to see him with various problems and he has to look after these people. It is suggested we are doing nothing because we do not reply to speeches—well, I will call them speeches—which are made in the House by members of the opposition. Mr. Chairman, if we were to get up and answer every piece of foolishness we hear, we should all be crazy in one week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Boulanger: I think I shall turn back to French, Mr. Chairman, because my temper is getting a little hot.

I shall close by telling you very seriously that a member of the House, in committee or in his office—and the public must realize that—is not here to play or fool around, but we are here, the members of the opposition as well as the members of the government, to work honestly for the people.

Therefore, I believe that speeches as I have heard since eight o'clock tonight are a mockery of the parliament!

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, at the invitation of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger), I would like to try to speak as honestly as possible.

The committee of the whole is studying clause 14 of bill C-207 entitled "An Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto."

I will therefore limit my comments to this clause.

Mr. Chairman, I would like, for the information of my hon. colleagues, to divide clause 14 into four parts, and analyze them one by one.

Here is what the first part of clause 14 stipulates:

Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters—

Mr. Chairman, that is to say that the first part of clause 14 which I just quoted indicates the government's purpose which is to meet requirements of new policies to be formulated. In fact, it will be noted, that part of clause 14 refers to requirements —for formulating and developing new policies—

Mr. Chairman, we agree that new policies must be adopted. No member will deny that. Besides, the problem is not at that level. There is no reference in this first part to the implementation of these policies nor to what they will involve. The only reason given to justify the establishment of these new ministries of state is that there are —requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies—

What is a new and comprehensive policy? What does it involve? What problems does it correspond to?

Mr. Chairman, clause 14 contains no reply either in the letter or in the spirit. There is no reference to implementation of new policies. Only formulation and development are mentioned.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, only studies, analyses or inquiries are referred to.

In other words, they will create a ministry headed by a minister who will make studies, analyses, surveys, develop a new policy, but will not administer them and will not take measures to solve a specific problem. They will be content with conducting studies.

Mr. Chairman, this is, in elusive terms, a judicial mess which cannot satisfy hon. members. This is why we are having this debate which we would like to be constructive.

The first part of clause 14 does not justify the establishment of ministers and ministries of state, this is merely eye-wash. The purpose of clause 14, the very principle of the creation of five new ministries and five new ministers of state is the following: "formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies".

Mr. Chairman, it is regrettable that there is no mention of application, that there is no specification of what is meant. Furthermore, none of the government members have given us this information. To oblige them, to speed up the work, we should vote blindly. No, Mr. Chairman. One may accept the principle of the formulation of "new policies" but at the same time one must not be afraid to ask for information. The clause does not specify either in what fields exactly such new policies will be formulated; it only states that policies will be formulated, that such policies will have to be new and comprehensive.

Mr. Chairman, would this mean that, through this clause, the government admits that its present policy is old-fashioned and unintelligible? I would not go so far as to say that, but why speak of a new and comprehensive policy if the government is unable to justify it?

We must also note, Mr. Chairman, that the first part of clause 14 does not specify the number of areas referred to. No general indication is given about the areas which would need a new and comprehensive policy; it is only stated that it will be related to one or several matters.

Indeed, the second part of clause 14 reads as follows:

—the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters—

...warrant the establishment of a "special portion". No reference is made to a normal portion usually found in a normal department, but a "special portion". What does "special portion" mean? What is this new invention of the government?

Mr. Chairman, we do not get an answer to the question either:

—presided over by a Minister—

There is the second part of clause 14. In short, in the second part of clause 14, there is a question of establishing "a special portion...presided over by a Minister". Does it mean that this minister will have a special status, compared to other ministers? It would matter greatly to get an answer to this question.

What will be the relationship between the House and the ministers who will preside over a special portion? And will this agency constitute a crown corporation with mixed participation, or a mandatory crown corporation? Will it be merely a ministry of state? Or rather a sort of make-believe ministry, not responsible to parliament?

Mr. Chairman, I have no preconceived opinion on this question. I am merely asking it. We are expecting an answer.

So we want to establish, to face a special "portion", a ministry presided over by a minister. Why then this "special portion"? What can justify the development of a special policy in Canada? What is this? To put it in a nutshell, in the second part of clause 14 we are told that a "special portion" will be presided over by a minister of state. This is therefore an excuse as the first part of the clause does not say what this new and comprehensive policy consists of. We are not told either what is meant by a "special portion". We cannot guess why a minister should be put in charge of such a service.

This is why we will fiercely oppose the passing of this part of Bill C-207 as long as the government does not specify its intentions in this regard, because as far as we are concerned this is a foolish and unjustified way of spending public funds.

Mr. Chairman, if the government leaves us in the dark because it does not know what is going on, we must conclude that this part of the bill is in fact a pretext to designate ministers of state.

I am still on clause 14 part of which reads as follows:

—a Minister charged with responsibility for formulation and development of such policies—

Not for their implementation, Mr. Chairman! It is not said: "a Minister charged with responsibility for implementation of such policies". No. There is no mention of implementation, no talk of translating words into action. Nothing is said of tackling specific problems in particular areas. The clause merely states that the minister designated to preside over the ministry will be charged with the sole responsibility and function of formulating and developping "new and comprehensive policies".

Why "new and comprehensive policies"? What does this responsibility consist of? Does that mean that the ministers responsible for those ministries will have absolutely no influence on present policy and administration? Mr. Chairman, that is obviously what this clause would have us believe.

Mention should at least be made in this clause of application. On the contrary, it speaks merely of "formulating and developing policies".

To understand clearly what the responsibilities of the minister will be, let us go back to the first part of clause 14 and find out why a ministry is to be set up. No reason is given. This may enlighten us with regard to the responsibilities of the minister!

I quote once more from the first part of the clause:

—the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters—

This is the purpose to achieve. This is the justification for appointing a minister of state and for creating five new ministries, and thanks to this obscure wording, a minister will be appointed who will have no power to influence policies directly but who will only have the power to study.

Mr. Chairman, to conclude this rapid analysis, I should like now that we consider this part of clause 14, and I quote:

—the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a ministry of State for that purpose.

Because "new and comprehensive policies" have to be drawn up, so says the government, a minister will be appointed at the head of a department, the so-called "special portion". Who is going to create the department? Who is going to appoint the minister?

Mr. Chairman, not parliament, not you, nor I, nor hon. members opposite either, nor my own colleagues. Who then? The people's representatives? No, Mr. Chairman. Clause 14 states clearly and I repeat:

—the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

This means the cabinet will create those departments and appoint those ministers. It will not need the authority of the House. All the Prime Minister needs to do is to convene the cabinet, establish the Ministry of State, give it a name and hand a reward to a new minister without coming before the institution that controls the taxpayers' money, namely Parliament.

Mr. Chairman, this is an infringement of our democratic system, a direct blow to Parliament which is entitled to scrutinize the administration of the country.

And I would use the same language if the Progressive Conservative party or the New Democratic party were in office. A principle is at stake. Will Parliament exercise control on the establishment of those ministries and ministers of state? If not, why should the government ignore Parliament when, last year or the year before, it did consult it to establish other departments? Why, at the present time, should some ministers be appointed without the agreement of the House, whereas others could not be appointed in such conditions? That is already unfair to the 29 other ministers who have submitted to the will of the House. Why a preferred treatment for some, while others will have to abide by the democratic requirements of this institution?

Mr. Chairman, if we get no answer to that question, we are entitled to believe two things. The first is that the government does not care about Parliament, and the second is that the government wishes to hurry to appoint certain persons to positions which will mean for them a title and a higher allowance.

Mr. Chairman, here is then in my opinion an indirect way to vote oneself a $15,000 yearly increase over and above one's allowance.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, I am quite puzzled by the fact that the government refuses to consult Parliament.

This is why I am proposing, supported by the member for Roberval (M. Gauthier), the following amendment to clause 14, in view of the explanation and of the analysis I have just made:

That clause 14 of the Act respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto be amended by striking out lines 22 to 24 and substituting therefor:

"Parliament may pass an Act amending the Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and having the effect of creating a Ministry of State."

Mr. Chairman, it will be noted that in this amendment I am respecting the government's wish to create more ministries of state. But, as a member of Parliament, I request the government to respect this supreme institution and to submit to Parliament any decision aimed at setting up any ministry of state since Parliament is the sole body in a position to decide on the establishment of a ministry of state.

I find this request reasonable and honest. The member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger) who, a few moments ago, appealed to our honesty can testify to it. He cannot say now that I am guilty of partisan politics.

Mr. Chairman, I think that this is a serious and positive proposal. It may be read in the bill that:

—the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

I wish it would be written instead: parliament may establish a ministry of state. Why should there be an exceptional situation in the case of some ministries of state, while all other ministers, when their departments were established, had to face parliament?

Mr. Chairman, this is an illogic thing, unacceptable to parliament. This why there are pretty stormy debates now in this House, and I think it is normal, understandable and important.

I therefore table a copy of this amendment.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière has moved an amendment. I must apologize to the committee that my facility in French is not as good as I would like it to be. I hope I can improve it rapidly. I think this is a very important amendment and that the matter with which it deals is very important. If I have leave of the committee, and if hon. members wish to make a contribution, I should like to consider the amendment and having considered it perhaps invite argument. I think it is a very important point and I would not want to deal with it rapidly.

Mr. Francis: Could we have the amendment read, Mr. Chairman? Some of us had a little difficulty following it.

[Translation]

The Chairman: I would ask the Clerk of the House to read the amendment in French:

(And the Clerk Assistant (Legal Affairs) having read the following amendment)

Mr. Fortin moved:

That clause 14 of the Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be amended by deleting lines 23 to 25 and substituting therefor the following:

"Parliament may pass an Act amending the Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and having the effect of creating a Ministry of State."

[English]

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. There is a mistake in the way the Clerk Assistant read the amendment in French, because it does not say, ..."gouvernement du Canada", it says, "la loi concernant l'organisation du Canada".

There has been a mistake made by either the hon. member or in the reading. The words "gouvernement du Canada" are not in the amendment.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Mercier raises a point which other hon. members might wish to consider. It is a very important point. I wonder if it is a substantive motion which we might have some difficulty dealing with in committee. However, I wonder whether hon. members would be prepared to assist the Chair in due course, or now. I am in the hands of hon. members.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, we are prepared to accept your suggestion. Your Honour might like to consider the amendment between now and next Monday.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, we would like to argue that the amendment is not in order. The amendment has the effect of saying that Parliament at some future date could present a law to this House to do something or other. I cannot see how the bill before us could be modified in a hypothetical fashion to attempt in some way to give this Parliament or a future Parliament the power to do something in the future. It would seem to me that this is a hypothetical amendment and it is out of order.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Ottawa West has raised a variation of the argument, but we would like an opportunity to consider it. In some ways he may be quite right, but I would urge that we not have further discussion at this time because so far as we are concerned one hon. member at least is most anxious to participate in the debate. Having in mind the time, we might proceed so that Your Honour and Mr. Speaker will have a chance to consider the amendment and bring down a decision either tomorrow or Monday, as the case may be, depending on the progress the government allows us to make on this bill.

The Chairman: Order. As I have indicated, I am not prepared to deal with the amendment now because I want the advice of hon. members. I have very serious doubts that it is in order. I think it is a substantive matter in the form of a declaration which very well may not be in order. But I think hon. members should have copies of the amendment so they may study it before it is put to the committee. If it is agreed, I think we might deal with it the next time the committee meets, because other hon. members wish to engage in the debate.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Chairman, I think your decision was correct and proper, because an important amendment like this should be considered over the weekend. I felt rather hurt by some of the comments made by the hon. member for Mercier who said that we were obstructing passage of the bill. Maybe I have too sensitive a nature to be here, but I do feel deeply about his comments.

I did not follow progress of the bill too closely, at least until the last day or so, because some of us, dedicated, sincere, interested individuals have been working in the agricultural committee trying to get a few minor changes made but meeting a very difficult situation. It almost seems like a filibuster by government members to drag the committee out and not accept minor changes. In fact, even tonight they turned down a very useful amendment with regard to appeals. People are to be denied the right of appeal.

When I first looked at this bill, the title of which says it is an act respecting the organization of the government, I thought it was a good one because any reorganization of the government would be better than what we have at present. I think it was the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert who said yesterday that this bill could be sung to the tune of "Roll out the Barrel." There is logic in that because it does look like a pork-barrel manoeuvre on the part of the government.

The Chairman: Order, please. I heard the right hon. gentleman speak yesterday and he dealt substantially with part IV of the bill, which is what we are dealing with now. I would invite the hon. member to deal with that part of the bill which is headed "Ministries and Ministers of State." The statements the right hon. gentleman made were really in reference to that part of the bill. I think that in general we may be straying a little from part IV and I would hope we could return to it.

Mr. Downey: I appreciate what you have said, Mr. Chairman. Probably in my enthusiasm I wanted to cover as much of the bill as I could. Hon. members opposite seem to be taking turns sitting in the chamber. Some of them may not have been able to understand the full meaning of the bill and I thought I would help them a little and cover some of the ground that had been covered previously. I apologize if I seem to have wandered to some extent. It seemed to me that the hon. member for Mercier also wandered a little in his remarks.

It is an old trick for a government, when it runs into a messy sort of situation such as exists today, to try to diffuse responsibility as much as possible. Under the term of this bill some 110 members may hold positions of one kind or another. That is a tremendous diffusion of responsibility. It is very useful to be able to say, "That isn't quite in my department. See the chap in the other office about it," or to say, "That fellow is out of town." I imagine if you had 110 people either serving in the cabinet or as parliamentary secretaries, at least 30 or 40 of them would be out of town at any one time. This would make it difficult to pin down where responsibility lay.

I have been told of a situation in one department in Ottawa where there are people who make their living simply by moving the position of papers in files. Requests and documents build up over the years. The person responsible takes the ones from the bottom of the pile and places them on top. It is just like shuffling a deck of cards. For some people it may mean that their requests, scheduled to be dealt with in six months' time, can be handled in a matter of weeks.

I believe it was the hon. member for St. John's East who commented on Information Canada. It is a new department and provides a parallel with the proposed ministries of state. Some weeks ago a document came into my office from Information Canada enumerating all that Information Canada had done. I do not have it with me but it said something to the effect: We had four letters on this subject and three letters on that subject. It listed about 28 or 30 letters and I understood that was the total number of requests for information it had received. Probably Information Canada was busy answering those letters. I presume it also produces the glossy reprints of minister's speeches, sends them across the country and sees that they reach Members of Parliament. But the sum total of work enumerated did not amount to any more correspondence than would go through a Member of Parliament's office in the course of half a day. Most of us thought that Information Canada would receive a flood of mail.

The subject of committee meetings has been mentioned in this debate. I wish to give an example of one committee meeting. A week or two ago I walked into a meeting of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee. There were three or four members present, sitting, dozing, and listening to evidence. They were passing millions of dollars worth of estimates and were actually sitting around dozing as if they did not have any responsibility. I only wish the people who voted for them could have seen what was happening.

The Chairman: Order, please. With respect, I again invite the hon. member to confine his remarks to the general ambit of part IV, ministries of state for specific purposes. When the hon. member deals at length with committees, and so on, he may be outside of the bounds of relevancy.

Mr. Downey: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I made an error in the notes that I had written for myself tonight.

An hon. Member: Several.

Mr. Downey: I thought this said "Secretary of State" instead of "ministers" and I thought if we have any more departments run the way this chap runs his, we are really going to be in trouble.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Downey: If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I shall tell a little story which illustrates quite graphically what is going on.

An hon. Member: Spare us.

Mr. Downey: This is something I heard out in the cow country and it may be very pertinent to the situation here. A chap who was sick went to doctors all over the place and they could not find what was wrong with him.

An hon. Member: He was probably a Stanfield Tory.

Mr. Downey: He travelled all over the world, and it was not until he met up with a Chinese herbalist that he got a diagnosis. The herbalist looked at him and said, "I know what is wrong with you. What you need is an ounce of dried human brains." This was an unusual prescription so the fellow asked, Where will I find this?" The herbalist said, "I have a whole office full of them here. I have cowboys' brains at $10 an ounce, doctors' brains at $250 an ounce, and I have Liberals' brains at $500 an ounce". The patient wanted to know if Liberals were that much smarter than cowboys, or why the difference in price. He was told "No, it is not that way at all. We can get cowboys brains anywhere, but you wouldn't believe how many Liberals we have to knock on the head to find an ounce of brains."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bell: Explain.

Mr. Downey: I apologize to members on the other side. I do not mean to offend anyone, because I know that basically they must feel the way they do about a lot of things. However, they are subject to the type of leadership they have and I guess we can't do anything about that.

I should mention something about the democratic process and relate this to committees. I realize that when too many people become involved it is difficult for the democratic process to work. If this bill were to go through we would have the situation where too many people would be involved. I cannot see that it could perform any useful function. As the hon. member for Athabasca stated, there should be a consolidation of departments rather than this diffusion of departments and the resultant diffusion of responsibility. This can be exemplified by the department of regional incentives which I believe is a new department within the last few years.

An hon. Member: You are still confused.

Mr. Downey: We have people who go around and pick out industries in various provinces and give them grants. I do not know how well equipped they are for the job, because there has been some question about their business experience. I would hate to hint at this, Mr. Chairman, but it seems that maybe some of the funds dispensed this way may find their way back in campaign funds or something like that. It is hard to say. I would not want to say that is the way it is, but it could be.

There seems to be a lot of enthusiasm for this debate and I am surprised that there are not more government members rising to speak. This is the way it is in the agriculture committee. A lot of complaining is done, but we do not find the degree of participation that there should be from the government. I sometimes feel that they do not even listen, that we are just being ignored. The other night we were discussing the wording of a clause to promote a viable agricultural industry—

The Chairman: Order, please.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House Leader what his intentions are for tomorrow?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose to continue with the bill presently under consideration in committee of the whole. If that should pass, we would call a number of other items: Bill C-3, an act respecting investment companies; Bill S-5, respecting weights and measures; Bill S-11, respecting weather modification activities, and Bill S-13 respecting the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—ISRAELI-ARAB CONFLICT—SUGGESTED REPRESENTATIONS TO ISRAEL RESPECTING PEACE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, when I asked this question on March 4 I was much concerned lest the favourable developments in the Middle East situation should not be taken advantage of by all those concerned with stabilizing the fragile peace in that crucial area. One very difficult aspect of the diplomacy or non-diplomacy respecting the area has been the complete refusal of the Arab states to recognize the existence of the state of Israel. It was because a forward move in this direction had been indicated by the statement of President Sadat at the U.A.R. that some dimunition in the tensions surrounding the Middle East confrontations developed. It was, and is, my view that friends of peace and friends of Israel should allow no opportunity to pass to nurture and nourish any possible hope of or portent for a less hostile posture in this part of the world which has for so long been a tinder-box.

I have long felt that the grim prospects of major warfare stemming from explosions in the Middle East are very real. Not so long ago President Nixon asserted that there was probably greater danger of great power involvement and conflict stemming from the Middle East crisis than from the Viet Nam war, awful and tragic though that conflagration be. I recently read an article by Max Lerner, the distinguished scholar and columnist, which began by saying:

> Just as the shadow of Southeast Asia hung over the 1960s, that of the Middle East is likely to hang over the 1970s. The problem of the Nixon administration is to make the Soviet Union and the American public—both of them—understand how dark this shadow is.

We have all rejoiced in the cease-fire and I think much credit is due to the efforts of United States Secretary of State Rogers. It is encouraging that even after the formal termination of the cease-fire there has been negligible military action across these hostile frontiers. In all of this it seems that the Canadian position has been one of glorious detachment. As the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) said, it is a Pontius Pilate role. But we cannot wash our hands of the matter. As a founding member of the United Nations, Canada was involved in the creation of the state of Israel. We are involved in peacekeeping and supervision roles. We were a member of the Security Council which adopted Resolution 242 after the 1967 war. We are involved. We have contacts with and diplomatic missions in countries on both sides. But have we tried to use our good offices or have we, as is our wont, folded our hands and looked piously in the other direction?

Of late there have been many indications that this country has developed a type of diplomatic laryngitis. We do not protest against French arm sales to South Africa but are content to assume that they will detect our attitude from United Nations votes or resolutions. When I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) the other day whether he had protested to the United States about the TAPS oil tanker route, he gave the interesting reply that he had protested in this House and that he understood his protests had been read in Washington.

Can we no longer convey directly this country's views to other nations? Are we now pursuing the art of diplomacy by non-involved, indirect discourse? Surely we still adhere to Resolution 242 which recognizes peacekeeping as an equitable balance of obligations. Surely we still believe that the state of Israel will continue to exist. Can we not work toward a realistic solution of the grave problems facing the peoples of the area and the frightening threat to the peace of the world?

At a meeting of parliamentarians in Cairo a few months ago I said that I believed Israel had the right to exist. That aspect of my remarks was not very popular. I went on to say that it did not have the right to exist within boundaries of its own choosing. Surely within these parameters there is still an opportunity for us to do useful work. Surely we can show more interest, be more helpful and generous and do something to assist in brightening the currently faint lamp of peace in this vital and crucial area.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) for giving me the opportunity of saying a word about the Canadian position on this grave Middle East situation. The present stage of efforts to make progress toward a lasting Middle East peace settlement involves both continuing dangers and challenging opportunities. The absence since March 7 of formal and mutual agreements to maintain the cease-fire underlines the persisting risk that hostilities might at some point be renewed unless the momentum of the current peace initiative is maintained and reinforced. But there are encouraging possibilities for such progress toward peace which I hope will be taken up and exploited by the parties.

The government of Canada has followed with close interest the latest sequence of exchanges under the aegis of Ambassador Jarring, the United Nations Secretary General's special representative charged with promoting a peace settlement on the basis of Resolution 242 which, as the hon. member for Hillsborough has reminded us, was drafted with the help of Canada which was then on the Security Council. Although Canada is not directly involved in these efforts and we are, therefore, not informed of all aspects of the exchanges, certain observations can fairly be made on the basis of development known to us.

I should like first to reiterate the Canadian government's full support of Ambassador Jarring's persistent and untiring efforts to assist the parties toward a settlement based on the Security Council resolution. The House is well aware of the formidable nature of the issues to be resolved. Any expectation of rapid advance toward agreement would be illusory. But some encouragement may be drawn from the Secretary General's report of March 5 on the course of Ambassador Jarring's mission.

In drawing attention to the intensity of recent efforts to move toward a peaceful solution, the Secretary General noted that general agreement had been found on some of the problems to be settled. He also cited with satisfaction the positive reply given by the United Arab Republic on specific questions raised by Ambassador Jarring. As the House is aware, the UAR response included an explicit expression of readiness to enter into a peace agreement with Israel subject, of course, to mutually acceptable terms of such agreement being worked out. At the same time, the Secretary General has appealed to the government of Israel to respond favourably to Ambassador Jarring's initiative. Ambassador Jarring will doubtless seek now to elaborate progressively the terms of a peace settlement. For this he will be dependent upon good will and restraint by the parties in asserting what they see as their respective vital interests.

In the Canadian government's view, the essential basis for a just and lasting peace remains available to the parties in the full implementation of Security Council Resolution 242. The opportunity is theirs, with Ambassador Jarring's help, to resolve within that framework all their outstanding differences. In this respect, the response of the UAR government to the questions posed by Ambassador Jarring is encouraging. We earnestly hope that the ultimate effort will be made along these lines, as a matter of urgency, to convert the present absence of hostilities into an enduring peace.

The Canadian government's concern to see the exchanges under Ambassador Jarring proceed successfully has been emphasized to the parties in these terms in our regular diplomatic contacts.

HEALTH—PARAMEDICAL SERVICES—NEGOTIATIONS OF COST-SHARING AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday I directed the following question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro):

Has the government come to any decision or is it in the process of negotiating a cost-sharing agreement with the provinces or with any province with respect to any of the several paramedical services?

The minister gave a negative reply to my question. This same question was raised about five months ago by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and myself. At the time, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Isabelle) indicated in part of his reply that in 1969 several provincial ministers had asked the federal government to include some paramedical services in the national scheme. He said it was up to the government to take a decision in this matter and not up to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

He also indicated that the minister had informed the provincial health ministers that he was prepared to discuss with the cabinet the inclusion of some services as soon as the provinces and territories had set a date for joining the national plan. He indicated that the minister intends to draw the attention of the other cabinet members to this important matter in due course.

There is no doubt that the government has conveniently forgotten that the Medical Care Act permits the inclusion of paramedical services. This section was added to the act by amendment on December 6, 1966. In the debate on the amendment it was made crystal clear that any province would be able to go ahead with providing additional services provided, of course, that the minister and the Governor in Council agree. This certainly is not the interpretation which the minister and this government currently places on the legislation. There is no need to obtain a consensus from the provinces, and there is no provision which says that all provinces must agree before cost-sharing arrangements can be made with a province.

To prove this point I would like once again to place on the record the following information. The Federated Legislative Council of British Columbia, in its bulletin of September 4, 1970, quotes from the Canadian Chiropractic Association memorandum of August 28, 1970, as follows:

On December 6, 1966, the Medical Care Act was amended to permit inclusion of paramedical services. Details of the debate which followed can be found on pages 10761 to 10766 of the House of Commons Debates, December 6, 1966. Two excerpts from that debate follow:

MR. DOUGLAS: I take it this means that the Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the minister, can extend paramedical services in a plan in a particular province, even though other provinces have not asked for a similar extension. In other words, the minister would be free under this amendment to accede to the request of a particular province that wanted to add the services which are provided under this legislation and it would not have to wait until a majority or a specified number of provinces indicated their desire to have these paramedical services included. I hope the minister's interpretation is the same as my own, namely, that any province would be able to go ahead with providing additional services, provided, of course, that the minister and governor in council agree.

MR. MACEACHEN: Mr. Chairman, I think the construction the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam has put on the proposed amendment is correct, namely, that it would be possible for one or any number of provinces to admit any health services. I want to assure the committee that the amendment proposed is not a pious wish.

Here we have the present government House leader, who was Minister of National Health and Welfare at that time, giving a solemn commitment that paramedical services could be instituted by a single province. This certainly is not the interpretation which is currently being placed on the Medical Care Act.

Over the past few months members of this House have received an increasing number of requests from individuals and organizations urging that paramedical services be included as a cost-shared item under the medical care program. Surely, Mr. Speaker, the health of the Canadian people should be one of the prime objectives of any government. In many thousands of cases, paramedical services are the only type of health care which an individual requires, and I feel they should be his or hers by right under the various provincial acts. There is no reason why the government should further delay allowing those provinces which wish to include these services, but can only include them if they are based on a cost-sharing basis with the federal government, to do so.

I understand that most provinces in Canada have already indicated that they intend to institute a medical care program. There should be no further delay by this government and by the Minister of National Health and Welfare in dealing with this matter. I trust that before this session is over the Canadian people will receive the welcome news that paramedical services will be part of the cost-sharing program under our Medical Care Act.

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, to answer in a more elaborate manner the question of the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding), i.e. if the government has taken a decision, or if negotiations are presently taking place with some provinces about paramedical services, here are in a few words the facts of the situation.

At the meeting of Ministers of Health in November 1968, this question was studied. Some provinces were then of the opinion that it would be wise not to proceed too quickly with the expansion of benefits, before acquiring some experience on the operation of provincial plans. At that time, the federal Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) promised that the federal government would not apply the provisions of paragraph (3) of section 4 of the Medical Care Act to any supplementary health service, as long as there was not unanimous consent of all the provinces and territories, and as long as the effective date of all plans, in the provinces and territories, was not known.

At the ministers' conference of November 1969, these provinces showed a much more confident attitude, and a formal request was made towards optometry services. As will be remembered, the minister stated that he would discuss the matter with his colleagues, when all the provinces and territories had made known the date of their adhesion to the federal medical care programme.

At the December, 1970, conference, the provinces agreed on the fact that no expansion of services would take place before the results of the review of the financial cost sharing arrangements were known.

I hope that some hon. members will understand that if the government takes the lead in this field, the provinces must also do their share.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.18 p.m.

OIL

PROPOSED TAPS TANKER ROUTE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I ask leave to move a motion on a matter of major significance and timeliness. It is prompted by the failure of the government to convey to the United States government its views on the TAPS oil tanker route. In order that the interests of the people of Canada may find expression, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin):

That this House formally oppose the TAPS oil tanker route proposal as an unwarranted and unacceptable threat to the ecological rights and economic interests of Canada; and this House instructs the Secretary of State for External Affairs to transmit the above resolution to the Secretary of State of the United States of America, and since the protection of ecological heritage is increasingly the concern of the international community, that a copy be also transmitted to the Secretary General of the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker: As the House knows, a motion under Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and the motion cannot be put.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR RELATIONS

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether there is anything he can report to the House briefly by way of progress with regard to the difficulties on the railways and, specifically, whether he can report any favourable developments with regard to the avoidance of a strike by the engineers on Monday?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was in touch this morning with the Minister of Labour who is personally involved in the negotiations doing his utmost to avoid a strike that would, without any question, do great damage to the economy. He reported to me, and I use his own words: "The negotiations are proceeding slowly but satisfactorily."

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the fact that there has already been a withdrawal of services by engineers in the western part of Canada which is already doing grave damage to the economy, particularly in the west, has the government acted on the suggestion made in the House yesterday that an approach be made to the engineers who have withdrawn their services to return to work in the expectation that the whole problem will be resolved along the optimistic lines reported by the Minister of Labour?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, as I recall his intervention in the House recently, the Minister of Labour said he had made such an appeal.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that is the way I remember it, but I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister whether, in view of the potentially drastic damage that may be done to the economy if a strike does develop on Monday, and particularly if it continues for any length of time, is the government at this point simply counting on the fact that a settlement will take place on Monday, or is the government giving any consideration to keeping the House on hand over the weekend in the event that it may become desirable, in the view of the government, in light of all considerations to consult the House and to present measures to the House with regard to what might become a real tragedy in view of the amount of unemployment that already exists in the country?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Leader of the Opposition would agree with me that it is better for negotiations to proceed without their being any threat of government action. Therefore I hope the Leader of the Opposition was not serious in suggesting that the work of the Minister of Labour and of the other conciliators should be subject to being interrupted or put at a disadvantage by the threat of government action.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that all of us wish the Minister of Labour well in his endeavours to bring about a voluntary settlement between the railways and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. In view of the statement that has just been made by the Acting Prime Minister, and in view of the great concern across the country, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister whether he will undertake to make a statement in the House if there are any favourable developments today?

Mr. Sharp: Nothing would give me greater pleasure, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister.

As to the 56,000 non-operating employees, the newspapers report that the improved job security program provides better additional benefits against unemployment.

Could the Acting Prime Minister tell us if this part of the regulations means that in case of unemployment, there will be different benefits than those provided by the Unemployment Insurance Act?

[English]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to take that as notice. I do not get the import of the hon. member's question.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—EFFECT ON PROVINCIAL ECONOMIES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I would simply ask the Acting Prime Minister if he would assure the House that the grave concern of the governments of various provinces, including the province of Prince Edward Island, is fully appreciated in light of the tragedy which would befall the economies of several provinces, especially Prince Edward Island, if the present embargo on perishable goods should continue for any length of time because of the labour situation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that the government is very much aware of this situation. This is the reason why it is bending every effort to get a voluntary settlement and why the Minister of Labour is absent from the House today, engaged in these very delicate negotiations.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—GOVERNMENT ACTION—REPLY TO SASKATCHEWAN LEGISLATURE RESOLUTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, as these railway engineers have not had a contract for a year and have attempted to bring about negotiations but without success, would the minister say when the government is going to end its dilly-dallying on this problem which is striking a serious economic blow not only in general but particularly in western Canada where everything is tied up and the farmers are in serious condition? I would ask the minister as well what reply the government gave to the legislature of Saskatchewan which passed a resolution asking for action rather than uncertainty and optimistic promises?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this does not mean that the right hon. gentleman has lost his faith in collective bargaining and in voluntary settlement.

[Mr. Douglas.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, no! Lest there be any mistake, the people of western Canada have lost all faith in this government and I join with them.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—ACTION TO KEEP SHIPS WAITING FOR GRAIN IN VANCOUVER HARBOUR FROM LEAVING

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): May I ask the Acting Prime Minister a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker? Has any attempt been made to retain the ships that are in the harbour at Vancouver since there will be no grain on hand immediately and even after settlement of the strike these ships will have to wait for grain to arrive in order to load? Is the government taking any action to keep these ships there?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): I shall refer this question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board who is directly responsible, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the hon. gentleman would hope with me that there will be a very quick settlement of this dispute so there will be no unnecessary delays.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—PAYMENT OF SHIP DEMURRAGE CHARGES BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister can assure the House that demurrage charges by ships waiting because of the strike will not be foisted on the farmers but will be assumed by the federal government?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

IMPENDING TAKEOVER OF MEMORIAL GARDENS CEMETERY ASSOCIATION BY TEXAS FIRM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Some weeks ago I asked the minister if he would look into reports about an American corporation buying a number of Canadian cemeteries. Has he made this investigation and can he tell us the nature of the corporation making these purchases?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The matter is still under lively investigation in the department, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN—INFORMATION ON ALLEGED BLOODSHED AND GENOCIDE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister. There are widespread reports in respectable and responsible journals concerning the alleged bloodshed in East Pakistan which is said to have reached the proportions of genocide against intellectuals and young people. Can the minister advise if through our own sources the government has any information on these events, and can he also bring us up to date on the condition and safety of such Canadians as are in East Pakistan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately we have no direct communications which would enable us to decide the extent of the bloodshed going on in East Pakistan. We are very deeply concerned. I should add, however, that bitter experience should have taught us the dangers of attempting to intervene in civil conflicts of this kind. We have had some examples where our intervention would not have helped those who were supposed to be the victims. I can add, however, that the government is ready to help in a constructive way in humanitarian effort that may be launched.

EAST PAKISTAN—REPORTED EFFORTS TO END FIGHTING—CANADIAN PARTICIPATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the reports from New Delhi to the effect that the governments of the United States, the Soviet Union and India are all endeavouring to bring an end to the fighting in East Pakistan and that there are parallel discussions to this end going on in the United Nations, is the Canadian government taking any part in these discussions or is it on its own initiative making any attempt to resolve the conflict that is going on in Pakistan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the situation is that the government of India has made representations to the Secretary General of the United Nations in a note in which I understand charges of genocide are made. The Secretary General has not yet decided whether he will take action or what action he will take. I have also seen the reports referred to by the hon. gentleman about action by the governments of the United States, the Soviet Union and India. It is our understanding that no substantive discussion is currently taking place between the United States and either country on the situation in East Pakistan.

EAST PAKISTAN CONFLICT—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS TO PAKISTAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

What is Canada doing about the conflict in Pakistan and what representations has it made to the government of Pakistan?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, our problem is that we do not yet have facts. I believe it is important, before we take any action, for us to know what is going on and not to have to depend, as sometimes happens, upon newspaper reports which may or may not have substance.

NATIONAL REVENUE

REPORTED PAWNING OR SCALPING OF T-4 SLIPS

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue who I believe is supposed to be present in the House today. In his absence perhaps I could direct it to the Acting Prime Minister or to the acting minister. In view of widespread reports that pawning or scalping of T-4 slips is taking place, to the ultimate detriment of many taxpayers, can the minister say if any steps are being taken to prevent this practice?

Mr. Baldwin: Come on, where is the minister? There is no reply. This is a pretty sick spectacle.

COMBINES

RAIDING OF OFFICES OF NEW BRUNSWICK NEWSPAPERS BY POLICE AND OFFICIALS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; I believe he has notice. In view of reports of harsh and unprecedented raids on daily newspapers in New Brunswick and on the Irving interests in general by officers of his department, may I ask what part his department played in this matter?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, of course I do not accept the hypothesis on which the question is based. The procedures followed were quite normal and standard.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: They arose out of an inquiry under the Combines Investigation Act which was made public some time ago by the parties being investigated. Of course, we do not make such inquiries public. The actual proceedings taken yesterday were taken in the name of the Attorney General of Canada on the advice of the law officers of the Crown.

RAIDING OF OFFICES OF NEW BRUNSWICK NEWSPAPERS BY POLICE AND OFFICIALS—POWER OF SEARCH USED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether it is not a fact, in view of his mentioning the Minister of Justice, that the method adopted by the government was the use of a writ of assistance, the most arbitrary form of search that is open to the authorities? Is that true or is it not?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is untrue, but the proceedings were instituted not by me but by the Department of Justice and questions as to detail should be addressed to my colleague, the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If the minister does not know and says it may be untrue, is he able to tell us that writs of assistance were not used?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that what was applied for and granted by the courts in New Brunswick was a search warrant under the Criminal Code.

BANKRUPTCY

PRESENTATION OF AMENDING BILL—PROTESTS BY QUEBEC MINISTER OF JUSTICE

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Shefford want to ask a supplementary question?

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I would like to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Has he received any representations from the Minister of Justice of Quebec with respect to the restrictions which that government publicly announced yesterday afternoon by tabling in the National Assembly a bill amending the Bankruptcy Act? Is he aware of these representations and will he take them into account before introducing his bankruptcy bill in this House?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have not received representations. I have had notice from press reports that a report was tabled in the Quebec National Assembly. We will take copies of the report and study them, and in so far as they may be useful representations we will of course take them into account.

STATUS OF ORDERS FOR LOCKHEED TRI-STAR AIRCRAFT IN VIEW OF ROLLS-ROYCE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can he give the House any information with regard to the status of the Air Canada contract for Lockheed Tri-Star aircraft in view of recent developments that I believe have taken place with regard to the negotiations between Lockheed and Rolls-Royce? Also, would the minister say what beneficial effect, if any, these contracts will have on Canada's air industry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): No, Mr. Speaker. My colleague, the Minister of Transport, is following this matter very closely. I will bring this question to his attention for reply when he is next in the House.

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—TIME OF DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES ON CANADIAN POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister arising out of the policy review report issued by the United States Secretary of State, William Rogers, in which he says that the United States government will want to consult with the Canadian government regarding any policies concerning foreign ownership. In view of the statement of the minister the other day in answer to a question that such consultations will take place, at what point in the process of developing legislation with respect to foreign ownership will such discussions take place? Will it be after the report to be submitted to the cabinet by the Minister of National Revenue, after a white paper, or after legislation has been prepared for presentation to the House?

Mr. Baldwin: Or after the election?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the more hypothetical questions that can be asked. Since the report has not been presented by the Minister of National Revenue, I do not know what will be in it. Until we have some indication of what recommendations may be made by him and what the general line of decision by the government will be, I really cannot find any basis on which to give an answer.

Mr. Douglas: Possibly I could be more specific. Can the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that there will be no consultations until such time as a firm policy has been reached and the government's policy has been placed before the members of this House?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the hon. member's question because I am often accused of not having consulted with the United States government about intended changes in their policies until it is too late.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES CONCERNING GEORGES BANK, STRAIT OF JUAN DE FUCA AND BOUNDARY BETWEEN CANADA AND ALASKA

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the suggestion by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his policy review to the effect that discussions are going on between the Canadian and United States governments regarding Georges Bank, the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the boundary between Canada and Alaska, are such discussions now going on, by whom are they being conducted and when may we expect a report from the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding these discussions?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are, of course, negotiating with the United States government. I have announced this on a number of occasions in answer to questions in the House. On negotiations of this kind I would expect that I would report the conclusions when they are reached. It is necessary to reach some conclusions on these border problems and I would not expect to report to the House until the negotiations are completed.

INDUSTRY

STEPS TO INCREASE PRODUCTIVITY IN MANUFACTURING

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): My question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As the decrease in exports of manufactured products this year is in part due to the sharp drop in productivity in the manufacturing industry, will the minister take the first opportunity on motions to advise the House what steps he and his department intend to take to bring the yearly increase in productivity at least up to the average of the past 10 years?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of the hon. member in the committee on Tuesday where I fully reported on this subject. The observation he has made on a number of occasions that in 1970 we had a decline of 4 per cent in export of manufactured products compared with 1969 is of course true. In January and February, however, we have reached 39 per cent for manufactured products in our export picture, which is only one per cent less than in 1969.

Mr. Hees: Has the minister looked at the DBS figures recently? If so, he will have seen that exports of fully manufactured products are down this year compared with a year ago.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ARMED FORCES OATH OF ALLEGIANCE

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. It has to do with the oath of allegiance that is now being used for those joining the armed forces. Has there been any change in the wording of that oath of allegiance recently?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there has not been any change since I have been Minister of National Defence. I will have to inquire to see whether there was any change at an earlier date.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister this because there has been some suggestion that the oath of allegiance is going to be changed to remove the Queen, to whom allegiance is sworn as the sovereign of our country. The minister emphasized on two occasions the other day an oath of allegiance to Canada. He emphasized the words "to Canada". I wish he would look into this and report at the beginning of the week on the wording that is now being used.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I remind the right hon. member that the Queen is the Queen of Canada, and in that sense it seems to me that my remarks are perfectly consistent with the oath as it now stands.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then the minister is having no part in what is taking place, apparently, in the citizenship department which has given notice that it will remove the Queen's name from the oath of loyalty?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

FISHERIES

CAUSE OF FISH KILL NEAR EUROCAN PLANT, KITIMAT

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry whether his department is investigating a major fish kill in the vicinity of the Eurocan pulp and paper plant at Kitimat. If so, can he report whether any progress has been made in determining the cause of this kill which apparently, according to Canadian Press reports, has led to dead fish being piled two feet deep on over a half a mile of beach?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): This particular fish kill is under investigation. No definite connection has been established between the operations of the industries in the area and the kill in question.

Mr. Barnett: Can the minister give us any indication of the cause of this major disaster to fish life in the area?

Mr. Davis: It is not a major disaster. The object of the exercise is to determine the cause of this kill. There have been similar kills before big industry moved into the area.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT IN FOUR EASTERN COUNTIES OF NOVA SCOTIA—MORATORIUM ON PHASING DOWN OF FEDERAL SERVICES

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Acting Prime Minister. It is prompted by a telegram I have received from the Cape Breton Metropolitan Alliance for Development at Sydney. In view of the fact surveys indicate that the unemployment rate in the four eastern counties of Nova Scotia has reached 25 per cent, can the Acting Prime Minister give an assurance that an immediate moratorium will be placed on any phasing down of federal services in this area which would further aggravate the burgeoning unemployment there?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): Without accepting the accuracy of the figures put forward by the hon. member, I will certainly take his suggestion into consideration.

Mr. Muir: I wonder whether the Acting Prime Minister would tell the distinguished clergy, businessmen and labour unions of the Alliance what he has just said? My supplementary is to the Solicitor General. I would ask him through you, Mr. Speaker, whether he would use his good offices to prevent the closing down of the RCMP detachment at North Sydney. He might also ask the Minister of Labour to try to prevent the closing of the unemployment insurance office at Sydney.

Mr. Speaker: These are, of course, representations, and the hon. member has to assume that his suggestions to the ministers will be considered.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INCREASED USE OF CREDIT—PROTECTION RESPECTING REPORTING AND USE OF DATA BANKS—AMENDMENTS TO SMALL LOANS ACT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the substantial increase in the use of consumer credit in Canada, making Canadians the second largest users of consumer credit in the world, does the minister plan to bring in legislation this session designed to protect the rights of Canadians in connection with credit reporting and the use of data banks? Does he intend at the same time to bring in appropriate amendments to the Small Loans Act?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Laws relating to credit reporting are being dealt with generally by provincial legislatures. A number have already acted on this question or are in the process of acting. As the hon. member knows, we have amended the Bills of Exchange Act to help correct some of the abuses in this area, and in December we tabled the report on bankruptcy and insolvency, which made a number of recommendations to deal with the problems of a credit-oriented society. I am currently working on possible revisions of the Interest Act and the Small Loans Act and I hope to introduce those amendments at some point.

Mr. McGrath: Within the jurisdiction of the federal government, does the minister propose to bring in a measure to license data banks in Canada so as to protect Canadians from the use of misleading information against them?

Mr. Basford: No, I do not, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

OPERATIONAL CAPABILITY OF CF-101 AIRCRAFT IN LIGHT OF REPORTED GROUNDING

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Darthmouth-Halifax East): My question is for the Minister of National Defence. In light of the seriousness of the situation, would the minister bring us up to date on the technical operating status of the CF-101 Voodoo fighters and perhaps give some indication whether the situation has affected or is likely to affect our position within NORAD?

Hon. Donald C. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. I should emphasize that several press reports indicating that all the CF-101 aircraft have been grounded are not correct. Canada is maintaining its status on an alert basis to respond to any requirement of NORAD. It is a fact, however, that for the time being training flights of additional 101 aircraft have been cancelled because of a technical problem with regard to the engines which is now under intense study by both the aircraft company and the department. It is hoped that at an early date the problem will be resolved so that the full complement of aircraft will be available for use. I emphasize again that all the requirements of the NORAD alert are being met.

Mr. Forrestall: Do I gather correctly from the minister's statement that the CF-101 is operational and is flying?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, some of them are operational and flying, those that are necessary to meet our obligations with regard to the alert. It is also true we have had difficulties, as the hon. member knows, particularly arising from the crash at Comox several weeks ago, with some of the CF-101s which have older engines. These have now been grounded so that technical changes can be made.

HEALTH

ACTION TO CURTAIL CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Bearing in mind the fact that at this time the annual cancer fund campaign is under way across Canada and also that cancer authorities have urged the cessation of cigarette advertising, would the minister check with his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare to determine when and what action might be taken to curtail the promotion of this unsafe product?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I have not had a cigarette since 7 a.m. on August 10 last.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: My colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, answered this question the other day. We have, of course, been consulting together on this question for quite some time.

FINANCE

"HOW YOUR TAX DOLLAR IS SPENT"—POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING CREDIT FROM BANK OF CANADA

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Prime Minister.

In the brochure "How Your Tax Dollar Is Spent", page 23, the Minister of Finance is said to expect to borrow $1.9 billion. In view of the fact that the public debt is in excess of $38 billion, could the minister say whether serious consideration is being given to the possibility of obtaining funds from the Bank of Canada?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Prime Minister): That question was studied many, many years ago and it was decided that the policy suggested would be highly inflationary.

[Later:]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the Acting Prime Minister.

In view of his answer to the question I asked a while ago to the effect that using funds provided by the Bank of Canada would cause inflation, would the minister advise whether the government is considering the possibility of preventing provinces from borrowing abroad, also to curb inflation?

REPLY BY MINISTER TO LETTER REGARDING A POST OFFICE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Since no one seems to want to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works I should like to ask him whether he would care to go back to his office and answer a letter I addressed to him two months ago about a post office he promised two years ago?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My question is for the Acting Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or the parliamentary secretary. Can we be told whether there is a plan for the employment of Indian students this summer and, if so, what is the nature of that plan?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): There are programs under way. For example, we plan to employ 300 Indian students directly within the department this summer.

Mr. Yewchuk: I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could inform the House how Indian students apply for this particular type of work?

An hon. Member: Through their Member of Parliament.

Mr. Buchanan: I believe it is through the Public Service Commission, but I would be happy to check on that matter.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

COMMUNICATION WITH PARIS POLICE RESPECTING KILLING OF MARIO BACHAND

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Solicitor General. Has the RCMP been in contact with the Paris police over the killing of Mario Bachand, a former member of the Company of Young Canadians?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker.

STATUS OF WOMEN

"HOW YOUR TAX DOLLAR IS SPENT"—POSSIBILITY OF OBTAINING CREDIT FUNDS FROM BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Can the Acting Prime Minister say whether or not we can expect the government to designate a minister to take charge of the implementation of the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women some time before Easter?

Mr. Speaker: It seems that the matter is now under consideration by the executive. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for St. Hyacinthe-Bagot.

[Later:]

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I believe the Acting Prime Minister is sitting on the edge of his chair anxious to answer the question I asked him about the status of women. I wonder if the minister may have the permission of the Chair to answer the question at this time?

Mr. Speaker: If there is agreement, certainly there is no difficulty from the standpoint of the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has been studying very carefully the report on the status of women and the matter has been given a priority rating in general government policy. The government has also been considering whether the assignment of responsibility should be given to a minister, and it would greatly help if the government organization bill were promptly proceeded with in the House so that we could get ahead with this assignment.

Mr. Baldwin: Act responsibly and bring in a special bill.

INDUSTRY

SLATER SHOE COMPANY—MEASURES TO PREVENT CLOSING

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Does he intend to take any special action to prevent the closing down of the Slater Shoe plant in Montreal, a company which has existed over the past 103 years and which provides jobs for 175 persons?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government has already taken certain steps to assist the footwear industry as a whole and Slater Shoe in particular. For instance, we have contributed to payment of consultant services for Slater Shoe in order to help increase their productivity. Nevertheless, the company decided not to continue its operations.

SHOES—MEETING WITH MANUFACTURERS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. A while ago the minister indicated that he would be holding meetings with representatives of the shoe industry. Have those meetings been held, and is the minister in a position to indicate what conclusions were reached at the meetings?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, they have not been held for one reason, in particular. The meetings were supposed to be held after a full investigation into the nature and precise penetration of import of footwear into Canada had been made. Unfortunately the department and DBS have not up to now been able to develop the kind of information needed. Some of the companies have been slow in giving us the proper information. I understand the information is coming forward now and that these meetings should take place within the next few weeks.

HOUSING

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING PARTICIPATION IN FINANCING OF NEW HOMES UNDER ONTARIO PLAN—METHOD OF PROVIDING FUNDS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister in charge of housing. Is Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation participating with the Ontario government in the financing of the 30,000 new homes which the Ontario government intends to build this year? May I also ask him whether CMHC is considering the new approach of the Ontario government whereby 75 per cent of the financing is provided by institutional lenders, 20 per cent by the government and 5 per cent by the purchaser?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Yes, Mr. Speaker, of course Central Mortgage and Housing is participating. We have made known our allocations in public housing and in other programs to the Ontario government. Although I have not yet had an opportunity to compare the precise figures announced by the Ontario government the other day with ours, I am sure they will dovetail.

With regard to the second part of the hon. member's question, it would almost take a statement on motions to go into this question which is a complicated issue. Simply put, we are providing a major program of public housing for which we put up 90 per cent of the financing. In the case of section 16, limited dividend housing, we put up 95 per cent of the financing. I am sure the hon. member is aware of how our programs operate in that sense.

PLAN TO PROVIDE HOMES FOR MÉTIS—PARTICIPATION BY PROVINCES

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing. Some time ago it was reported that there was a policy in effect to provide federal and provincial assistance in the housing field for the Métis people. Can the minister say whether any provinces have joined with the federal government in this respect and how the plan is progressing?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we have been very eager to get something going in this more specialized field for the native people, in particular the Métis. On the Prairie provinces last year we were encouraged by the activity of the Métis people themselves in joining in a research program to identify their needs and particular requirements. We are now conducting negotiations, which I think will be successful, with some of the Prairie provinces to move on from research to actual housing on the ground.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister look into the particular situation of underprivileged families living adjacent to Indian reservations where the Métis people are not eligible for the housing provided the Indian people under the Indian Affairs branch?

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STUDIES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Some two weeks ago I asked the Minister of Finance, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, whether the Prices and Incomes Commission had conducted any studies relating to the possible imposition of wage and price controls, either generally or on a selective basis, and what would be the implications of such a policy. The minister said that he would look into the question. I have no doubt that he consulted the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can the minister indicate whether such studies have been completed and, if they have, whether they will be tabled in the House?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are no studies in the sense the hon. gentleman refers to them, but both the Minister of Finance and the government have made it clear that we have considered from time to time a number of various options which are available to the government, as well as the implications of those options.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to understand that no actual study is presently being conducted concerning the possible implications of such control measures, that it is simply being considered in a general way and that no concrete plan has been developed on a contingency basis?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, very careful consideration has been given to a number of different proposals and their implications. I think the hon. gentleman is using the word "study" in the sense of a royal commission report or a document that would be tabled. As the Minister of Finance has made clear, the government has carefully considered in detail the implications of a number of proposals. If there is, of course, to be any change in government policy or any legislation introduced based on the various alternatives, this will be announced in the House in due course.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to get information from the minister this morning, though usually it is very easy. I would ask the minister pointedly whether the government has developed a contingency plan with regard to the imposition of wage and price controls?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I think I just answered that. The government has carefully considered a number of different alternatives, a number of different proposals, and a number of different contingencies.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Chair calls orders of the day I will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands for a last supplementary on this subject.

WAGE INCREASE LIMITATION SUGGESTED BY PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION CHAIRMAN—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of the reported statement by the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission that wage increases should be restricted this year to 4 per cent, may I ask the minister whether this represents government policy and whether he is able to assure the wage and salary earners of this country that the cost of living will not exceed 4 per cent?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Certainly that would be a very desirable objective, Mr. Speaker.

If this is the conclusion of the question period, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might have the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions simply to table a report.

Mr. Speaker: Does the minister have the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Thursday, April 1, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

One clause 14—Establishment of Ministries of State.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose yesterday clause 14 of the bill was being considered.

Yesterday the hon. member for Lotbinière moved, with the consent of the Committee, an amendment to clause 14. Hon. members will recall that the Chair took under advisement the procedural acceptability of the amendment. If I may, I would now rule on the matter. Perhaps first I should read the amendment:

That clause 14 of the Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, be amended by deleting lines 23 to 25 and substituting therefor the following:

"Parliament may pass an Act amending the Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and having the effect of creating a Ministry of State."

Last evening I indicated I had some doubt concerning the procedural acceptability of the amendment. I indicated, however, I would like to think about it and would be prepared to hear today any hon. gentlemen who might wish to argue the procedural acceptability of the amendment. I might say that in the intervening time I have confirmed my preliminary thought that the motion is not procedurally acceptable on two points. First, it is declaratory, and as such I do not think comes within the purview of the clause we are presently considering. The second point, which I also think is important, is that as all hon. members know, Parliament is its own master and may enact legislation or statutes as it wishes within the confines of its constitutional authority. In effect, the amendment of the hon. member for Lotbinière confirms this. I believe the amendment is a nullity in the sense that it is not necessary to say what is obvious, and the obvious of course is that Parliament may legislate at any time to do the things it wishes to do within its constitutional authority. These are the points which would seem to indicate the amendment is out of order. However, if hon. members wish to present argument I would be pleased to hear it.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to your first remarks concerning the admissibility of the amendment I submitted yesterday with regard to clause 14 of Bill C-207. You question the merits of the amendment, and for the most part you base your decision on two points.

First, you say that this may be more in the nature of a statement than of an amendment. You add that there is no need to speak of the power of Parliament as this power is evident.

I would like to comment on your second point first. There is no evidence, at the present time, that Parliament is its own master, with regard to clause 14. It is neither certain, nor clearly indicated that Parliament will be able to appoint ministers through the agency of government, or to participate in a debate on the establishment of new ministries.

Mr. Chairman, it is obvious, and I agree it is, that when the government wants to set up a Crown corporation, a ministry of state or a federal department—and there are numerous precedents to enlighten us in this regard—it is clear that Parliament has its word to say about it and that it must pass legislation, that is to say, the government's desire to establish a particular department must be approved by Parliament.

But the procedure proposed in clause 14 is an exceptional one which does not give Parliament this authority to legislate on the establishment of a ministry of state. This is, indeed, what can be read in clause 14, and I quote:

—the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

Nothing is said about Parliament, and I will point out that this is a truly exceptional procedure as regards the setting up of a ministry.

It is precisely this concern which prompted me to move an amendment which is not a substantive one, and there is the second point of my argument.

Indeed, one can conclude from the heading of this clause that the substance of the matter is the establishment of ministries of state. Essentially, the question is therefore to know if we are in favour of the establishment of ministries of state or against it, and I will point out that my amendment does not aim at changing the substance of the matter directly or indirectly. The amendment that I have moved deals only with form and procedure, and I am not against the establishment of ministries of state, because I would then change the substance of the matter. In the 4th edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, it is clearly stated that the substance of the matter cannot be altered, but that the form and procedure can be.

The government proposes in clause 14 the terms "Governor in Council" instead of "Parliament" and "proclamation" instead of "legislation."

Mr. Chairman, I will respectfully point out that even if I agree with you that it is not necessary—because obviously Parliament is supreme—to refer to the powers of Parliament, if we do not wish to use the terms "Governor in Council" or "proclamation", it is necessary to make things clear to state who will have the authority, if we do not agree about the procedure.

This is why althoug it seems obvious to us members that Parliament is the supreme authority, it is not evident from clause 14 because this clause denies Parliament this supreme power to legislate on the establishment of ministries of state, of departments and of Crown corporations.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I moved precisely opposed this procedure.

Then, Mr. Chairman, you give a general indication saying that we are free to make recommendations and give advice, which we appreciate respectfully.

You say that the amendment would appear to be a statement of some sort.

• (12 noon)

In fact, this is not a statement but a simple change in procedure with respect to the creation of ministries of state.

Here is a part of the amendment:

Parliament may pass an Act amending the Act respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and having the effect of creating a Ministry of State.

During the debate yesterday the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) told the House the amendment was out of order because it anticipates the intentions of the government.

I refer the House to Hansard of which everyone has a copy.

Mr. Chairman, if the argument of the hon. member for Ottawa West were right, we should logically say the same thing about this clause.

Indeed one can read this in the bill:

—the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

This clause therefore presupposes the intentions of the government and legislates, without giving Parliament any justification, on the necessity of creating ministries of state.

In other words, if my amendment has no bearing on an immediate and concrete reality, neither does clause 14: it relates to the possibility that some day the government might want to establish a ministry of state. In short, one is no better than the other.

Mr. Chairman, if the argument of the hon. member for Ottawa West seems in order to you, I respectfully submit that the same goes for my amendment; they both amount to the same thing.

The clause stipulates that the "Governor in Council may"; in the amendment, you can read: "the Parliament may". These are the same circumstances. The only change, Mr. Chairman, is in the procedure, the manner, the means, and not in the substance, the principle.

The principle is clearly indicated in the heading:

Ministries of State for Specified Purposes.

Mr. Chairman, thus this is not a future statement, since clause 14, at that rate, could also be a future statement, as the clause stipulates: "the Governor in Council may". As a matter of fact, what is clause 14 but a statement? It says:

Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters—

Mr. Chairman, these are such general terms that they are merely a statement of intent. Clause 14 is a statement of intent, some sort of a blank cheque to the government which one day or another, depending upon requirements, will establish a "ministry of state".

It is not mentioned whether this is a specific legislation. The names of the ministries are not mentioned and it is not said how many there will be. It is not specified in which fields they will work, study, formulate or develop their programs. The bill merely states that there will be "ministries of state" according to the "requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies"; all it says is that there will be ministries in relation to any matter or matters. It does not legislate in any specific field.

For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that if it can be said that my amendment is declaratory, clause 14 is also declaratory on the same ground. And if it can be legislated truly on a statement, granting that clause 14 is a statement of fact, since it really is, why should we not have the right to legislate at the same level?

This is not a question of money, but of legislating at the same level. For these reasons—and I apologize for taking so much of the time of the House to explain and defend the amendment which I proposed—it seems to me that the amendment does not deal with substance but with procedure, and that this is an excellent opportunity for the government, if it is willing to accept the amendment, to prove that it considers the substance, namely, the creation of "ministries of state"—if it is really necessary—more important than the ways, the means, the procedure to achieve it. If the government feels that the substance is more important than the form, then why should they not make concessions about the form, about the means of reaching the same end, that is the setting up of "ministries of state", of passing legislation in areas relating to "new and comprehensive policies".

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am not able to support the procedural validity of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Lotbinière, but I rise, for a moment or two, not just to add to the arguments against it but to suggest to him that even if Your Honour does rule his amendment out of order, all is not lost. If we have sufficient votes, we can still achieve the same purpose that he has in mind. In other words, I see his amendment as, in effect, an expanded negative. Let me put it this way. The constitution of this country and the rights of Parliament are such that we could, by act of Parliament, at any time establish a ministry of state. What clause 14 seeks to do is to give the authority to the Governor in Council to do it without coming to Parliament. The hon. member for Lotbinière wants to make sure that before such Ministries are created Parliament has to legislate on them. So, all we have to do is defeat clause 14, and if my analysis is correct, of course that does support the contention that the amendment is really an expanded negative. So, although I anticipate that you will rule the amendment out of order, I trust that when the votes are called there will be enough of us here to defeat clause 14.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, speaking on the question of order which Your Honour has raised, as I understand it, the hon. member for Lotbinière is trying to indicate that the sole right to establish ministries of state should not be left with the government. I know, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out, that there is always a residual right in Parliament, but obviously, for practical purposes, the passage of clause 14 will mean that that right will be taken away from Parliament. There is no question about it. As I understand what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has indicated, we can achieve the same objective by defeating the clause.

I have not been around here as long as he has, so perhaps I am not as naïve as he is about the government's intentions. I fully realize that we would like to defeat this clause. Justice indicates it should be defeated. However, when the time comes the government will call in its storm troops and the clause will pass.

Mr. Reid: Because you do not have any on your side.

Mr. Baldwin: While I go along with what Your Honour has indicated, the question remains as to whether or not what the hon. member for Lotbinière wants to do is, in fact, achieved by these words, whether it is his intention that the establishment of a ministry of state by order in council should be subjected to parliamentary decision at a given time. I support that proposition. If he does not bring forward an amendment in those terms, and Your Honour should rule this one out of order, I probably will. In other words, if a ministry of state dealing with an important segment of the social and economic life of this country is established by proclamation, having in mind that the government intends to pass this clause willy-nilly, my belief is that the establishment of such a ministry should be dealt with by Parliament.

• (12:10 p.m.)

I very much doubt if the amendment as moved contains those particular views, and it may well be that Your Honour will rule it out of order. But if that is the hon. member's contention I would support him on another motion along those lines, or I might move one myself.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The Chairman: With respect to my caveat last night, perhaps I may now rule on the point of order with respect to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Lotbinière. As I have indicated, it is a very important matter and has serious constitutional implications. As such, we must give it serious thought.

As I indicated, and as hon. members have indicated in their arguments when assisting the Chair in arriving at a decision, the purport of clause 14 would be to permit the Governor in Council to establish a ministry of state by proclamation. The hon. member, and others who have argued on the substantive matter in the debate, have indicated that they do not agree with it. Of course, this is a matter for argument, and what the hon. member for Lotbinière seeks through his amendment is to have the government establish these ministries by separate statutes.

I have indicated, and other hon. members have indicated, that we are merely stating the obvious with respect to a declaration by Parliament because Parliament, within its constitutional authority, is supreme. For those reasons, and for the others which I mentioned earlier, I feel I must not accept the amendment.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make some comments on this clause, and I would like to begin by expressing my regret that more members of the government and more government supporters have not deigned to take part in discussion on the bill.

Mr. Boulanger: What about last night? You weren't even here.

Mr. Stanfield: I read what was said last night and I recognize that a few of them deigned to take part in the debate, but what they said seemed to be irrelevant to the discussion on the bill.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: But I am pleased that, even though what they had to say was irrelevant for the most part, a few of them at least summoned up enough gumption to take part in the debate. I hope this trend will continue.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanfield: I am wondering whether this sort of attitude on the part of the government—

Mr. Deachman: We want to get on with the job.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I hope hon. members opposite are not getting too excited already. It will be very bad if they are going to get excited at this stage of my remarks. I am just wondering whether this attitude on the part of the government supporters is preparation for charges of opposition obstruction?

Mr. Deachman: After 17 days debate.

Mr. Stanfield: If so, I want to tell the hon. member from Vancouver, and others over there who seem to be getting a little excited, that if this is their strategy it represents a very woeful misconstruction and miscalculation on the part of the government.

Mr. Deachman: Seventeen days?

Mr. Stanfield: And it is especially so if the government intends to charge a united opposition with holding up the creation, for example, of the Department of the Environment.

Mr. MacEachen: The NDP have not opposed that.

Mr. Stanfield: What we have in this bill are a few excellent proposals, of which the Department of Environment is one, associated with a lot of junk, of which this clause is one example. It is like the situation in a housing shortage where a fellow who owns a house has a lot of junk furniture, and he insists that the person buying the house must also buy the junk furniture at a very high price or else he will not get the house. I would suggest that if people in the business community behaved the way the government is behaving with regard to this bill, the Department of Justice would probably be very active in encouraging some attorney general to prosecute.

If the government wants to proceed with the valuable sections of the bill, let it do so. Let it separate the bill and not try to be smart. The Secretary of State for External Affairs was trying to be smart again this morning, suggesting that the government was anxious to get the bill passed. If the government is anxious to get the bill passed, then let it drop aspects of the bill such as this. Let it separate the bill and not continue to try to foist something off on the House and the people of Canada.

I understand the embarrassment of hon. members opposite with regard to participating in discussion on this bill. With justification, the bill has been described as a pork barrel measure. In fact, I was accused by one distinguished and eminent editorialist of not understating the situation when I said there was a pork barrel in this bill. The editorialist said there were several pork barrels in it. But in any case it is certainly a pork barrel measure we are now discussing, and nobody likes to be characterized as a pig, even by association. If you praise the construction of a trough with too much enthusiasm, you may have some difficulty in avoiding the charge or the reputation of hoping to wallow in it.

I say that if the government spent anything like as much energy trying to help the unemployed people as it is devoting to this measure, a lot would have been done by this time to help the unemployed. Of course, patronage on a large scale by the government is not confined to this measure. Ever since the election of 1968, we have seen the government looking after its friends outside, one by one.

Mr. Boulanger: Get Mr. Diefenbaker back in the House. I understand his English.

Mr. Stanfield: Sir, criticism goes beyond the pork barrel aspect of the bill.

Mr. Boulanger: I understand Mr. Diefenbaker's English better.

Mr. Stanfield: I am sorry the hon. member has difficulty with my English. I will try to speak slowly enough so that he can understand it. I think the message is getting to him judging from the fact he feels it necessary to interrupt me, and to carry on a constant conversation. It seems he is not too happy to hear the things that are being said about the bill, but there will be lots of time for the hon. member and his colleagues to take part in the discussion.

Mr. Boulanger: I took part last night.

Mr. Stanfield: The hon. member will have to do better. As I was saying, criticism of the bill goes far beyond the pork barrel aspect. The part of the bill we are now considering would allow the government to set up, and then dismantle, a whole series of departments without any parliamentary approval. This is what was worrying the hon. member for Lotbinière.

The pitfalls are obvious. This is another step in the degradation of Parliament. I do not pretend that Parliament is the totality of democracy in Canada, but in this country it is certainly one of the most vital and basic links in the democratic chain. Any attempt to whittle down its rights is an attack on the democratic process, and that this is the effect of this bill has surely been adequately demonstrated already. Why then is there this determination on the part of the government?

The hon. member for Lotbinière said on Wednesday that the setting up of these new structures now is simply a means of trying to hide inefficiency. I certainly go along with that analysis. The government knows, or ought to know by this time what the basic problems are, but it seems to be attempting to give itself a sort of panel of panic buttons to press when it is faced with some kind of unexpected event. In other words, we have another instance of government by ad hoc measures; this time we might call it institutionalized ad hocism. After three years in power, government is still looking at machinery instead of dealing with issues, and still dealing with structures instead of concrete reforms. This clearly became a government by way of improvisation. Look at the action with regard to Denison, just off the top of the head. Look at the action with regard to Home Oil, just off the top of the head. It was not part of any policy. Yet this government, Mr. Chairman, is supposed to be a program government, a government that knew what it was doing. This doesn't say much for its over-all competence or its ability to forecast.

Once again, as in so many spheres, we are faced with ambiguity and uncertainty. This time, the government intends to institutionalize these two characteristics by process of law. It must be the first time that a democratic government has openly admitted its own incompetence and lack of foresight. We have had enough experience with improvising, Mr. Chairman, to deepen our concern that a provision such as we are now considering would increase the certainty of ambiguity and the certainty of confusion.

Three sources of deep concern about this measure relate to the integrity of Parliament. This measure represents an attack on the essential dignity of the Member of Parliament. I realize there is a problem in this age of growing executive power, but the solution of this government for the great majority of government Members of Parliament, is to try to include them in the charmed circle of executive perquisites. In other words, the sweets of office are handed around to everyone.

We have another dimension to the extent of confusion now, Mr. Chairman, the confusion that exists among ministers and parliamentary assistants. The ordinary Member of Parliament is usually considered to be expressing his own views unless he is explicitly expressing government views. Until the era of this government it was assumed that ministers expressed government policy when they spoke, but not now. It all commenced with the debate on NATO in which the Minister of Communications expressed totally different views from those of the Ministers of External Affairs and National Defence who had some responsibility.

More recently there has been the matter of Alaskan Oil. We have the Secretary of State for External Affairs expressing disapproval of the Alaskan and Pacific route, but indicating that he does not intend to oppose it. If he is at sea, where are the other ministers who share responsibility in this matter? For example, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is reported to have said yesterday that, as he sees his duty it is to stimulate public discussion on these matters. One would have thought, Mr. Chairman, that his duty would be to develop policy instead of jumping around like a cat on a hot tin roof. We follow the minister all the way from Denver to his meeting the other day with representatives of the oil industry, and what do we find? We find the minister busily engaged in developing, not public opinion and certainly not informed public opinion, but simply in creating confusion in the minds of the Canadian people and, I am sure, in the minds of the American people as well.

Then we have the Minister of Communications getting into the act. The delightful climax is the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources suggesting to the Minister of Communications that others should think before they speak.

I am pointing this out at some length, Mr. Chairman, to remind everybody of the degree of confusion we have with the present size of the cabinet and the number of parliamentary assistants. We hear about all kinds of escalation these days. In view of the experience we have had, and in view of the proliferation of ministries and parliamentary assistants contemplated by this bill, I think it might be described as an escalation of confusion.

There are two results which are felt by the ordinary Member of Parliament, Mr. Chairman. There is increased pressure on government members to conform to the party line and there is the degradation of the basic task of the parliamentarian which is to cast a critical and appraising eye on the executive power. It means more than ever that the only authentic Member of Parliament will be on the opposition side of the House if these measures carry. It shows the basic contempt with which the government views its own backbenchers, and it is another step in the direction of executive control of Parliament.

In short, Mr. Chairman, this clause of the bill constitutes an admission by the government of its own inability to pursue defined long term policies; it constitutes an admission of incompetence and a further attempt to substitute improvisation for planning and God knows, Sir, we have had enough improvisation. I say that it is no wonder the ordinary member on the other side of this House is unwilling to debate. I ask myself whether most of them are afraid to involve themselves because of the possible effect it might have on their future. It is no wonder that they want this debate to end quietly and soon. In general, their silence is an eloquent expression of their shame and I suppose that feeling does them some credit, but it is not enough. I say to them, through you, Sir, that if they believe in Parliament, if they believe in the control of government by Parliament, if they believe in themselves as parliamentarians, they should be raising their voices against this sham version of participatory democracy. By their silence, they are voicing their shame but at the same time they are displaying their servility.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, despite some of the suggestions of members opposite that they are anxious that this debate be terminated, I want to let them know that outside of a very short participation on second reading I have not appeared at all on the debate in committee. However, at this particular point I think one must pause and examine the implications of what is really a new bill within a bill, an entirely new principle in the structure of government. Yet they want us merely to gloss over this and, because it has been proposed by them, to bow low three times or more in subservience to that superintelligence that they seem to have arrogated to themselves. They have assumed the mantle of omniscience. They say that this is good for this country, that this is good for Parliament and that therefore we should rubberstamp it. I do not want to attribute motives to hon. members, but the unseemly and undignified urge to get on with this legislation seems to be a direct measurement of the kind of aspiration of some hon. members for the positions which would be created under this bill. I have no hesitation whatsoever in asserting that and repeating it. It is their desire for promotion that urges some hon. members to try, shall we say, to impose a gag on hon. members on this side. Yet what are the facts? Should not hon. members reflect for a moment on what is being proposed today?

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Boulanger: It is the hon. member who ought to reflect.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): When the hon. member from Montreal, who is known for his piping voice, speaks, it usually indicates that the gauge is set at high and that the whistle will be shrill. But the shrillest whistles come from empty places, Mr. Chairman.

If you will look at what is proposed here, Mr. Chairman, and how this ties in with the power of the office of the Prime Minister of Canada, you will see that it will require not a 20 minute intervention but a number of interventions to expose what is being done to some of those people whose apparent greed for office tends to blind their reason.

Let us look at some of the justifications which have been put forward. I am surprised that neither the Prime Minister nor his parliamentary secretary have ever been present to take part in the debate on this very fundamental reorganization of the principles of cabinet responsibility to this House. They are responsibilities not to one man but to this House. That is something that seems to have escaped those opposite. This is one responsibility that should not be shirked by the Prime Minister. It is not for another minister to pilot through this part of the bill. It affects the prerogatives of the Prime Minister, and he should be here to defend his case.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): So far, there has been no appearance by the right hon. gentleman.

An hon. Member: There has been a delegation of nothing.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Has nothing been delegated? It is not the duty of another minister nor the responsibility of another minister to pilot through a cabinet restructuring of this kind. This is a fundamental abdication of responsibility on the part of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Pepin: How?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who has exercised the responsibility of a privy councillor, should know better and should know that that is the responsibility of the Prime Minister. I am not speaking of the other parts of the bill. I am speaking of this particular part.

An hon. Member: He does know and he does not care.

Mr. Pepin: That is not correct.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister can wave his hands in protest all he wants, but this is all within the responsibility of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Boulanger: Why does the hon. member not read the bill?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce suggests that there can be delegation of responsibility. Not one minister has said anything in justification of this clause.

An hon. Members: There is no gag.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Simply because this clause appears in a bill it seems that we are to treat it as a law, as a ukase from on high, as though this were the imprint of God which should not be questioned. That is not the way this House will take it; and, as far as I am concerned, I say that if this is to be the attitude of the government, it will take that much longer to get the bill through.

Mr. Boulanger: Blackmail.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, this is not blackmail.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

The Chairman: Order, please. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is trying to gain the floor on a point of order.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Chairman, I have heard the argument developed by my hon. friend from Edmonton West. Can he refer to any law or constitutional practice to demonstrate that a minister in whose name a bill appears must be present in the House and cannot be represented by another minister when his bill is introduced and debated in the House?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am very pleased to answer that question. I will say this: ministers, on occasions, have been represented by other ministers, yes. They have discussed legislation and so on and so forth. I will reply to the minister by saying that no Prime Minister has ever ducked the responsibility or the obligation of setting up a new ministry or altering the composition of his cabinet. That is not the responsibility of either the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. That is in no way their responsibility whatsoever.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member should check the record.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The minister can check the record all he wants. I will say to the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that he is trying to drag across the trail a very smelly red herring.

Mr. Pepin: Not at all.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The government says that it wants to have a flexible response. That seems to be the theme underlying the whole principle of this part of the bill. The government wants to be in the position of being able to exercise a flexible response, so that action can be taken and so that it will not have to come to this House to justify that action. It takes too long a time. Of course, if one wants to take that argument to its ultimate point, one can say that the government which allows the greatest degree of flexible response is a dictatorship, a straight dictatorship. Under that system all that has to happen is this: one man makes up his mind and, there and then, the changes are made. If that is the sort of flexible response you want, then I suggest to you that you have not gone far enough.

Mr. Paproski: What you ask for is what you get.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Nevertheless, the tendency is there. This is the action of people who are impatient with democracy. This clause seeks to give the Prime Minister the power to create at some time five ministries of state. It is the Prime Minister who is to get these powers. He will do that whenever he sees fit. It is not the government at large that is getting the power. It is not the cabinet, or the governor in council that is getting the power, it is the Prime Minister. Let not the President of the Treasury Board look at me with amazement or incredulity on his face. Let us get down to brass tacks, Mr. Chairman, and admit that there is not one ministry that exists or one minister who occupies his office without the complete approval and sanction of the Prime Minister. He put the ministers there and he can also remove them very rapidly. This could and does happen.

Mr. Boulanger: Where did the hon. member get his information?

Mr. Paproski: Look at what happened to the hon. member for Trinity.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Let us briefly—and I may need more time to speak on this subject later—review the power of the Prime Minister of Canada, or the power of the office of the Prime of Canada, as compared with the power of the President of the United States and the power of the Prime Minister of Great Britain. At the present time, even without this bill, the Prime Minister of Canada is a more powerful individual within the structure of the government of Canada than is the president of the United States or the prime minister of Great Britain. Some people may be amazed at this fact. I assure hon. members that this particular step that is now being proposed by the government in this bill takes that power much further. There can be a manipulation of the cabinet and the entire structure of government by one man.

An hon. Member: You are a bunch of puppets.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What is the purpose of the creation of ministries of state? We could have a minister of state for economic affairs. We could transfer the functions of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the Minister of National Revenue, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion and the Minister of Finance and put them all under a minister of state for economic affairs. This would take in one large ambit of the government. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Minister of National Defence and a couple of other ministers could be grouped under one title. The duties of the Attorney-General of Canada, the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General could all be wrapped up in one ministry of state for home security. There could be five czars within the cabinet.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, may I direct a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): After I finish my speech. At this moment I do not have time to answer but after my remarks the hon. member will have the opportunity of asking me questions.

[English]

This can be changed by order in council. Who but the Prime Minister controls those who make the orders in council? The Prime Minister governs the people who do this work. This is the nature of the beast. I am not referring to the present Prime Minister, but the office of any Prime Minister. I am not talking about the personality of the present Prime Minister, I am discussing the position, powers and responsibilities of that office and what can be done. This Parliament is being asked to give even greater powers to that office. I object to that, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): My time is very short, but I intend to come back to this charge with regard to the powers of the office of the Prime Minister. Under this set-up, no government member will dare challenge that. Why cut off your nose to spite your face? I am brutally frank about this.

The executive already has too much power vis-à-vis Parliament. It is on behalf of Parliament that I want to speak. Hon. members who are wholeheartedly behind this proposal are being deluded by the so-called request for a flexible response and so-called efficiency. This is being done in the same way that members have been deluded and inveigled into giving up their rights, some in very small slices but others to a considerable extent.

Mr. Boulanger: Their rights to what?

Mr. Lambert: Their own rights as members. This is something the hon. member fails to recognize.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lambert: The only right that the hon. member recognizes is that he can sit in his seat, raise his voice and heckle by uttering nonsense. That is all he can do.

Mr. Drury: Will the hon. member permit a question?

The Chairman: Order, please. Is the President of the Treasury Board rising on a point of order?

Mr. Drury: No, Mr. Chairman. I want to know whether the hon. member will permit a question.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Of course, I will permit questions from the genial minister.

Mr. Drury: I am most interested in this analysis. I would like to know in what way the rights of Parliament would be derrogated, eroded or reduced by the appointment of a minister of state to look after the affairs of women, as has been suggested?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The affairs of—

Mr. Drury: The female sex.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It is not the purpose that I am discussing Mr. Chairman. It is the fact that such a ministry, having been set up, could be completely abrogated by an order in council without any discussion in this House. If the ministry is set up, the members of this House would not have one word to say about the duties and powers of such a ministry. Even the act of setting it up would be the result of the thoughts of one man, or a small group of men, who would have the exclusive right to determine the nature of the order in council setting up that ministry.

There are variations provided for in clause 16. The Governor in Council may by proclamation make changes from time to time. Parliament would not have the opportunity of discussing them. To that extent, Mr. Chairman, the rights of members are being abrogated. The composition of the cabinet is being provided for in a manner whereby this House will not have the opportunity to say one word about it, yet the cabinet is supposed to be responsible to this House. What a contradiction in logic is that? Although the cabinet is supposed to be responsible to this House, we are now being asked to state that we will not have anything to say about the duties assigned to ministers or anything of that nature. I notice that my time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am not going to ask for an extension at this time.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member's time has just expired. He may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question.

The Chairman: I understand there is unanimous consent. Before the hon. member continues, he may want to accept a question from the parliamentary secretary.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I have no objection to the hon. member continuing his brilliant speech, which contributes nothing to the debate, but I should make that subject to a condition, that he reply immediately to the question I want to put to him.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I accept no condition set by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary, but I will tell him that it was not my intention to pursue my remarks now as they would extend far beyond the few minutes I would be granted. I shall therefore reply later this afternoon, and I am prepared to reply 100 times, if he so wishes.

Mr. Béchard: Once should be enough.

• (12:50 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Lotbinière.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the comment made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Béchard) who is imposing conditions on the right to speak of an hon. member. It seems to me that he is assuming certain rights, since all hon. members have the right to speak, and since it is not up to one of them or to a Parliamentary Secretary to grant such right.

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order. I wish to point out that I have as much right to speak as the hon. member for Lotbinière who is giving us, for the fifth time the same senseless speech.

[English]

An hon. Member: That does not mean anything.

Mr. Paproski: On a point of order.

The Chairman: Order. Will the hon. member for Lotbinière please resume his seat? I recognize the hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Paproski: I wish hon. members on the government side would stop their filibuster so the hon. member for Lotbinière can carry on.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière has the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, at this point of the debate on clause 14, which provides that the Governor in Council may by proclamation, establish a ministry of state, without going through the normal procedure, that is through legislation, I object once more to this manner of proceeding. Since the amendment I moved has been rejected, I wanted to intervene at this time to bring in new elements to this debate.

To replace my hon. colleagues in the context of this debate, I should like to set forth some basic principles that govern Canada. Canada is a sovereign country, although its charter is a foreign document. Our political system is a constitutional monarchy, in a federal system, in a parliamentary and democratic system, in a responsible government.

Mr. Chairman, the executive now consists of the Governor General, the Prime Minister and his cabinet. The Prime Minister is the major element.

The Governor General merely acts on behalf of the sovereign and on the advice of the cabinet. He summons, adjourns and dissolves parliament. He sanctions legislation and officiates at ceremonies. His main responsibility is to ensure the continuity of the state and to choose a Prime Minister in some rare and exceptional cases.

The members of the cabinet must normally be elected members from the party of the majority or from the party which obtained the confidence of the House.

Mr. Chairman, such is the spirit of the statutes which govern Canada. Therefore, it may be seen that the Governor in Council is nothing more than a ceremonial institution, and that it is not the Governor in Council who can establish "ministries of state", but rather the cabinet.

According to the British North America Act, parliament is composed of the Queen, the Senate and the House of Commons. The House of Commons remains the corner stone of the Canadian parliamentary system. Only the House may propose bills involving expenditure of monies or imposing new taxes.

Mr. Chairman, this is still the spirit of the legislation governing the Parliament of Canada. Well, clause 14 pushes aside parliament, which is still the supreme institution according to our statutes, to say that the cabinet itself will establish by proclamation and not by legislation the "ministries of state". The executive power is responsible to the elected representatives of the people for its actions and decisions. The House can overthrow the government by a non confidence vote, but the Prime Minister may at any time ask the Governor General to dissolve parliament and call a general election.

Therefore it means, Mr. Chairman, that according to the intent of the laws governing Canada, this House still remains a supreme institution. The government must answer to parliament for its decisions and administration.

But, in clause 14, the government gives itself an exceptional right not to proceed through parliament, concerning the establishment of "ministries of state". There is, in Canada, a genuine separation between the judicial and the political powers on which is based the principle of the independence of courts.

But parliament, Mr. Chairman, is still sovereign, under Canadian laws concerning the powers not dealt with under the BNA Act, including human rights.

Mr. Chairman, this shows again how the government, through clause 14, violates the laws which, since 1867, govern the administration of Canada. Parliament—and this is where things become most interesting if we consider the intent of the laws governing us—exercises control over the action of the executive power and can withdraw its confidence if necessary.

This means, Mr. Chairman, that it is not the government or the cabinet which gives parliament its power, but parliament which gives it to the government. It is an important factor of our parliamentary system and shows that if one wants to be logical, parliament should confer to the government the power to create those ministries of state and will in effect be creating them. It does not fall on the tool of parliament to create those ministries but on parliament itself.

Parliament must consider bills and the supremacy of the legislative power has never been challenged in Canada.

However, Mr. Chairman, the present government is challenging the supreme authority of that legislative institution, by introducing an exceptional legislation concerning the establishment of ministries.

I see that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) is frowning, but I suggest to him that his department was indeed created by an act passed by the House of Commons while those ministries will not be established by an act of the House of Commons but rather by a proclamation of the governor in council.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

The Chairman: It being one o'clock I do leave the chair. The committee will resume at two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

• (2:00 p.m.)

AFTER RECESS

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, before lunch, I was demonstrating that clause 14 is in direct contradiction with the spirit and the letter of the legislation governing the land since 1867.

Parliament, always according to the spirit and the letter of the legislation governing Canada, exercises control over the actions of the executive power and can deny its confidence if need be. This has occurred in Canadian history. When you read the history of Canada, the mere fact that in some instances parliament denied its confidence in the government through a non-confidence motion or by overthrowing it proves to what extent the influence of parliament exceeds the executive power where decisions are concerned.

Parliament must study bills always according to the spirit of the law. The supremacy of the legislative power in this regard has never been questioned in Canada.

It is done nevertheless in the everyday political life. One quickly realizes that the balance of power now tends towards the executive on account of the great number of statutes. For instance, under the omnibus bill before us, we can no longer exercise complete control over all aspects of the legislative program submitted to parliament.

That is an extremely important point. The government made parliamentary reforms, they invented new ways of legislating in presenting, for instance, measures which we call omnibus bills and which include different parts often without any relation with one another. It is a kind of package deal that the House is asked to pass at top speed.

It does not take more time to pass a complex piece of legislation than a very simple one. Such a thing is inconceivable but it is done without hesitation under the guise of efficiency. Such is the system towards which parliament is moving progressively while losing little by little its control over the legislative power.

We can no longer thoroughly and objectively examine complex bills as we would a very simple measure. Bills from a member of the opposition have no chance of going through because the system is inadequate or because it is a bill the cabinet has decided not to approve.

The government has now decided to legislate through regulations without consulting the members and thus weaken the legislative power.

Now what is the object of clause 14 if not to legislate by creating "ministries of state" through a regulation or a royal proclamation instead of doing it by means of a debate and a vote in the House.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to give an explanation on a particular point. I do not object to the creation of ministries of state nor to the underlying principle, but I object to the form, to the procedure through which we are going to create ministries of state.

That will have the effect of increasing the power of the government to legislate by proclamation or regulations without consulting the House. It is that aspect of the question which prompts me to fight so desperately in the hope of bringing my colleagues, and particularly the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), to revise their positions.

More and more, observers believe that the most important changes in the political institutions of Canada are no longer the result of the work of parliament, but rather of structures which properly speaking have no legislative power and which come directly under the jurisdiction of the executive power. For instance, the federal-provincial conferences as well as the different ministries of state which will be established.

Mr. Chairman, those ministries of state do not come under the jurisdiction of parliament, but under that of the executive power which will legislate more and more not through the democratic action of parliament but through its own authority, by way of royal proclamation or regulations.

Mr. Chairman, the rise of technocrats and the delegation of the responsibilities of the House to Crown corporations, to offices, to boards, to the cabinet itself, as it is done by Order in Council, have contributed and contribute more and more to a loss of prestige by parliament.

Mr. Chairman, more and more this government is legislating, controlling and influencing the Canadian policy not by using such a wonderful tool as parliament but on its own and through its own creatures, by establishing corporations not under the control of parliament, and by setting up, for example, regional information offices at the service of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) about which members of parliament are not allowed to say or know anything.

By proclamation, the government would give itself the power to create ministries of state, to appoint directly ministers of state at the head of these ministries, and this would therefore entail the expenditure of public funds which would escape control by parliament and we would get no information except, of course, the piece-meal information which the government agrees to give us.

Needless to say, Mr. Chairman, as members we are already in quite a precarious position in the eyes of the Canadian people as we cannot play the role we were given regardless which side of the House we are sitting, namely of being informed and of transmitting this information to our ridings. We can no longer do this now because of the increasingly encroaching powers of the technocrats on members' actions.

This is basic. Several Liberal members behind the curtains are justified in complaining as do the Conservative the NDP and the Créditiste members, that the technocrats now have more importance and influence than the members, and this is nonsense.

The technocrats do not have to report to the people whereas the members do. In passing, let me say simply that each one of us regardless of his political views, will be responsible before our citizens at the next general election.

This means that if we are to account for our actions to the people we represent in parliament we are entitled to influence the policies and the administration.

Such are the spirit and the letter of the legislation governing our country. Mr. Chairman, when the executive, under the guise of efficiency, creates tools directly responsible to it and not to parliament, when the government arrogates the powers of parliament and delegates them to tools not responsible to the people, the prestige of parliament is being degraded, as well as the role of the member, whatever his political allegiance. We then prove inconsistent and indeed undemocratic.

We are all for efficiency and for "developing new policies" as prescribed by clause 14, since our present policy is antiquated and unintelligible. We wish the development of a new policy in various fields. We should like to know in which particular field these ministries will act, under whose authority and, precisely what responsibilities the ministers appointed to head them will assume. In addition, we should like to know whether these ministers will be responsible to parliament.

I ask myself the following question: will these ministers answer questions put by hon. members? In fact, the bill clearly says that the Governor in Council will appoint them. Therefore, if the minister heading the ministry condescends to reply, we shall get answer but, otherwise, they will do as does the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) concerning the CBC; they will provide no answer.

Mr. Chairman, this is why I fiercely oppose this clause that runs counter to the spirit and the letter of the legislation governing Canada since 1867.

[English]

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Chairman, there are probably some reasons why, after 17 days on this bill, a government member might be prompted to enter the debate. I suppose one could respond to the provocation of the charges from the opposition which in many cases are unworthy of hon. members opposite—charges of greed and of self-seeking, charges that somehow members over here are afraid that if they became involved in debate they would jeopardize their future, charges which came from amongst others the Leader of the Opposition and are unworthy of him and of his party.

Mr. Baldwin: I have to leave because I have not had my lunch.

Mr. Faulkner: My remarks might give the hon. member for Peace River indigestion, so perhaps he should leave for his lunch. After 17 days of listening to the fatuous charges made by members of the opposition in lieu of argument, one thing is certain and that is that government backbenchers could not be inspired to get into this debate on the basis of dealing with argument. We have not had much in the way of argument. What we have is a badly disguised filibuster which has recently degenerated into a pure farce.

In the past three days we have had four contributions from the hon. member for Lotbinière.

An hon. Member: They have been good ones.

Mr. Faulkner: Last night we had a corporal's guard of Tories led by my good friend the hon. member for St. John's East, who had to speak twice because there were not enough members here to systematically delay the passage of this legislation.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: You wouldn't listen to him once.

Mr. Faulkner: The only point he really made was that somehow in our traditions there is a contradiction when you have the committee of the whole house meeting and standing committees meeting at the same time. At no point did he make the same objection to the House meeting, with Mr. Speaker in the Chair, at the same time as committees were meeting, which is something that happens every day in our practice. According to him, somehow the contradiction develops when the committee of the whole house is meeting and the standing committees are meeting. The hon. member, Mr. Chairman, has more intelligence than that, and one cannot help but feel he was searching for arguments to use up the time, to delay further the passage of what is really, in all respects, a very innocent piece of legislation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Faulkner: Hon. members opposite groan. That is the level of their arguments now, a series of groans. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to examine some of the things that were said—

Mr. McCleave: May I ask the hon. member a technical question, and may I point out he is a former deputy speaker of the House? How is it possible for the committee of the whole house to meet when Mr. Speaker is in the Chair?

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants had done me the courtesy of listening to my remarks more carefully he would be able to appreciate the distinction. The argument being made last night by his colleague was that the committee of the whole house should not be meeting while standing committees are meeting. The point I am making is that the same objection was not made by the hon. member for St. John's East with respect to committees meeting at the same time as the House is meeting with Mr. Speaker in the Chair. Apparently it seemed to him that the House was not as important as the committee of the whole house.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal with some of the things that have been said in this debate. This bill has been described by various members in pretty strong terms, and I suppose in none stronger than those used by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. If you go through his remarks, Mr. Chairman, you will see he made some very strong claims. He claimed that Parliament was being bamboozled. That seems to me to be a reflection as much on the members of his own party as it is on the members on this side of the House. He quoted with approval the remarks of the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte who described "the mercenary provisions" of this bill. He went on to describe the bill as having all the hallmarks of the dictatorship of the majority. He went on to describe it as a fraud, a political swindle, and he also described it as a piece of skulduggery, placing shackles and bridles on Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: Hon. members opposite approve. I hope they approve, when I conclude my remarks, with as much enthusiasm as they approved these fatuous charges of the right hon. member for Prince Albert. That is how he, an ex-prime minister, one of the senior members of this House, described the government organization bill. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that his strong language is nothing more nor less than exaggerated nonsense. The tragedy is that he is not alone. He has the support of another very senior, very respected member of this chamber, the leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. McCleave: Could it possibly be that both of them are right?

Mr. Faulkner: The hon. member will have his chance to speak again, Mr. Chairman, and we will listen with bated breath to his fourth or fifth contribution to this debate. I would like to quote some remarks made by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, as recorded at page 4788 of Hansard:

> Yet here the government is asking for authority, without referring to parliament and merely by proclamation, to set up such a department, to extend the powers of that department—

Mark that, Mr. Chairman.

> —to extend the powers of that department and, when it deems it advisable, to end that department.

It was offensive to the hon. member that the government could do this sort of thing.

> Parliament is not to have any opportunity whatsoever to discuss the matter. Mr. Chairman, this is an amazing attitude for the government to take.

At that point the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert interjected:

> It is scandalous.

This inspired the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands to continue:

It is nothing short of scandalous that the government should ask for the power to set up departments of government without referring to the Parliament of Canada—

That is an interesting suggestion, Mr. Chairman, particularly in light of what was put on the record on February 2 by the President of the Treasury Board. I draw the attention of the committee to recent changes made under the Manitoba Executive Government Organization Act. I point out that at the time of those changes, we hardly heard cries of dismay from members of the New Democratic Party. There were no alarms raised at that point. What were the powers that the Manitoba legislature, under that act, provided for the Lieutenant Governor in Council? I quote from the act:

Notwithstanding any act of the legislature the Lieutenant Governor in Council may determine the organization of executive government and of the various departments thereof, and for that purpose may

(a) establish, vary, or disestablish any department;

This is precisely the power that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was describing in these rather extravagant terms in respect of the present bill before the House. Under the Manitoba Executive Government Organization Act, the Lieutenant Governor in Council may also:

—determine or vary the duties and functions of any department and transfer any duties and functions from one department to another;

(c) determine or change the name of any department.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if what is happening here is so offensive to the traditions of Parliament, if what is happening is so inimical to the traditions of this Parliament, surely it is equally offensive and inimical to the traditions of the legislature of Manitoba. It appears to me that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has two standards, one to apply to a government which does not share his political philosophy, and another to apply to a party which happens to be the government at the time, and which does share his philosophy.

That was not the only claim that that hon. member made. He also went on to call into question the matter of control. All hon. members know that the appropriations of ministries of state pass through our committee system and before the House. But the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands did not deal exactly with this point. These were his remarks, as recorded at page 4788 of Hansard.

There is no opportunity in the House except for a vote. It is true that a member may specify a particular item on which he wants a vote taken, but there is no opportunity for discussion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is simply not true. If the opposition want to debate an item of the estimates, and they know this as well as I do, they simply put forward that item and forgo the temptation to put in a resolution which pre-empts it. There is no reason why any item in our estimates cannot be debated in the House of Commons. I think it is misleading to suggest that there will be no opportunity to debate these appropriations.

• (2:30 p.m.)

An hon. Member: How long?

Mr. Faulkner: I woudl like to look briefly at this bill which has engendered so much opprobrium, which has been called in such extravagant terms a bill to undermine Parliament and jeopardize parliamentary traditions.

Mr. Baldwin: The bill is for the benefit of Liberal backbenchers.

Mr. Faulkner: What are we talking about? What are the powers we are talking about when we deal with ministers of state? I have before me clauses 14 and 15. Basically, the ministries of state for designated purposes are to be set up to formulate and develop new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters coming within the responsibility of the government of Canada. Surely, that is not such an outrageous proposition. A ministry of state would simply be set up to respond, in a flexible way, to immediate needs. It seems to me a little extraordinary that hon. members opposite can see in such a provision a threat to our democratic institutions, and such a threat to our Parliament, that it has required them to protract this debate for 17 days. When one compares the particular powers sought in this bill with the powers which are available to the Manitoban Lieutenant Governor in Council, one really questions the sincerity at least of members in the NDP in protracting this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Faulkner: The fact is that this is an entirely relevant provision, relevant to the needs of government in the 1970's. There is nothing insidious about it, there is nothing dangerous about it, and it escapes me completely as I am sure it must escape Canadians at large, why the official opposition would protract, delay and procrastinate for 17 solid days of legislative time, debate on a bill which simply provides for these meaningful and relevant powers.

Mr. Osler: Would the hon. member permit a question? Can he tell us how much mail he has been getting on the subject after 17 days of debate? I did not receive any.

Mr. Faulkner: That is true. I am hoping to get more mail after my speech.

Mr. Baldwin: You will, and you will not like it.

Mr. Reid: It will all be from you.

Mr. Faulkner: If I may sum up, because my time is limited, as is everybody else's—

An hon. Member: Take all the time you want.

Mr. McCleave: We are Conservatives, not hoodlums.

Mr. Faulkner: I know why hon. members opposite are so generous, because when I speak it takes the burden off others in protracting this absurd filibuster into 18 and 19 days. But I am not prepared to go on to that degree, much as I admire and respect hon. members opposite.

The point is that clauses 14 and 15, which deal with ministries of state, do not set up a department to manage a program. In the bill itself it is indicated, and it was indicated by the President of the Treasury Board, that ministries of state will be more or less small, highly specialized groups, probably temporary in nature in some cases, to deal with a specific problem. I really fail to see how any member opposite, with any understanding, even as minimal as it often is on the opposite side, of what our needs are today in government could possibly object to that provision.

Now, I want to turn to another clause which has also come in for some criticism, and which relates to parliamentary secretaries.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McGrath: That is the one that is so dear to most of our hearts.

Mr. Faulkner: I am surprised at the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. McGrath: It affects all my deposed friends over there.

Mr. Faulkner: The hon. member has had some experience with regard to parliamentary secretaries. Would he like to see the leader of his party stand up and say, if elected, God forbid, as leader of his country, that he would abolish this provision in the bill?

Mr. Baldwin: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Faulkner: I am running out of time. During this debate no mention has been made of the responsibilities of parliamentary secretaries, and there are some experienced ex-parliamentary secretaries opposite who know what those responsibilities are and who are perfectly aware of the history of parliamentary secretaries in our tradition. Instead, we were faced with a blanket charge of greed, self-seeking ambition and all sorts of odious charges which are really unworthy of hon. members opposite. What I find so interesting is how the line of argument has changed.

Mr. McCleave: Do you want us to lobby for you?

Mr. Faulkner: In 1959 this was not the argument hon. members opposite were using. On March 24, a resolution was introduced to the House which I would like to quote.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Faulkner: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. Hon. members should know that they should not disturb the Chairman when he is reading the Bible.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that you are reading the Bible in the middle of my speech, but never mind.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

Mr. Baldwin: He was reading the section which says "They shall begat—"

Mr. Faulkner: The resolution reads as follows:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the appointment of parliamentary secretaries to ministers, to provide for the payment of salaries to them at the rate of $4,000 per annum out of the consolidated revenue fund and to authorize the re-imbursement to them of reasonable expenses incurred by them in the discharge of their duties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Faulkner: That was a resolution introduced in 1959 by none other than the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I know that the hon. member is not the kind of hon. member who, despite his party, would deliberately try to mislead the House, but I think the hon. member must agree that that act replaced one which the Liberal government enacted dealing with parliamentary assistants.

Mr. Faulkner: I missed the point of order of the hon. member, but I am advised by the President of the Treasury Board that it was insignificant. However, let me proceed. Now that I have read the resolution and all hon. members are aware of it, let me point out that what is more interesting than that simple resolution is the argument that was developed by the right hon. gentleman in defence of the resolution. I think his arguments are dead on. It is not often that I agree with him but this was one time in a debate when he was absolutely dead on. I am surprised that he did not employ the same arguments in the debate dealing with the bill before us. As recorded at page 2186 of Hansard, in defence of the resolution providing for parliamentary secretaries and their emoluments he said:

> Our purpose is at all times to improve and strengthen Parliament as an institution; to make possible an opportunity for members in various parts of the country to learn of the operations of the departments and to participate in a specialized manner in doing those things which are allotted the departments—

Mr. Baldwin: We had members who were capable of doing it.

Mr. Faulkner: I would like to continue reading what I consider to be quite a relevant quotation. It continues:

> After all, the major question is to keep Parliament in a position of not being unchanged and unchangeable.

That was the justification and that, of course, is precisely the justification being used today. He had more to say as follows:

> We maintain ancient traditions; we change to meet those changes that come about through the complexities of modern government.

• (2:40 p.m.)

> We change some of the forms, but maintain the mandate. We alter, to meet altering conditions, the techniques of Parliament. We do not change the great abiding things that have remained with us as our legacy from the generations past.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Does the House agree to allow the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Faulkner: I am very grateful, Mr. Chairman, and I will only be a few minutes.

Mr. McGrath: Now, you have another 20 minutes.

Mr. Faulkner: The arguments which were relevant in 1959 in support of the very useful initiative of the Conservative party are equally relevant in 1970. Probably even more so, since the calibre of appointees is higher.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faulkner: I got a lot of support there from the parliamentary secretaries.

Mr. McGrath: You didn't get any from your predecessor.

Mr. Faulkner: It appears to me to be somewhat curious that the arguments have changed over a period of some ten or eleven years. I don't want to use up any more of the time of this chamber, Mr. Chairman, because I am sure that after this convincing intervention there will be a disposition to take the vote.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Francis: Vote.

Mr. Faulkner: I want to repeat that it does seem that the argument about the bill as a threat to Parliament, and as a threat to our institutions amounts to nothing more than arrant nonsense, and that these charges are presented with synthetic indignation. We should call it what it is at this point, shameful and shameless obstruction of government business. I think the opposition will be held accountable for it when they meet the people.

An hon. Member: When is that?

Mr. Faulkner: In my view, Parliament deserves much better from the opposition than we are getting and have heard during the past 17 days.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member indicated he would accept a question and I have a very simple one. In view of the fact that the same members on the other side have sat all through this debate, are we to assume that they are the candidates for ministers of state and parliamentary secretaries?

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Boulanger: On the same point of order—

Mr. Baldwin: It was not a point of order.

Mr. Boulanger: On the same point of order; wouldn't you think that after inviting us to speak, the opposition would have had enough for their money for a few days? They realize how good we are now.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I don't think questions of order of that type should be directed to the Chairman, who, after all, is an innocent bystander not seeking any particular honour.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I think the strength of our parliamentary institution has been well proven in the last couple of days. We are strong enough to withstand the last question; we are strong enough to withstand the last speech; we are strong enough to withstand the fact that one side of this chamber decided a couple of days ago that the other side should not be allowed to speak. In our turn, however, we would permit the parliamentary secretary to continue his speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: You are all heart.

Mr. McCleave: We are all heart, we are all democracy, we are all soul and we are going to make this institution work despite the efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite to turn it into a computerized 1984 type of operation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: I don't have to pay much attention to the odour of those who are preaching for higher calls to know that we are heading exactly in the right direction when we criticize this bill. I rise from higher motives than simply to cast aspersions—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCleave: —on the preachments of those opposite. I rise to speak on Bill C-207, an act respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto. I rise from the rather special position of having been the first person in the House to speak on this particular measure, to cast doubts on the way it was presented to us.

An hon. Member: What date was that?

Mr. McCleave: That was so long ago that my hon. friend opposite has now about ten more grey hairs and by the time he goes back to his constituents to try to explain it he will be completely bald. I rise to carry on the point I made then, that this is seven bills in one. I am not even going to touch on the part that deals with parliamentary secretaries and this should please my hon. friends opposite very much. Within the time allotted to me, I am going to deal especially with Part IV which refers to ministries and ministers of state. On its face, Bill C-207 bears the sponsorship of the Prime Minister of Canada.

Mr. McGrath: Where is he?

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member for St. John's East has asked where the Prime Minister of Canada is today.

An hon. Member: Read the newspaper.

Mr. McCleave: The right hon. Prime Minister of Canada, who sponsored this bill, has never spoken on it in this House, but he has answered some questions about it during the question period. I shall refer to them later. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have known of any newlywed in Canada to visit Niagara Falls without his wife.

Mr. Boulanger: That is not very funny.

Mr. McCleave: It is not very funny, Mr. Chairman, and I am glad somebody is speaking up for the wife of the Prime Minister today.

Mr. Boulanger: From a socialist I would expect it.

Mr. McCleave: I could finish the second, third and fourth parts of my speech if necessary at a future time without being interrupted by the hon. gentleman opposite.

I think it has to be pointed out over and over again to the House of Commons and the people of Canada that this is the first time in my memory a bill has been debated so long without the presence of the person associated with it. That is rather unusual, and since the bill involves the reorganization of the government of Canada, I think we should have some indication of the thoughts of the right hon. gentleman from Mount Royal on it and his ideas about the organization of the government which he heads. Be that as it may if we don't get his views now perhaps we will get them at some other time.

I am going to deal, Mr. Chairman, with Part IV which refers to ministries and ministers of state, and I will not be drawn into a discussion of the question of parliamentary secretaries. However, I should be glad to answer the hon. member for Peterborough on that at a future time. Last week or the week before in this chamber, the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings asked the Prime Minister a question about the ministries of state and I followed with a supplementary question. The answers clearly showed the Prime Minister envisioned that the housing and urban affairs policy of his government would be established by the creation of one ministry of state, that the science policy of this government would be established by a second ministry of state and, according to a speech by the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing, that possibly matters under the aegis of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women would be the responsibility of yet another minister of state. This accounts for three of the five ministries of state.

I should like to repeat in committee this afternoon a question I asked the other night which was answered by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister. Now, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister is an engaging chap, and I think he was struck by my point, but he could not answer on behalf of the government, nor could any minister and the Prime Minister himself was not here. The question was this: Are we to take it that whenever there is a vacuum in the ministry, that the vacuum can be filled by an ex parté action, so to speak, taken by the Prime Minister and his government? I say that is exactly what this House is being asked to approve when it approves part IV of this measure. In other words, immediately after this measure is given royal assent the right hon. gentleman can set up his ministry for housing and urban affairs. No one in this chamber will have the right to stand up and say that this or that should be in the legislation, or that certain powers should be given to the minister and certain powers withheld. It is as simple as that, Mr. Chairman. Don't you think it is important and does not anybody on the government side think that this is important? Does no one in the opposition think that this is an important matter?

An hon. Member: I do.

Mr. McCleave: I ask, why have we not, in this debate, concerned ourselves with urban affairs? The Prime Minister told the House that he wishes to set up a department dealing with urban affairs. Oh yes, we all buy esoteric theories and listen to guff and probably talk a lot of guff; but we do not talk about the things that concern Canada and the urbanization of this country. Would it not be a pity if, without debating urban affairs, we passed this bill and thereby gave some fellow in the ranks of the government who was preaching for a call the right to set up a department of urban affairs which might possibly contravene the provisions of the British North America Act relating to federal responsibilities. Urban affairs constitute the fastest growing problem within our nation. Should we not be debating that subject now? Heavens above, Mr. Chairman, if we do not debate the subject, how can we even go back to our people and say that we had the gall to represent them in Parliament? How can we say that if we allow this opportunity to slip by? I say to the Prime Minister that this particular debate ought to be an urban affairs debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCleave: The right hon. gentleman also said that science policy would be subject to a pronunciamento from the government. Which hon. member would he pick to guide our science policy? I see two hon. members who, in my opinion, might perform this task adequately. Should not they and others on the government be listening to what we on this side say? Should they not listen to our opinions? Are we supposed to crouch in some miserable position, and forget that we are in Parliament. Oh, come on now. The hon. member who suggested that we are spending too long on this debate may wish that we had spent 1,000 days more on it if he wishes Parliament to remain in being. The Minister without Portfolio who I suppose has responsibility for the recommendations of the royal commission on the status of women, if anyone can be said to be in charge of them, has suggested, I think, that the subject of women should come under the portfolio of one of the new ministers of state. Will this mean that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, the only woman in the House, will be included within the responsibilities of that portfolio.

An hon. Member: She can look after herself.

Mr. McCleave: Are the rest of us in this House not to say what sort of jurisdiction that minister will have?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McCleave: Is that what we have come to in this Parliament? Is none of us to be allowed to express his opinion on subjects like housing and urban transport, the area in which we face some of our greatest problems?

Mr. McGrath: Don't forget Information Canada.

Mr. McCleave: Are we not to be allowed to speak on science policy? The committee of the other place studying this matter had volumes to say on the subject, and did not show in any favourable light any government going back as far as 1935. I am trying to make my remarks as broad and as non-partisan as possible, you see. It showed all governments in a bad light; science policy, like Topsy, has been allowed to grow and grow. It is as simple as that, Mr. Chairman.

Once in a while I have tried to be non-partisan in my speeches, although this afternoon I have been partisan. Sometimes I make suggestions which may not be valid until ten or 15 years have passed. At any rate, I have tried to make suggestions to the best of my ability. I say that this is good or that is bad and, somehow, we reach a consensus. Apparently, we are being told at present that the computer knows what is good and that we need not trouble ourselves about some matters. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman, that is not good enough. If that is what Parliament is to be all about then, for goodness sake let us put it in the form of a resolution so that some of us can get out while there is still time and preserve our sanity.

Let us look, specifically, at how ministers of state are to derive their powers. The hon. member who preceded me mentioned clauses 14 and 15. I shall read clause 14:

> Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters coming within the responsibility of the Government of Canada warrant the establishment for the time being of a special portion of the public service of Canada presided over by a Minister charged with responsibility for the formulation and development of such policies, the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

If I may, I should like to mention something relating to my home province. If we are to be parochial in our thinking, let us at least talk about the environment from which we began our careers. When the Fathers of Confederation sat down together over 100 years ago, they did two things which now appear to be self-contradictory. If oil is discovered in commercial quantities off the coast of Nova Scotia, it will be seen that the positions of the Fathers of Confederation were contradictory indeed. The British North America Act provides that the boundaries of the province of Nova Scotia shall remain as they existed before confederation. If that is so, then the boundaries of Nova Scotia clearly extend to Sable Island, that spit of land cropping out in the Atlantic which has swallowed up so many ships and lives. Later, when defining the responsibilities of the Parliament of Canada, the British North America Act, in a subsection of section 91, provides that the Parliament of Canada is to have exclusive jurisdiction over aids to navigation and the like. Sable Island is specifically mentioned. In my opinion, two parts of the British North America Act are contradictory. One part indicates that the province of Nova Scotia is to retain the jurisdiction it exercised over the territory that was Nova Scotia before the coming into effect of confederation, which brings in Sable Island.

The old maps show Sable Island. Nova Scotia, before confederation, had to provide navigation safeguards with respect to the island. But, another part of the British North America Act provides that the federal government or the Parliament of Canada shall have exclusive jurisdiction in certain areas. It mentions navigational safeguards, and specifically mentions Sable Island. I do not know how one can resolve this contradiction. I presume that the provisions of this subsection would not affect earlier sections of the British North America Act. Be that as it may, I submit that because Sable Island is specifically mentioned in the subsection I have just mentioned, the government could establish a ministry charged with responsibility for Sable Island, if I read clause 14 correctly.

An hon. Member: They have horses there.

Mr. McCleave: Yes, there are horses there, but they are not horses on the payroll.

Mr. Schumacher: Not yet.

• (3:00 p.m.)

Mr. McCleave: Be that as it may, we would never have the opportunity to talk about that matter until it was either decided in court or the estimates of the particular ministry came before us. We would never be able to give the flavour of our opinion on what should be established under that ministry of state, and that is completely wrong. The purposes of the government would be better served if they took any one of these matters and allowed members of the opposition and the government to speak about what they think the legislation should contain. I say to the President of the Treasury Board that we should be told government thinking in this regard because it would play a large part in helping us make up our minds and conducting the debate. It is as simple as that. I make that point as seriously as I can.

I only have four or five more minutes in which to speak. I have three quotations I would like to put on the record. If I do not have enough time, perhaps I could yield to someone else and do this at a future time.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. McCleave: The quotations are from a debate in the House of Commons in London on November 19, 1964. The debate was on second reading of the machinery of government bill. I will put these quotations on the record as quickly as I can. I quote from the speech of Mr. Selwyn

Lloyd which appears at page 655 of the record of the debate:

> In our view, changes in the machinery of government should be made after and not before discussion in Parliament, for the very good reason that such matters fall for the judgment of right hon. and hon. members not just as party men or women, but as individual Members of Parliament, custodians of its traditions and rights.

In that debate a leader which appeared in the London Times about the advantages of the extra ministries and the argument for extra parliamentary secretaries was quoted. This was quoted by Mr. Lloyd, at page 663, as follows:

> The present rule, which was re-enacted after deliberation only seven years ago, makes 70 the upper limit. Mr. Wilson will have 83 salaried members of the government on the benches with them. Add to that the unpaid whips and the usual bevy of parliamentary private secretaries and the number of MPs attached to the government will be between 130 and 140, not far short of half the parliamentary Labour Party.

Of course, their numbers are much more than ours.

> If this is to be the practice in the future there simply will not be enough ministerial backbenchers of the capacity and independence required to man the committees which ought to be keeping watch on policy.

I will not read the final quote: I do not think I can compress it into a moment or two. In conclusion, I suggest to the Prime Minister, not by way of fighting words but as kind advice, that it would be better to get our advice when establishing new ministries. There may be a long debate at the start, but there will be shorter debate after the ministries are established. I thank the committee for its indulgence.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, the right hon. member for Prince Albert rendered this House a great service in speaking on Tuesday with his devastating analysis of Bill C-207. I was delighted to see that his message appeared to be getting through to the backbenchers and even a few frontbenchers across the floor. I listened with interest to the discourse and representations of the hon. member from Peterborough a few minutes ago, preaching for the preservation of his present position as Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State.

An. hon. Member: He already has the position.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I said he was preaching for the preservation of his present position of Parliamentary Secretary to the Secretary of State. We listened to his speech with certain reservations because he has a conflict of interest.

Most hon. members call this an omnibus bill. I think most members know the meaning of the word "omnibus." With the Prime Minister's liking for the romantic, and travel, it will take a very large omnibus to hold all the new ministers of state and parliamentary secretaries at one time. There is now new hope for the SST jumbo jet program recently cancelled in the United States. It will take one of these huge planes to carry this expensive throng. The planes now at the disposal of the Prime Minister will be made obsolete by Bill C-207 if he wishes to take his cabinet with him.

[Mr. McCleave.]

Cracks are beginning to show up in the government wall, a wall that many of us had come to believe was invincible. When men lose their taste for debate and lack the courage to stand up and oppose, then the leader of such men can indeed become invincible. Despotism must have support. No despot has ever ruled on the strength of his own initiative or his own character. He must rally men around him who are willing to be used as pawns in a cruel game designed to systematically rob the people of their heritage. But cracks are now showing up in the wall, Mr. Chairman, and the great one-man show across the floor is nearing the end of the last act. The curtain will be rung down on the sorriest melodrama ever played in this House. As result of the railway engine drivers' strike, the only thing moving in Canada today is the Liberal gravy train.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alkenbrack: Members opposite may shout and jeer, but it is true. Everything else, employment, the CNR, the CPR, western grain and potash shipments, British Columbia lumber—are any government members from British Columbia present?—Consolidated Smelters, at Trail, B.C., and Hudson Bay mining at Flin Flon have all stopped. They are either dormant or dead, but the Liberal gravy train rolls merrily on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Alkenbrack: Does the Prime Minister and his supergovernment really believe that the Canadian people are going to swallow one bitter pill after another, without ever calling him to account? The Prime Minister is custodian of the public purse, public welfare and Canadian institutions. There seems to be an assumption on the other side of the House that the Prime Minister can transcend all the rules of procedure and all the traditions which have been developed and nourished in the Canadian Parliament over the last 100 years. He is the sponsor of the bill before us, yet he has not been present at any of the debates in connection therewith.

There seems to be a misconception in the minds of those on the other side of the House as to just what is the role of the Prime Minister. There is surely some confusion as to whether or not the Prime Minister is even a mortal man. The Prime Minister does not own the public purse. He does not own the Canadian people. He does not own the institution of Parliament, all rumours to the contrary. The Prime Minister has confused his sacred trust with outright ownership. I go on record as informing him that he does not hold clear title to anything in Canada except his own personal property, like the rest of us. Parliament and the Canadian purse are the property of the Canadian people. The bill we are now debating makes the dangerous assumption that the Prime Minister is free to disburse funds at pleasure. It makes the assumption that the Prime Minister can dip into the public purse to reward obedience and servility on the part of his loyal subjects on the benches opposite. No Prime Minister in the history of Canada has ever approached the august chair of chief minister with such total disregard for the responsibilities which are traditionally accepted and discharged by the holder of that high office.

All of us in this House know that the office of Prime Minister carries with it implied privileges which are not accorded to other parliamentarians. There are also responsibilities connected with that high office which do not have to be assumed or discharged by any other Canadian. Tabling legislation in this House in the sure knowledge that a clear majority of members supporting the government will ensure its passage is not a privilege; it is a responsibility. When a government holds a clear majority it is a public trust as well as a responsibility for the Prime Minister to ensure that the legislation tabled by him does not transcend the established limits of authority vested in him by the Canadian electorate.

Bill C-207 is a complete rejection of the responsibility assumed, presumably in good faith, by the Prime Minister. It constitutes a clear denial of the sacred trust vested in his high office; and I am prepared to challenge him to take this bill to the Canadian people by way of a referendum. If it is so important to him to have these super powers, let him get them directly from the people by their consent and I shall not complain. But he knows, as we know, Mr. Chairman, that the Canadian people would reject him and his preposterous demands out of hand. There is no justification for the powers the Prime Minister seeks in the bill before us. A Prime Minister who cannot govern with the largest cabinet in the history of this country is not likely to do any better simply by expanding it still further. Adding pomposity to the present Prime Minister's arrogance is not likely to get us better government.

I think the real issue here is that he has come to the end of his string, and I will not be a party to shoring up a weak and confused leader by delivering up the public purse. Nor will I submit to the insidious and arrogant subterfuge which characterizes this bill as being necessary to the preservation of the Canadian environment. We have lots of law on this subject. We have had for 100 years law on our statute books to deal with this situation. Statutes already in force forbid anyone to pollute our streams, our soil and our air. Why not use the laws we already have? Certainly we need an improvement in the quality of the environment—and we intend to get it.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether I understood the hon. gentleman correctly. Do I understand him to say that since we already have adequate laws to protect the environment, we do not need this new department?

Mr. Alkenbrack: I never said we did not need a department of the environment. My contention is that we do not need to pay such an extreme and unreasonable price for one.

The Chairman: Order, please. This might be an appropriate point at which to remind hon. members that we are considering clause 14. I think it is fair that the debate be allowed to range over part IV of the bill because the clauses are interrelated, but I should point out that the establishment of a department of the environment is dealt with in another part of the bill. I believe we should confine debate now to the issue of the ministers of state.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Yes, Mr. Chairman, but clause 14 is one of the clauses which must be passed if we are to obtain a department of the environment. The other day one of my constituents stopped me on a street in Napanee and asked, "Why do you criticize Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Benson so much; they haven't done anything"?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alkenbrack: I thought that was a very good point. This bill is a sugar-coated pill and the inside of the pill is more bitter by far than anything so far perpetrated here. We on this side are being asked to vote, so to speak, in favour of motherhood and in favour of unrestricted abortion, all with one show of the hand. There is no record of such shameless conduct in the history of Parliament, with the possible exception of the use of closure by a former Liberal government in order to subvert this institution for its own purposes. As was pointed out by my right hon. friend from Prince Albert, if we agree to let the Prime Minister re-make Parliament in his own image we could have a ministry of the environment. I would not willingly give him that kind of power in return for any concession.

I would not be prepared to give the Prime Minister unrestrained powers even if he promised to provide one million jobs in the coming year. The price would be too great to pay, and I would not be prepared to take his word on that score since he has steadfastly refused to reverse policies which have inflicted on our people the highest rate of unemployment since the great depression. As my friend said "he has done nothing".

Why would a Canadian Prime Minister need, or even want, a larger cabinet when he already has the largest, the most cumbersome and the most expensive cabinet in Canadian history? I should add that it is also the largest cabinet in the western world. By way of contrast, the United States cabinet consists of 12 departmental ministers and two non-departmental ministers in the persons of the vice-president and the permanent ambassador to the United Nations, for a total of 14. Great Britain appears to be able to get by with a cabinet of 22 ministers; and Britain has a population of some 55 million people. We are not likely to impress other nations with our assumed pre-eminence or importance by giving virtually every member of the government party a fat cabinet post. I believe we would project an image far different from the one the Prime Minister envisions.

It is obvious to anyone who can think at all that the only way in which a government of such a size could be kept under control would be for the Prime Minister to keep the ministers on a short leash—I think he is doing that now—and force them to wear muzzles. There is no other way in which such a monstrous machine could be piloted and guided by one individual. And, with the exception of three or four courageous souls, we have seen for ourselves that the ministers and members across the floor are already kept on a short rein. I wonder how much more a man will endure in order to qualify for one of the lucrative cabinet positions being dangled before him.

One former minister now sitting as an hon. member across the floor has exhibited uncommon courage on many occasions since he forsook the financial rewards and the prestige of the cabinet rather than renounce his lofty code of ethics and his personal honour. I refer to the hon. member for Trinity. He placed his duty to his constituents above the rewards of high office, and many hon. members on his side of the House would do well to follow his example. A few days ago that hon. member took his government to task for the disastrous and inhumane manner in which they have mismanaged the national economy. I would like to repeat one of his comments on that occasion. He said: "In my opinion, as a nation we should be ashamed". He was referring to the massive unemployment in our country but his comment applies equally well to the bill we are debating. If we in this chamber, on both sides of the House, allow the Prime Minister to railroad such a bill through this Parliament, then we should all hang our heads in shame.

Not a single member of this House has a moral right to allow the Prime Minister to take unto himself the powers of a reigning sovereign or of a dictator. If we must do this in order to get a department of the environment, then I submit this is too great a price. Nor do we need a minister of the environment alone. We have already seen that this government takes away more than it gives in the downgrading of the Department of Fisheries, at a time when it has never been more important to us to have an effective fisheries ministry and a forceful and dedicated fisheries minister. Foreign nations are raping and depleting our fishing grounds and, in the process, are putting our fishing and fish processing industries in jeopardy. Scientific effort in the area of inland and offshore fishing technology and fisheries protection should be accelerated—

The Chairman: Order. I appreciate that the debate on this clause has been very wide and I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I think I have a responsibility to ask him to try to be as relevant as possible to clause 14, or at least to part IV of the bill. With respect, there is nothing within the purview of the committee this afternoon relating to the matters with which the hon. members has been dealing.

Mr. Lundrigan: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, clause 14 deals with the creation of a number of ministers of state. In this bill the government is also downgrading the role of the fisheries and eliminating from the roster system of the House one of the most important portfolios in the government. Surely the hon. member's remarks are relevant. As a matter of fact, I hope to be able to make three or four 20-minute speeches on the point the hon. member is now making. I submit that his argument is certainly within the purview of clause 14.

[Mr. Alkenbrack.]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Frontenac-Lennox and Addington.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, I remained seated because I fully expected you would be making a ruling on the hon. member's point of order.

The Chairman: I am prepared to make a ruling. I think generally I agree with the hon. member. If the hon. member who now has the floor is relating his remarks to the creation of a new ministry, or at least the designation of a ministry of state for the purpose of fisheries, or for the purpose of youth, and so on, as many hon. members have already done in this debate, then I think there is relevancy in his remarks.

I have not tried to hold any hon. member too closely to the subject, but with respect I think the hon. member who has the floor and who is making a very good contribution was not previously completely germane to the clause. But I think he will be now.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for your vindication of my statements. I was just saying that a scientific effort in the area of inland and offshore fishing technology and fisheries protection should be accelerated under a fully-fledged ministry, not downgraded. This is but one more price we are expected to pay for the department of the environment, and the price is too high.

The clause that would create the department of the environment has been called the motherhood clause and we are told that if we refuse to let the bill go through we will be accused of being against the preservation and improvement of our environment. I disagree heartily, Mr. Chairman. I call that clause a red herring, and I support the view of the right hon. member for Prince Albert that the clause should have been submitted to this House as a separate bill in order that it could receive adequate study and attention and the support of all parties in the House.

It would be a sad occasion, and it would be the low point in the history of this Parliament, if this bill should ever be enacted into law. If that should happen, then the day on which it is proclaimed should be declared a national day of mourning, which should be observed on that day in each succeeding year as a reminder to the Canadian people that the sacred institution of Parliament was lost to them for all time by default. It will do everything within my power to alert the people to the danger that threatens the future of their institutions and their birthright if this bill becomes law. Bill C-207 is an arrogant attempt to subvert Parliament and to vest suppressive power in the office of the Prime Minister. I will do everything in my power to rouse my people to righteous indignation against this giant step in the direction of dictatorship.

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Chairman, we have heard some very interesting interventions in this debate on part IV of the bill. I was particularly interested in the intervention of the hon. member for Peterborough who so far has been the only member on the government side to contribute to the debate today. He seemed to indicate there was some sort of urgency in this country that required the expeditious passage of this legislation, and I think a word or two should be said on that particular point.

Looking at the order paper, one would not get the impression that there has been a great deal of urgent public business prepared by the government for the consideration of this chamber. It is of interest to note that at second reading stage there are six items. The first is the Yukon Territory minerals bill, the second is the young offenders act, the third the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, the fourth the unemployment insurance legislation, fifth the weather modification bill, and sixth the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act. Of those measures, I submit only three have any real substance and are of national importance—the young offenders bill and the two measures standing in the name of the Minister of Labour. In that connection I think even those measures would not take very much time of the House if the government were to indicate some willingness to remove the controversial and overburdening provisions contained in them.

After second reading we have two measures at the report stage. The first is legislation to provide for a grant for a heavy water plant in Nova Scotia. Then there is legislation dealing with weights and measures. On third reading we have the textile bill. So I do not see how the government can indicate it has a great, exciting program which has been held up by the discussion on this very important piece of legislation. In respect of part IV of the bill which is before us this afternoon, which is the proposal to create five new ministries of state, I would like to ask the government why we should consider increasing the size of this country's cabinet at this time.

Reference has been made to the size of the cabinet in the United Kingdom and the cabinet in the United States. I think it is of interest that in his state of the union address, the President of the United States proposed a reduction in the size of his cabinet. I should like to refer to an article by Lubor J. Zink in the Calgary Herald of February 19, 1971. The article states:

> Paradoxically, Mr. Nixon says he can do with fewer cabinet ministers while Mr. Trudeau says he needs more.
> Calling for a "sweeping reorganization of the executive branch" in his state of the union message last month, Mr. Nixon proposed to reduce the present 12 cabinet departments in Washington to eight.

We have 29. The reduction in the United States is a one-third reduction in the size of the cabinet. The article continues:

> This, he said, we needed "if the government is to keep up with the times and with the needs of the people."
> Mr. Nixon wants to retain unchanged four of the existing departments (state, treasury, defence and justice) which have clearly defined and indispensable roles, but seeks to consolidate the remaining eight into four which would be responsible for human resources, community development, natural resources, and economic development.
>
> "Under this plan," Mr. Nixon said, "rather than dividing up our departments by narrow subjects, we would organize them around the great purposes of government. Rather than scattering responsibility by adding new levels of bureaucracy, we would focus and concentrate the responsibility for getting problems solved."
> It's an imaginative and bold attempt to end the buck-passing paper-pushing practice among proliferating federal agencies which, Mr. Nixon said, have created "hopeless confusion for form and function."
> No doubt the entrenched bureaucratic empires and their political protectors in Washington will fight Mr. Nixon's sweeping reorganization program tooth and nail.

I suggest that Bill C-207 interests the bureaucracy in this country because, after all, if there are to be up to five new ministries there will have to be supporting staffs. I think the comments of the editorialist in the Calgary Herald of February 18, 1971, are of interest here because a year or two ago we had a good program announced by the Prime Minister in which the public service was to be controlled and cut by 25,000 persons, as I recall the announcement of August, 1969. When all the smoke cleared we found that perhaps 300 people actually had been removed from the public service. In any event, that program has fallen by the wayside because now I believe there is a proposal to increase the public service by 8,000. I would quote from the editorial in this regard:

> The great program to reduce the civil service in numbers is being replaced by a great new round of hiring. There is an allowance for hiring an additional 8,000 civil servants. This is one way to reduce unemployment, but it cannot be considered productive nor a realistic way of enlarging the nation's work force.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, if there are to be new ministries there cannot help but be a larger supporting staff and I do not see any demonstrable need for such staff at this time. There certainly is no evidence that any member of the present administration is over-worked. We have a situation in which the Secretary of State I believe is now sojourning around southern France, and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is travelling around the South Pacific in a Boeing 707.

The ambitions of the Minister of Labour are a little less grandiose: he has gone to Montreal. I suppose he is working there in an effort to solve the transportation problem in this country. The locomotive engineers have been without a contract for ten months or more. This is a field of endeavour which is completely under the government's jurisdiction. If we have such an effective and hard working Minister of Labour, I wonder why in the past ten months he was not busy encouraging the parties to reach a contract instead of waiting for a strike to develop before doing anything and going where the action is.

An hon. Member: The next thing we know, you will suggest the whip.

Mr. Schumacher: What whip?

An hon. Member: A whip to beat them into submission.

Mr. Schumacher: I would like to see some of them earn their pay. Perhaps you want them to be like the minister of communications now that the Post Office has been removed from his jurisdiction. What conceivable reason is there for that man to be sitting on the treasury benches and pulling down a full-fledged cabinet minister's salary? Yet you want to add to the number. This administration has demonstrated that it is unable to organize its affairs on a rational basis. We find that the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration is also responsible for the Wheat Board, and neither function is being discharged in a proper way. Recent immigrants to this country have advised me that while in theory the new immigration system may be fine, in practice it is not working. It has been pointed out to me that in practice a great number of immigrants to this country are unskilled and have nothing to contribute to the country except problems both for themselves and for the country.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Schumacher: It is true. We are getting people in our country at this time whose only asset is muscle. This is not what is required by Canada at this time. It is perfectly obvious that the minister does not understand how the grain should be moved in this country. We find a situation where the train engineers started booking off sick last week on the west coast in protest against the long delay in respect of a solution of their problems. Now a week has gone by and certain grades of wheat are not on hand. Certainly the terminal facilities at Vancouver should be used in a better manner. Yet the minister says he must keep the amount of grain in storage at a low level so that there can be efficient handling. I say the fact is that he does not want to pay storage on the grain.

The government talks about the creation of new departments and we are told that these new ministers are needed to formulate policies and programs. What is the Privy Council office doing? What is the Prime Minister's office doing, and what are the senior planning executives of the departments doing, if we are not getting the required planning and formulation of policy and need more ministries?

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Dinsdale: They are running in different directions.

Mr. Schumacher: I would also ask why the government should be allowed to establish departments at will. This is an indication, to me, that this government has no understanding at all of the parliamentary system of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: They are like a football team with no quarterback or coach.

Mr. Schumacher: They are unduly influenced by the presidential system. They will not accept the fact that we have a combination of the executive and legislative branches within one chamber and that the executive branch's responsibility is to the legislative branch. They want to have a clear hand at organizing the executive the way they see fit. This also flows from their feeling that just because they had the greatest number of people elected in the last election, whatever they say goes—without any consideration for the people who did not necessarily support their party in the last election. They should remember that while they may have 154 members and the majority of seats here, they did not receive a majority of votes in the country and that they have certain responsibilities to those people.

In this country we may elect our dictators, but we should not be acting under that principle. The desire to have the right to proclaim new departments without reference to Parliament is just like the desire of the government to set the time for discussion in this place. It is the same type of thinking that produced rule 75C that is behind this bill, where they want this House to delegate absolute power to the executive to proclaim new ministries without further reference to this chamber—ministries that are supposed to be parts of this chamber.

The government has forgotten that we have a parliamentary system and think they are already operating under a presidential system. The roster system is another example of this. As hon. members on this side have pointed out in the last three years, the government has no right to set up a roster system which relieves attendance in this House when members are present in the city of Ottawa. They forget their responsibilities to Parliament.

It is important to members of this House, perhaps more to some than to others, to remember that this parliamentary system is one of the bulwarks protecting the Canadian identity, and that if we further reduce parliamentary processes so as to implement presidential processes we will be reducing more and more our reasons for a separate Canadian identity. I think hon. members from the province of Quebec should be particularly conscious of this fact, because if we adopt presidential processes and make ourselves look more like the Americans, we will also, with the pressure of their presence already on this continent, tend to become part of the United States. If we look and act like them in everything we do, we may as well have their standard of living and become the real thing rather than a pale imitation. So I think it is very important that we stop going along this road toward a denial of the British parliamentary system for some sort of presidential system which would give us the worst of both systems.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to rise again this afternoon. Because hon. members opposite knew I was going to speak, they gathered here in large numbers today.

Mr. Jerome: I just want to interject for one moment on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. There has been discussion about a couple of measures on the order paper pertaining to a government measure and to a measure under the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming, a private member's bill. The government measure, Bill S-11, deals with rainmaking equipment, and the bill in the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming also deals with this subject.

I make this suggestion, which I think will meet with unanimous consent of the House, that just prior to four o'clock the House might be disposed to pass, without debate, Bill S-11 on second reading and refer it to the committee and, furthermore, might be disposed to give unanimous consent to drop from the order paper the bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming but refer the subject matter of the bill to the committee at the same time. I thought I should inform Your Honour of this prior to reaching private members' hour at four o'clock. When the hon. member for Peace River is ready, perhaps we could do that and call it four o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The Chair has taken notice of this suggestion, but it will have to be made when Mr. Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. Baldwin: I would be quite willing to take my hon. friends away from the land of milk and honey in which they have been recently, and if Your Honour wishes to assume the chair at this time I will reluctantly forgo my opportunity to make further comments on this bill. The suggestion of the parliamentary secretary is perfectly agreeable to me.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): This will have to be done at four o'clock when Mr. Speaker is in the chair.

Mr. Baldwin: Do I hear an hon. member on the opposite side say it is four o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Baldwin: I must say the whole thing reminds me of what the great bard said:

> Oh, what a tangled web we weave,
> When first we practise to deceive!

The government, in their attempts to whistle through what they knew were bad, repugnant and objectionable proposals, included them with other measures in respect of which, although this House has had the opportunity to discuss them in a sharp and spirited way, there has been no disposition to prolong the debate. But on these particular measures the government proceeded, in spite of the clearest warning from this side of the House that these two particular parts of the bill were obnoxious and objectionable and would be opposed. When I hear the hon. member for Peterborough stand up and say that we were wrong in taking the time we have in discussing part IV of this bill, may I point out that he is not entitled to do so because we filed a caveat and made absolutely plain what we intended to do.

I say to the President of the Treasury Board that if he does not like it, he knows what to do. There is Standing Order 33 available to him any time he wants it. I will let him look at the Standing Order, but I will inform other hon. members that it is the rule with regard to closure. If the government does not like the fact that we are taking time, which we feel is our duty as responsible members of this House and as members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, in opposing this measure, they have a recourse which is available to them under the rules.

Mr. Boulanger: Yes; but filibustering is another matter.

Mr. Baldwin: This is not filibustering; it is an opportunity to awaken the country to the dangers of this measure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: We have been discussing this matter for 17 days, but how many letters have hon. members opposite received? We have spent an extremely limited amount of time on this part.

• (3:50 p.m.)

An hon. Member: You were not here.

Mr. Baldwin: Let hon. members read the digest Hansard with regard to the debate on this particular part of the bill. Let me tell them we intend to make progress. We intend to stick to our guns, to see that the country is informed through the aid of those people whose duty it is to report intelligently, as I am sure they will, the debates in this House with respect to this issue. We intend to make certain that the people of this country, suffering under the misdeeds of a tyrannical and oppressive government, with heavy unemployment and with the cost of living going up, will look at this cause and the other causes which follow it and see them for what they are, until the volume of mail which flows to members of the opposition and, hopefully, to members of the government will be such as to compel the government to withdraw the bill.

Having disposed in those few sentences of the contribution of the hon. member for Peterborough, I want to turn my attention to the President of the Treasury Board whose remarks in connection with this part of the bill at second reading stage have been reviewed by many. I was not here at the time the minister made those remarks on second reading, but having read them since I wonder from what ancient barrel he dredged-up the material with which he made his speech at that time. Talking about ministers of state, the President of the Treasury Board had this to say, as recorded at page 2769 of Hansard:

> In essence, the government organization bill deals with the constant challenge facing Parliament and the government to be as efficient as possible—

God help us!

> —in doing those things which are in the interest of the Canadian people and society. This challenge is imposed upon us by the rapid changes taking place today, and our response in this regard must be positive. Both Parliament and the government must be flexible;—

I don't know what this bill has got to do with Parliament.

> —both must adapt their procedures and structures; and in the final analysis, the test is whether they are continuing to respond effectively to the needs of the society and of the world with which they must deal.

As recorded at page 2771, the minister went on to say:

> We in Canada have a somewhat more restrictive tradition.

The minister there was referring to the method by which ministers are appointed and selected, and departments established, in the United Kingdom.

> Fundamentally, of course, the prerogative vested in the Crown to establish ministerial offices and fill them remains as untarnished here as it ever was.

I disagree with that statement. The minister is saying—this is the gist of the argument he made previously and has made since—that this bill, so far as it deals with the appointment of ministers of state and the establishment of ministries of state, is only restoring to the government the rights which it held with regard to the prerogative of the Crown as it existed in earlier times. The minister should see the show "Cromwell." Maybe he has seen it already.

Mr. Drury: The bill is to limit that prerogative.

Mr. Baldwin: Maybe the Prime Minister saw a preview of "Cromwell" some months ago, before the show came to this city, and that is why this bill is before us. But the fact is that there is no more prerogative right left in the Crown to establish ministries, as the President of the Treasury Board seems to suggest. He was saying in his statement on January 26, and I quote it again:

> Fundamentally, of course, the prerogative vested in the Crown to establish ministerial offices and fill them remains as untarnished here as it ever was.

Mr. Drury: "Ministerial offices."

Mr. Baldwin: I disagree totally with that statement. I take issue with it. It cannot be substantiated. It must be taken subject to the general common law and statute law that the prerogative right can be affected by Parliament. Parliament has used that right from the time of confederation in the establishment of ministerial offices, ministers and departments. Once Parliament has seen fit to interfere, to enact legislation as it has enacted it, the prerogative right of the Crown is diminished and lost to that extent.

When we read the various government organization acts and the various legislative proposals which established departments of the government at one time or another, there is only one assumption which can be drawn from them, and that is that the prerogative right of the Crown to establish departments has been taken away by Parliament. And what the government wants to do is restore to the Crown this prerogative right. Mr. Chairman, civil wars were fought and parliamentary revolutions have taken place, all of which have settled this question once and for all and beyond any shadow of doubt. That right now remains in this Parliament.

What this bill seeks to do is take that right away from Parliament and give it back to the government. This we shall not permit. This we shall only allow if the government sees fit to impose closure.

Mr. Drury: You have misunderstood.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Baldwin: There was no misunderstanding. I read the minister's remarks quite correctly, and there is no question about them at all. He went on to say:

> This created a problem for Parliament, and for this House in particular, because the accountability of the government to Parliament was much more confused, diluted and imprecise than it should have been.

There is no question about that, Mr. Chairman.

> In other words, Parliament was the weaker as the result of a ministerial system which had failed to keep pace with the demands placed upon it.

That is no excuse for bringing forward a measure of this kind to allow the government the untrammeled right to establish five ministries of state and appoint an unlimited number of ministers of state. I suggest to the President of the Treasury Board that he must seek further to find either constitutional, political or social reasons to justify a measure of this kind. I would like to continue, Mr. Chairman, but I see it is four o'clock, and in view of what has been said may I call it four o'clock?

Mr. Boulanger: Before we call it four o'clock, Mr. Chairman, we have two more minutes left and I wonder whether the hon. member would permit me one question. When he talked about legislative men and businessmen, I would like to know the meaning of the words "sufficiently informed to take a vote."

Mr. Baldwin: "Sufficiently informed to take a vote" is when the members of this House and the people of the country, as a result of the vigilant, praiseworthy efforts of this opposition, are able to find out what has been going on.

Progress reported.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: It being four o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, notices of motions and private bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

WATER RESOURCES MANAGEMENT ACT

PROVISION TO ENABLE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT TO CONTROL SEA AND FRESH WATER RESOURCES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River) moved that Bill C-36, relating to the control and management of the water resources of Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we have only an hour, so my remarks will not be long; and I am sure members on the government side will not filibuster this bill to the stage that we will not have a chance to vote on it. This bill was drafted and brought forward as a private member's public bill for the reasons set out in the explanatory note. As a member of this House with great interest and concern for the water resources of this country, it is my view that while government proposals were aimed in the right direction and contained some measure of remedial action against pollution and misuse of water resources, they did not go to the root of the issue. In my opinion, the federal government was not given the power it is entitled to exercise in a constitutional sense. The Fisheries Act, the Shipping Act, the Navigable Waters Protection Act and other measures have been on the statute books for a great many years. If this legislation had been used it would probably have been sufficient to prevent a great many of the problems which we and the next generation will have to face.

The official aspect of the problem has been apparent to a great many people in the northern part of Canada, and for that reason this bill was presented to the House. The Navigable Waters Protection Act has been in force for a great many years, since well into the last century. The act contains provisions and sanctions which specifically prohibit certain action with regard to the use of navigable waters. For many years prior to the time it was discovered by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and for many years prior to that by the native people, the Peace River has been one of the important, main arteries of navigation in northern Canada. Some years ago the province of British Columbia was permitted to erect a very substantial dam on the river, known as the Bennett dam. I have never rejected the need for the proper development and use of water resources in the north for the production of power, Mr. Speaker, but I think it must be done under rules and regulations which take into account what is best for the nation as a whole. This was not the case with this particular dam.

The federal government of the day, a Liberal government, failed to insist upon the province of British Columbia and the hydro agency which was acting as a Crown agency for the government, filing an application under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, filing the plan and a statement of its requirements indicating the amount of water to be impounded by the construction of the dam. The federal government and the provincial government of Alberta of that day failed to consider the possibility that the erection of the dam would cause to those agrarian dwellers below the area where it was constructed, a substantial amount of damage. Construction was allowed to proceed and no attempt was made to compel the province of British Columbia to comply with the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

At the time I asked a number of questions. I pressed the government and the then Minister of Public Works who held responsibility for enforcement of the act. I pressed the Minister of Justice, who said that the works being constructed by the agency of the province of British Columbia were works to which the act applied. I pressed the Minister of Public Works to know whether the government of Canada was proceeding to require the province of British Columbia to file a plan and make application to the department in order to secure permission to proceed under the act. They did not do this, the dam was built and as a result the prophecy of myself and others came to pass. The drainage levels of the river have been diminished. This has happened with the Athabasca delta as well, and it has affected the level in the Mackenzie River navigation system. The result may be permanent damage to future transportation in that area. At the present time we do not know what ill effects it will have.

I could deal with this matter at length, Mr. Speaker, but I know that other hon. members wish to speak and are anxious that this bill receive second reading today. It was for these reasons and because a number of other acts are along the same lines that I introduced this bill. According to the explanatory note, it vests in the federal government the full measure of power which I believe the federal government has to exercise in order to deal with the problems of misuse and pollution of water resources. This is a problem on which we must legislate in the interests of those who come after us, Mr. Speaker. It is not enough for us to legislate for it today; we must legislate for 100 or 200 years hence. The present legislation, while aimed in the right direction, is not adequate and does not go far enough.

I am not suggesting that there is not a role for the provincial government. There is, and there must be, an overriding authority—but that can only be in the federal government. I think it should go a great distance under the existing Constitution. However, if it is found that the existing Constitution does not permit the federal government to go as far as it should in laying down guidelines, then it is for us to alarm the people of Canada so that they will demand that the final and overriding authority be vested in the federal government.

With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I shall resume my seat. I hope that other hon. members will have the opportunity to make contributions before second reading is given to the bill before five o'clock.

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in rising to speak on Bill C-36 is to outline the current status of the Peace-Athabasca delta project and show that the federal government is co-ordinating with the provinces and is taking action on that very severe problem. In doing so, it may be helpful if I reviewed very briefly the problem in the delta and the establishment of the federal-provincial task force. I should like to summarize particularly our co-operative project with the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia. I shall outline and summarize the objective and design of the delta project and the work presently under way.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Hon. members are aware that low water levels have occurred in the delta for several years. This has resulted in ecological change to the natural habitat for fish and wildlife, with consequent damage to their populations. The contributing factors to the low water level are low precipitation in the Peace and Athabasca river basins and the regulation of the Peace River by the construction of the Bennett dam.

As hon. members may remember, in early January of this year ministerial agreement was reached between the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) for the government of Canada and Hon. J. D. Henderson, for the province of Alberta, to establish a joint task force which would be responsible for investigating the delta problem. Subsequently, the government of Saskatchewan agreed to participate in the study, and the government of British Columbia to provide technical information on its Peace River regulation. Because the problem lies largely within a national park, involves an interprovincial river and has adversely affected the livelihood of the local Indian population, the federal government has taken the lead in initiating and funding this investigation. Treasury Board has given its approval to the project, its cost and timing. We have hired a competent consultant, Mr. D. M. Hornby of Calgary, as project director. Mr. Hornby has been on the job now since mid-January, operating with a small professional staff out of the Peace-Athabasca delta project office in Edmonton.

The key element in mounting a co-operative intergovernmental effort is effective organization. In this case the task force consists of an intergovernmental liaison team, a technical committee and the project director and his staff. The intergovernmental liaison team has a member from Canada, Alberta and Saskatchewan. The chairman of the liaison is Mr. F. J. Forbes, head of the prairie regional section, planning division, water operation and planning branch, Department of Fisheries and Forestry. The team's function is to provide liaison on questions of policy and administrative matters between the project director and the governments involved.

The technical committee consists of senior personnel from federal and provincial agencies who are responsible for resources management in the Peace-Athabasca delta area. This committee provides technical advice to the project director. Co-operation, a point stressed in the hon. member's bill, among the members of the task force has been excellent. To date the intergovernmental liaison team has met three times and the technical committee has met twice, including a field trip to the delta on March 24, 1971, which was just last week.

The joint federal-provincial technical committee recommended that a staged approach be adopted. The first stage would focus on restoring water levels in the delta by the spring of 1972. The objective for the first stage as drafted for the technical committee is as follows:

Within the Peace-Athabasca delta and Lake Athabasca area to assess, by September 1, 1971, the environmental effects of the future hydrologic regime (with Shrum generating station, Bennett Dam in operation) on the following:

(1) Vegetation pattern
(2) Fish production
(3) Wildlife habitat

[Mr. Corbin.]

(4) Navigation, and the consequent influence on the socio-economic status of residents, and to recommend what immediate or long-range action, if any, should be taken.

I must stress, Mr. Speaker, that the project is focusing on the immediate problem of restoring water levels by the spring of 1972. Ecologists feel that this is a critical period and that low water levels beyond that time could result in permanent ecological damage in the delta. At the same time, the technical committee recognizes that there are broader environmental issues and long-range implications involved and may recommend additional studies to consider them.

The total estimated cost for the first stage of the project is close to $1 million. Expenditures have been budgeted over a 12-month period ending in March, 1972. The bulk of the expenditure will occur this summer. Expenditure in 1972 will cover the completion of reports and preparation of recommendations for future work. The thrust of the investigations will be ecology, at an estimated cost of $227,000, and hydrology at an estimated cost of $158,000. As noted earlier, the federal government will bear the bulk of the expenditures. Ministerial discussions are under way with Alberta to obtain technical assistance on the project. Also, the intergovernmental liaison team is reviewing the legal aspects of the delta problem.

Having described the Peace-Athabasca delta project, Mr. Speaker, I want to summarize the key developments. First, a project office has been established in Edmonton. The following professional staff for the office has been seconded: a planner from the Department of Fisheries and Forestry, a hydrologist from the water resources division, Alberta Department of Agriculture, and an ecologist from the Canada Wildlife Service; second, a field camp with a capacity for 25 men has been established at Fort Chipewyan; third, a contract was let in early March for an ice-thickness and water-depth survey in the delta. It is a part of the ecological investigations. This work, it is hoped, will be completed shortly. Fourth, contract proposals have been invited for a socio-economic study of the importance of the resources of the area; and fifth, office work is under way on the hydrologic and ecological investigations.

In regard to the purpose of our deliberations this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, which is mainly to assess the need for additional legislation on water resource management, the Peace-Athabasca delta project provides two important conclusions: first, the government in co-operation with the provinces is taking positive action to correct the delta problem; second, the project is evidence that a major intergovernmental effort involving several governments can be mounted quickly under existing legislation. The question then is, what need have we for Bill C-36?

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Corbin) has given the members of the House an outline of what is now taking place under the auspices of the task force to which he referred which is to deal with ecological and other problems created in the Peace River-Athabasca delta area. Without decrying or downgrading the work which he outlined, I suggest that if ever there was a classic case of locking the barn door after the horse was stolen, this is it. Certainly I would not agree with the conclusion he enunciated in his last sentence, that the proposal contained in the bill introduced by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) is unnecessary. Nothing is further from the truth. Perhaps it is all the more necessary in light of the experience of the disastrous or near-disastrous results that have become apparent from the construction of the Portage Mountain dam on the Peace River in the province of British Columbia.

As the hon. member for Peace River has said, this whole question has become one of increasing and urgent importance. The drafting of the bill is rather novel in some respects. I do not intend to go into the details of its merits, but there is one point which strikes me as being the key point if I understand his intent correctly. He is suggesting the obvious, that in any river or river basin which is interprovincial, in light of the current situation in this country we have a situation where the constitutional jurisdiction with respect to something being done for the general advantage of Canada must be recognized and brought into play. If this is what the hon. member for Peace River is seeking to do with this bill, then the principle should certainly commend itself to this House.

The story of the development of the Portage Mountain dam, which has been christened the Bennett dam in honour of the Premier of my province, has gone on for years. Some of the key decisions in relation to it were made during the period I was not a member of this House, between 1958 and 1962. I therefore did not have the opportunity to express myself on the subject in this forum. During the period when the basic decisions were being made, the government of the province of Alberta appeared to remain silent and uninterested in what was going on across the western provincial boundary. It should have been obvious to anyone with any knowledge what would happen because of the impact of building that dam to hold back the normal flow of the Peace River. It would not only affect the river within the province of British Columbia but the portion which lies in the province of Alberta and, indeed, the entire Mackenzie River drainage system which, of course, involves the Northwest Territories.

The federal government has jurisdiction over the Northwest Territories. I have always been amazed that definitive, joint action was not taken at that time by the government of Alberta and the federal government to make it clear to Mr. Bennett that in the national interest he must be called upon to recognize that something was involved which went far beyond the boundaries of one province and, therefore, directly or indirectly affected all the people of Canada.

I have a bill on the order paper which is not unrelated to the subject matter of Bill C-36. My bill is C-105, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act. By the simple addition of one section to that act, it will state "This act is binding on Her Majesty in right of Canada or a province or any agent thereof." Hon. members may recall that an amendment in these terms was agreed to last year when dealing with the amendments to the Fisheries Act. I proposed an amendment to the amending bill at the report stage.

As far as I know, this particular formula was first incorporated into a piece of legislation in the International River improvements Act of 1955. This is made clear in the explanatory note of my bill which states that many activities of governments, either at the federal or provincial level, and more particularly their agents in the form of Crown corporations such as hydro authorities, impinge on the economy, ecology and whole pattern of development in the country, in much the same way as activities of large private corporations.

This has been one of the uncertainties about the question of whether the province of British Columbia was in fact required to secure a permit other than under the Navigable Waters Protection Act for the construction of that dam. It was in effect being built by the province through its agent the Crown corporation, the B.C. hydro power authority. This is one of the ambiguities this House should take steps to clarify at the earliest possible date. It would be a useful step in augmenting the purpose which the hon. member for Peace River seeks in his bill.

The issue raised by Bill C-36 is highlighted by the fact that a provincial waters act has just been introduced for first reading in the legislature of the province of British Columbia. According to the reports I have received, the minister introducing the bill, Hon. Ray Williston, said it was his intent to introduce this bill for first reading in the current session of the legislature. He said it would be open for consideration and broad discussion. As a result of that, he said it was his intention to introduce an identical or similar bill at the next session of the provincial legislature.

The most significant part of the statement by that minister was that a jurisdictional vacuum exists with regard to water resources, their use, control and management. Because of this he felt that the legislature should move to fill that vacuum before some other authority sought to take it over. I am not privy to all that may have gone on in the considerations of the Lieutenant Governor in Council prior to the introduction of that bill. I mention it to underline the importance of the subject matter raised today by the hon. member for Peace River. In the previous session there was extensive discussion in the House and in the standing committee with regard to a federal act in respect of our waters. Apart from any other implications, it muddied the waters in the matter of constitutional jurisdiction over our national water resources.

I am happy, therefore, to support the principle of the bill introduced by the hon. member for Peace River although its terminology appears to be unusual, for which reason I cannot say whether I would agree with every particular. However, the idea behind it is one which I feel the House should support, and I for one would like to see the measure referred for consideration to a standing committee of the House. I am sure there are few things which are more important or more urgent today than making wise use from now on of our natural water resources.

Apart from what happened in connection with the Columbia River under the agreement entered into with the United States, what has occurred on the Peace River, Athabasca and Mackenzie river systems as a result of the construction of the dam at Portage Mountain just west of the British Columbia-Alberta boundary is a classic example of the unwise use of our resources. I hope the House will seriously consider allowing this bill to be read the second time so that it can be considered in more detail by the appropriate standing committee.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to rise and make a few observations about this bill. I should say at the outset that I support it, believing that such legislation is a necessity at the present time. The need is well illustrated by the downstream effects of the W.A.C. Bennett dam.

What has taken place in the Peace-Athabasca delta has been widely discussed in the last year or so, particularly with reference to the damage to the ecology which has resulted from an insufficient flow of water down the Peace River since the dam was completed. I have had an opportunity to review the Hansards of the early sixties when this dam was being planned and during the early phases of its construction, and I have found—as my hon. friend from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has pointed out—that the question of whether the government of British Columbia had applied to the federal government under the terms of the Navigable Waters Protection Act was raised on many occasions in the House of Commons. But for reasons which are unknown to me, the federal Liberal government of the day chose to ignore those questions.

This is a good example of the kind of thing we had in mind when talking about another bill earlier today. In the Liberal cabinet of that day, quantity was not lacking but the quality of the ministers was not necessarily commensurate. If the ministers responsible at that time had really been equal to their jobs, the situation we face today might have been avoided.

There is another lesson to be learned from this. On many occasions the Liberal government in power at the time, like the one which is in power today, blindly opposed any suggestions from the opposition no matter how good or beneficial they might have been, simply because they came from the opposition. I hope the present government and hon. members who are sitting opposite me now and smiling will bear this in mind and do what they can to see that such obvious mistakes are not repeated.

What happened with regard to the construction of the Bennett dam and the destruction which occurred downstream is an example not only of negligence on the part of the governments of the day, that is, the federal government and the government of British Columbia, but also of the manner in which huge interests are able to run roughshod over the desires of ordinary citizens. It also shows that governments ought not to be rushed into proceeding with projects of this kind as soon as they are conceived. This has particular relevance today to the proposal to construct a Mackenzie Valley oil pipeline. It is evident that the government is overly anxious to proceed with this project, though it may well be that research in connection with such schemes has not yet reached the point at which we could ensure that the ecology of the area and the interests of the people who live there would not be adversely affected.

I was interested to hear the comments made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Corbin). He told us that a federal-provincial task force had been set up and described what it would be doing. It appears that one of the most important parts of the necessary studies has been omitted, that is, the effect of the decreased water level of the Peace River on the town of Peace River itself. As is well known, the town has launched a lawsuit against B.C. Hydro for damages done to its water intake system. The town has had to spend considerable amounts of money to reconstruct its water intake system in the river, and so far it has been unable to obtain any sort of compensation for this extra expenditure. The government should give serious consideration to extending its study to include the difficulty which has occurred in the operation of the water intake system owned by the town of Peace River.

I was also pleased to learn that a technical committee and field commission have been set up at Fort Chipewyan to study conditions in the Athabasca delta. It is important that we assess the extent of the damage done in the area. It is also important we should determine whether or not this damage is reversible and determine, also, what might be done to repair the damage which exists. I have received communications from the Indian people in the area, their chiefs and their advisers—people who live very close to nature and who probably understand it better than most of our ecologists. They are pointing out the advantages of dams of the type beavers build which would raise the water to the level desired while not impeding the overflow experienced when the water rises in the spring.

The vegetation changes in the area have become obvious. What used to be a wide, swampy area covered by water during part of the year is now grown over with tall grasses and acres of tall red willows. The fall in the water level has greatly impaired the ability of the native people to make a living by trapping. The parliamentary secretary told us that socio-economic studies would be undertaken, but if I remember correctly there was no indication that the committee would include a particular person charged with carrying out such studies.

I think it is fair to say that the chief source of income for the people in the region of Fort Chipewyan, or one of the chief sources, is trapping, particularly muskrat, though other fur-bearing animals also. Fishing has also been adversely affected; there is no question of that. This can be substantiated by the fact that welfare costs in the region have gone up by leaps and bounds in the last couple of years. I would close by indicating that in view of the fact that making a living has become more difficult, the incomes of the people in the area of the Peace-Athabasca delta have been substantially reduced. As a result, we must consider what alternatives we can offer these people.

In this regard we must seriously ask ourselves, who is the fellow who caused the problem in the first place, and see what can be done to hold him responsible at least in part. As I said before, the fellow who is responsible is in fact a group of fellows: the federal government, which failed to look at the situation to begin with; the British Columbia government, which in its rush to construct this hydro project did not give due consideration to the effects it would have on neighbouring communities; and the Alberta government, which was either sleeping at the switch or for some reason or other did not look at the situation at all while the project was being developed.

In conclusion, I think this is a good bill. I do not want to see it talked out and I hope it passes, to the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, in order to follow up the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Corbin), who has outlined the action that is now being taken, and in order to deal with remarks of other speakers, I am very pleased to participate in this debate, doubly so because I had the pleasure of chairing 34 very interesting and hotly debated meetings of the committee that discussed the Canada Water Act. However, I think I should set one thing straight first. The previous speaker mentioned that the Liberal government in the early 1960s did not take very much action. I suggest to him that there was another government in power in the late 1950s and early 1960s that did not take very much action either, which is why the Liberals came back into power in the early sixties and why the present opposition is still gracing the benches opposite.

Mr. Mahoney: And will for a long time.

Mr. Dinsdale: Such humble people over there!

Mr. Hopkins: This is a very important measure now before the House, dealing with a very important topic and in regard to which I can sympathize with the House leader of the opposition. I, too, have become involved from time to time in discussions about interprovincial waters, living as I do along the Ottawa River. However, I think it is very important to point out that the hon. member's suggestions are in many ways the same as the provisions of the Canada Water Act and other measures passed in this House—if I may say so, passed by this Liberal government.

Mr. Yewchuk: Ten years too late.

Mr. Hopkins: Ten years too late it could be; but I would point out that ten years ago the present opposition formed the government of this country, and if this action should have been taken ten years ago, why did that government not take it?

Mr. Benjamin: One is as bad as the other.

Mr. Hopkins: Just to round out this particular point before getting back to the subject of the bill, I would say that when hon. members opposite stop making inaccurate statements about us, I will stop telling the truth about them.

Bill C-36 in many ways catches the spirit of government legislation which has already been passed. Its explanatory note states in part:

> The purpose of this bill is to concentrate and use the full powers of the federal government to control and manage the sea and fresh water resources of Canada in the public interest; and the provision, where necessary, for co-operation with the provinces to this end.

Compare this statement with the first paragraph of the explanatory note to Bill C-144, the Canada Water Act, which was proclaimed law on September 30, 1970. It read as follows:

> Bill C-144, an act to provide for the management of the water resources of Canada including research and the planning of programs relating to the conservation and development of water resources.

There is obvious duplication between that bill and Bill C-36. I should like to examine the Canada Water Act a little more closely, but before doing so I would point out that if my memory serves me correctly we had members of the opposition sitting on the National Resources and Public Works Committee during those 34 meetings on the Canada Water Act, to which I referred, who were very vocal in regard to protecting provincial rights. The suggestion being made in this bill, that the federal government should be taking a stronger stand as far as jurisdiction over water resources in Canada is concerned, conflicts with the previous stand taken by some hon. members opposite.

From a personal point of view I very much sympathize with the House leader of the opposition. I am one who feels that the federal government should have stronger constitutional powers in regard to handling many phases of resource development in this country, one of these being water development. For this reason I am a very strong advocate of the greater use of the elastic clause in the Canadian Constitution.

The Canada Water Act had its origins in two major national meetings, the Resources for Tomorrow conference in 1961 and the pollution conference of 1966. It was conceived in 1967 and drafted mainly in the spring and summer of 1969 under the auspices of the present government. Its concepts were presented to the Canadian public in a policy paper in late August, 1969, and was formally introduced to the House of Commons on November 5 of the same year. After many days of debate in both the House of Commons and the Senate, and nearly 40 public hearings, it was passed by Parliament on June 26, 1970.

Surely, throughout all this period there was plenty of communication and opportunity for communication. I often feel that communication is one of the cheapest things we have to offer in this world, yet sometimes it is one thing of which least use is made. If we could at all levels of government achieve complete co-operation instead of participating in bickering matches, then in such an atmosphere of harmony we would be able to do far more for the country.

Why did the federal government pass such legislation? First, because it was obvious to the majority of political leaders, to academics and industrialists, to government officials and to the public generally that the pattern of water resource development and utilization across Canada was not fully satisfactory despite some excellent programs in certain areas and on certain topics. Secondly, with the federal government having certain responsibilities in the field of water resources and the provincial governments other responsibilities, a framework for a co-operative program was needed.

In the event that the province should not act and that there is not federal-provincial co-operation in bringing in a constructive program for the proper utilization of water resources, in the final analysis the Canada Water Act suggests that the federal government should act unilaterally. This comment was placed on the record on a couple of occasions by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), the gentleman who still holds that portfolio today. Here is where the elastic clause in the Canadian Constitution would come into play.

We may run into situations in the future concerning the disposition of certain provincial arguments about matters which could involve the subject under discussion today. It is quite possible that this aspect of the Canada Water Act will end up in the Supreme Court of Canada. But surely this is how the laws of a nation are solidified and put on the books once and for all so that they may be changed only by further acts of Parliament as times and as needs require. I think we should be prepared to take our chances in this regard in respect of any act which goes through this Parliament. I think the time is ripe in Canada, if we do not get stronger amendments to the Canadian Constitution, for the elastic clause to be exercised and questioned in the Supreme Court on such issues as this. We cannot continue forever having long hassles over the resources of this country, involving long discussions between federal and provincial governments at a time when immediate action and immediate decision is an absolute necessity.

Unfortunately, the inadequacies of Canadian water resources' development and utilization were abundantly clear. Under these circumstances, the federal government felt it had to equip itself with the legislative authority to meet fully its responsibilities to remedy these deficiencies.

[Mr. Hopkins.]

Recognizing on the one hand the divided jurisdiction in water matters and, on the other hand, the very real gains in efficiency and effectiveness by a comprehensive multipurpose approach to water development and utilization, the federal government set out to build a legislative platform for joint federal-provincial undertakings and in the final analysis for unilateral action by the federal government if necessary, but only as a last resort. To this end, the Canada Water Act contains six principal parts. In these six principal parts I think hon. members of this House will recognize that the bill before us in private members' hour, Bill C-36, in fact in some respects overlaps the Canada Water Act.

The first of the six points is consultation—joint examination of problems to reach accord on certain areas and subjects requiring joint action and those most appropriately undertaken by each government alone. The second point involves comprehensive water management—joint comprehensive planning of river or lake basins, regions or coastal strips and joint implementation of those plans. Perhaps there is a very strong case here that the Peace River should be under a river basin plan. The third point is water quality management—joint designation of water quality areas, formation or designation of a management agency, water quality planning, implementation of those plans, a prohibition against the deposit of wastes except as prescribed by the regulations, and the assessment of fees and charges.

The fourth point involves nutrient control—a prohibition against the import or manufacture in Canada of cleansing agents or water conditioners containing more than the prescribed content of nutrients. The fifth point deals with inspection and enforcement—provision for inspectors to examine effluents, cleansing agents and water conditioners; fines for contravention of the prohibitions, plus the power to close the offending plants if necessary.

The sixth point is public information—a program to inform the public of the state of water resource development in Canada, to increase the understanding by the public of the problems of environmental degradation, and to use public leaders in an advisory capacity. These are the key features of the Canada Water Act. How do they work or how is it intended they will work? One of the major considerations certainly is consultation. In summing up I would say that from this examination of current federal legislation one finds that the subject matter of Bill C-36 is largely redundant. Measures to preserve and enhance environmental quality are included in recent federal legislation and, in addition, the government has before the House Bill C-207 which has even further implications for anti-pollution legislation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The hour provided for consideration of private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until next Monday at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order.

[English]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the government whip if it is the intention of the government to go on with Bill C-207 at the crack of dawn on Monday?

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that we shall go on with it at the usual hour on Monday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The Chair would like to remind hon. members that next Sunday is Palm Sunday. On this day the sound and ring of repeated Hosannas should remind us of mankind's frantic search for salvation, peace and truth.

I conclude with these words of a Palm Sunday hymn: Hosanna! Hosanna! Blessed is the Saviour of the world!

[English]

After such a long week in the chair, I wish to thank hon. members for their very good, kind and understanding co-operation. I should be the wiser for having listened to so many speeches. I take the opportunity once again to wish hon. members and the staff of the House a very pleasant and peaceful weekend.

At five o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 5, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

GOVERNMENT ACTION CONCERNING ANTI-POLLUTION DEVICES FOR MOTOR VEHICLES

Question No. 682—Mr. Anderson:

1. Have any federal funds been used to develop or test exhaust manifold thermal reactors or exhaust gas recirculation systems for automobile engines?

2. Have any federal research funds been used to develop systems to reduce particle matter in automobile exhausts?

3. Has the Department of Supply and Services announced a date after which all vehicles owned or leased to the federal government must be equipped with (a) exhaust manifold thermal reactors (b) exhaust gas recirculating systems to control nitrogen oxide levels (c) systems to reduce particle matter?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Transport and Supply and Services as follows: 1. No, to avoid duplication of work being carried out in the United States. The findings of this research will be made available to the Department of Transport under the memorandum of understanding signed by the Minister of Transport and the Secretary of the United States Department of Transportation.

2. No.

3. Vehicles purchased by the Department of Supply and Services must comply with the objective performance standards on the levels of emission from motor vehicles in accordance with the Motor Vehicle Safety Regulations issued by the Minister of Transport, effective January 1, 1971.

AIR CANADA—CLOSING OF RESERVATIONS OFFICES IN THE UNITED STATES

Question No. 735—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has Air Canada refused to allow employees to see the recommendations of Mr. Justice Freedman made pursuant to the feasibility study of employment adversely affected by technological changes and, if so, for what reason?

2. Will any Air Canada reservations offices in the United States be closed as a result of the new policy being adopted by Air Canada and, if so (a) how many U.S. citizens are working for Air Canada in reservation offices in that country (b) will any be laid off through the implementation of this policy of office consolidation?

3. Did Air Canada introduce the system of office consolidation in the reservation department known as Telpak on an experimental basis some years ago and, if so (a) in what cities or towns (b) was the experiment discontinued and, if so, for what reason?

4. If the results of the experiment were not satisfactory, is the same system now being reinstituted and expanded and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): The Management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. The report in question is a public document and is available through Information Canada.

2. Reviews of this nature to improve customer services are an on-going process. If and when any adjustments are made as a result, appropriate notice would be given and discussions held between the Company and union representatives.

3. Yes. (a) Fredericton, Boston, London, Windsor, Quebec, Trois Rivières, Victoria, Tampa, North Bay, Saint John, New York, Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Miami, and Sudbury. In addition to the foregoing, 138 other cities in Canada and 227 in the U.S. are linked to major reservations offices located in other cities by Zenith and special exchange lines. (b) No.

4. N/A.

HEALTH AND WELFARE—CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

Question No. 753—Mr. Fortin:

1. Does the government regulate cigarette advertising on radio and TV?

2. How much money was spent on such advertising in each of the past three years?

3. If the government does not regulate such advertising, does it intend to do so and, if not, for what reasons?

4. What results have been obtained by the publication by the Department of National Health and Welfare of anti-smoking literature?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Canadian Radio-Television Commission and the Department of National Health and Welfare advise as follows: 1. The Canadian Radio-Television Commission has no Regulations directly affecting cigarette advertising on radio and TV.

Year	Radio	TV
1967	$2,863,000	$2,458,000
1968	2,350,000	2,717,000
1969	2,727,000	3,344,000
1970	(not available)

The above figures compiled by Elliott Research exclude agency commission, program and commercial production charges.

3. Introduction of legislation concerning cigarette advertising would depend on the progress made on present legislation before the House and the priorities that have been established.

4. In drafting Regulations on advertising material in 1970, the Commission took note of the concern expressed by the Commons Committee Report on Tobacco and Cigarette Smoking. The Commission enacted a television Regulation which made room for an additional 30 second unpaid public service announcement per hour where the maximum regulatory advertising material is completely sold out. Unpaid smoking and health announcements are announcements which may be broadcast during this additional 30 second period.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

Question No. 783—Mr. Mather:

1. Is the government giving consideration to the issue of a summary report for 1969 or 1970 analyzing highway accidents of commercially operated vehicles in which fire was involved?

2. Is consideration being given to analyzing and reporting motor carrier accidents involving vehicle defects or mechanical failure?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. The collection of highway accident data is a provincial responsibility and the Department of Transport is now studying accident data collected by the provinces. After establishment of a common basis for these data, they could lend themselves to the analysis of highway accidents for all of Canada.

2. Officials of the Department of Transport are working on a data system to gather this information which contributes to the development of safety standards.

WATER POLLUTION ABATEMENT

Question No. 849—Mr. Comeau:

1. What recommendations have been made concerning financial assistance to municipalities and industry in their fight against pollution as indicated at page 2711 in Hansard, January 25, 1971 by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry?

2. How much money has the government paid in direct pollution abatement cost other than planning or research costs?

3. Are any loans or grants now available to industry and municipalities and in what form?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): 1. Suggestions have been made to review the provisions under the mechanism of tax exemptions in order to assist industry in its efforts to abate pollution. Such measures were thought to be potentially helpful in supplementing the assistance that may be considered in the form of low interest loans to municipalities and industry.

2. Departmental operating expenses apart and exclusive of planning and research expenditures, the federal government spent in excess of $100 million directly on pollution abatement costs during the calendar year of 1970.

3. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation provides loans to municipalities to cover two thirds of the cost of eligible works. 25 per cent of the loans are forgiveable on completion of the works. The long term interest charged by CMHC has recently been reduced from 8¼ per cent to 7½ per cent. Available funds are allocated to provinces, who select projects to be funded and who assign the requisite priorities to the works. The Coordinating Committee on Water Pollution Abatement Research of the Federal Government and Pulp and Paper Industry, chaired by the Director, Program Coordination, Canadian Forestry Service, will annually select research proposals from industrial and other research agencies to receive federal support up to $1,000,000 annually for the next five years if matched by equal numbers of dollars by the pulp and paper industry.

MERCURY CONTAMINATION OF DOGFISH

Question No. 983—Mr. Barnett:

1. Has the Department of Fisheries and Forestry determined the sources and/or the causes of the contamination of dogfish by mercury in the Strait of Georgia and (a) if so, what are they (b) if not, what investigations and/or research are under way or contemplated?

2. What programs are being implemented with a view to eliminating or reducing the contamination of dogfish by mercury in this area?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): 1. No. (a) not applicable; (b) additional samples of dogfish from this and other coastal areas are being collected for analysis and comparison purposes.

2. Further research in the area of background levels of mercury in the environment will be carried out during the coming months.

DRUG RESEARCH

Question No. 998—Mr. Mather:

Is the government undertaking to supply marijuana to the Toronto Addiction Centre for the purpose of having persons smoke the drug for a payment of $5.00 a day as a pilot project for a longer research test later this year and, if so, what is the approximate cost?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): In May 1969, the Food and Drug Directorate authorized the release of a supply of marijuana and hashish to the Addiction Research Foundation of Toronto for research purposes, following their request. The Foundation is now using the drugs in a small pilot study designed to investigate the long-term physical and social effects of the consumption of these drugs. The Addiction Research Foundation has not applied to the federal government for financial support for this project.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND FORESTRY—INCOME DERIVED FROM COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,060—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): (a) $8,000; (b) nil; (c) nil; (d) nil.

ABOLITION OF STEEL TRAPS IN HUNTING AND TRAPPING

Question No. 1,062—Mr. Mather:

Have representations been received urging the abolition of the use of steel traps in hunting and trapping and, if so, what consideration is being given to such representations?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Yes. Trapping and fur management, however, are responsibilities of the provincial and territorial governments.

PEI—ALLOCATION OF FEDERAL FUNDS FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES

Question No. 1,080—Mr. McQuaid:

Since March 7, 1969, has any money been paid or allocated by the Government of Canada to the Government of Prince Edward Island under the Prince Edward Island Development Plan for purposes of education or for the construction of educational facilities and (a) if so, over what period of time will the allocated money be paid and what will be the terms of repayment (b) if not, will any money be made available over the next five year period to the Province of Prince Edward Island for purposes of education or for the construction of educational facilities and, if so, how much and what will be the terms of repayment?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The government advises as follows: Not to date. (a) Not applicable; (b) these matters are under consideration in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

Questions

FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN ST. BARBE, NFLD. AND BLANC SABLON, QUEBEC

Question No. 1,120—Mr. Peddle:

1. Did the ferry Avalon Voyager operate from St. Barbe, Newfoundland to Blanc Sablon, Quebec last year and, if so, who was the owner and the operator?

2. How many (a) passengers (b) cars (c) trucks, were transported on this ferry during the 1970 season?

3. Was any federal subsidy paid directly or indirectly to the operator of this ferry and, if so, how much?

4. Is an effort being made to have this vessel replaced for the coming season?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. (a) Yes; (b) Puddister and Bennett Shipping Limited, St. John's, Nfld.

2. (a) 4,656; (b) 1,258; (c) 839.

3. (a) Yes; (b) $91,451.61.

4. No, but the possibility of vessel replacement in subsequent years is under study.

PRIVY COUNCIL OFFICE—INFORMATION CONCERNING STAFF

Question No. 1,163—Mr. Coates:

1. What is the present total staff of the Privy Council Office?

2. Are L. D. Hudon, David Kirkwood, Miss Pamela McDougall, J. M. Shoemaker and Jean Richard employed or to be employed in the Privy Council Office and, if so (a) in what positions (b) at what annual salary?

3. What is the present total annual payroll of the Privy Council Office?

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister): 1. 206.

2. Yes. (a) and (b)

	Position	Salary Range
Mr. L. D. Hudon	Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet (Economic Policy)	$24,000 - 30,000
Mr. D. H. Kirkwood	Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet (Government Operations)	$22,000 - 27,000
Miss P. A. McDougall	Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet (External Affairs and Defence)	$22,000 - 27,000
Mr. J. M. Shoemaker	Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet (Science, Culture and Information Policy)	$19,100 - 21,700
Mr. J. Richard	Assistant Secretary to the Cabinet (Legislative and House Planning)	$20,000 - 25,000

3. Approximately $2,257,850.

HUNTING OF POLAR BEARS IN CANADIAN ARCTIC, 1971

Question No. 1,184—Mr. Paproski:

1. How many polar bears were shot in the Canadian Arctic in 1971 by licenced hunters other than Eskimos?

2. What is the quota on polar bears for the current season?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. To date, no polar bears have been shot by licensed hunters under the sports hunting of polar bear program.

2. The quota for the sports hunting of polar bear for the current year is 10, to be taken out of the over-all quota for Eskimo and Indian licence holders.

Questions

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES PENSIONS

Question No. 1,196—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

1. In each year 1959 to 1970, both inclusive (a) how many personnel of the Armed Forces commenced drawing pensions under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act (b) how many widows commenced drawing pensions under the said Act?

2. In each of the same years, how many pensions under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act to (a) retired Canadian Armed Forces personnel (b) widows of such personnel, have been discontinued because of the death of the annuitant?

Year	(a) Former Canadian Forces Personnel	(b) Widows
1959	492*	62*
1960	459*	79*
1961	787*	93*
1962	1110*	101*
1963	1170*	123*
1964	2825	217
1965	3723	273
1966	3124	278
1967	2588	299
1968	3245	370
1969	4071	342
1970	4092	358

*Prior to 1964 records were not maintained in a manner which would permit this information to be readily identified and the figures represent the difference between pensions in payment at end of each year.

2.

1964	342	70
1965	351	98
1966	185	105
1967	89	80
1968	162	77
1969	249	76
1970	261	78

*Widows' pensions may cease for reasons other than death, e.g. remarriage, and statistics are not maintained on the reasons for discontinuing pensions.

Records prior to 1964 were not maintained in a manner which would make this information readily identifiable.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PUBLIC WORKS—RENTAL AGREEMENTS

Question No. 380—Mr. Coates:

1. Have any rental agreements been entered into by the government with individuals or firms for space, where the actual occupation of the rented space had to await the completion of construction of the building and, if so (a) on how many occasions has this occurred since June 25, 1968 (b) in each instance, what was the name of the individual or firm from whom space was being rented (c) what was the total amount of space rented (d) for what period of time (a) at which dollar value annually in each instance?

Return tabled.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT PARTICIPATION IN DECISION-MAKING PROCESSES OF CHARTERED BANKS—INTEREST RATES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Was the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources expressing the view of the government when he said in a television interview last night, as recorded by Canadian Press in today's journals:

> The government might have to sit at the table where the great financial decisions are made to a far greater degree than it has in the past to enable Canadian companies to play in this very tough league with the American companies.

If this is government policy, can we expect the government to be injecting itself far more into the decision-making processes of the chartered banks than it has in the past?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say what the minister had in mind when he used the expression "sit at the table." If he means there should be someone talking for the public interest and that it should be the government, then I totally agree with him. But if he meant something different I would have to discuss the matter with the minister. I imagine he was talking on his own behalf.

Mr. Diefenbaker: How can a minister talk on his own behalf!

Mr. Trudeau: There is no particular statement of government policy contained in that beyond what I have just said.

Mr. Hees: If it is government policy that where the interests of the country are concerned the government should inject itself more into the decision-making process of the chartered banks, does the government now intend to tell the chartered banks that they should lower their interest rates in keeping with what has been done by their counterparts in the United States, Great Britain, Europe and most parts of the world?

Mr. Trudeau: This particular move is not contemplated at this time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the statements we heard from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources last night were taped two weeks ago, can the Prime Minister assure us that those are still the views of the minister?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING EXPANSION OR RESTRICTION—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of the report of his speech to the Niagara Falls Chamber of Commerce. The Prime Minister is reported as having said that in a free society trade-offs must be accepted and that in order to provide jobs it would be necessary, among other things, to have a shorter work week with earlier retirement, delays in young people entering the labour force and less emphasis on women working. I should like to know if this means that the government's policy now, instead of seeking to expand the economy and create jobs, is to restrict the labour force wherever possible in order to make a greater distribution of poverty throughout the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the statements mean what they say. I do not think that this government believes there should be growth at any price, to the point that we would have longer work weeks, child labour and so on. I am surprised that the statement caused any astonishment in the ranks of the NDP.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask if it is the government's intention to bring in legislation to provide for a shorter work week, for earlier retirement, for a greater delay in young people entering the labour market and, particularly, if the government intends to introduce legislation to provide for less emphasis on women working in view of the Prime Minister's speech in Toronto a few weeks ago asking for the removal of discrimination against women? Does the government intend to introduce legislation to deal with the matters which the Prime Minister outlined in his speech in Niagara Falls?

Mr. Trudeau: That is a very wide-ranging question, Mr. Speaker. On the latter part of it, I do not think legislation would be the kind of thing we would contemplate to put less emphasis on women working. What I did say in Niagara Falls was that women should have a choice of being able to work or not according to their own decisions and not because of traditions and social structures imposed on them from the past. On the earlier part of the question the answer is yes. There is a provision before the House now for earlier retirement, if the opposition would let us get it through.

[Later:]

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the first question asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. Is the Prime Minister taking the same course in double-talk from the same instructor as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, because they both say different things every week according to which way the wind blows?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to a preceding question. May I ask the Prime Minister whether his speech at Niagara Falls in particular, as well as the report of the governor of the Bank of Canada, means that the government has definitely abandoned any commitment to a full employment policy for fear of inflation and that it intends to keep the economy with some slack in it at all times?

Mr. Trudeau: Obviously not, Mr. Speaker.

WAGE INCREASE LIMITATION SUGGESTED BY PRICES AND INCOMES COMMISSION CHAIRMAN—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of a statement made by the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, Dr. John Young, to the effect that wage increases should be restricted this year to some 4 per cent? Does this represent government policy, and is the Prime Minister prepared to assure the House and the country that the cost of living his year will not rise more than 4 per cent?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Of course I cannot give that assurance, Mr. Speaker. I do not know how high the cost of living will rise this year.

YOUTH

PROGRAMS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE DELAYED IN ENTERING WORK FORCE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's statement over the weekend that there must be some delay in young people entering the work force, can he tell the House whether the government has any programs for young people if they are to be delayed even more in finding employment?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We have recently put forth a lot of suggestions along these lines, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member knows that as a constant thing for some years past the federal government has been financing half the cost of post-secondary education all across the land at a cost of several hundred million dollars per year.

SOCIAL SECURITY

QUEBEC—ALLEGED APPROPRIATION OF GUARANTEED INCOME PENSION SUPPLEMENT BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

As the Bourassa government, in Quebec, is taking over the increase of the guaranteed minimum income supplement for the old, could the minister tell us if the federal government has agreed to such action by the Quebec government?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the premise of the question and therefore it is difficult to answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

In view of the situation prevailing in the province of Quebec, would the minister consider lowering the pension age to 60 and granting pensions to wives of pensioners, even if they have not reached pension age?

NATIONAL SECURITY

EXTENSION OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—REQUEST BY QUEBEC PREMIER FOR PROVISION OF SPECIAL MEASURES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. It is in two parts. Did the premier of Quebec, Mr. Bourassa, ask the Prime Minister to extend the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act when it expires on April 30? Also, if the premier made such a request, has the Prime Minister agreed to present the extension to Parliament on behalf of the premier?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, the premier of Quebec, in conversation and in writing to me, did ask for the provision of some special measures to deal with situations such as we have known in past months. What cabinet will do with that request is something I cannot predict. We will, of course, have to study the request, along with the other input we are looking at, in approaching the House with measures concerning public order.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Since the Minister of Justice said before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs that the government would only extend this Act if there were extenuating circumstances, or only bring in permanent legislation if there were extenuating circumstances, what are the extenuating circumstances, if this is government policy, under which this Act would be continued or a new bill brought in to replace it permanently?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is really for a statement on motions or a declaration of policy that the hon. member is asking. If we come to Parliament with specific measures, of course we will explain to Parliament why we are coming to it for specific measures.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further question. Does the Prime Minister accept as government policy that before this Act would be continued, or a measure introduced to replace it, there would have to be extenuating or special circumstances that do not exist today in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what is meant by extenuating circumstances.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, may I ask one further question. I wonder if in the course of time the Prime Minister will contact the Minister of Justice and find out what he meant by those words?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for York South on a supplementary.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, can the Prime Minister tell the House now whether the government has decided to let the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act die in accordance with its promise, or whether the government is considering coming to parliament for an extension of time for that Act?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell the House now.

BROADCASTING

SUPREME COURT DECISION ON ACTION BY CKPM RESPECTING CANCELLATION OF LICENCE BY CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION COMMISSION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. It has to do with the judgment handed down this morning by the Supreme Court of Canada in connection with the action of Confederation Broadcasting (Ottawa) Limited, the owner and operator of CKPM, against the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. Has he read the judgment yet and does he realize that it is a body blow to the bureaucratic injustice and tyranny that has been practised against responsible Canadians?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have not had as yet an opportunity to read this judgment and I leave to the right hon. member the responsibility for the conclusions he has just drawn; I would not endorse them myself before reading the judgment, and perhaps not even after.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I recall that the minister did not endorse my views on April 6, 1970, when I brought this matter to the attention of the House, as recorded at page 5511 of Hansard. I asked the minister then whether the decision made against the company operating this station was not in fact Star Chamber in effect. In view of the decision of the Supreme Court that there must now be a hearing and that Mr. Juneau and the commission acted wrongly in denying the simple justice of a hearing, and inasmuch as when this matter again comes up it will be before the same board with Mr. Juneau in charge and of the same members, has the minister given consideration to taking action that will ensure that the owners of CKPM who were denied justice will not again be denied justice by the very commission that did just that?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I am taking the right hon. member's learned remarks into consideration.

LABOUR RELATIONS

AGREEMENT BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—IMMEDIATE MOVEMENT OF LUMBER AND GRAIN IN ALBERTA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Robert Borrie (Prince George-Peace River): My question is for the Minister of Labour. We welcome him back to the House after a long weekend.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Borrie: Will the minister advise the House if the agreement that was reached last night in the railway dispute will mean the immediate movement of lumber and grain in the western provinces, British Columbia and Alberta in particular?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before I came into the House I spoke by telephone to the local chairmen of both unions of the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National employees in Vancouver in the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers who have assured me that the men are returning to work in that particular area.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): In view of the fact that at the meeting in Winnipeg there appeared to be some rejection of the plan, can the minister inform the House as to the outcome of the meeting that was held in Winnipeg?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I have been busy elsewhere. I apologize because I am not fully conversant with all the meetings that are taking place at this moment across Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

FAILURE OF COMMISSION TO COMPLETE WORK—PUBLICATION OF COMMISSIONERS' VIEWS ON REASONS THEREFOR

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister advise the House if an Order in Council has been passed discharging the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism from its responsibilities, either under Privy Council minute No. 3374 or its successors, and does that minute relieve the commission from its obligation to report on the mass media as laid down in the original terms of reference?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot remember if there was an Order in Council along those lines. I remember writing a letter to the joint chairmen explaining to them that I understood the reasons why they did not want to pursue their work.

Mr. Baldwin: As Mr. Gagnon, the former co-chairman of the commission, has, in breach of propriety and probably of law, disclosed certain details of the meetings of the commission, is it the intention of the government to secure from the other commissioners and publish their views on the issue raised so that the taxpayers of Canada can decide on the extent to which they got value for the $10 million spent?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course I cannot agree with the premise of the question. If the hon. member has a charge to make or an information to lay, I hope he will do it.

Mr. Baldwin: Did Mr. Gagnon or the other commissioners have any communication with the government or anyone on its behalf, either in writing or otherwise, with regard to this decision to suspend hostilities or about the 12 month stalemate which preceded it? Was information about their decision communicated to the government?

Mr. Trudeau: No communication at all, Mr. Speaker, concerning the cessation of hostilities.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING CONCLUSION OF COMMISSION'S WORK

Mr. David Lewis (York South): May I ask the Prime Minister whether he will consider tabling any correspondence relating to the conclusion of the work of the commission which passed between one or both of the joint chairmen of the commission and either himself or any other minister of the Crown?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will. If the hon. member is referring to the correspondence in which the commissioners notified me that they wanted to wind up their work and the answer I gave to them, I see no reason why I should not table it in the House. I will look into the correspondence to see whether it contains any information which might be secret; if it does, I will explain to the House why I should not table it.

Mr. Lewis: I am interested particularly if there is correspondence which sets out the reasons the commission decided not to produce its final report—all that kind of thing—so that all the information may be before Parliament and the people.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The letters to which I refer do contain some explanations along those lines and I will meet the commitment I gave a few moments ago.

FAILURE OF COMMISSION TO COMPLETE WORK—PUBLICATION OF SPEECHES AND EDITORIALS BY JEAN-LOUIS GAGNON

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. Having read what Jean-Louis Gagnon said, as reported by Arthur Blakeley in this morning's Gazette, it is apparent he had some difficulty in understanding the reason for divisions in the province of Quebec. I am wondering whether the minister reporting for Information Canada, and knowing the desire of that organization to give the fullest information, would feel like publishing the speeches and editorials by Mr. Gagnon between 1940 and 1950? It would be very informative.

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): I would certainly give consideration to that suggestion, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps the speeches of the right hon. member would be of more national interest, though.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Thank you for the compliment, but at the moment I am asking about Mr. Gagnon because he had a lot to say that Canadians should know about and Information Canada with its capacity for making information public would be doing a national service.

FAILURE OF COMMISSION TO COMPLETE WORK—WITHHOLDING OF COMMISSIONERS' SALARIES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): In view of the fact that the B and B Commission refused, or was unable to, complete its final report, has any consideration been given to withholding money for the commissioners' salaries on this account? After all, the commission has cost about $10 million.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is my understanding that there are no further salaries to be paid to the commissioners, that they have now wound up their work. If we wanted to give them more money I am sure they could publish more things and produce further volumes. If that is the desire of hon. members opposite—

Mr. Hees: Liberal pork barrel. Come and get it. It is here. Help yourselves. We have millions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I realize this is an important subject and I see that a number of hon. members are anxious to ask questions about this very interesting situation. However, perhaps we might give some thought, before the end of the question period, to going on to another subject. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Calgary North and the hon. member for Annapolis Valley on this same subject, but I suggest that we then go on to another matter.

Mr. Woolliams: Does the Prime Minister not consider that part of the function of the commissioners was to complete their final report as they promised, in accordance with the terms of reference? Since they were unable to do this, or refused to do it, would the cabinet look into the situation and request a final report or, if one is not forthcoming, be prepared to withhold further payment of salaries?

SUGGESTION THAT COMMISSION NOT MAKE FINAL REPORT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): My question concerns the revelations by Mr. Gagnon concerning some of the problems the commission encountered in finalizing and/or writing the last few volumes of the report. Would the Prime Minister inform the House, when he answers the hon. member for York South, if there was any communication by any member of the government to the commission prior to the letter from the commission to the government telling the government and the country they would not in fact be completing their report? In other words, I refer not necessarily to communication by written correspondence. Was any member of the government in touch with the commission, was he aware of the division of opinion, and did he suggest to the commissioners or to a commissioner that no final report be made?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the matter. I cannot give a very simple answer, especially when my answers are cut off by the opposition. I should say now that my previous answer was not completed, and I am afraid I will not be able to complete this one.

Mr. Hees: You were cut off by the Speaker, not us.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSAL BY SOVIET UNION FOR CONFERENCE ON BANNING OF GERM AND CHEMICAL WARFARE

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Having in mind the Soviet Union's current proposals for a five-power disarmament conference, particularly with regard to germ and chemical warfare, is Canada giving any consideration to using its good offices to encourage such a conference?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, one of the most encouraging aspects of the speech made by Mr. Brezhnev to which the hon. gentleman refers was its reference to a new Soviet approach to the banning of biological weapons. This really means that the Soviet Union has now agreed with the method of proceeding proposed by the British and supported by Canada, namely, that the early conclusion of a separate treaty on biological weapons is the most efficacious manner of making progress. We are hopeful that an international agreement banning development, production and stockpiling of biological agents of warfare can be agreed upon at an early date. Work could continue on banning chemical weapons.

EAST PAKISTAN—PARTICIPATION BY CANADA IN DISCUSSIONS TO AVERT WIDENING OF CONFLICT—SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the continued troubled situation in East Pakistan, and especially the announcement of interest in the matter by the Indian government. Can the minister advise whether Canada is holding discussions on this serious question with representatives of Pakistan, India or the United Nations with a view to averting an even wider conflict?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have been trying to keep in touch with the situation in Pakistan. I understand that the High Commissioner of Pakistan was recently in touch with the Canadian government urging us to prevail upon other countries not to intervene in this situation. We made it clear, as I have made it clear in the House, that until we have all the facts we think that intervention would not serve very much purpose.

Mr. Macquarrie: May I ask the minister whether he is now in a position to assure the people of Canada that Canadians living in East Pakistan have been safely evacuated or are not in danger?

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The situation is this. Before the emergency arose there were about 150 Canadians in Pakistan. About 40 left before the recent emergency arose; another 22 have arrived in Singapore, and there may be a few others we have not been able to trace. There remain about 85, and the information we have is that none of them is in any danger at the present time.

EAST PAKISTAN CONFLICT—CANADIAN ASSISTANCE THROUGH RED CROSS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. Have he or his officials been in touch with the Red Cross agencies to provide aid and assistance to people in this area?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We have been in touch with the Canadian Red Cross and have said we are ready to help if they can find some way of assisting the people of East Pakistan.

RENOVATION OF NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD VANCOUVER TERMINAL—GREATER USE OF PRINCE RUPERT CAPACITY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the continued idleness of the National Harbours Board terminal at Vancouver owing to the condition of the building, do the minister and the government intend to authorize the expenditure of money to renovate the terminal and put it into full operation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the possible use of this terminal was thoroughly investigated again recently. Following the investigation tenders were sought from private interests both in connection with possible leases and in connection with possible sales, but nothing has come of them to date. Some further approaches are now being pursued bearing in mind the possibility that, because of the record movement of grain which is going to be passing through Vancouver, an additional terminal may in fact be an economic proposition, notwithstanding that large amounts of money may have to be spent on putting it into operational shape.

Mr. Benjamin: In view of the obvious need for more capacity at Vancouver, will the government give consideration to the construction of a new National Harbours Board terminal and some expansion of the terminal space at Prince Rupert? May I also ask whether greater use will be made of the terminal at Prince Rupert which the former chairman of the Board of Grain Commissioners alleges is being used only to half capacity?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, whenever we are having, as this year, record movement of grain out of the west coast ports the terminal at Prince Rupert does tend to be used fairly fully. This will be done again this year. The question of additional facilities is one which is, of course, under review, but whether it would be appropriate for the government to build the facilities or for one of the private trade or co-operative companies to build it remains to be seen.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a supplementary. Is any thought being given to diverting some of the funds which would normally be spent under the Temporary Wheat Reserves Act into the construction of such a terminal elevator on the west coast?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I do not think one need put a particular label on the source of the funds. If additional facilities are clearly required, and if a particular kind is required at Vancouver, I am sure the funds will be found.

FINANCE

INFLATION—SUGGESTED REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES TO STABILIZE ECONOMY

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance a question.

Does he think that inflation has been completely overcome in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that is a very general question. The hon. member urges the minister to make a statement which usually is made on motions. If the hon. member could make his question more to the point the minister might be able to give an answer.

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Speaker, could the hon. minister tell us whether he intends to lower the discount rates of the Bank of Canada again so that chartered banks also bring down their interest rates for a better balanced economy?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter for decision by the governor of the Bank of Canada. If he has any such intentions he will, of course, notify the public in the normal way and would be in consultation with me before making such decision.

AMENDMENT OF UNITED STATES INTEREST EQUALIZATION ACT TO COVER SHORT-TERM CAPITAL FLOWS—CANADIAN EXEMPTION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In light of reports that the United States seeks to amend its interest equalization act to bring short-term capital flows under the control of the act, could the minister tell the House whether Canada has been advised of this action, whether his officials are in touch with those of the United States government, and whether the government of Canada is going to seek exemption from these controls, as we do for long-term capital flows?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be meeting with the Secretary of the Treasury tomorrow. I understand that in the act that was approved by Congress and the Senate there was no question of the continuation of Canada's exemption.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DENIAL OF CANADIAN TELEVISION PROGRAMS TO WINDSOR STATION

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he is prepared to reply to the question of which his parliamentary secretary took notice last week concerning the denial of Canadian-produced television programs to the television station at Windsor?

[Mr. Lang.]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this is in keeping with the Standing Orders, but I would suggest to the hon. member, since I have the reply but it is a rather long one, too long, I believe, for Your Honour's forbearance, that the matter might be discussed on adjournment.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This might be a good arrangement in any event. It is up to the hon. member who would have to give the usual notice to the Chair.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—REQUESTS BY PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK FOR ASSISTANCE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has he or the government received any request from the governments of either Prince Edward Island or New Brunswick or both for assistance for the agricultural industry of those two provinces because of the fact that their main cash crop is now being sold at less than the cost of production? I refer to potatoes of course.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have had some requests and correspondence dealing with the price of potatoes and the lower volume that has been marketed so far this year.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PUBLICATION OF BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON QUEBEC CRISIS—ENGLISH VERSION

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Secretary of State if he can inform the House when the confessions he put in book form will be ready in the English translation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member realizes the question is not in order. For one thing it is not a supplementary to whatever the previous question was and, second, the hon. member is not asking a question which relates to the administrative responsibility of the minister as such. I would not think that in those circumstances the question is in order.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—I will make this very brief—we are going to be asked to consider substitute legislation for the public order act and I think those of us who speak the English language should have an opportunity to read this book. It would be very revealing to us and we would be able to get the feel of it in our own language.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister's book might be prescribed reading for the courses given to hon. members who are trying to learn French.

HEALTH

CONFERENCE ON ASSISTANTS TO PHYSICIANS—RECOMMENDATIONS OF 1969 NATIONAL HEALTH MANPOWER CONFERENCE—USE OF FELDSHER SYSTEM

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the government's national conference on assistants to physicians now being held and in view of the possible tremendous implications for national health care, would the minister state if any of the recommendations of the national health manpower conference of October, 1969, will be presented to this meeting?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I believe so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rynard: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister if the Feldsher system, now being abandoned by the Russians, is to be made a cornerstone of the new program?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I would indicate generally, without particular reference to the Feldsher system, that we believe, along the lines of the report in respect of dental auxiliaries and now the investigation into physicians' assistants, that the development of health personnel in this way will be beneficial in improving the health delivery system in Canada.

FINANCE

REPRESENTATION OF GENERAL PUBLIC ON BANKS' BOARDS OF DIRECTORS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the statements made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arose out of speeches made by the presidents of a number of the chartered banks of Canada, can the minister tell us whether, as part of the process suggested by the minister of involving the government more intimately in the decision-making processes, the government is giving consideration to legislation which would provide for public representation on the boards of directors of the chartered banks of Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I believe the boards of directors of the chartered banks are made up of members of the public. Incidentally, since the time this question was first raised I have read the prepared texts of the statements of the various bank presidents in New York and find that the press was quite misrepresentative in stating that the opinions of one or two of them were the general opinions of the bankers at this meeting.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Would the minister give consideration to new legislation which would require appointment to the boards of directors of the banks not of shareholders' representatives but of representatives of the general public, probably through appointment by the government?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I really do not know whether my hon. friend is looking for a job.

CHARTERED BANKS PRESIDENTS' POSITION ON CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—SUBMISSION OF BRIEF TO COMMITTEE PRIOR TO DEADLINE

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the chairman of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. In view of the critical stand taken by two or more bank presidents when in the United States regarding the Canada Development Corporation, did the Bankers' Association or any Canadian chartered bank submit a brief on this subject to the committee prior to the March 31 deadline?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot ask this kind of question. I must say it is always somewhat difficult for the Chair to determine what questions can be asked in relation to committee proceedings, but generally speaking the only questions allowed to a chairman of a committee deal with the holding of meetings and the proceedings of the committee. I would not think it is in order to ask the chairman whether or not a brief has been submitted.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING BILL—PROVISION OF SUFFICIENT COPIES

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the importance placed on Bill C-176 by both the government and the agricultural industry of Canada and in view of the fact that after one year copies of the bill still are not available to members of the House or to farm commodity groups, will the minister consult with the persons responsible to see whether this can be rectified at an early date?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have to admit I was unaware that additional copies were not available to members of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this is the kind of problem the Chair might look into. My information is that the available supplies were depleted some time ago. Of course, hon. members and the public who are interested are entitled to have copies of this bill and this is a difficulty which can easily be remedied.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPLICATION OF MINIMUM WAGE LAWS TO HOTEL EMPLOYEES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Minister of Justice is now in a position to answer a question I directed to the Minister of Labour some time ago regarding the provisions of the minimum wage laws being applied to employees of Canadian National hotels in Canada, especially in view of the importance of the matter to the collective bargaining process?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, after the question was posed by the hon. member to the Minister of Labour I reviewed the situation of the case before the Alberta Supreme Court and found that the matter has not yet been tried. I have suggested to the parties that it would be in the interest of the country to have it brought on for trial as soon as possible.

WHEAT—STOCK ON HAND AT VANCOUVER—NUMBER OF SHIPS LOADING OR WAITING

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Can he tell the House whether there is still a stock of wheat on hand at Vancouver, whether ships are being loaded and how many are waiting to be loaded?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the report I have in my hand this morning indicates that four ships are being loaded, ten are waiting to be loaded, and some 195 cars were spotted for unloading at the terminals.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Are there any ships now in position in respect of which demurrage charges are being paid, and in view of the loss of $1 million a day to the western grain economy in the past week or so will the government see to it that these charges are not forced upon the grain industry?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have the impression this question was asked on Thursday or Friday of last week.

NEW QUOTA POLICY—EFFECT ON EQUITABLE DELIVERY BY PRODUCERS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board having to do with the new quota policy which results in quotas now being non-cumulative and terminable. Is any consideration being given to the inequities that will arise as a result of late harvests, harvests in the spring, or the fact that many producers may have grain not of the type and grade offered for same at a particular time, which would in effect inhibit equitable delivery in respect of many producers?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I can assure the hon. member that all these variables are being taken into consideration by the Wheat Board. The way in which the Wheat Board will operate the terminable quotas should allow for most of the matters to which the hon. member referred being dealt with.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has already expired or is just expiring now. The Chair would like to call on the hon. member for Selkirk for the last question.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—CRITERIA USED IN CONSIDERING APPLICATIONS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Secretary of State having to do with the Opportunities for Youth program. After having supplied members of the House with the criteria to be employed in the selection of projects under the Opportunities for Youth program, has the minister subsequently added two criteria, namely, that projects which are not to be administered by the youth themselves are not acceptable under the terms of the program and, second, that projects which might normally be considered within the ambit of municipal or provincial public works departments are not to be considered under the Opportunities for Youth program?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): The reply to both parts of the question is no, Mr. Speaker. Evidently, we prefer programs young people themselves can administer and implement, and even more programs through which young people can obtain the co-operation of adults of their community.

The reply to both parts of the question is therefore negative, provided I have understood the question well.

[English]

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that the question period expired three or four minutes ago. I recognize that a number of hon. members have been rising throughout the question period. I will attempt to give them preference tomorrow. I will also seek the co-operation of the front benches to give the Chair an opportunity to recognize hon. members in the third and fourth rows. I think I should insist on this. I do feel that the Chair is perhaps placed in a difficult position from day to day when there is insistence on the part of hon. members in the front rows to ask questions at the expense, I suggest, of hon. members in the third and fourth rows.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SHIPS WAITING TO BE LOADED AT VANCOUVER—DEMURRAGE CHARGES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I apologize for taking up the time of the House but I was the fellow who asked a question a couple of days ago but did not receive an answer from the minister at the time. I think he has an answer today to the question I put.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure to which minister the hon. member is referring. I am sure that if a question was asked and if the reply is short, the House will agree to allow the minister to give that answer now.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): The number of ships and the problem of demurrage in relation to them is one that changes every day. I will have to ask the hon. member to give me notice of the specific day in which he is interested and I will try to provide the figures for him.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Friday, April 2, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Richard in the chair.

On clause 14—Establishment of ministries of state.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. When the committee rose on Friday, clause 14 of the bill was being considered.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to see that the Prime Minister is present for the opening of the discussion of this bill today. Perhaps he is going to stay and listen and also contribute to the enlightenment of hon. members regarding the reason for Part IV of the bill which will give him the power to create five ministries of state if it ever becomes law. I am sure the bill will not become law because hon. members will not agree to it.

I think there might be some hon. members across the way who have not read Bill C-207 yet, judging from what they said on Thursday and Friday of last week. I have to say that, as a new member of the House, I might not be as conversant with the legislative language as are other hon. members, but the first thing that strikes me is the language of Part IV of the bill. Clause 14 reads:

> Where it appears to the Governor in Council that—the government of Canada warrant the establishment for the time being of a special portion of the public service of Canada presided over by a Minister charged with responsibility for the formulation and development of such policies, the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. There is a great deal of perambulation through the Chamber and behind the curtains, and a great deal of talking. The Chair can stand it but it is very difficult for the hon. member who is making the speech. I, therefore, ask for the co-operation of hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: I have no complaint about the noise in the House, Mr. Chairman. This is just an indication of lack of interest in Bill C-207 on the part of hon. members, and consequently it is not surprising to me that this disinterest is beginning to manifest itself in this way.

However, the language in Part IV of the bill is what strikes me. If we go to page seven, clause 23, we read:

> A minister of State appointed by commission under the Great Seal of Canada— (a) may be assigned by the Governor in Council—

This indicates that when the Prime Minister, who is the dictator in the cabinet—that is the basic system we have in Canada today—decides that he is going to appoint a minister of state, that is done. The rights and responsibilities of that minister are then determined by the Prime Minister. Certainly, I am not very knowledgeable of the parliamentary system, its history and its privileges, but until now the Cabinet has been dictating to the House. As a matter of fact, the Canadian people have recognized that it has been part of the whole tradition for the Governor in Council, or for the Prime Minister and his cabinet, to decide on the policies, to decide what moneys will be spent and where they will be spent.

What we are now being asked under this bill is to establish a system whereby the total number of people involved in ministries under the Prime Minister's control may be larger than the number of the people in his government. I am surprised that hon. members across the way have not taken strong exception to it. I was trying to calculate the actual number of people who would be involved. At present, the cabinet consists of 28 ministers, including the Prime Minister and the ministers without portfolio. If the present legislation becomes law, we might find that with every minister having at least one parliamentary secretary the figure would double to 56. If you add a few extra parliamentary secretaries for some of the larger portfolios there would be 63 people under the control of the Prime Minister. At the same time there would be five ministers of state. Clause 23 reads:

> A Minister of State appointed by commission under the Great Seal of Canada, other than a Minister who presides over a Ministry of State,
> (a) may be assigned by the Governor in Council to assist any Minister or Ministers—

I do not know what that means exactly, but my interpretation is that the Prime Minister or the Governor in Council may appoint any number of ministers of state. We have a potential of five ministries and an unlimited number of ministers. Assuming the Prime Minister is very fair in his distribution and appoints only five ministers of state, a couple of them being those already under his control, we might have a situation with four parties in the House where the Prime Minister might appoint every member in his party to some position of authority. It is possible for a government to be elected in Canada with only 70 members. At present there are 150 government members, 70-odd in the official opposition, less than 20 in one opposition party and 10 in the other. It would be possible, after the next election, for one party to elect 70 members and still form a government. We have had governments with just over 100 members.

Let us consider the possibility of a minority government with only 70-odd members forming the government, with the support of opposition parties. Under this system, it would be possible for a Prime Minister to appoint each and every one of his party to positions of authority, and so far as I am concerned this is a serious step in the wrong direction. It is one which will increase the autocracy of cabinet, the autocracy of the Prime Minister, and reduce the democratic process below what it is at the moment.

Members of the House of Commons are complaining about the lack of independence which they suffer in trying to vote on legislation. Everyone is aware of the party system. Everyone knows there is a lot of line toeing, and a good deal of party allegiance. A couple of days ago I was talking to 70 or 80 young people who visited the House of Commons, and they complained that parliamentarians were not sufficiently independent from their parties. They said that Members of Parliament had to go along with the policies of their parties. If this piece of legislation becomes law, the independence of members will become much less than it is now. I cannot understand the attitude of hon. members opposite. During the last few days I have noticed the type of member who has been staying in the House. I have been noticing the type of member who has been making his presence felt. These people are either ministers or parliamentary secretaries now or aspire to become such.

Members of the Liberal party are showing a great deal of fear. I don't blame them. Some of these members want to become part of the establishment. They want to play their role. They want appointments. They want to be on the inside track. Can you imagine the effect of this attitude on the government if this legislation becomes law? Already there are many hon. members who are trying to show their great allegiance to the Prime Minister, their great allegiance to the cabinet, and their great allegiance to their party, but not to the country. That is not where their allegiance lies. It lies with the Prime Minister, the cabinet, and their party. Hopefully this legislation will never become law. But, can you imagine what will happen if it does, and if a Prime Minister can give appointments to some 100 members of his party? In fact, at present he can decide on about 70 appointments, and the people of Canada are wondering about the fate of democracy.

I have talked to people in this party, Mr. Chairman, who are knowledgeable with respect to the legislative process. They wonder why we did not get a separate bill dealing with the environment, so that we could have had a debate on environment. Such a bill would have been on the statute books by now. They wonder why the government did not decide to bring in separate bills if it wanted more ministries established. I was astounded on Friday to hear the President of the Treasury Board ask the hon. member for Edmonton West if he would be against establishing a ministry of state in charge of feminine affairs, or women. I was astounded at him asking that question, since the Prime Minister already has the authority to appoint any number of ministers without portfolio. I was astounded that he did not realize the Prime Minister could have introduced a separate bill to establish a ministry in charge of feminine affairs. Doesn't he have that right? I ask the President of the Treasury Board, doesn't he have that right now to bring in a separate bill, spelling out the duties, the functions, the responsibilities, and the total administrative bureaucratic costs to the Canadian people of such a ministry? Why does he want unlimited power, such as he would have under this legislation?

I say to the people of Canada that every minister of the Crown is guilty of collusion with the Prime Minister, in the first place for allowing this legislation to be before the House, and secondly for not speaking out against it. The President of the Treasury Board sits over there and smiles. Mr. Chairman, I look down the list of people whom I recognize as honourable gentlemen. We have the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I won't say he is the most aggressive member of the cabinet. He can figure skate beautifully, but I believe he would take exception to the democratic system going down the drain.

I look at the member from Vancouver who is in charge of public works. I don't think he is so enamoured of all the aspects, all of the efforts of our present Francophone Prime Minister that he would not stand up for his people. I look at the President of the Privy Council. I know he got to the leadership convention, and I know he has had trouble finding his way up to his present level in his party, but I thought he would be against a provision of this type. I look at the President of the Treasury Board who has control of the purse strings of the Canadian nation. I would expect this gentleman to thump his desk and say, "If we want a particular ministry of state, or particular minister without portfolio in charge of unemployment, in charge of urban affairs, or in charge of women, or of any such area concerning the Canadian people, bring in a new separate bill, Mr. Prime Minister; place it before the Canadian nation, spelling out the duties, responsibilities, the structure, the hierarchy, and the cost, and we will go for it. We will go for it after we have analysed it and have changed it."

Then we get the minister from Kingston who is the Minister of Finance. I believe he is one who has great knowledge of the composition of the economy in the east and who would stand up against the Prime Minister. Everybody knows the Prime Minister is a very knowledgeable internationalist. Today, I heard the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert challenge our Information

Canada expert to produce some of the speeches of Mr. Gagnon during the ten years 1940 to 1950. I would like to see Information Canada publish some of the essays and contributions to the literary world of the Prime Minister during that period. One hon. gentleman holds up a copy of "Pierre Trudeau and Canadian Federalism." I would like to see passages from it circulated to the Canadian people. Then, there is the book by Jacques Hebert and Pierre Elliot Trudeau, "Two Innocents in Red China", which I have read with great interest. I should like to see this book circulated because it tells of his second coming to Red China and his great association with the Chinese people. I think the Prime Minister is a great internationalist. I would like to see more publicity given to Jacques Hebert's views on his visit to Red China. This Jacques Hebert is the same gentleman who published the book by the Secretary of State.

The Prime Minister is an expert on eastern matters. There is nobody in this Parliament more capable than the Prime Minister of finding ways to get control of situations. Then, we have the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. We also have the Minister of Energy Mines and Resources. Where does he stand? I know we are having trouble determining where he stands with respect to energy policies.

Mr. Deachman: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Are we still on Bill C-207? If we are I would not have recognized the fact from listening to the last several minutes of the present discourse. I wonder if the hon. member just wandered off to another topic.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra has made a very good point. The hon. member who has the floor may have been straying just a bit far.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra for proving that he was awake. I think he is just getting in an early application for one of these appointments. I notice that my good friend, the expert in the area of finance, who is sitting over there, is not wearing his red shirt today. He has done a tremendous job of ingratiating himself with his colleagues since he was appointed parliamentary secretary. Keep up the good work, there are a lot of appointments to come.

I think my remarks are relative, Mr. Chairman. We are asked to approve a decision of the Prime Minister which, hopefully, came before the cabinet. I hope it did because I have some confidence in his colleagues in the cabinet. But I am challenging the various members of the Privy Council to explain why they are prepared to permit the Prime Minister, who has never explained the bill to the House, to go ahead with legislation which will in effect take complete and total control of the House of Commons. Instead of having dictatorship of the cabinet, as has been traditional since 1867, we will have a small group of 28 ministers in control of all the decision-making process, plus the fact that the Prime Minister will have control of his own party. It will be a completely autocratic situation.

I have overlooked the Postmaster General, but now I come to a gentleman for whom I have a great deal of respect, the Minister of Justice. He has not been in the House during the debate, so far as I am aware. Perhaps he has been here once or twice, but he has never taken exception to this provision. I wonder if he took exception to it in cabinet. At the moment, there are enough ministers in the cabinet with backbone that some will stand up against the things that are happening in this country.

I will overlook the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and come to the Minister of Labour, the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, a man who has tremendous credentials on paper. Is he satisfied with the control being given to the Prime Minister? And where is the member for Vancouver-Quadra?

On rereading clause 23 I see that it gives permission to the Governor in Council to appoint an unlimited number of ministers of state, not just those who will be in charge of the five ministries of state. It provides also that a minister of state "may be assigned by the Governor in Council to assist any minister—". What kind of control is that? Is the member for Calgary South satisfied that we in this House can vote to give a blank cheque, as was done during the Second World War?

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, and I do so only to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Agreed.

Mr. Lundrigan: I won't even accept the opportunity, Mr. Chairman, because I am sure there are many hon. members who wish to speak. I have another 20 minutes, so I shall wait until a little bit later in the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, we are now on clause 14 of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

As the hon. members opposite know, I have already dealt with this clause, but in view of the extensive powers the government seeks in this clause, Mr. Chairman, this question cannot be settled through only one or two interventions. It is therefore my duty to intervene again, not to repeat what has already been said, but to raise further points.

Mr. Chairman, I should like first, for the benefit of my hon. colleagues, to underline three quite distinct points.

Under clause 14 of this bill, the government wants to assume the right to appoint five more ministers of state.

But there are already 29 ministers. The government also intends to appoint, under Part IV of this bill, 13 additional parliamentary secretaries.

In short, this bill will create 18 new positions at a high salary. It might be advisable to ask why, and I shall come back to this later on.

The second point I would like to emphasize is that because of the excessive number of technocrats in the federal administration, fewer and fewer powers are devolved to parliament in the legislative field, while more and more are granted to the creatures of the executive power, that is to technocrats or experts who are not answerable to the Canadian people.

Indeed, the more ministries of state and departments are created, the more power will be secured by the technocrats, the would-be experts who, unfortunately are not answerable to the people, so that the member of parliament wonders exactly what his role is in parliament, why he is elected; for, if the government is allowed to continue operating as it does at the present time, not only will the role of the member have to be redefined—which might not be a bad idea—but it will have to be discussed and updated.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring up a third point: thanks to the roster system set up by the prime minister (Mr. Trudeau), from 110 to 130 Liberal members will be given higher indemnities, indirectly, for some reason or other, and this without submitting to the test of public opinion.

Mr. Chairman, that is third point which we must not be afraid to raise in this House, because it shows us another aspect of the problem. But let us come back to the first one. So they intend to create 18 new posts. It is known that there is at present more than 29 departments and 16 parliamentary secretaries. One this bill is passed, five more ministers will be appointed; consequently there will be 34 ministers and as many parliamentary secretaries.

Why? Will the establishment of a ministry of state, a department or a Crown corporation be more beneficial to the population? Will five more ministers, five or thirteen more parliamentary secretaries do better justice to the Canadian population? Will a greater number of members with special assignments allow the population to take a greater part in the administration of public affairs?

Mr. Chairman, of course the answer is no. Canadians cannot take part in the administration of public affairs. I think that the government introduces this bill as an excuse for its failure in governing.

The other day, I dealt briefly with a comical situation which already occurred and which is so plausible that it might occur again tomorrow. Assume that there should be tomorrow a shortage of jobs for students, as it is already the case now. The government would be faced with a serious emergency from coast to coast. It would not know what to do with the young students. In fact, in 1972 for instance, there will be an additional 300,000 undergraduates on the labour market, not to mention the present unemployment problem. This means that this government which has no solution today will not have any tomorrow.

On the one hand, the government is blamed by the population because it does not have any direct and immediate solution to the problem. On the other hand, criticisms keep on increasing because it has not solved the basic issue which is the monetary problem. It goes on following patchwork policies, suggesting makeshift solutions but does not settle the problem.

The latest gimmick used by the right hon. Prime Minister to cover up his lethargy and his imcompetence is very simple: the widely-publicized establishment of a ministry of state and the appointment of some member who is yearning for a title, new powers or a pay raise. With a lot of drum-beating, this new ministry of state which will precisely tackle the problem of summer jobs for students will order inquiries throughout the country, as if we did not know that there are often problems in Canada. Studies will be made, commissions will be created under the authority of this new ministry, and public opinion will be entertained, not on the basic problem but on the surface problem, that is, publicity around this ministry, in the hope of keeping people's minds off the basic problem.

Mr. Chairman, we have 29 departments now. Is the situation better today than it was when we had 25? No, Mr. Chairman. There has been a lot of commotion in government since the Prime Minister came to power, but has the creation and abolition of departments, the changing of names, what I like to term this "fooling around", has all that solved the problem? No! In fact, the only result was to amuse some people, the Liberals, and not to create more justice, more freedom and more security for Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, we in Canada are not asking for changes in department names or in the number of ministers, but for an in-depth reform. It is not a question of giving numerous titles to people who are mad for power. On the contrary, one must forget one's personal interest and deal truly and honestly with the fundamental problem.

Furthermore and this is even more serious, administrative costs are excessive and constitute too much of a load for Canadians. The cost of administrative services is out of proportion to the income of Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, on pages 21 and 22 of the booklet published by the Canadian government and entitled: "How your tax dollar is spent", it is said, regarding the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, under "economic development and support", that for primary industry alone, administration costs—and not what industries are given to assist them—will be $13.8 million in 1971-72. Last year, they amounted to $12 million. In one year, they have increased by $1.8 million.

One could find similar examples in the case of other departments. For the Department of Labour, administration costs will be $13 million for 1971-72, while in 1970-71 they reached $9.8 million. This is a rather considerable increase. Why? The Canadian people are still waiting and trying to guess.

As regards the Department of Transport and Communications, its administration will cost over $29.8 million in 1961-1972. The expenditures of the same department totalled $23 million last year, which means they have increased by $6.8 million in one year. Is this in order to give better service to the Canadian people? No, Mr. Chairman, but in order to give greater authority and better working conditions to technocrats, and to increase the number of officials who pester people with all sorts of inquiries and plans.

As far as the internal overhead expenses of the government are concerned, it is mentioned that the government cannot foresee the correct amount. The exact wording is as follows:

Contingencies Vote

What does it mean? Without trying to understand, Mr. Chairman, let us be content with what is said.

Mr. Béchard: This is a far-sighted government.

Mr. Fortin: It reads as follows:

Contingencies Vote

Seventy-five million dollars are provided for unforeseen spending and salary increases. Last year, the amount was $63 million or $12 million less. Perhaps those figures are not sufficiently eloquent. Here is what we read with regard to "General Government Services":

Legislative—salaries, operating costs of Parliament, election expenses and Auditor-General—

Those items will cost $36.1 million in 1971-72. This cost $32.3 million last year. This is an increase of $4 million.

The collection of taxes is a very interesting aspect.

• (3:20 p.m.)

On page 27 of the same brochure it is said and I quote:

National Revenue—costs of collecting taxes—

Does anyone know how much it cost to collect taxes from the Canadian taxpayer and pay technocrats during 1971-72? The cost was $184,300,000. For the previous year, in 1970-71, the cost was $164,500,000, that is an increase of more than $20 million in one year.

Mr. Chairman, there is no point in proceeding any further with this demonstration to prove that the government believes that it does not have to serve the people.

Mr. Chairman, it seems the government feels it is its duty to serve the technocrats, the civil servants, for its own purposes but not to serve the Canadian people or parliament.

On page 18 of the same publication are printed the words of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), who is sitting in front of me but not listening to what I have to say, and I quote:

The government does not necessarily have to spend vast sums of money in order to meet its policy objectives.

That is a little too strong, we have to admit. In that booklet, the government states that it does not necessarily have to spend vast sums of money for the people. At the same time, he introduces bill C-207, asking for a free hand to establish, at his discretion, five ministries of state, without telling us what field they will be covering, without telling us what their relationship with parliament will be, taking power away from parliament to increase the power of technocrats and the executive. In fact, while the government is about to appoint sixteen more parliamentary secretaries, here is what it tells us:

The government does not necessarily have to spend vast sums of money in order to meet its policy objectives.

That is an insult to the Canadian people. It is the government's constitutional right to levy taxes from taxpayers, but it is also its duty to provide services commensurate with the taxes levied.

The same government says that it is entitled to levy taxes but without being obliged to spend for the people. That is the ridiculous situation in which we are now.

Last week I mentioned the increasingly decisive influence of technocrats on the government.

Mr. Chairman, I have very interesting statistics that can be found on page 19 of the publication of the Treasury Board, and I quote:

Thereare two ways to look at the overall spending program—one by department and the other by the objectives or functions being served. The Blue Book necessarily sets out amounts for each of the 80-odd Federal departments and agencies,—

Mr. Chairman, "80-odd departments and agencies" are presently heading this government, directly under the executive power. To hear our opposites, this would not be enough to administer the country. This means enormous administrative costs which drain revenue and prevent a really efficient administration, because we are tripping over technocrats and this does not make sense. The situation is now reaching gigantic proportions and is really ludicrous.

This is why I so fiersely oppose the passing of this clause 14, inasmuch as it is a direct attack against the powers of parliament.

This clause states that "the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose". Last week, I proposed an amendment stating that instead of the Governor in Council being able, by proclamation, to establish a ministry of state, it would be done by the Canadian parliament may through legislation.

I would like to ask the President of the Treasury Board why the establishment of the 29 other departments had to be submitted to parliament and approved by legislation, whereas the government now forgets this constitutional right and would willingly let the Prime Minister establish whatever departments he wishes in fields of his choice without submitting such projects to parliament. That is senseless. That again is prejudicial to the rights of parliament.

The choice we have to make today is not an easy one, but it is clear. Either we shall continue to abuse the system, increase the number of departments, Crown corporations and ministries of state, grant powers, pay salaries and give titles to technocrats, who will abuse such powers without being responsible to the people, or we shall give back to the Canadian people their right of scrutiny over the administration.

• (3:30 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I must advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I deeply regret that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Béchard) is not here, he who the other day was complaining when I told him that I was going to continue with my remarks—he was here a moment ago—and I would hope that he will honour us with his presence so that I may address my remarks particularly to him.

I see that he is just coming in and I can outline the substance of my speech.

[English]

When speaking on this bill the other day, Mr. Chairman, I indicated that this part of the bill would greatly add to the powers of the Prime Minister. I indicated at that time that, in my opinion, the office of the Prime Minister of Canada was far more powerful than that of the president of the United States and, as a political office, far more powerful than that of the prime minister of Great Britain in the same sphere. I do not mean a comparison as to their positions in the world. That would involve different considerations.

I wish to deal briefly with what the Prime Minister of Canada can do once he has assumed that office. The cabinet, within the political considerations of his party, is entirely his choice. He answers to no one except his own party with regard to the choice of his cabinet. There is no necessity to submit the names of the cabinet for ratification, as is one in the United States. Up until a couple of generations ago, we had a practice whereby any one named to the cabinet had to resign and the name of that person was resubmitted to the electorate by way of a by-election for approval. That no longer applies.

In the United States, certain individuals who have been proposed as cabinet ministers have encountered considerable opposition either in the Senate or in the House of Representatives. The last example I can think of was the nomination of the former secretary of the interior, Walter-Hickel, which was approved only after a great deal of difficulty and persuasion in the house. No one should be under the illusion that the President of the United States is free to do as he wishes with regard to his cabinet. In Great Britain, there is no requirement for ratification.

With regard to the Senate of this country, the nominations to that place are entirely within the control of the Prime Minister. The appointments are directly attributable to the Prime Minister. To that extent, Mr. Chairman, he controls a great deal of the political life and happenings within Parliament. I will not go into detail except to state that he has absolute power with regard to appointments to the other place.

In the United States, the Senate is a second legislative body, subject to vote by the electorate and is a counterbalance to the powers of the President. Any one who wishes to say anything on the subject should read American political history. He will see that in many instances the United States Senate, even if it shares the political views of the President, will not side with him and in fact may turn him down. The most recent example of that is the support the presidency gave to the further construction of a supersonic air transport. When the senate turned it down by refusing to continue the funding, that was the end of the program, although it was against the will of the president. There is no such thing in this Parliament. After the legislation comes down, unless the House itself becomes very difficult, the Prime Minister merely sticks to his guns, his majority ultimately votes in its favour and it becomes law.

In Britain, prime ministers must take account of the House of Lords. It is true the powers of that body have been curtailed over the years. The British prime minister has no power over the composition of the House of Lords, except in so far as peers are nominated; there is a body of hereditary peers over which he has no control. There can be no doubt that the presence of the House of Lords has greatly influenced decisions British prime ministers have reached with regard to certain pieces of legislation.

Consider appointments to the judiciary. Appointments to the Supreme Court of Canada are the prerogative of the prime minister and no ratification of those appointments is required. In the United States, recommendations for appointment to the Supreme Court are subject to ratification and in the last three years we have seen just how far this revisionary power can be exercised. Both Presidents Johnson and Nixon have seen their nominees refused by the Senate.

In England, there is no provision for ratification of appointments to the bench or to the High Court, although it is accepted that hereditary peers can form part of committees of the House of Lords, and they do. To this extent, there is a restriction on the power of the prime minister.

Appointments to representative posts abroad are usually made from within the public service, but the man who has the final say with regard to major appointments is the prime minister. Appointment to be an ambassador to a foreign country is not subject to ratification. In the United States, searching examinations of potential holders of major ambassadorial posts can be carried out and approval can be withheld. In Britain, there is no similar practice.

Appointments to positions as parliamentary secretaries can be made here at the whim of the Prime Minister. He is apparently of the opinion that there should be a complete turnover every two years. Others have felt the period should be one year. But the Prime Minister is the man who determines who shall be a parliamentary secretary and to what minister. In Britain, the position is the same. In the United States, there are no similar appointments.

Now, I come to my final comparison. The Prime Minister can always hold a sword over the heads of his cabinet, the parliamentary secretaries and any of his supporters in the chamber by threatening to call an election. It is at his call, and his call alone, that a recommendation for the dissolution of Parliament can be accepted by the Governor General. This does not apply in the United States, if only because the dates of elections are fixed under the terms of the constitution. No President of the United States can hasten or delay an election. I know that in the history of this country on many occasions when government backbenchers and parliamentary secretaries were proving recalcitrant or critical of the conduct of a prime minister, the answer has been: If you don't like it let us call an election and we shall see then how many of you will get back. This made them toe the line, Mr. Chairman.

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, the hon. member for Calgary South, could, if he were prepared to break some confidences, tell us about some instances of which we have become aware through that authoritative source of information, the leak from caucus. These are the points of comparison I bring to the attention of the committee between the powers exercised by the Prime Minister of Canada, the Prime Minister of Britain and the President of the United States. The proposal before us today would make the Prime Minister of Canada even more powerful. I admit that within the cabinet there is a kind of political responsibility, but the power of the office of Prime Minister is unrivalled in regard to these five ministries of state, ministries whose name could be changed, whose function could be changed, ministries which could even be wiped out altogether by order in council. Even an order in council is, in fact, an order made by a cabinet under the dominance of a prime minister.

Another point I wish to emphasize is this. In clause 16 of this bill there is a power to vary by order in council the purpose or the objectives of a ministry of state. I would say that this would include the power to change the purpose for which money had been asked for or voted by the House. This is a power which has been denied to government in other cases. Indeed, Mr. Speaker has ruled that the government does not possess the power to change the purpose for which money was estimated and granted by the use of orders in council.

An attempt was made to do so in the case of the Dominion Coal Board, but it was ruled that the government did not have the power to vary the allocation of moneys voted on behalf of the board. Yet, here we are being asked to give carte blanche when it comes to altering the objectives, the composition and the financing of ministries of state. An attempt is being made to stampede the House into accepting this proposal by exerting all kinds of pressure. I could name member after member on the other side who must, surely, find it extraordinarily difficult to countenance legislation of this kind even for one moment. It is something which has never been done before and there is no reason to try it out now.

I talked the other day about efficiency and quick response. Why does not the parliamentary secretary set up a dictatorship? That is the most efficient and quickest way to get a flexible response. But in the view of the parliamentary secretary from Bonaventure, anything that is proposed by the government has been inspired by some divine source and can have nothing wrong with it; therefore, we should bow low and be thankful that we have such wise masters. That is the way Liberal members think. They think they own Parliament and the people of Canada.

An hon. Member: They are your words, not ours.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): But the actions are yours. The words uttered by hon. members opposite may well be Charlie McCarthy words for all I know. Certainly, the Prime Minister is the man in this House who said: "We are masters of this Parliament". According to the Prime Minister, members on the government side are the masters, but this is not the case. Never will I vote for a proposal whereby moneys voted by this Parliament may be diverted to another purpose by order in council. I suppose this is the government's way of trying to get around the ruling made by the Chair the other day that one cannot legislate by supplementary estimate. Under this proposal, the government would not have to worry about adding a supplementary estimate; they can legislate new provisions entirely by order in council.

It is a good thing that I let a period of time elapse between my last speech and this, because in the interim we have had the benefit of that really gem performance of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, if one contemplates the possibilities under this proposal, it could turn out that that minister could be made a minister of state for economic affairs. And what a green-eyed disaster that would be!

I deny, of course, that the minister is correct when he says that presidents of Canadian banks have no right to speak out. They can criticize government proposals, whether in Canada or outside. I am not going to hold a brief for what they said, but I suggest that they do have the right to say what they said. I would like to hear what the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister would have said had those particular gentlemen been laudatory of government programs in any way. I suppose it would then have been suggested that they be offered seats in the Senate; that they should be taken as witness of the efficacy or value of government action. But because they dared criticize, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister has the unmitigated gall, the impertinence, to suggest that one particular bank president be fired. I would have thought that the man who had earned the right to be fired was the parliamentary secretary.

An hon. Member: Who is it you are talking about?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I suppose the parliamentary secretary was talking about the former governor of the Bank of Canada, who was making a speech in his position as president of the bank. However, I suppose hon. members opposite do not have the slightest concern for relevancy or whether any names or situations are at all parallel. Anything that pops into that wide open space between the ears rattles around and then comes out again.

If presidents of Canadian banks do not have the right to speak out on their own, then what right has the Secretary of State? It is alleged that he has the right to express his personal views, as he has in his book, even though he may disagree with those of the government. That is all very fine if that is the position taken by the government; but why single out individuals for comment and then go on to suggest that government must sit on the boards of Canadian banks in order to control individuals on those boards, as has been suggested in this particular instance?

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue if there is consent.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): If there is consent, Mr. Chairman, I can finish fairly shortly. All I am saying at this time is that I suggest to the parliamentary secretary from Bonaventure, and to all other hon. members, that if they study these particular clauses dealing with ministries of state they will see how insidious and dangerous a situation is being created. It may be, of course, that so many of the hon. members opposite are carolling or singing, hoping to draw attention to their own particular qualifications so that they might be among those who are upgraded for the various positions that will be open.

I should like to hear one hon. member opposite, and not one has yet done this, stand up and justify with valid reasons the creation of ministries of state of this kind with the power to change by order in council not only their composition but their tenure of office, their purpose, and the purpose to which their funds are directed.

Mr. Gillespie: Shocking!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board is a great one to say "shocking". We know the degree of omniscience with which he approaches a given position; he thinks that if the members on the government side think something is all right, then it must be all right. I suggest to the hon. member, whom I have known for a long time, that if he sat over on this side of the House for a while he would see that it is a far cry from being correct merely to sit on the government side and approve all ideas that emanate either from the cabinet or from the administration. After all, one has to sit on the government side for only a short time to become aware of the influence of the bureaucracy and of certain individuals within the bureaucracy, the mandarins. This proposal is made to order for the mandarins and for those who populate the Prime Minister's office. Since the Prime Minister his broken through the ceiling of $1 million in salaries in his own, personal office, I suppose we can expect a further expansion.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Certainly, all these ministries of state will have to be supported. The parliamentary secretary says "looked after". But it will mean jobs for the boys. It will be very nice, boys, too, at salaries of course which will set a great example for the whole country. But may I say this, Mr. Chairman: I must share the views of many of my colleagues who say at this point they will not allow this measure to pass. A great deal more explanation must come forward. As a matter of fact, there is one man who should come into this House and give the explanation concerning why he wants to change the composition of this cabinet. No cabinet ministers have been here at all, except merely to sit, except perhaps for the President of the Treasury Board.

An hon. Member: He is the one on duty.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, but it is not his duty to explain this legislation.

An hon. Member: He has been delegated by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, the President of the Treasury Board may have been delegated by the Prime Minister, but the Prime Minister owes it to this House to come here personally and say why he wants his cabinet changed. Perhaps government members have forgotten that the cabinet is responsible to this House and believe they are the masters. So far as I am concerned, that is for the birds.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Chairman, I am happy to express my views for the first time on Clause 14 of Bill C-207 which I consider very important, as does my hon. friend the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin).

This bill is one of the most important, particularly with respect to Clause 14, which gives the Governor in Council the right to increase the number of ministers from 29 to 34 and the number of parliamentary secretaries from 16 to 34, an increase of 18.

I do not doubt, Mr. Chairman, that many hon. members on the government side can indeed fulfill the office of minister or parliamentary secretary. However, I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that in order to decide if the government should spend more money in the administration, we should know first whether this would be profitable for the people of Canada and if this would make a serious contribution.

Would it not be necessary now to give some consideration to the administration of the already existing departments in order to reorganize them, before setting up new ones?

The hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Faulkner) said the other day, as he was blaming the opposition for objecting too much to Bill C-207, that he thought it was a very innofensive piece of legislation of no great importance. If this is true, I would call upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or the minister who introduced this bill, to withdraw it immediately. We could proceed to the consideration of more serious legislation, if this bill is really innoffensive and of no great importance.

But if the minister suggests that the bill before us is of some importance, and that its aim is to increase administrative efficiency, it would be necessary first to know whether its passage would be really profitable.

I note that very often certain departments only operate against Canadians and particularly against producers.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw the members' attention to the report of the proceedings of the Senate Committee on External Affairs dated November 4, 1970, regarding what I consider as poor administration. I would like to quote some excerpts from this report.

Senator Macnaughton was asking the hon. Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) what was the matter with meat imports, particularly lamb from New Zealand. As a matter of fact, the question was as follows:

Mr. Minister, I would now like to turn to New Zealand, and include with it the meat problem of Australia. You mentioned yourself the possibility that Great Britain may make the European Common Market in due course. Needless to say, as you so well know, the New Zealanders are extremely upset. Here is their assured market which may be in jeopardy.

Is Canada considering possibly stepping into the shoes of Great Britain and stepping up the importation of lamb from New Zealand and meat from Australia, on three grounds: firstly, we need a secondary source of cheaper meat than filet mignon every day; secondly . . .

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order . . .

The Chairman: The hon. member for Hamilton Wentworth on a point of order.

Mr. Gibson: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I want to say that the hon. member is out of order because he is talking about New Zealand lamb. This is not the matter under consideration and I protest.

[English]

The Chairman: I think the point of order of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth is well taken. However, I do not wish to seem to be too strict in this particular debate because I believe other hon. members have wandered a little at times. I hope the hon. member will try to stay on the subject.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for having raised this point of order, but I do not think I am out of order for drawing the attention of the House to the administration of existing departments.

That is what I said at the outset and it will not take long to make my point. I resume the quotation, with your permission—

Mr. Boulanger: Permission is not granted.

Mr. Beaudoin: I quote the rest of the question:

—and thirdly, Great Britain has to, as you have so wisely said, consider a market of 300 million and not a market of 50 million—

Here is how the minister answered:

I am pleased to tell you that this has already taken place. Mr. Burns might explain.

Mr. Burns is Assistant Deputy Minister for External Services in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Here is his answer:

Mr. Chairman, the Canadian tariff on meats from Australia and New Zealand is a very low one, of the order of a quarter or a half a cent a pound—

Mr. Boulanger: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

The Chairman: Order please. The hon. member for Mercier is rising on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, you have just called the previous speaker to order. Now, after having recognized that you were justified in doing so, he said he would continue in the same vein.

Mr. Chairman, you can tolerate this situation, but if you want the Standing Orders to be respected, you will have to recognize that the hon. member does not abide by them.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear.

• (4:10 p.m.)

[English]

The Chairman: The hon. member for Hamilton Wentworth raised a point of order. I think the hon. member for Richmond may be straying a bit far, and perhaps he would try to confine his remarks to the part with which we are dealing.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to show how effective are the present departments before determining if the creation of others would benefit Canadian producers. I continue with Mr. Burns' answer:

There has been a very sharp increase in meat exports both from Australia and New Zealand in the last 18 months.

Is this sound administration, Mr. Chairman, especially with respect to our Canadian producers who find that the price of their products vary by 4, 5 or 6 cents per pound from week to week? Do you think, Mr. Chairman, that with departments such as these and such irresponsible people—I restrict myself to this particular field because I did not have time to consider the whole question—we will get somewhere? As a matter of fact, we, of the opposition, must be everywhere at once.

With respect to farm production, does our present Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, in the manner it operates, benefit the people who come under it?

The more the government creates departments and, by the same token appoints parliamentary secretaries, the more it will have to establish royal commissions, etc. The more departments, the more public servants; the more public servants, the more "tripping", and less progress is made.

Mr. Béchard: It is good for animals, it is good for sheep.

An hon. Member: There are enough sheep on the other side.

An hon. Member: Some are in New Zealand, and some on the other side.

Mr. Beaudoin: Let us leave the sheep in New Zealand. Is it patronage-minded leaders we want or capable ministers? I said before, Mr. Chairman, that some members on the other side of the House can become excellent ministers and parliamentary secretaries. However, would it be profitable for us? We should know what we are buying, what administration is costing us, before we appoint administrators.

Since 1968, the cost of administration has increased by some 70 per cent. That's enough. With unemployment and with the tax collector stealing from their pockets, small wage-earners will certainly take a dim view of an increase in the number of ministers, of parliamentary secretaries, of civil servants, and in the cost of government administration.

I wanted to say a few words to call the House's attention to this oversize expense game. I wanted to say that I am against this bill, and particularly against clause 14.

[English]

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, I suppose everyone who speaks in this Chamber subconsciously worries about being original and about avoiding repetitious remarks. But I may say at the outset of this intervention that I make no apology whatsoever for being repetitious if that is necessary. I have no concern whatever about repeating arguments that have been made before, because it may take a lot of repetition before the people of Canada are aroused to see just what is happening. It may also take a good deal of repetition to arouse the innate decency of the government backbenchers. I am amazed at all this talk of obstruction and delay in connection with this piece of legislation.

The hon. member for Peterborough, in his intervention last Friday, mentioned that we had been debating this bill for 17 days, and another hon. member said we had been debating it for 20 days. Who knows? I suspect that both of them grabbed these figures out of the air, but even if it takes 37 days or if it takes 70 days it will be worth it, in my humble opinion, to delete this part of the bill.

It has come to my attention through scuttlebut around the hill that it is being said: what is the difference, the government does not have any legislation ready anyway so we are really not holding up anything.

An hon. Member: There is the unemployment insurance bill.

Mr. Baldwin: Bring it in.

Mr. Boulanger: You are not the government. You had a chance in 1958.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Lambton Kent has the floor.

Mr. McCutcheon: I thank you, Mr. Chairman. I was going to refer to the fact that there are three particularly obnoxious clauses relating to ministries and ministers of state, and these are clauses 14, 20 and 23. I say to the government in all sincerity—because I think I am a reasonable person and I am anxious that some parts of this bill be enacted—that we should split this bill and only keep parts I, II, III and VII. If I am any judge of members in this place, I say that those parts will pass virtually automatically.

Mr. Béchard: Why don't you vote, then?

Mr. McCutcheon: All you have to do is withdraw parts IV, V and VII and resubmit them in another form. I will then guarantee you that the bill will become law very quickly.

What is the crux of this debate? It is very simple. We on this side do not object to the appointment of extra ministers when it can be demonstrated that a need for these extra ministers exists. But what we do object to is the method used in this instance. Ministers without Portfolio can be appointed and their pay must come from an appropriation account. In other words, we have to scrounge around to find the money to pay them. What is wrong with that? If it can be proven to Parliament that there is justifiction for such an appointment, there is no problem getting that ratified. In his intervention the other day, the hon. member for York East pointed out that backbenchers in this chamber could not stop anything, could not do anything. Maybe he was partially right, but I submit that at least in such a case the people of Canada would know. They would be told why it was necessary to have another minister. That is very important in parliamentary democracy, but under this method salaries are provided by statute. There will never again be a chance to question why these appointments were made. We are being asked to accept this proposal on a take it or leave it basis, by one man rule.

What will all this mean? How many other ministers will there be? By how much will bureaucracy increase? Is this a bill to appoint five or six new ministers? I submit that because of the woolly way in which the bill is worded it would be quite possible for every member on the government side to receive an appointment. There is just no ceiling. So far, not one government member has come forward with a reasoned argument in support of this measure. I have been sitting here waiting for someone to come out with a reasoned sales pitch, to explain to me why I should support this measure.

If the government backbenchers believe in this thing they should be prepared to stand up and be counted. They should say we should do it for this reason, that reason or the other reason. But has that happened yet? I ask you to read the debates. The best interjection from the government side so far was by the President of the Treasury Board last Thusrday. At that time he told me to read the bill. I thought that was rather profound, coming from him. I have read the bill, and I have read the speeches made on it. The only contribution from the government side has been to point out that patronage exists in other legislatures. In my opinion, that is a very weak argument. Let us admit that it does exist in other places. Does that make it right for us? I think not.

The only contribution by the hon. member for Peterborough, for whom I have the highest regard and respect for his academic background, his integrity, and for his being a former deputy speaker, was to point out that in 1959 a resolution regarding parliamentary secretaries was introduced in this House. I am not going to stoop to that type of nit-picking, but let the record show that that bill in 1959 replaced a previous act that had been brought in by a Liberal government. But this is specious argument, and I don't like it. On Thursday last, the hon. member for Mercier made a sincere intervention in the debate. He did not need to, but he apologized for his English. I salute him, Mr. Chairman. His remarks were well made. I sincerely wish I could do as well in his language as he did in mine.

I am astounded that government members have given so few reasons to support the bill. But there was one exception. We all know that the hon. member for York East is an independent thinker. I admire his intellect. I do not always agree with him, but I respect his judgment. As recorded at page 4798 of Hansard he said:

> This bill proposes to create a few or any number of ministers of state.

He can see the loopholes in it. He went on to point out how pessimistic he was about Parliament, and as recorded later on the same page he said:

> No hon. gentlemen opposite can say that he really has the power to change anything, and none of us on this side can say it either.

I cannot share his pessimism about the way this institution works. I was not sent here to give up my right to be heard on behalf of the people of Lambton-Kent, and to try to make changes. I was not sent here to be a rubber stamp to an arrogant government run by one man. Attitudes here, Mr. Chairman, are appalling. One voice here last week was heard to say, "We've got a winner." He was probably referring to the Prime Minister. I say to hon. members opposite: don't let it go to your heads, boys, because under our system of representation, which incidentally, Mr. Chairman, is another subject—

Mr. Deachman: Would the hon. member permit a question with regard to a point he has made?

Mr. McCutcheon: As soon as I conclude my remarks I will be happy to answer questions from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Deachman: This is just a factual point. I think he made an error, and I believe the hon. member might like to explain it if I am incorrect. He said that the bill would create any number—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. Does the hon. member for Lambton-Kent wish to accept the question?

Mr. McCutcheon: I told the hon. gentleman I would be prepared to accept questions from him at the conclusion of my remarks. I only have 20 minutes. I was saying that under our system of representation—

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Jerome: A point of privilege, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The hon. member for Sudbury on a point of privilege.

Mr. Jerome: In his contribution to the debate on this clause, the hon. member has said that any number of ministries of state may be created or any number of ministers of state may be appointed. Clause 17 of the bill reads:

> The Governor in Council shall not, pursuant to section 14, establish ministries of state so that there are more than five such ministries in existence at any one time.

I wonder if the hon. member would not admit that this does not provide for "any number" but provides for a specific number only and that he would be in error—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): I think the hon. member is entitled to make his contribution, and if any other hon. member wants to deny his allegations or correct them it can be done in a future speech.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, this intervention is typical and is just a stalling tactic. I would refer the hon. gentleman to the remarks I have made, and I would further refer him to clause 23 to see how that relates to the clause he quoted. But may I continue?

Our system of representation has given the government a majority, but I would like hon. members opposite to remember that in the 1968 election, 4,375,115 people voted against this government while 3,609,539 voted for it. I ask, therefore, who has the greatest responsibility, government members or members in opposition who have tried their best to represent the majority? I say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the hon. members opposite, "Don't be so cocksure of yourselves; remember you don't have the divine right to rule." We on this side of the House represent a lot of people as well.

Last Thursday night, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Kitchener made a spirited intervention in this debate. His remarks in support of this section of the bill can be found on page 4835 of Hansard. He said, "Patronage is very evident in the province of Ontario." He went on to say that he also supported a private members' bill, submitted by the hon. member for Cochrane, providing for the appointment of Members of Parliament to boards and commissions. The government whip, and I am delighted to see in the House, in an effort to assist his colleague as all good whips do, posed the following question as recorded at page 4835:

> Is he aware that according to press reports, of all the members on the government side of the Ontario legislature only eight fail to receive additional income above and beyond their $12,000 emolument? This is in the last fiscal year.

That is not a defence of this bill, Mr. Chairman, but it seems to me that it was meant to point out that since there is supposed to be patronage in another jurisdiction it must be all right to have it here as well.

Mr. Francis: Could I ask the hon. member a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. McCutcheon: Just as soon as I finish my remarks. I ask hon. members opposite, do they approve of this in Ontario or any other place? Do they condone this practice? If they think it is wrong in Ontario, why do they support it here? Two wrongs don't make a right.

Look at what will happen to members of Parliament in the future. A move is under way to move members down to the Commonwealth building, and why? Plans are being made to have Parliament taken over by an elite. When a rubber stamp vote is required a bell will ring and members will climb on the bus which will run every three minutes. I think the Commonwealth building should be renamed Eunuch Hall.

To return to my point, Mr. Chairman, is this a bill to appoint five new ministers or six, or could it be 50 or 60? There is no reference in this clause to parliamentary secretaries or deputy ministers. Does clause 20 refer to deputy ministers or parliamentary secretaries? If it refers to deputy ministers, where do they come from and where do they go later? Are the ones who are let go those for whom we made a provision for extra pension payments in another clause of this bill? And where do we get the expertise—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, the hon. gentleman's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to keep the floor very long but nevertheless, I have a few remarks to make concerning the legislation now before us, Bill C-207.

I also wish to say, like my hon. friend from Lambton-Kent (Mr. McCutcheon), that there is no need for me to apologize for taking up the House's time, for it is my duty to my constituents to speak in this debate.

I am quite convinced that Bill C-207, if it becomes law, will imply wasteful expenditures and for this reason, I think it is my duty to oppose it.

To me, this bill is like a grab bag of the kind you can buy in any drugstore. It looks good from the outside but you are disappointed when you open it, in the same way as we are disappointed when we read clause 14 in particular.

The opposition is quite justified in doing everything in their power to block the passage of this piece of legislation.

I can easily understand the anxiety of government members who feel they meet the required qualifications to be entrusted with extra duties. But at any rate, let us not forget that Bill C-207 reflects the kind of arrogance and uncompromisingness so typical of this government's actions.

• (4:40 p.m.)

This is why I want to congratulate warmly my hon. friend from Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) who on several occasions has drawn the House's attention to the deficiencies of this legislation.

I was hoping that the government apprentice whip would have learned something but I think he is a desperate case and that the best he can do is to speak from time to time in an unintelligible fashion.

Mr. Chairman, with Bill C-207, the government is trying to get carte blanche to administer public affairs without consulting the House. If 264 members have been elected by the Canadian people it is to protect them against the extravagances of this government.

I cannot see why our friends opposite do not stand up in larger numbers to defend this legislation. Only a few of them stood up to congratulate the government or to have their presence noted or through loyalty toward their leader so that they be remembered when promotions are distributed.

After a quick study of the measure before us, one can but conclude that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) would like to increase the number of ministers from 29 to 34, and that of parliamentary secretaries from 16 to 34.

Considering the additional expenses those proposals imply, it is thousands and thousands of dollars that taxpayers will have to pay for such extravagance and the wish to reward the more or less deserving members of government.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that more thought should be given to that matter. It is becoming obvious through press reports as well as radio and television news that the people are beginning to resent that measure.

There could perhaps be another explanation to the proposal before us now. I think it is a roundabout way of rewarding Liberal members only since it is a known fact that during the last election many of them who were not sure of running were promised that the M.P.'s emoluments would be at least $24,000.

In view of ever-increasing pressures, members of the cabinet probably concluded that the best thing to do was to introduce the bill before us now, so as to increase the number of parliamentary secretaries and ministers of state.

Some of my colleagues said self-assuredly, I believe, that almost 140 Liberal members would thus be rewarded during a government's tenure of office. In other words very few would be unable to get a piece of the pie the Prime Minister wants to give his supporters.

Mr. Chairman, one may recall that when this omnibus bill was introduced, Mr. Speaker mentioned that perhaps the limit had been reached concerning the introduction of omnibus bills in this House.

I should not like to condemn Bill C-207 as a whole.

This legislation surely contains provisions that are on the point of being enacted and I do not see why this government insists on having the whole bill adopted at the present time. If the government listened to reason and simply withdrew clause 14, this legislation would be adopted very quickly.

I must remark that people do not readily understand why in Canada, where the population is about 21 million, this government should try to multiply the positions of ministers and parliamentary secretaries, whereas much larger countries, for instance, the United States and Great Britain, tend to consolidate their departments in order to make them more efficient.

The government stated that this measure was designed to ensure better administration. Judging from the way this government is running state affairs, one cannot help but conclude that more confusion will result. A greater number of people will have to deal with such and such a problem, which will create confusion. Instead of providing the Canadian people with the more effective and decentralized administration which government members seem to want so much, we will have just the contrary.

Just like other opposition members, I can only recommend to the government that they withdraw the bill under study or at least clause 14. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) may rest assured that should he do so, this measure would quickly be passed.

Those, Mr. Chairman, were the few remarks I wanted to make with respect to Bill C-207.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, one of the interesting announcements contained in the Speech from the Throne on Thursday, October 8, is the following paragraph:

> To foster coordination of the activities of all levels of government, and to contribute to sound urban growth and development, the Government proposes the re-organization of its urban activities under the direction of a Minister of State for Urban Affairs and Housing.

In reply to my question of March 17 with regard to the ministries of state that would be set up, the Prime Minister stated:

> —we would wish to have a minister of state designated for the purpose of looking at housing and urban affairs.

This is the only opportunity that hon. members, including the former mayor of Toronto who have a great interest in housing and urban affairs, have to say what they think should be included in a ministry of state for housing and urban affairs or, as stated in the Speech from the Throne, urban affairs and housing. Hon members should not miss the opportunity of speaking on housing at this time. Once we have a fait accompli, that is once the ministry is established, it will be very difficult to get any laws changed. Perhaps this illustrates the fundamental weakness of the legislation with regard to the point I have made twice before and will again several times.

As elected representatives of the people, we will not be permitted to get a point of view across if we tame the swell of the ocean by the creation of these ministries of state without anticipating what kind of ministry will be set up. Once the debate is over, we will no longer have an opportunity and Parliament will have lost a great deal more of the strength it once had to react to the views of the people. I make no apology for speaking briefly on this subject. I will be brief because we must go on to other matters at five o'clock, matters which I look forward to with a great deal of interest. I have to attend a committee meeting this evening, so I will have to finish my speech on housing at a later date.

This is the only opportunity for a full-scale housing debate. We must state what the function should be of this reorganized ministry. I presume that the Prime Minister and the government have more in mind than a minister without portfolio reporting to this House on behalf of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In view of the thrust and push of urban problems, there has to be something more. Parliament authorizes the spending of a great deal of money out of the federal treasury to deal with the housing problems of Canada. Therefore, we must have a great deal more say with regard to the policies and programs on which this money will be spent.

The Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities today presented a thoughtful brief to the federal government. It suggested that the near total freeze on urban renewal spending be lifted. There should be some discussion on this matter in this chamber. Are the mayors right in making that suggestion to the minister without portfolio in charge of housing? They suggest that the federal role be largely a funding operation and that the policies with regard to the spending of the money be made with provincial and municipal cooperation. Do we want to hand over vast amounts of money without stating how the money should be spent? That is an important policy question. It is something we have to discuss before this ministry is set up. There are other suggestions, but I cannot state them all in the minute that remains.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

Business of the House

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—External Affairs—Disbanding Commonwealth Committee on Indian Ocean security—Request for statement; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland)—The Canadian Economy—Possible sale of McClelland and Stewart publishing firm to foreign interests; the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Denial of Canadian television programs to Windsor station.

OUTLINE OF GOVERNMENT ORDERS TO BE CALLED—PROCEDURE IN PRIVATE MEMBERS HOUR

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could state the order of business. There are a number of points. Following private members hour, it is our intention to proceed at eight o'clock this evening with government order No. 8, Bill C-3, the Investment Companies Act. This will be followed by government order No. 43, Bill S-5, dealing with weights and measures. Following those items, we will return this evening to Bill C-207 in committee stage. Tomorrow, we will begin with government order No. 50, the textile measure. Following that, we will again return to the committee of the whole stage on Bill C-207.

With respect to this hour, Mr. Speaker, on Friday afternoon there was some discussion about the possibility of dealing with Bill S-11 on the basis of the uanimous consent of the House to refer that bill to the committee following second reading. With the consent of the House, it is now agreed that we do that with the exception that a speaker will be heard on that subject. If hon. members are in agreement, following that we will withdraw the bill standing in the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters), Bill C-24, which deals with the same subject matter, but the subject matter of the bill will be referred to the same standing committee at the same time. Following those items, we will then revert to the regular order of business for this hour, the notice of motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Pell South (Mr. Chappell), notice of motion No. 25.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): That was one of the better speeches of the day, Mr. Speaker. We accept it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) has clearly stated what has been agreed. I assume agreement to this program carries with it an assurance that when I move for the reference of the subject matter of Bill C-24, after we dispose of the government's bill about rainmaking, the necessary unanimous consent will be forthcoming, it being understood that no speeches will be made at that point.

[The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard).]

• (5:00 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the House agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

WEATHER MODIFICATION IDENTIFICATION ACT

PROVISION FOR OBTAINING OF INFORMATION CONCERNING ACTIVITIES

Hon. C. M. Drury (for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry) moved that Bill S-11, to provide for the obtaining of information respecting weather modification activities, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I insisted on speaking about Bill S-11 for the purpose of giving the House a few explanations about the problems which might rise from this bill.

In 1964, I was the first member in this House to raise the question of cloud seeding. I was the laughing stock of other members and of the press in general. I would like to quote what was written in Le Droit of October 23, 1964:

> The House of Commons has certainly been the scene of some unusual questions recently. The Créditiste member for Chapleau, Mr. Laprise, carried the day for ingenuity yesterday, by asking the Prime Minister whether the government authorized the irresponsible people who are seeding clouds.
> The members, who were intrigued at first, smiled feebly. And as the member for Chapleau insisted on the importance of his question, quoting La Terre de chez nous and La Frontière of Rouyn, they could not refrain from laughing. The speaker of the House, with the seriousness of his functions, suggested that the question be put on the order paper.
> Then the Prime Minister, visibly taken by surprise and about to burst with laughter like more and more of the members, promised to enquire.
> Taking offence, the member for Lapointe rushed to his colleague's help and stated with an incensed taxpayer's voice that this practice of seeding clouds had brought about so much rain in the Lake St. John area that all the crops failed. Again, renewed gales of laughter. Mr. Gregoire, determined not to give up, explained that if city-dwellers did not take this seriously, peasants were fed up with getting their hair wet. He solicited the government's attention.

So they laughed at me. I was practically called an imbecile, a madman and I am glad to see today that the Senate has become just as mad as I was in 1964, since they are introducing Bill S-11 titled "An Act to provide for the obtaining of information respecting weather modification activities."

So, there it is, they want to modify the weather. The concept is taken for granted. In fact, private enterprise and scientists employed by Mr. Bernard Power, owner of the Montreal firm Weather Engineering, have been doing research and development for a long time designed to produce rain or snow. I would not be surprised if the heavy precipitation experienced in areas such as Montreal, Quebec and even Hull-Ottawa last winter was the results of such physical or chemical experiments.

Clause 2 (b) of the bill states:

"Weather modification activity" includes any action designed or intended to produce, by physical or chemical means, changes in the composition or dynamics of the atmosphere for the purpose of increasing, decreasing or suppressing hail or lightning, or dissipating fog or cloud.

There now, Senator Paul Martin has become a socialist: We know how this government has found means of imposing direct taxation on private income, indirect taxes in order to redistribute wealth; it takes money from some individuals to give it to others. I think that is precisely the role of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) to redistribute wealth. Now, rain is to be redistributed, precipitations are to be redistributed; nature is going to be socialized.

I do not mean that I am against scientific research, but this research should not be conducted at the expense of people, as it was noted during the years 1958 to 1965. In 1964, the Prime Minister of Canada was quite surprised to learn that tests could be conducted on cloud seeding. Either the minister was ill-informed or did not want to give explanations or information about it because some time later, I put questions on the order paper to throw some light on the subject.

According to the answers I was given by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport in 1966, the federal government sponsored experiments on the seeding of clouds from 1959 to 1963. In 1964, the Prime Minister knew nothing about it or pretended not to know anything.

The Progressive Conservative government sponsored such experiments from 1959 to 1963. During those five years, such experiments cost some $607,000,099.23 the Canadian taxpayer. What purposes did they serve? They increased rainfall by 15 to 20 per cent in some areas of Quebec, mainly Abitibi and Lake St. John, and in the Timiskaming riding in Ontario.

Not only was the federal government making and sponsoring such experiments, but so was the government of the province of Quebec at the same time. Owing to losses caused by such rainfalls, the UCC got in touch with and made representations to the government of the province of Quebec, particularly to the Minister of Natural Resources, Mr. René Lévesque. According to that organization, in 1964 losses to farmers in the Abitibi constituency alone exceeded $1 million.

In 1964, it rained in Abitibi for 69 consecutive days. It was not a very heavy rain, but when rain falls every day needless to say that the soil gets soggy and there comes a time even a light rainfall will have harmful effects.

On May 14, 1965, Mr. René Lévesque, another one who wanted to "socialize" the weather, and who is today the leader of the Parti Québécois, turned down requests from the residents of the Lake St. John area. He had received, at that time, a petition signed by 60,000 women and requesting that these experiments be ended. Mr. Lévesque answered: No, there is no question of stopping the cloud seeding.

In June 1965, Mr. Lévesque was forced to change his decision, and he "ordered" rain to stop falling in the Lac Saint-Jean area. This minister could control elements by allowing or asking firms such as Weather Engineering to practice cloud seeding, so as to bring about precipitation. So, Mr. René Lévesque ordered rain to stop falling, so that, during the summer of 1965, in the Lake St. John and Abitibi regions, the people might enjoy 90 days of sunshine.

Mr. Speaker, if governments dare meddle with the weather,—science has advanced enough today to achieve some success—and if they do it at the expense of populations, we do not agree. That is why we made a great fuss at the time and brought pressure to bear in order to have those tests stopped.

Those who want to make those tests should go where there are no people to harm. I have here a letter addressed to my colleague from Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) and signed by Mr. J. P. Lalonde, secretary of the Air Transport Committee, which refers to a request of the Royalair Company Limited.

The company was asking for a licence of what was then called "air control operations". Those people did not want to talk about rainmaking operations to avoid alarming the population.

In his letter, Mr. Lalonde includes the ruling of the Air Transport Committee explaining cloud seeding in detail. A solution of silver iodide is used, or else "Weathercord" bombs, invented by Weather Engineering, are dropped from an aircraft into the clouds to be seeded. Part of the ruling reads as follows:

The seeding services are ensured by the applicant...

...Royalair Ltd...

...jointly with the Montreal company known as Weather Engineering Services Limited, hereinafter called Weather Engineering. The object of cloud seeding operations is to increase rain—or snow-falls.

That is the purpose of the operation. That is why I am wondering whether, this last winter, there may not have been cloud seeding operations which increased considerably the snow-fall in several areas. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prevent Bill S-11 from being referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry for detailed consideration, but I simply wish to say why it is necessary to pay special attention to a matter of which many are not aware yet, and which is very important. The bill simply requires that companies wishing to make such experiments must obtain a permit, a licence, and in the explanatory note of the bill introduced by the hon.

member for Timiskaming (M. Peters), namely Bill C-24 there is the following comment:

Following the advent of rainmaking equipment and its commercial use which may infringe on the rights of others; it appears that control licensing and regulations must be adapted to protect the public and make possible the payment of compensation where damage is deemed to result from such use.

I think that the hon. member for Timiskaming goes further than the hon. Senators, because he asks that, if losses are caused by this research, the ones suffering these losses be at least reimbursed.

Mr. Speaker, we know that the government of Quebec, through Hydro-Quebec, through lumber companies, carries out or has carried out such research. We know that the federal government had this kind of research carried out for five years which was, indeed, very expensive. We want closer supervision in that field. The fact requiring permits for experiments of this kind is not sufficient, in my opinion, and we should prevent these experiments above territories occupied by the Canadian people.

Those are the remarks I wanted to make on the matter, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

THE RAINMAKING ACT

MEASURE TO GOVERN, LICENSE AND REGULATE THE OPERATION OF RAINMAKING EQUIPMENT

On the order: Public Bills

October 20, 1970—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of Bill C-24, an act to govern, license and regulate the operation of rainmaking equipment in Canada—Mr. Peters.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the understanding that we had at five o'clock, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

That the order for the second reading of Bill C-24, an act to govern, license and regulate the operation of the rainmaking equipment in Canada, be discharged and that the subject matter of the said bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

This is the public bill which appears as order No. 2 on today's order paper in the name of the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). The purpose of the motion is to refer the subject matter of the bill to the same committee to which the bill from the Senate has just been referred.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

[Mr. Laprise.]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we are quite willing to do this. My only comment, in view of the terms of the government organization bill, is to ask why it is necessary to do this. I would have thought the government would simply include a clause that the government control the weather by regulation; then we would not need to do what we are doing now.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): If we accept the motion, of course, it would be clearly understood it is the subject matter and not the bill itself that is going to the committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is what the motion says.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the pleasure of the House to accept the motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

BROADCASTING

REQUEST FOR THIRD VHF TELEVISION STATION IN TORONTO

Mr. Hyl Chappell (Peel South) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should, pursuant to authority in the Broadcasting Act, consider the advisability of directing the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to hold a public hearing in order that it may consider the possibility of the establishment of a third VHF Television Station in Toronto, and if possible select a suitable applicant in order to provide better service for the three million people in the greater Metro Toronto listening area.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this motion would require the government to direct the CRTC, pursuant to the authority in the Broadcasting Act, to widen the terms of its public hearing, set for September 1971, in order that it might determine the best way to meet the need for better television service in the Metro Toronto area. Any decision based upon the stated terms of the inquiry would do little to improve a very bad situation, would disregard a likely solution and would lock out correction for some years to come.

Metro Toronto should and could have a third VHF-TV channel, independently owned and non-network, and centrally located so as to provide the whole metro area with adequate coverage of general news, political happenings, candidates and cultural activities which it now lacks.

Toronto will not get such a locally oriented VHF channel unless the terms of the public hearing are widened so that applicants may demonstrate how this service can be given. A VHF station located as far away as Paris, Ontario, as the terms of the public inquiry would now require, would not provide the quality of service nor the total coverage which is essential. The proposed UHF—ultra high frequency or shorter range—channels, one French and one English, to be considered at the same hearing, even if economically feasible, would provide limited or pocket coverage only.

Metro Toronto will not have the benefit of such a widened and full hearing essential to obtaining this locally oriented station with complete coverage unless Toronto business, elected representatives and the public demand it. The cable TV supplement in most of the area and in particular in Mississagua, in my riding, is not available and where it is available is expensive. This proposed truly Metro Toronto station would eliminate the need and thus the cost of cable television for many. All of Metropolitan Toronto will not have cable TV service for years to come. In Mississagua alone, over 100,000 have been waiting for over two years for a hearing to extend the existing service. This new station would provide a most desired coverage quickly and at no cost to the public.

The relatively poor television service for the Toronto area, and the confusion and mystery which surround the whole subject, arise from the fact that there has never been a public hearing for the purpose of establishing just what can and should be done in order to improve the service. In this day of public participation, it is not right that the CRTC should, within the confines of its own office, decide what channels are available for what areas and then hold a public hearing to establish what applicant should obtain the licence. The hearing should also be directed as to what channels might be made available and what can be done to improve the over-all service. In expropriation cases, a department of government must submit to a hearing as to whether it has selected the proper site, which of course invites representation as to more suitable ones. It would not be acceptable for a department of government to say a decision has been made as to what land is to be taken but the public will be allowed to come forward and suggest what may be built on it. A public hearing, confined to the selection of an applicant, falls far short of establishing what is the real need in the area and the means of answering or fulfilling the need. The hearing, as set for September, should be widened and include the consideration of the return of channel 13 to Toronto.

For its vast viewing audience of perhaps four million people, Toronto has the poorest TV service in North America. Other large centres including Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo and Cleveland, all smaller than Toronto, have three VHF stations. Montreal has four, two French and two English. Toronto has two. By international treaty in 1948, Toronto was alloted three channels but subsequently, in the early 1950's, the CBC—then the governing body—traded channel 13 away to Kitchener and Rochester. The two Toronto Channels, CFTO and CBLT, are the flagship stations of the national networks, CTV and CBC, and because of their national obligations they cannot devote much time to local news and public service. Although they cover happenings in Toronto, by the nature of their network commitments it is generally the type of incident thought to be of national rather than local interest.

Because the choice to the Toronto viewers has been so limited, many residents in Toronto, perhaps 50 per cent, have turned to Buffalo and other United States border cities for selection. While enjoying this United States entertainment, they are inflicted with news and comment on both the local and national scale of United States happenings. Many residents of the Toronto area are more aware of United States political developments than Canadian. As a result, they are disadvantaged and cannot be completely informed or in tune with the Canadian scene. Both Canadian and United States advertisers confirm the immensity of the Toronto viewing audience enjoyed by the Buffalo and Rochester stations. It is said that Canadian advertisers spend approximately $13 million a year in United States border stations. I believe about half of this is from the Toronto area.

Toronto-based firms advertise over Buffalo stations because they cannot obtain time on either of our national networks. United States firms, with subsidiaries based in Toronto, advertise over these same United States stations for the same reasons. Very little, if any, local Toronto advertising is carried by either of the Toronto network stations. It would seem that enough advertising is diverted to Buffalo and Rochester to carry a local independent station which would cover all of the Metro Toronto area. Ontario dollars cross the border in this everincreasing flood and in return we in the Toronto area get United States comment and opinion. While we support these United States stations with our advertising dollars and are exposed to their news comment and opinion, many aspects of our community life are unreported and thus are lost from the Canadian scene.

The Toronto area with its many cultures and activities represents a tremendous source of program material and talent. An independent and truly Toronto VHF station would provide opportunities for this talent and would make a substantial contribution to program production. This would go a long way toward offsetting the United States cultural penetration into southern Ontario. We have the programming material, the advertisers to pay for it and the desire to listen to and watch our own culture. Should we not demand it?

At one time Canadians spent more time listening to United States radio than their own. As more Canadian stations were licensed, listening to United States stations diminished to practically nothing. The same could and should apply to TV. With the licensing of the second TV network station in Toronto in the early 1960's, United States viewing by Toronto residents dropped from 70 per cent to 50 per cent. As was demonstrated in the case of radio, a third channel would make a substantial further reduction with a saving of Toronto dollars and an immense boost to our culture and morale. In 1967 an application was filed for an independent Toronto station by CFRB. The Board of Broadcast Governors had earlier stated that if someone could find a way they would entertain an application for such a station. By a series of moves, CRFB found a way to return channel 13 to Toronto which is now used by Kitchener and Rochester. The moves were: (1) a CBC repeater in Haliburton to be moved from channel 5 to 4; (2) CBLT—CBC Toronto—to be moved from channel 6 to 5; (3) CKCO-TV Kitchener to be moved from channel 13 to 6; (4) WROC-TV Rochester to be moved from channel 13 to 6.

The applicant had the necessary agreement from each station involved and the Department of Transport gave approval from a technical standpoint. In June, 1967, when the Board of Broadcast Governors gave its decision on the application to transfer the Barrie station, channel 3, to Toronto, it commented on the CFRB proposal as follows:

> The board advised the minister that at the public hearing announced for November, 1967, the board would wish to hear an application from CFRB Limited for the use of channel 13 in Toronto, provided the application is forwarded to the board by the Department of Transport, as a technically acceptable application, in time for the November hearing.

As a condition to obtaining such a hearing for the return of channel 13 to Toronto, CFRB offered to hold their agreements with the other stations involved in trust, for the successful applicant, and in addition it offered to set up a chain of UHF stations throughout southern Ontario and to support them financially until they were economically strong enough to become independent.

On April 1, 1968, the CRTC replaced the BBG and on December 10, 1968, the CRTC wrote to CFRB returning their application with the simple comment, that channel 13 had not been allocated for use in Toronto. So without a hearing, without considering CFRB's proposal in detail, and without giving any reasons, the CRTC reversed the position of the Board of Broadcast Governors and denied this service to Toronto.

Recently the CRTC announced that it will hold hearings in Toronto on three kinds of proposals: for channel 6, southwest of Toronto and in the Belleville area; for an English language UHF station in Toronto, and for the CBC, a UHF French language station in Toronto.

From the information which I have received, south of Toronto means in the Paris, Ontario, area and even with extra and expensive gadgets on aerials only a part of the Toronto area would be covered, and with an uncertain signal. This is not good enough. Because of the urgent need for this local Toronto station, which in a sense would be for central-southern Ontario, I ask that the CRTC be directed to widen the terms of the hearing so as to ascertain whether channel 13 can be returned to Toronto and, if it can be, to choose an applicant to provide such service.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have listened carefully to the comments of the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell) in support of his motion concerning the radio and television situation in the city of Toronto. I agree with and endorse fully his remarks about U.S. intervention into that market, about Canadian content and about the needs of that important city, and about the three million residents of the city who are indeed a considerable number and not by any means an insignificant force in Canadian politics today.

While I sympathize with him as a Toronto member and with his desire to do more for his people, I have to take a totally opposite tack and suggest that while the consideration of the needs of the people of the city of Toronto is a very valid one for those who come from there, it is important that this chamber understand as well that there is a vast land beyond the limits of that city. The people who reside in the other parts of the country—and I represent a substantial city that falls within that category—have come to feel that all the regulations imposing restrictions on radio listening or television viewing, on Canadian content, and so on, apply to them more than the privileged people who live within a few miles of the U.S. border. They are meant not for those who live in Montreal, Toronto and all cities that lie along the U.S.-Canadian border, but they impose hardship for those of us whose residence happens to be so far from the border that we cannot get U.S. programs by the simple expedient of putting a special antenna on our roof. The result is that people in my constituency, and they are typ cal of people in many other cities, feel that they are treated in a second-class manner. We feel that we are being treated as second-class citizens in this respect.

I am a supporter of the chairman of the CRTC and recognize that he has a very difficult task to carry out. I believe that Pierre Juneau is doing a thorough, conscientious and courageous job in that capacity and so are the members of his commission. I support their motivations in respect of Canadian content. I also believe in them and support their endeavours respecting the very necessary policy of regulatory control on cable television and community antenna systems which are part of the technology being adopted for the future of this country. Our failure to control technology will cause us dismay and disgrace in years to come, because technology will control us if we do not control it.

I accept the difficulties that they experience and the time they have to take to formulate a policy of control. But I say to them that while they are doing that task, they must remember that a great many of our citizens find themselves close to the U.S. border and therefore in a situation where, without regard to the policies, motivations or controls of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, they are receiving all the programming they can handle. People who are far from the border cannot receive these programs; they are dependent on the commission to bring programs to them. That is a viewpoint which does not seem to be adequately heard in the circles in which it needs to be heard.

The motion that is before us this afternoon is a typical one, namely, that the board should be holding hearings in the city of Toronto to expand the service there. I say that the service in Toronto is already adequate if not more than adequate. What the commissioners should be doing is concentrating all their efforts on getting on with the policy of controlling cable diffusion of broadcasting signals. They should examine the situation in my constituency where, for example, until a short time ago there was only one television station—Canada's first privately-owned television station, CKSO.

I say that a television station operating in a monopoly position in Sudbury amply demonstrates that they are worthy of praise in the operation of their station. They have done, and continue to do, a first-class job. Only after many complicated hearings and a rather complicated formula for which I congratulate the commission, has it been possible within the last two years to resolve the problem so that a second service could be introduced to Sudbury. Now the Conrad-Lavigne interest in Timmins will provide the CBC network coverage in Sudbury, while CKSO will provide the private network coverage in the area. This is a very laudable solution and I support it.

But the people of Sudbury are pressing for a choice of more and more viewing all the time and a method has to be found to expand the formula under which the commission brought a second service to the area while respecting the rights of the existing operators. Under that kind of formula the commission should be searching to bring some kind of cable system into all areas of the country like Sudbury, where viewers up to now have been content with one channel but are now looking forward to a second channel and, naturally, want more. They want what other Canadians along the U.S. border have had for several years without regard to regulatory policy.

There are two English radio stations in Sudbury, Mr. Speaker, providing both AM and FM service, and one French speaking station. But here again, the people want more. There is pressure to have a CBC radio station established in Sudbury, but the answer has always been that the traffic does not warrant it. There is no cable service. For years it was felt that the introduction of cable would prejudice the introduction of a second Canadian TV channel. I urge the commission to go all out in an attempt to find a formula whereby cable service can be introduced without undue prejudice to the existing operators.

One third of Sudbury is French speaking, and this proportion is higher in the environs of Sudbury. French speaking viewers have access to a relay station in the CBC network but there is no local programming. I would like the CRTC to explore ways of introducing this service to Sudbury and the more remote areas. I am sure residents of the city of Toronto already have a choice of all the viewing they can handle.

Dealing with radio, Mr. Speaker, a short time ago the last of the radio operators to carry ethnic programs in their various native languages took those programs off the air because he could not afford the effect they had on his earnings. It was not so much a question of the advertising revenue during the hour that the programs were broadcast, but the listener ratings were affected and this reduced his earnings for the whole of the programming. As a result, the various ethnic groups have since been asking, "Surely there is some way whereby we can be provided with our native language programs which we enjoy so much. Surely these programs cannot harm many other people." Those programs were broadcast on Sunday mornings and not during prime time. On behalf of all the people in the city of Sudbury, I say to hon. members of this chamber and through them to the people of the city of Toronto, please remember our complaints. But we in turn must remember that some areas of the country have no television service yet and those people are lucky to have even one radio station.

Again I congratulate the CRTC for the job it is doing in trying to provide service. The commission has worked hard. As I say, it has found a formula for the introduction of a second channel to Sudbury, something we have been trying to get for 15 years. Now I frankly say to the commission: Never mind Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver. Direct all your time and attention to Sudbury and similar regions throughout the country. Mr. Speaker, I know that other hon. members wish to take part in the debate. In conclusion, I repeat that in my view the CRTC has been doing a good job. It should continue to do so, and I urge it to give top priority, not to areas that are next to the U.S. border but to the Sudburies of Canada where its attention is badly needed.

Mr. Robert Borrie (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) has just made my speech. I can appreciate the intention and the principle of the hon. member's motion. To me it is symptomatic of the frustrations all members of this House, indeed the public, share in attempting to influence and understand the purpose, action, or lack of action, of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. In my humble opinion, it appears that the commission is not staying abreast of the desires of television viewing audiences. If it were, there would be no need for the hon. member's motion.

I admit that the CRTC is faced with many and varied problems, but I would suggest its problems could be somewhat lessened by the immediate adoption of fixed public interest policies which would provide stability in the broadcasting industry. At the moment the public and licensed operators are kept in a continuous state of agitation. What decision will emanate from on high next? With recent precedents from which we may judge, Mr. Speaker, your guess is as good as mine.

If I were considering entry into any endeavour, the last I would choose would be television. There is no established policy to guide an applicant. The hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell) may through his motion gain a hearing in Toronto, but I question whether an applicant would appear before the commission. If an applicant did appear and proved acceptable, he would likely be advised that a short-term licence would be issued but no guarantee would be given that the terms of the licence would not be changed.

Television equipment and manpower are expensive commodities. The person or syndicate entering or expanding in the industry must be given an opportunity to make a fair return on the investment required. However, with present conditions and over-all control of the media, private enterprise may be forced to the wall. As a taxpayer and a legislator I am not prepared to accept the burden of state control and state operation of the media.

My last remark may be considered by some to be an exaggeration, Mr. Speaker. It is. It is intended to be just that. My reason for the statement is an attempt to awaken Parliament, and the minister responsible for the CRTC, to a creeping paternalism that instead of improving quality may choke it completely. Imagination and originality are hard to foster when you are being throttled by regulation and more regulation. As control of the broadcasting media becomes more stringent, the possibility of state financial involvement increases. Restriction is not being exercised only by the CRTC. We are being asked by the hon. member for Peel South to direct the CRTC to hold hearings for the purpose of possible establishment of a third VHF outlet there.

There have been pronouncements that the House may soon be asked to abolish tobacco advertising on television and radio. If we support that move, where do the media make up the loss of revenue? I do not object to the intent of possible legislation, Mr. Speaker; all I ask is that the entire means of communicating tobacco advertising be treated equally.

As much as I sympathize with the hon. member's motion, I regret that I will not be able to support it. Policy decisions regarding the direction of television to Canadians residing in the central and northern reaches of the country prevent me from being generous to those who already have sufficient outlets to cater to their entertainment and educational needs. Television outlets are desired and required in many localities in my own constituency. Indeed, there are residents at McBride and Valemount, short distances from microwave, who would most happily accept one outlet. Efforts to interest CBC in extending service from Jasper, Alberta, for the few miles into the two localities in British Columbia continue to be met with study after study.

Dissatisfaction is also being experienced at Fort Nelson where the CBC frontier package fails to provide all-round acceptable programming. Until these inequalities are overcome—which are also part of the commission's responsibility—I would not favour a hearing as proposed in the motion. I could be easily swayed if the hon. member would support extension of television services to regions not as densely populated as those near the 49th parallel.

There is considerable concern, Mr. Speaker, about the role being fulfilled by the CRTC. When an hon. member must resort to bringing Parliament's attention to a situation which automatically should be resolved by terms of reference to the CRTC through the Broadcasting Act, it is not surprising that the public takes strong exception to recent proclamations of policy regarding Canadian content. Those of us who choose to live miles north of the 49th parallel are prevented from receiving broadcast entertainment of comparable value to our southern counterparts. We who are developing our country far from densely populated regions of Canada must forgo many material benefits, and the arbitrary regulations imposed on CBC, our only television outlet in most cases, further limits our viewing pleasures.

CRTC policy of imposing exceptionally high Canadian content without consideration for population disparity is not acceptable. Proposals were published a year ago February 1, public hearings were held and from the announcement of finality by the commission we are led to believe that public input assisted deliberation. If this were the case, it appears to me that greater concessions would have been made. With the combined opinions of broadcasters, actors, writers, members of the public and Members of Parliament, why did the commission proceed with its uncompromising Canadian content policy? Speculation is only possible. Broadcasters were divided and accommodating in their presentations, but who could fault them? The licensing powers of the commission are exceptionally wilful. Writers and actors could be considered partisan, and Members of Parliament as political influence. In the case of the latter, Mr. Speaker, I suggest we know public opinion and are more prepared to cater to it.

Regulations adopted by CRTC are loading the dice against the broadcasting industry. No corresponding conditions are applied to magazines, newspapers, movies or billboards. Is this fair? Mind you, with some actions of the CRTC we cannot help but wonder if it ever intends to be fair. As may be seen from the hon. member's motion and my comments, I believe it is time a review of the commission's references was made, keeping in mind that public desires are of greater importance than has been shown to date by the present body.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, upon reading the hon. member's motion my first reaction was one of surprise. As an individual who spent considerable time in Toronto getting my university and legal education, it seems to me that if there is an area of the province with a surfeit of radio and television coverage, it is Toronto.

I was also surprised when I received a communication from my riding indicating that notwithstanding the fact we have two excellent radio stations in Sarnia and programs that can be picked up by antenna from London and Windsor, the feeling of parochial and local pride was such that the writer felt we should have a local station in the Sarnia area. It seems to me this is the kind of situation the CRTC is faced with, looking at what might be termed as parochial pride as against a legitimate need for television coverage requested by individuals.

I support the hon. member for Sudbury (Mr. Jerome) and the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell), who moved the motion, who indicated in their comments that initiative should be taken by the CRTC and that they should not be limited by the scope of an application. This is an area where direction might be given to the general public, particularly those who wish to establish independent stations. Without this kind of expertise and initiative we will be faced with the situation where a group with the money, power and know-how can have a surfeit of coverage and another part of the country will not have enough.

Because I support the hon. member's motion, not that a third station be established in Toronto but that there be a public hearing to decide whether such a station is necessary, I shall resume my seat, simply indicating that some initiative must be shown by the CRTC beyond the scope of an application.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately because of the shortage of time, largely occasioned by the very reasonable proposition put forward by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Jerome) that we deal with another item of business prior to this one, I do not have time to deal at length with the motion put forward in the name of the hon. member for Peel South (Mr. Chappell).

Rather than get into the substance of that, I should like to say in the minute that remains that some of the criticisms that have been levelled at the CRTC—and I have no doubt they are levelled in good faith—fail to point out that the CRTC is simply carrying the talks assigned to it by Parliament. When one speaks about hearings, the scope of hearings and Canadian content, the onus has to come back on this chamber because the CRTC is bound by an act of this Parliament known as the Broadcasting Act. When we speak about Canadian content and whether the CRTC is doing its job, I think it is important to do this in the context of our Broadcasting Act. It was we who decided what the broadcasting policy should be, and we are responsible for it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hour set aside for the consideration of private members' business has expired. Hon. members will have noticed that the matters presented during this hour were rather airborne: they dealt with weather modification activities and broadcasting. However, they did not attract very great numbers to participate and the flight was not a success. The pilot was not successful and probably should lose his licence.

The House will resume at eight o'clock with item No. 8, an act respecting investment companies.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INVESTMENT COMPANIES BILL

FILING OF STATEMENTS AND INFORMATION, QUALIFICATIONS AND DUTIES OF AUDITORS, TRANSFER OF SHARES, ETC.

Hon. C. M. Drury (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-3, respecting investment companies.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this bill was considered by the House earlier this session and following third reading on December 14, 1970, was referred to the other place. Having completed their consideration of the measure, their Honours recently gave third reading to the bill, incorporating amendments.

A detailed explanation of the purpose and intention of the bill was given when it was before the House for second reading and I am sure hon. members will join with me in not wishing all that detail to be repeated at this time. I propose to limit my remarks, therefore, to a brief outline of the amendments made to the bill in the Senate. At the outset it can be said that none of the amendments depart from the broad purposes or objectives of the proposed legislation. All are intended simply to clarify the existing provisions or, in some cases, to define more precisely the scope and application of the measure.

In this latter category, three distinct changes might be noted. Firstly, by virtue of an amendment to subclause 4 of clause 2, the concept of excluding from the scope of the legislation companies that are essentially industrial, commercial or manufacturing enterprises has been extended to include such of those companies that for one reason or another have one or more subsidiaries interposed between themselves and their actual operating subsidiaries. As the bill stood before amendment, not all such types of companies would have qualified technically for a statutory exemption and it would have been necessary for them to seek exemption individually from the minister. The government sees no objection to the extension of statutory exemptions contemplated by the amendment.

Secondly, the granting of statutory exemptions to companies that carry on an investment business exclusively on the basis of funds borrowed from Canadian chartered banks, formerly contained in clause 2(3) (d) of the bill, has been deleted although the minister's discretionary power to exempt such types of companies remains. This statutory exemption stemmed from the view that practically every company from time to time has occasion to borrow funds from banks in connection with its day to day operations and it was not considered necessary to bring all such companies under the legislation if, as it was thought, they were likely to be granted discretionary exemptions.

The Senate accepted the view that the automatic exclusion of such companies might possibly create a preferred position for the chartered banks vis-à-vis other financial institutions. The amendment is intended to remove any such possibility, and the government has no objection to what is essentially a change from a statutory to a discretionary form of exemption for all or most such companies.

Thirdly, clause 2(3) (d) has also been changed to specify an additional class of company entitled to a statutory exemption from the legislation. I refer to family investment companies that otherwise would fall under the act by reason only of the fact that they borrow funds from members of the immediate family of the principal shareholder. It was intended to exempt any such cases under the discretionary exemption provisions of the bill. It was subsequently suggested, however, that a relatively large number of companies would likely be involved and the amendment is intended to relieve all these companies of the necessity of seeking ministerial exemption. As the amendment does not alter the intended scope of the legislation, the government has no objection to it.

The other amendments made in the Senate are directed primarily toward clarification of the intents and purposes of the legislation. The definition of "business of investment" in clause 2(1) (b) has been slightly altered to make it clear that the use of borrowed funds to purchase investment real property includes the use of such funds to make improvements to investment real property. The application of the asset and borrowing tests in clause 2 has been clarified. A new subclause 6 has been added to clause 6 to relieve the auditor of an investment company of any liability to which he might otherwise be subject as a consequence of filing with the minister and the directors of a company pursuant to subclause 5 a report on matters affecting the well-being of the company that in his opinion require rectification.

Clause 9(5) was amended to provide an additional set of circumstances in which the minister might grant an exemption from the prohibition against investments and loans where there is a conflict of interest. Clause 15, restricting the power of a Canadian-controlled sales finance company to sell or dispose of its undertaking, was changed to apply only to the sale or absolute disposal of the whole or any substantial part thereof.

Clause 16 was amended to make it clear that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation may, in connection with its functions as a lender of last resort, employ only those funds made available to it from the consolidated revenue fund expressly for that purpose. Clause 32 was slightly altered by the replacement of the words "to ensure" by the words "necessary for" in relation to the authority of the Governor in Council to enact regulations to carry out the provisions of the act.

That completes my remarks concerning the amendments made to the bill in the other place. As I mentioned earlier, none of these affect the principal purposes and objectives of the measure and we are satisfied that the bill as amended will be an effective measure in filling the gap that now exists with respect to the supervision and inspection of financial institutions. In closing, I would like to thank members of both chambers, particularly those who served on the respective standing committees, for their efforts in improving this important legislation during its Parliamentary process.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I heard that automatic response from the back reaches of the government party. It indicates the attitude of some members with regard to legislation. The members responsible for that attitude should look at the chequered history of this bill. I do not know who was the misbegotten progenitor of the bill, but whoever was responsible for it must forever hide his head in shame.

This bill originated from the attitude of "big brotherism" that is so prevalent among certain ministers of the Crown. During the second reading debate on the bills, as recorded at page 576 of Hansard for October 26 I traced its rather nefarious and chequered history. I was going to say "unwanted" because it is really something that should be hidden.

There is a certain bar sinister in this particular bill. It first began as Bill S-17 in the other place during 1968-69. That was the time when the attitude was prevalent that this government had been elected to save the people. We saw what happened to the bill in the other place. When our confreres there got rid of Bill S-17, all that was left of it was the title clause. With the aid of their able counsel, they rewrote it from stem to gudgeon, but then nothing happened.

We dealt with the bill again last year. It came back to this House as Bill C-179. It actually got through second reading. Because the finance committee was preoccupied with the white paper on tax changes—another exercise in complete frustration for a lot of people—and because of the misbegotten ideas on the part of the government, the bill was referred to the justice committee. To the credit of my colleagues on the justice committee, they took one look at the bill, threw up their hands in disgust and tossed it in the wastebasket, never to resurrect it. There it died.

The bill is now before us in modified form as Bill C-3. It received second reading, went before the finance committee and there it received a number of amendments as a result of the efforts of government and opposition members. Ultimately it made its way to the other place. The net result is that further housekeeping has been carried out. Actually, it is more than just housekeeping because it tidies up a number of details of the bill that left many members of the Commons committee very uncomfortable as a result of hearings on this bill.

Although the representations from the public sector had justice on their side, there was no predisposition with regard to this particular section by government members and their advisers in the administration to pay any attention to the representations that were being made. However, like the ever-wearing drop of water, the further representations made before the Standing Committee on Finance had their effect. Therefore, we have the amendments before us.

I am not going to discuss the pros and cons of the amendments. I think they are all improvements to the bill. On behalf of the members of the official opposition, I am prepared to accept them to that extent. However, the history of this legislation has not been one of the more edifying experiences of this administration.

I want to refer to the current debate on another bill. There is a good deal of opposition to a lot of very bad thinking which is contained in Bill C-207. Government supporters seem to have shut their minds to any criticism, and this is another classic example. Bills that are bad in their origin, bad in their thinking, completely misbegotten and ill-drafted are still put forward as though they are works of art inspired by the greatest intelligence. It is as though they have been handed down on tablets of stone from on the mountain. For the umpteenth time the government is coming forward and saying, with its majority in the other place and its committees, that it has accepted further and further amendments. I am sure that if we started on another round, there would be further refinements.

This is a classic example of the advantage of taking a second look or even a third look at a proposition. If enough people expose the deficiencies of a particular measure, their arguments will finally be recognized: even people who were blind will see. If we take the original bill, S-17, and compare it with Bill C-3 as amended, the difference is like that between night and day. This does not say much for those in whose department the bill had its origin and it says even less for the cabinet committee which screened it. They must have been anticipating the holidays, or maybe the preoccupations of the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans), then the Postmaster General, took up most of the time of the cabinet. As hon. members know, this bill passed through its early stages at the time the Post Office was going through its travail.

In any event the cabinet committee which screened the bill certainly muffed it. Then it went to the Senate. The eminent members of that body saw how bad it was and rewrote everything but the title. Again it has been presented, I would say with a considerable amount of slapdash. This is one for the hopper. I cannot say I am overly impressed. We have now reached the stage at which representatives of the sales finance companies and Senators in the other place are, I suppose, reasonably satisfied that they can live with this legislation. All right. These amendments improve Bill C-3. It is better now than when we saw it and when we passed it, and I am therefore prepared to recommend the motion before us to my hon. friends.

As I say, this is a classic example of second and third thoughts improving legislation. I only hope the same process can be applied to Bill C-207, because I believe the paternity of that bill is suspect, the product is even worse and the participation in debate in this House from the other side has been non-existent, as though hon. members opposite wanted to put the whole thing away from them, using not a 10-foot pole but a great, long 30-foot rod to stand away from it. And so they should. They have learned a lesson from Bill C-3. Let them apply it to Bill C-207.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

Weights and Measures Act

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING UNITS OF MEASUREMENT, INSPECTION, OFFENCES, ETC.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): moved that Bill S-5, respecting weights and measures, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

Mr. Basford moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): On the surface, Mr. Speaker, this appears to be a fairly innocent piece of legislation. It is a companion bill to one we have already passed, a measure which is presently before the other place, Bill C-180 dealing with packaging and labelling.

In essence, the trend of the amendments to Bill S-5 is to bring the Weights and Measures Act into line with modern practices and, in certain instances, to prepare the way of the introduction into this country of the metric system. There are several new clauses which are deserving of mention before the legislation receives third and final reading. Clause 10(p) provides for the application of sections of the Weights and Measures Act to coin-operated vending machines, machines which are now in widespread use. One of the difficulties likely to arise in connection with this amendment, desirable and necessary though it is, appears to be lack of adequate enforcement. I do not believe there are enough inspectors in the department at the present time to enforce the provision.

This is one of the points about which concern was expressed in committee, taking account of the great number of coin-operated vending machines in existence in Canada, more particularly those dispensing soft drinks, coffee and that kind of thing. We hope the minister will be able to reassure us in this regard, because there are occasions upon which these machines do, in fact, defraud the public.

New ground is also covered in clauses 18 and 32 of the bill which deal with oil deliveries. An attempt is made to correct a fraudulent practice, one which we hope is not widespread but which does take place from time to time, that is to say, the robbing of the public by oil vendors who deliver fuel oil to homes. Perhaps I can best describe this practice by quoting from report No. 17 of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs as follows:

Mr. Anderson: . . . the practice of "riding the ticket" to which Mr. Basford referred earlier is the practice which we are trying to overcome.

"Riding the ticket" means that the operator of a fuel truck can insert a ticket iinto the printing mechanism of his meter, pull down a lever, and punch a zero on it. The ticket remains locked in the printing device until the delivery is completed and then, he pulls down the lever a second time and prints the total gallonage.

In other words, if the driver has an order to deliver 200 gallons of oil, in effect he can deliver only 150 gallons of oil, indicate that 200 gallons have been delivered on his meter and take the other 50 gallons for his own use or sell it elsewhere. This is a fraudulent practice that has crept into the delivery of fuel oil, one that requires regulation. In this regard we are worried whether or not the minister has enough inspectors on staff adequately to enforce the provisions of this amendment. We feel these inspectors are very necessary and essential in preventing the continuance of this type of practice.

There are two provisions dealing with sections 18 and 32, both of which are consequential upon each other. We hope that the minister will give us, in view of the importance of these amendments to what would otherwise be a piece of housekeeping legislation, some elaboration and explanation before the House consents to third reading. Perhaps the most important of the new provisions in the bill now before us is clause 27, which states:

Every person who alters or adjusts the odometer of a motor vehicle in such a manner that as a result of the alteration or adjustment the total number of miles indicated on the odometer is other than the total number of miles travelled by that vehicle is guilty of an offence.

The second part of that particular clause, which is consequential, provides:

(2) No person shall be convicted of an offence under subsection (1) if he establishes that the alteration or adjustment was reasonably necessary for the purpose of making repairs to an odometer or to any other part of a motor vehicle directly related thereto.

That is a very important new aspect of this bill. It takes into account what has been a fairly common practice, especially with the sale of used cars, namely, tampering with the odometer in order to mislead the public into believing that the motor vehicle in question has in fact not travelled the number of miles it has in fact travelled.

There are certain questions that were raised in committee and which I think deserve to be brought up at this time in respect to this particular clause. First of all, on the surface this would appear to be an area of provincial jurisdiction. For example, we do not know how many of the provinces have amended their motor vehicle acts to make this practice an offence. We know some provinces have done so, and we are wondering exactly what would be the effect of this amendment which extends the jurisdiction of the federal government into an area which on the surface appears to be one solely for the provinces.

Having said that, I should like to reiterate a matter put forward by myself and other members in the committee, namely, that this new clause in the bill will have the effect, hopefully, of getting the provinces to pass legislation to protect the public from unscrupulous automobile dealers, especially used car dealers, who all too often have made it a practice to tamper with automobiles and to sell them to the public by misrepresenting their true mileage. I think this matter is worthy of mention here.

I hope the minister will enlarge upon what I have said and perhaps inform the House how he intends to enforce this provision. Perhaps the minister can inform us whether or not he has had consultations with the provinces in regard to the constitutional aspects of this provision. Certainly in provinces that have not legislated in this area, the initiative of the federal government will be welcomed. But we should also like to know what is the position of this amendment in cases where the provinces have acted and made the appropriate amendments to their provincial motor vehicles act. Which law will take precedence, the provincial or the federal? I think this matter deserves attention.

I think these are new and important amendments that have been introduced into the bill. Down through the years this legislation has served the public of Canada well in its regulation of weights and measures, and is now expanding into areas where it can continue to protect the public. As I say, we are concerned about its constitutional aspects. We are concerned that we may be enacting a law that is powerless, by virtue of constitutional limitation, notwithstanding the importance of these specific clauses, to protect the public from fraudulent and in many cases criminal practices which unfortunately have become all too common in our modern society.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I feel I should reply to my hon. friend—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must advise hon. members that the minister would need the unanimous consent of the House to speak now. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I feel I should say something in reply to the very helpful comments and questions put by my hon. friend from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who as leader of his party in the Committee on Health and Welfare was very helpful in the examination of the bill and in dealing with the amendments that were made in committee and undoubtedly improved the bill. I thank him for his thoughtful remarks this evening which were directed to the substance of the bill, and for some very legitimate and proper questions that he asked in relation thereto.

This is, as the hon. member pointed out, a bill that is really a complementary measure to the packaging and labelling bill which this House passed a couple of weeks ago. When we were introducing the new omnibus consumer packaging and labelling bill to Parliament, it seemed a proper and opportune time to revise the Weights and Measures Act, which is a very historic act in Canada but one which, if we are to keep pace with technological developments, needs to be revised from time to time. Now is the proper time to make that revision.

The hon. member for St. John's East referred to a number of important provisions of the act and to amendments which were made during the course of the committee's hearings on the bill. For example, he mentioned clause 10 (p) of the bill which relates to the measurement of liquids dispensed by vending machines, in regard to which up to now there has been no regulation at all. I think this is a conservative statistic that will appeal to hon. members opposite: according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, as of 1968, which are the latest available figures, there were some 14,000 coin-operated, liquid vending machines in Canada. These machines dispense coffee, soup, soft drinks and a multitude of liquid products.

Whereas there has been no regulation covering those machines in respect of whether they must give a proper measure or money's worth, so to speak, this bill of course will provide the power to regulate that kind of measuring device, as it is called within the bill, to ensure that it gives an accurate measure and that there is no misrepresentation or deception in connection with the measurement it provides.

The hon. member for St. John's East also mentioned clauses 18 and 32 and the provisions relating to the delivery of oil by oil delivery machines. Another statistic we may place on the record is that there are some 3,000 fuel oil vending trucks in use in Canada and of course most of those, if not 99.44 per cent of them, are operated by honest merchants delivering oil in an honest and proper way. Our inspectors, however, have found—as the hon. member for St. John's East pointed out—that there are some cases of what is called riding with the ticket. This bill will deal with that practice.

The hon. member for St. John's East also referred to clause 27 and the device on a motor vehicle which measures the mileage. I am sure all of us have had the experience of buying a used car and wondering whether or not the mileage shown on that car is in fact the true mileage. Clause 27 is designed to deal with that problem. The hon. member asked whether we had had consultation with the provinces in this connection and in connection with the whole bill.

I assure him, as I assured members of the committee, that we had written to all provincial motor vehicles branches with relation to proposed section 27 and the regulations relating to odometers, and had a response from one which indicated they did not like the wording in clause 27 because they believed it might create problems. Consequently I proposed an amendment before the Standing Committee to which this bill was referred. This clause is designed, hopefully, to avoid any difficulty such as the earlier draft may have created.

As I say, every member of this House has probably wondered when buying a used car whether the mileage was correct. Clause 27 at least is a substantive provision of the law which will make it an offence to tamper with odometers or mileage indicators on a car for purposes of deceiving the public. The hon. member asked whether we could enforce this provision. That is a very good question. I am not sure whether or not we can enforce it, but at least we will have a substantive prohibition in the law of Canada against such a practice, which we did not have up until now.

If there are those who have any indication that a dealer or salesman is tampering with the odometer of a motor vehicle, I would hope they would report that fact to us so we could investigate and determine whether there is a case which would warrant bringing these people to court. I am the first to admit that enforcement will be a problem. But up until now there has been no prohibition against this practice, and now we have the prohibition I can assure hon. members we will endeavour to enforce the clause.

There are, of course, other steps which we hope will be taken. I know that the provincial motor vehicles departments are considering the provision of a registration or log book for each motor vehicle, in which the mileage and the repairs to that vehicle would be recorded. In other words, there would be a history of motor vehicles something like a ship's log book or registration book. This is a matter which is under provincial jurisdiction and I understand provincial governments are looking at this sort of thing in order to cut down the abuse and malpractice that goes on.

There is also the hope that the motor vehicle manufacturers could develop an odometer which is tamper-proof. I understand that the North American car manufacturers and instrument manufacturers are devoting a good deal of attention to the development of an odometer which cannot be tempered with and which will in fact show the proper mileage of a motor vehicle.

The hon. member for St. John's East also mentioned an important provision in this bill which allows the usual well known measurements in Canada in units of the pound, the inch and so on, and also makes legal the Canadian use of the metric system. Of course, the government indicated in a white paper tabled in this Parliament last February that we think Canada should convert to the metric system and that a number of steps will be taken to encourage Canadians to use the metric system, make it available to them and make them knowledgeable in respect of it. This bill makes legal the use of the metric system. It does not make it obligatory or mandatory. When it is made mandatory in Canada, another amendment to this act will be required.

The hon. member mentioned enforcement. I advise him we have 178 inspectors in Canada. These are the weights and measures inspectors of my department. All these inspectors are working at full tilt. We are trying to make our operation as effective and efficient as possible. Whenever we receive a complaint of under-inspection or under-enforcement, we endeavour to correct it. If the hon. member has specific evidence that the act is not being enforced in some respect, I would like be the first to hear about it so we could take remedial action. Naturally, the effectiveness of enforcement depends upon our financial resources to a great extent, but I believe generally the Weights and Measures Act has been well enforced by my department. I assure him we endeavour to make it effective.

One last remark is in respect of parking meters which are also dealt with under this legislation. Heretofore there has been no regulation relating to the sale of time. Under this legislation there will be. In respect of parking meters, I am sure all of us have been concerned—just as persons buying used cars have been concerned about the shown mileage—that parking meters in which we put our nickels and dimes may not be working properly. This legislation will relate to the sale of time and a device designed to measure time would include a parking meter. This provision will allow us to regulate the construction of parking meters to ensure they are constructed, designed and developed in such a way as to provide accurate measurement and ensure that they in fact work properly for all Canadians who put nickels and dimes in them.

I believe I have dealt with all the important matters which were raised in the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to which this bill was referred. I think the bill has been improved by the committee—I thank the hon. member for St. John's East for his contribution in the House and to the work of the committee in examining the amendments made to the bill, and I commend it to hon. members.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit a question? In view of the increased necessity for surveillance under the new provisions of the bill—here I am thinking of clauses 10, 18 and 27—does the minister envisage a substantial increase in the number of inspectors employed under the Weights and Measures Act in order to adequately enforce these new clauses?

Mr. Basford: I would not anticipate a great increase. I think we may need a few additional people at the head office in order to examine and inspect the devices that are submitted for sale in Canada, particularly the new devices that are developed and which under this act must be approved for sale in Canada. Undoubtedly, the workload of inspectors, whether or not we have a new act, will increase. Our population is increasing, the number of retail outlets is increasing and the number of ordinary measuring scales is increasing, all of which generally requires us from year to year to have more inspectors.

However, we are finding that while we have more devices to inspect, there are technological improvements in the devices, which makes it less necessary to inspect them as often as before. This is a broad generalization, but while the number of devices increases, their perfection increases also, and therefore we have to inspect them less often. Also, this law allows us better enforcement provisions with regard to the devices which we now inspect. For example, the hon. member mentioned oil delivery machines. We already inspect all the fuel oil vending trucks. We will have a better enforcement provision under which to inspect them. We have found there are practices which under the law we are unable to deal with. This new law will enable us to deal with them.

Mr. McGrath: Would the House permit one final question? It might assist us if the minister were to put on the record the number and which provinces have already acted in the areas covered by clause 27, dealing with automobile odometers. How many provinces have enacted amendments to their motor vehicles acts to cover the provisions of clause 27?

Mr. Basford: I apologize to the House. I know that there were questions on this matter in committee and I thought I had them with me, but I find that I do not. I must therefore go by memory. I believe that two provinces have laws relating to the setting back of odometers and a number of other provinces are considering it. The hon. member will understand if I do not name the provinces that are considering it, because it is up to their ministers of highways or their attorneys general to make that announcement when they introduce amendments. As I understand it, the provinces that have some provision relating to odometers on cars are British Columbia and Alberta.

Mr. Baldwin: Rather than make a speech, something which I rarely like to do, I would ask the minister a couple of questions. He answers questions so delightfully. My question relates to clause 27. I notice the distinction between the amendment which changes subclause 2 of 27 and the original subclause, the one dealing with automobiles. In my view this provision has the effect of changing the burden of proof.

I am not making a big point of it; I just want to know whether in the opinion of the minister's legal adviser it would now be necessary for any person charged with an offence under this clause to establish affirmatively that the adjustment or alteration was reasonably necessary. Is it the minister's view that this clause now puts the burden upon the person charged to establish innocence?

Mr. Basford: Not entirely; and I think that is not quite the effect of subclause 1 and subclause 2 of clause 27. If one looks at subclause 1 of clause 27, it deals with every person who alters or adjusts an odometer on a motor vehicle. The standard of proof there is the usual standard of proof; the Crown will have to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the odometer was altered.

Under subclause 2 the accused is then entitled to show that the adjustment was reasonably necessary. But the standard of proof under subclause 1 is the same as it has always been. The Crown will have to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the odometer was adjusted. Having proven that beyond a reasonable doubt, there is the presumption that the court would make and that the clause makes, that the odometer was adjusted or altered for an illegal purpose, at which point the accused is entitled to rebut that presumption under subclause 2.

Mr. Baldwin: I thank the minister for that answer. I am sure he will find it useful when perhaps after the next election he is engaged in defending clients. He may even have a chance to defend someone under this particular clause.

Mr. Basford: I am expecting to be here then.

Mr. Baldwin: The other question relates to the same clause. There was some discussion between the minister and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) on the question of the provinces having adopted views along these lines and incorporating them into legislation. Has there been any discussion among the provincial ministers with regard to provincial governments changing their sale of goods act or comparable legislation in order to permit a breach of this particular clause? Such matters are, of course, punishable under the Criminal Code. Nevertheless has there been any thought of permitting a breach of this provision to be regarded as being ground for a civil action for damages, for cancellation of a contract, for setting aside a contract, and so on?

I recognize that this is entirely within provincial law, but it would seem to me that it is an avenue which might be pursued. It is one thing to punish a man for doing what is wrong, and another to put a provision in a bill requiring that a certain thing be done. In addition to that, let us consider the remedy of the person who is suffering. There may be some doubt about what the federal government could legislate. There have been instances, to which I can refer, under the Criminal Code where provisions were included which in effect dealt with civil offences. I am not suggesting that the minister consider doing that. I am suggesting that he might pursue that question in a reasonable way with the provinces and urge them to ensure that their own codes dealing with the sale of goods and automobiles provide that this sort of offence would vest in a person who has been wronged the right of cancellation or rectification.

Mr. Basford: The remarks of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) are well taken. I think he is correct in assuming that under the federal Weights and Measures Act, which is clearly based on the federal jurisdiction over weights and measures as specified in the British North America Act, we could not determine the rights between vendor and purchaser of a motor vehicle, and of course we have not purported to do so. Nevertheless, I think that his remarks, in so far as they were directed at provincial governments and at my making suggestions to them, are well taken. That is why two of the provinces have already regulated this matter. I know that one other is definitely intending to do so, and possibly more may do so.

Also, and in a more general way, many of the provinces are considering complete revision or amendment of their sale of goods acts, a turn of events which comes about because of the amendment made by this Parliament to the Bills of Exchange Act last June, which became effective November 1 last, where we said with respect to the rights of a person signing a promissory note that those rights travel with the note even if it is sold and passed to an assignee a holder in due course.

As the hon. member and I both said in the House last June, this measure opened the door to the provinces to revise their own laws relating to the sale of goods, and contracts between vendors and purchasers. Some of the provinces have already gone through that door. In my own province of British Columbia the Attorney General has introduced amendments to the provincial sale of goods act. As a result of a conference on consumer affairs held last November in Toronto, I know that a number of other provinces are thinking along the same line.

I would join with the hon. member for Peace River in urging the provinces to revise these laws because many of the laws relating to the sale of goods had their origins in days when people were buying horses and buggies, rather than automobiles, refrigerators, stoves and all the things a modern family buys. Many of our laws were written in those old, old days and now we need new laws. This is what my department is all about. So far as the federal department is concerned, we are endeavouring to write those laws and introduce those reforms in Parliament. The same thing needs to be done at the provincial level, and I think the question asked by the hon. member for Peace River is a very valid and proper one. He asks me to urge the provincial governments to revise their laws relating to the sale of goods. I hope he will join me in doing so.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. When the committee rose at five o'clock this afternoon clause 14 of the bill was being considered.

On clause 14—Establishment of Ministries of State.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the message that I—

Mr. Drury: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. Just before we adjourned for dinner the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants suggested it was time the House entered into a debate on housing and said there would not be an opportunity, once this bill was passed, adequately to discuss housing problems.

I agree with him wholeheartedly that housing is an important problem, and indeed on a number of occasions this Parliament has paid considerable attention to it. One of the purposes of this bill, as outlined by the Prime Minister, is to make it possible to establish a ministry of state responsible for urban affairs and housing, in the hope that we will have a rather more elaborate, rather more satisfactory policy in respect of housing so far as the federal government is concerned, and that consequently all Canadians would be able to benefit.

However, I would point out that in this particular debate the issue is not whether our housing policy is satisfactory or not, but whether the government should be so reorganized at this juncture to enable it to establish, hopefully, a more effective housing policy than we now have. If, as the lawyers say, it would help the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants at all, I am prepared to admit that the current policy and housing programs of the government, while good, still could be improved—and one of the purposes of this bill is to seek to do that. Therefore, the hon. member would not usefully occupy the time of the House were he to make a case which we already admit, namely, that further improvements in housing policy in Canada are not only useful but needed.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the minister a question? Is it the intention of the government, after the passage of Bill C-207, in view of his present interest in housing, to remodel this chamber into a number of compartments and rent them, or does he have any more sophisticated plans for the House of Commons after Bill C-207 becomes law?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, my inadequacy in this matter demonstrates in one more way the necessity of getting this bill passed and the ministry of urban affairs and housing established.

Mr. Lundrigan: Would the minister not be satisfied to bring forward a package on urban affairs, with such a bill containing specifically the ministry to be established and all its duties, responsibilities, costs and bureaucratic structure, so that this House—

The Chairman: Order, please. The minister sought the floor on a point of order. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants already had the floor, and I think little can be gained in committee by continuing the question and answer period.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, the point that I made in my first speech in this debate, which has been made by other members since then, was that this was a very mixed bill, with as many as seven different principles in it, all of which can give rise to confusion. I can be as confused as anybody else in the House, either due to my own natural talents or other people's natural talents, but I do not mind sharing my confusion and perplexities with others.

I said we should have a housing debate because the right hon. Prime Minister, who is the sponsor of the bill, in answer to a question asked by me said that the ministry of urban affairs and housing was one of the ministries of state that would be created. All I am asking is that before anything like that takes place I, and other hon. members on this side of the House, be given a chance to express their views. I see the former mayor of Toronto and other hon. members opposite who should be able to contribute suggestions on what such a new ministry should do.

This is the perplexity facing us, Mr. Chairman. If we do not put up a fight now—and I may suggest a solution to the fight—it will be lost entirely. The thing will be heard, there will be a minister, he will be given his terms of reference under the bill and it will be very difficult to change anything. The terms of reference are set forth in clause 15 which provides:

> A proclamation establishing a ministry of state shall
> (a) state the name of the ministry;
> (b) specify the matter or matters in relation to which the minister for the ministry is to formulate and develop policies; and
> (c) specify the powers, duties and functions to be assigned to the minister for the ministry in relation to the formulation and development of those policies.

I have been in this House for 12 years—not as long as some other members—and we have had to deal with such things as the creation of new ministries. But on those occasions each of us could say what we thought should or should not be included in the measure, and we could move amendments and make suggestions. In that way our constituents could see what we were doing and could write to us with suggestions that they felt should be advanced. Surely it is participatory democracy when voters can say, "Why don't you put this forward as an idea regarding housing?"

Who can say that the minister, the government, Central Mortgage and Housing or any small number of people have all the wisdom in the world? We know that the former minister in charge of housing, the hon. member for Trinity, went around the country and gathered opinions from thousands of people. Many of these found their way into his report on housing.

This is the dilemma that we find ourselves in on this side of the House, Mr. Chairman, and indeed I think members on the other side are in the same dilemma. The Prime Minister has spoken about the new ministries in relation to science and housing, and the minister who speaks for housing has talked about one based on the Bird Royal Commission on the Status of Women. That is three out of five. Given all that, we have no chance whatsoever to say what we think. Clause 15 says that a proclamation shall specify the matter or matters in relation to which the minister is to formulate and develop policies or the powers, duties and functions to be assigned to the minister.

That is our dilemma, Mr. Chairman. We do not know where we are going when we give these powers. That is what it boils down to. The President of the Treasury Board has the task of piloting this legislation through the House, and I suggest to him that we must have a bridge to all sectors of the House. Some of the new ministries may have to be established in a hurry. If the matter were put before us for debate as early as possible, we could probably agree beforehand on a time limit within which resolutions could be moved, or amendments and suggestions for changes in the powers of a particular ministry. These could be presented to Parliament. Surely a group of people of good will, from all sides, could get together and set limits for the debate within practical terms.

That is where the whole friction in this debate occurs, because we are simply afraid to give such sweeping powers to any government. If we were on that side and the people over there found themselves—in reduced numbers, of course—on this side, I am sure they would be standing up and making exactly the same argument. When you have classic battles between the powers of the executive and the powers of Parliament, once in a while Parliament has to dig in its heels and say, "Only so far and no farther." We must have our say.

That is what I am asking for, Mr. Chairman—and not only on behalf of members on this side of the House. I will not embarrass anyone on the other side—although I could name members—but I think I am speaking for them as well. There are members who would like to say what they think should be contained in any new department dealing with housing and urban affairs, or a science ministry. God knows, the mistakes in the science field are legion and nobody in this place can be exonerated from them. For the past 35 years we have been making mistakes. Perhaps it would be better if we were all made more accountable for mistakes in that field.

The recommendations of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women have caused a great deal of excitement in Canada. It may be that the least likely source in the House would come up with the best ideas. Nobody has a monopoly on ideas: 22, 24 or 28 cabinet ministers have no monopoly on ideas. We are here to swap ideas. You will notice that I have not turned this into a housing debate, Mr. Chairman, but when the time comes to deal with urban affairs and the housing problems of the nation I do not want something presented to me on a platter. I would rather consider ten ideas even if only one were accepted.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I acknowledge with appreciation the fact that we did not get into a housing debate. I think the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants has quite sincerely expressed the dilemma which faces a number of people who have intervened in this debate. There is an unwillingness to hand over to the executive greater powers than it now has. In other words, what is being sought here is is a delegation of parliamentary authority to the executive, but there is a feeling that there will not be adequate provision for calling them to account. I am afraid this is based on a misapprehension to some degree.

The House leader for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition knows about the ability of the executive in the United Kingdom. It is granted a unitary form of government rather than a federal one and has a much larger lower chamber than we have, and consequently one would expect a somewhat larger membership than ours. The United Kingdom, of course, is the source of most of our parliamentary traditions. The executive of that country has a total limit placed on their members of ministerial and quasi-ministerial rank, and within those members the size established in respect of interrelationship is left entirely to the executive to determine. There is no necessity, no demand even, that changes within this framework will be set in advance, as is being suggested here, apart from Parliament.

Our tradition in the functioning of the executive has largely been derived from the royal prerogative and has been more conditioned by the desirability of having from the outset the strictest of parliamentary control, which has brought a consequent lessening of that prerogative. Departments and ministers with the authority to head departments in this country, I suggest, have been up to the present established through a special statute setting up the department. Subsequently funds are provided in the usual fashion on an annual basis through the Appropriation Acts.

However, there still remains, as I pointed out before, the prerogative right of the Governor in Council to appoint in unlimited numbers ministers without portfolio not in charge of departments as such, having functions and duties which are defined by the Governor in Council and are not subject to prior parliamentary approval at all. There is, however, one element of parliamentary approval which must be sought, which is not related to the nomination or definition of these functions. Parliamentary approval must in every instance be sought to provide the funds with which the staff must be paid to enable the minister effectively to discharge whatever responsibilities he has been given. In addition to that, Parliament is asked for and grants—or up to the present has always granted—the amount of the annual salary for ministers without portfolio.

What we see here is a proposal which will have the flexibility of the prerogative in relation to the appointment of ministers without portfolio. I think our recent experience has demonstrated that the kind of flexibility which is necessary to appoint a minister quickly in response to a seen need, to appoint a minister in charge of a particular, new function, to appoint a minister who will address himself largely to a new problem which has arisen and to provide for proposed policies and solutions which eventually can only be implemented by Parliament through the provision of the necessary funds, is useful in an era when change appears to be the rule rather than the exception. Frequently, if one can respond rapidly and effectively, the problem—I have heard speeches to this effect—will be less than it otherwise would be if allowed to drag on without being met quickly.

What is sought here is to provide that feature, that flexibility of response and, further, to provide, under the designation or title of ministers of state, for the appointment of ministers who will be in terms of responsibility and stature the equivalent of ministers heading other departments. Consequently, they will receive the same salary and those other considerations given to a minister but they will not normally be in charge of a large operating function or the running of programs for which normal departmental organization is required.

Such a minister will need, in order to fulfil his functions, a staff consisting of relatively few highly skilled people who will assist him in the process of analysis and development of policy. If the policy development as subsequently approved by Parliament calls for the establishment of a large number of public servants to put the policy into operation, at that time, I suggest, we could proceed under the first part of this bill to establish government departments and the duties, responsibilities and manner of functioning of certain people will all be clearly set out in the statute.

For those limited number of cases in which there is a problem and in which the immediate need does not call for the operation of subsequent programs but for the seeking of solutions, particularly in those fields where jurisdiction is not exclusively federal but is mixed and calls for a good deal of consultation with the provinces rather than the operation of programs by themselves, this is the kind of instrument, it seems to me, that can more adequately meet our needs.

As I indicated, although this bill provides that the Governor in Council will be able to name the minister without the necessity of further parliamentary approval, it is, as I think all hon. members will understand, impossible for that minister to have a staff to do the work of analysis, of problem solving and of proposing, unless funds are provided to him for that staff. This money can only be provided by Parliament through either the main appropriations, if that is the appropriate cycle when it occurs, or through supplementary appropriations if it occurs at some time other than the beginning of the main estimates cycle.

When one looks a little more into the kind of proposal that is being made here, and relates it to the kind of parliamentary tradition into which we have grown, I think it will be seen that a great many of the apprehensions and fears expressed are perhaps groundless. I suggest that this proposal will not then appear quite as alarming as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants quite honestly, I think, suggested it was.

One other advantage of this kind of proposal may be seen if one considers the kinds of problems that a minister of state might deal with, as suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway the other day. This is something that has arisen relatively recently and consists of an area of interest, or an area of problems which does not fit neatly into our classical patterns of government organization or, indeed, thought. These problems range at a variety of levels horizontally across the whole government apparatus. A minister who will look at the Canadian perspective with this particular aspect of it in view will, I think, be able to make many useful suggestions which can be implemented. They could be implemented, not necessarily by himself or by a department which he might head but by other departments and other agencies.

When he has done this particular job and there does not appear to be a continuing need for this kind of analysis and policy suggestion, then keeping the apparatus in being any longer clearly would not be a useful application of the resources provided by the taxpayer. Then it ought to be dispensed with and our energies devoted to other problems which might take on new forms as suggested by clause 14. I think this, in so far as parliamentary operation and particularly parliamentary control is concerned, is of some significance.

One point made during the course of this debate was that this bill, as an omnibus bill, was unsatisfactory in that it covered so many subjects that it was impossible for hon. members and for the House to focus adequately on a particular principle and give it the kind of consideration which clear focusing would allow. It was said that because of the wideness, range and number of topics involved, focusing in relation to this bill was very difficult.

In terms of the ministry, it would be of considerable assistance to the House, particularly during the interesting 40 minutes per day which we have, if in relation to a current problem there was one minister who was clearly charged with responsibility for that particular item. To again refer to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, at the present time there is no minister to whom the members of the House can point the finger of responsibility: it is diffused.

The Prime Minister obviously cannot provide detailed answers for the whole range of subjects in which the administration is engaged. Consequently, the House does not get a satisfactory accounting. The ministry is not as accountable to the House as it would be with the kind of focusing which clause 14 would make possible. With this kind of arrangement, rather than Parliament having its powers eroded and losing authority it would, if intelligently used, find its real power—knowledge and power, in this world in which we live, are synonymous—through increased accountability and responsibility of minister for specific needs.

Rather than have what the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants is afraid might be the case, I suggest as strongly as I can that not only is it the intention of the government that it should be so, but Parliament, particularly the House of Commons, will find its power, authority, credibility and—to use a rather overworked term—relevancy enhanced.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his contribution in spite of the fact that a large number of government members have spoken on this issue in the past few days. Most have used their time whimpering, whining and bleating about filibustering. The minister at least made an effort to attack the problem. It is refreshing to see someone go to the root of the issue rather than talk nonsense about filibustering.

I have examined the record. On this particular issue, probably the most important one in the bill, only 2½ days have been spent. Up to the present time approximately 9½ hours have been used to debate this particular measure. I say to those members who are wringing their hands, whining and crying about filibustering, that there are five important areas which can be the subject of the creation of ministries of state. Three or four have already been identified by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants. They are housing, science and the status of women.

Information Canada has also been mentioned, although the government has not tied itself down on that. How in the name of heaven can hon. members on the government side say that we are filibustering? How dare they say that? How can they have the unmitigated audacity to say that we should be expected to discharge our responsibility in 2½ days? I will deal later with the very good speech made by the minister.

Within the four corners of clause 14, the government has intimated in no uncertain terms its intention of setting up three, or possibly four, ministries of state which they have identified. There will be at least five, but the government has identified three, and possibly four. The minister talked about the differences between our system and that of the United Kingdom. While we should constantly examine the practice in the United Kingdom in a variety of matters, we in Canada should make our own rules. We should adapt, change and pattern ourselves according to our needs. I do not believe in blind obedience to the practice of the United Kingdom. If members opposite want that, that is up to them. We in this party and other opposition parties believe there is much to be derived from a thorough and constant examination of the British system, but adapted to meet the requirements and needs of Canada.

The minister may be aware that there is a statute in the United Kingdom, passed in 1937, the salaries of ministers act, which deals with more than salaries. It identifies and establishes certain ministries. Although it does not identify them, it provides for a number of secretaries of state. My point is that the United Kingdom Parliament has in fact legislated. My suggestion to a constitutional lawyer opposite would be that having legislated, the prerogative of the Crown has gone, except within the limits of the statute.

The minister attempted to make the very best of a bad case. I think he knows he has a bad case, but I give him credit for trying to put the best face on it. He might succeed. We have been very careful. We have briefed and informed ourselves. We know the weaknesses. I will point some out now. Others in this party will also have something to say about them.

An hon. Member: Again?

Mr. Baldwin: Yes. Now we have a target. For the first time someone has had the courage to stand up and defend this bill. Other members did not have the courage to do that, because they did not understand the bill. The minister has put up a defence. It was as good a defence as he could find for a bad bill or the bad provisions in the bill. I am going to deal with it. The minister had the courtesy of replying to us. He made his best effort to deal with the matter.

We in this House have instituted a new set of Standing Orders. The minister knows about them. Enough has been said about them in our party and other opposition parties. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants clearly stated his fears about this legislative program. When this legislation is passed, as I assume it will be in due course, the government will be free to exercise the prerogative of appointing ministers and establishing ministries of state. For example, there will be a ministry of housing, a ministry to deal with, or at least reply to, questions on issues raised in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, and a ministry of state to deal with housing. There is no question about that.

What would be the case without this legislation? What would be the situation? The government would be compelled, as I think it should be, to go to the House and say it had reviewed the situation, exercising its prerogative as the executive, and had reached the conclusion that the housing situation had been allowed to get into such a mess that something needed to be done about it, including the establishment of a ministry.

On this basis the government would then bring in legislation. A recommendation from His Excellency would probably be required, since payment of money for staff, and so on, would likely be involved. A bill would be introduced into the House and would pursue the normal course. Members of this party, members of the Créditiste party to my left and supporters of the government who had the courage to express their honest views would do so. There would be a debate. Issue would be joined.

If we on this side felt the government proposals were inadequate, we would put forward counter-proposals; we would offer amendments and the proposals would be studied in detail in committee. I do not think this would take a great deal of time, but there would be an opportunity provided for us on this side to say, "Here are the alternatives". This is what the government proposes to take away from us.

My hon. friend from Halifax-East Hants hinted—I believe he was exercising a kind of poetic licence—that he would like a debate on housing. I believe he was giving expression to the frustration we feel, because we recognize that if this bill is passed in its present form we shall be denied the opportunity to express our views adequately on housing, on science policy or other subjects which might form the basis of the establishment of a ministry of state. This is what we are complaining about. The minister said we shall have our opportunity when the estimates come before us. That is a lovely thing to say, after all the government has done to the House in connection with the scrutiny of estimates. If the changes in the rules had not been made in this regard, the minister might have had a better argument.

Let me digress for a few moments. In the course of my experience in the House, some 14 years, my recollection is that there were never more than three Ministers without Portfolio. The limitation was not imposed by statute but probably followed tradition and custom; no government considered that with 22, 23 or 24 cabinet posts available more than three Ministers without Portfolio should be appointed. But in each instance, with respect to Ministers without Portfolio, there was an item in the estimates dealing with their salaries and, from time to time, with their particular staffs. In accordance with the practice followed then, when dealing with estimates an opportunity was provided for a substantial debate to take place in connection with the appointment. It does not exist now. I shall not get into that argument this evening because there were some aspects of the change which I accepted, though there are others which I have never liked. Be this as it may, the minister is bound to agree that the opportunities which existed for members on this side of the House under the rules before they were changed several years ago are not present today.

Mr. Drury: Not true.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister may wax indignant. He smiles as he speaks and I do not think he really believes what he says. He knows that the opportunities available to us now are nothing like they were before the rules were changed. That is a statement which in my opinion cannot be denied on the basis of the facts.

Mr. Drury: I will deny it.

Mr. Baldwin: The minister may deny it but I am talking about facts. This is the difficulty we face. It may be that within a month or within six months of this legislation being passed, a proclamation will be made and the cabinet will promulgate an Order in Council which will provide for the establishment of a ministry of state to deal with housing. Parliament will not have seen the terms of reference. It will have had no say in establishing the conditions under which the ministry has been set up. It may be we shall be given an opportunity to ask questions, but I contend that the representatives of the people of Canada are entitled to suggest what the terms of reference should be in a matter so vital and important. The same considerations apply to the creation of ministries dealing with science, the status of women, and so on.

The minister cannot deny that the government would have the power to establish these ministries, to disestablish them or to vary their functions. It has been demonstrated beyond doubt by members on this side of the House that an opportunity to discuss such matters on estimates in the confines of a parliamentary committee does not permit the free and unhibited discussion which is essential. It is difficult enough for this party, with 72 or 73 members in the House, to staff committees and maintain attendance in the chamber. It is even more difficult for the party to my immediate left, with 23 or 24 members, to do so, or for the Creditiste party to do so. In any case, there is no opportunity for the kind of debate of which the minister has spoken. I think he is speaking only from his experience as one sitting on the treasury benches. He has not had the edifying experience of sitting in opposition.

Mr. Drury: I have.

Mr. Baldwin: Obviously the hon. gentleman was not there long enough. That is something we shall try to remedy at the next election.

Mr. Drury: It was not my fault.

[Mr. Baldwin.]

Mr. Baldwin: It will not be our fault next time, either. I can see the hon. member sitting here after the next election reading my speeches and trying to imitate me.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Drury: This is fantasyland.

Mr. Baldwin: I believe I have answered the minister. I intended to answer him because he had the decency to drive right to the root issue. However, he did not deal with the subject in such a way as to convince me. I listened hard. I am very easy to persuade. If he had made a case, I would have been prepared to say so. But he fell far short of doing so and I cannot accept his argument.

Before I sit down, let me say that one of the problems we shall face if this legislation is passed is a proliferation of ministers. The hon. member for Ottawa East, who was occupying the chair the other day, spoke about reading the Bible, an apt book to be reading at that time. After all, the Liberals are trying to create a land of milk and honey where there will always be a place for deserving backbenchers. Like the armies of the south in the early days, all the generals will be privates. Under those conditions it is a sad, sad story indeed.

What are the dangers inherent in this situation? The first three rows of the government benches will be filled with ministers, with ministers of state responsible for a ministry of state and with ministers of state who have been deprived of the opportunity of administering a ministry of state. Then the parliamentary secretaries will sit behind them.

What about the confusion that we have observed in the last few days when ministers of the Crown have said that "X" is brown and ministers of state have said that "X" is white? Perhaps on this point I could simply read an editorial which appeared in the Ottawa Journal last week.

Mr. Mahoney: Take your time; there are five minutes left.

Mr. Baldwin: The article reads:

> Uncle Sam must be puzzled about his Canadian nephews these days. While our energy minister and our northern affairs minister are going hell-for-leather to get the Americans to run their Alaskan oil through a Mackenzie Valley pipeline, our communications minister says it would be "a kind of industrial suicide." Even foreign minister Sharp is asking that the Pacific route be scrapped. Our Prime Minister indicates he doesn't find confusion embarrassing for the government hasn't decided its policy!
> The decibels are the message.
> There are other ways for Mr. Trudeau to encourage public discussion of a vital issue than set his cabinet running off in all directions. What about some of those parliamentary assistants or articulate backbenchers—mightn't they ventilate provocative views?
> As it is we have the two ministers presumably most concerned telling the Americans they must not use the Pacific coast route and must use the Mackenzie route, but the Prime Minister telling the Americans at the same time that Canada hasn't yet decided whether it wants the Mackenzie pipeline.

Ministerial contradiction is old stuff in the U.S.A. where the President has the final say. But here in Canada, as in Britain, we have a system wherein the Prime Minister is only the first among other ministers—

The Prime Minister has not heard about that; I guess he has not read this article.

—and cabinet is presumed to be a team that thinks—

Certainly that is a questionable point.

—(and agrees on action) before it urges or acts.

Today's spectacle is absurd and, what is more, makes our system appear absurd. If Greene and Chrétien win then Kierans is made to look a dunce and his judgment on other matters becomes suspect. Or vice-versa. There may be dunces in this cabinet—

I should like to debate that point, Mr. Chairman, but it is not relevant at the moment.

—as in others, but it helps nothing to have the Prime Minister encourage them in the name of freedom of speech and thought to go about running off at the mouth.

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair has been lenient with the hon. member because I thought all hon. members would want him to finish the editorial, but I must inform him that his time expired about 30 seconds ago. If there is unanimous consent, the hon. member may continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: I thank the committee for its courtesy; hon. members know how infrequently I speak. I simply ask them to think of the terrible situation we would have with 50 ministers of the Crown, all of them engaged in these antics that have been so adequately described by this highly responsible newspaper in the editorial to which I have referred. Where would the people be in such a situation? What would they think? Who would they believe? I suggest this would be a catastrophic situation, one that this poor country should not be asked to face.

I should like to close by reading from one other article which I think is indicative of what would be the mental condition of so many of my hon. friends on the other side if they were ministers of state, ministers of state without a department of state or parliamentary secretaries. They would not know what they were doing or saying. This article is as follows:

The Texas House of Representatives has unanimously passed a resolution endorsing the job performed by the Boston Strangler in the field of population control.

The resolution submitted by two representatives who believed the Texas House would pass any resolution set in front of its members—

This is the sort of situation we would face. I do not think my hon. friends opposite would go quite that far. I give them credit for stopping somewhat short of that.

An hon. Member: Don't fool yourself.

Mr. Baldwin: One of my hon. friends behind me says I would be fooling myself. He may have better judgment than me. This is the situation we would face with 50 ministers of the crown and 29 parliamentary secretaries trying to govern this poor, unfortunate country. This is one of my reasons—I have a few others yet—for saying we must not allow this bill to pass.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would allow a question.

Mr. Baldwin: I would be delighted.

Mr. Drury: I ask him which two members of the opposition prepared the articles from which he quoted.

The Chairman: Order, please. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—DISBANDING COMMONWEALTH COMMITTEE ON INDIAN OCEAN SECURITY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, on March 8 I inquired regarding Canada's views as to the status and prospects of the Commonwealth committee on security in the Indian Ocean which had been established at the Singapore conference of Prime Ministers. At the time of its establishment there was a tendency in some quarters to regard it as a major achievement. There were accolades for the Prime Minister of Canada, and this country was selected as one of the members of the committee.

My question sought to elicit the views of the goverment on their present attitude towards this ill-starred emanation of the Singapore conclave. My mystification as to what Canada now thinks stems from the reply of the minister who said, "We considered that it was a useful initiative and we still think so. However, I am satisfied that the committee will not meet." This latter comment is hardly in the category of rash predictions. But surely there must be a more effective way of dealing with the matter than merely waiting around until so many members drop off that nothing numerically significant is left.

Diplomacy may not welcome an excess of definiteness, but possibly this newly developed machinery for Commonwealth consultation might be used to put the whole matter in true perspective, rather than have this wearisome, withering-away process. I fear we have been too much given to façade building on many matters such as the South African arms issue. If there is really nothing being done nor to be done, it is really helpful to give the impression that something efficacious is in progress or in prospect?

Along with an air of unreality there has been, in connection with South African arms sales, a regrettable measure of hypocrisy or at least inconstency. More than once we heard of protests, prime ministerial and otherwise, by letter and otherwise, to Britain. But in reference to France, a considerable merchant of arms to South Africa and other areas, not a word. Are British arms more deadly than those manufactured in and sold by France? The minister said the protests are made to Britain because of our Commonwealth membership. But surely this is a strange reply. France and Canada are charter members of the United Nations. That body has made many protests and has passed many resolutions concerning arms sales. Are we to believe that this government regards the obligations of Commonwealth membership as transcending our responsibilities under the United Nations charter? What an interesting scaling of priorities this would be!

I believe, Sir, we would be well advised to deal with these matters with a greater sense of realism, more consistency and not make pretensions unsupported by the hard facts.

Mr. André Ouellet (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on February 22 last, the British government made known its wish to supply South Africa with naval defence material. In the minds of some people, this announcement on the part of Great Britain somehow deprived the committee of any reason for being and, as the hon. member knows very well I think, Nigeria and India, followed by Malaysia, announced their intention of withdrawing from the committee. Other countries, such as Canada, that felt that the terms of reference of the committee went far beyond finding an immediate solution to the problem submitted to its consideration, were ready to convene the committee so that it could examine the longer-term problems now occurring in South Africa and the Indian Ocean.

But as Nigeria, India and Malaysia have persisted in their intention of not taking part in any meeting, whatever the purpose, Canada thus finds itself forced to admit that the committee is no longer representative and, therefore, cannot call a new meeting, because the terms of reference cannot be fulfilled. We regret, Mr. Speaker, that such an opportunity of discussing various problems, and in particular that of South Africa, should be lost.

I would like, in closing, to talk about the comments of the hon. member who saw fit to include in this debate the question of the sale of arms by France. I believe it has already been said, many times, in this House, that Canada, in the speeches of its representatives at the United Nations, as well as elsewhere, had always clearly expressed its complete disapproval of any country selling arms to South Africa.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY—POSSIBLE SALE OF McCLELLAND AND STEWART PUBLISHING FIRM TO FOREIGN INTERESTS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my intervention this evening has to do with the possible sale of the publishing firm of McClelland and Stewart to foreign interests. Perhaps I might take just a moment to explain the situation which existed when I posed the question which has given rise to this debate. The publishing firm of W. A. J. Gage had been sold to United States interests. The publishing firm of Ryerson Press had been sold to United States interests, and it had just been announced that McClelland and Stewart might follow the same route.

On February 18, as reported at page 3509 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) if he was considering any specific action such as the creation of a Canadian book development corporation or the provision of long-term, low-interest loans to Canadian-owned book publishing firms in order to assist their avoiding falling into this kind of sale. At that time the minister said he would look into the matter to see what was being done.

Then on February 19, in answer to a further series of questions from myself and the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce suggested that an interdepartmental committee and the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) were looking into the whole problem of the foreign ownership of Canadian publishing firms. He also said that in that regard they were specifically examining the possibility of creating a book development corporation and means of promoting the sale abroad of Canadian books.

Subsequently, in a speech in this House and on other occasions I suggested five means which the government of Canada might undertake in order to prevent the sale of McClelland and Stewart to foreign interests, and also to preserve the Canadian publishing industry as it now exists and perhaps to see it grow and flourish. I suggested the creation of a Canadian book development corporation which would operate similarly to the Canadian Film Corporation, that is, provide loans for the publication of books in the expectation that any profits derived therefrom would be shared by the corporation.

I suggested the provision of long-term, low-interest loans through institutions such as the Industrial Development Bank. I suggested that more aid should be made available for the publication of scholarly and artistic works by the Humanities Research Council and the Canada Council. I suggested that a Canadian-owned book distribution system be established to operate in rivalry with the book distribution systems which now exist in Canada which are largely U.S. owned, and I suggested the creation of a Canadian book publishing house in the U.S. which would increase potentially the volume of sales of Canadian books.

Subsequent to these events the Secretary of State met with representatives of Canadian-owned publishing houses who made representations to him suggesting steps which he might take in order to maintain the industry in a healthy state. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say, to allow that industry to regain a state of health. In subsequent questions in the House I attempted to learn from the Secretary of State when action as a result of this meeting might be expected from the government. Perhaps understandably, the minister has thus far only been able to tell me that the government is studying the representations. I am using this occasion to emphasize the urgency of the whole question of the foreign ownership of Canadian publishing houses because in the April 3 issue of the Ottawa Citizen there is an article headed "McClelland dickering with U.S. firms" in which the following statements are made:

> Ardent Canadian nationalist Jack McClelland is negotiating with Americans as well as Canadians to buy his book publishing firm.
> Six weeks after he announced he would sell McClelland and Stewart, Limited to American interests only as "an absolute, last ditch stand," the co-chairman of the Committee for an Independent Canada said he was considering offers from the U.S. following a recent trip to New York.
> "It is purely a protective measure on my part", he added quickly in an interview Thursday. "I've had some proposals from Canadians too".

Mr. McClelland went on to say:

> He has made repeated requests to the federal and provincial governments for long-term, low-interest capital but apparently has been turned down. Nor has he been able to obtain extensions of earlier loans.

It is obvious that Mr. McClelland wants to leave his firm in Canadian hands but is being forced into a situation, due to inaction on the part of both the government of Canada and the government of Ontario, where he must consider U.S. offers. There is, therefore, considerable urgency involved in this whole question and a statement of government policy is required immediately if we are to prevent McClelland and Stewart from going the same route as Ryerson Press and W. A. J. Gage. I have emphasized the need for action on the part of the government. This position is reinforced by the representations made to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) in a brief entitled, "The Textbook Racket," by Art Smolensky, a senator of the University of British Columbia, and Rob McDiarmid, vice-president elect of the Alma Mater Society of the University of British Columbia. The specific complaints of the authors of this memoir are—I quote from the memoir—as follows:

> Textbooks are too expensive relative to (the student's) ability to pay for them.

In their documentation of that case they provide, with respect to English language textbooks, information relevant to the case that I am arguing this evening. They point out that 80 per cent of all library and 92 per cent of all university bookstore purchases are books not published in Canada; that only 17 per cent of all post-secondary textbook sales are from domestic publishers, roughly half of this number being published on the basis of adapted rights, and therefore less than 10 per cent of all university texts are of Canadian origin. They also quote figures from Ernst—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland) said in his intervention tonight that the purpose of raising this question was to draw the attention of the House to the urgency of maintaining a viable Canadian publishing industry. I would simply reiterate what has been stated by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), that this is an urgency of which we are all aware.

In the case of the pending sale of McClelland and Stewart I would like to set forth the following facts. Since the sale of McClelland and Stewart was first mooted by Mr. McClelland, officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce have been in constant touch with Mr. McClelland. At the beginning of March the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce met with Mr. McClelland, at which time Mr. McClelland assured him that although he was going to give U.S. companies the opportunity "to look him over" it was not his intention to sell to non-Canadian interests if at all possible. The government is sure Mr. McClelland would not take any precipitate action which would result in McClelland and Stewart passing into foreign control before consulting further with the Canadian government and the government of Ontario.

Mr. McClelland is continuing to negotiate with private Canadian commercial interests concerning the future of McClelland and Stewart, as well as with federal, provincial and private financial institutions. Of course, it would not be appropriate to comment on these discussions now. As the hon. member has pointed out, there have been a number of studies conducted and one important conference held on the state of the publishing industry. The information which we have now is far more complete than it was previously and, as I said at the beginning of my remarks, there is a very real sense of the urgency of the matter both on that side of the House and on this side. It is recognized that if publishing is to play its role it must be an economically viable industry, and all the departments concerned are continuing on an urgent basis to keep all possible options open to the government.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—DENIAL OF CANADIAN TELEVISION PROGRAMS TO WINDSOR STATION

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, the facts on which this question is based are as follows: in the first week of March, station CKLW-TV in Windsor was forced to withdraw the program "Rainbow Country" after 22 of 26 episodes had been shown because the CBC, which was the Canadian distributor and the co-producer, had entered into an agreement with American purchasers which banned this series from being shown in Windsor to enable it to be shown by Detroit stations for a higher price. That this is no random example of such a happening is indicated by the fact that earlier in the viewing season the program "Audubon Theatre" had also to be withdrawn after four episodes had been shown, and for the same reason.

There are many amusing aspects of this problem. One is that after entering into a form of agreement not to allow a series to be shown in Windsor, the CBC was not sufficiently alert to police its programming in order to see that the agreements were carried out. Another is that the CBC is a one-quarter owner of the station CKLW-TV and has agreed to take complete ownership within four years. However, these are not the important aspects, Mr. Speaker. The important aspect is the serious decision by the CBC to sell its programs to American buyers at the expense of Canadian viewers and Canadian stations.

We have to look at this from the viewpoint of both the viewers and the stations. Viewers in Windsor are confronted with the fact that they have available to them only one Canadian station out of some 15 VHF and UHF stations. The station is confronted with the fact that most American programs which are carried by the CBC cannot be carried by the CBC affiliate because the CBC has had to agree that they will not be shown there.

We have already been condemned to reruns of American programs. Are we to be condemned to reruns of Canadian programs as well? Is the CBC, if it can find American purchasers, going to sell the national news to them so that we viewers in Windsor will have to watch our news program on their station?

This is a situation there where CBC has shown a very serious lack of regard for both the station and the viewers in Windsor. It will probably plead commercial necessity; but while it is true that the CBC is not the sole producer, it is co-producer of these programs and it has considerable control over such commercial contracts.

Certainly the purpose of the CBC is not one which can be justified solely in commercial terms. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation was established by this House for the purpose of achieving broad objectives. All these objectives might be summed up in the words "Canadian culture". If Canadians in one part of Ontario are not to have access to Canadian culture, or are to have their access to it considerably limited by decisions of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation taken from purely commercial motives, this is not good enough. The CBC has a public duty to Canadian culture and to thousands of Canadians, especially in those parts of the country where it has affiliated stations.

I want to express to this House not only my own dissatisfaction but that of the citizens of Windsor with this action taken by the CBC.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the CBC reports that in general, full network programs produced by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation using its own facilities are released to all stations of the English television network, including affiliated stations such as CKLW-TV Windsor. However, CBC has accepted the practice for over ten years of not including its Windsor Affiliate in the initial scheduling of some of its programs for the following reasons: first, with respect to television series produced in the United States, and acquired by CBC from a Canadian distributor for full English television network release, United States distributors regard Windsor as part of the Detroit market in the United States, and therefore the rights acquired by the Canadian distributor seldom include Windsor. They are controlled in the United States.

Second, with respect to television series produced in Canada, and acquired by CBC from a Canadian distributor for full English television network release, except for the most inexpensive productions the sale of Canadian television rights rarely covers a major part of the full production cost. The largest television market is in the United States. In order to increase the private producer's chances for United States sales, CBC usually defers for a period of some months the right to include Windsor in its network schedule. If the Canadian producer has not made a United States sale in which the Windsor-Detroit market is involved within a specified period, CBC then has the right to schedule the series on the Windsor station.

Third, with respect to television series produced in Canada, and co-financed or co-produced by CBC, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation acquires Canadian television rights but usually defers its Windsor rights for the second reason given above. In order to attract production capital it is essential that United States market possibilities be enhanced. In CBC's view, the encouragement of private production companies is an important consideration in the development of Canadian content. The Canadian market is small in relation to the cost of production of television series. Nevertheless, an attempt is made to balance the private producer's cost-recovery problems against the desirability of including Windsor in the primary scheduling of full English television network programs, and wherever possible this is done.

I say simply, by way of conclusion, that in view of the hon. member's deep and abiding interest in this matter which affects his riding it might be useful to explore reasons one and two in particular with CBC officials when they come before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF ITALIAN PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION AND SECRETARY GENERAL OF INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

Mr. Speaker: May I bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of a delegation of parliamentarians from an enchanting country with which we have close ties of friendship; I am referring to Italy.

[English]

This distinguished group representing both Houses of the Italian Parliament is led jointly by Senator Antonio Pecoraro, and by the Honourable Giuseppe Fracassi. On behalf of all members of this House, I am pleased to extend to these visitors a most cordial welcome to Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: An equally distinguished compatriot of the members of that delegation is also present in the Speaker's gallery today, although he is here on a distinct mission. He is the recently appointed Secretary General of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, Mr. Pio-Carlo Terenzio.

[Translation]

Hon. members, especially those who are members of the Canadian group of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, are honoured that Mr. Terenzio should have come here for the express purpose of getting in touch with them at the beginning of his mandate. We wish him a most cordial welcome to Canada.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

THE CENSUS

TABLING OF LIST OF COMMISSIONERS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), the list of the census commissioners appointed on April 1, 1971, for the 1971 census.

MANPOWER

MEASURES TO ASSIST SCIENCE AND ENGINEERING GRADUATES TO OBTAIN APPROPRIATE EMPLOYMENT—STIMULATION OF RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the very alarming forecast with regard to the difficulties that graduates in science and engineering are foreseen as encountering in the immediate future and perhaps for some time, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he has any measures in mind to recommend to the government or any measures that he proposes to take to assist these graduates in obtaining appropriate employment in Canada so that we may retain the services of these highly trained individuals in Canada and avoid also discouraging those who are in the process of training in these fields? Has the minister any plans to propose?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made reference to what is a very serious problem in the field of science and engineering graduates which was to some extent evident last year, will be much more apparent this year and, again, will be a continuing problem next year. The report that has been published makes quite clear that it is unlikely that these science and engineering graduates, these highly trained men, will be without employment but suggests that perhaps they will not find for themselves the kind of employment which would be ideal from the point of view of their training. The fact of the matter is that, given the state of industrial and economic development which this country now has, given the degree to which our industrial and economic machinery in the scientific and technological field is currently staffed, there will not be immediately available the places to absorb, in the kinds of positions which have been classical in the past, all the opportunities needed. There will, I am sure, be employment for these qualified men, which will have the result of upgrading, I hope quite substantially and generally, our technology and its application.

Mr. Lewis: What did the minister say? What did you say, Bud?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I think in summary the minister said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition might ask a supplementary question.

An hon. Member: The reply will be interesting.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask the minister whether one of the fundamental reasons for the difficulty being faced by these engineering and science graduates is that research and development units developed by private industry have practically levelled off during the last three years under the present administration? Is the difficulty of these graduates not substantially due to the stagnation of research and development in this country—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Stanfield:—in private industry? Has the minister any plans—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question of the Leader of the Opposition, it seems to me, is in the form of an argument. I doubt whether it is in order.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he has any plans to encourage and stimulate the development of research and development units in the private sector in view of the difficulty that has been indicated?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister will be allowed to reply briefly to the Leader of the Opposition who asked him to indicate if he has any plans. If the minister has plans, I think that normally they should be announced or elaborated upon by way of a statement on motions.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Revenue with regard to the study he is now undertaking for the government with respect to foreign ownership. Will his study deal with the suppressive effect of branch plant operations in Canada on the research and development sector of our economy? Also, will the minister have suggestions to offer in that report for beefing up the research and development sector of the economy?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the elements that has been looked at.

Mr. Rowland: I wish to direct a further supplementary to the Minister of Supply and Services. Will the minister be looking into the suggestion contained in the science council background report that government contracts and other purchasing agreements might more commonly include provisions for research and development expenditures as a means of obtaining improved supplies and services for the government?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): I will be looking at the report, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. I wish to ask the President of the Treasury Board whether he has any programs to encourage research and development. If so, will he take the earliest opportunity to inform the House about them?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the House is aware that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce has a number of programs in the science and engineering field. It is in the process of revising them to make them more effective than they have been over the past year.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary. I wish to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when he will be able to inform the House as to the measures he proposes his department and the government should take to encourage research and development?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman had had the privilege of taking part in the discussion of our estimates going on now in committee, he would have heard a full report on the amount of research and development support to industry which is given by my department. He would know that we are constantly revising our programs to make them more effective. He would also know that we have made some major changes for example in our DIP program to make it more civilian-oriented than in the past and that we have made many changes in the PAIT program to convert to grants what used to be offered as loans.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that very soon we ought to go on to another subject, but for the moment I will recognize the hon. member for Joliette.

PUBLIC SERVICE

FRANCOPHONE HIRING PROGRAM— NUMBER ALREADY EMPLOYED

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Joliette wish to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

With reference to the policy of hiring 250 francophones, I should like to ask the minister whether he can say if he has started hiring these francophone university graduates, and how long it will be before these 250 francophones are recruited?

Mr. Speaker: I dare suggest to the hon. member that his question is not directly related to the one asked by the Leader of the Opposition, but since the question has been put, it may be simpler to let the minister answer it.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to try to get this information and relay it to the hon. member.

INDUSTRY

CHEMICALS—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON PROBLEMS

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in connection with the chemical industry and the fact that they would employ many of these graduate students. Has the minister's department heard yet from the joint government-industry committee which was set up to study the problems being faced by the chemical industry? Has that committee made a report to the government yet?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that the supplementary is not related to the original question. The question will be allowed, but the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands on a different subject immediately thereafter.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that study is very well known in my department because my department is taking part in it. The report on the necessity of having more foreign markets in order to build a viable base in Canada, has not yet reached me. I am waiting for it.

ENERGY

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—AVAILABILITY OF BASIC INFORMATION TO PUBLIC

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of his speech in Vancouver to the Canadian Pipeline Constructors Association in which he called for a great public debate on the question of a northern pipeline on the ground that an informed public was needed in order to advise the government so that the latter could produce sound and lasting decisions. In view of the fact that public participation in such a dialogue requires certain basic information to be furnished, can the minister tell us when we may expect, first, the white paper on energy resources, second, the ecological studies of the effects of a pipeline in the Arctic and, third, a report on the economic impact of a project of this magnitude?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I am not sure what the hon. member has in mind when he refers to a white paper. No such paper is contemplated at the present time. With regard to the many studies which are being made in connection with the economics and the ecological safety of a pipeline through the Mackenzie Valley, both I and, I believe, some of the organizations in the private sector which are undertaking such research, have disclosed at considerable length what is going on. Whether the scientific papers will be disclosed or whether they will be left for use should an application be made has not yet been decided, but certainly the nature and extent of these studies has been disclosed by me here in the House, at Vancouver and other speeches and also by the pipeline researchers themselves.

CANADIAN COMMUNICATIONS CORRIDOR FROM ALASKA TO UNITED STATES

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the report of the minister's speech indicates that he spoke of a Canadian corridor from Prudhoe Bay to the United States border through which would run oil and gas pipelines, a highway and a railway, I want to ask whether the government has any plans for constructing a highway and a railway through the Arctic or whether this reference was merely a manifestation of the minister's exuberance?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not believe the speech itself dealt with the specifics of what would be in the corridor but reference was made to one of the guidelines issued by the government in August in anticipation of the pipeline question and after two years of research. This indicated there would not be pipelines or roads or rails all over the north but that there would be a single corridor concept through which all the various avenues of communications would be directed.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the statement by Mr. Edward Patton, President of Alyeska Pipeline Service Company, when he was appearing before a legislative committee in Alaska, to the effect that the Alyeska Company was not interested in building a pipeline through Canada, may I ask the minister whether there is any group presently evincing an interest in the construction of such a pipeline or whether the debate which is contemplated is going to be about a pipe-dream rather than about a pipeline?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CENSUS

INQUIRY RESPECTING APPOINTMENTS OF COMMISSIONERS

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Could the minister say what procedure was followed by his department for the appointment of census commissioners, a list of which he has just tabled in the House, since for the constituency of Shefford, for instance, I note that all six commissioners are officials of the Liberal party organization in Shefford?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the answer is very easy. I simply followed the procedure described in section 5(1) of the Statistics Act. At one time, I did consider consulting my hon. friend to ask him for names but as I know, first of all, that he has no friends but his supporters, and in the second place as I know he was opposed to my appointing supporters, I refrained from doing so.

Mr. Rondeau: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Further to his reply, can the minister assure us that the names appearing on the list are really those of commissioners, and that he has not inadvertently submitted the list of members of the Liberal association of my riding?

Mr. Speaker: Order. As phrased, the question is hardly in order.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

MARITIME PROVINCES—CHANGING OF FINANCIAL POLICIES IN KEEPING WITH ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL RECOMMENDATIONS—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. It concerns a report just released an hour ago in Halifax by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion containing the recommendations of the Atlantic Development Council, a government agency. Is the government now prepared to change its monetary, fiscal and tariff policies in keeping with the recommendations of the council to foster and generate economic growth in the Atlantic area?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot answer the question directly beyond saying that we have had policies that are precisely designed to foster economic growth in those areas and which in fact have had that effect.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received the report, has it been considered in cabinet, and will the Prime Minister table the report which was released to the press in Halifax just an hour ago by one of his ministers so that members of the House will have the same privilege that the press have at the present time?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Fundy-Royal on a supplementary.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister wanted to answer my question. I wish he would do so.

Mr. Speaker: There seems to be some reluctance. The Chair recognizes the hon. member for Fundy-Royal on a supplementary.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in relation to the statement. What steps is the government taking to lower trade barriers so that an increase in trade can take place between the Atlantic provinces and the New England states, as forecast in a speech by the Prime Minister in Saint John last December and as taken seriously by the Atlantic Development Council and, incidentally, by M.P.'s from the Maritimes?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Generally speaking, Mr. Speaker, we do not lower tariffs on a regional basis. Second, it is very doubtful whether the United States government would have the power to negotiate such tariff reductions at this time.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, may I redirect my question, which the Prime Minister refused to answer, to the now occupied President of the Privy Council. May I ask the government House leader whether the government has received the report of the Atlantic Development Council released just an hour ago to the press by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and is the minister prepared to table the report so that Members of Parliament will have a chance to study it?

Mr. Speaker: My understanding is that this is a matter that does not come under the administrative responsibility of the minister. I believe the hon. member's question was properly directed in the first instance when it was asked of the Prime Minister.

Mr. McGrath: Then may I redirect my question to the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. May I say, with great respect, that this report was released in the city of Halifax by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, and all I am asking is that the Prime Minister table the report so that Members of Parliament may have a chance to look at it.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I understand that this is a report that was directed by an advisory council to the minister just in the last few days. I have not yet seen a copy of the report, but I would invite the hon. member to table his copy and perhaps the House can then study it.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to comply with the wish of the Prime Minister and I table a copy of the report forthwith.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that even the right hon. Prime Minister cannot change the rules.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member knows that he cannot table a document. According to our rules this is not in order. The hon. member may bring the document to the attention of other hon. members, but there is no provision under our Standing Orders for a member of the House to table a document in the way which is now being attempted by the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I then ask for the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions so that I can table this report under the provisions of Standing Order 41(2)?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Agreed!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I really do not think that the provisions of Standing Order 41(2) are applicable in this instance. In any event, I will read Standing Order 41(2) for the benefit of hon. members. It reads as follows:

A Minister of the Crown, or a Parliamentary Secretary acting on behalf of a Minister—

The hon. member may have been either promoted or demoted, according to the way he wants to look at it, but it is not my understanding that he falls under either of these two designations. I suggest to hon. members that we are not making much headway in this regard. The hon. member has no right under the rules to table the document.

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I say, with great respect, that I was acting on behalf of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE CENSUS

TYPE OF QUESTIONS TO BE ASKED

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has to do with a document which, if tabled in the House, would be incomprehensible to most members. I refer to the 1971 census which is full of questions of all varieties and types, including such questions as, when you enter your living quarters do you go in by a common hall or through someone else's living quarters.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It also asks, do you have a flush toilet, and other questions of an intimate nature in the domesticity of the home. It also has all the appearance of being of interest to those who have set out certain principles in the white paper on taxation because it asks, if you were selling your home now, how much would you expect to get for it.

I ask the minister whether he reviewed this conglomerate mess before it was made available as an official document? I would like very much to know why "snoopocracy" of this kind is being tolerated today in our country.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the opposition will sooner or later get together and reconcile their views. One day I am accused by one of them of playing with statistics, of telling DBS what to do, and the next day I am accused of not doing so.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baldwin: Yes, we are right on both counts.

Mr. Pepin: I suggest that they should make up their minds.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So the minister's admission is that this is an opportunity for the government to obtain correct statistics, and if you do not answer every question you are liable to a $300 fine—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman may have a supplementary question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to the question. In view of the fact that the fine will be $300 if you do not answer this mess of questions, does the minister not agree that there will be only two classes of people in Canada, those in jail and the rest waiting to get in?

AGRICULTURE

ALLOCATION OF DAIRY QUOTAS—AVAILABILITY TO PROSPECTIVE PRODUCERS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSED CHANGES

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he can inform the House if any change is contemplated in the policy which has been followed by the Canadian Dairy Commission in respect of the allocation of dairy quotas to producers. Will some quota allotments be made available to prospective producers who do not now have quota allotments or do not qualify under the policy that has been followed?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that any policy changes are under consideration at present which would increase the total amount of the subsidy eligibility quota, but I could advise you, Sir, that discussions are going on now between the provincial agencies responsible for milk marketing and the Canadian Dairy Commission as to the way of transferring both the market-sharing quota and the subsidy eligibility quota.

Mr. Gleave: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the minister's reply to my question, would he be prepared to make a statement on motions very soon and inform the House as to what changes his department, in consultation with other governments, is proposing to make?

Mr. Olson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think I would be prepared to make a statement on motions as soon as there is general agreement between those provinces which have entered into a market-sharing quota and the Canadian Dairy Commission as to the new rules, regulations and criteria for transfers.

Mr. Gleave: The minister referred to those provinces which have entered into an agreement. May I ask the minister what the position of those provinces which have not entered into an agreement will be, and will his statement cover that?

Mr. Olson: Quite obviously there is no question of transferability of the market quota in those provinces which do not have a market quota. In so far as the subsidy eligibility quota is concerned, there may be some consequential and minor amendments required, but we do not intend to have a major change in the transfer of the subsidy eligibility quota at the moment.

DAIRYING—TRANSFER OF QUOTAS WITHOUT INCLUSION OF HERD AND IN SMALLER AMOUNTS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): I wonder if the minister, before making his statement on motions, would give consideration in the negotiations to having the federal quotas transferred without inclusion of the herd, and also would he consider whether smaller amounts could be transferred?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): That is one of the considerations that the negotiations are taking into account now.

DAIRYING—POLICY RESPECTING ANTICIPATED PENSIONS AND TRANSFORMATION OF CERTAIN OPERATIONS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister a supplementary question.

At the last meeting with provincial ministers, was any reference made to new funds or grants with regard to, if I am not mistaken, pre-retirement benefits for older producers and transformation of some operations? Is the minister in a position to say what he thinks about it and whether the policy will be announced soon?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): No, Mr. Speaker, I cannot give any further details respecting this until we have come to an understanding with the provinces. We have had one meeting with all the ministers. There is another meeting later this month of the deputy ministers. If at that time there are some positive details that can be announced that have been agreed on, I will be happy to do so.

THE CENSUS

PUBLICATION OF LIST OF COMMISSIONERS AS APPENDIX TO HANSARD

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the fact that a large number of Canadians are currently seeking employment and that census commissioners are in a position to hire personnel, could the minister have printed in appendix to Hansard the list he tabled so that the unemployed know where to apply for a job?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this list is available and should my hon. friend want a copy of it, I shall be pleased to send him one.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATUS OF RESTRUCTURING OF PAY SCHEDULES OF CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): My question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Can the minister bring us up to date on the present status of the restructuring by him and his colleague, the Minister of National Defence, of the pay schedules for the Canadian Armed Forces, promised for some time this month?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): I will have to take notice of the question, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSED SALE OF IMPORTED BULLS—RETENTION OF SEMEN FOR CANADIAN FARMERS AND RANCHERS

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): My question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the proposed sale by the Department of Agriculture of imported bulls presently being held for semen collection at the government experimental farms at Lacombe and Brandon, can the minister assure the House and farmers of the nation that any sale will be made with the assurance that a percentage of the semen collected will be retained by the Department of Agriculture so that semen will be available to Canadian farmers and ranchers at a price they can afford?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether this might not be the kind of question which might easily be placed on the order paper.

HOUSING

URBAN RENEWAL FUNDS—DIRECT DEALING WITH MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of housing. In view of the statement issued by the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities that present federal government policies may be making the housing situation worse instead of better, would the minister put an immediate end to the freeze on urban renewal funds and in so doing deal directly with the muncipalities which have a better view of the situation and are more sensitive to the needs of the people?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there was not a curtailment of urban renewal funds. We are in fact spending more on urban renewal now than before the dialogue and debate arose as a result of the task force on housing and urban affairs about two years ago. I did tell the mayors we were interested in discussing this as well as all other urban problems in tri-level consultations which are hopefully scheduled to begin before too long.

MONTREAL—REPLY TO CITY'S HOME RENOVATION PROPOSALS

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister in charge of housing. Has the minister given any reply to the city of Montreal regarding the proposals that city made to him about two weeks ago regarding the renovation of 100,000 homes in the Montreal area?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we had a very constructive meeting about two weeks ago with the Minister of Municipal Affairs from the province of Quebec and some of his officials and the mayor of Montreal and Mr. Niding and some of their officials from the city administration. We agreed to establish a co-ordinating and working committee between the federal government, the provincial government and the city of Montreal to address ourselves to all those problems. I heralded that meeting and the commitment to consult further as a major breakthrough in tri-level co-ordination and co-operation.

URBAN RENEWAL—USE OF TRI-LEVEL COMMITTEES TO INVESTIGATE CITY PROBLEMS—ESTABLISHMENT OF GUIDELINES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary to the minister in charge of housing. Am I to take it from the minister's answer that this will be the policy of the government in order to alleviate the growing problems of the major cities throughout the country?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I think that one flew past my ear. I am not quite sure to what the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can explain it a little more clearly for the minister. In view of the fact he has just indicated he is setting up a committee representative of the city of Montreal, the province and the federal government to look into that city's several urban problems, will that be the policy of the government in respect of all other major cities throughout the country, including the city of Hamilton which has been continually pressing the minister for more funds for urban renewal?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, without going back to the more funds for urban renewal for Hamilton question, which battle we fought last year, the general principle of tri-level negotiation and co-operation, if the provinces are willing to join with us in that kind of endeavour, is very close indeed to my heart.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the mayors and reeves have indicated how important urban renewal problems are, or regeneration as the case may be, is it the intention of the minister to bring down guidelines now keeping in mind the several suggestions which have been made by the mayors in order that we can have some sort of policy from this government in terms of attempting to alleviate the several problems of urban renewal?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the minister might reply briefly. We have spent quite a bit of time on one question and three or four supplementaries.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, urban renewal under section 23(b) of the National Housing Act is only one of many programs, and last year we spent $1.1 billion and this year we will spend about $1 billion directly through CMHC, to say nothing of the vast amounts of money being spent by many other departments of this government in help to the cities.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am certainly accustomed to the answer the minister has continually given me for the past two years. All I asked was whether the government is thinking about indicating guidelines in respect of urban renewal, and the minister will not answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member may not be satisfied with the reply given by the minister but I suggest to him that is not a point of order.

PROPOSED REHABILITATION AND SOCIAL SERVICE PROGRAMS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary to the minister. Is he giving consideration to the proposals made yesterday that the federal government fund neighbourhood rehabilitation programs and fund social service programs to permit improvement of the environment in other forms except provision of shelter?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, this much more comprehensive approach is one we are examining with great sympathy and with a considerable bias toward ultimately arriving at this kind of policy approach.

UNEMPLOYMENT—PROJECTED REDUCTIONS FOR 1971

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister has rejected the requests of Metro Toronto and the city for additional programs to fight the problems of high unemployment on the ground that present government policies are more effective, is the Prime Minister able to give the House specific levels of reduced unemployment for 1971?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I cannot, of course, predict what will happen in the months to come, but for the month already expired the figures have been given to the House and they are known to the House.

Mr. Ryan: Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister undertake to work out some projections of reduced unemployment levels for the country for the year ahead?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, at the time of the budget we do attempt to indicate to the House of Commons and to the people the shape of economic things to come.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CITIZENSHIP

ALLEGED INTERFERENCE BY CIVIL SERVANTS IN JUDGES' DECISIONS—SPECIAL STATUS FOR BRITISH SUBJECTS

Mr. Gaétan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for citizenship I should like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Following charges yesterday by a citizenship court judge to the effect that senior civil servants attempt in some instances to influence decisions on citizenship applications and the British subjects are given additional special status by Ottawa officials, would the Prime Minister tell the House what his reactions are to these charges and whether he would ask the minister responsible to conduct a personal inquiry into the matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the second part of the question is in order, but the hon. member cannot ask what the Prime Minister's reaction was to the circumstances to which he has alluded. The Prime Minister might reply to the second part of the hon. member's question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the subject was drawn to my attention before coming into the House and I have ascertained that the minister will do what the hon. member suggested. He will look into the matter, make an inquiry and report to the House as soon as possible, perhaps even tomorrow when he will be in the House. Could I be allowed to answer a question asked yesterday, Mr. Speaker?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is no difficulty whatsoever about the Prime Minister answering a question asked yesterday. A suggestion was made by a member of the cabinet the other day that the Chair does not allow ministers to take the initiative to reply to questions asked previously. What I have objected to from time to time is that a minister, while he has the floor, replies to a prior question without allowing a supplementary. However, since there is no supplementary at this time it is quite in order for the Prime Minister to seek permission of the House and of the Chair in order to reply to a prior or previous question.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

REQUEST FOR TABLING CORRESPONDENCE CONCERNING CONCLUSION OF COMMISSION'S WORK

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was asked a series of questions yesterday concerning the B and B commission and I wish to refer particularly to the question concerning the exchange of correspondence between myself and members of the commission. I did look into it and I can report to the House there was no further exchange of correspondence beyond that already tabled in the House on March 17, which corresponded pretty directly to the type of question asked by the hon. member for York South. That was tabled on March 17 and I have not been able to find any further correspondence.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Did the Prime Minister not get a letter from one of the commissioners, Professor J. B. Rudnyckyj, dated March 16 in which he made certain recommendations to the Prime Minister, and would the Prime Minister be prepared to table that letter?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot remember having received such a letter but I will look into it and if I have I will see if it can be tabled.

GRAIN

WHEAT—PREVIOUS LOANS UNDER CASH ADVANCE PROGRAM—DATE MONEY AVAILABLE IN CURRENT CROP YEAR

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the substantial changes being made in the cash advance program for the 1971-72 crop year, when will the minister be in a position to announce what the situation is regarding previous loans, and the date cash advances will be available in the current crop year?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, if there are to be substantial changes in the cash advances program I am sure that my colleague, the minister from Saskatchewan, after taking that into account will announce whatever changes are necessary to take care of the advances that are outstanding now.

NATIONAL PARKS

ELK ISLAND—ANIMAL STARVATION—FAILURE OF WILDLIFE SERVICE TO DIRECT REDUCTION IN ELK POPULATION COMMENSURATE WITH FEED SUPPLIES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who is supposed to be here today, but in his absence I will direct it to the acting minister or to his parliamentary secretary. It has to do with the starvation of elk and other animal wildlife in Elk Island National Park. In view of what has transpired there, can the parliamentary secretary indicate whether the department is looking into the operations of the Canadian Wildlife Service, which serves the parks administration in an advisory capacity, to determine why a directive was not issued recommending a fall reduction in the elk population commensurate with available feed supplies?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that this kind of question might be placed on the order paper. I am not familiar with the details of the matter brought to the attention of the House by the hon. member, but it seems to me he is referring to a situation that has already passed, and, in those terms the question might be placed on the order paper. In any event, I note that the parliamentary secretary has taken notice of the question.

Mr. Mazankowski: On a point of order and with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, since park officials are now engaged in mercy killing of elk and other wildlife, with the meat being of no saleable—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the additional circumstances mentioned by the hon. member, but he has noted that the parliamentary secretary has taken notice of the question.

Mr. Mazankowski: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would merely like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether he can give the House and the people of Canada an assurance that such a situation will not happen again in the future?

OIL

PROPOSED NORTHERN PIPELINE—DETAILS OF ECOLOGICAL STUDIES

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of statements made by the Canadian Wildlife Federation that there is little research being conducted on the ecological results of oil pipelines in the north, will the minister list with the House the studies presently under way, the location of each project, and the staff which is carrying it out?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would think that question should be placed on the order paper.

ELECTIONS

PROVISION OF RIGHT TO VOTE TO CANADIANS RESIDING OUTSIDE COUNTRY

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will urgent consideration be given to providing the right to vote to all eligible Canadians residing outside Canada in the next federal election, particularly people who are employed at the United Nations and others who are not in the armed services?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's very interesting question could also be placed on the order paper.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Would he tell the House if he intends to ask the government to amend the Bank of Canada Act and the Bank Act concerning chartered banks to establish government participation in the major decisions of the banks and the economic independence they advocate?

Mr. Speaker: I believe that the question asked by the hon. member has already been asked several times and I wonder if it could not be put on the order paper.

BROADCASTING

PROVISION OF TELEVISION SERVICE TO NORTHERN COMMUNITIES—CONSULTATIONS WITH RESIDENTS ON PROGRAMMING

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the fact that television will soon be available to northern communities through the Telesat satellite, are there any plans, or have consultations been held or are consultations being held with northern residents, concerning programming? Further, are there any plans to include natives in the areas of acting and film production as recommended recently by the National Indian Brotherhood?

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with the details but I will be happy to draw the matter to the attention of the minister.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR STUDENTS

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that in reply to a question from the hon. member for Athabasca last Friday I indicated that it was my assumption that the jobs provided in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for native students would be filled through the Public Service Commission. In fact they are being handled through the regional offices of the Department.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Textile and Clothing Board Act

• (3:00 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT, INQUIRIES, REPORTS, ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE FOR WORKERS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved that Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, on rising to speak on Bill C-215, an act to establish the Textile Clothing Board, I should first like to make some general comments regarding the basic liberal philosophy which surrounds so many of the current problems facing the country. I would commend to all hon. members on the opposite side of the House a book written by that distinguished spokesman for conservatism, William F. Buckley, entitled "Up From Liberalism." One of the chapters in Mr. Buckley's book is entitled "The Liberal—and the Obliging Order," sub-headed "Our Age of Modulation." Mr. Buckley has several interesting things to say. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the age of liberal modulation is in no way better illustrated than in the liberal lexicon for describing current social phenomena. For instance, it is most revealing to note that no longer do our societies have ghettos, but rather in the liberal view we have "centres of ethnic concentration," and so on.

I have made these introductory remarks merely to illustrate that once again this confused manner of liberal thinking is present in the bill now under consideration. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) refers to the bill as having the purpose of "rationalizing" the textile and clothing industry in Canada, whereas in every eventuality, as I believe all hon. members on this side of the House know, the result of the bill will be to build a high protectionist tariff wall, particularly around low cost cotton imports.

I wish to quote a few passages from an editorial entitled "Protection Will Out" which was published in the Winnipeg Free Press on March 22, 1971:

> Any doubts as to Mr. Pepin's attitude should be dispelled by his response as minister to various proposals for modifying the bill. Since it first appeared there has been much criticism that it goes too far, even on the doubtful premise that something more should be done for the textile industry...In consequence, various amendments were offered when the legislation was reported back to the House. Their purpose was not to destroy the bill; merely to remove or ameliorate some of its worst features. It would have been quite open to Mr. Pepin to accept any of these or to propose acceptable substitutes. This is a perfectly normal procedure; the government would have lost nothing by following it and might have gained marks for good sense.
> What happened? The first amendment on Thursday was in the name of Gordon Ritchie and called for regional representation on the new clothing board. The method proposed may have been imperfect but the intent—of providing a consumer voice—was clear enough. Mr. Pepin rejected this out of hand...
> The next two amendments were offered by G. W. Baldwin. In these cases the intent was even clearer. It was to limit the new textiles legislation to textiles. For the astonishing thing about the bill is that it is not so limited. Under the guise of helping one afflicted industry, it opens the way to general restriction by order in council. One section of it refers to the anti-dumping act, using the words: "in respect of any goods other than textile and clothing goods." Thus, if there is injury—or even threat of injury—to manufacturers not in textiles, the government will be able to rescue them too by placing the offending goods, on the import control list. For Mr. Pepin, that is a convenient arrangement. He turned down the amendment.
> Mr. Baldwin then moved to delete clause 27 of the bill, which refers to the Customs Act, again using the word "goods". The purpose here is to reinforce the government's method of blocking imports by imposing "voluntary" quotas on other states.
> As Mr. Baldwin judiciously observed, there is no more connection between that clause and the inherent principles of a textile bill than there is between rapeseed and immorality. But again, it provides a weapon of convenience for a protectionist minister and Mr. Pepin would not tolerate its removal...
> With this in hand and no one upset (apart from knavish importers and long suffering consumers), he will be able as minister in charge of trade and commerce to revert to the congenial task of lecturing a wayward world on the evils of restrictionism and the superior morality of freer trade as practised preferably on a one-way basis by this enlightened nation.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that Bill C-215, simply reflects the fact that certain sectors of the Canadian textile and clothing industry are uncompetitive with their counterparts in other countries of the world. Following from that summary of the problem, we must then look to see what proposals are being put forth in this bill to remedy the situation, what the people who are most actively engaged in the industry think their basic problems to be, and what their assessment is of the likelihood of these problems being overcome in the foreseeable future.

During the course of the examination of this bill by the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of which I am a member, we had the opportunity of hearing a number of expert witnesses representing different and contrasting viewpoints on the implications of this proposed bill. A number of them also commented at length on the state of the Canadian textile and clothing industry. One such witness was Mr. G. L. Bruck, President, Bruck Mills Limited, who appeared before the committee on February 18, 1971.

The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik), asked Mr. Bruck if he thought there was any real hope of the Canadian textile industry becoming competitive in the international market in Canada. Mr. Bruck responded as follows, and I quote:

> Well, my answer is "yes", we are competitive with most countries in the international field and I mean truly competitive. We are not complaining about what is happening to us from importations from the European countries, or even the United States. We feel that with the present tariffs, although they are not terribly high, they are adequate, and we have to learn to operate within these limitations.
> To say that we must be competitive with Korea, Taiwan, Japan, Mainland China, or any of these countries, well, that is drawing a rather long bow. I am not quite certain how they are going to get up to $3.00 an hour salaries and other such fringes. Let us wait and see.

Mr. Bruck was asked further if he did not think that the real problems of that portion of our textile and clothing industry which face the greatest competition from countries in the far East originated from the industry in Canada not being as technologically advanced as its foreign competitors. Again, I think it is most revealing to quote to hon. members the reply which Mr. Bruck made on this particular point. Mr. Speaker, he said, and I quote:

> I disagree completely with that view. I think our industry is well up. We are keeping up with the technological advances. It is possible that our industry does not have everything the next fellow wants at all times. This can never be. No country in the world can provide everything, and in that context, as Mr. Armstrong said, we do not expect to have the entire Canadian market. We have 50 per cent now. Perhaps if we had 60 to 65 per cent we would have come a long way. So from the point of view of not keeping up, we say this is completely wrong, we are right there.

I think that I am summarizing the essence of the witness's testimony when I say that, in fact, he admitted that the section of the Canadian textile and clothing industry which specializes in cotton goods can never, in the foreseeable future, become competitive with goods produced abroad. Notwithstanding this admission, he still feels that the industry should be entitled to some 60 or 65 per cent of the Canadian market in these products. While that viewpoint is to some degree understandable coming from the industry, I do not think it is at all understandable or justifiable when we relate it to the broad and vast interests of the Canadian public as a whole. I think we need to remind the industry, that it exists to serve the needs of the Canadian people and not the reverse. If an industry is not competitive and has few prospects for becoming competitive, and if similar products can be imported from abroad at a price which allows low income Canadian families in particular to benefit from the import, then I think we have a compelling obligation to see that the interests of the greatest number of people are protected.

I simply do not see the purpose of using tariffs or import licences to protect an industry which can never become competitive. I think the history of tariffs or other similar restrictive devices has shown that once erected, they are seldom torn down. Moreover, the countries against whom they are erected usually respond by establishing their own tariffs against those commodities of which we are most productive.

Those hon. members who have followed recent trends in trading patterns cannot, I think, but become gravely concerned at what appears to be the very real possibility that an intense trading war may be developing between the United States and the European Economic Community on one hand, and the United States and Japan on the other. When one bears in mind the size of these trading blocks, and further remembers that Canada is not a member of any of them, it becomes readily apparent that we could be caught in the middle of a giant conflict, thus incurring all of the damage to which we would be subject in such a position.

At the outset of my speech, Mr. Speaker, I spoke of the manner in which the liberal mind distorts realities. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has stated that this bill has as its purpose the rationalization of the Canadian textile and clothing industries, or certain portions of them. I quite agree that the purpose of the bill is to rationalize certain matters, but what concerns me is that the rationalization which the bill may bring about will be the type of rationalization which will permit a number of uncompetitive segments of these industries in central Canada, namely Ontario and Quebec, to remain in existence, while the consumers of western Canada, that is those in the portions of Canada west and north of the boundary of Ontario, will have thrust upon them unnecessary costs through tariff structures to protect an industry which does not warrant protection.

In addition to western Canada, we must also remember those many Canadians in our Atlantic provinces who will also suffer increased costs for cotton imports and who are in an area of Canada not known for high wage rates. As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has stated on a number of occasions, his department conducted an exhaustive two year study of the Canadian textile and clothing industry as a prelude to drafting the present bill. I should think, as a result of that study, he and his senior officials would know quite clearly at this date that those segments of the textile and clothing industry in Canada which persist in attempting to compete with low cost imports from Japan and Taiwan, Mainland China and Korea, can never become competitive. If they are to remain in the Canadian market, their presence can only be maintained by Canadians having to pay an unreasonable and unjustifiably higher cost for their basic cotton goods than they otherwise would.

Western Canada has become increasingly successful in developing export markets with the Far East. While the bulk of our exports consist of primary industry products, their export is, nevertheless, a significant item in Canada's international balance of payments. In addition, these exports provide a broader and greatly needed economic base in western Canada from which we expect secondary industries will be developed. Western Canadians would naturally and rightly look with the utmost disfavour and concern upon any measures which might be adopted to protect at the possible expense of these markets, industries in central Canada which have for decades been the recipients of heavy tariffs and other protections, all of which have been borne with resentment by Canadians in our western provinces.

I strongly caution the government against passing legislation which will not in any significant way assist those segments of the Canadian textile and clothing industry which are experiencing extreme difficulties in remaining in their fields, and which at the same time will result in Canadians paying unnecessarily increased costs for many textile imports. Not only will import licences restrict choice, but their great harm will be in the potential threat which they represent to some of our largest and best trading partners whose good will we should be cultivating rather than testing.

The real danger in this legislation is that it could so very easily be cited as a precedent by other Canadian industries experiencing difficulties similar to those of our textile and clothing industry which, in fairness, the government ought to extend to them. Are we then to see a proliferation of boards and acts similar to the present legislation, each with the power to urge measures upon the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce which in their total could make us one of the most portectionist countries in the world, with obvious consequences for our exporters. With the difficulties which Canadian exporters are already experiencing, including those which have arisen from our floating—perhaps I should say bloating—Canadian dollar, the government should not be embarking on courses which could well set off anticipatory reactions amongst our trading partners, particularly in the Pacific area.

Much has been said in our country, Mr. Speaker, in these past, uncertain months about the need to foster Canadian unity. We in western Canada cannot be unified with central Canada if we are to be separated by tariff walls. We have acted in good faith in understanding the needs of other parts of Canada and now we must insist that the same good faith be extended to our needs. If the government damages relations with our major trading partners through measures such as those proposed in the present bill, we can only conclude that western Canadian alienation from the Canadian union will be further enhanced.

Mr. Normal Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in reviewing this bill for a brief moment, I want to say that I am fully in agreement with its intentions. I am a member of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of this House which reviewed this bill in considerable detail. I think that it skates the very difficult route between the interests of textile manufacturers and those of the consumers of textiles in Canada, and I think it does this very well. I think that through the establishment of the textile board, the bill will make it possible for action to be taken to rationalize the textile industry in the interest of both the consumers and the manufacturers.

One thing concerns me particularly at this moment and I hope in his concluding remarks that the minister will touch on the question of adjustment assistance for workers. Clause 21 of the bill almost parallels a similar legislative provision connected with the auto pact under which transitional assistance benefits are made available to people displaced as a result of the operation of the auto agreement. What concerns me is whether the decision of the textile board as to whether or not people are qualified for these benefits is subject to appeal. I know that in the case of the auto pact there are no such provisions within the act itself; and, indeed, there are no such provisions for appeal within the bill we are now considering.

I pursued this question in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. When I did so, the minister indicated that he would take my views into consideration and, in the House, indicate whether appeals would be allowed by trade unions or representatives of employees if new evidence was available to show that they should, in fact, be granted such eligibility. I hope that the minister will assure this House today that those groups will actually be given an opportunity to appeal decisions made by the textile board in connection with their eligibility. Provided that assurances are given that appeals will be heard if new evidence is available to indicate that they should be granted that eligibility, I would be quite prepared to support this bill enthusiastically.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party supported this bill on second reading. Having seen the bill through the committee stage, we are now prepared to support the bill on third reading, despite some reservations which I shall attempt to set out in the course of my remarks.

Basically, we consider that this is a new step which represents an innovation on the Canadian scene in trying to find solutions to the problems that face the textile and clothing industry. We wish the government luck in its program, and we will be watching the actions of both the government and the board very closely as they attempt to grapple with the difficult problems facing this industry. While we have some reservations on some aspects of the bill, nevertheless we believe it represents a step forward in government policy. I think it should be noted here, as it has been during the committee hearings, that there is a possibility that, on the basis of the experience gained through the operations of this board, the principle involved may be extended to other fields of industrial activity in Canada. We hope that this proposal will be of assistance in finding a solution to the very difficult problems of the industry concerned. I think it should be noted that the government has a particular responsibility, in view of the very wide ranging policy considerations involved, to deal with the problems with which we are confronted in the textile and clothing field.

Of course, we shall have to deal with conflicting interests, and there are some difficult conflicts of interest to contend with as we attempt to find a sensible and reasonable solution to some of the problems before us. We must take into account the fact that we want to see a viable textile industry in Canada. On the other hand, we must also recognize that we trade with the rest of the world, and that Canada is greatly dependent on trade for the carrying on of its economic activities.

Some conflicts of interest have resulted in concerns which have been expressed, both on the floor of the House and during committee hearings. In particular, those concerns have been expressed by some hon. members who are involved with and concerned about the situation affecting western Canada. I speak as a member from western Canada. Concerns respecting questions of trade and respecting, particularly, agricultural products have been raised in the discussion on this bill. Most of these concerns arise with respect to the degree of protection which will be afforded to the textile and clothing industry as a result of the activities that will be carried on by the proposed textile and clothing board. Concerns and fears have been expressed as to how these will affect the economic interests of people in other parts of Canada. For instance, in western Canada people are concerned about agricultural trade and agricultural exports. Thus, we see that this bill affects various sectors of the Canadian economy and we must give it careful consideration.

It seems to me that some of the concerns expressed from time to time have not been totally rational. I say this with the greatest of respect, at the same time noting that some of the concerns expressed are valid and should be taken into account. I believe, too that some of the concerns which have been expressed from time to time have been expressed in a way which I do not think reflects the degree of maturity that we require in Canada to deal with the various interests, concerns and conflicts with which we are faced.

Speaking as a member from western Canada I can say, as hon. members will be aware and as you, Sir, will be very much aware, that from time to time—many hon. members would say "on numerous occasions"—problems of western Canada have been brought before the House. These have involved everything from damp wheat and farm income to wheat sales, grain movements and so on. These constitute very real problems for us. I might say that while remarks about these problems were listened to with interest by members in some parts of the House, there was also a certain amount of reaction from members coming from other parts of Canada. They were very unhappy that some of us from western Canada had taken advantage of numerous occasions to raise some of these problems. I suggest that many of those members did a disservice to Canada and to Canadian unity by not giving proper recognition to the very real problems that some of us were attempting to raise.

In the bill under consideration, we are concerned about the problems of the textile and clothing industry. As has been noted, these are very real problems. The industry has had to contend with problems of low cost imports. These have had a very serious effect on employment in the industry. Some of the provisions of the bill, of course, have been drafted with this factor in mind.

My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), will be dealing with some of the considerations involved in the assistance to workers which may result from any further dislocation to this industry. The fact is that this industry has faced serious disruption and serious problems. It is obvious that the industry must adjust. It requires time to make these adjustments, but nevertheless they must be made. In addition, further adjustments will be forthcoming.

Within the past few weeks there have been newspaper articles on new technological innovations in the textile field which will greatly cut down on the employment available in this industry. Very large amounts of investment will be required if Canadian firms are to keep up with international trends. It is obvious that the industry has responded, and we can expect a further response. Whether the response has always been adequate is another matter upon which I do not pass judgment at this particular time. We have a duty to respond positively to the situation which we face at the present time. In my view, a negative response would be a disservice to Canada, to the people who work in this industry, and to those companies associated with the activities of this industry. If there were no signs of response, legislation such as this probably could not be justified at the present time.

We must try to find a good balance with respect to our economic situation. We have to take into account the trading needs of Canada, and the fact that we must not only export but import as well. We have to take into account also the concerns of the industry in Canada, and the need to carry on industrial activity in this country. Reference has been made to some of the exchange problems which have developed. These remarks may not be completely consistent, because while the exchange problem has resulted in some very real problems in some sectors of the Canadian economy at this time it will, on the other hand, force some sectors of the Canadian economy to upgrade their standards of activity and productivity.

We consider this legislation to be a step forward. It is a useful innovation. As far as we are concerned, we are going to watch and judge the government on the basis of its actions. The minister made quite clear during the second reading stage and before the committee that the government must and will bear final responsibility for actions taken under this legislation. However, Mr. Speaker, there is one aspect of the structure involved in this bill which needs further consideration and development. I refer to the whole question of industry planning.

The minister made it quite clear that responsibility rests with the government. In my view, this is correct. The board is to be given a free hand in making its recommendations. This is also correct. I have no quarrel with this position. However, what is the framework within which the board must operate? The board really cannot make judgments unless it has some knowledge of industry plans, and the direction in which the industry is moving. Within what sort of a framework will the board be operating which will enable it to make sound judgments to pass on to the minister?

What is needed is an overview of the situation which will enable the board to make more rational and useful recommendations to the minister, on which he will then pass judgment. At the present time, the board is expected to react to proposals, plans and requests of the minister as well as other inquiries. It is entirely dependant upon requests for action. This is going to be the basis of its activities. As I understood the questioning that took place in the committee, there is no provision for consultation with the minister or the department while an inquiry is in progress. I want to make it clear that I do not suggest any restriction on the powers and freedom of the board to carry out its studies and prepare recommendations for the minister.

The government has not adopted the principle of planning which would enable an adequate job to be done. There is an element of "ad hoccery" in the bill as it is before us at the present time. There is no overview which would permit the problems of the industry to be dealt with properly. When I questioned the minister and his officials before the committee, they stated that the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce does carry on studies regarding trends in the industry. These studies are available to the minister when passing judgment on any recommendations made to him by the textile and clothing board. This is a perfectly valid form of analysis. Such an examination needs to be carried out to determine the trends in the industry and the direction in which things are moving so far as they can be foreseen. However, I suggest that is not adequate.

As I pointed out during committee hearings, it is quite correct that an analysis of trends is one part of the process of developing a plan for industry. If you are going to leave it at that and then decide whether proposals and plans submitted fit within this trend, then certain assumptions are involved. Trends usually develop because they best serve the over-all public or national interest. A further assessment of the public interest is required before you can decide whether a proposal or plan fits in with the trends. When I speak of planning, I want to make it clear that I am not speaking of any sort of imposed plan, any sort of a monolithic, bureaucratic type of plan. The type of planning that would be required in this industry would involve a combined effort on the part of the government, industry, workers and other people associated with the industry.

I acknowledge that there have been consultations. The government has held many consultations with people concerned with this industry, both in the preparation of this bill and in dealing with the problems that the industry has faced for a number of years. I suggest there may be a further development of this process before the board and the government will be fully equipped to deal with the problem in the best possible way. In trying to understand the exact nature of the board proposed in this bill, I suggested to the minister during the Committee hearings:

> Then, really what you are underlining, it would seem to me, Mr. Pepin, is that through this legislation you are establishing a framework for future policy development in that—

The minister then interrupted me by saying:

> I have said that.

I find the minister's words are always much more complex than that when he speaks on these subjects. I continue to quote:

> —this does not necessarily influence the policy that will be developed in future years. It simply establishes a structural framework within which policy is developed.

The minister indicated that was essentially the case. Later on, I said:

> You are really going to leave it to the Board to make its own studies of the problems that exist, to assess the conflicting interests—and make their own assessment of the situation to develop their own criteria and to make their own judgments, which they then pass on to you—and upon which, then, you have to pass judgments.

● (3:30 p.m.)

"You" being the minister in this case. This deals with one aspect of the matter, but again it is clear that a complete framework for dealing with all these problems is lacking. The proposals contained in the bill before us amount to a step forward but they are still incomplete in this respect. I questioned the minister about this aspect on a number of other occasions during the committee hearings.

The issue of protectionism has been raised during the debate in this House as well as during the committee hearings. Is the board contemplated in the legislation to be simply a protectionist vehicle? The minister did deal with this matter at one point during the committee hearings. In answer to a question by myself, he said:

> Will the Board be a protectionist one? Will it be the opposite of whatever a protectionist one would be? I really do not know. I suggest that we have appointed good members. We have given them the kind of task, the kind of definitions that are really motherhood before the Women's Liberation movement, and they have to bear in mind the interests of consumers, the interests of importers, the interests of exporters, the international situation, everything. That is what you wanted us to do is it not? Now they are going to come out with suggestions or recommendations to the government, and the government will have to make up its mind. Then, from that series of decisions, you will be in a position to judge whether the government is protectionist or not.

I thank the minister very much for setting out this situation so clearly in order that we might have a proper understanding of the functions of this board. Of course, we are very much concerned that there should be no greater degree of protectionism than may be necessary. I understood the minister to say, in answer to one of the questions I put to him, that it was quite possible some tariffs would be raised as a result of recommendations from this board and that other tariffs might be lowered. We want to see restrictions on trade removed as far as possible within the context of developing the Canadian economy on a rational basis. We should keep our relations with the developing countries constantly in mind, particularly since a good deal of the competition in this field is coming from those nations. The minister referred to this point, too, during the committee hearings.

It is necessary to take conflicting interests into account, to determine in which direction the industry is moving and the kind of industry we desire to see established in Canada. Here is an area in which more answers from the minister are needed. The hon. gentleman told us during the committee hearings that he really did not know. I cannot blame him for giving such an answer; some things cannot be forecast, though, as the result of events over the past two or three years in particular, the department has a good idea as to the likely trend of affairs. Above all, we must seek to reconcile the conflicting interests which arise when dealing with these questions. We must encourage and foster trade with all parts of the world. This is critical for us in Canada, and especially for some of us in western Canada.

On the other hand, when we are concerned with the affairs of an industry which employs some 200,000 people directly, as well as providing indirect employment for many more, this becomes a matter which cannot be treated lightly. It is for this reason that we are prepared to support the bill. We wish the government well. We shall watch its actions, we shall question its actions and we shall judge on the basis of the decisions which are made. We shall certainly wish to examine from time to time the programs which are instituted as a result of these proposals in order that we may properly take into account the various interests with which I have attempted to deal this afternoon. On this basis, we are prepared to support third reading of the bill.

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out the importance of this bill without however taking up too much of the time of the House.

I believe the bill to establish a textile and clothing board will certainly help solve some of the problems now confronting textile and clothing manufacturers, especially with regard to the marketing of their products.

The industry in general and the representatives of labour unions have welcomed this bill whose purpose is neither to help the textile industry financially nor to grant it the monopoly of the Canadian market, but rather to organize meetings with the representatives of the industry and find out what the real problems are.

I feel that the real purpose of the board will be to advise the government with regard to imports, especially when these tend to flood the market with low-cost products, or to lead to practices for avoiding duty and excise tax.

Although that board must not be endowed with absolute powers, I would hope that further to serious investigations, corrective measures could be brought about in order to improve the situation which we have known for some years.

The textile industry in Canada is one of the most important with respect to production, employment and investment in that sector of the industry. It would therefore be unthinkable that a country like Canada be deprived of an industry such as textiles, an industry with a high productivity, centered on investment and technology and one like which all modern countries would like to have.

In any modern country, consumption of textile products is an indication of the standard of living of the people and of the extent of the industrialization of its economy.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Canada is a country where consumption of clothing as well as household textile products of all kinds is very high. Prosperous countries are highly industrialized. That is why they use also large quantities of packing material, bags, insulating products, transmission belts, tire canvas, upholstering for automobiles and a number of other special industrial products which the textile industry can provide.

Textile products are essential in the life of a modern people. It is not surprising, therefore, that Canadians are among the largest users of textile products in the world.

In Canada, textile products purchased in a year average more than 33 pounds per capita. These products are made up of natural and synthetic fibres; about 40 per cent are used for clothing; about 31 per cent for industrial products; and 29 per cent for household articles. Second to the United States, Canada has the largest average consumption of textile products in the world.

For the Canadian people, the main and most reliable source of textile products, remains its national industry which produces clothing, knitted goods and a large number of household and industrial products. The latter are generally used to supply material to other industrial sectors for further processing.

Canadian textile factories are located in the industrial areas of Quebec and Ontario, close to the market, but the industry is nevertheless spread out from coast to coast, and more than 80,000 Canadians, or 6 per cent of the total labour force in the manufacturing sector, earn their living in the manufacturing of textile products.

According to an economic study, each job in the manufacturing sector creates work for 1.17 persons more in the sectors of supplies, services, maintenance, repairs, etc. So, the textile industry provides jobs for close to 175,000 workers, who, in turn, support families representing over half a million people. The best conditions for efficiency in the textile industry do not necessarily imply large production units. However, a large part of the total textile production in Canada is concentrated in order to allow a maximum scale of production under the present conditions of the Canadian market.

The annual production in Canada exceeds $1.8 billion, which shows the importance of the Canadian textile industry which no longer has to prove the top quality of its production. This industry, as well as the ready-to-wear industry, is endowed with a technology as advanced and as efficient as in any other country in the world. The Canadian section of the National Industrial Conference Board stated, and I quote:

> This is a sophisticated and progressive industry whose technical efficiency leaves nothing to be desired compared with similar industries in North America, meaning the whole world. Its management is enlightened, the quality of its products is superior and its prices are maintained at a very low level, taking into account the salary scale in North America and the special demands of the Canadian market.

The enormous investments made by the manufacturers of textile products demonstrate the willingness of the industry to remain always ahead of progress. Presently, and for the last twelve years, the textile industry has spent about $100 million per year to renew its machinery and equipment.

Not only is the computer more and more widely used in production control, but the Canadian textile industry owns some pieces of equipment found nowhere else in America.

This concern for up-to-dateness obviously gave tangible results. The rate of production has increased faster in the textile field than in most other industrial sectors in Canada, by about 6 per cent, for a good number of years.

Canadian textile mills sell around 90 per cent of their production on domestic markets; this is why we should try to protect part of those domestic markets for Canadian manufacturers. However, on account of the very great variety of materials, designs, patterns and finishes, let alone the requirements created by marked variations in the climate, the industry cannot easily resort to mass production, which would allow for a still greater decrease in prices.

Consequently, Canadian producers have to face very strong competition on foreign markets, in the United States as well as in Europe and in Asia, where big industries, because of the huge population and of the lower standard of living, or because of both factors, enjoy many economic advantages and corner practically the whole of their domestic markets.

The Canadian market is different. In this country, industry must continually fight, and it has been doing so for many years, to get each dollar of sales. Mass-production and low costs, which are assets to big foreign producers at home, are also a big help to them on our domestic markets.

As a result, Canadian textiles have to face hard competition from imported items. For instance, out of the 800 million-odd yards of cotton, wool and synthetic textile items that the Canadian people consume yearly, the proportion supplied by Canadian factories represents less than 60 per cent.

For several years, manufacturing has been a most desirable activity for Canada by reason of its high productivity and of its marked technological trends. In recent years, the annual value added per worker, in Canada, has been more than $13,000 compared with approximately $7,000 for the whole Canadian industry. Several other countries see in it an ideal way to use their resources, so as to create maximum economic growth. The world capacity for manufacturing synthetic goods has increased by more than 60 per cent over the past 10 years and it is anticipated that this growth will accelerate again in the future.

Technological development has been speeding up and showing itself in the improvement of the quality of products, and the rate of appearance of new products on the market is increasingly accelerating. The producer who would choose to offer a product of a quality and type similar to those of two or more years ago, would disappear.

In the area of man-made fibers, as in many other industrial sectors largely dependent upon investment and technology, the average unit production costs decrease in relation to the production volume. Therefore, other factors being equal, the manufacturers whose production is the most important have the lowest unit costs. The bill now before us is specifically designed to protect low production costs industries with a fast turnover.

The volume of production is a function of the volume of demand. So it is logical to say that the production unit cost is a function of demand. Under present conditions, with a small domestic market, it is necessary to take protective measures for the Canadian textile industry.

Since 1952, Canada and other industrialized countries have reached agreements to expand their textile imports from developing countries. For the last 20 years or so, we have assisted these countries in many ways either by extending loans to organize their industry or by allowing them to acquire machinery from us. This is not a reason to put aside our own industry which is now feeling the bite of cheap imports from these countries which we have assisted for some twenty years.

Before concluding my remarks, I wish to stress that the board's main duty will be to supervise and advise the government on the risks that textile and clothing imports present for the various sectors of our industry. I think the bill before us is a reasonable measure for the contracting parties to the agreements reached since 1952 and that it is a desirable step for the Canadian textile industry whose share in the domestic market has been continuously declining for ten years.

I wish other measures of that kind will complete the work already begun by the Textile and Clothing Board that already started to operate four months ago.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I already had the opportunity on many occasions of expressing my opinion as to the measure before us now and of dealing with the textile and clothing industry, so this afternoon, in order to hasten the passage of that measure, I will make only a few remarks.

Since I was closely associated with the textile industry for many years before becoming a member of Parliament and that many of my fellow citizens are unemployed at the present time, on account of the government's lack of foresight, I avail myself of this opportunity to express once more my dissatisfaction and direct reproaches to the authorities concerned.

But I will not elaborate because I think that the government took long enough to recognize the disastrous situation of the textile industry. In fact, the government is responsible for the loss of markets and jobs. There is no need to recall the past. I would rather share the enthusiasm shown by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) about the results of the Textile and Clothing Board and assure him that we shall not oppose this legislation. Certainly our views may differ but, generally speaking, we shall give the minister all the support we can.

Let us not forget that the current situation of the textile industry is due to imports. The minister himself is convinced of this since he introduced last year specific measures to protect the jobs of certain workers in the shirt industry. But once again, these measures were taken too late and the workers were the most affected.

I hope that the minister, in co-operation with other departments, will do his best so that the workers who have already spent several years in the textile industry will get their jobs back. I dare hope that the minister, who knows this industry very well, since he is from a city where the textile industry is a major activity, will give this problem all the attention it requires. If it is possible to find new jobs for the workers who have devoted most of their life to the textile industry, the minister will have deserved our admiration and our gratitude.

I believe that there should also be full co-operation between the various departments. Now, I wonder whether there really exists the necessary co-operation that would ensure planning in the textile industry and other industries.

While skimming through the report of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion for the period from May 1970, I see that some ten new textile industries have been established in Canada with the help of grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. I am asking myself whether it would not have been better to provide a little more planning and to transfer those grants, if possible, to industries already in existence. It is somewhat difficult to make workers who have just lost their jobs understand that the government is providing a grant amounting to thousands of dollars to some textile industry in India through the liberality of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion.

The House will no doubt be interested in learning that the grants to new industries for the period from May 1970 to March 1971 amounted to over $2 million.

Our taxpayers will not admit easily that part of their tax money should go through grants to foreign companies in order that they may settle here. Mentioning this state of affairs to the minister will surely bring about more co-operation between the various departments.

Insofar as all the representations made by the leaders and the workers of the textile industry are concerned, it must be noted that the Canadian textile industry does not want nor has it ever requested assistance or charity. That industry simply wishes to be assured of at least 70 per cent of the Canadian market. In my opinion, that is a reasonable request which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce could grant. It may be that in some quarters people will maintain that it is a protectionist measure. I would like to reassure those who tend to see excessive protection in this measure and to remind them that what is good for one part of the country is also good for other parts.

Were we to examine whatever the government does in different areas of the country, I think that some of my colleagues who live outside Ontario and Quebec could find ample reasons to take exception if they were looking at the government actions the same way we do.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would like to assure the minister that even if we do not share all his enthusiasm, we want him to succeed, because on his success hangs the welfare of many workers and industries.

• (4:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, in looking over boards I have known, it seems to me there are generally two reasons for establishing boards or two categories into which boards fall. In one category, the board becomes the captive of the industry itself. Instead of regulating the industry, the board becomes the instrument of the industry. The other kind of board, which also is very common in the country whether municipally, provincially or federally, is the type of board which is used by a government as a means of putting off the making of political judgments and as a means of avoiding political responsibilities. I think the bill we are now debating in respect of setting up the textile board is really an indication of that kind of policy. My colleague, the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) has indicated our support for the measure. We support it because we believe it is an improvement over the complete lack of thought which has prevailed and, therefore, even a board is more acceptable than the vacuum which has existed up until the present time in the field of textile policy.

I believe we should make very clear that if we had had a government which had a policy, which was prepared to implement a program and which had given some thought about planning the direction of this industry, we would not be faced with the necessity of having a textile board. We are to have this board. We have heard two conflicting views concerning what this board will do. Some hon. members look upon this board as a protectionist device to protect the textile industry and provide additional aid to the industry. It has some of those characteristics. Other members are fearful that the board's existence will lead to the phasing out of the textile industry. Again, there may be some validity to certain aspects of this kind of comment. I think the minister's statement to which my colleague from Regina East referred is the most honest. The board will be neither of these things but will look at each case, make recommendations, and from these recommendations a policy will be developed. It is a framework of a kind. The Board is not there to do one thing or the other, but to provide a framework for policy decisions.

Whether in fact the policy will be successful, or whether we will have a textile policy, will ultimately depend on what kind of approach the government takes to the recommendations of the board. The great weakness as I see it of this general approach is that it depends on people in the textile industry finding themselves in trouble, responding to a crisis which arises one way or the other, and then having a resolution take place within the framework of the board. It would seem to me, and again I refer back to the remarks of my colleague the hon. member for Regina East, that what is needed is some kind of a government program for the textile industry. I see my hon. friend from Edmonton West is making faces whenever I speak of a framework or plan. I hate to see that handsome face so distorted.

In speaking for the people in the textile industry whom I know, I can say that to have some kind of planning take place in that industry would not be repugnant to them. Their futures are involved and planning is not a dirty word to them. They want some kind of framework in which they know their future will be assured. It is not a question of moving in with a heavy hand and clamping down on this or the other, but rather is a question of trying to get industry together with the government to discuss the bringing in of tax policies or incentive policies in order to provide a rational framework. I can almost anticipate what the charming Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) would say to me.

He would say: Ah, that is very easy for you to say; have you ever tried to bring these people together? The minister would say it is not easy to bring them together. I agree.

In our Canadian society there are some very real problems involved in bringing people together, but I honestly question whether the philosophy of the minister's party is really conducive to making this kind of proposal to people in industry. I question whether a wholehearted effort has ever been made to bring people in the industry, people in the trade unions representing the workers in that industry, together to work out a framework and, if necessary, a program of incentives and perhaps even of penalties or a combination of both, in order to effect a rationalization of this industry. So, while all of us in this House really do not have any choice but to support what we see as an experiment or an attempt to deal with the problems in the industry, we will not be in a position to judge what is being done until some time has elapsed when we can see the outlines of the government's policy.

My reason for rising today to make this intervention is the speech made by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), a member for whom I personally have a very high regard. I was rather surprised by the touch of bitterness in his voice when he spoke, as a western member, about protectionist policies which favour the east. He looked upon this bill as a protectionist bill which would tend to subsidize the textile industry. I do not really think anyone could come to that conclusion based on a reading of the bill. His statement, however, illustrates what has been a long and deep grievance between the western part of Canada and the central part of Canada. It is very difficult to say—and I suggest the hon. member for Dauphin consider this—whether in fact it is always the west which subsidizes the east or always the Maritimes which pays the price of central Canada's prosperity. At the moment, however, no part of the country is prosperous because of the government's policies.

There is a considerable degree of subsidization. Certainly, those of us who are from Ontario have never been, and I hope never will be, insensitive to the problems of Prairie farmers. We have never stood in the way of farm programs that would assist them when they were facing difficulties. I do not think any of us from Ontario have stood in the way of transfer payments to the Maritimes. We have supported those payments very strongly. The truth, of course, is that there does not seem to be any acceptable pattern through which the rewards in one part of the country are being shared with another part of the country. Historically from the beginning of this country, there has been this conflict between the primary producers, the provinces dependent on primary production, and the manufacturing sections of the country. Having listened to the speeches made today, we know that we are a long way from resolving this problem.

Since this problem must be resolved if we are to have an economic policy that will gain wide acceptance, the one thing that must be assured is that the benefits which accrue to any one part of Canada must be shared equally with the other parts of Canada. The day has long passed when one province can say, "because we have oil the major rewards from oil production must stay with us," or "because we have manufacturing, the major rewards from manufacturing must remain with us." We must develop a sharing program that is acceptable across the whole country. Until we do that, we will have the kind of recrimination that always arises whether it be over textile policies, tariff policies, or natural resource policies. If we are to have a rational, reasonable and intelligent development of industrial policy, that particular issue of sharing must be involved.

In an interview the other day the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) made some scathing remarks about the effects of a pipeline through the Mackenzie valley on the manufacturing industry in central Canada, on our balance of payments, and on the Canadian dollar. But the people in Alberta and Saskatchewan may have different views. They may see the pipeline as of great assistance to their economies. They will be able to move more oil. There will be additional employment available in those provinces. But even if they agree with the minister they may say, "So what? Ontario has been living off the fat of the land; it is time we had our innings." These are understandable conflicts and we will not resolve them through this measure or in this debate.

I raise this matter because these kinds of bills are being debated out of the context of national policy, out of the context of the kind of society we want to see, out of the context of sharing between people and sharing between provinces. Until we have a clear statement of national policy from the government on what it is planning for the economy, it is difficult to see anything meaningful or important in the kind of measure that we have before us today.

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say a few words on the bill before the House.

We set up a commission to study the problem of the Canadian textile industry. I recognize that the problem is serious and rather complex. I should like to say how much I admire the Minister of Trade, Industry and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) who worked untiringly in his endeavour to find solutions to the problem.

To solve the problem, he has recommended that a board be established to study the problems of production, distribution and especially exports and imports, to find out what may not be working properly.

If something is wrong in respect of imports, especially with dumping, the Board will have to prevent such abuses. However, all kinds of suggestions have been made, all kinds of statistics have been produced about textile products, but such a solution will never solve the problem.

The problem in the textile industry is the same as in any other industry, in any other segment of the economy. It is a Canadian problem as well as an international one. In the textile field as in many others, the experts should be seeking a real solution to the problem, one which would tend to reduce textile prices. These prices are too high, therefore bringing about all kinds of consequences.

I suggest the Board should primarily consider the textile industry's main problem which is that of unduly high prices.

What causes high prices? As in any other field of industry, prices of Canadian products increase because of excise taxes, provincial taxes, municipal and school taxes, all of which are exorbitant. Finally, the financing of stocks by formula 88 again increases textile prices. That is what the Board the minister mentioned should get to work on. The government can certainly find a cheaper way of financing stocks. This increase in the price of textile products and other products is attributable to the 2 per cent monthly portion of the production which is allocated to inventories. Instead of decreasing the prices of products, all this contributes to increasing them and diminising the purchasing power of the Canadian people who are therefore unable to buy textile products. The problem of exorbitant prices is one that we should tackle.

The minister does not see any problem with production. I do not believe either that his officials find anything wrong with production for it is excellent. Experts should rather deal with the problem of distributing these products. We could consume 50 times as many Canadian textile goods as we are producing now. We buy textile products from other countries because they are 50 or 60 times cheaper than Canadian goods. It is not the fault of the Canadian producers, but of the economic system which increases prices through government and bank agencies of all kinds which control prices and board in part the profits of industrialists.

Therefore we support the board set up by the hon. minister. If something can be done, if it can find a solution to the problem, so much the better! But, how many such agencies, how many other boards in the industrial or commercial sectors have never solved the problem. I doubt that this Board will solve it because it will be concerned only with dumping and not with high prices, too heavy taxes, excise duties, etc. These contribute to maintaining high prices and also diminishing the production of our textile industries. The distribution system is to blame. If it could count on lower taxes, interest rates, and transportation costs, the textile industry would do so much better. Transportation is so expensive, because of too many taxes on trucks, on gas, on all sorts of other things. This contributes to the higher cost price of our textile products, while in other countries, there are lower taxes on transport, on building materials and lower excise duties. There are also many countries which have more beneficial customs tariffs.

I ask the minister to instruct the Board to adjust prices through grants if necessary. If the government must subsidize the textiles industry, let the Board study the possibility of granting subsidies to this industry so that it can lower its prices, adjust to the purchasing power of Canadians and sell in other countries at competitive prices. We shall achieve this only through the compensated discount that we could give on these products. As to the implementation of this compensated discount, it is merely a technical question. If the government would open its eyes and ears, and apply the real financial technique to finance what can be financed, to make financially possible everything that is physically feasible, we should see the result, and we should not have the abominable situation that now exists in the textile industry.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I shall not take up very much time, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to make a few comments about Bill C-215. The bill has a potential for effecting a much needed rationalization of various segments of our clothing and textile industry. In my opinion, it also has some potential for being a protectionist device behind which inefficient and outdated segments of the industry will lobby for further restrictive measures. In many instances this might lead to protection of industries which are not competitive or efficient enough to be worthy of survival.

Mr. Pepin: Do you know the industry well?

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, let me point out to the minister that I am not opposing the bill. I just wish to make a few comments on behalf of the consumers of the country and point out some of the pitfalls facing us.

During the study of this bill, the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs heard from a number of knowledgeable witnesses who expressed concern over the ends toward which the provisions of this act could be used. One of these witnesses, Mr. Keith G. Dixon, Executive Vice-President, Canadian Importers Association, gave, in my view, a very reasonable summary of the reasons Canadian manufacturers ought not to be competing against overseas producers of low cost cotton goods. For the benefit of those members who were not as the committee's sitting when Mr. Dixon spoke, or who have not had an opportunity of reading the minutes of the committee, I would like to quote a small portion of his remarks. He said, and I am now quoting a portion of his remarks:

> One of the principles of international trade, as I think you will quickly agree, is that every country in the world tries to do that which it is best equipped to do and perhaps Canada is not ideally suited to make the complete range of textiles for a population of 21 million. We do not have any raw materials here at all in textiles. We have no cotton. We have no wool to speak of, we have about 3.5 million pounds of wool, and the synthetic operations are associated or closely directed by overseas companies. The only textile fibre we have in Canada of which we are a world producer, Mr. Chairman, is asbestos.

I am sure all hon. members would agree that the facts which he outlines, plus our wage rates in the textile and clothing industry which are the highest or second highest in the world, necessitate that our judgments and actions concerning the clothing and textile industry in Canada reflect the economic realities with which we are faced. This means that the industry must direct its resources and initiative into those areas where it is competitive in world markets. I fear that in too many of our commercial endeavours, and not just in the clothing and textile industry, we have clung to the production of many items on sentimental or emotional grounds long after such operations have lost their economic justification.

Under clause 8 of this bill, a person who produces in Canada any textile and clothing goods, or a person or association acting on his behalf, may file a notice of complaint with the board alleging that the importation of the textile and clothing goods described in the notice is causing or threatening serious injury to his production in Canada of any textile and clothing goods. In essence, the board is being established to hear complaints from parties who allege, or even fear, injury from the importation of certain textiles or clothing items. I cannot help but think, Mr. Speaker, that it will be a relatively short time before the board becomes brain-washed into believing that most Canadian textile and clothing manufacturers are encountering serious challenges from overseas sources, and that the issuance of important licences is required in order to eliminate these challenges.

The textile and clothing producers appearing before the board may be able to strengthen their arguments by having their employees' representatives testify regarding the actual or alleged jeopardy in which their jobs are being placed. Being further mindful of the fact that in many of the towns or villages in Ontario and Quebec where textile and clothing companies are located they are the only or major employer, the board will be under extreme pressure to agree to the request for the issuance of an import licence. I am not suggesting that clothing and textile manufacturers and their employees should in any way be impeded in making their position or views known to the board. What does, however, concern me is the lack of regional balance amongst the membership of the board, and the lack of adequate provisions in the bill to ensure that the consumers' interests are going to be as vigorously represented as those of the manufacturers and unions.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) may believe that the provisions of clause 10 of the bill, whereby the board is required to publish in the Canada Gazette a notice of its intention to hold an inquiry, will afford to all interest parties an adequate opportunity to make representations. However, I think he would agree that while consumers are the largest single interested group in Canada, they are one of the least organized. Moreover, as the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) observed during a committee hearing, the Canada Gazette is such an obscure publication that the death of kings may be buried in it without one being the wiser.

The very limited extent to which Canadian consumers are organized was clearly brought out before the committee studying this bill when it heard representatives from the Consumers Association of Canada, the only nationally organized consumer group in Canada. The Association has 65,000 members and a professional staff of only five workers. When one considers the many other consumer interests which the association must serve, I think it becomes readily apparent that the Canadian consumer is going to be at an enormous disadvantage in presenting his case before the textile and clothing board in comparison with the industry and its employees, who in themselves number almost 200,000.

The Economic Council of Canada has documented rather dramatically what a high percentage of our population lives below the poverty line. In addition, hundred of thousands of our people live on net salaries which are not a great deal above the poverty line. My concern is that measures which serve to increase artificially and unnecessarily the costs of clothing items for people in these income brackets—and they are the ones who will be most affected by restrictions against inexpensive clothing from overseas—are directed against those people who are least able to afford increased costs and who are least able to make the kind of organized representations against increased costs that will be made in favour of them.

Perhaps even more fundamental to this whole issue than anything else is the question, "Why is a board necessary?" Why cannot the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce assist the rationalization of the industry from within the framework of his department instead of creating a new agency, which by his own admission will in any event be heavily dependent upon the human resources of his department? I have followed the debate and study of this bill as closely as any member, I think, yet I cannot see any clear, overriding advantage for the creation of a textile and clothing board, whereas I can see a number of distinct disadvantages against its formal creation.

The very existence of such a board cannot but raise fears that, starting with the textile industry, which is certainly not one of our weaker industries, Canada is embarking on preparations for restrictive trade barriers at the very time when there is so much uneasiness in international trade quarters that the European Common Market and the United States are headed for a trade war which could have the most drastic consequences for us if we become caught, as is likely, in a squeeze play between these two giant trading blocks. Owing to the indifference towards our traditional ties with Great Britain shown by successive Liberal governments, Canada can no longer expect that its markets in the United Kingdom will remain when the British government is finally accepted into the European Common Market. The United States and Japan are having serious difficulties in arriving at mutually acceptable positions regarding trade in clothing and textiles. With growing unemployment in Canada and the United States, it is easy for us to fall into the dangerous trap of hoping that by keeping out foreign competition we will ease the level of unemployment. I think that one does not need to look too far to see that overprotectionism can bring retaliation from other countries and may result in the possibility of the collapse of international trade as each nation seeks to protect itself more and more.

The presence of the board will help to encourage the opinion that a certain percentage of the Canadian market—it appears to be 60 per cent—belongs almost as a birthright to Canadian manufacturers. Indeed, this position was put forward by the president of the Canadian Textile Institute when he appeared before the committee studying this bill. I think that such a proposition is the root cause of so many of the problems which our industries are facing. I do not believe that a guaranteed percentage of the market makes for a healthy economy in a free enterprise society.

Mr. Pepin: Neither do I, and I did not suggest that.

Mr. Yewchuk: In a recent article appearing on January 20, 1971, in the Winnipeg Free Press, this attitude was rather nicely summarized. May I quote from that summary appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press:

> It was once accepted that industry exists to serve the public. Has this now been reversed in the case of textiles? Do we, the captive consumers, exist to save the needs of industry and, to that end, must the market be rigged so that 60 per cent of our textile dollars flow to the domestic interests—

Mr. Pepin: That is not in the bill. Is the hon. member answering the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard)?

Mr. Yewchuk: I listened with a good deal of interest to his speech, and that is why I said at the beginning that I was not objecting to this bill. I am merely pointing out what we ought to be thinking about from the consumer's point of view.

Mr. Pepin: But what the hon. member has just suggested is not in the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please.

Mr. Yewchuk: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that all hon. members will carefully weigh the comments I have made and the precedents which Bill C-215 will establish, if passed, which I have attempted to outline in the preceding comments.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) appeared before one of our standing committees a few days ago, I went out of my way to commend him with respect to one portion of this bill, Bill C-215. I refer, of course, to the provision in the bill for enhanced unemployment insurance benefits or for preretirement benefits in the case of textile workers who are put out of their jobs as a result of government policy. My going out of my way to commend the Minister of Labour brought a reaction on his part. He went out of his way to make it clear that this provision is unique and applicable in this kind of situation only because this very bill could produce a situation which government policy might throw people out of work. He did not want me to read anything more into it.

In my intervention at this point, which will last for only a couple of minutes, I wish to repeat my commendation. I think the government is doing the right thing in providing for enhanced unemployment insurance benefits or for preretirement benefits when textile workers are thrown out of their employment. I should like to impress upon the government that this is a principle that ought to be extended. It is all right for the government to say that this is a special case. It is all right for the government to admit that in this instance government policy may cause unemployment. The fact is that many of those who are out of work in other areas, especially those of middle or older years, are out of work because of government policy, because of social policy, or because of conditions generally. I submit that this situation should not be regarded as unique. Instead, the government should boast of it as a precedent and as a principle that it should be prepared to follow.

I am also interested in the remarks attributed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Niagara Falls over the weekend. He said that one of the solutions to our unemployment problem would be earlier retirement. If we are going to talk about earlier retirement, and if we are going to talk about people being forced out of work at ages such as 50 or 54, the ages mentioned in this context, it seems to me that we must move a great deal faster than we have been moving in the provision of adequate pensions at an earlier age. I welcome these few beginnings, especially the one that is before us in this piece of legislation. I noted with interest the plea made this afternoon by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) that if any textile workers are denied benefits to which they think they are entitled, there should be an appeal to the board or even beyond that board. The main point of my intervention, however, is to say that it is a good idea for the government to recognize that when people are out of work at age 50 or 55, the government has a special responsibility. I agree with the statement of the Prime Minister in this area which he made at Niagara Falls over the weekend. I urge that the government move a lot faster than it has been moving in the matter of providing for earlier retirement. But the only way to do this is to provide adequate pensions so that people can enjoy an earlier retirement, and that is the plea I make at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. If the minister speaks at this time, he should have the unanimous consent of the House, and close the debate. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, while I receive assurance from every part that there will be unanimous or almost unanimous endorsement of Bill C-215, it would be ungracious for me of course, to hinder speedy passage of this bill on third reading.

However, I feel strongly tempted to reply, point after point, to some hon. members who imagined all kinds of specters, werewolves and ghosts in order to try and frighten people about the implementation of this bill, and especially to answer some editorial writers who wrote about this bill "non rational" things, to use the term of the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton). But I resist the temptation and wait for other circumstances.

At any rate, I have said almost all that I had to say about Bill C-215, either at the time of my statement on May 14 last, or on January 21, on second reading, or during the numerous sittings of the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. I had the opportunity there to deal with the subject in detail and to raise almost all aspects of this textile and clothing policy.

My officials and I have described the situation obtaining in that industry, which is not as good as some hon. members—the hon. member for Athabasca (Mr. Yewchuk) in particular—would have us believe so that we do not do anything about it, nor as bad as some others state so that we give it up. Both in the House and before the committee, we have mentioned the many changes taking place in that industry, namely the greater part that fashion will play in it, the reduced cost of labour as technology and equipment are developed, changes which, by the way, will be of advantage to our producers.

We have of course dealt with the problems resulting from imports from countries with low production costs and from the important sales that these countries are already achieving in Canada, as evidenced by the high degree of penetration of their products on the domestic market. We have seen, in committee, how the other industrialized countries deal with problems arising from exports, and I feel that we have clearly shown that Canada's attitude had been most conciliatory and constructive toward developing countries.

I have also described the new policy as global, with some commercial, industrial, financial, social, and even aesthetic aspects. I have indicated the general direction of this policy, that is rationalization and concentration in certain areas identified as viable, so as, indeed, to be able to avoid a protectionist attitude.

I explained the membership and the work of the Clothing and Textile Board, as well as the criteria on which it will base its judgments. Of course, I cannot go over all that. But I would have expected the hon. members and the editorial writers who condemned the policy, sometimes irrevocably, to have been better informed. But in this case, I think we were facing prejudices of which, as the author said, "reason knows nothing".

However, I must point out that few well informed members are against the bill. We mostly disagree about the principle underlying the implementation of the bill, some fearing that the Board and the government might be too protectionist, others that they might be too liberal.

Besides, may I say in passing, that some critics, from the opposition for instance, have managed to condemn the textile policy as too protectionist while in the same breath asking for more protectionism in the sector of industry or agriculture that means more to them or to their area.

If a logician were to study some of the speeches made in this House on the occasion of this bill, he would surely split his sides with laughing for several days. In either case, some members and editors argued on the basis of their own prejudices for, as I have said repeatedly, this bill does not reflect any prejudices: it merely enumerates what factors should be taken into consideration. At most, this bill gives an orientation, that of rationalizing around the viable sectors. The sole purpose of this bill—and some members, of whom those from Regina East and from Waterloo, recognized it, and I thank them for it—is to create a framework, to provide an instrument for decision-making and means to implement decisions.

The whole thing is so well balanced, to my mind, and several others agree, that some industrialists are now using this policy to justify their closing down certain plants, while some members and commentators are accusing the government of taking protectionist measures.

In my opinion, both accusations are contradictory, it being impossible for both of them to be true. It seems to me indeed that some closings of plants now taking place can very well be explained by referring to the substance of this bill. If so, the bill cannot be protectionist. Life always offers some contradictions, and I agree, but sometimes there are contradictions which simply cannot be accepted.

[English]

There has been a lot of talk about free trade, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Pepin: May I ask for the indulgence of the House? I have been silent for days! These are my 10 minutes.

There has been a lot of talk about free trade in this debate. Everyone, inside and outside this House, is in favour of freer trade, especially when someone else is involved. If one reads the presentations made to the Canadian government by national institutions, from the Canadian Federation of Labour to the Canadian Labour Congress, he will realize that everyone in Canada is in favour of freer trade. However, if he reads the paragraphs that follow that statement, he will see that free trade is usually qualified by words such as "as much as possible". Free trade, protectionism and other concepts are usually found in their purest form in textbooks of sociology, economics or political science. I hardly need to say, though, that the art of the possible is the only reality. As the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) said, in practice it is a question of finding the right balance, the right mix. Intelligent men discuss the mix, the balance, not the absolute.

May I answer briefly some of the questions which have been raised? The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik) asked me whether it would be possible for the Board to review decisions with respect to the certification of special benefits for workers should new situations arise or new circumstances become known. Well, if new circumstances come to light, the board will surely be prepared to look at the situation again. If it were not, the minister could direct the board to do so.

I shall not deal at length with the treatises on planning given us this afternoon by the hon. member for Regina East and the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman); there will be occasions to do that in a more intimate way. It is true this bill does not provide a complete framework for planning, and one of the reasons is that we have no power to tell the industry what to do, to force it to do this or that.

We can advise, we can recommend, we can suggest, we can incite, we can push, but that is about all; we cannot make the decisions for businessmen. Then again, even in countries where decisions can be made by the government for industry, planning is not always a total success. The plans which the industry will have to present to the board will be wide in scope and will in some measure constitute a degree of planning. In making recommendations, the board will in fact have a good idea of what is happening in any particular sector of the industry concerned. I might add that the department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, will also be involved in more "active" planning.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) has asked me if assistance benefits would be paid to workers. I want to assure him that it will be so, as the Board already has some requests and is getting ready to reach a decision. But as the member knows, there are all sorts of conditions to be fulfilled. Everyone will agree that this part of the bill is especially modern and valid from a social point of view.

The advice that hon. members have given us about the co-ordination between various departments are of course accepted.

[English]

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) talked about the principle of pre-retirement benefits and spoke persuasively in its support. Obviously, we agree with him. He suggested that principle should be extended to other sectors of industry. He might have suggested further extension to the workers in the fishing industry and the agriculture industry. I agree with him. It would be nice to be able to do so. But if we multiply family allowances, if we double the amount of the old age pension, triple social assistance benefits and what-not, "the cow may run dry". I refer to an old saying in French, l'État est une vache que tous ont le droit de traire mais que personne n'a l'obligation de nourrire.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—House of Commons—continuation of Speaker in position following next election—suggested discussion by party or House leaders; the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise)—Social Security—Quebec—alleged takeover by government of guaranteed income supplement; the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski)—Indian Affairs—National Parks—Elk Island—animal starvation—failure of wildlife service to direct reduction in elk population commensurate with feed supplies.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are not up to date.

Mr. Jerome: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I can report to Your Honour that there have been some discussions and there seems to be unanimous accord to dispense with the private members' hour today and to proceed forthwith to consideration of the young offenders' bill.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

PROVISIONS REGARDING CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS

The House resumed, from Wednesday, March 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Goyer that Bill C-192, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Gilbert (p. 4577).

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): There is probably a disposition to have one vote on this motion, or two votes, the second one on the second reading, a little later on today. My speech will at least represent the final offering from the official opposition at this stage. I shall be as brief as I can but I should like to put six or seven points on record, points which I believe will have to be considered in the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

First, I accept the philosophy expressed in an earlier motion by the hon. member for Calgary North Mr. (Woolliams) and, for essentially the same reasons as were given then, I shall be supporting the motion now before us in the name of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). It is comforting to us on this side to recall that in the course of his contribution to the debate, the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Tolmie), who is the chairman of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, gave us an indication that he would like to see the widest possible discussion take place when this bill reaches his committee. I agree that this should be the case, because we who are members of that committee are being inundated by floods of correspondence from all over Canada concerning the young offenders act. These expressions of opinion should be well-scouted before we can report such a measure back to the House.

Before I get to the five or six specific points I have in mind, may I say this? The minister should consider himself fortunate that he is a new minister. If this measure had been placed before us in its present form by a minister who had been in office for a longer period, the debate would probably be going on a lot longer. But we desire to accommodate him and there is at least some indication that he will approach this subject with a flexible mind, perhaps because he inherited somebody else's problems and is not particularly wedded to the approach taken by that other person. Time will have to tell. I do not ask the minister to comment on this; we are giving a young minister the benefit of the doubt and we know that at least he will be co-operative.

The last message I, personally, received on this subject was from the United Community Services of the Greater Vancouver area. Speaking through their president, the Reverend R. A. Burrows, they sent to the Solicitor General and to the Chairman of the standing committee a request that the United Community Services, which shares the concern of many organizations that the young offenders act requires careful study and reconsideration, will have the opportunity to present its views to the committee, along with other groups.

Now, to proceed to some of the others. The first is from Professor B. F. Frost, head of the division of clinical diagnosis and special education, faculty of education at the University of Calgary. If I may quote from his submission in two particulars only, both of which are found on page 2, he says:

> The act has been developed in a vacuum because the system of articulated rehabilitation agencies, necessary for the act to function, does not exist—
> In respect of rehabilitation, there is no evidence in the act nor in the very day functioning of the provincial authorities that anything has been learned from the experience of the U.K., Holland and Sweden who are the acknowledged leaders in the field of the rehabilitation of juvenile delinquents. Study of the relevant laws of these countries as well as their institutions is mandatory if a reasonable system is to be established here.

So, right off the bat, we have two criticisms, criticisms that are repeated by other sources as well, one as to the quality of the law we are being asked to consider and the other as to the quality of the institutions in Canada that are available to help young people caught in the coils of the law.

Then, Professor H. R. S. Ryan of the faculty of law of Queen's University has this to say:

> It is respectfully submitted that Canada should not return to a system of juvenile criminality which proved unsatisfactory in the past here and which the British have now abandoned. Instead, juvenile misconduct should be regarded as creating welfare and educational problems and dealt with on that basis.

That brings up a point that is echoed and re-echoed in the material we have received, namely that you must consider the child as a total person, against his family background and the background of society, and not treat him, as it were, in a vacuum.

Then, we have this paragraph from Mr. R. Couchman, chairman of the Troubled Child Committee of the Ontario Educational Association, who wrote the minister and sent copies of his letter to the rest of us:

> —I would certainly hope that child welfare legislation and legislation affecting the delinquent child would complement the positive approach being developed by Canadian educators. Unfortunately the proposed legislation shows little regard for the therapeutic requirements that must be built into such modern legal legislation.

So there is the view of a person in the educational field who sees the child in the total picture, and more particularly in the educational picture.

Then, we have Professor Ronald R. Price, of the faculty of law of Queen's University, who in his letter to us makes the criticism that the government of Canada was careful to consult with provincial governments as such, but that many of the provincial governments took a very narrow approach to consultation in preparing their own position and submissions. He says that many interested groups in a number of the provinces were not consulted at all by their own provincial government, and are very anxious to have an opportunity to make their views known.

I am about half way through the quotations I have decided to put on the record so that the minister and his officials can look at them over the Easter season and get some indication of the matters that bother some members of the committee.

Again, I have the views of Professor Frost, who makes this point:

> Serious crimes against the person (e.g. murder, manslaughter, rape, etc.) committed by a young person of 16 years or older should be dealt with separately from other "offences". In this case, and in this case only, should the case be tried in adult court with the possibility that the adult court might refer the case to a juvenile and family court.
> In all other cases the maximum age limit should be 18 years for both sexes.

Many of the submissions we received dealt with this very thorny problem of age, but I do not think at this stage of our proceedings, without having heard expert evidence in committee, it would be very helpful to scout that argument over and over again. But at least the paragraph I have just read into the record is one point that the members of the committee will want to follow up and be reassured about by the evidence; otherwise, we will want to make some changes in the provision regarding age.

A very significant contribution came to us from an assistant professor, John A. MacDonald, who I must say has a very good name. He is from the School of Social Work at the University of British Columbia and must have had a fair amount of legal training because his brief is peppered with legal references, though the gist of it really deals with the area of social welfare. At page 10 of his very thoughtful contribution he makes this point:

> The bill contains punitive provisions which would have the effect of stigmatizing juvenile offenders and undermining the traditional separation of juvenile from adult offenders. These provisions are for the most part not supported by the Justice Committee report and a number appear to have been inserted in response to pressure from provincial authorities.

This gentleman can bet his bottom dollar that we will be getting answers to that particular point to his satisfaction. He went on to quote at page 11 of his brief from the Department of Justice committee report, referred to a moment ago, as follows:

> Long-term imprisonment has marked and detrimental effects on adults. Long-term confinement of youngsters may often be even more dangerous. We think that any rehabilitation of the juvenile that is likely to result from institutional commitment can be completed within the three-year period we suggest. If a juvenile is not reformed within three years by institutional experience, society should accept that risk unless it is prepared to allow youngsters to be held in what amounts to indefinite detention.

I think that recommendation by the Department of Justice committee was not easily arrived at. Probably the experts who dealt with that question gave it long and hard consideration before making up their minds on the approach that should be made. Reform the child within three years or take your chances with him, is really what they are saying. But the bill does not say that, and this is another reason that we on this side tend to treat the bill with some considerable suspicion. It is the reason we will want to have wholesale reform of the bill when it gets to committee.

My final quotation is from assistant professor K. Roy MacKenzie of the division of psychiatry, the University of Calgary School of Medicine, who takes particular objection to section 30(1)(k) and section 30(4), which contain, he says, the almost incomprehensible suggestion that the child be first sentenced as a child, and that the child then be subject to a renewed sentence when he reaches the age of 21. If Your Honour recalls the earlier debate, that point was made over and over again. How can you put a child into an institution for a few years when he knows his fate will not be decided until he is hauled into court as a young adult at the age of 21? This seemed to us to be absolutely monstrous, and something that is going to be scouted well and truly in committee.

To return to Professor MacKenzie's thoughtful comments, he makes this point:

> This completely ignores the fact that most childhood difficulties stem from the pressures surrounding the child and that very frequently the child is drastically changed by the time he reaches 21 and the particular action which led to his earlier incarceration may no longer be reasonably applicable.

I have placed on the record some quotations that outline, in as fair a way as I can devise, the problems that bother this particular Member of Parliament, and which I think also bother other Members of Parliament, with regard to the young offenders act. We also received thoughtful submissions from the Canadian Mental Health Association and the Canadian Bar Association, but these were pretty well dealt with on another occasion, so I shall not place them on the record at this particular time.

Finally, I would say that the treatment of the youngster who goes astray is a highly emotional matter. Sometimes it becomes a question of semantics whether you should fasten the appellation of offender or of criminal on that person. I know that some people are very excited and say that this bill is really a criminal code for children. I think it will be difficult to sort our way through the emotional issues that surround this subject, but knowing the calibre of the members of the committee and the fact that we are given the widest terms of reference possible, I know we will do our best. I hope we can come back with a bill which will be substantially altered, and which will do that committee and the House of Commons proud.

Division

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The question is on the amendment. Those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Call in the members. The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Gilbert), which was negatived on the following division:

Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the House that the Chair call it six o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

ERROR IN FRENCH VERSION OF ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if I might have permission to revert to motions I should like to inform the House about an error in the French version of the Canadian Wheat Board annual report which was tabled today.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: In French!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): In French!

[English]

Mr. Lang: I will have to hold on to that surprise for a little longer. I wish to inform the House that there is an error in the French version of the Wheat Board report. On page 5 it should read, "for the crop year ended July 31, 1970" and not, "for the crop year ended January 31, 1970." I apologize to the House for not having caught this error before the report was tabled. I, therefore, would like to table two corrected versions of the Canadian Wheat Board annual report in French.

Mr. McGrath: Since we have reverted to motions, Mr. Speaker, I ask consent of the House, under Standing Order 43, to table the report of the Atlantic Development Council released today.

Some hon. Members: Oh. oh!

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair. The House will resume at eight o'clock this evening.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed from Monday, April 5, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose last day, clause 14 of Bill C-207 was being considered.

On clause 14—Establishment of Ministries of State.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, our opposition to this clause of the bill is based on very sound arguments and on the experience we have had with the government since the outset of this Parliament. We have the roster system which clearly contravenes Standing Order 5 of this House. With the roster system, certain members of the House are permitted not to be in their place to answer questions put to the government by the elected representatives of the people. A responsible government, Mr. Chairman, is supposed to be responsible to Parliament, which is responsible to the people. The roster system is a complete denial of that practice.

We now have a new provision and innovation creeping into our governmental system. By the whim of the Prime Minister we are to have new ministers of state, without Parliament having a chance to express itself on whatever the Prime Minister wanted, he could conceivably appoint a minister of state to preside over a ministry which would be responsible for an area of jurisdiction that could be totally repugnant to Parliament. This particular clause of the bill permits the government to do just that.

We wonder if the government is trying to adopt a version of the British cabinet system which has an inner and outer cabinet. I understand that ministers of state in Great Britain are not Privy Councillors; the ministers of state are junior cabinet ministers. Our ministers of state are to be full-fledged members of the cabinet and will preside over ministries to be designated by the Prime Minister, ministries on which Parliament will not have an opportunity to express itself. That is what we find objectionable about this particular clause of the bill.

We object to the increasing use of discretionary power by this government. We object to this government increasingly bringing in statutes which give ministers discretionary power. In this particular case we are being asked to give the Prime Minister discretionary power to appoint at will whatever ministries suit his fancy. He will be able to appoint the faithful who support him in the Liberal caucus. That is why we object to this particular clause of the bill. We object to another aspect as well. Concomitant with the government's illegal roster system, another obnoxious practice is creeping into this House, one which totally defies the responsibility of the government being responsible to Parliament. I refer to the increasing practice of ministerial statements being made outside this House at a time when the House is sitting. This is clearly against our tradition and practice. In my judgment it is a violation of the rights of this House.

We are used to the government issuing press releases to get around the responsibilty of having to make statements on motions. I suppose that practice must be condoned because of the demands placed upon the government by modern, fast communication. But in no way can we condone the practice which is creeping into our system—that of ministers making full-fledged statements of policy outside the House while the House is sitting. In our view, that shows complete contempt for Parliament. We wonder what the future of this institution will be if this government remains in power. This institution which houses the representatives of the people is supposed to be a debating forum. It is supposed to be a forum where the representatives of the people have the opportunity to question ministers of the Crown and the government on their responsibilities.

By rules brought in by this government and railroaded through the House, we have been denied the right to withhold supply. The estimates have been taken out of this House. No longer can we withhold supply from the government. Tomorrow, Mr. Chairman, Parliament will adjourn for ten days. When we return we will have the main estimates to consider in most of the standing committees of this House. These committees will be meeting simultaneously with House sittings. They will be undermanned by members of the government and the opposition because we can only spread ourselves so thin. We will be faced with a bevy of experts who will back up ministers and their deputy ministers.

We are supposed to meaningfully examine the estimates of departments, but it is a futile process because we cannot change anything. According to the new rules, at a certain hour on a certain day, regardless of the position of the estimates in any committee of this House, they will be deemed to have been passed. That is the position in which we will find ourselves at the end of May. That is what the Standing Orders say.

Mr. Drury: You do not understand the rules.

Mr. McGrath: It happened every other year, and I suspect it will happen this year. The estimates of the Department of Fisheries and Forestry have not even been started. That standing committee is currently involved in examining a clean air bill. By the time we get to the main estimates of that department we will not have an opportunity properly to examine them. Notwithstanding the intervention of the President of the Treasury Board, at a certain hour on a certain day—I think May 20—all estimates will be deemed to have been passed.

We have lost the main power that Parliament once had. We have lost the traditional and long fought for right of Members of Parliament to withhold supply until satisfactory answers have been received from the government. Under the old rules, any member of this House could withhold supply if he had a particular grievance and was not satisfied with the way the government was handling the matter. We have now lost that right.

We are concerned about what is happening to this institution. We are concerned about the growth of the cabinet of this government, which has now reached record size. There are now almost 30 members of the cabinet. There are to be five additional members and perhaps as many parliamentary secretaries. We are arriving at a stage where the majority of the government will either be cabinet ministers or parliamentary secretaries. Therein lies the tale. Perhaps the government is having trouble with its members in caucus and that is why it is bringing in these innovations.

These are the matters which concern us, Mr. Chairman. These practices which the government is bringing in are having the effect of destroying the rights and privileges of this House. They are denying the concept of responsible government as we know it in this country. If the government is opting for a presidential system, why don't they openly say that this is what they have in mind and that they intend to bring it about by an evolutionary process, instead of doing it in this surreptitious manner? This is what the government is up to, I suspect.

I am particularly concerned about the release of important documents outside this House while the House is in session, and making statements of policy outside the House while the House is in session. I suppose every member of the cabinet has been guilty of this, including the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry who made a statement in Vancouver about sealing—

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Boulanger: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I have a very serious point of order and I think this is the proper time at which to raise it. I hope the hon. member who has just sat down for a moment will understand it very well. I am going to read in English—

An hon. Member: That won't help.

Mr. Boulanger: —Standing Order 34 concerning irrelevant or repetitious remarks. Paragraph 2 states clearly that such remarks are out of order and that a point of order may be raised. For the last three or four days the hon. member has been repetitious in every speech he has made. Every time he has got up it has been repetition, repetition, repetition.

An hon. Member: That is the trouble with the point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, if there is a Standing Order which must be followed tonight with regard to the hon. member who now has the floor, it is indeed that which deals with the disrespectful remarks he just made and the repetitions he has chosen to make for the last four or five days.

Therefore I respectfully suggest, Sir, that you make a ruling on this important point of order.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacInnis: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I notice there are a good many rule books on the other side. The hon. member referred to Standing Order 34(2). I will read it as it should be read.

> Mr. Speaker or the chairman, having called the attention of the House or of the committee—

So the responsibility for referring first to repetitious remarks by any hon. member belongs to the Chair and is not a matter for an hon. member to raise. This is written right into the rule.

[Translation]

Mr. Deachman: On the same subject, Mr. Chairman, the words do not seem to be the same as in the Standing Orders because this is how it reads:

> Mr. Speaker or the Chairman, after having called the attention of the House, or of the committee, to the conduct of a member who persists in irrelevance, or repetition . . .

. . . again, and again, and again—

> . . . may direct him to discontinue his speech, and if then the member still continues to speak . . .

—keeps talking, keeps the House busy—

> . . . Mr. Speaker shall name him . . .

. . . That is, the name of the member—

> . . . or, if in committee, the Chairman shall report him to the House.

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order—

[English]

The Chairman: The Chair would like to thank hon. members who have expressed their views on the point of order. I will hear further argument on the point if hon. members wish, but I am prepared to make a ruling now. However, hon. members should stay with the point of order which has been raised.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. It arises from the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, or wherever he comes from in British Columbia, implying that what I said was not, in effect, what I read from the rule. I read only so far from Standing Order 34(2):

> Mr. Speaker or the Chairman, after having called the attention of the House—

That is where I paused. The responsibility for drawing the attention of members to repetition rests with the Chair. I do not want to hear the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra, who has proven in the House before to be a liar—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Chairman: Order. I am sure members of the committee realize we are engaged in an important debate and should not take up too much time on the point of order. As I indicated a few moments ago, I would like to rule on the point of order if hon. members would allow me to do so. It seems to me, with respect to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Mercier, that as the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond has indicated it is really at the instance of the Chairman or of Mr. Speaker that an hon. member is asked not to be repetitious. From my own experience in the House, it seems that over the years there has been a good deal of repetition, perhaps for the purpose of emphasizing points which hon. members wish to make.

I would think, though, with respect, that the point of order was well taken and I would ask the hon. member for St. John's East and other hon. members, in view of the fact that the point with which we are concerned tonight is not so much the terms of the Standing Order as the general relevancy of the debate, to confine their arguments at least to part IV of the bill, dealing with the establishment of ministries and ministers of state.

Mr. Boulanger: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. Its purpose is to tell you, Mr. Chairman, that here on the government side we practice what we preach. As you will have noticed, I just spoke in English, as a Quebecker, and my hon. friend, as a good British Columbian, spoke in French.

Mr. MacInnis: And neither one of you said anything.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I was saying that if this bill were passed more ministers would be able to circumvent the rules of the House by making statements outside the House while the House was sitting, or by releasing important documents and reports outside the House when those documents ought properly to be tabled in the House. And more ministers would submit themselves to the illegal roster system, thereby depriving other hon. members of the opportunity of discharging their responsibility to their constituents by asking questions at the appropriate time.

Today the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion journeyed to the city of Halifax to release an important document which should have been released first in this House and to issue, together with that document, a statement. This illustrates the contempt which that particular minister feels for this institution. The report he issued today had been prepared by a government agency, the Atlantic Development Council. The document was an important one for the four Atlantic provinces, calling, as it did, for a ten-year strategy of development. It completely denies the present policy of the government and shows that policy to be one which is of little benefit to the disadvantaged regions of this country, in particular the Atlantic provinces.

I say this with particular reference to the creation of employment in the Atlantic provinces. Which are the two provinces getting least benefit from this program? They are the two with the highest rates of unemployment in the country, namely, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, one with 11 per cent unemployment and the other with 15 per cent.

• (8:30 p.m.)

This House was denied the right to have the document tabled today. Members were denied the opportunity of responding to it and of replying to the statement made in tabling it. A statement was made outside the House, notwithstanding the fact that the House was sitting. This document was released today in the city of Halifax one hour before the House was to begin its sitting. I submit this is clearly in contempt of Parliament. It shows complete contempt for the traditions and ancient privileges of this institution. This is a document of tremendous importance to the Atlantic Provinces. For example, chapter 1 refers to the economy of the Atlantic provinces, with which it deals in great detail. In chapter 2 there is a resumé of the main recommendations—

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I call Your Honour's attention to citation 159 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules which provides, amongst other things, that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the House if it can be done without injury to the public interest. Paragraph 4 of that citation provides:

> Official papers quoted during a debate should be laid on the table of the House. Mr. Patterson, member for the electoral district of Essex, and Mr. Cockburn, member for the electoral district of Northumberland, having, in the course of the debate on a motion for an order of the House and the amendment thereto, read extracts from certain official papers in their possession, and relating to the question under consideration, Mr. Mackenzie raised the point of order that official papers, when cited by an honourable member, ought to be laid on the table of the House. Mr. Speaker ruled: "That the point of order was well taken, and that the papers cited by the honourable members for Essex and Northumberland should be placed in the possession of the House".

It is true that Your Honour is sitting in committee, but I suggest that under that provision there is a direct, mandatory requirement that when an hon. member sees fit in the course of debate to cite from what are in effect official papers—and this document can only be considered, of course, an official paper—they should be laid on the table of the House and made available to all hon. members.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, on the point of order raised by my hon. friend from Peace River may I say he anticipated me because it was my intention to ask for the consent of the committee to comply with the expressed wish of the Prime Minister that I table this document. I was not permitted the opportunity to do so today, for reasons which I will not go into, notwithstanding the fact that I had been asked personally by the Prime Minister on the floor of the House to table the document. I endeavoured, in the opportunity presented to me today under Standing Order 41(2), to comply with the Prime Minister's wish that I table the document. I am concerned that members of the government have not seen it, let alone members of the House. I am sure that the Prime Minister is as anxious to see the document as we are. Certainly, I am sure no member of the government would withhold consent to my tabling this important and very valuable document.

Consequently, supported by the citation from Beauchesne placed on the record by my hon. friend from Peace River, and in accordance with the expressed desire this afternoon of the right hon. Prime Minister, I am very pleased and honoured to be able to lay on the table of the House this very important document for the edification of the government and members of this House.

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair is prepared to make a ruling. Are there any other hon. members who wish to contribute to the point of order?

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Chairman, concerning the point of order, I must point out that—

The hon. member has just moved that the committee accept the tabling of the document. In my opinion, the document should be tabled, if warranted, at the Committee on Regional Development. That committee is having hearings during this part of the session. The hon. member should submit the document to the committee in charge of reviewing the operations of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I do not feel that this is the right time to table the document in the House.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. I have heard the argument of the House leader for the official opposition that there may be some procedure by which the document referred to by the hon. member for St. John's East can be tabled at this stage of the proceedings. I must say, I have very grave doubts that this can be done while the House is sitting in committee of the whole. The hon. member for St. John's East made reference to the wish of the Prime Minister. I cannot assess the position in that respect because I have no knowledge of it. However, it seems to me that in committee of the whole we must follow the procedures of the committee. We must concern ourselves with our terms of reference. The committee is discussing clause 14 of Bill C-207, dealing with ministers and ministries of state.

As I indicated when the point of order was raised a few moments ago, there is some doubt in my mind about the relevancy of the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's East. Be that as it may, I think in committee we have been relatively generous in the matter of relevancy. However, I do not think there is any procedure, with great respect, by which this document could be tabled in committee of the whole at this time.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I did contemplate, in light of the ruling you have made, moving a motion that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to have this document tabled. But in light of the fact that this might cause difficulty I think I should ask the committee to appeal the decision that Your Honour has made.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East has the floor. There may be another opportunity for the hon. member for Peace River to move the motion to which he has referred, but at the present time the hon. member for St. John's East has the floor.

Mr. Baldwin: With respect, Mr. Chairman, I rose on a point of order to start with.

Mr. Basford: Who is talking of the rules of Parliament now? This is disgraceful conduct.

The Chairman: Order, please. I do not think there can be any quarrel about this. It seems to me that the hon. member for Peace River has gained the floor on a point of order for the purpose of moving a motion. There may be other opportunities for him to move the motion, but it seems to me he cannot take the floor on a point of order to move the motion.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, you are quite correct, but I think that Your Honour will agree that I first rose on a point of order when the hon. member for St. John's East made his statement. On that point of order Your Honour made a ruling. Under those circumstances, I initiated the discussion. I submit, with all due respect, that I am entitled to appeal the decision that Your Honour has made.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, if I could speak to this matter for a moment I may be able to find a way out of this impasse.

The Chairman: The hon. member for Peace River may find an opportunity to move the motion, but I have indicated that the hon. member for St. John's East has the floor; and as long as he has the floor I think I must acknowledge his right to speak.

Mr. Baldwin: With due respect, Mr. Chairman, I must appeal your decision not to allow me to appeal your decision.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, my intervention, which you so rightly ruled you would hear, was to suggest that perhaps the committee, which is master of its own conduct within the rules of the House, might wish to give me unanimous consent to table this document and in that way comply with the Prime Minister's request.

Some hon. Members: No.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, it would appear that unanimous consent is not forthcoming. I regret that this is so. The hon. member for Gaspé, for example, should be as interested as anyone in getting this report. He comes from one of the most disadvantaged areas in the country. For that reason I would hope the committee would reconsider its refusal and through you give me unanimous consent officially to table this document today.

[Translation]

Mr. Cyr: Mr. Chairman, I rise on the same point of order.

For the information of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) I must tell him that all members received copies of the document in today's mail. There is therefore no need to make an issue of—

[English]

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Gaspé said "all members". This is not correct. I have not received any such copy. With regard to the ruling given by the Chair, I wish to seek guidance from the Chair. How will the committee of the whole operate in the future if Beauchesne's rules do not apply? We are in committee of the whole. It appears that in disallowing the argument advanced by the hon. member for Peace River the authority of Beauchesne is no longer applicable in committee of the whole. Is this committee to operate without the rules of Parliament?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is an appeal.

The Chairman: The Chair does not want to reiterate the ruling. Hon. members may not agree with it, but as I indicated earlier I am aware of no procedure whereby under the circumstances which we have tonight in committee of the whole a document can be tabled.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, you have made a ruling, it is your right to make that ruling and I respect it. But I also respect my rights and the right of any other hon. member to appeal that ruling. I raised a point of order to start with. It was my point of order on which the discussion was initiated. Your Honour, in the breadth of your discretion, disallowed my point of order. I am now appealing your refusal to accept the point of order which I raised. Surely when I raise a point of order and Your Honour decides against it, I am entitled to appeal that decision.

The Chairman: I think the hon. member for Peace River is quite correct. The point which the Chair tried to make was that when the hon. member gained the floor on a point of order to appeal the ruling, the hon. member for St. John's East had the floor. The hon. member for St. John's East concluded his remarks, I gave the floor to the hon. member for Peace River subsequent to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Gaspé, and I now take it from the hon. member's remarks that having obtained the floor quite properly in the sequence of events, he is appealing the ruling. If I am correct in that, I think the hon. member has the right to appeal the ruling. Of course, under the rules the appeal will be submitted to Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: Your Honour is correct. You can consider that the appeal has been made and that the machinery has now been launched.

Mr. Boulanger: That is what I call mockery of the House.

Mr. Baldwin: This is what the rules provide. Read them.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker resumed the chair and read the question as follows:

The question is an appeal of a decision of the Chairman of the committee of the whole under the provisions of section 4 of Standing Order 55, as follows:

When clause 14 of Bill C-207, an act respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto, was being considered in committee of the whole the hon. member for Peace River raised a point of order to the effect that a document referred to in committee of the whole should be laid upon the table.

The Chairman ruled that there was no known procedure whereby a document could be laid upon the table of the committee of the whole since the committee was bound by its order of reference which in the present instance was clause 14 of Bill C-207.

Whereupon the hon. member for Peace River appealed to Mr. Speaker from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: If hon. members think it would be of advantage to the proceedings in this chamber to give citations or advice to the Chair in relation to the point of order which has been raised, I will be pleased to hear such argument, after which a decision will be given.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the first instance I shall try to establish the various facts which I think must be established in order to sustain the onus of proof upon me, and I admit there is such an onus. The first question is whether this is an official document. The document is called "ADC, A Strategy for the Economic Development of the Atlantic Region, 1971-1981, Atlantic Development Council". The first page contains a letter addressed to the Hon. Jean Marchand, P.C., M.P., Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, Ottawa, Ontario. It states:

Dear Mr. Marchand:

I have the honour of submitting to you on behalf of the Atlantic Development Council—

A council established under legislation.

—our proposals for a strategy for the economic development of the Atlantic region.

The council presents this strategy in the hope that it will contribute to accelerated economic development in the Atlantic region in the 1970s.

I simply leave this branch of my case by saying I submit that this establishes that the document is an official paper. I would then refer Your Honour to citation 159, Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, paragraph 3, which states:

It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the House, if it can be done without injury to the public interest.

It goes on to deal with certain instances. Then paragraph 4 states:

Official papers quoted during a debate should be laid on the table of the House. Mr. Patterson, member for the electoral district of Essex, and Mr. Cockburn, member for the electoral district of Northumberland, having, in the course of the debate on a motion for an order of the House and the amendment thereto, read extracts from certain official papers in their possession, and relating to the question under consideration, Mr. Mackenzie raised the point of order that official papers, when cited by an honourable member, ought to be laid on the table of the House. Mr. Speaker ruled: "That the point of order was well taken, and that the papers cited by the honourable members for Essex and Northumberland should be placed in the possession of the House."

I admit that what the chairman of the committee pointed out is a problem Your Honour, myself and other hon. members will have to face, that is, we were not having a debate on a bill in the House but in committee of the whole. I think this raises a moot point. If the ruling of the chairman of the committee, is to be upheld, is it the position that any hon. member during the course of a debate—there is no doubt this was a debate in committee of the whole—can cite official papers without being subject to the requirement of having those official papers laid on the table of the House?

It may well be that we will have to be vigilant and alert to find a way in which this can be done. It may well be that the committee would have to resolve itself into the House so that the documents could be laid on the table. However, I submit that the rule is clear, positive and categorical—that if official documents are quoted in a debate they must, when requested, be tabled. I rest my case upon this simple point and hope that justice, equity and fairness will permit Your Honour to see the logic and justice of the case I have made.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would merely like to add a few words to those of my colleague from Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). I do not think there is any distinction whatsoever—I believe Your Honour would agree with me—in the nature of debate that takes place whether in committee or when Your Honour is in the chair when we are sitting in formal session. Debate is debate. Therefore, when a member of the House, be he minister or otherwise, quotes from a public document I suggest, with the greatest deference, that the rule is the same. The circumstances are the same and whether we are in committee or in the House in formal session makes little difference.

The reference is to a public document during debate. I am sure that if the minister when discussing a clause in a bill were to make reference to a public document,the House could call for it to be tabled. Therefore I would say that under the present circumstances the House can call for the document which the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was quoting, because it is a public document. In addition, I would submit to Your Honour that Standing Order 55(1) has direct application to the present circumstances. It refers to the application of Standing Orders to sittings while in committee of the whole and states:

The Standing Orders of the House shall be observed in committees of the whole House so far as may be applicable—

Then the rule states the exception, which in no way touches upon this particular question. So there are no exceptions which concern the tabling of papers. Therefore I would put it to Your Honour that whether we are in committee or in formal session in the House makes no difference. This is a public document, and whether the document is referred to by a member of the government, a government backbencher or a member of the opposition makes little difference: the hon. member can call for the document to be tabled.

To that extent I put it to Your Honour that the point of order raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) was perfectly correct, and therefore the hon. member for St. John's East should be called upon to table the document.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I notice that a number of hon. members to the right of the Chair seem to be anxious to participate in the debate and, I assume, to give advice to the Chair along the lines that the point of order should not be accepted and the appeal should not be allowed. However, in all honesty I must tell hon. members that I am now prepared to give a ruling and I cannot think of anything that could be said by hon. members to my right which would influence me to change my course of action, having heard the points made by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

If there are other arguments to be submitted for the guidance of the Chair by hon. members who wish to support the point of order and who think the appeal should be allowed, I am perfectly prepared to hear them and as a result I might be otherwise convinced; but I have to tell hon. members that I am not convinced at all by the arguments already advanced.

The hon. member for Peace River suggests that he has the onus of proof. He was perhaps generous in this regard. I do not think he necessarily has the onus of proof; I think it is a burden to be shared equally on both sides of the question. The matter should be looked at objectively by the Chair with this point in mind. Hon. members have suggested that because a public document, an official document, has been quoted by an hon. member, it should be tabled in the House. I suggest to hon. members that this has never been a rule of the House and I would be very surprised if any precedent could be quoted in support of the contention advanced by the hon. member for Peace River and by the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Hon. members well know, perhaps even better than the Chair, that documents can be tabled in the House under certain circumstances. If hon. members will turn to citation 209 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition they will find the following passage:

> Papers are laid before the House in pursuance of > (1) Provisions of an act of Parliament;
> (2) An order of the House;
> (3) An address to the Crown;
> (4) The command of the Crown;
> (5) Standing Orders of the House.

Standing Orders of the House relating to the tabling of documents are the Standing Orders under which the hon. member for St. John's East earlier today attempted to table the document in question. Here I refer to Standing Order 41(2) as follows:

> A minister of the Crown, or a parliamentary secretary acting on behalf of a minister, may, in his place in the House, state that he proposes to lay upon the table of the House, any report or other papers dealing with a matter coming within the administrative responsibilities of the government—

I think hon. members know that this has reference to the tabling of documents on motions by a minister or by a parliamentary secretary on behalf of a minister.

The point is made that a document, having been referred to in debate, should be tabled. The rule in this respect is, again, well known. I refer hon. members to May's Seventeenth Edition, page 458:

> Another rule or principle of debate may here be added. A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the House, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table. This restraint is similar to the rule of evidence in courts of law, which prevents counsel from citing documents which have not been produced in evidence.

With due deference, I suggest to hon. members that the rule is clear, that it applies to an official document quoted in debate—not merely referred to, but cited and quoted in debate—and referred to in support of an argument by a minister of the Crown. This rule has never been otherwise interpreted by Speakers and has never been deemed by the House to be applicable to reference in debate to a document, official or otherwise, by an hon. member.

Even if the document in question is admitted to be an official document—and I do not quarrel with this interpretation by the hon. member for Peace River—this imposes no obligation and does not, I suggest, give to the hon. member who has quoted or referred to the document the right to table it. I suggest to hon. members that we would have a rather overcrowded table if every time an hon. member referred to an official document he was called upon to produce the document and place it on the table of the House. This has never been done and it has never been accepted that such is a rule of the House.

I suggest to hon. members, with respect, that the ruling of the Chairman of the committee was in accordance with the Standing Orders and with the practices of the House. Therefore I rule that the appeal cannot be allowed. The committee will now resume discussion of the bill that was before it.

And the House having resumed in committee:

The Chairman: House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-207.

On clause 14—Establishment of Ministries of State.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, before clause 14 is passed, I wish to express the arguments that I was unable to put forward when I last took part in the debate since my time was up.

Government Organization Act, 1970

Proposed clause 14 provides for the establishment of ministries of state by proclamation by the governor in council.

Clause 14 of the bill provides that ministries of state will be established by, and I quote:

—the Governor in Council ... by proclamation—

Clause 15 in Part IV of the same bill states that the establishment of a ministry of state will be announced by proclamation.

A proclamation establishing a Ministry of State shall

(a) state the name of the Ministry;

(b) specify the matter or matters in relation to which the Minister, etc.—

That is to say that clause 15 is derived from the same concept as clause 14: namely, resorting to proclamation rather than passing legislation.

Mr. Chairman, clause 16 deals with amendments to the contents, definition or purpose of the ministry. Under clause 16, these amendments could be made by proclamation. In effect, this clause reads as follows and I quote:

The Governor in Council may, by proclamation, from time to time, change the name of a Ministry of State or vary any matter set out in the proclamation establishing the Ministry.

And this is not all, Mr. Chairman. The same principle is applied further. Clause 18 deals with the termination of a ministry of state. How will this termination be made? What method will be used to eliminate a ministry of state? Still by proclamation. Clause 18 is drawn up as follows:

The Governor in Council may, by proclamation, terminate the existence of a Ministry of State.

This means that in clauses 14, 15, 16 and 18, the government is clearly stating what it has in mind when asking us to adopt Part IV of the bill. Basically, the government would like Parliament to delegate part of its already fairly reduced powers to the executive power to enable it, as regard these specific questions, not to have to go through Parliament but to act on its own authority, by proclamation instead of legislation.

Mr. Chairman, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) stated yesterday in the House that Parliament cannot control the activities of commissions such as the Royal Commission on the status of women since no minister is actually responsible for it. This was basically his point. He argued that a minister had to be responsible before the House for the Royal Commission on the status of women, for instance, or for the Prices and Incomes Commission or any other commission.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to make it very clear for the President of the Treasury Board. That is precisely what we want, that a minister be responsible for the Crown corporations and all organizations, agencies or departments created by this government.

So, to be logical, it would be necessary for the President of the Privy Council to tell us precisely what Crown corporations or agencies will come under the jurisdiction of this or that minister. It is important to know they take good care not to tell us in precisely what area those bodies will be created. We are being asked for blanket authority to create ministries whose terms of reference in particular fields the government will specify as they please, as circumstances may require.

Mr. Chairman, one cannot discuss things unknown to him. The argument used by the President of the Treasury Council was very weak, I believe, and I had hoped he would give better reasons for clauses 14 to 18. There must be serious reasons not to use Parliament but to resort instead to proclamations. In order to justify the creation of ministries of state and the appointment of new ministers the President of the Treasury Board pointed to the fact among the 80 government agencies or departments, many are not really responsible to Parliament, except for the annual report they present at the close of the financial year.

He thus proved that numerous powers had already been handed over to those creatures of the government. Fundamentally, the argument put forward by the President of the Treasury Board showed to what extent that administration escaped the control of Parliament.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the President of the Privy Council proposed that the House grant him a broad permission to create ministries of state.

He took care not to tell us exactly in what fields these ministries would operate.

Mr. Chairman, this is a serious lapse, and I feel that the President of the Treasury Board could rise and very simply and quite frankly give us some details.

I do not stand here to hold up the passage of this bill but only in the hope of being enlightened on clauses 14 to 18 and on the reasons why the government does not intend to proceed by legislation but rather by proclamation and asks the House for delegated powers.

An eminent statesman once said: "Give us the tools and we will do the job." We are ready to give the tools to this government, but we want to know to what use it will put them.

We want Parliament to establish these ministries of state through legislation. I want these ministries of state to be established through legislation according to the normal practice of the House. If the government really intends to amend the definition, the name, the responsibilities, or the structures, as indicated in clause 16, I want it to proceed not by proclamation but by way of legislation. If the government wants to abolish a ministry of state or another, as it can do under clause 18, it should do it through normal and ordinary procedure, that is through legislation rather than proclamation.

Our hon. opposites have not given us the answer to these questions. Why, in the case of 29 other departments, has the government submitted to the will of Parliament, proceeded through the normal and ordinary procedure while now, by means of clauses 14 to 18 of part IV, it will no longer proceed through legislation but by proclamation, independently of needs or problems raised by Parliament, independently of the opinion of parliamentarians of any party? At this level, Mr. Chairman, we are all equal and we all have the same rights and the same privilege of knowing exactly what is going on.

Mr. Chairman, facing this problem the government would like to have all this done through exceptional measures, either by proclamation, after receiving general authorization from the House of Commons. This is what a vote in favour of clauses 14 to 18 will mean—blanket authority granted to the government to act as it pleases through delegation of powers.

Mr. Chairman, we would grant the government the over-all authorization it seeks if it were willing to proceed, as it should, in the establishment and administration of these ministries, by telling us in what definite fields they will operate, but this answer is not given to us.

Mr. Drury: It cannot be given, Mr. Chairman.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Fortin: If we were given this answer, Mr. Chairman, we would certainly be in a position to co-operate. But we cannot go blindly on.

In view of this uncertainty and the dark in which we are kept, I cannot agree. This is why, Mr. Chairman, I want to express my fierce opposition to the fact that Parliament keeps on delegating its authority to the executive, because we do not know just how far this government will ask us to go and how far we will actually go.

Mr. Chairman, there must be a balance between the executive, legislative and judicial powers. The legislative power is increasingly delegating its authority to the executive to enable it to work more effectively. However, it is not proven that this system of delegation of power really serves the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. Chairman, we now have a government of technocrats, of specialists and scholars instead of a human government. We have a government which constantly increases the number of inquiry commissions, departments, agencies, ministries—in fact, there are more than 80 of them—and appointments, ostensibly to bring the people to participate in the administration of the state. Unfortunately, the people participate less and less, and I shall give a very specific exemple to this effect.

One day, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) rose and told the House: The government has just published a white paper on tax reform, which is going to change the whole tax structure and system. He said also that this white paper was published to obtain the views of the people. He said: We will take into consideration the views that will be expressed, the people will have an opportunity to submit their views to the government.

The days went by and some opposition members asked the Minister of Finance whether he was hearing from many Canadians and whether their views were favourable ones. The minister contented himself with rising, smiling while rocking back and forth and resuming his seat as usual. An opposition member rose and asked the same question. The Minister of Finance then gave the following answer: The opposition would like very much to know how popular the Liberal party is in Canada.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the kind of attitude that proves the government does not really want more participation in the formulation of legislation, in the administration of the common weal. It is an excellent purpose, Mr. Chairman, to want more participation by the people in the formulation of legislation, and that is not what I blame the government for.

Mr. Chairman, my concern about these ministries of state, and I have said so again—

Mr. Béchard: And you are going to say so once more.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, if only the Parliamentary Secretary would stop disturbing me.

Mr. Béchard: He does not disturb much!

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, if a crisis should occur in a particular field,—I would not want it to happen,—and should a ministry of state serve as a pretext to the government to do nothing, to hide its inability to get things done, would the government be able to say what could happen?

What does the government do when it is faced with a problem? It creates a Royal Commission of Inquiry and the results are nil. Nothing happens.

We would like to know how far these ministries of state can go. What authority will they have? In what way will they differ from other departments established through the normal legislative procedure?

Mr. Chairman, as long as we do not obtain clear and fair answers to these questions, the government has no right to suggest that the opposition is filibustering, because we are convinced that we are doing our work as members of this House, which is to ask the government to account for public expenses.

The President of the Privy Council may well tell us later that hon. members can easily exercise such control through the question period and the annual reports of departments and agencies.

Mr. Chairman, since I was elected to this House, I put more than 300 questions on the Order Paper about the management and status of Crown corporations and I made in this way a detailed study on the control exercised by Parliament over these corporations. Today, I can tell the President of the Treasury Board that, according to the findings of that study, parliamentarians have less and less control over Crown corporations.

Mr. Chairman, it can easily be proved that control by Parliament over Crown corporations has become nonexistent, and that its control over departmental administration is only bluff, since we are only informed of what the government wants us to know.

I have asked, for instance, for the production of papers concerning the Department of Public Works, with regard to the construction of a federal building in Victoriaville, which the Liberals have been promising since 1952. I have had that notice of motion put on the order paper in October and it was only a year and some months later that the papers, although not all of them, were provided.

Mr. Chairman, this is an example of the carelessness of the administration. And yet, a member should be the first to be informed of the achievements of a department in his riding. But this is not the case. When a member—and let us put aside party politics—tries to find out about the plans of a department, of officials or technocrats in his riding, he is wasting his time. He goes from one technocrat to another and standing on a two-foot thick carpet, he learns absolutely nothing!

They say that it is a departmental or interdepartmental secret, or still, they say politely: This is none of your business.

Yet, people have democratically elected the member so that he will keep in touch with the authorities concerned and, without any partisan motive, report to his constituents on the administration of the government.

I have written at least a dozen letters to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing), asking him about the progress being made in the expropriation proceedings concerning the federal building in Victoriaville. I got no reply, except one from his private secretary, acknowledging receipt of mine and telling me that she would bring my inquiry to the minister's knowledge. That is the kind of control Parliament has over a department even when a member's riding is concerned. This is ridiculous.

I understand the President of the Treasury Board has valid motives and is honest, but I wish to tell him that the system is inadequate, and I am not prepared to crawl in order to create four more ministries about whose establishment, transformation or abolition we shall have nothing to say, and about which we shall never know what is going on if ever one of them developped programs for our ridings.

Mr. Chairman, this is absolutely senseless. The construction of a federal building in Victoriaville is very important to me and to my fellow citizens in Lotbinière and Victoriaville—and I say this without any partisanship. All the people of my area are shocked because we have been promised a federal building since 1952. The supplies have been voted, as one can see in the estimates. An amount of some $697,000 was voted two years ago, but no building has been erected. I wrote to the department to know if there had been expropriations, but I got no reply. In a letter to the minister I asked how work was progressing, but I have not yet received an answer. Now, I am being asked to approve a bill seeking to create ministries of state about which Parliament will not be able to give its opinion regarding their establishment, their modification, the restriction of their powers or their abolition. Our fears are quite understandable.

That is why I reject those clauses as long as we do not get information—

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, my intervention will be quite brief. I should like to say a few words in response to representations made by the hon. member for St. John's East and also by le député de Lotbinière. First, the hon. member for St. John's East has raised what might better be described as grievances rather than observations on the bill under study. Although perhaps the grievances were not relevant, they ought to be answered.

• (9:30 p.m.)

The hon. member objected to what he referred to as the illegal roster system. He supported the notion of illegality by quoting Standing Order 5 which calls for hon. members to attend the service of the House unless leave of absence has been given by the House. I suppose that one could conclude from this Standing Order that ministers who are not on duty in the House on a particular day are absent without permission and, consequently, are offending Standing Order 5. This kind of interpretation of Standing Order 5 would apply to very large numbers. For example, the hon. member's party would be in a state of illegality and in contravention of the rules of this House if that were the correct interpretation of the rule. I am sure the members of the committee would agree that this is not the way the rule is to be interpreted.

In so far as the roster system is concerned, it is in effect an assurance given by the Prime Minister that the ministry will be so organized that each of the ministers will attend at the question period on three of the five sitting days of a week. The roster system is not designed to absent but to ensure the attendance of ministers on at least three of the five sitting days of the week unless they are out of the city of Ottawa on official business. On those three days, that system takes precedence over House or other government business. In this light it would be hard to argue that the hon. member even has a grievance.

The hon. member raised one other matter which I think deserves comment. He complained that under our new rules it is no longer possible to withhold supply. He cited the case of the old days where, if I understood him correctly, if a member was not satisfied or did not get his way he could indefinitely, presumably forever, hold up supply for the government in the service of the country. As I understood it, that is a plea for what is properly referred to as the tyranny of the minority. I do not think our rules and practices should lend themselves to that kind of tyranny. They are liable to be abused in the same way as is sometimes seen as manifestations of the tyranny of the majority. Both can occur, and both are equally dangerous. In so far as the hon. member regrets the disappearance of this phenomenon, he is crying about what I am glad to say is a lost cause.

[Translation]

When the hon. member for Lotbinière mentioned the President of the Privy Council, I believe he meant the President of the Treasury Board because he was referring to what I said. He claimed that yesterday I suggested setting up ministries of state to better supervise Crown corporations and boards created from time to time by the government. He mentioned the example I gave concerning the problem of the status of women. I am not in favour of those ministries to better supervise Crown corporations. What I tried to explain yesterday was this: from time to time, unexpected and serious problems crop up suddenly, which are of national portent and which do not fall within the jurisdiction of an existing department. Again I mention the problem of the situation of women in Canada which, so to speak, concerns most of the departments of the government and therefore no specific department.

It will therefore be understood that certain problems come under the jurisdiction of all departments in general, but of none in particular. And in order to formulate a sound and useful policy to solve those problems, it is necessary to establish a ministry of state which will be entrusted with the task of preparing a policy. That ministry will then administer and implement that policy. If any new ministry must implement a policy established and approved by Parliament, it might be that after achieving its purpose, it will disappear. Indeed, it is not the wish of the government to see a proliferation of bureaucrats and departments, and if a ministry of state has survived its usefulness, it will be suppressed. We have enough officials, we must not take on any more. One must distinguish between a real department and a ministry of state. In theory a department is created through legislation, and that is what we want to do. As regards the creation of a ministry of state that would be relatively small, that would look after policy-making, that would not have many functions, it may not be as necessary to flollow the procedure applied for the establishment of a real department. One must distinguish between the two. Departments from now on will have to be established through legislation. On the other hand, a ministry of state may be established in order to achieve precise purposes and abolished once the purpose has been achieved.

That is what is meant by clauses 14 to 20. If the hon. member can distinguish between a ministry of state and a department and if he can understand that departments will be established as before, through legislation, I believe he could accept easily enough the creation of ministries of state through proclamation.

• (9:40 p.m.)

Mr. Bell: I should like to ask the minister a question. I appreciate he is the first one who has tried to justify the roster system. In the first part of his response to my hon. friend from St. John's East he said that ministers who are not here are in the same position as members who are not here. Does he make no distinction between a minister who announces formally that he will not be present and a member who may be behind the curtain or in the building somewhere? Is there not a flouting of the Standing Order by a minister who announces publicly that without permission he intends to be absent? Does the hon. gentleman not see a definite distinction here?

Mr. Drury: I see a difference, but I cannot see that clandestine sneaking behind the curtain is any worse than stating one's intentions publicly. Doing in secret what is wrong is not really much better than doing publicly what is wrong.

Mr. MacInnis: Would the minister not also distinguish between the responsibility of a cabinet minister and that of any other member of the House and keep this in mind when he refers to the roster system? Would he also, since he has alibied the roster system quite well, explain to the House the practice of ministers not attending the House unless they are on the roster and are given permission to attend during the question period? I emphasize the words "given permission to attend" when they are not on the roster.

Mr. Drury: I appreciate the hon. member's emphasis on those words, though I am not sure why he emphasized them or who is in the process of granting this permission.

Mr. MacInnis: For the edification of the minister I would suggest he get in touch with the Prime Minister, if possible, and with the Minister of Fisheries. Let him look at what has happened in the past in this respect. No matter how the minister defines Standing Order 5, it is not a question of being absent voluntarily or absent on government business; it is a case of the roster system being imposed upon ministers who do not and cannot attend on the days on which their names do not appear on the roster.

Mr. McGrath: The minister seems to have missed the point with regard to Standing Order 5. I suppose this is one of our oldest rules, and surely its purpose is to preclude the possibility of anybody preventing a member of the House from attending. What the minister seems to ignore is that the Prime Minister is violating that rule by directing a number of his colleagues, on any one day, to stay out of the House, clearly in contravention of Standing Order 5.

Mr. MacInnis: He does not seem to know what the Prime Minister is doing.

Mr. Drury: You will forgive me, Mr. Chairman, but I am not sure whether this is really relevant to the bill. I apologize for being out of order. However, let me say that I am a member of the ministry.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Drury: I will try to explain what a member of the ministry is. I have never been directed by the Prime Minister to stay out of the House. Indeed, I have on occasions been in the House during question period on days other than those on which I am required to attend in accordance with the roster. I have come into the House on those occasions feeling that attendance in this House was appropriate and should have the highest priority on my time. Let me assure the hon. member that I did not have to seek the permission of the Prime Minister and I do not believe I shall have to seek the Prime Minister's permission to do so in future. This notion that members are forbidden to enter the House by the Prime Minister is nothing but an unsubstantiated canard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Order, please. I hope we will not proceed too far on this point. I believe there is some relevancy attached to it. The subject of the question period and the roster system has been raised by hon. members in debate. In a sense it is relevant. The committee is now being asked to approve the appointment of ministers of state and I think some importance attaches to what is at issue. I will recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond and then the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster, but I hope we will not spend what is left of the sitting discussing the roster system.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege. I do so prepared to stake my seat on the statement I have just made, providing the minister has the guts to stake his seat on the denial he has made of what I said. The precedent is already established on the record of this House. Whether or not the minister himself has been requested or instructed by the Prime Minister to remain out of the House when he is not on the roster, I say that ministers have been so requested—the record will prove it—and I will stake my seat upon what is contained in the written record if the minister is prepared to stake his denial in the same way.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I stand on what I said, that I as a member of the ministry and a minister of the Crown have been in the House on days during the question period other than my duty days in accordance with the roster; that I did not, that I do not have to—and I am sure I shall not have to—seek the permission of the Prime Minister in order to do this. If the hon. gentleman has loose in his head some idea that there is some curious system which he believes in, he is entitled to his beliefs. I am just saying what I know from my personal experience.

Mr. MacInnis: I apologize to the minister. I did not at any time say that the minister was the member of the government I had in mind. I did not deny the statement the minister has made but I said, and I will repeat it, that I will stake my seat on this premise that it is already recorded in the Hansard the statement which indicated that a member of the government was instructed to stay out of the House on a day on which he was not on the roster system. Again I say to the minister that I am not denying what he says, but if he intends to deny what I am saying he should stake his seat on it, because I will stake my seat on what I am saying.

Mr. Drury: I suggest we might terminate this discussion and that we do not waste the time of this House, or my time, by trying to deny what the hon. gentleman is saying.

Mr. Bell: Would the minister agree, once and for all, now that the matter has been brought up, to formally raise it with the Speaker? I know His Honour has avoided ruling on this matter when it has been brought up during the question period, but now we have it in the open and we shall be concerned with it to the extent that we wonder whether these new ministers will ever appear here; we think they may be civil servants and businessmen who will never be elected to Parliament—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: We want to know these things. Will these ministers of state be required to be here? Does the minister not agree we should formally get a decision from the Speaker on this entire roster system and settle the matter once and for all?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: The hon. gentleman has asked whether the ministers of state will appear in the House. Let me assure him that the individuals appointed under this proposed legislation will have all the qualifications in respect of membership of this House that any other minister would have.

Mr. Bell: There will never be an appointment of a person who is not a Member of Parliament to be a minister of state; is that the assurance?

Mr. Drury: The same kind of people will be appointed to head departments, ministries of state and to be ministers without portfolio as has been the practice in the past.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, on the same question—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Oxford.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Chairman, I was wondering whether the minister who has just taken his seat would deal with one matter. In view of the fact that the party of which he is a member, in former days when I was a member of the House appointed a minister from Montreal who was not a member of the House—I refer to Mr. Marler who was Minister of Transport for a good many months before being elected to this chamber—would he give us an assurance that none of these ministers of state will be persons outside this House?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I can only repeat my earlier statement and give the assurance that the appointment of departmental ministers, ministers of state and ministers without portfolio will follow the practice of the past.

Mr. MacInnis: Is the minister—

The Chairman: Order. I indicated a few moments ago that I thought this was a helpful interchange and I do not want, unless hon. members would like me to do so, to curtail it at this point. I have been trying to recognize the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate who has a contribution to make—

Mr. Lundrigan: A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: —but if hon. members want to continue the cross-examination, if I may call it that, of the President of the Treasury Board, it may be useful. I recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, is the President of the Treasury Board aware of anybody in the present government who is not a member of this House?

An hon. Member: No.

The Chairman: Order, please. I am not sure we are advancing the work of the committee by this sort of informal interchange. I will recognize the President of the Treasury Board. Has the hon. member for Lotbinière a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I wish to put a very specific question to the hon. President of the Treasury Board.

He said yesterday in his speech, and I quote:

> To again refer to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, at the present time there is no minister to whom the members of the House can point the finger of responsibility: it is diffused.

Which means we need a minister in charge of these general policies.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday my hon. colleague for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) put the following question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson):

> Mr. Speaker, could the hon. minister tell us whether he intends to lower the discount rates of the Bank of Canada again so that chartered banks also bring down their interest rates for a better balanced economy?

Mr. Chairman, the President of the Treasury board knows as well as I do that the Bank of Canada is placed by law under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance. Now let us look at the minister's answer:

> Mr. Speaker, this is a matter for decision by the Governor of the Bank of Canada. If he has any such intentions he will, of course, notify the public in the normal way and would be in consultation with me . . .

Mr. Chairman, this one instance of the lack of parliamentary control and the minister of Finance—

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. With respect, the hon. member took the floor to ask a question of the President of the Treasury Board. Would he please ask his question.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: I was coming to the point, Mr. Chairman, a point which the President of the Treasury Board does not seem to be missing. This demonstrates how a member is denied the right to know anything about this government's policies and stresses the fact that the minister is not actually responsible.

Is this the kind of responsibility in store for the future ministers in charge of a ministry, or will they be subject to a stricter responsibility and tighter parliamentary control?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is well aware of the fact that the Bank of Canada Act states quite clearly the duties, functions and responsibilities of the Bank itself and of its Governor. What the Minister of Finance had in mind the other day was that under the statute approved by Parliament the responsibility for policy questions does not lie with the government but with the Governor.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. Would hon. members resume their seats. If the hon. member for Lotbinière has a supplementary question I will recognize him, but it seems we are entering very substantially into debate and may be denying other hon. members the opportunity to take the floor. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, in view of the explanations just given by the hon. President of the Treasury Board, let me ask if this means that under the law, the Governor of the Bank of Canada is not responsible before Parliament for his decisions or for his influence on the Canadian economy through the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lotbinière is well aware that it is not up to me to interpret the existing laws. He is seeking legal advice and I suggest that he reads the statutes relating to the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. It being ten o'clock p.m. it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, might I be permitted to ask the government House leader what we will be doing tomorrow, so that we may be adequately prepared?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I had better resist the temptation to make a comment on that point so as not to halt the progress being made in this House. Tomorrow I had in mind beginning with the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act, on the understanding that because of the intensive preparation the speeches will be short, to the point and few in number. Following that we would continue with the present bill which some hon. members find so exhilarating, others depressing.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I ask the President of the Privy Council whether he could tell us if the House could expect to enjoy the presence in the chamber tomorrow of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, so that the House will be given the opportunity of directing questions to the minister on the statement that he made today, and perhaps the minister might even be disposed to table the report.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether he is on the roster, but I will make a special effort to produce him whether he is on or off the roster.

Mr. Baldwin: Will you table him?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—CONTINUATION OF SPEAKER IN POSITION FOLLOWING NEXT ELECTION—SUGGESTED DISCUSSION BY PARTY OR HOUSE LEADERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, March 23, as recorded in Hansard at page 4512, I asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the right hon. gentleman consider holding discussions with the leaders of the other parties in the House, or ask the House leaders to hold such discussions, concerning the possibility of our taking appropriate steps so that after the next election we will still have as Speaker of this House, on a continuing basis, the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the chair?

At that point Hansard has this notation:

> SOME HON. MEMBERS: Hear, hear!

Which, being interpreted, means that there was applause. I am very happy that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) in his capacity as government House leader is here to respond to my question as I put it once again tonight. I was not surprised that His Honour the Speaker did not let us stay on it the other day when I asked the question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and I may say that this has been noted in a number of publications, notably in an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press on Saturday, April 3. That editorial said:

> It may well be that the proposal, coming in the middle of question period, took Mr. Trudeau by surprise. Obviously it is one that deserves a considered response.

The same editorial went on to say:

> Mr. Knowles, however, was well advised to raise the matter at this time because there is danger that consideration, if deferred too long, may be futile. The closer we draw to a general election, the greater is the probability that the issue will be decided not be serious consultations but by untoward political events.

That indeed is the reason for my raising the question again tonight and expressing to my friend, the government House leader, the hope that he might be here, as he is, to answer it. Perhaps I might read two more sentences from the Winnipeg Free Press editorial for they are sentences with which we all agree. They read:

> For three years, the House has been ruled by a Speaker who was not elected to Parliament as the candidate of a party. Never in our history has the chair been held in such respect.

[Mr. McGrath.]

It is because all of us in this House value greatly the leadership and the guidance of the present occupant of the chair that I raise this point again tonight. Perhaps I might be permitted to point out for the record that the Mr. Speaker to whom I am referring is not in the chair at the moment but, rather, Your Honour Mr. Deputy Speaker, which makes it easier for us to speak in glowing terms about His Honour the Speaker of this House of Commons.

It seems to me that the point in the Winnipeg Free Press editorial is well taken. This is a matter that we should not leave until a month or two before the next election. We have a Speaker of whom we are all extremely proud, one who guides this House effectively, with tremendous impartiality, and I think there is complete agreement in the House and it would be most desirable to have His Honour the present Speaker preside over us in the next Parliament. There are various ways by which this can be achieved. I have put forward a proposal in the form of a public bill, but that is not the only way it can be done and in rising here tonight I am not speaking with respect to that bill. I simply want the assurance that the matter of doing something will be considered. I am really asking for no more at this time than I put in my question to the Prime Minister on March 23, namely, that appropriate discussions on this matter not be delayed.

I suggest two levels at which discussions should take place. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can call in the leaders of the other parties and have such a discussion, or if he should feel it more appropriate, at least as a beginning, he could ask the House leaders of the various parties to have that discussion. I am sure I speak for the House leaders on this side of the chamber when I say we are quite willing to do so.

Therefore I put it forward tonight, Sir, without trying to pin down any specific way of dealing with the problem but simply to ask the government House leader—and I hope he will do it—to give the assurance that appropriate discussions will be held soon so that something may be done about this important matter while there is yet time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be quite brief because of the short time available. I respond to the question raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) first of all by saying that in the analysis of the operations of the House of Commons that are frequently conducted, sometimes the influence of the Speaker in establishing the mood of the House is overlooked. It is a fact, nevertheless, that in addition to the other parts of the House, the government and opposition parties, the Speaker wields an influence which may be as great if not greater at times than that wielded by any of the other parts of this institution.

I have had the opportunity to observe four Speakers in this House and I believe each has made a valuable contribution to the institution. In general, I think we can be satisfied that in Canada the speakership as an institution has operated effectively over the years. Because we have as a House acted to strengthen the hand of the Speaker, one of the most important moves being to abolish appeals to the House from Speakers' rulings, a status has been ensured for the Speaker which he had not enjoyed.

I share the hon. member's feelings about the present incumbent and the feelings expressed in the editorial he quoted. I believe it was because of an appreciation of his qualities that the House at the beginning of this Parliament again unanimously selected him to be the presiding officer of the House. Because of that expectation, in the last federal election he ran as an independent candidate in his constituency and, as I understand it, was unopposed by any of the parties in an official sense. I believe a candidate ran against him but this candidate was not sponsored by any of the leaders presently in this House. That was a general manifestation of the desire of the political process to maintain the present Speaker in office. I hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not ruled out that procedure as one of the options or appropriate steps he would suggest as a way to ensure the continued occupancy of the chair by the present incumbent.

Before the question was asked, and since, I have attempted to study some of the literature on the subject of a permanent speakership. It has been a difficult subject. As my hon. friend knows, at one time the British established a select committee to determine how appropriate steps could be taken to reach the goal of a permanent speakership. Men like Winston Churchill were on that committee, but the final result was that the system then in vogue was recommended for retention. It so happened that many Speakers of the British House continued in office despite the intrusion of elections, which they invariably won. The British system would demonstrate that the Speaker, certainly in Britain, has had no difficulty in maintaining his seat and the electorate has understood his importance in the system.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret that I must interrupt the minister. As a matter of fact, I have been a little generous and he has had a little more time than he is entitled to under the Standing Orders.

SOCIAL SECURITY—QUEBEC—ALLEGED APPROPRIATION OF GUARANTEED INCOME PENSION SUPPLEMENT BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on April 5 last, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) if there was an agreement between the Quebec government and the federal government since the Quebec government was taking over the increase in the guaranteed minimum income supplement paid to our senior citizens.

I had then no time to explain but I will do it tonight.

The hon. members will remember that before the Christmas recess, the House adopted a legislation increasing from $31.83 to $55 per month the guaranteed income supplement for senior citizens aged 65 or more and without any other income. This involved therefore a monthly increase of $23.17.

Now, in the Province of Quebec, the Social Security Act, better known as the Social Welfare Act, provided for a supplement, especially when only the husband or the wife had reached retirement age.

This supplement varied, I repeat, from $1 to $30 per month, and sometimes a little more.

But as soon as the federal legislation increasing the guaranteed income supplement was passed, the Quebec government took steps to take away from old people a portion or all of the supplement granted, so that a couple or a single person did not receive more than before.

I will quote as an example the case of a lady from La Sarre, who had been granted by Quebec, after many attempts, a supplement of $20 a month. As early as December 1970, the government of Quebec took away from her this supplement of $20 which she required to meet her needs. After a few representations to the provincial department involved, it agreed to restore this supplement. But, as early as the day after the cheque was received, the officials of the La Sarre office took it away from this lady through means that I will call disgusting.

I could quote many similar cases where almost everybody received a supplement from the province of Quebec. The supplements have been cancelled or reduced according to the increased guaranteed income supplement from Ottawa. I am aware that my colleagues in the House know also of similar cases and are shocked by the Quebec government's attitude towards older people. This means that the Quebec government appropriates, so to speak, the increase granted by the federal government, since the older people will not get more money than they did before.

Therefore, I should like to ask the minister if there was an understanding between both governments for Quebec to proceed in such a way; it seems an indirect means by which a province is granted larger revenues.

Since the federal government cannot interfere directly with the decisions taken by the provincial governments as regards social security, perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) should at least try to come to an understanding with the provinces with a view, first of all, to gradually to lowering the age for eligibility to the old age security pension down to 60, as was the case when the retirement age was lowered from 70 to 65.

Besides, the government should grant the old age security pension to any person whose spouse receives such pension, even though that person has not reached the age provided in the act. This would dispel much worry and hardship for those couples in which only one spouse gets a pension.

If we intend to establish a really just society, let us avoid inequities and provide as much satisfaction as possible to those who, during their whole life, contributed to the development of their country, and this sometimes in wretched conditions. At least, let us recognize the fact and let us provide them with a little well-being on their retirement, and spare them the feeling of being crushed and a burden to others. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that nobody will have to stint in order to provide more security for those people.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's reference to the guaranteed income supplement to the old people in Quebec suggests that he misunderstood the matter. No pressions were put on Quebec to have it administer the guaranteed income supplement for older people.

Since we are on this subject, I should like to mention that the federal government increased by over 50 per cent the amount of the income supplement for older people in Canada. Since legislation to that effect was enacted in December, the increases in the supplement will ensure that no qualified married couple will receive less than $255 per month and no qualified single person, less than $135. Moreover, these increased benefits came into force at the beginning of this month.

NATIONAL PARKS—ELK ISLAND—ANIMAL STARVATION—FAILURE OF WILDLIFE SERVICE TO DIRECT REDUCTION IN ELK POPULATION COMMENSURATE WITH FEED SUPPLIES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my purpose in raising the question of the starvation of animals in Elk Island National Park is simply to impress upon the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Buchanan) the request that a full and complete investigation be conducted into the actions of the Canadian Wildlife Service and the parks administration with respect to the discharge of their duties and responsibilities; also, of course, to seek an assurance from the minister that what transpired in Elk Island Park during last winter will not be allowed to recur.

I raised the matter on March 2, 1971, when as reported at page 3865 of Hansard I asked whether the minister was aware of the situation in Elk Island Park and whether action was being taken toward alleviating the situation there. The minister replied that he was aware of it; the problem was due to the early winter, heavy snowfalls and hardening of the top layer. He referred to the fact that a number of animals had already died and said:

> —the officials of my department have arranged for the conveyance of six tons of feed daily in the park, in order to help the animals to survive throughout the winter which has been as hard for them as for us.

The assurance was given by the minister that a feeding program was to take place. However, upon checking with the officials of the park and Canadian Wildlife Service personnel it was pointed out that a feeding program was against sound management of wildlife principles, particularly at a time when the animals were suffering from gross malnutrition. It is obvious, therefore, that a feeding program was not conducted. There was a feeding program of a sort, but not pertaining to the elk, and this is the question with which I am basically concerned.

In my opinion, the park administration and the Canadian Wildlife Service attempted to mislead the public into believing that politicians, self-styled experts and the public were becoming overemotional and panic-stricken. They merely suggested that nature in its raw form was cruel and that a natural culling-out process was desirable even though it meant that animals would suffer. I suppose one could accept this if the park contained all the attributes of a natural habitat. I suppose one could accept it more if there were abundant supplies of natural feed in the park. But this is not the case. I have examined the situation personally with the assistance of biologists who are familiar with the feeding and maintenance of wildlife in a park such as Elk Island.

Then, of course, the situation was compounded by a bad winter. That is the only argument that the members of the Canadian Wildlife Service and the park officials have put forward. They contend that the whole difficulty has resulted from a severe winter. We examined the park, and it is clearly evident that there is insufficient food available to support a population of something like 1,500 animals. This leaves two courses open to the authorities. They can either follow a population reduction process or undertake a feeding program. The Canadian Wildlife Service, according to information that I have received, recommended neither course. I understand that the park administration and the Canadian Wildlife Service has stuck to the argument that if they were to commence a feeding program they would be going against principles of sound wildlife management, and have rejected that course.

With regard to reduction of the elk population, this usually takes place in the form of a fall slaughter. The meat is processed and distributed to needy people, to hospitals, to Indians and Métis. Elk Island has an excellent abattoir and processing facilities. This could have been done easily. One slaughter was conducted in 1969. Even though it was obvious that supplies of food were glaringly short in 1970, no appreciable reduction in the wildlife population was recommended in 1970. It therefore seems to me that there has been a glaring lack of proper evaluation. I would go so far as to say that there has been a dereliction of duty, either on the part of the Canadian Wildlife Service or the park administration, or at least there has been lack of co-ordination. I do not believe that developments such as this should be allowed to take place. I do not believe we should tolerate them in this day and age.

This reminds me of a situation that developed only 20 miles from Elk Island Park. A farmer was brought to court and charged with starving his horses which were left unattended and without adequate feed. That is much the same type of situation as we have here. That man was charged, and yet in a park being administered by federal officials this sort of thing has been allowed to happen. May I refer to another situation which seems to be paradoxical. As a result of emotion and the hue and cry of the public we face a situation in which the seal industry may be practically destroyed because people are concerned about cruelty. But in Elk Island Park animals are deliberately being allowed to die, to suffer from starvation, as a result of the administration of federal officials. I say that this is a case for the humane society to investigate and of course, for the minister himself to look into.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: In my opinion there has been a dereliction of duty. I believe that the Canadian Wildlife Service and the park administration must accept full responsibility for what is happening and not pass it off as something that has happened simply because of a hard winter. I have lived in the area all my life and have never seen a situation like this in 35 years. So I say that they are responsible for mismanaging and for estimating inaccurately what the animal population ought to be in relation to the available food supply. I urge the parliamentary secretary to use his influence and good offices and impress upon the minister the necessity of looking into the situation and investigating it thoroughly in order that we may prevent a recurrence of this situation.

Mr. Judd Buchanan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I will be very happy to draw the hon. member's representations to the attention of the appropriate individuals. However, as the hon. member has indicated, the animal population of Elk Island Park is controlled through the periodic slaughter of surplus animals. It was indicated that the last such slaughter took place in the fall of 1969. In the fall of 1970, one year later, studies indicated that the animal population had not grown to a sufficient extent to warrant another kill. At that point officials were anticipating normal winter conditions.

Unfortunately, this winter has been a particularly severe one. Although large areas of the park still contain adequate forage, there are limited areas which have been overgrazed and overbrowsed. The main problem this winter has been occasioned by a heavy crusting on top of the snow. The initial crusting occurred after a thaw in January but really severe conditions did not develop until after a thaw which occurred in mid-February. This crusting condition made it very difficult for the animals to move about in search of food.

Mr. Paproski: We know the weather report. Get on with it.

Mr. Buchanan: Consequently, the animals became virtually penned into very small areas by the crusted snow with the resultant overgrazing of the limited areas in which they became corralled. Park officials first became concerned about this situation and inaugurated a feeding program on February 6. As the condition became more severe, the amount of feed was increased until it reached between seven and eight tons per day. The weaker animals are always subject to winter stress and there is usually a mortality rate of approximately 4 per cent.

Mr. Mazankowski: It was more than double this year.

Mr. Buchanan: Because of the severe conditions it is expected that this mortality will amount to approximately 8 per cent this year. The total number of animals in the park is approximately 1,500. We feel this condition resulted mainly because of the heavy crusting which was not anticipated. I do not think it is reasonable to expect that the officials of the—

PRIVILEGE

MR. TRUDEAU—CLARIFICATION OF ANSWER RESPECTING CORRESPONDENCE FROM MEMBERS OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this first opportunity to rise on a question of privilege to clarify an answer I gave in the House yesterday on the subject of correspondence from members of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. At page 4946 in Hansard I reported that there was no further exchange of correspondence beyond that already tabled by myself in the House on March 17. This correspondence consisted of letters to me from the co-chairmen of the commission dated March 1 and a reply which I sent to them on March 11.

In giving my answer yesterday I was doing so with particular reference to questions from the hon. member for York South who wished me to consider tabling any correspondence relating to the conclusion of the work of the commission which was exchanged between one or both of the joint chairmen and myself or any other minister of the Crown.

On April 5, at page 4898 of Hansard, the hon. member said:

> I am interested particularly if there is correspondence which sets out the reasons the commission decided not to produce its final report—all that kind of thing—so that all the information may be before Parliament and the people.

I repeat today that the correspondence tabled on March 17 contained the only letters I personally have received concerning the reasons for the decision of the commission not to proceed with its final report.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Peace River asked if I had received a letter from Professor J. B. Rudnyckyj, who was a member of the commission. I indicated I was not aware of such a letter but would look into it and see whether it had been received and might be tabled. I have received this letter and at the appropriate time in the proceedings, perhaps in motions, will be pleased to table it.

I should like to point out to hon. members that Professor Rudnyckyj wrote his letter to me on March 16, several days after the exchange of correspondence between myself and the co-chairmen of the commission. His letter was postmarked March 26, received by my office on March 30 and acknowledged on April 2. I first became aware of it when it was drawn to my attention by the hon. member for Peace River and later by my office.

Mr. Baldwin: I am always glad to oblige, Mr. Speaker.

MR. HAIDASZ—WORLD HEALTH DAY—FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF DISCOVERY OF INSULIN

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I would like to bring to the attention of all hon. members that today is world health day and its theme is "a full life despite diabetes". In 1921 Frederick Banting and Charles Best discovered insulin at the University of Toronto. Today the World Health Organization is commemorating the fiftieth anniversary of this great medical discovery which has brought improved health and extended life for many diabetics and also provided a great stimulus to medical research. On this occasion while we pay tribute to Banting, Best and their collaborators in their efforts to conquer diabetes, I express the hope that Canadians will increase their support for medical research.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I realize the importance of the statement made by the hon. member but may I suggest at this point, without reflecting in any way on the substance of the comments made by the hon. member for Parkdale, that the reading of such statements is highly irregular. Even when an hon. member gives to the Chair notice of his intention to raise a question of privilege, it is difficult for the Chair to determine whether there is a valid question of privilege. The statement, of course, has nothing to do with privilege. I suggest to hon. members that it is not proper to make that kind of comment at the opening of the proceedings of the House.

MR. SKOBERG—SAFETY OF RAIL OPERATIONS IN FRASER VALLEY

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in rising on this point of utmost urgency and privilege I should like to point out that last September the Railway Transport Committee of the Canadian Transport Commission established a public inquiry to look into the causes and circumstances surrounding accidents on Canadian railways. Because of the heavy workload of the commissioners, delays have occurred in the hearings. The next sitting will not be until May, which delay can only contribute to an explosive issue. Mr. Speaker, slowdowns and work stoppages in rail operations have occurred in the mountain regions and are largely attributable to unsafe conditions in the Fraser Valley. Actually, the bodies of the three crew members lost in the accident some time ago have still not been recovered from the Fraser River.

Further railway mishaps of the kind that occurred on Monday can only result in family tragedies, discontent and militant action by the rank and file of all railway operating personnel. This can only result in a disruption of normal rail service and affect our entire economy. If Your Honour finds that I have a prima facie case of privilege, I should like unanimous support for the following motion which I wish to move:

That this House call upon the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour to initiate an immediate on the spot inquiry into safety of rail operations in the Fraser Valley in British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Again, I suggest to the hon. member that his comments do not relate to privilege. The hon. member might have raised the matter by way of a motion under Standing Order 43. I fail to see how the question he has raised in any way affects his privileges as a member of this House. I will not in any way reflect on the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member which has been brought to the attention of the House, but I suggest to him that there is no privilege. It might have been appropriate, more proper and more in keeping with the Standing Orders if that motion had been proposed under the terms of Standing Order 43 rather than under the heading of privilege. Of course I must rule that there is no prima facie privilege and, accordingly, no motion can be put to the House at this time.

COMMUNICATIONS

TABLING OF "INSTANT WORLD", GENERAL REPORT OF TELECOMMISSION—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present to the House today "Instant World", the general report of the Telecommission. The tabling of this document and its release to the public marks the completion of the first and perhaps the most difficult phase of a process of study and consultation on the state of communications in Canada, and on the needs, present and future, of the Canadian people. This first phase began more than a year ago when the Telecommission was launched on September 18, 1969. The next step in this process will end when I come before the House to present the government's white paper on telecommunications policy and regulation.

[Translation]

The telecommission report was intended from the outset to serve as a mechanism for the collection of information and opinions on the basis of which proposals could be formulated to solve Canadian telecommunication problems. This means that the document presented to Parliament today does not contain officially endorsed views of the federal government nor a key to its future policy. With the publication of this vast store of information, it is expected that the government will be able to proceed in a short time with the preparation of a white paper which will define the government's policy on telecommunications.

We will now begin immediately a process of further consultation with the representatives of provincial governments, private industry, users and other interested groups. As Minister of Communications, I will participate directly in these consultations, as will senior officials of my department.

[English]

Because the Telecommission report is to date the most complete and most coherent discussion of telecommunications problems and opportunities in Canada, I earnestly commend it to the attention of all members of this House and to all Canadians who have an interest in the rational and equitable development of telecommunications facilities in our country.

This document represents the final distillation of the work of 43 separate study groups. It represents an almost unprecedented collaboration of hundreds of individuals, groups, institutions, departments and agencies of government, private firms and universities. The object of this work was to collect all the information possible on which to base sound judgments in the months and years ahead. The next step in the continuing search for better arrangements and better policies will be, as I have said, the white paper.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the minister has expressed the hope that we will all read the report carefully. I can assure him that we shall. I am particularly tantalized by his use of the words "white paper", and I shall read the report with great care in the hope that it may include some method of getting through to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we have not, of course, yet had an opportunity to read "Instant World", a document which was certainly not prepared instantly. The whole field is a tremendously complex one.

The minister in his statement talked about the need for the equitable development of telecommunications facilities in our country. This will not be easy to achieve. We see, for example, that common carriers such as Bell Canada would like to expand into areas concerned with computers and data processing. If they can do so this would, in effect, prevent the development of a separate computer industry. We see the uncontrolled development in recent years of cable television systems in such a way as to threaten the continuation, let alone the development, both of the CBC and the private CTV television networks and their ability to produce programs and obtain the advertising necessary to pay for those programs because of the fragmentation of the market which has followed the widespread proliferation of cable television systems. These are just two examples within the telecommunications field of the tremendous problems we face.

We shall, of course, read the report with a great deal of interest. We trust that in addition to posing questions with which most of us are already familiar it will offer some solutions, some answers, to the problems we face.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in short, in his statement the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) announced the publication of another white paper which will define the future government policy about telecommunications.

Request for Skagit River Valley Study

Now I would like to remind my hon. colleagues of the various stages the government went through before really doing something.

On September 18, 1969 it announced the establishment of the Telecommission to undertake a process of study and consultation on the state of telecommunications in Canada and on present and future needs of the Canadian people in this field. To this end, the government formed over 43 separate study groups.

On April 7, 1971 it tabled in the House of Commons the conclusions of those studies that do not express the official opinions of the federal government nor what policy it intends to follow in this field.

Later, the government will begin, and I quote:

a process of further consultation with the representatives of provincial governments, private industry, users and other interested groups.

Those studies and consultations will result in the presentation of a white paper on the subject.

The publication of a white paper does not constitute a concrete policy; it is merely a means whereby the government can probe public opinion and encourage interested parties or groups to make what remarks they feel are timely.

I therefore regret that the minister did not, in his statement today, give us an exact date on which a Canadian telecommunications policy could be implemented. I feel that studies and research must not be neglected in that field. But it seems that such studies and research works have become an excuse for the government not to take real action. I believe there are problems related to the provinces which the government is keeping from us.

Canada greatly needs a national policy taking regional or provincial characteristics in the field of telecommunications. The importance of that field is undeniable. Mr. Speaker, and its implications for our economic, political, social and particularly cultural life will be considerable. To be sure, there should be nothing left out in the preliminary stage consisting in research and studies, but this stage should not be indefinitely drawn out to serve as an excuse for lack of action and of a specific and up-to-date policy.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, the report will no doubt get the full attention of members of our group, but the minister's evasive statement only increases our impatience for the adoption by Canada of a modern policy, taking into consideration rights and interests of the provinces in the very important field of telecommunications.

POWER

SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—TABLING OF REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to table in the two official languages the text of the Skagit River reference which has been jointly agreed upon by the governments of Canada and the United States and is being formally communicated by the two governments to the International Joint Commission.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has just tabled the text of a joint reference by the governments of Canada and the United States to the International Joint Commission. In this joint reference our two governments ask the International Joint Commission to study the environmental consequences of further flooding in the Skagit River Valley in British Columbia. This study is concerned with the ecology of the Skagit Valley and the consequences, in environmental terms, of raising the Ross dam in the state of Washington.

The International Joint Commission has been asked to report on the nature, scope and impact of the raising of the dam and to recommend measures for the protection and enhancement of the local environment, all of this to be consistent with its order of approval given for the raising of the Ross dam back in 1942.

It is becoming increasingly clear that decisions to build dams and raise water levels should be taken after there has been a thorough investigation of the environmental consequences. Since the Skagit River flows across the international boundary, the Canadian government has a special responsibility in this regard.

There is widespread concern about the environmental consequences of raising the Ross dam in my own home province of British Columbia. In our discussions with the United States we found that the U.S. government was also sympathetic to this concern and it agreed that the best way to proceed was to request the International Joint Commission to organize and carry out a detailed study on the basis of which it would make recommendations to all concerned. The International Joint Commission has a long tradition of helping our two countries to resolve problems along our boundary and it is experienced in dealing with environmental questions in boundary water areas.

It is the usual practice of the International Joint Commission, in carrying out investigations of this kind, to draw on the expertise of governments at the federal, provincial and state levels. The Canadian government will, of course, be glad to make available to the International Joint Commission such information and staff as the IJC may request in this connection.

I expect that the International Joint Commission, in accord with its normal procedures, will hold public hearings prior to making its recommendations to government. It will, of course, be up to the commission to announce the timing and location of these hearings. These hearings will provide an opportunity for private groups and individual citizens to make their views heard.

I might add that I have informed the Minister of Lands, Forests and Water Resources of British Columbia about this reference to the International Joint Commission and he has told me that his government supports this inquiry.

It is my hope that this study by the International Joint Commission can be launched without delay. Because a good deal of information is already available I also expect that the IJC will be able to complete its investigations and make its recommendations to the Canadian and United States governments before the end of October, 1971.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the minister speaks of concern in his native province about the flooding of the Skagit valley he is certainly not exaggerating; in fact, in my opinion he is indulging somewhat in understatement. If I may express a personal opinion, I think it would be a great misfortune if this valley were flooded. The proposal to do so obviously results from a decision made in former days when the preservation of the valley did not seem to be of very much consequence, but today it does not seem to me good economic sense to flood the valley for the purpose described, and certainly in terms of environmental considerations it does not seem to make any sense at all.

Quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, we have to consider the significance of the reference to the International Joint Commission upon which the two governments have agreed. The commission is asked to make recommendations for the protection and enhancement of the environment not inconsistent with its order of approval of 1942, and the agreement between Seattle and the province of British Columbia of 1967. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it seems very clear that the International Joint Commission is not even asked to make any recommendations involving the withdrawal of permission to flood the Skagit Valley. The only recommendations that the commission is authorized to make under this reference concern the protection and enhancement of the environment consistent with the authorization granted in 1942.

It is quite interesting to read the reference with some care, Mr. Speaker. In the first paragraph it says:

> The commission is requested
> (a) to investigate the environmental and ecological consequences—

Of the flooding, and so on. These are quite broad investigative procedures. The second paragraph invites the International Joint Commission:

> —to report on the nature, scope and impact of these consequences;

This could be quite a broad reference in terms of investigation and reporting.

But the significant and important paragraph is that authorizing the commission to make recommendations. Clearly the recommendations seem to be limited to recommendations which are consistent with the order of approval dated January 27, 1942. Therefore I have to ask the minister whether my impression is wrong when I draw the conclusion from these terms of reference that the International Joint Commission is not authorized to make any recommendations which would eliminate the flooding of the Skagit Valley, and that the recommendations therefore can only relate to measures that the commission might recommend to reduce the environmental consequences of the flooding.

This is the way I interpret the reference, having read it as carefully as I have been able to in the short time I have had. No authority is given to the commission to reopen the decision of 1942 or to withdraw in any way the right that was granted then and in subsequent orders and agreements regarding the flooding of the Skagit Valley. The commission is simply authorized to recommend ways and means to reduce the damage that may occur in the process.

This is how I read the reference, Mr. Speaker. I must add, and I hope I am not being unfair when I say it, that it was snowing when I went into the Skagit Valley but still I was able to see it and, Mr. Speaker, I have the distinct impression it is snowing in the House of Commons today.

• (2:30 p.m.)

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, the Skagit Valley controversy has become a symbolic one for British Columbians. More and more British Columbians are and have become alarmed and aroused at the prospect of the Skagit Valley being flooded for the purpose for which it is to be flooded. It has become symbolic because Canadians by and large are no longer content to be but hewers of wood and drawers of water for our friendly neighbours to the south.

Our interest in this issue goes back for some time. Over a year ago I received a reply from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) in which he indicated that before any final approval could be given an application would have to come before the Federal Power Commission in the United States and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources in Canada. Apparently the government is no longer holding to this particular view. I can only guess at the reasons behind the change.

On both sides of the border conservationists and ecologists are beginning to take concern for the environment beyond the stage of mere dilettanteism and have built up mass support for a better quality of life. We are beginning to agree that the preservation of our environment has a real value superior to the despoilation or exploitation of a particular area for a specific purpose. Environment has a value in itself and should be preserved.

The government obviously has preferred the International Joint Commission rather than some other independent body to study this particular issue. The IJC would be the best vehicle by which—and I hope I am wrong—to accomplish a six months' delay. Certainly some of us would like to see the 1942 and 1967 agreements negated. I refer both to the one which came about first of all with IJC approval in 1942 and the other between Seattle City Light and the British Columbia government in 1967. The government is very sensitive in dealing with the IJC because any suggestion that the IJC was being interfered with by government would upset a number of other questions under the commission's responsibility all along our long and so far undefended border.

The government of Canada has the power to negate the agreement outright but has chosen this other device. I am certain this other device will please the premier of British Columbia because it will take him off the hook. I think it will appeal to him also because this is an ostensible second look at the problem and the IJC which approved the matter in the first place is now to continue the study. In other words, there is not to be a disinterested appellate review conducted here. Some of us could be excused for being a little cynical and for believing that this proposed investigation might be little more than a whitewash, an appearance of action or pseudo-action.

I think the House would have been in a much better position to make some decision on this matter if the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) had indicated whether or not he had discussed with the government of British Columbia the cost of renegotiating or getting out of the agreement completely. It seems to me there could have been a federal-provincial sharing of the $8 million already spent by Seattle City Light. I might also mention the matter of the annual compensation to British Columbia of a pitiful $35,000 when we know that the downstream benefits should have produced at least $1 million according to the Columbia River formula.

I see you are becoming a bit impatient, Mr. Speaker, and I promise to wrap up my remarks forthwith. I believe the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) put his finger on the point that this is an ecological study only since we have no assurance that it is anything beyond that and there is nothing to indicate that the project will not go ahead regardless of the Commission's findings. In conclusion may I say that it does not really matter how many hearings or studies are conducted because the vast majority of the people of British Columbia want the proposed plan to flood the Skagit River Valley stopped and stopped completely.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, as one of the first references to this matter goes back to the Speech from the Throne of October 13, 1970 and that it was mentioned on many occasions, we are happy to note that an inquiry has been requested by the International Joint Commission to establish the probable consequences of raising the level of Ross Lake in British Columbia.

Obviously, if this would happen, our country would suffer, but I believe that the International Joint Commission is ready to carry out a serious study and to consult environmental experts and others to assess the possible consequences of this action so that this will not happen and that the City of Seattle will find other sources for its electricity.

Possible Closing of Canadair

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE CLOSING OF CANADAIR—REQUEST FOR CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I request leave to move the adjournment of the House, under Standing Order 43, to discuss a question which has not yet been considered in the House, and which is extremely important.

At the present time 29 subcontractors of Canadair are in a very poor financial situation and will have, all or most of them, to lay off most of their employees, which might put several thousand people out of work in a few days. Indeed, the Aero Machine Parts Company, in Longueil, will have to do so either today or tomorrow.

That situation, Mr. Speaker, is brought about by the precarious situation of Canadair, which had 10,000 employees in 1968, at the time we were promised a "just society", 3,900 in April 1971 and 1,900 by the end of—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member and ask him to state the meaning of his motion as soon as possible. May I suggest at the same time that the procedure he is following seems to be slightly out of order. The hon. member is proposing that the business of the House be adjourned under Standing Order 43, so that an urgent question may be discussed. A motion of this kind should be made under Standing Order 26 and not under Standing Order 43 and requires furthermore the regular notice. If the motion is moved under Standing Order 26, the notice I just referred to must be forwarded to the Chair in written form within the deadline provided for in the Standing Order and then the statement of the hon. member must be limited to a few sentences.

The hon. member seems to have merged both Standing Orders and is using the best of two worlds to make a statement which I feel is rather lengthy. I woold therefore suggest that he indicate as soon as possible the nature of the motion he wishes to put forward.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to show the importance and urgency of my question and to request the unanimous consent of the House, because at the end of 1971, there will only be 1,900 employees at Canadair—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member and ask him to come to the point. If he does not accept the suggestion of the Chair, he will not be allowed to present the motion or to indicate to the House the substance of his motion.

I invite the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair and to consider that all hon. members generally who present motions under Standing Order 43 abide not only by the letter but also by the intent of this rule, and content themselves with making very brief statements explaining the urgency of the question.

[Mr. Laprise.]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I request the unanimous consent of the House to propose my motion, in view of the very critical and very important situation of the closing in a few days of a major company, Canadair of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has not yet indicated the meaning of his motion. At all events, I take it for granted that he is suggesting that this House adjourn for the purpose of considering the important and urgent matter to which he has just referred, and I invite the House to indicate whether there is unanimous consent pursuant to Standing Order 43.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will have noted as I did that there is not unanimous consent. Consequently, the motion that the hon. member intended to present to the Chair cannot be considered by the House at this point.

[English]

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was rising to present a motion under Standing Order 43.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize that the hon. member intends to follow the suggestion made by the Chair that he will move a motion under Standing Order 43, but we are still on motions and at this point I recognize the President of the Privy Council, following which I will recognize the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EASTER RECESS—ADJOURNMENT FROM APRIL 7 TO APRIL 19

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council) moved:

That when this House adjourns on April 7, 1971, it shall stand adjourned until April 19, 1971, provided always that if it appears to the satisfaction of Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the government, that the public interest requires that the House should meet at an earlier time during the adjournment, Mr. Speaker may give notice that he is so satisfied, and thereupon the House shall meet at the time stated in such notice, and shall transact its business as if it had been duly adjourned to that time;

[Translation]

And that, in the event of Mr. Speaker's being unable to act owing to illness or other cause, the Deputy Speaker or the Deputy Chairman of the Committees shall act in his stead for the purpose of reconvening the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSPORT

SAFETY OF RAIL OPERATIONS IN FRASER VALLEY—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I indicated the urgency of my motion when I spoke earlier and I will not repeat what I said. I now ask leave under Standing Order 43 to present the motion that I read earlier, which is as follows:

That this House call upon the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Labour to initiate an immediate on the spot inquiry into safety of rail operations in the Fraser Valley in British Columbia.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. Is there unanimous agreement under Standing Order 43?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity and therefore the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Rowland: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether you could perhaps prevail upon the Secretary of State or the Minister without Portfolio who assists him in his duties to make a statement before we leave motions on the Opportunities for Youth program and, specifically, the criteria being employed since there is considerable confusion and this is the last day on which the government can make such an announcement prior to the closing of applications.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that it might be difficult for the Chair to prevail on a minister for the purpose suggested by the hon. member. I suggest to the hon. member that he might attempt to do his own prevailing.

BROADCASTING ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROHIBIT ADVERTISING ON CHILDREN'S TELEVISION PROGRAMS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-237, to amend the Broadcasting Act (advertising on children's programs).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, this bill reflects the growing excessive nature and the alarming increase in commercial advertising directed at children on television. It would have the effect of prohibiting such commercial advertising. But the immediate objective would be to have the bill referred to an appropriate committee where the subject matter could be studied by Parliament.

I know that all hon. members support this bill, including the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Mr. McGrath: By leave, now?

Mr. Speaker: The bill can be read a second time now only by unanimous consent. The suggestion has been made that second reading take place at the next sitting of the House. Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received which is as follows:

Government House, Ottawa

7 April, 1971

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Gérald Fauteux, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 7th of April, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,

CBC PAYMENTS FOR FOOTBALL BROADCASTING RIGHTS

Question No. 740—Mr. Nowlan:

How much has CBC paid in each of the past five years, up to and including the 1970-71 estimates for (a) American professional football broadcasting rights (b) Canadian Football League broadcasting rights?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: (a) There were no rights payments involved. U.S. games were received by network extension through agreement with the originating U.S. network. (b) CBC was not the primary rights holder during the past five years. Arrangements for CBC English and French network coverage of CFL games were negotiated with rights holder, CTV. In two of the five years in question arrangements were made under which the sponsors of the CBC telecasts purchased rights for CBC coverage directly from CTV. In the other three years the CBC paid CTV approximately half the total cost of the rights as its share for CBC coverage.

*OFFER OF MONEY FOR INFORMATION LEADING TO RETURN OF JAMES CROSS ALIVE

Question No. 929—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Did the government receive an offer of a gift of $1,000 from Mr. Jack McDowell, ex-M.L.A. of Winnipeg, for information that would lead directly to the return alive of Mr. James Cross and, if so, on what date?

2. Was his offer accepted and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is that there is no record of such an offer having been received and therefore the second part of the question is not applicable. I feel that I should inform the House and the right hon. gentleman who put the question on the order paper that our inquiries in this regard have been confined to the offices of the Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General. If he has any further information to lead us to inquire in other offices we would be happy to pursue the matter further.

NATIONAL REVENUE SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES—PERCENTAGE DESIGNATION FOR CERTAIN PURPOSES

Question No. 967—Mr. Robinson:

What percentage of the supplementary estimates of the Department of National Revenue is designated for (a) winter works (b) to reduce unemployment (c) underestimating expenditures (d) combatting inflationary costs (e) new programs (f) hiring of additional employees?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Customs and Excise: (a) nil (b) 100% (c) nil (d) nil (e) nil (f) nil. Taxation Division: Not applicable. This division does not have any supplementary estimates.

EMPLOYMENT OF ARCHITECTS BY NATIONAL AND HISTORIC PARKS SERVICE

Question No. 1,201—Mr. McCleave:

1. How many architects, specially trained and skilled in the restoration of French period structures, have been offered temporary employment to meet the program demands of the National and Historic Parks Service?

2. What are the contract terms in each case as to (a) time (b) payment (c) other benefits (d) location of employment and project to be worked on?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Public Service Commission as follows: 1. None.

2. Not applicable.

SALE OF "GOLDEN SCARAB"

Question No. 1,203—Mr. McCleave:

1. Was the Golden Scarab sold by the Industrial Development Bank to Catalina Exploration and Development Limited and, if so, under what circumstances and on what terms?

2. What representations were made by the Bank concerning Canadian standards for such vessel?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. Yes. Under the usual terms and conditions of an Industrial Development Bank loan.

2. In connection with the offering of the ship for sale to potential buyers, the IDB had an estimate made by a firm of marine surveyors and its own engineering staff of the cost of preparing the vessel for sea. This estimate did not purport to take into account any cost which might be incurred in converting the vessel from a tuna seiner to a seismic survey vessel or for any other purpose.

BOEING 707's PURCHASED FOR ARMED FORCES

Question No. 1,025—Mr. Mazankowski:

1. How many Boeing 707's have been purchased for the use of the Canadian Armed Forces?

2. What was the price per aircraft?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): 1. Five.

2. First four aircraft—$10,564,975 each including Canadian federal sales tax. The fifth aircraft—$9,993,465 including Canadian federal sales tax.

COMPUTER SERVICES INCOME, DEPARTMENT OF SOLICITOR GENERAL

Question No. 1,209—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of the Solicitor General (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): (a), (b), (c) and (d) Nil.

COMPUTER SERVICES INCOME, DEPARTMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE

Question No. 1,217—Mr. Robinson:

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

*USE OF JET STAR AIRCRAFT BY PRIME MINISTER SINCE JUNE 25, 1968

Question No. 12—Mr. Coates:

1. On how many occasions has the Prime Minister made use of the Jet Star since June 25, 1968 and in each instance, what was the designation of the flight and what was the purpose of the flight in question?

2. On each occasion that the Prime Minister has used the Jet Star, what are the names of the persons who accompanied him and what was the responsibility of each during the period in question?

[Mr. Benson.]

3. On the occasions that the Prime Minister used the Jet Star were any stop-overs made other than to service the aircraft and, if so, what was the purpose of the stop-overs and duration in each case?

4. What was the total mileage travelled by the Jet Star since June 25, 1968, when used by the Prime Minister?

Return tabled.

USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT BY PRIME MINISTER BETWEEN JULY 1 AND SEPTEMBER 30, 1970

Question No. 43—Mr. Coates:

1. On how many occasions did the Prime Minister make use of government aircraft between July 1 and September 30, 1970?

2. (a) What were the specific dates on which the Prime Minister used the aircraft (b) what was the reason in each instance for the use of the aircraft (c) what was the destination (d) what were the names of the people who travelled with the Prime Minister on each occasion (e) were they members of the government service and, if not, did they make any payment to the federal treasury for passage?

3. What was the cost on each instance that the Prime Minister used government aircraft?

Return tabled.

COST OF PRINTING GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

Question No. 271—Mr. Peters:

1. What was the total cost of printing all publications, reports, news releases and other public documents issued by government departments and agencies in the calendar year 1965?

2. What was the total cost of printing similar material issued in the calendar year 1969?

3. Approximately what percentage of the increase in cost is attributable to (a) a larger number of printed items (b) more expensive paper and use of colour (c) the necessity of publishing all material in the two official languages?

Return tabled.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

EAST PAKISTAN—REPORTED MASS KILLINGS, SHORTAGE OF FOOD AND MEDICAL SUPPLIES, MASSING OF INDIAN TROOPS ON FRONTIER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has received any information about what is going on in East Pakistan with regard to the reports of mass killings and shortage of food and medical supplies? Has the hon. gentleman received any information that he considers reliable either through the United Nations or the resources of his own department?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have no information directly from any representative of the Canadian government. We will be talking to the Canadians who have come out of Pakistan about the situation there. I think it is clear, however, that there has been a good deal of violence and killing. It appears from the reports we have received, which I think are available to all members of the House, that there has been violence on both sides. This is something which I am sure we all deplore. The question before the Canadian government is how best it might be able to help, and I do not think pious declarations against violence are going to achieve anything. We are searching for some means by which we can be constructive, by supplying relief or something of that kind.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister about the reports that India has six divisions massed on the Pakistan frontier. Can the minister tell us whether he has any information on this subject and, if so, is it of any concern to him?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak about the massing of troops on the Indian side of the border. The most reliable information I have is that there has been no incursion of Indian troops into Pakistan.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question. Is it the intention of the Minister to take any initiative with regard to the United Nations on what is transpiring in that part of the world or any initiative with regard to the secretariat of the Commonwealth to involve the Commonwealth or the United Nations in this matter?

Mr. Sharp: As I said in the House the other day, Mr. Speaker, the Secretary General of the United Nations has been apprised of the situation by a letter from the Indian government. It is my understanding that he still has the matter under consideration and has not yet replied. I can understand his hesitation because I am sure that he wants to do something constructive in this situation, and under the circumstances it is very difficult to know how best to proceed. We have been consulting with the International Red Cross to discover whether there are any practical means by which we might be able to help.

PROVISION OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME IN LIGHT OF SUGGESTION BY PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING PROVISION OF JOBS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister arising out of his proposal which was referred to the other day for providing jobs by instituting a shorter work week, earlier retirement, delays in young people in entering the work force and less emphasis on women working. In view of the fact that it would be necessary for some income to be provided for these groups who are either kept out of the labour force or retired from it, does the government intend to introduce a guaranteed annual income or has it some income policy to cope with the situation which would arise if the measures referred to by the Prime Minister were put into effect?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, we have a policy, Mr. Speaker, concerning these areas. The details of it are known to the House and I do not think I can be expected to go into the details of the white paper at this time.

STUDIES OF GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME PROPOSAL

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare if studies regarding a guaranteed annual income are under way in addition to the study made by Dr. Willard, who is conducting such studies and at what levels of income is the government aiming in the event it institutes a guaranteed annual income?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether the hon. member is not asking a question of a rather detailed nature and whether this kind of question ought not normally to be placed on the order paper. Unless the right hon. Prime Minister has the information immediately available and can give it briefly, I suggest to the hon. member that normally this kind of question should be asked through the order paper.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I was directing my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare and asking if studies were going on in his department at the present time, who was conducting these studies and at what levels of income the studies were being conducted. It seems to me the minister could give me that information.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that it is clearly set out in the white paper on income security that we were prepared to entertain studies and demonstration projects in this area. As has been noted in the press, some provinces have indicated that they might be interested in combining with us in such studies. This matter is under consideration in some provinces right now.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REVIEW OF WHITE PAPER ON INCOME SECURITY TO PROVIDE FOR EARLIER PAYMENT OF OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the Prime Minister's references to earlier retirement, is the government considering a review of its paper on income security with a view to providing that the old age security pension be made available at an earlier age?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there have been observations in terms of retirement pensions made in the white paper. We have discussed it at the welfare ministers conference and we have invited proposals from all interested associations and people in Canada. After we look at those views it is possible that we will give consideration to them.

SUGGESTION BY PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING PROVISION OF JOBS—LEGISLATION TO REDUCE WORK WEEK

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's suggestion may I ask the Minister of Labour if any legislation is going to be introduced regarding a reduction in the work week?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, one of the things we are doing is presenting a new Canada Labour (Standards) Code in such a manner that will make it more effective than it has been in the past. It does limit workers to a 40-hour work week.

SUGGESTION BY PRIME MINISTER RESPECTING PROVISION OF JOBS—NATIONAL DAY-CARE ACT

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? Is the minister or his department giving consideration to a national day-care act as recommended by the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, because such an act would be of help to mothers who must be in the work force?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the white paper recognizes the need for day-care centres and suggests that the route for the accomplishment of this end would be discussion with the provinces with a view to possible amendments to the Canada Assistance Plan. This question is being considered by the provinces and was discussed at the last welfare ministers' conference.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I ask the Prime Minister, in the absence of the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and having in mind the Prime Minister's suggestion about decreasing the emphasis of the role of married women in the work force, whether he is now considering the provision of a salary for married women?

CANADAIR CL-215 AIRCRAFT—GOVERNMENT DECISION RESPECTING USE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister.

In view of the fact that the federal government has been studying since 1963 a possible assignment for Canadair's own CL-215 aircraft which were previously used to fight forest fires in Canada and across the world, I wonder if the right hon. gentleman could tell us when the government will be in a position to "graduate" its answer after having studied the matter for so many years.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this question has already been asked not too long ago and it has been answered by the Minister for Industry, Trade and Commerce.

SUGGESTED DEVELOPMENT BY CANADAIR OF REPLACEMENT FOR ARGUS AIRCRAFT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, to the Minister of Supply and Services. Is his department investigating the possibility of turning over to Canadair responsibility for developing a follow-up aircraft for the Argus?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): No, Mr. Speaker, that is not under consideration at the present time.

PROPOSED NORTHERN PIPELINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION—PROVISION OF CANADIAN PRODUCT TO EASTERN CANADA

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the continuous conflicting statements by various ministers and the talks being held in Ottawa and Vancouver and to be held with United States authorities on the pipeline issue, what position is the government advancing at these talks? Has the government got a formal position on this issue?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions in the House I have expressed the view of the Canadian government that there are dangers to the ecology arising out of the building of a pipeline across Alaska for ships to carry oil through the Strait of Juan de Fuca.

Mr. Comeau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the government is all mixed up on this issue I would ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member has a supplementary question to ask. We should not enter into debate.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the price of oil and gas is to be considerably higher on the east coast, will the minister now consider supplying Canadian oil and gas to the east coast?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the price increases announced today, resulting from higher world petroleum prices as well as higher tanker costs, are being considered by my department and by the National Energy Board.

Mr. Stanfield: Does the minister think he will roll them back?

Mr. Greene: Any conclusions with respect to the viability of a pipeline will be very carefully considered by the board. In the meantime, the National Energy Board is prepared to consider quickly an application by any entrepreneur wishing to build a pipeline to the Montreal market.

Mr. Baldwin: When are you making your next speech, Joe?

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—SUGGESTED INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION HEARINGS ON POSSIBLE POLLUTION FROM TANKERS

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has he had an opportunity to explore with his United States counterpart the possibility of International Joint Commission hearings similar to those scheduled on the Skagit Valley question, in order to permit all relevant information on the important question of tanker traffic and consequent oil pollution in the Strait of Juan de Fuca and the Gulf of Georgia to be made completely public?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not yet had an opportunity of exploring this matter with the Secretary of State for the United States, nor have my officials. I will bear the hon. member's suggestion in mind.

Mr. Anderson: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A number of hon. members wish to ask supplementary questions. The Chair will recognize the hon. member, but I suggest that we should try to go as quickly as we can to other subjects.

Mr. Anderson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. In view of the realization by the government of the United States and the government of Canada that public hearings on the effect on the environment of raising the Ross dam should be held, will the government House leader now reconsider his acceptance of the motion of the hon. member for Peace River to shelve the second report of the House of Commons Special Committee on Environmental Pollution and bring this matter forward so that similar public hearings can be held by members of the House on the environmental question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member's representations have been heard and noted.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is in the form of a representation. He must assume that it will be considered sympathetically by the minister.

POWER

PROPOSED FLOODING OF SKAGIT RIVER VALLEY—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S. FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION HEARING

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry who may become minister of the environment. Does the government of Canada intend to make any representation at the Federal Power Commission hearing in Washington on the question of the Skagit Valley and the application before the FPC, in view of the effect this project will have on Canada?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, it would not be appropriate for the government of Canada to appear before a foreign tribunal of that character.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister intend to have the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich journey to Washington again and do the work that the government of Canada ought to be doing?

Mr. McGrath: And get his face slapped for doing it. The hon. member is not appreciated over there.

SKAGIT RIVER REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—SCOPE OF AUTHORITY TO MAKE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the agreement between Canada and the United States for a reference to the International Joint Commission. In view of clause (c) of the reference which limits the commission's power to make recommendations to matters which are not inconsistent with the commission's previous order of 1942 and the agreement between the city of Seattle and the province of British Columbia of 1967, I ask the minister whether this means that the commission will have no authority to make recommendations against the raising of the Ross dam and that it will be confined exclusively to dealing with the ecological effects of the construction of the dam and the flooding of the Skagit Valley?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman has asked me for a legal opinion which I would not venture to give in the House.

Mr. Stanfield: That is a good retreat.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not asking for a legal opinion. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is a member of the government which signed the agreement. I am asking the minister what the agreement means. Does the agreement mean that the International Joint Commission will have the power to recommend that the Skagit Valley not be flooded, or is it restricted by clause (c) to discussing merely the ecological effects of such flooding? Surely the government which signed this agreement knows what it means.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has asked his question twice. Perhaps the minister would like to reply quickly, after which the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the only reply I can give is to read clause (c), if you will permit me to do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the moment has come to recognize the hon. member for Portneuf.

Mr. Stanfield: The minister did not deny that my interpretation was correct.

SLATER SHOES—MEASURES TO PREVENT CLOSING OF OTHER SHOE PLANTS

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. minister for Regional Economic Expansion concerning the closing down of the Slater Shoe plant.

Since some industries which are presently running into trouble will be able to hold on for a few years on grants from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, I wonder if the minister could tell the House what measures he intends to take to see that industries being run by millionnaires and which are considering transferring their equipment to foreign countries—as in the case of the Slater Shoe Company—will be able to pursue their operations.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the minister to make a statement of a rather general nature and I do not think the question is in order.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND ACT PROHIBITING CERTAIN PUBLIC GATHERINGS—SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has he examined the act of the Prince Edward Island Legislature, entitled "An act for the prohibition of certain public gatherings"? If so, is he giving consideration to acting under Section 55 of the Supreme Court Act and referring this measure to the Supreme Court of Canada for consideration and decision?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have only just seen a copy of the act, and I do not know if royal assent has been given to it. Until we have had an opportunity to study it more closely, I do not think it would be proper to make any comment.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the wide suspension of normally accepted liberties, particularly the right of assembly, and in view of the importance of this legislation in light of similar legislation dealt with in this House last fall, was there any consultation with the Minister of Justice or other members of the government before this legislation was introduced into the provincial legislature of Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Not so far as I know, Mr. Speaker.

ENERGY

DEVELOPMENT OF PARALLEL POLICY ADAPTABLE TO NEEDS OF UNITED STATES MARKET

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the statement yesterday by Jack Austin, deputy minister of resources, that Canada is developing a parallel energy policy that will permit ready adaptation to the needs of the United States' market, can the minister say if this is the case? If it is the case, when will the minister announce the national energy policy?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the deputy minister's speech referred to the development of Canada's national energy policy in the decade since the national oil policy was announced. While the term is certainly descriptive—a parallel policy rather than an integrated or continental policy, and very well put—we have developed Canada's national energy policies in the Canadian interest and to the benefit of Canada but have continually sought to sell our surplus product in the American market.

INCREASE IN CANADIAN OIL PRODUCTION TO MEET GREATER PROPORTION OF DOMESTIC REQUIREMENTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): A supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the crude oil price increases in the Middle East and Venezuela, and the increased crude requirements in Canada amounting to 7 per cent, will a policy be developed to increase the amount of Canadian production to meet increased domestic requirements to a greater extent in view of the fact that foreign imports are to increase by 12 times as much as the Canadian production increase will be?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, Canadian production and sales have been increasing at a very rapid pace. Last year there was something like a 20 per cent increase in our exports over previous years. I feel sure that all these economic factors such as the increase in price and a higher price for offshore crude will tend toward an even greater productivity and production on the Canadian scene.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize one last supplementary.

Mr. Nystrom: I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the public statement by the National Energy Board to the effect that we should be increasing our refinery capacity in Canada as well as for security of supply in eastern Canada, will the minister now give the National Energy Board power to rule over exports of oil?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the two questions are properly related. The National Energy Board and the government have continually attempted to encourage a greater refining capacity in Ontario which is essential to the national energy policy and the national oil policy. Unfortunately, contrary to pronouncements made by the New Democratic Party, refining in Ontario is not a highly profitable matter.

HOME OIL COMPANY—DISPOSAL OF SHARES BY ROBERT BROWN—FURTHER NEGOTIATIONS WITH GOVERNMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in connection with Robert Brown of Home Oil Company. Is the minister in a position to advise whether Mr. Brown has been able to dispose of his shares in Canada to Canadians? If not, what further negotiations have taken place in the past week or so between the minister, his department and Mr. Brown relative to the sale of shares outside of Canada?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to report that the Home Oil Company is still Canadian. If the government's intervention played some part in that result, I am even happier to announce that fact.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Greene: I am instructed that negotiations are still taking place. I have not been privy to these, nor have I taken part in them since my indication to the House that we had broken off direct negotiations for the public purchase of Mr. Brown's shares in Cygnus Corporation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am interested in the minister making reference to the illusory government intervention for which the minister gives himself a pat on the back. I ask if any step has been taken by the minister or those associated with him which would prevent Mr. Brown selling his shares outside of Canada.

Mr. Greene: As I previously indicated, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Brown has indicated to us that he is fully aware of the government's desire that Home Oil remain Canadian. I am confident that in his negotiations he is attempting to achieve this end. If a pat on the back is deserved for this result, I will be very pleased to receive same from the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing as immodest as self-praise. As the minister is so interested in what is being done, will he advise when was the last communication with Mr. Brown in connection with this matter?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the last communication with Mr. Brown was when I last reported to the House, at which time Mr. Brown indicated—as I indicated to the House—that he was going to pursue his attempts to find a Canadian buyer for his shares in Cygnus Corporation.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Has the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated or has caused to be indicated to Mr. Brown that he would not be free to sell his shares abroad?

Mr. Greene: As I indicated to the House at the time of the negotiations, Mr. Speaker, these negotiations were carried out in good faith and in confidence between the parties. Until the matter is completely resolved, I think that confidence should be maintained by me.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL RECOMMENDATION OF FULL EMPLOYMENT POLICIES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, whom I welcome back to the House after his visit to the invigorating shores of Nova Scotia. Is the minister now prepared to make a recommendation to the government in keeping with the main recommendation of the report of the Atlantic Development Council whereby they recommended that full employment policies must be pursued by the government of Canada in order to make regional development policies effective in the Atlantic area? Is the minister prepared to make that recommendation to his colleagues in the government?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I stated after the report was transmitted to me that the next step will be to study all the recommendations with the chairman of the council. After that I will report to the cabinet. I will then be in a position to announce any new policies.

Mr. McGrath: A supplementary question. When can we expect the report to be studied by the cabinet, because it is a very important report, affecting as it does the ten-year plan for the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Could he tell the House whether negotiations are under way with the province of Quebec as to the signing of a new Canada-Quebec co-operation agreement for the economic development of the Lower St. Lawrence region, the Gaspé peninsula and the Magdalen Islands?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that agreement should be signed at any time now.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING MEETINGS WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

Mr. J. M. Will the hon. gentleman pay special attention to the recommendation which calls on him to meet quarterly with the four Atlantic premiers?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I do not know whether we shall meet quarterly but we shall try to have at least one meeting. I think the recommendation of the council to which the hon. member has referred is an important one.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING TARIFF STRUCTURE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): In light of the recommendation of the Atlantic Development Council, a constituent part of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, that the tariff structure be reassessed with a view to accommodating more equitably the regions of Canada experiencing disparity, is the minister prepared to discuss this idea formally with the government of the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I think the first discussion should take place with the chairman. Then I would make a report to the cabinet and after that, if necessary, enter into negotiations with the provinces.

GRANTS FOR GASPÉ ROADBUILDING

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I wonder if before asking my supplementary the Chair would kindly allow me a question of privilege before adjournment—

Mr. Speaker: Indeed, the hon. member can always rise on a question of privilege. It might be better if the hon. member waited until the end of the question period, although he is entitled, under Standing Orders, to do so right now. Nevertheless I suggest he should wait until the end of the oral question period and ask his supplementary question now.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether the agreement soon to be signed with the province of Quebec will provide for a substantial grant intended for the Gaspé road network?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PRAIRIE PROVINCES—SIMILAR STUDY TO THAT DONE BY ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Having regard to the apparent importance of the ADC report on Atlantic development, does the government intend to discuss with the Prairie provinces the idea of organizing a comprehensive analysis of this kind as a basis for the economic development of the Prairies?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): This is a question I could discuss with my cabinet colleagues, Mr. Speaker.

PROPOSED DIVERSION OF PEMBINA RIVER INTO NORTH SASKATCHEWAN—DISCUSSIONS WITH ALBERTA GOVERNMENT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Have discussions taken place between officials of the Alberta government and the federal government in connection with the proposed diversion of the Pembina River into the North Saskatchewan River?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harding: Have any studies been projected to determine what possible ecological effects such diversion would have on the Athabasca Delta, the Mackenzie River and the Mackenzie Delta?

Mr. Davis: I do not know personally, but I will make inquiries.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT COUNCIL RECOMMENDATION RESPECTING MONETARY AND FISCAL POLICIES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I would if I could return to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the recommendation of the Atlantic Development Council that government monetary and fiscal policy be sensitive to regional needs, and in light of the fact that the Atlantic region has suffered excessively from the burden of personal and corporate income tax, will the minister now give some assurance that he will remove or consider removing the 3 per cent surtax on personal and corporate income tax in the Atlantic region?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I believe I have the authority to discuss this subject with all interested parties, but I do not have the authority to decide.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we should give other members an opportunity to ask questions at this point.

AGRICULTURE

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING BILL—EXCLUSION OF CATTLE AND CALVES—ACTION OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): My question is for the Prime Minister. I ask your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, since it involves a short preamble. On February 4 I asked the Minister of Agriculture whether it was still his intention to have cattle and calves excluded from the provisions of Bill C-176. He replied that it would be up to the Standing Committee on Agriculture to determine how they wished to amend the bill, but added there was general agreement—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask his question. I suggest it is not quite fair of him to deliver to the House a preamble of such length.

Mr. McKinley: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am getting there. Yesterday, in the Standing Committee on Agriculture, such an amendment was moved by a government member and 12 of the 15 government members voted against it, including the minister's parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is not a question; it is a speech. I recognize the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. McKinley: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, my question is coming immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows he cannot do this. He has referred in part of his question to proceedings in a committee and this is not in accordance with the rules. At the same time, it is not entirely fair to the other hon. members who are just as anxious as he is to ask questions, particularly when there are only seven minutes left before the end of the question period. Nevertheless, the hon. member might be allowed to put his question at this point.

Mr. McKinley: Does the Prime Minister not consider this vote to represent a distinct lack of confidence in the Minister of Agriculture by the majority of government members and would he use his influence to have such an amendment accepted when the bill comes before the House?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the preamble was out of order and that his question is also out of order.

WELFARE

RESPONSE TO PROPOSALS PRESENTED BY NATIVE COUNCIL OF CANADA RESPECTING MÉTIS AND NON-STATUS INDIANS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. It arises from a question asked earlier by my hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. In light of the Prime Minister's suggestion that there should be a retrenchment in the labour force, has the minister suggested to the Native Council of Canada that Métis and non-status Indians should continue to live on welfare, or was he able to offer them a more positive response to the proposals in the paper recently presented to him by the council?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I pointed out, commenting on the many observations contained in their brief, that many of the recommendations we were putting forward in the white paper, including amendments to the Canada Assistance Plan, would materially assist many of the Métis to get off welfare.

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that $1 billion has been offered by President Nixon to the Indians of Alaska in exchange for land and oil, has the right hon. gentleman considered making a similar offer to the Indians inhabiting the Yukon and the Northwest Territories?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I ask whether payment would be made in dollars, or wampum?

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—EXTENSION OF DEADLINE FOR APPLICATION

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Secretary of State. In view of the fact that the youth program planned for the coming summer months is subject to a deadline of April 14 in many cases, I believe, and since there is still vast confusion all over the country as to how this program is to be carried out, will the Secretary of State, or whichever minister is in charge of this scheme, give an assurance to the House before we adjourn for the recess that further consideration will be given to the plan and an extension of time granted if necessary?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I think, Mr. Speaker, from the hundreds of projects we are receiving, that the hon. member is more confused than the young of this country.

I am surprised at the hon. member being so confused that apparently he does not know that a meeting has been arranged for five o'clock this afternoon for all hon. members interested in meeting the civil servants, information officers and other people in a position to supply all the information that they might not have yet or even that which they have received already but, and I have evidence that this is true of some opposition members, have not read.

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I have received no such notice as the minister refers to, nor have other hon. members. I am beginning to reach the conclusion that the minister does not know his rear end from third base.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

EARLY APPOINTMENT OF NEW CHAIRMAN

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the recent, regretted resignation of the chairman of Devco, Mr. Robert Burns Cameron, a great Canadian who has served Nova Scotia and Canada well, and bearing in mind the urgent need for preserving the continuity of office of chairman of this important corporation, can the minister advise the House how soon he may be appointing someone to fill this vacancy?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I regret the resignation of Mr. Cameron and I share the hon. member's feelings about him. I hope that very soon I can find a replacement.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the uncertainty with regard to the future of Devco, would the minister be prepared to make a statement on this important question when the House resumes later this month?

FINANCE

AMENDMENT OF UNITED STATES INTEREST EQUALIZATION TAX TO COVER SHORT-TERM CAPITAL FLOWS—CANADIAN EXEMPTION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs of which I gave him warning, if not notice. I regret that my warning was short. Has it been ascertained that Canada will be exempt from an amendment to include short-term as well as long-term capital flows in the United States interest equalization tax, and is the government consulting United States officials on the whole matter? If so, when will a definitive announcement be made?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has been exempted from the application of the interest equalization tax and, so far as I know, from all the associated restrictions. My colleague the Minister of Finance was in Washington yesterday and I would suggest that if there are any questions on detail, they should be directed to him.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND ACT PROHIBITING CERTAIN PUBLIC GATHERINGS—POSSIBILITY OF DISALLOWANCE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice a further question concerning the act to provide for the prohibition of certain public gatherings passed by the Prince Edward Island legislature yesterday? In view of the fact that this act seems to deny certain basic liberties that belong to all Canadians, will the government in its review of this matter consider the possibility of disallowing the act?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would not think that would be the remedy in any event. In the final analysis the courts would be the proper forum for challenging any act, if that challenge were on a constitutional basis.

GRAIN

BARLEY—SUGGESTED INCREASE IN INITIAL PRICE TO INDUCE GREATER PLANTING

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible to the House for the Canadian Wheat Board, and the urgency of my question is that the planting season is almost upon us. My question refers to the current initial prices established for wheat, oats and barley. In light of the 60 per cent increase in barley acreages required this year and the tendency of farmers to lean toward the production of more wheat because of price advantage, will the government consider raising the initial price of barley to increase the incentive to grow more of this grain in order to meet current markets?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I was very encouraged by the report from DBS that in fact farmers plan to increase their barley plantings to 14.4 million acres and to hold their wheat at 18.6 million acres. I should like to see further increases in barley acreage, but they are planning to plant sufficient barley to allow us to export at a pretty high level.

INFORMATION CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORT, "COMMUNITY INFORMATION CENTRES"—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio in charge of Information Canada. Does the minister intend to table the report called "Community Information Centres", which has been circulated among the press? If so, when he tables the report, which I suppose will be after the Easter recess, will he inform the House what the government intends to do with the report, and in view of certain recommendations regarding the functions of these centres, does he intend to be Dorothy Dix's big brother or minister for Information Canada?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the report to which the hon. member refers has been circulated to all hon. members. It is a consultants' report and will be studied as such. I would appreciate having the views of hon. members as well as the views of the provincial premiers and mayors of principal Ontario cities who will also receive this report.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I have a copy of the report and have read it. It includes recommendations for setting up neighbourhood counsellors to advise on time, weather, how to apply for a job—not how to get one—drivers' licences, how to get an abortion, the names of reliable garagemen, counselling on data storage, how to repair your car, and all that kind of thing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time and I hope the right hon. gentleman will soon ask his question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would need the whole afternoon to read portions of this remarkable document. I ask the minister whether, among those consulted in order to bring about this monstrosity, Mao or any of his associates was communicated with.

Mr. Stanbury: I do not think so, Mr. Speaker.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ALLEGED REFUSAL OF BELL CANADA AND ROYAL BANK EXECUTIVES TO ACCEPT APPOINTMENT TO INTERIM BOARD OF DIRECTORS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, but since he has left the chamber perhaps the Prime Minister could look after it for me. Have Messrs. R. C. Scrivner of Bell Canada and John Colman of the Royal Bank of Canada turned down an invitation to sit on the interim board of directors of the Canada Development Corporation? If so, can the Prime Minister tell us why?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether they have turned it down. I do not know whether such offer was made to them to sit on an interim board of directors of something or other. Perhaps the hon. member is right, but I have no jurisdiction over that. Perhaps he should ask them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to hon. members who have been rising during the question period; I was hoping we could give them an opportunity to ask their questions but we have run three or four minutes beyond the regular time. Perhaps at this moment the Chair might recognize the hon. member for Matane before calling Orders of the Day, since he has a question of privilege. Is the hon. member for Selkirk rising on a point of order?

Mr. Rowland: Mr. Speaker, I fail to understand how the Prime Minister can tell the House that he has no jurisdiction over appointments to the board of directors of the CDC in the interim stages.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, a written statement I made on the last report of the Bank of Canada and especially on the economic theory, was interpreted by some newspapers as reflecting on the government's anticyclical policy. In this instance, the newspapers in question have completely distorted my thinking—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I should point out to the hon. member that when rising on a question of privilege, as in this case, the hon. member must give notice to the Chair and, in the circumstances, the hon. member will appreciate that he cannot carry the matter any further.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, in view of the importance of the question which I would have liked to direct to the Prime Minister in connection with the census.

As the census is a rather important matter, I think that the Chair will allow me to deal briefly, in view of the injection of $3.5 million which will affect 42,000 workers—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member will acknowledge that there is no question of privilege here. I sincerely regret that the hon. member has not been able to ask that important question. He may perhaps be able to get the information he is seeking in another manner, or later this afternoon. I feel the same for the hon. members for Spadina (Mr. Ryan) and Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), who are among those who did not have the opportunity to ask their questions this afternoon.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

NORTHWEST ATLANTIC FISHERIES CONVENTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, INSPECTION, OFFENCES AND PUNISHMENT

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry) moved that Bill S-13, to amend the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I know that all hon. members are concerned about overfishing in the North Atlantic, especially overfishing near our own shores, and I think they all agree that we must bring this situation under control. We must conduct these fishing operations in international waters on a sustained yield basis. We need a formula which will enable us to operate in this way. We need data. We need assurance that fishing carried out by nationals of other countries conforms with a set of rules which make sense from a long-term point of view.

The amendments to the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act contained in Bill S-13 will grant powers to Canadian officers to board the fishing vessels of other countries, and reciprocal powers whereby officers of other countries can board Canadian vessels on the high seas.

There has been a long history of fishing in the North Atlantic, stretching back over 400 years. There have been indications, especially in recent decades, of serious overfishing. In order to deal with this problem of overfishing a conference of 11 countries was convened in Washington in 1949. The International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries was drawn up at the 1949 conference, and was signed in Washington later that year.

By 1953 the convention had been ratified by Canada, Denmark, France, Iceland, Italy, Norway, Portugal, Spain, the United Kingdom and the United States. Since 1953 the Federal Republic of Germany, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Poland, Roumania and Japan, in that order, have become members of the International Commission for the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries and ICNAF is now a 15-member organization. The commission coordinates investigations of the fisheries off our east coast and makes recommendations to member governments for the protection and conservation of the fish stocks there. Conservation measures have already been drawn up and enforced in all five sub-areas of the North Atlantic.

It has become apparent that various measures must be undertaken. The first steps taken were to regulate the size of the mesh of nets that could be used. Then regulations were drawn up with respect to closures during periods when the fish were spawning. More recently, ICNAF has dealt with limitations of catch in particular areas. One of these areas includes Georges Bank and Browns Bank, south of Nova Scotia. There is need to extend these regulations geographically as well as in terms of gear, species, catch limits, seasons, etc.

Responsibility for enforcement of regulatory measures recommended by the International Commission, and approved by member governments, has rested with each government for its own flag vessels. As far back as the mid-1950s Canada made the suggestion to the commission that it should consider some sort of international scheme for enforcement. We need to know more about the enforcement methods of other governments. We need to be able to meet the complaints of our Canadian fishermen to the effect that the regulations which we have agreed to with other countries are not being enforced on foreign fishing vessels, particularly those that come near our shores.

On June 6, 1970, at its annual meeting at St. John's, Newfoundland, the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Commission recommended that protection officers of any contracting government be permitted to board vessels operating under the flag of another contracting government. The purpose of this recommendation was to enable our fisheries officers, for example, to examine the catches taken and the gear used by foreign vessels fishing off our coasts.

The amendments to the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention Act provided for in this bill will make it possible to grant authority to Canadian officers to enforce these regulations on vessels flying the flags of other contracting governments. They will also permit the officers of other contracting governments to board Canadian fishing vessels for the same purpose.

The Canadian fishing industry, I understand, is enthusiastic about this arrangement, as are Canadian inshore fishermen, in that this will place better information in our hands and enable the regulations developed under ICNAF to be effectively policed.

I might add that Canada and the United States, by mutual agreement, have already been carrying out joint enforcement procedures. This very day, for example, Canadian patrol vessels are operating with U.S. coastguard vessels over Georges Bank and Browns Bank. Canadian officers are on U.S. coastguard vessels and, conversely, U.S. officers are on Canadian vessels, thus permitting enforcement by the vessels of either country on U.S. and Canadian flag fishing vessels. With international enforcement in effect it will no longer be necessary to have the extra officer from the other country on any given patrol vessel.

We are all concerned about overfishing. We need to establish rules in the North Atlantic fishery so that the fishery can be operated on a long-term sustained yield basis. We need rules also to make absolutely sure that Canadians get their fair share of the catch. This bill, which will allow our officers to board foreign vessels and officers of other member countries of ICNAF to do likewise with Canadian vessels, will help to ensure that this desirable state of affairs comes to pass.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for South Western Nova (Mr. Comeau) seeks the floor for the purpose of asking a question of the minister. Is the minister prepared to answer?

Mr. Davis: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Comeau: Can the minister tell the House what areas are affected by the convention and by this bill?

Mr. Davis: I understand that all the sub-areas—in other words, the total area encompassed by the Northwest Atlantic Fisheries Convention—would come under these provisions.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, we welcome this bill and the international convention that it ratifies, and we commend the minister for the initiative he has taken in helping to bring it about. But we regret that the government has chosen to bring in this bill just a few hours before the House is scheduled to recess for Easter, because the bill would have afforded us a unique opportunity to examine some questions of very great concern to those of us who come from the Atlantic provinces.

As a consequence of the government's strategy, we will not have that opportunity today. Hopefully, there will be other occasions before the session ends when we can have a full-scale debate on the situation that prevails on the east coast of Canada with respect to our fishing interests and our international commitments in relation thereto, because this is of continuing concern to the many thousands of Canadians in the Atlantic provinces who depend upon the fisheries for a living.

In my province the fishing industry is still the keystone of the economy, and in my view will be for a long time to come. The treaty—I suppose it is a treaty, a convention or an accord within a treaty—provides that Canada will share the right with other member countries to board foreign ships with a view to enforcing the regulations under ICNAF with regard to the use of fishing gear and the implementation and enforcement of conservation measures. We hope this initiative is not too late. My hon. friend from Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan), who has taken commendable initiatives in the whole area of conservation, will have something to say on that matter in the debate.

There is, however, one area about which I am concerned and in respect of which I believe this bill will be totally ineffective. I refer to trying to protect our Atlantic salmon fishery from virtual extinction as a consequence of overexploitation by the Danes off Greenland, because by the very terms of this convention we can enforce the regulations only within our own area. There is no way our fisheries patrol vessels, which are small in number and size, can adequately protect this Canadian resource from overexploitation by another country. I say "Canadian resource", because the tragedy of it is that our country spends substantial amounts of money annually to provide hatcheries and spawning grounds and to keep our rivers open and provide the necessary protection for our salmon which go up the rivers off the east coast of Canada to spawn, only to be, upon returning to the sea, scooped up in thousands of tons by the Danes to be taken to their country to be processed, canned and perhaps even shipped into Canada as canned salmon.

This is a new problem for us. It is a very recent one because only within the last ten years have the Danes discovered one of the greatest mysteries of all, the location of the North Atlantic feeding ground of the Atlantic salmon. The Danes discovered this feeding ground off the coast of Greenland. Since that time they have been harvesting these salmon, the product of Canadian protection and of Canadian waters, in tens of thousands of pounds.

As an illustration it might be worth while to place a few statistics on the record. The total Danish catch, in pounds of salmon, in 1960 was 220,000. In 1961 it remained at 220,000 pounds. In that year, however, they made their great discovery, and the catch went up to 661,000 pounds in 1962. In 1963 it went up to 1,100,000 pounds. In 1964 it rose to 3,306,000 pounds. In 1965 it was down again, but still substantially up at 1,760,000 pounds. In 1966 the figure was 2,865,000 pounds. In 1967 it was 2,865,000 pounds. In 1968 it was 1,300,000 pounds, and in 1969 it was 2,865,000 pounds. Estimates are not available for 1970.

It is interesting to note that our own catch of this valuable resource has remained virtually the same. Of course, there is a good reason for this. We have taken great steps to conserve this very important resource, important both as a commercial fishery and as a sports fishing industry in respect of tourism. Our catch has remained virtually the same at about three million pounds. The only difference is that we catch these salmon because they are a product of our scientific research, of our conservation policy and of the expense and effort we put into protecting our rivers from pollution, from poaching and from other things which would greatly deplete the stocks of salmon.

We have been notably unsuccessful in our efforts to prevail upon the Danes to substantially reduce their catch with a view to avoiding total extinction of the species. There is varying evidence in this regard, but I submit that unless something is done immediately the Atlantic salmon will be extinct in ten years. I think, therefore, we must, as a consequence of our failure to obtain meaningful agreement with the Danes, look at our position within ICNAF because this is supposed to be the international forum in which this type of agreement is reached. I want to know why we cannot get the Danes to reduce their catch of salmon.

Only a few days ago the Norwegians introduced regulations to reduce the catch of salmon off Greenland. So the Norwegians are concerned and are doing something about it. Also, just a few days ago our own minister issued a statement concerning new regulations aimed at protecting the species within our own jurisdiction. I am sorry the minister is not here. Perhaps he is more concerned with clean air and the rather attractive subject of pollution than he is with the cold, hard reality of dealing with this very important bread and butter industry.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Corbin) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Corbin: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the hon. member would allow me to explain that the minister has been called out of the House for perhaps ten minutes. I am taking notes and will keep the minister informed of the hon. member's points.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I was commencing to refer to a statement made on March 12 by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) in respect of the introduction of new and strong regulations aimed at preserving the species within our own jurisdiction. I might say I do not agree with many of these regulations. It would seem that the minister expects Canadians to bear the burden of the overexploitation being carried on by the Danes: Canadian fishermen must bear the consequences of the failure of this government to bring full pressure to bear on the Danish government to substantially reduce the Danish catch off Greenland. I think this is regrettable.

These regulations will in my province have the effect of denying to the people the traditional right they have enjoyed of catching fish any time they wish. We now have regulations under which only people engaged on a full-time basis in the fishing industry will be able to obtain a licence to catch salmon. The same thing applies in the rest of Atlantic Canada, but it is especially objectionable to our province where the people have traditionally enjoyed this right. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate understands the point I am making. Previously the people in our province, whatever their occupation may be, have enjoyed the privilege of going out and catching a few salmon for their own use or perhaps even to sell on the market. Now, however, these people are deprived of this right because of the failure of the government to obtain meaningful agreement from the Danes.

We have suggested in this House time and time again—and I am sure the minister has warmed to the idea—that the government impose economic sanctions on the Danish government if they will not comply with adequate conservation measures. Unfortunately our Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, in matters pertaining to international relations in the international fishery does not seem to enjoy the support or the good will of his colleagues in the government. Certainly he does not have the support of his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), who should be most active in this area.

I should like to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself attend the next meeting of ICNAF which is scheduled to take place this June and at which these matters will come up for discussion. By so doing he will demonstrate to the other members of ICNAF who fish off our shores and who do not have the same vested interests in these fisheries that Canada has a great interest in this resource which we look upon as our own but which we are prepared to share with others.

I believe that the presence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the next meeting of ICNAF would demonstrate and underline the determination of this government in its external pursuits to protect the interests of Canadians, to protect this traditional, ancient and important Canadian industry, the North Atlantic fishery. Instead, we cannot get our minister to even open up negotiations with the French government with a view of reaching a satisfactory solution to the impasse in which we find ourselves with that country as a consequence of our ancient treaty obligations vis-à-vis the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon which lie practically within our territorial waters. Because of the presence of France off Newfoundland we have not been able to obtain any meaningful agreement with respect to our territorial sea and fishing limits. We have pestered the minister time and time again in this respect.

To return to the minister's statement of March 12, he said:

> Not only do we have to talk tough to the Danes, but we also have to put our own house in order.

I submit to you that it is not Canadian fishermen who pose a threat to this very important fishery. I submit that the evidence which I have placed on the record, which is well known to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, indicates that the real culprit is the government of Denmark who are overexploiting this resource every year to the point where it will be virtually extinct in a very short time. Yet our fishermen have to bear the full brunt of the failure of the government to reach meaningful agreement with the government of Denmark.

We must be a joke in the international forum, especially in ICNAF, because I submit there is not one member of the 14 member countries of ICNAF who have a greater stake in the North Atlantic fisheries than does this country. Yet this country has gone in with half-hearted efforts in its attempts to deal with these countries and bring forward a meaningful agreement in terms of conservation. Something must be done, and it must be done soon before it is too late.

I have made a suggestion in this regard. I have suggested to the minister that he try to obtain the support of his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs. A way for him to do this would be to invite his colleague to attend with him the next meeting of ICNAF, which I understand is to take place in June. At that meeting let the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, supported by the government of Canada in the person of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, forcibly and dramatically put forward the case for Canada, and by so doing let them talk tough to the Danes and tell them that unless they bring in meaningful conservation measures, and unless they subscribe to our terms respecting what we consider to be sustained yield of this Canadian resource, we will have no alternative but to impose economic sanctions on Danish products coming into Canada.

That is the only kind of language the Danes will understand, and in my view that is the only way in which we can protect this important resource from virtual extinction. To put it mildly, that would be preferable to imposing penalties on our Canadian fishermen who are not the guilty ones.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, those of us who participated in the parliamentary action which originally ratified the North Atlantic Fisheries Convention viewed that action as auguring well for the future. We hoped that it would usher in a new era of rational management of the various fisheries of the North Atlantic on a sustained yield basis; that the breakthrough would herald the day of better things to come in the way of a rational use of the living resources of the sea throughout the world. Of course, many of those hopes have not materialized, as has just been indicated by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath).

Even while we were dealing with the bill that ratified this convention, we were aware of some of its limitations but hoped that the passage of time would bring about a realization that necessary improvements to it would be made. One of the limitations of the original convention is that any recommendations of the commission can have the effect of law only by unanimous consent, and any of us who are members of this House of Commons know that it is not always easy to get unanimous consent on a particular course of action. That is an inherent weakness in the current situation so far as the effect of this treaty, in law, is concerned. I think that perhaps it lies at the root of some of the problems that were outlined in respect of the very existence of the North Atlantic species of salmon.

In addition to that, of course, the limitation in the original convention expressly puts the territorial waters of any of the countries involved out of bounds so far as the application of the treaty is concerned. I think this should be stressed in light of the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's East because, if my understanding of the situation is correct—I know that he is much more familiar with the geography of that part of the world than I—much of the salmon take of the Danes is within their territorial waters off the coast of Greenland.

This highlights some of the inadequacies of our ability to establish a rational arrangement under the rule of law on the high seas. In light of statements and statistics given to this House and to the Standing Committee by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis), the result has been obvious. There has been a direct decrease in the annual catch, particularly of Canadian inshore fishermen, in recent years. This indicates that despite the provision in the treaty for scientific research into management of the resources, our high hopes for conservation of the various species when we put the parliamentary stamp of approval on this convention in 1954 are a long way from realization.

I think the House should understand that when we consider the modest proposals contained in the bill before us. These will certainly not bring an end to the problems in respect of the North Atlantic fishery, the survival of some of the stocks and the maintenance of the income of Canadian fishermen. Very startling things have happened since 1954. At that time few of us realized the technological changes that would bring about huge, highly mobile fleets travelling the high seas of the world with the support of mother supply ships. The countries historically concerned with the Northwest Atlantic fishery are today by no means the only countries involved. There is an indication of this in the adherence to the treaty since the original signing of a number of other nations, notably the U.S.S.R. and Japan. When this bill was originally put through Parliament it did not occur to me that one of the signatories of the Northwest Atlantic fisheries treaty would be Japan. We in British Columbia tend to think of that country as a Pacific fishing nation.

This is undoubtedly one of the compounding factors in the decline of many of the resources of the northern Atlantic, Mr. Speaker, and although the commission has not yet come to grips with it they will have to do so in the future. Obviously, no nation is more concerned with the success of the work of the commission than Canada. While it is true that many of these resources lie in what traditionally has been regarded as the high seas, nevertheless what we are discussing are to a large extent Canadian resources. I think we must make it clear that we regard them as such, and that while we have no desire to take a "dog in the manger" attitude toward the resources of the sea adjacent to our shores, our special position can and must be recognized by other countries.

I think we would all agree, Mr. Speaker, that the proposals in the bill represent a modest improvement in the terms of the original treaty. It proposes to strengthen the policing powers, and I suppose it says something for the years of association of the fishing countries of the Northwest Atlantic that they are prepared to agree to mutually policing the vessels of member countries.

It seems to me that ancillary to the passage of this measure perhaps Canada should undertake more adequate policing than it has in the Northwest Atlantic. Because of the special interest and importance of this area to Canada, and in particular to the Atlantic region, I suggest that within the limits of this new arrangement we should take full advantage of the opportunity to ensure that the regulations put forward by the commission, and accepted, are in fact enforced. This may require larger expenditures by the department but I think it would be well warranted.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I think we must recognize that many of the basic problems will remain unsolved after the passage of this measure. It seems to me that the situation is highlighted by the recent action of the minister with regard to cutting back on the Atlantic salmon take of Canadian fishermen and by the depletion of resources available to fishermen on the Atlantic coast. It underlines the need to have a Minister of Fisheries in Canada.

While I do not want to enter into debate on another bill, the fact that we are to enter into important international negotiations when the commission meets in June, the fact that we will have to speak out strongly and firmly to the Danes, the fact that the other bill makes no provision for any reorganization of the Department of External Affairs, the fact that our international relations pertaining to fisheries have been carried out by the Department of Fisheries and Forestry in the past and that our Department of External Affairs has had no structure to deal with these issues, underlines the fact that when we go to an international convention we need someone who can speak for us officially, with the prestige of being the Minister of Fisheries for Canada.

To me this underlines the fact that at international conventions, quite apart from other gatherings, we need someone with the title and prestige of Minister of Fisheries for Canada. I say that because the kinds of questions surrounding this little amendment to the international convention highlight a worldwide situation. The amendment highlights whether the law of the jungle is to prevail on the high seas, whether there is to be ruthless exploitation and extermination of the living resources of the sea or whether we are to move to something better so that those resources will be managed and used for the benefit of mankind under the rule of law. These are the kinds of questions that come to my mind as I consider the ramifications of the bill before us.

When we arrive at the point at which these crucial decisions must be made they might relate to new agreements or new régimes regarding the exploitation of resources, or to the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. John's East, that is, to the threat of sanctions against other nations which will not give due recognition to our needs and requirements—I hope that our own house will be in order so that Canada can speak with an effective voice in these international councils.

These considerations are important, not only for a particular industry in this country but also in the long range, as many distinguished scientists and others have suggested. In the long run, the survival of the human race may well depend on whether we learn properly to use and manage the resources of the sea, particularly the rich, living resources of the sea which can provide an important part of the total food requirements of the human race.

I say in conclusion, without speaking in detail about the situation regarding Atlantic salmon which was the subject of the speech of the hon. member for St. John's East, that I regret that the minister felt he had to take the steps to impose the kind of restrictions upon the Atlantic salmon fishery that he recently announced. May I also say in passing—this may surprise the hon. member for St. John's East that the fishermen in British Columbia would be much happier if the restrictions which we know must be imposed in British Columbia with regard to the licensing and taking of the salmon resources of the Pacific were based more on the principles which the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry followed in respect of the Atlantic fishery, rather than on the approach, technique and philosophy that the minister adopted with respect to the Pacific resources.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker—and I am referring particularly to the Atlantic salmon situation—that we all hope that Denmark will follow the obviously sensible course of embarking upon some kind of reciprocal arrangement on the utilization of that resource. Perhaps the arrangement could be similar to some of those we have been able to work out with nations on the Pacific coast. Although those arrangements have not worked out ideally or to the complete satisfaction of all fishermen of Canada or the United States over the years, nevertheless there have been situations, such as the one respecting the fishery of the Fraser River, in which an obvious and common sense arrangement was worked out for sharing the catch.

It may very well be that that kind of arrangement could be worked out as far as the Atlantic salmon is concerned, because we must consider that apparently their feeding grounds are within the territorial waters of one of Denmark's possessions. I hope that will be the upshot of any discussions, Mr. Speaker, because I for one hope we can deal with this matter rationally. I hope that the kind of confrontation suggested by the hon. member for St. John's East will not become necessary.

When the bill goes to committee we shall want to hear further particulars about the work of the commission, how this proposed policing arrangement will be carried out, by whom it will be carried out, and that sort of thing. When the bill comes back to the House for third reading I hope we will view the picture somewhat more optimistically than we can view it on the basis of the facts now before us.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, first may I congratulate the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) for putting into perspective for the first time in this House, so far as I am aware, the problem of the salmon fishery as it relates to the Danes. He presented a substantial argument against some of the actions of the minister who has placed the blame unfairly on the shoulders of Canadian fishermen and not squarely on the shoulders of the Danish government, where it belongs. I thought his presentation was commendable.

Bill S-13 is a very minor piece of legislation. Even so, we support it. I think that the ratification of the International Convention on the North Atlantic Fishery in June, 1970, was a good beginning to the solution of a particular problem. In his presentation I thought the minister made a rather puny attempt to indicate the extent of the effort the Canadian government has made to bring about changed conservation methods on the Atlantic coast that have been recommended for 22 years by the members of ICNAF. He talked about regulations which have been adopted. He talked about mesh sizes of nets, the idea being that only fish of a certain size would be taken. He talked about the mistake of overfishing on the Georges Bank, and especially the overharvesting of haddock. Mr. Speaker, it is inexcusable that the minister did not stand in the House today and outline in substantial detail the efforts the government has made in the conservation of our resources.

In my effort to bring some perspective to this problem I will try to outline the history of our fisheries on the one hand and the history of our conservation efforts in the last 22 years on the other. Perhaps I ought to call our conservation measures efforts at conservation, or promises of conservation. According to our history books, our fisheries started in the latter part of the fifteenth century. Anyone researching our history books will find that codfish supplies were plentiful at that time. Actually, codfish was the staple diet and industry of the people who eventually formed the Canadian nation. Codfish was so plentiful, according to reports I have read, that it was possible to dip up the fish from the shores and beaches of what eventually became Newfoundland. According to stories, harvesting methods were very simple: fishermen had only to go out a little distance, lower their nets or their baskets overboard and bring up a plentiful quantity of codfish. This primitive method of harvesting was possible mainly because of plentiful supplies.

Throughout the years there have been various developments. We have gone through the stage of having 30 or 35-foot boats. These are still in use. People have used traditional methods such as trawling, the use of codjiggers and handlines. The fish harvested were in plentiful supply. Traditional Newfoundlanders as well as present-day fishermen use large cod traps, about the size of this chamber. These are sunk in the Atlantic ocean. There are particular methods of allowing fish to get into these traps. Great boatloads of cod were harvested that way. Cod was in plentiful supply in every little cove around Newfoundland.

Our forefathers, the original inhabitants of what is now Canada, sailed from the island of Newfoundland to Labrador where they did one of two things. Some settled in the small coves, bays or inlets on the Labrador coast. They went out in their small boats with their cod traps and harvested great quantities of fish. Others would remain on their larger vessels or schooners, 100 to 200 feet in length, and spend the summer on their boats using cod traps. They would process their product on board the vessel.

Perhaps the minister is not aware that Newfoundlanders used to travel to Labrador in great fleets of schooners long before Russia was known as a fishing nation. There are great communities in my constituency, such as Greenspond, the home of the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter). Before the schooners left the harbours of these communities in the spring to go to Labrador, their masts looked like a great forest of timber as they stood at mooring. The minister knows what I am talking about. I am referring to the masts used for their sails. It was possible to walk across the decks of the schooners in the harbours at Bonavista Bay and Notre Dame Bay, the home of the great schooner builders and captains. All these harbours were literally filled with schooners. Under the guidance of the captain, homespun in their home town, the members of the various communities boarded these vessels to sail to Labrador to reap the benefits of the great fishery there. The Labrador fishery was so plentiful that traps placed in little coves or inlets were filled with great, beautiful black cod. These cod are now declining. This is the history of our fishery.

In recent years we adopted new technology: we became more involved in gill netting and dragging operations with longliners, boats approximately 65 feet in length. The operation of draggers is a very important part of technology. We are not very far advanced toward other stages of fisheries. It certainly cannot be said that our traditional fishery was not competitive with that of other nations. As a matter of fact, we were the vanguard of fisheries in the world 20 years ago as far as Canadian waters were concerned.

I wish to deal with events since 1949 when Newfoundland became part of Canada. As the minister stated, this was the same year that the International Commission for the North Atlantic Fishery came into existence. That board now has 15 members from Scandinavian, Iberian and western Europe countries as well as the United States and Canada. These countries' representatives have been making recommendations in the hope of controlling the harvesting of marine resources in order that we will have a sustainable yield of our marine resources. The board has been meeting since 1949. The number of members has been increased. This commission made annual reports, all of which recommended certain managerial procedures to be adopted by the member countries.

Another type of activity was manifested in a number of Law of the Sea conferences, the most important of which was at Geneva in 1958. At that conference international agreements were reached among nations which had a particular interest in the seas. There is a particular name for these nations; they are called maritime nations. In 1958 these nations agreed there should be a definite responsibility on the part of nations which were taking resources from the sea, to manage the resources. To use Canada as an example, there should be a definite responsibility on the part of Canada to enforce managerial control and conservation measures in the waters adjacent to its territorial sea in the event that we should not reach international agreement for such conservation measures. I think I am quoting the article correctly. I believe it is article 14.

In any event, the articles of the 1958 agreement stated that Canada could unilaterally impose conservation measures, quotas, closing areas, limits of technology, such as the number of ships and gear, and the like on the continental shelf, which extends 400 miles off our shore, if Canada could not reach international agreement with the nations that harvest our resources. This is an international agreement. I think it was unanimously agreed to at the Law of the Sea Conference in 1958.

Another date of particular note is 1964, when the then Prime Minister of Canada launched his great Magna Carta for the development of Canadian fisheries Canada and the protection of our marine resources. He promised Canadians that we would impose a 12-mile limit as the first step toward conserving our resources. Another noteworthy date was reached in 1970. Canada met with the U.S.S.R. as a result of tremendous political pressure regarding incidents on our west coast involving collisions between Russian ships and our fishing schooners or vessels. Because of tremendous political pressure in the minister's constituency and elsewhere on the west coast of Canada, representatives of the U.S.S.R., British Columbia and the federal government reached certain agreements about the Russians fishing offshore and using west coast ports.

In 1971 another event deserves note. Approximately 60 foreign vessels were inside our three-mile limit off the southwest coast of Newfoundland. This occurred only a few weeks ago. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) decided to impose a 12-mile limit on all vessels, including Canadian, on a very small portion of the southwest and west coasts of Newfoundland. This was the first response to the promise made by the Pearson government in 1964. The history of this particular problem goes back 22 years, ever since ICNAF and Law of the Sea conferences have been making recommendations. The response to this by the present government and previous governments has been puny and ineffective. For example, the minister stated that we have had the imposition of quotas on George's Bank. As a matter of fact, the fishing of haddock is not permitted by any nation at the present time.

I have referred to the situation in British Columbia, to which we received a response. I have mentioned the 12-mile limit on the southwest coast of Newfoundland. In 1973 the maritime nations will again meet at a Law of the Sea conference. These are positive steps and I do not criticize them. However, the fact is that since 1949 nations that were unheard of as marine nations have become involved in the harvesting of our resources. The greatest predator is the U.S.S.R. I do not know if Germany is the second greatest competitor of the Soviet Union, but I believe she is.

There are times when the vessels of more than 20 nations are fishing off our continental shelf. Countries such as Algeria are now constructing fishing fleets hoping to be able to take advantage of the historic rights of France and to operate under the French flag off our coasts. Roumania—this was unheard of in years past—now has great fleets of vessels quite unlike our own small draggers or inshore fishing craft, great processing vessels and dragging vessels which literally declare war on a fishing area. One billion pounds of fish was taken in one year from Hamilton Inlet Banks, the great spawning ground of the Labrador fishery, enough to occupy the largest fishplant in Gander-Twillingate employing 350 people for 100 years. In that year the Soviet Union took 25 per cent of all the fish on the Hamilton Inlet Banks, according to authoritative reports and statements from the Department of Fisheries and ICNAF. The Soviet Union took 250 million pounds of fish from those banks.

The following years saw a decline in the Labrador fishery to the point at which thousands of our Newfoundland fishermen went to the fishery only to come home empty-handed. The fishing was a complete and utter failure. The minister knows why the Labrador fishery has failed. It was the tragic result of overfishing. The oldest traditional fishery in the world, certainly the oldest in North America, has been destroyed; it has been a disastrous, total failure in the last three years as a result of overfishing on the spawning grounds. I invite hon. members to imagine the coast of Labrador. Some 250 miles off Grosswater Bay we come to Hamilton Inlet Banks. Hundreds of vessels were fishing there day after day. The minister knows what happens. He has talked about it on television. He knows how Soviet vessels operate.

Again, let us take what happened on Georges Bank as an example. Three or four years ago news went around that Canadian fisherman were getting good catches of haddock there. The Russians declared war on Georges Bank. They went in with great fleets of ships; it is their practice to move in packs of between 20 and 60 ships. They have 40 ships operating there, including factory ships, medical supply vessels and everything else—a whole community. They declared war on Georges Bank and in that year they destroyed the haddock fishery to the point at which the chances of its spontaneous recovery are most unlikely. Biologists in the Department of Fisheries tell us that depletion of stock may have reached the stage at which natural processes cannot replenish it. This is the result of overfishing.

Now the minister tells us we should impose quotas and restrict fishing on Georges Bank. He can do this for a very good reason: there are more haddock in Lake Ontario than there are on Georges Bank at the moment. He is able to impose restrictions on fishing in the area because there are no more fish there. The depletion of stocks had reached such proportions that everyone realized that the time for action had passed. Everyone in Canada interested in the fisheries knew that stocks had disappeared by the time we got round to taking action.

The minister tells us about the patrols we are carrying out, the great effort which Canada is making. At a time when there were 60 foreign vessels off the southwest coast of Newfoundland a few weeks ago, the Canadian response was two small ships trying to patrol the whole of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the coast of Newfoundland. One is a 65-foot vessel called the Cape Freals. It would have trouble navigating the Rideau Canal in a high wind. Indeed, it would be just as effective on the Prairies as in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

The minister says they are doing a great job, that the crews are even working overtime while still keeping within the departmental budget. He says "You must remember that these men must rest from time to time; they must have time to themselves; they must have weekends off." What a shame, disgrace and embarrassment for the Canadian nation to treat its fisheries, to treat its sovereignty, to treat its territory in this way! The department sent in two capable aircraft when the situation had reached the point at which the fishermen themselves were threatening to take up arms to assert their rights. What a response to a threat of the kind we have been facing!

The minister was warned what was likely to happen. Members on this side of the House have made numerous recommendations and I shall repeat some of them today. We have asked that Canada take immediate steps to convene a conference in lieu of a Law of the Sea conference—the next to take place two years from now. We have urged that Canada convene a conference on marine resources in order that the nations of the world involved in the fishing industry might sit around a table and talk about conservation and management as a first step. This should have been done in 1959 following the Law of the Sea Conference at Geneva. Canada was given the right to ask the nations of the world to attend a conference to discuss this subject and if after six months they refused to agree on conservation measures, then Canada could take unilateral action. This was never done.

We have asked that the Canadian government impose a 12-mile limit right around the coast of Newfoundland and the coast of Canada. We have asked that the Canadian government enforce the laws which it has had on the books since 1964 and which have been brought forward under various guises since then. We have asked the government to take the question of our sovereignty over territorial seas seriously since among other things this directly affects the livelihood of so many of our people. We have asked that the government use National Defence facilities to enforce the laws of Canada in this area. We have asked that the government recommend quotas to the various nations which are engaged in harvesting our resources. I understand that the Soviet Union, for example, is willing to talk about quotas, to talk about restricting catches and the number of boats and the amount of gear which may be employed. After all, Russia too has been getting an increasingly small return on the total capital and technology invested in its fishing fleet. Indeed, they are getting an even smaller return per man-hour than we are.

The simple fact is that Canadians are not willing to give the fisheries any degree of priority. The reason is, I believe, that when many people think of Canada they think only of the central heartland, of the Montreal-Toronto complex. They think of a power structure which is basically in tune with manufacturing industries, and I do not think they are prepared to lift a finger which might upset the delicate international balance which presently exists. They certainly are not prepared to lift a finger on behalf of our fisheries.

Various North and South American and European nations are launching new initiatives in the area of marine resources, which is one of our great frontiers of resource development. But Canada has crawled into a shell in this regard. I say, as I have said before, that as long as we have the present incumbent in charge of the External Affairs Department, a man with the backbone of a marinated herring, we will not have any action with regard to marine resources. If you were to read the proclamations of the minister of external affairs, Mr. Speaker, you would find that he wrote off fisheries as early as 1952 as a poverty endeavour. He never took the trouble to enlighten himself on the fact that this is one of our great frontiers of Canadian development, an area that could pay dividends to the nation as a whole.

The Minister of Fisheries has not heard a word I have said because he has been talking to his colleagues. This is an indication of his interest in fisheries. He is conducting a slow but deliberate policy of withdrawal from the fisheries into the more sophisticated area of environmental control, air pollution, cleaning up the Eddy match factory and the sewage emptying from the Prime Minister's residence on Sussex Drive. He has taken on this new image of Mr. Clean. We do not even get the response we used to get to the mail we send the Minister of Fisheries. He is now too busy acting as the big brother in the Canadian cabinet. He has no more time for the fisheries.

If the minister wants to enjoy a healthy political life in this House of Commons, he had better change his attitude. We have lots of time to discuss the plight of the fishermen of Canada, and whether this government likes it or not we will get the government to take action that benefits the fishermen. That is, if the government wants to conduct the business of this House in a sane and satisfactory manner. The Minister of Fisheries should listen to people who know something about the fisheries, such as the hon. member for St. John's East and other of my colleagues from the Atlantic provinces. When they make recommendations to the Minister of Fisheries, he should listen damn carefully and try to encourage his colleagues, the flower-powered Prime Minister and the fellow who sits to his right to do likewise.

He should imbue these men with a knowledge of fisheries and impress upon them the importance of our marine resources. Let him keep them on their toes so that we have some action. We are becoming a little disillusioned at the responses of this government in the area of marine resources. It is time the government, which is interested in a just society, dished a little of it out to the fishermen of Canada in all our provinces.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will be very short. This is the last day of the session before Easter and I learned of this measure an hour or so ago. I agree with what the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan) have said and I have no wish to repeat it.

This bill is a step in the right direction, something which as far as I am concerned we need. Other members have talked about depletion of our fisheries. I am concerned about what we do if certain countries fail to participate in this convention. How will we be able to control their activities in this field? I should like to know how many nations are contracting parties to this convention. If I understood the minister correctly, the agreements have not yet been signed but are about to be signed. I think every effort should be made to see that at least the ICNAF nations sign agreements; but those countries who are not party to ICNAF should also be made aware of the convention and be asked to participate in it.

There is no question that the Canadian government should afford protection to our inshore fishermen as well as to our offshore fishermen. Much concern has been expressed recently about herring stocks, for example. A few years ago an international convention was held in Fredericton which was attended by many scientists. I know scientists are wrong sometimes and therefore I do not criticize them, but most people who attended this convention predicted that the herring stocks off the Atlantic coast would never be depleted. Encouragement was given to produce herring meal and all kinds of plans were made to harvest herring in one form or another.

Now we find that some of the herring processing plants are having to close three years after this convention. Obviously something has gone wrong. In addition, other parts of the fishery that use herring meal have been affected. Fish that feed on herring are now less plentiful. In my province we hold a tuna fishing contest for the tourists every year, but in the last two years there have been no tuna to fish because of the herring shortage.

These are a few of the repercussions of the herring shortage upon the fisheries and this is why we need protection.

This bill will also enable us to check amounts of fish caught by other countries. I think of the lobsters that are caught on Georges and Browns Banks, where the United States has traditionally fished for large lobsters, cod that is fished by other countries and haddock which is pretty well depleted now. In addition we need new beds for scallops. I hope that this bill will permit us to make investigations and will provide some check on stocks of these fish.

It is no use my giving the House statistics—this has already been done and time is moving on—of the number of vessels fishing off our shores in the last few years. There have been hundreds and hundreds of them. I think of certain areas on Georges Bank, for example. As I say, our inshore as well as offshore fishermen are experiencing difficulties. However, I do not think we can adequately deal with this question on the last day before Easter. I hope we will be given the opportunity, either in committee or elsewhere, to study in great detail the problems facing our inshore fisheries. I am concerned to see how effective the bill will be and I hope it can be enforced.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate have passed the following bills to which the concurrence of this House is desired: Bill S-15, an act respecting the consolidation of the Income Tax Act in the printed roll of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970; Bill S-16, an act respecting Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd.

• (5:00 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed from Tuesday, April 6, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. When the committee rose last evening clause 14 of the bill was being considered.

Government Organization Act, 1970

On clause 14—Establishment of Ministries of State.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, during the course of the discussions a number of representations were made to the effect that if this particular clause and the subsequent ones looking to the creation of ministries of state are passed, this will provide the House with a final opportunity to examine the necessity for, the reasons in favour of, the modus operandi of and generally the conduct of the ministries of state that are to be set in place by proclamation.

Account does not seem to have been taken of the fact that while it will be possible, if this bill is passed, to establish a ministry of state by proclamation, the funds necessary for its operation will have to be provided in the usual fashion through the estimates, and that this will provide an occasion for inquiry into, questions to be asked and observations made in relation not only to the operations but also to the structure and, indeed, the necessity of the ministry itself. However, in spite of this, Mr. Chairman, and in an endeavour to exhibit a measure of co-operation to the House, we are prepared to propose an amendment to clause 14 and, as a consequence, an amendment to clause 16 which would provide the House, subsequent to the proclamation of a new ministry, with an occasion to express its view regarding that particular ministry. This would be done in the form of a negative resolution of the House of Commons, a rather new and as yet untested device for which provision was made for the first time in Bill C-182 which passed the House about a month ago and which is now before the Senate.

That bill provides for an amendment to the Interpretation Act, which in turn provides for this new instrument, a negative resolution of the House of Commons and gives statutory or background effect to it. In order, then, to offer the opportunity to the House, following proclamation, to express its disapproval if such be the case—I must confess that I find it hard to imagine a case when the House will be constrained to express its disapproval, so this will be a highly exceptional procedure—and in order to provide all the necessary safeguards, whether needed or not, I would move:

That Bill C-207 be amended by striking out lines 22 and 23 on page 9 thereof and by substituting therefor the following:

"the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, subject to negative resolution of the House of Commons, establish a Ministry of State for that"

I have here copies in English and French of this amendment relating to clause 14. It might be of interest and perhaps convenience to the committee if I also suggested a similar amendment to clause 16 which provides for the same negative resolution in the event that changes are made in an existing ministry of state. This amendment would read:

That Bill C-207 be amended by striking out line 6 on page 6 thereof and by substituting therefor the following:

"proclamation, subject to negative resolution of the House of Commons, change, from time to time,"

I also have this amendment in French, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. The following amendment has been moved by the President of the Treasury Board:

That Bill C-207 be amended by striking out lines 22 and 23 on page 9 thereof and by substituting therefor the following:

"the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, subject to negative resolution of the House of Commons, establish a Ministry of State for that"

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, shouldn't it be page 5?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The reference in the English text should be to page 5, although it was typed as page 9. It is also to be moved by Mr. Drury—I am just reading this for information at the present time:

That Bill C-207 be amended by striking out line 6 on page 6 thereof and by substituting therefor the following:

"proclamation, subject to negative resolution of the House of Commons, change, from time to time,"

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I shall try to be as brief as the minister was, and because of the tone of his speech and his proposal, which we accept as being conciliatory in an attempt to co-operate with all parts of the House, I will not repeat the objections that we have taken to clause 14 in its present form. They are on record and speak for themselves. The minister's approach has been reasonable. He has attempted to find common ground. There have been discussions, as there always are in this place, to see if there was not common ground, and now the minister has come quite a distance. I do not think he has come far enough but I will indicate how far we are prepared to go. It may be that the final mile will be worked out, if not today then at a later date.

An hon. Member: In three or four months' time.

Mr. Baldwin: No, that is not so. The government has made its position clear and we are entitled to make our position clear. I have before me the bill amending the Statutory Instruments Act and I think I am entitled to quote from it because the minister indicated that this is a new and novel procedure. The expression "subject to negative resolution" is contained in clause 28 of that bill, at page 17. I refer to Bill C-182 and I quote:

—the expression "subject to negative resolution of Parliament", when used in relation to any regulation, means that such regulation shall be laid before Parliament—

For "regulation" we substitute the word "proclamation" here.

—within fifteen days after it is made or, if Parliament is not then sitting, on any of the first fifteen days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting and may be annulled—

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the hon. member read paragraph (d) because my amendment relates to "negative resolution of the House of Commons."

Mr. Baldwin: The minister is quite correct. That paragraph reads:

—if the House is not then sitting, on any of the first fifteen days next thereafter that Parliament is sitting and may be annulled by a resolution of the House of Commons introduced and passed in accordance with the rules of that House.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The problem we see on this side of the House is a very practical one. An onus would be placed on an opposition party or a private member to secure ways or means by which he could have it annulled. It would be quite impossible, for example, for a government backbencher to do this because at the present time the procedure of using an opposition day is denied to all except those in opposition to the government. So if there should be a backbencher on the government side or a government member who should decide to move by way of negative resolution, he would be denied that opportunity.

It may well be that some time in the future this House might get around to enacting changes in our Standing Orders which would make a negative resolution an effective procedure, but so far it is not effective. I say there is no practical way in which a negative resolution can be of use at the present time. So, Mr. Chairman, I shall come right to the point. We propose an alternative. At one time I considered moving this as a subamendment, but in light of the amendment moved by the minister I doubt if this could be done. Therefore, perhaps I might place it on the record as an indication of our view, although I would move it as an amendment if I thought I would be in order.

It is our view that instead of having a negative resolution we should have an affirmative resolution. Let me read an affirmative resolution. I am referring to section 28A(1) (b) in clause 28 of the statutory instruments bill:

the expression "subject to affirmative resolution of the House of Commons", when used in relation to any regulation, means that such regulation shall be laid before the House of Commons within fifteen days after it is made or, if the House is not then sitting, on any of the first fifteen days next thereafter that the House is sitting and shall not come into force unless and until it is affirmed by a resolution of the House of Commons introduced and passed in accordance with the rules of that House;

That places on the government the responsibility to seek and secure some procedure. The government is much more able, because it has command of the government's time, to bring forward a resolution in the House of Commons and seek approval of that resolution. The minister may say this might cause a considerable amount of difficulty in the interval. Mr. Chairman, let us take parliamentary notice of the fact that very rarely does a year pass when this House is not in session for approximately nine months, and there is very rarely a calendar year when Parliament is not sitting for a period of three months.

The government has the means at its disposal under existing legislation to cope with the situation in the interval through the means of appointment of either a minister without portfolio under the present practice or, as the case might be, a minister of state under the new practice—I am not talking about the establishment of ministries of state—and provide that under the Transfer of Duties Act the minister without portfolio or minister of state so appointed may during his period of office execute and carry out the duties required which would place the onus, as it should be, upon the government of seeking from this House immediately or if Parliament is not in session, within 15 days of the proclamation, the required authority.

The difference between negative and affirmative of course is very substantial, but it is not so great in this particular instance when we examine it. Under the present rules we would be giving up an entrenched parliamentary right by adopting this amendment. If the minister is prepared to consider this and also to consider the proposal made by my hon. friend from St. John's East in respect of an amendment to part II concerning the department of the environment—I understand there is disposition to work out something in respect of the use of the word "fisheries" in that part—it might well be that matters might be resolved.

All I can do at this point is read the amendment I would have moved had the minister not proposed his motion. I believe I am estopped from presenting it now as a motion because I do not think I can amend the minister's motion. The amendment I would have proposed is the following:

That clause 14 be amended by renumbering it as 14(1) and adding 14(2) as follows:

"14(2) Any such proclamation shall be subject to affirmative resolution of the House of Commons."

That would provide the kind of safeguard I think this House is entitled to have before clause 14 in its present form is passed.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the House leader of the official opposition suggested one should controvert the proposed amendment from negative to affirmative. I have listened with considerable care to his suggestion and find it rather difficult to accept. The only reason given for preferring the affirmative rather than the negative resolution is that to rely on the negative alone would deprive members on the government side of their ability—

Mr. Baldwin: That is not the only reason. It is one reason.

Mr. Drury: —to speak out against giving effect to a bill or proclamation made obviously with the consent of the government. I do not feel this is a serious deprivation of the rights of Members of Parliament. It offers the serious disadvantage, as the hon. member has pointed out, when the House is not in session of requiring the use of—I will not say "improper"—cumbersome and rather difficult procedures if one is to avail himself of the flexibility and usefulness of this kind of instrument to achieve the national purpose.

This of course can be set right, when the House reassembles, by the government using government time for what might turn out to be the kind of debate we have had on this occasion, when everybody is in favour of a department of the environment and yet after some 15 days unfortunately we have not reached agreement.

The hon. member suggests the government should subject itself to this kind of possibility and yet we are offering to Parliament, if it should disapprove, the ability to make its disapproval known and to withhold the particular proclamation in respect of the setting up of a ministry. The possibilities are clear. They are there; they are open. If they should not be effective it would merely be because the mover and seconder of such a motion could not carry the House. I do not think we should be envisaging procedures which enable, as I mentioned last night, the tyranny of the minority to prevail.

I am not sure we could conclude this debate tonight, and perhaps the best thing to do would be to envisage an early termination of these proceedings. However, before doing so I would ask the indulgence of the committee to raise a point in respect of a clause we have not yet reached, clause 27(3) of part VII, on page 12. Subclause 3 of clause 27 provides, in effect, that the early retirement provisions will be available only in respect of persons who cease to be employed in the public service after the coming into force of this act.

When the act was introduced early in February it was assumed that its passage would be possible prior to April 30. This does not appear any longer possible. In the meantime, plans have been made for lay-offs of employees at two national defence bases in the province of Manitoba, at Rivers and Gimli, and the notices are effective in a number of instances on April 30. If the bill is not passed by then and the lay-offs occur, those who are laid off will not be able to take advantage of this early retirement clause as we had planned and hoped they would.

So, Mr. Chairman, I must give notice that when the House resumes consideration of this bill we will propose an amendment to subclause 3 on page 12, which I hope will be accepted, which will provide that the benefits of the early retirement amendments will be applicable to those who cease to be employed after April 30, 1971.

Mr. Baldwin: I think I am able to tell the minister that provided he can establish a meritorious case for the passage of subclause 3 we will have no objection to such an amendment as may be required to give it retroactive effect. The onus will, of course, be upon him and the government to establish that it is a clause which needs to be passed.

Finally, I want to correct the impression which the minister was trying to create, that the only reason I was raising a question on the affirmative resolution was that I was deeply concerned about backbenchers on the government side. That is true to some extent, but I would point out most categorically that I also said there is no current procedure laid down whereby a negative resolution can be employed. As I read the Standing Orders, we would be in the position of having to move a motion, which would be a private member's motion. Under those circumstances it would take its place somewhere toward the end of the list, so we might wait for a long time.

I do not think, however, that there is very much difference between us. I give my understanding that I will look seriously, and so will my colleagues, at what the minister has had to say and at his resolution. I urge him to look also with care and seriousness at the amendment we offered, trying to look at it from the point of view of those who will have to carry the burden of having to establish a case in some way or other by a negative resolution, which will be a difficult problem. The difference between us is not that great and I hope that the minister between now and when we come back to the bill will have an opportunity to do as I urge.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I wish to say a word on the amendment which the President of the Treasury Board suggested the government would like to make to subclause 3 on page 12 of the bill. I say to him that from the contacts I have had with a number of public servants an amendment of this order will be very welcome, and even though the committee of the whole has already passed clause 27, I trust that the necessary consent will be given so that the amendment can be made. If that consent is not given, I shall offer my services to the minister to try to find some other way in which to do it.

However, there are two points that I would like to make. I gather the minister is making this announcement now so that those affected will know that this provision will apply not only to those who may be dismissed at the end of April but to public servants who may voluntarily decide to withdraw at the end of April. The minister is looking at me in a way I do not quite understand.

Mr. Drury: It is I who do not quite understand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister said that what made this kind of amendment necessary was that certain people will be dismissed at Rivers and Gimli as of the end of April, but the provisions of the early retirement are available two ways, to those who are dismissed and to those who on their own initiative decide to retire. There are certain people who in anticipation of this bill are planning to retire and pursue other activities. I would just like him to be clear that the right of people who are in service on April 30, whether they are fired or leave voluntarily will be covered by this amendment.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is much more of an expert in this than I am, so I hesitate, without grasping clearly what he is getting at, to make what appears to be a categorical statement. But let me say that what we hoped to do here was to cover by the passage of this bill prior to April 30 those whose jobs were in effect disappearing at Gimli and Rivers. Because of the non-passage of the bill, it is necessary to make an amendment which will neither extend nor restrict the provisions of the bill as they now stand. It will not make it applicable to either a greater or a lesser group but to all those who are contemplated here had we passed the bill today.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think that covers it, Mr. Chairman, and I am sure that when the officials in the department get at this they will make sure that the wording of the amendment which the minister will bring in will cover it. I know I am an old hand at nit-picking, but may I raise one other point. The minister referred to people who leave the service after April 30. I hope he meant "on or after April 30". In fact, let the amendment be drawn in such a way that there is no problem concerning people who leave at the end of April 30. That kind of problem does crop up. When you start talking about the month of May, someone who put in time on April 30 might not be covered. I am sure the minister knows what he wants to do and I just ask that the wording of this amendment covers those whom he intends to cover.

Mr. Drury: If you had passed the bill today, we would have no problem.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to call any other government business between now and the time we will be summoned for royal assent. So if it is agreeable we could suspend the sitting until that time.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion is that we suspend the sitting until the call of the bell. If there is no objection, I will leave the chair. However, before doing so I would remind hon. members that according to well-established practice and tradition, hon. members are invited to join me in room 16 when we return from the other place.

At 5.30 p.m. the sitting was suspended.

• (5:50 p.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5.50 p.m.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Right Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (6:00 p.m.)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act respecting investment companies
An act respecting weights and measures
An act to amend the Pension Act

Royal Assent

An act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952
An act to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act.

Mr. Speaker: It being after six o'clock this House stands adjourned, subject to the order made earlier today, until two o'clock on Monday, April 19, 1971.

I remind hon. members and their colleagues that they are invited to join me in room 16 in a few moments.

At 6.03 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order, until Monday, April 19.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, April 19, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

VACANCIES

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received communications notifying me that three vacancies have occurred in the representation, namely:

Bernard Pilon, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Chambly, by decease.

J.-A. Mongrain, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Trois-Rivières, by decease.

James E. Brown, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Brant, by acceptance of an office.

Accordingly I have addressed my warrants to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of new writs of election for the said electoral districts.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PENITENTIARIES

KINGSTON—STATEMENT BY SOLICITOR GENERAL ON RIOT

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, on the night of April 14, inmates of Kingston penitentiary seized six prison guards as hostages, smashed windows, furniture, the cell locking devices and occupied the cell blocks and the central control area.

As a precautionary measure the warden of Kingston penitentiary requested assistance from the Canadian Armed Forces and troops were subsequently deployed to guard the perimeter of the penitentiary.

On the morning of April 15, the warden, his deputy and the regional director of the penitentiary service met with a committee of three inmates chosen as spokesmen to present grievances. Inmates requested that representatives of the press, radio and television media be permitted to attend and this was authorized.

The grievances expressed by the inmates dealt in general terms with the whole area of police, judicial and correctional systems. Only in three minor areas were complaints made against the Canadian penitentiary service itself.

The inmates' committee requested that a group of distinguished citizens be asked to hear the views of the inmates. It became clear that the hostages would not be released until the inmates had had an opportunity to meet with such a group.

A committee of five citizens was subsequently formed under the chairmanship of Mr. Arthur Martin, Q.C., consisting of Mr. Ron Haggart, Dr. Desmond Morton, Mr. William Donkin and Mr. Aubrey Golden, Q.C. This committee was given a mandate to hear the views of the inmates and to report to the Solicitor General.

This committee of citizens met with the inmates' committee throughout the night of April 16 and I received a report early on April 17.

Of the number of requests reported to me by the citizens' committee, the most significant was that the hostages would be released if it were guaranteed that no criminal or disciplinary charges were laid as a result of the disturbance and the seizure of the cell blocks. The inmates' committee was informed that the government would be unlikely to discuss any matter as long as hostages were held by the inmates.

During the early afternoon of April 16, one of the hostages was released apparently unharmed and in good health. After a series of discussions between the inmates' committee and the citizens' committee which went on sporadically during the 17th of April, no agreement could be obtained from the total inmate population as to what they wanted to request of the government.

The cell blocks and central control area had been occupied by about 500 of the 641 inmates at Kingston. No disturbances occurred at the psychiatric wing, at the hospital or in the dissociation area which had remained under the warden's control. However, very early in the morning of Sunday April 18, there were outward visible signs that internal control among the 500 inmates was deteriorating rapidly. There was apparently some sporadic fighting among these inmates.

As a result, I decided to go to Kingston penitentiary. After consultation with the penitentiary authorities on the spot, I authorized that a plan be put into effect permitting those inmates in the cell blocks who wished to do so to come out with hostages. Shortly after daylight, some 200 inmates were allowed into the courtyard and at about 7 o'clock movements of inmates to other institutions began. These movements continued throughout the day and the hostages were released gradually.

I know that hon. members and all Canadians were greatly relieved when the last hostage was released apparently unharmed and in good health at about 5.00 p.m. on April 18, 1971.

Unfortunately one inmate was killed and a number of others were injured by other inmates while they were in control of the cell blocks. We have notified their families.

• (2:10 p.m.)

I would like to make it clear that there was no use of force at any time by penitentiary guards or the Canadian Armed Forces.

The whole question of improvement of penitentiary services and methods of rehabilitation presents both short term and long term problems which involve not only the government, the Penitentiary Service and the inmates, but also the Canadian public. In addition to the on-going programmes of the department which the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs now has an opportunity to examine, I decided two weeks before the recent events in Kingston to appoint a working group composed of outside and departmental sources to look into the Canadian Penitentiary Service rehabilitation approach for maximum security institutions and to recommend the type of new programmes and facilities that should be developed. These appointments will be announced shortly and I will ask that a report be made to me in six months.

So far as Kingston penitentiary is concerned, a decision had been made many months ago to phase it out by September 1971. This plan was already under way with the transfer from Kingston of a number of inmates to the new institution at Millhaven before the recent disturbance.

Inmates of our correctional institutions remain members of our society though temporarily segregated. Programmes which meet the needs of this group in society must be based on the acceptance of the principle that chances of rehabilitation are enhanced if inmates are given an opportunity to socialize, work and participate in activities under conditions as close as possible to what is found in normal society.

The government intends to pursue an increasingly progressive penitentiary program, but this can only be done in an orderly manner. The speed at which changes can be made depends jointly on the co-operation of inmates with the department and on public understanding and support.

With regard to the events at Kingston penitentiary, I have directed that a board of inquiry be established to review the events, to assess responsibility and to report to me.

On behalf of the government and on my own behalf, I would like to express sincere thanks to Mr. Arthur Martin, Mr. Ron Haggart and to the members of the committee for the very important role they played in helping to bring about a solution at Kingston. I should underline the valued co-operation of the Canadian Armed Forces and the police forces at the municipal, provincial and federal level. In concluding, I should like to express my personal thanks to several hon. members for offering to assist in any way they could.

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I should like to open my remarks by thanking the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) for his courtesy in providing me with a copy of his statement. I, like him, also, believe that thanks should be given to the citizens' committee, to the officers and staff of Kingston penitentiary, and to the members of the armed forces for keeping their cool in a somewhat critical situation. I wish I could be as effusive in my thanks to the hon. gentleman regarding other parts of his statement. In particular, I wish I could thank him for advising Your Honour, members of the House and the country why this riot took place at all; in the main, his statement is silent on that point and we are still left with what is a multi-million dollar mystery.

The hon. gentleman does say that there were three minor areas of complaint about the operations of the penitentiary service. We are not told what those three minor areas are; therefore we cannot assess whether, indeed, the adjective "minor" should be used at all.

Most of us have had the advantage of watching Mr. Jack Webster, a very senior Canadian newsman, interview on television last night a person who had been an inmate of that penitentiary. Certain factors were revealed which seemed to shed some light on the events in the penitentiary during the last few days. More specifically, there was the fear or the dread that most of the inmates there had about going to the new maximum security prison at Millhaven. I will return to that point in a few minutes' time or, rather, in a few moments' time; I do not want to wear out Your Honour's patience so quickly after the Easter recess that you lose the benefit thereof.

The point that this inmate made related to electronic snooping on inmates, even when they were engaged in private toilet activities. This was the talk of the inmates at Kingston and might have given rise to what happened. If this was their fear, surely there must have been some means of communication between the inmates and those looking after them so that it could have been dispelled. I suggest that these fears could have been dispelled by taking a few of the inmates to Millhaven and showing them what they would be up against, or films could have been taken and shown to the inmates in order to dispel their fears. Either these fears were justified or there was such an abysmal lack of communication that the whole country now has to suffer a multi-million dollar destruction of one of its institutions. One thanks the citizens' committee for its work, but one would have appreciated learning from the minister what reports, if any, it has so far made to him.

The Ottawa Citizen in its Saturday edition, in one of the reports it carried on this continuing story, quoted guards as saying that they were expecting a riot at Kingston. One would like to know what measures were taken to head off that riot. I suggest a similar situation to Kingston prevails at Dorchester, at British Columbia penitentiary and at Prince Albert—in short, at any institution built years and years ago that is being used to try to serve the needs of today. I think the simple answer to the problem is to be found in that fact. As a member of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee which visited some penitentiaries but not all, I know that the members were impressed by the modern institutions. Hon. members will have noted that these modern penitentiaries have remained free of the disturbances that have racked others such as St. Vincent de Paul which, thankfully, has now been closed.

I suggest to the Solicitor General that the inquiry should deal with the points of criticism in respect of Millhaven. The government is apparently going ahead with its plans for Millhaven come hell or high water or even more riots, although it has been criticized over and over again and referred to as an "electronic 1984". I suggest that the board of inquiry should deal with the lack of occupational training and with the Parole Act. Both these topics have given rise to complaints by the inmates. The board of inquiry should also suggest steps to avert another riot. Let me return to the point I made a few minutes ago. Surely some permanent method must be devised to provide for discussions between a committee of inmates and a committee of prison guards in order that intolerable situations that exist can be rectified immediately before they reach explosive proportions.

Finally, I think that the committee of inquiry should deal with that small group in penitentiaries which constitutes, even in the eyes of the most hardened criminals, the dregs of society. This little group needs protection from the other inmates of penitentiaries. I refer to sex deviates, Crown witnesses, stool pigeons, informers and the like. During our visits to certain penitentiaries in Canada we noted friction building up whenever that group of people was in close contact with the general prison population. It may surprise hon. members to know that the most hardened wife beater is still entitled to look down his nose at someone. The person he looks down his nose at is the sexual deviate. To this extent the element of segregation is involved in penitentiaries. I gather this was a factor in the Kingston riot although the Solicitor General has not dealt with it. That factor must be considered by the board of inquiry.

The members of the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee had an opportunity to visit some of the penitentiaries and to observe some of these problems. We will be very anxious and eager to learn the results of this inquiry and what steps the minister will take to head off future incidents of this type.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we owe a debt of gratitude to the members of the citizens' committee who spent many hours during the daytime and at night in an attempt to resolve the problem at Kingston penitentiary. It may well be that we will have similar committees in the future. Periodically over the years we have experienced riots at different prisons throughout our penitentiary system. Some of these riots have been worse than others. The riot some years ago at Kingston during which there was a fire and a great deal of burning occurred, as at St. Vincent de Paul, involved a great deal more damage in one sense than the riot which concluded over the past weekend.

We all regret very much the death of one of the inmates. Presumably an attempt will be made to discover how it occurred and criminal charges will be laid if the person who caused this death can be identified.

I am wondering about the government's attitude on the matter of destruction of public property. I understand the damage has been estimated at $1 million, but who knows what it is in terms of dollar value. We should realize, however, that under the Criminal Code there is provision for a maximum penalty of 14 years' imprisonment for destruction of government property. As a result of riots in the past certain individuals have been charged in the criminal courts and, following conviction, have had the maximum sentence of 14 years meted out for participating in a revolt against the system. I suggest very sincerely that the minister and the government should look very warily at the approach that has been adopted in the past, that of laying criminal charges in an attempt to counterbalance the situation for the future, because it probably will not work.

The government response to such situations in the past has been to punish the individuals involved either within the system or by laying charges in court. It has been one of punishment of the whole inmate population by in effect putting the lid on the joint, by removing all privileges, recreational facilities and the like for long periods of time, by segregating individuals and keeping them locked up in cells for 23½ hours out of 24 hours every day and permitting them only half an hour for exercise. I believe that the government's response in the past through this type of retaliatory oppression, removal of privileges and punishment for all regardless of their participation or non-participation in such things really will not serve us very well in the future if that is to be the sole action taken as a result of the riot at Kingston.

A number of questions have not been answered and I think two are of extreme importance. It would have behooved the minister well to indicate from his point of view what he knows concerning the answers to these two questions or what he may have surmised as to the situation. One question is, what are the recommendations, if any, that have come from the citizens' committee which spent hours in that institution talking to the inmates' committee. The members of the citizens' committee were liaising back and forth and undoubtedly have a far greater insight into the feelings which led up to this revolt than could possibly be derived through any board of inquiry or working group such as the minister seeks to establish. I believe it would serve the public interest well to know what the recommendations of that citizen's committee were or whether there will be any forthcoming in the future.

I also think it would have been well for the minister to give some assessment of his views concerning the real reasons behind the riot. I am sure it was not just a riot by people who objected to the prospect of being transferred to another institution, Millhaven, on the basis of rumours concerning what existed there and what sort of oppressive and electronic devices might be there to invade their privacy. I believe it goes much deeper than just being another riot in a penitentiary. I believe it represents partly a revolt against the judicial system and concern that we give lip service to the idea of rehabilitation in the penitentiary system but do not in fact do anything about it. It is a revolt against the fact of life that some penitentiaries are there just as places for people to be locked up in.

Any attempt at effective rehabilitation work within the prison system as we know it today will run counter to the idea and concept of security and custody and the obligation on the part of the penitentiary service to carry out the instructions of the courts, namely, to keep a person in jail for a stated period of time. We can talk about rehabilitation programs within our penitentiary system but by and large that is not the place in which they will work. Generally speaking, inmates participate in chaplain's groups, therapy groups or rehabilitation groups and talk with their counsellors in great detail, but their prime objective is to get out of jail and therefore they will use those mechanisms, those systems and those structures that are set up supposedly for rehabilitation for the prime purpose of getting out on the street.

Rehabilitation means parole and the proper and full use of the parole and probation systems. We could probably release tomorrow on parole one-third to half the inmate population of our federal penitentiaries and not a single additional criminal offence would take place while those inmates were on parole. It would be in that period of time while they are on parole that rehabilitation would work to the full. In 1956 we had eight federal penitentiaries; today we have approximately 35 to 40. I do not know the exact number. If we had spent even half of the millions and millions of dollars on parole and probation that we have poured into building bigger and more glamorous institutions, surely we would have done something more worth while and realized more of the benefits of rehabilitation than we have until now. We have to try to establish a relationship with outside voluntary private groups such as the St. Leonard Society, the X-Kalay Foundation in Vancouver and others of a similar nature which have worked wonders in the rehabilitative field in helping to get people back on the straight and narrow and off that merry-go-round which repeatedly puts them back into the penitentiary system.

I noted that a couple of weeks ago the minister appointed a working group. I gather that he has not yet named the personnel of that group. I wonder whether it will really be a worth-while functioning group because many studies and examinations have been made in the past of rehabilitation both in maximum security institutions and in other parts of the system. However, if the minister is going to proceed and really thinks it will be a worth-while working group that will come up with something valuable, I suggest he should appoint to that group some ex-convicts, people who have gone through the mill, who know what rehabilitation is all about and who have worked at it, people who, for instance, participate in organizations, such as the St. Leonard's Society and the X-Kalay Foundation, people such as Mr. Earl Allard who is associated with the X-Kalay Foundation and who could tell the minister and the government more about rehabilitation and the necessity for it than all the professional working groups one could find both in the Public Service and outside it.

We need to be concerned about the damage that was done, the loss of life and the injuries to individuals, all of which are important, but above all we need to take instances of this nature and look upon them as revolts against the judicial and penological systems and structures and learn by them to develop something beneficial and helpful in the future for the individual. Our concern must be with the salvation and rehabilitation of the individual, and that will not be achieved by constructing bigger, more elaborate and more modern buildings and the like. We have had riots in the past and undoubtedly we will have them again, but I think our best guarantee of keeping riots to a minimum is to treat inmates as human beings and to work for their salvation and not for the continuance of an antiquated penological system which brings about frustration and riots.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we wish first to thank the officials of the Kingston penitentiary and each member of the citizens committee for their efficiency in seeking an immediate solution to last week's disorders and for remaining calm despite the seriousness of the situation.

Mr. Speaker, this was certainly not an easy situation and the deeper causes of the problem which created this unrest in the Kingston penitentiary baffle us, at least from the minister's statement. Be it as it may, the government certainly acted in good faith and we are willing to commend it.

But there is one point that I should like to raise immediately, namely the fact that one inmate was killed and several others injured, and that hostages were held by inmates, the Canadian Armed Forces were called in and damages amounting to thousands of dollars were caused to the premises.

Mr. Speaker, this is violence and as far as we are concerned, violence cannot be accepted under any circumstances. It is hard to justify an act of violence so long as there is a chance of a dialogue between the differing parties. I wonder whether the federal authorities responsible for penitentiaries across Canada could have avoided this riot through frequent and regular contact with penitentiary officials, and representatives from the inmates and the general public.

In his statement the minister repeatedly said that the government intends to undertake a thorough reform in this field provided that they can get the co-operation of the public, of the inmates and of the authorities concerned.

Mr. Speaker, no doubt the government can depend on the support and co-operation of the people, of all those concerned or skilled in this field. There is no doubt, the most interested of all, the inmates, those who can be recuperated or rehabilitated, are ready to co-operate in order to improve the situation.

Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if the government has made all the necessary efforts to promote continuous consideration—not only at a critical time,—of problems that could be foreseen. Violence should never be allowed, and the troubles that occurred in Kingston are most regrettable and sadden all Canadians, particularly in the case of the dead and injured inmates and in respect of the damages that have thus been done.

Mr. Speaker, if on one hand, violence cannot be approved, on the other, we can ask ourselves to what extent the methods put forward by the government will be effective, especially the establishment of a work group which will file a report and a board of inquiry on the troubles which we have just known. We ask ourselves if those studies coming after hundreds of others on the Canadian penal system will really be effective.

There has been violence in Kingston and there has also been violence elsewhere in Canada. Quebec experienced a crisis which was no laughing matter, and in any event we must ask ourselves a basic question.

• (2:40 p.m.)

The disorders at Kingston penitentiary are putting hon. members and the Canadian people right at the heart of the problem, namely what are our objectives.

Our first goal is to reduce crime in Canada. Year after year the crime rate is on the increase. The government has abolished capital punishment on the ground that it would reduce crime. In my opinion, the initiative has been a total failure, and I wonder whether the disorders at Kingston penitentiary do not once again revive the advisability of re-establishing capital punishment, not for the inmates who organized the riot, as we should thank them rather for having provided the opportunity to discuss again the advisability of restoring capital punishment.

Mr. Speaker, in a country we can succeed in bringing about respect for authority only if we deserve it. In creating an economic, political and social climate where each individual can achieve fulfilment in freedom and security, crime can be reduced. If an effort is made to bring back the prisoners to a normal life through an efficient rehabilitation system adapted to each individual, we can hope to insure order.

Under our present penitentiary system, dangerous criminals and milder types, are thrown together, which does not improve the situation of either one.

Mr. Speaker, the government is indefinitely postponing a complete overhaul of the Canadian penitentiary system, alleging lack of funds. There as elsewhere, the reason for our failure to take action, for our apathy, is again, it must be recognized, lack of funds. When—and it is with that question that I want to close my remarks—when will we finally make up our minds to finance not only peace, but also respect for the individual, in order that each Canadian citizen may be given every opportunity for fulfilment in freedom and security. Every individual, whether free or incarcerated, is a human being, and nothing should be left undone for his welfare. To this end, we must resort to financial means other than those the government now uses since no price is too high for healthy and normal fulfilment of human beings.

Mr. Speaker, that is why, in spite of the minister's promises, which only appease us for the time being, we hope that from now on he will agree to carry out a thorough overhaul of our penitentiary system and will not hesitate to make money available for human beings and to finance their security and freedom, giving each one an opportunity to return to normal life or, if has so deserved, to be punished accordingly.

REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA

TABLING OF 1970 REVISION—STATEMENT BY MINISTER

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is with much pleasure, and a sense of achievement on the part of the department and of the commissioners, that I am able to announce that the Statute Roll for the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, has been deposited with the Clerk of the Parliaments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): This revision will be the fifth revision of the federal public general statutes, and the fourth in this century. Earlier revisions were those of 1886 begun in Sir John A. Macdonald's administration, 1906, 1927 and 1952.

With the consent of the House I wish to table the seven volumes of the 1970 revision and the first supplementary volume that contain a consolidation of current federal statutes that were passed by Parliament prior to October 7, 1970. A second supplementary volume is in the course of preparation and will contain the amendments made in the present session to the statutes in the revision. An appendix volume containing constitutional legislation and documents will complete the ten volume set.

I might say that when the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, are proclaimed in force the proclamation will have the effect of repealing those public general statutes on the statute books that are included in the revision and replacing them by the statutes in the revision. The Revised Statutes do not operate as new laws but are to be construed and have effect as a consolidation and as declaratory of the law as contained in the statutes and parts so repealed for which the Revised Statutes are substituted.

There is, however, a technical repeal and replacement brought about by the revision, and this aspect of the revision caused the Revision Commission to omit that part of Chapter 44 of the Statutes of Canada that is entitled the Canadian Bill of Rights from the revision, and to include it in the appendix volume where constitutional acts and documents are contained. The result is that the Canadian Bill of Rights may be cited still as the Statutes of Canada, 1960, Chapter 44, as it is not repealed and replaced by inclusion in the revision. Because of the nature of the Canadian Bill of Rights and the wide circulation it has received, it seemed desirable that it should retain its original form and chapter designation.

In addition to the bound volumes I also wish to table, with the consent of the House, and for the first time in the history of the Canadian Parliament, the revision in the form of magnetic tape containing the machine-readable database used in the production of the revision.

[Translation]

An initial decision by the Commission was to prepare the revision by utilizing data processing and photocomposition techniques rather conventional printing methods. This decision required the development of a software system that would support an automated, bilingual page format. The Revised Statutes, 1970 as tabled, represent a "first" for Canada. To the best of our knowledge, no other country has produced statutory material in this manner in a two-language page format, lining up marginal notes and columns of type automatically. Because of the uniqueness of the revision in this respect, Canada has been asked to provide magnetic tape of its Criminal Code for a demonstration of legal information retrieval at the next combined World Peace Through Law Conference and World Assembly of Judges to be held later this year in Belgrade, Yugoslavia.

[English]

The decision to use computers has resulted in the production of a machine-readable database of about 40 million characters containing the current public general statutes of Canada. This database will support information retrieval programs and will be the base for the development, now under way, of computer assisted drafting, editing and publication of laws system, the acronym for which is CADEPOL. The machine-readable magnetic tape provides a flexible storage medium from which it will be possible to update and reproduce statutory text. Thus, subsequent revisions of the Canadian statutes can be prepared more rapidly in the future.

Heretofore, the only way to store statutory text in a flexible form was by the costly and cumbersome method of holding vast quantities of lead type, which was rarely undertaken by any jurisdiction. The long delays involved in typesetting in the conventional manner can now be avoided in the case of future consolidations of the federal statutes.

I should add that the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, represent the culmination of a challenging and imaginative program undertaken by the Statute Revision Commission, and I draw the attention of hon. members of the presence in the Speaker's gallery of the members of that commission, and to the presence in the ladies gallery of a few of the great number of people whose combined efforts, co-operation and dedication have made the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970, the achievement that it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The commissioners and staff of the Statute Revision Commission have received the full co-operation of the Canadian Government Printing Bureau. Many of the innovative techniques used in the production of the revision were developed by the printing bureau, and on behalf of the commission I extend sincere thanks for a job well done.

The Revised Statutes tabled today will not have the force of law until proclamation by Order in Council at a later date. Distribution of this revision will begin almost immediately, and members of the public will have an opportunity to inspect the revision before it comes into force.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Finally, I wish to table a short history of the Statute Revision Commission which outlines in brief the work of the commission from its appointment in 1965, as well as a copy of the report of the commission to His Excellency, the Governor General of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Peace River I should indicate to the minister and to the House that I have serious reservations as to the authority which the minister has to table—as he says in his own words—"for the first time in the history of the Canadian parliament" a magnetic tape of deliberations. My recollection is that some years ago when a motion for the production of such documents was made by the then hon. member for Pontiac a ruling was sought from the Chair, and the ruling was that under our existing Standing Orders there is no authority for seeking from the government the tabling and the submission of such documents.

I again say that in this case this tape should be accepted only with reservations, and if it is done now hon. members on the treasury benches should not complain in future if a motion is made by other hon. members seeking permission or seeking authority for an order of the House for the tabling of documents other than what have been interpreted in the past as being documents that can be tabled under the terms of Standing Order 41(1).

All this having been said, it is obvious that the House is master of its own rules and can accept the tabling of any document, whether it is a magnetic tape or any other kind of tape. Subject to those reservations I would seek the authority of the House to accept for tabling the documents to which the minister has alluded, including the magnetic tape. Is this agreed?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, after visibly having produced the tape—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Has it a cable licence?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It is for public use only—I shall accept the reservations put to me by the Chair. We will keep the tape of the consolidation in the government printing bureau, but I hope the House will accept the tabling of the statutes.

Mr. Speaker: Is it so agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (2:50 p.m.)

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we would have been quite prepared to accept the tape as an exhibit, without prejudice. However, the minister has probably handled the matter in the best way. We are going to review the rules in any event, and who knows what we may do with them or what the minister may be able to do later.

I join with the minister in welcoming the completion of this massive task. I also join with him in congratulating all those who were in any way involved in the task. Speaking as one who has had something to do with statutes, I think it is excellent that we are finally getting these consolidated statutes. The task has taken some time. I am not blaming anybody for that, but in these times when the government is intervening more and more in the rights of individuals it has become essential for those in this House, members of the bar, judges and others to find out exactly what a statute does without having to search painstakingly through many statute books. I hope we can look forward to the next revision being completed in a shorter period of time, especially since contemporaneously we have a government that legislates by moving radically in all directions at the same time in trying to enact new statutes.

In addition to congratulating the minister and those who were involved in the task, may I say that this is one of the times when we should pay more attention to the message than to the medium. In other words, I think that the government and members of the House ought to be more concerned about what goes into statutes rather than with the way they are issued. I say that more in sorrow than in anger because these statutes probably contain the chronicle of the fall and decline of what was to be the just society, and I would hope that the government in the short period which lies ahead will do something to repair this omission.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, mankind has come a long way in the matter of law. Once upon a time a great man came down from the mountain with ten commandments. Today the Minister of Justice came down with 40 million characters.

An hon. Member: The hon. member is one of them.

Mr. Baldwin: There are 40 million characters in the cabinet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We welcome the completion of this important and monumental job. Your Honour found today to be unusual in that the Minister of Justice was seeking to table a magnetic tape. We have learned to deal with red tape around here; this is the first time that magnetic tape has been presented to us.

I should like to point out something else which is significant about today. The last time I asked the Minister of Justice about the Revised Statutes of 1970, I put the question in these terms: could the minister undertake that the Revised Statutes of 1970 would be tabled before the end of 1971. He said yes. This is a red-letter day. The government has kept its commitment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As the hon. member for Peace River pointed out, it is extremely important to have our federal legislation in this consolidated form so that we can find it, appreciate it, understand it and also amend it in its many weak spots. We welcome the completion of this job. We join with the Minister of Justice in paying tribute to the members of the Statute Revision Commission and to the others who have taken part in this piece of work.

As an old-time printer, I should like to underline the tribute that the Minister of Justice paid to another group of people. I noted his reference to the ancient ways of printing that involved much time spent in the setting of type or in setting it over again. I am glad to note that he paid tribute to the printing industry and to the Canadian Government Printing Bureau in particular for developing many of the innovative techniques which will help to make it possible for our laws to be dealt with in this way.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we would like to thank the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) for having tabled today, as he had promised, a copy of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970.

Mr. Speaker, federal acts have thus been codified, which will make them more readily understood.

The point that I should like to raise does not occupy much place in the hon. minister's statement, but that revision has certainly required considerable work from the members of the Commission, since it has been published in both official languages, something we rejoice about. We wish to thank the hon. minister for this initiative, which is an extremely important point.

Mr. Speaker, we seize this opportunity to congratulate the members of the Commission who worked more or less actively at this enormous task and we wish to tell the minister that we hope to see the greatest possible distribution of the statutes to the people interested, at a reasonable price. For instance, I have in mind university students who cannot afford to buy the statutes. It would be a very good idea if the government agreed to a compensated discount policy on the revised statutes, in order to allow each law student to have them.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House under Standing Order 43 to move a motion. As students are now becoming available for employment and very few applicants for the Opportunities for Youth program have received any notification from the department concerned, or have even received notification of the receipt of the applications, as a number of municipalities have been fenced out of this program, as there has seemingly been no consultation with the post-secondary community across Canada in the preparation of criteria and objectives, as there is no indication that the program will be directed toward those married or underprivileged students who would most need the income in order to be able to return to school, as there have been numerous reports of absolute chaos and complete lack of organization in the secretariat processing the applications, and as it is necessary to have full disclosure—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member. The hon. member knows what the rule is. It has often been stated from the Chair. Hon. members cannot argue a case in substance. They can only indicate to the House, for the guidance of hon. members, the urgency of the matter which they wish to bring to the attention of the House.

I have indicated on a number of occasions that I think it is not quite in keeping with the spirit of this rule and the spirit of debate in the House of Commons for hon. members to take advantage of the Standing Order to submit an argument to which no response can be made by virtue of the wording of the Standing Order itself. I think hon. members should keep in mind, when attempting to bring forward motions under Standing Order 43, that they should limit themselves precisely and essentially to allusion to the urgency of the matter which is proposed for discussion under the Standing Order.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I was just coming to that. I wanted to say a word or two prior to coming to the urgency as to the reasons why this matter must be considered by a committee of this House, because it is necessary to have full disclosure of the pertinent problems and difficulties of the program before it becomes fully implemented and thousands of young people are disappointed. Since we have not had information in the House to date, I wish to move, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That the House refer the entire matter of the operation and criteria for the Opportunities for Youth program to the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration for immediate public examination in order that the Secretary of State and his officials can clarify and resolve these problems enabling the program to achieve optimum effectiveness.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Egmont. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not consent so the motion cannot be put.

INCOME TAX ACT

CONSOLIDATION IN PRINTED ROLL OF REVISED STATUTES OF CANADA, 1970

Hon. John N. Turner (for the Minister of National Revenue) moved the first reading of Bill S-15 (from the Senate), respecting the consolidation of the Income Tax Act in the printed Roll of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[Mr. MacDonald (Egmont).]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

MIGRATION OF PROFESSIONAL PEOPLE TO THE UNITED STATES, 1950 TO 1970

Question No. 386—Mr. Robinson:

How many (a) doctors (b) dentists (c) accountants (d) chemists (e) engineers (f) architects (g) university professors and/or lecturers (h) other professionals migrated to the United States in each year 1950 to 1970 inclusive?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): In so far as the Dominion Bureau of Statistics is concerned: statistics are not collected on people migrating to the United States.

AIR POLLUTION AND EXHAUST EMISSION CRITERIA

Question No. 482—Mr. Anderson:

1. What air pollution and exhaust emission criteria does the Department of Supply and Services apply when evaluating motor vehicles for possible purchase by the government?

2. What is the maximum sulphur content acceptable to the Department of Supply and Services in its purchase of fuel and heating oil for government use?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): 1. The department applies the objective performance standards on the levels of emission from motor vehicles in accordance with the Regulations Respecting Safety for Motor Vehicles and Motor Vehicle Components issued by the Department of Transport and printed in Canada Gazette, Part II, No. 22 dated November 25, 1970.

2. The maximum sulphur content acceptable in fuel and heating oil purchased by the Department of Supply and Services is governed at the present time by the plant design, by local conditions and by ordinances that apply in the localities where the individual heating plants are located. It is anticipated, however, that the co-ordination of the Government's interest in environmental control under the proposed Department of the Environment will result in new standards which will be put into effect in Government procurement of fuel.

EMPLOYMENT OF PUBLIC SERVANTS DURING 1969-70

Question No. 696—Mr. Mazankowski:

How many public servants were employed by the government during the fiscal year 1969-70 and (a) what was the total cost of the payroll (b) what was the average salary (c) what was the percentage of increase over the previous year?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board):

	1969-70
Number of continuing employees on strength as at September 30	197,684
(a) Total salaries of continuing employees (in thousands of dollars in effect on September 30)	$1,332,450

(b) Average Salary ((a) divided by number of employees)	$6,740
(c) Percentage negotiated increase over 1968-69 salaries, including any retroactive effects of agreements negotiated up to March, 1971	5.8

Source: Central Personnel Records System, Department of Supply and Services. September, 1969.

Notes: 1. The data provided in October in answer to a similar question was based on the Federal Government Statistics published by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. As the Dominion Bureau of Statistics is not publishing the data for 1969 we are unable to provide comparable data. 2. The data in (a) and (b) contain only the information reported by the Central Personnel Records System as at September 1969. The rate of increase, however, contains the negotiated increases granted up to March 1971, but applicable retroactively to the 1969-70 period.

AVERAGE PERCENTAGE INCREASE SINCE 1961 FOR PUBLIC SERVANTS AND ARMED FORCES

Question No. 781—Mr. McCleave:

1. By year since 1961, what has been the average percentage increase in the pay of (a) federal public servants (b) members of the armed forces?

2. What are the total respective increases for each category over those years?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The average percentage increases since 1961 in the pay of (a) federal public servants and (b) members of the armed forces are as follows:

	Federal Public Servants	Armed Forces
1961	—	—
1962	2.9	2.7
1963	1.8	—
1964	3.0	9.0
1965	7.7	—
1966	7.8	9.8
1967	8.9	4.0
1968	6.8	6.5
1969	5.8	6.5
1970	(not available)	6.1

The total percentage increase (a) for federal public servants for the period 1961 to 1969 was 54.0 and (b) for the armed forces for the period 1961 to 1969 was 44.6. 1970 figures for federal public servants are not available since many collective agreements have not been signed for that year. The total percentage increase for the armed forces from 1961 to 1970 was 53.7.

USE OF COST OF LIVING INDEX AS BAROMETER FOR DETERMINING INCREASED COST ALLOWANCES

Question No. 858—Mr. Robinson:

Is the cost of living index a valid barometer for determining increased cost allowances to (a) rural areas (b) urban areas (c) the Maritimes (d) senior citizens (e) welfare recipients (f) pensioners?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: The Consumer Price Index for Canada relates to middle income families of two to six persons living in urban centres. For that group, it is considered a valid indicator of the impact on living costs of changes in prices. The extent to which the index is applicable to other population groups has not been determined. However, the families to which the Canada index relates would include senior citizens, pensioners and Maritime families living in urban centres, in so far as they meet the income and family size criteria of the Canada index.

ISSUANCE OF COMMERCIAL FISHING LICENCES TO INDIANS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Question No. 878—Mr. Barnett:

How many commercial fishing licences were issued to Indians in British Columbia in each of the past five years and how many boats (a) owned by Indians (b) operated by Indians, were engaged in the commercial salmon fishery for each of these years?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Information on the number of commercial fishing licences issued to fishermen of Indian origin is not available as no record is kept of the ethnic origin of the recipient. Complete information requested in parts (a) and (b) also is not available, but as a result of special studies carried out for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development the following can be provided:

	1968	1969	1970
(a)	624		573
(b)		416	361

CANADIAN CONTRIBUTION TO SUPPORT OF THE WORLD COURT AT THE HAGUE

Question No. 891—Mr. Robinson:

How much per year has Canada contributed to the support of the World Court at The Hague since it was established?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State of External Affairs): Canada does not contribute directly to the International Court of Justice in The Hague. The Court is financed from the Regular Budget of the United Nations which is approved annually by the United Nations General Assembly. The Canadian contribution to the Court may be considered the product of the Court's actual expenses and the Canadian percentage assessment to the United Nations Regular Budget as approved by the General Assembly. Because of certain factors such as contributions to the United Nations Regular

Questions

Budget by non-member states, some of which are members of the Court, this calculation results in an estimate. The following table shows the estimated Canadian contribution to support the Court.

DEPARTMENT OF SUPPLY AND SERVICES—DESIGNATION OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES

Question No. 917—Mr. Robinson:

What percentage of the supplementary estimates of the Department of Supply and Services and Receiver General of Canada is designated for (a) winter works (b) to reduce unemployment (c) underestimating expenditures (d) combatting inflationary costs (e) new programs (f) hiring of additional employees?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): (a) Nil; (b) 44 per cent; (c) to (f) nil.

Note: As a result of the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Government Organization (Glassco Commission) the Computer Services Bureau was formed and commenced operations in 1965-66 to provide data processing services to government departments. The Bureau acquired a large computer in 1966; financing its operations from a revolving fund. In order to recover start-up costs for the computer, the item of $1,242,551 for the Computer Services Revolving Fund was submitted in Vote 10a of Supplementary Estimates "A". This amount comprises 56 per cent of the total amount voted by Parliament.

CANADA'S GROSS NATIONAL PRODUCT—PERCENTAGE DERIVED FROM FISHING INDUSTRY

Question No. 962—Mr. Sulatycky:

What percentage of Canada's Gross National Product is derived from the fishing industry?

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): The contribution of various industries to the economy is measured from the Gross Domestic Product at factor cost rather than from the Gross National Product at market prices. In the National Account Statistics, trapping is included with fishing and fish processing with manufacturing. It is not possible, therefore, to arrive at precise data on the contribution of the fishing industry, i.e. the primary and secondary sectors, to the Gross Domestic Product. A rough estimate can be obtained, however, with the use of the weighting system of the Index of Industrial Production. On this basis, the combined contribution of fishing and fish processing to the Gross Domestic Product was 0.3 per cent in 1969.

WASTE PAPER DISPOSAL BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Question No. 976—Mr. Sulatycky:

1. How is paper waste disposed of by government departments in Ottawa?

2. Is any paper waste of the federal government recycled?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): In so far as Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is concerned: 1. Waste paper from government departments is disposed of by award of contract after public tender through Crown Assets Disposal Corporation.

2. No.

INFORMATION ON DISPOSITION OF DUES PAID BY CANADIANS TO INTERNATIONAL UNIONS

Question No. 1,065—Mr. Deakon:

Does the government receive or collect information regarding the disposition of dues paid by Canadians to international unions and, if so (a) what amount of dues were paid by labour union members to Canadian unions having head offices in the United States (b) what percentage of these dues were forwarded to the parent office in the United States (c) what percentage of these dues were invested in Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: The Dominion Bureau of Statistics, under the provisions of the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, collects and compiles certain information relating to dues paid by Canadians to international unions. This information is published annually in the Annual Report of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act (Part II, Labour Unions). However, the data collected under the Act do not provide the information needed to answer specifically parts (a), (b) and (c) of this question.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO ANTI-ALCOHOLISM OR TEMPERANCE, 1970

Question No. 1,068—Mr. Mather:

What, in dollars, was the amount of federal contributions to anti-alcoholism or temperance in 1970?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Under the Public Health Research Grant an amount of $37,306 has been approved for the fiscal year 1970-71, to assist the provinces in carrying out research activities in the field of alcoholism. In addition, a sustaining grant of $15,000 was provided directly to the Canadian Foundation on Alcoholism.

Furthermore, during 1969-70, the following Welfare Grants were made for Alcohol Education: Yukon Territory, $6,656; North West Territories, $56,616.

A number of welfare institutions and welfare agencies supported under the Canada Assistance Plan are also involved in programs which treat alcoholism. However, expenditure for this particular purpose cannot be segregated or identified.

INFORMATION SUPPLIED BY CANADIAN MEMBER OF ICC TO CIA AID TO SOUTH VIETNAM

Question No. 1,123—Mrs. MacInnis:

1. Did the government investigate a claim in 1969 that a Canadian member of ICC had handed information to CIA?

2. Was an investigation instituted and, if so, with what results?

3. Does the government intend to further investigate the matter?

4. Since August 15, 1968, has the federal government contributed aid, in any form, to the government of South Vietnam, and, if so, what was the total amount of such aid?

5. Are there Canadian-funded hospitals in Quang Ngai and Qui Nhon serving the Vietnamese civilian community and, if so, to what extent?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. No.

2. and 3. Not applicable. 4. Normal accounting procedures are to calculate expenditures on a calendar-month basis. Using those figures, Canadian aid to South Vietnam from 1st August 1968 to the present, totals some $5,700,000.

5. There are two clinics in Vietnam which are meeting the needs of the civilian population. At Quang Ngai, there is a two-storey T.B. Clinic which was built and equipped by Canada. The construction was completed in December 1967. The Clinic functions primarily as an out-patient, ambulatory service of the province public health program for the detection, control and prevention of tuberculosis. A five-year plan calls for the gradual phasing out of Canadian support for the project. A Rehabilitation Centre at Qui Nhon, which was built and equipped by Canada, has been open since mid-1969. As at Quang Ngai, emphasis is on out-patient treatment. Under the terms of a five-year plan, there are up to eleven Canadian advisers to the Vietnamese staff with a gradual phasing out of Canadian participation.

CMHC PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,161—Mr. Coates:

1. How many individuals have been employed by CMHC in the past two years at a salary of $15,000 a year or more and, what are (a) their names (b) their responsibilities (c) their present salaries?

2. How many of the individuals in Part 1 are members of the staff of the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Housing and, in each instance (a) what are their specific responsibilities (b) what are their qualifications?

3. Is Douglas Bailey an employee of CMHC or the Minister's staff and, if so, what is (a) his position (b) his salary (c) his qualifications?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): 1. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has taken on strength 22 employees during the past two years at a salary of $15,000 a year or more. (a) (b) (c) The names, salaries and duties of employees of CMHC are internal administrative matters. It has not been the practice, nor is it considered appropriate, to answer questions relating to the internal administration of the Corporation.

2. None of the 22 individuals in Part 1 are members of the staff of the Minister without Portfolio responsible for Housing. (a) (b) (c) Not applicable.

3. Douglas Bailey is not an employee of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or the Minister's staff. (a) (b) (c) Not applicable.

CONSUMPTION OF EGGS IN CANADA, 1968-70

Question No. 1,183—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

1. What was the consumption of eggs in Canada during the years 1968, 1969 and 1970?

2. What was the consumption, by province, during the same years?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: 1. Domestic disappearance (consumption, spoilage, etc.) of eggs for the years 1968, 1969 and 1970 was as follows:

Year	Domestic Disappearance of Eggs* '000 doz.
1968	442,734	(excludes Newfoundland)
1969	456,964
1970	464,925

*Excludes eggs for hatching.

2. The data are not available to answer this question mainly because figures on interprovincial movements are not complete.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR—INCOME DERIVED FROM COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,190—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of Labour (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): (a) $1,399 for keypunching services to Solicitor General and Penitentiary Services. (b) Nil; (c) nil; (d) nil.

RESEARCH INTO MATTERS RELATED TO BACTERIAL WARFARE

Question No. 1,200—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

Is the government presently engaged in research into matters related to bacterial warfare and, if so (a) what is the nature of this research (b) what is the annual cost (c) how many departments participate and which ones (d) what other countries are participating with the government in these studies?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Yes. The work is carried out by the Defence Research Board of the Department of National Defence; (a) to develop protection for Canadians against biological attack; (b) $400,000; (c) the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Department of Agriculture are represented on the Defence Research Board Advisory Committee advising in this field; (d) no other countries participate. In accordance with established practice between allies, information is exchanged with the NATO countries and with USA when justified.

BEAVER HILLS PASTURE, SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 1,202—Mr. Nystrom:

1. Were any cattle turned away from Beaver Hills pasture in Saskatchewan (a) this spring (b) the spring of 1969 (c) the spring of 1970, because of a positive reaction test for Bangs and, if so, how many?

2. How many cattle tested positive when they came out of the pasture in the fall of 1969 and 1970?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. (a) No; (b) no; (c) no.

2. 1969, none; 1970, none tested.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE—INCOME DERIVED FROM COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,218—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of Agriculture (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry, (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): (a) Income derived from other departments during 1970-71 was $17,-260.95. (b) Nil; (c) nil; (d) nil.

REDUCTION IN PERSONAL AND CORPORATION TAXES

Question No. 1,230—Mr. Southam:

Is it the intention of the government to accept the advice of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and cut personal and corporation taxes in the spring budget to speed the rate of economic recovery and improve employment opportunities?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Government intentions on matters of this nature would be answered at the appropriate time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PENITENTIARIES

KINGSTON RIOT—AVAILABILITY OF CITIZENS' COMMITTEE AND BOARD OF INQUIRY REPORTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Solicitor General if he is prepared to table in the House or otherwise divulge, to the extent to which it is not confidential, the report of the citizens' committee which met with the inmates and, as indicated in his statement of April 17, reported to the minister?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have met Messrs. Martin and Haggart who made an oral report on the prisoners' requests and gave me a note, but I do not know whether it is official. However, I have considered their report as being official.

I would now have to determine whether the document they delivered squares with what they told me and if according to them, it is truly representative of the requests made by the prisoners.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: In order to make available to the House at least the very useful information which this committee has probably gathered in connection with this problem, will the minister facilitate the appearance of a member or members of the committee before the Parliamentary committee which is now considering the question of correctional services, since their contribution would possibly be helpful to the committee when making recommendations to the House?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the mandate given to this committee was quite clear. It was supposed to hear the prisoners' grievances and report to me personally.

Now, if the members of the committee wish to tell me about their experience, I will certainly consider their views.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: I have one further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. The minister might like to review his statement. He did not quite answer my question. Possibly he might do that tomorrow. The minister indicated in his statement that he has directed a board of inquiry to be established to review the events, to assess responsibility and to report to him. I wish to ask generally the same question. After that committee has reported, will the minister be prepared to make all or part of the contents of that report public and have the members of the board appear before the Parliamentary committee for discussion?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, in my opinion it has always been agreed that those would be the boards created to consider the internal problems and that accordingly, the report was of a private nature.

I am seriously considering the opportunity of appointing as members of this board persons that are not employed by the department.

[English]

KINGSTON RIOT—NATURE OF INMATES' COMPLAINTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Solicitor General's commendation of the citizens' committee, particularly Mr. Arthur Martin and Mr. Ron Haggart, can the minister inform the House as to the nature of the complaints transmitted to him from the inmates' committee, and what steps the minister is taking to rectify the situation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated, the complaints submitted by the inmates had to do with the judiciary, the police and the penitentiary systems generally. They somewhat fall in line with the complaints brought forth by modern society and they refer not so much to the standards of living as to our way of life. Therefore, the physical conditions of detention as such are not involved but rather the conditions under which liberated inmates are reintegrated into society and this is why we want to review the conditions of detention.

On the other hand, I mentioned that three types of minor complaints were also brought up to our attention.

The first type concerned the fact that an inmate was reportedly beaten. As hon. members will recall, about three months ago two inmates of the Kingston penitentiary detained hostages and eventually the guards were left uninjured. Still, one of these inmates had a knife which had to be taken from him by force. No serious injuries were inflicted on the inmates. Later, a Mrs. Redmond, who had been called to intervene and convince this inmate to surrender his knife and his hostages, was able to see the inmate and discuss with him and she told us firmly that no more force was used than was needed.

The second grievance was related to the fact that when members of the House write to inmates, letters are opened and remarks from the Warden of the institution are added to them. This problem has already been raised in the parliamentary committee and I indicated that we were considering the possibility of revising this practice.

The third grievance was related to the fact that the acting assistant director of the institution had denied an inmate a remission of 15 days that had been granted to him. I inquired about this and it turned out that this is not in the least consistent with the facts. This inmate was never denied 15 days of remission.

[English]

Mr. Douglas: A supplementary question. May I ask the Solicitor General if one of the complaints transmitted to him by the inmates' committee through the citizens' committee was the boredom arising out of the fact that the inmates are not given adequate opportunities for training? If this is the nature of the complaint, I ask the minister whether steps are being taken to rectify it, particularly with regard to those who are moving to the new institution at Millhaven?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, this was not a matter of complaint on the part of the inmates. On the other hand, I know that a problem exists in our institutions with regard to the industrial programs which must be implemented. In this connection I am expecting the report of an inquiry commission which was established a few months ago, and I will certainly study this report very closely in order to find out how this commission's recommendations may be carried out.

[English]

MILLHAVEN—ALLEGED INSTALLATION OF ELECTRONIC SPYING DEVICES

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Have electronic viewing and/or spying devices been installed in the new Millhaven maximum security prison and, if so, where have they been set up?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): No, Mr. Speaker. If there were spying devices, I would not want to reveal them, but I can say that there are no bugging devices at the Millhaven institution.

[Mr. Goyer.]

[English]

Mr. Ryan: Will the Solicitor General say categorically that there are none of these bugging devices in the cells or bedrooms of these prisoners?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: I say, Mr. Speaker, that there are no spying devices. That is the question I was asked. Now, if the hon. member has information, he might give it to us.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the minister has replied to the question.

[English]

SUGGESTED VISIT BY PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE TO KINGSTON AND MILLHAVEN—STEPS TO REDUCE PRISON POPULATION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): In view of the fact that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs has the power to visit Canadian penitentiaries, will the Solicitor General facilitate attendance of the committee at the Millhaven and Kingston institutions to observe the conditions there, speak to the inmates and report back to the House?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the members of the committee and myself were to visit the whole Kingston complex and take the opportunity to visit Millhaven as well. Unfortunately, I did so in rather unusual circumstances, in which I should not like hon. members to find themselves, all the more so since a coroner's inquiry is now under way as it was discovered that one of the inmates was dead. Besides, the inquiry board has to look fully into the circumstances surrounding events and will certainly want to visit the institution before anyone else. Therefore, taking the situation into account I shall give the hon. member's proposal the most sympathetic consideration.

[English]

Mr. Gilbert: Since the Ouimet Commission expressed the view that the prison population should be reduced very quickly, and requested that a research committee be set up to study conditions affecting prisoners held in maximum, medium and minimum security institutions, would the minister make a statement on motions setting forth what he has done to reduce the prison population and set forth the criteria with regard to inmates of penal institutions?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, to reduce the prison population is directly related to the number of persons sentenced to jail terms by the judiciary system.

That being said, perhaps we have stressed too much in the past the punitive aspect of the law and detention in general. Also it may be that the judiciary system should be revised so that the sentence be more consistent with the criminal act which has been committed.

AGRICULTURE

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE RESPECTING RESTRICTIVE MEASURES

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Since some provinces are taking new steps to end the free trade of farm products between provinces, what approach does the federal government intend to take with regard to these restrictive measures that may prevent needed competition and balkanize trade between Canadian provinces?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): If I heard the question correctly, I should like to advise the hon. member that I do not intend to take any measures which would balkanize trade between provinces. All the Ministers of Agriculture have indicated to me, even very recently, that they are prepared to negotiate a plan in accordance with which all the marketing regulations would be applied uniformly across the country. As soon as Bill C-176 is passed and we have authority to do this, we believe we can alleviate this problem.

Mr. Baldwin: That is not what Thatcher says.

[Translation]

Mr. Beaudoin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture.

What immediate steps does he intend to take to remove the embargo that certain provinces have put on a given farm product coming from other provinces?

[English]

Mr. Olson: What we intend to do is to move, as rapidly as the provinces and this House will allow us, to put into effect plans which will in fact remove this problem which is causing some difficulty in connection with provincial borders.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN STATUS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I would ask the Prime Minister whether or not there have been any discussions between various members of the Commonwealth, or whether any tentative arrangements were made at the recent Prime Ministers Conference, whereby Governors General shall hereafter be regarded as heads of state?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): There was no such general discussion at the Singapore Conference or at the London Conference which I attended. Beyond that, I imagine each government is giving thought to the problem in the way it best can.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does that answer indicate that the Governor General, who is now visiting countries in continental Europe, has been given a direction by this government that he is the head of state of this nation?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: The Governor General is in Europe on an official visit, obviously with the authority and consent of this government. It might be important to add, however, that the advice of the Queen was sought and that she did give her consent to this trip also.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That still does not answer the question. As for Her Majesty, the Queen, being consulted, she naturally takes the advice of her Prime Minister, so the Prime Minister does not get away from the question by that evasive answer. I ask the Prime Minister: Is the Governor General travelling, with the knowledge of the government of Canada, as head of state? If so, is this another step in the erosion of our monarchical system by the present government?

Mr. Trudeau: It could hardly be that because the head of state, under the constitution, is the Queen—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: —as the right hon. gentleman knows.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I enjoy the Prime Minister's evasive answers, but I want an answer to this question, and Canadians have a right to know. Is the Governor General properly representing himself to be the head of state rather than Her Majesty the Queen who now has received the official imprimatur of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Trudeau: I think the answer can be put quite simply by saying that the Governor General of Canada is travelling abroad in his function and capacity as, and under the title of, the Governor General of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And not as head of state; it is the old game.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

KEEPING OF DOSSIERS ON MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): My question is directed to the Solicitor General. I should like to know whether Premier Campbell of Prince Edward Island was correct when he stated that RCMP dossiers are kept on all cabinet ministers in Canada. If so, are similar dossiers kept on other elected Members of Parliament and, in that case, on which members?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is in order to some extent, though not in the form in which it has been asked. The hon. member is inviting the minister to express his view on whether or not the premier of a province was correct in something he has said, and in those terms the question cannot be accepted.

Mr. Murphy: May I rephrase the question and ask whether or not it is the policy of the RCMP to keep dossiers on cabinet ministers or on any other elected members of Parliament?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I feel the RCMP should treat all Canadians the same way. It does not rest with the RCMP to say that because a citizen is a university professor, or the head of a large company, or a member of Parliament, he enjoys a certain immunity.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General a supplementary question. In view of the fact that some time ago one of the officials of the RCMP indicated to me during a meeting of the justice committee that perhaps there would be files on Members of Parliament in the event that complaints were made by constituents or members of the public, would the minister now advise whether, in the event of such complaint against a Member of Parliament, it is the policy to compile a dossier relating to that member?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker,—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems once again there is some difficulty about the form in which the question is asked. I think that, as asked, it is extremely hypothetical.

Mr. Alexander: May I ask whether, in the event of a complaint by a constituent against a Member of Parliament, the RCMP, rightly or wrongly, would compile a dossier relating to that member?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that what I said in the first instance still stands. The hon. member is asking a hypothetical question, and in those terms the question cannot be asked. The hon. member might find some way to rephrase his question. I appreciate that the matter is an important one, but a question cannot be asked in those terms.

Mr. Alexander: May I ask a further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I am just trying to seek information. Would the minister, at his earliest convenience and preferably this afternoon, indicate to the House and to the people of Canada just what is the policy of the government in this regard?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I certainly do not want to cause difficulty. The question is not quite in order. I understand that the hon. member is asking the minister whether such a statement would be made on motions; I am presuming he is not being asked to make a statement now.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a statement on motions. I feel I have replied to the question and if the member does not understand me clearly, I wish he could be more specific.

[Mr. Goyer.]

[English]

ALLEGED RECOMMENDATIONS TO PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND PREMIER RESPECTING PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN PUBLIC GATHERINGS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. In view of Premier Campbell's statement that the RCMP advised him of the necessity of introducing the public order act in the province of Prince Edward Island, may I ask the minister whether any such recommendations were made by the RCMP to the premier of Prince Edward Island? If so, were these made with the minister's knowledge and consent?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, if this was done by the police authorities of Prince Edward Island, it was done as such, by police authorities that are under contract, but are necessarily employed by the province, and are required to give advice on the requests made by the government concerned.

[English]

SURVEILLANCE OF PUBLIC MEETINGS IN WHICH MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT PARTICIPATE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Solicitor General. Some weeks ago I placed on the order paper a question with regard to the security investigation procedures of that branch of the RCMP. I hope the minister will shortly answer that question. However, at this time I should like to ask him, through you, Sir, whether it is now the practice of the RCMP to photograph, and in other ways cover public meetings in which members of this House as well as civic officials, might participate, as was recently indicated by the premier of Prince Edward Island.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, some hon. members seem to think that they are in the United States. I do not know whether it is the practice or not. What motivates the decisions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the need to take action. There is certainly no systematic policy about citizens. Events lead us. If some methods have to be used with regard to an individual, it is because there is a clear indication that it is necessary.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is obvious that the Solicitor General has today failed to clear up a very important point that affects this member of the House inasmuch as reports in today's papers indicate that possibly RCMP surveillance, and by way of implication some form of intimidation, may in fact be exercised by members of the RCMP with respect to members of this House. I would invite the minister, at the earliest possible date, to clarify any possible danger that this kind of intimidation will become a consistent practice in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is the hon. minister rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Goyer: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I merely wish to point out that no over-all accusation of this sort may be brought, for this would truly amount to irresponsibility towards a department of the government. If the hon. member has a specific case in mind, he should spell it out and I will gladly have it investigated properly.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will recognize the hon. member but perhaps we should move on. This is the third question of privilege we have had on the same matter. The hon. member rose on a question of privilege. The minister raised a second question of privilege and now we have a third. The Chair will recognize the hon. member in view of the importance of this matter, but we should try to make progress.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I want to make it very clear to Your Honour, to the Solicitor General and to other members of the House that I did not indicate that it has now become the practice of the RCMP to give extensive security coverage to public meetings in which members of this House and civic figures may happen to participate.

KEEPING OF DOSSIERS ON MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, so important is this matter to the independence of Parliament that the minister, now having opened the door as far as he has, must let this House know whether or not the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have dossiers on Members of Parliament. This is something that cannot be cleared up by evasive answers. Dossiers are the first step toward the control of the independence of parliament. Will the minister give his unequivocal answer that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, for whom he speaks in this House, have not, and are not continuing to have, dossiers on Members of Parliament? Let that be clear and let the House have the answer.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police enjoys the greatest respect from Parliament and I do not think that Parliament as such has grounds for complaint about the methods used by the RCMP. Some individuals may have such grounds, and I am still waiting for specific complaints to be made.

Now, I find no provision in the law—and if there is, I should very much like to be enlightened about it—to the effect that members of Parliament are not also citizens, that they enjoy complete immunity and that they can do anything. If the House wishes to pass such a provision, the people will think that hon. members constitute a special category of citizens in this country.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I must ask a supplementary question since the last answer is worse than the first.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the right hon. gentleman in a moment, but I suggest to hon. members that there is not much point at this time in having this very important matter develop into a debate. This is still the question period. For the time being, the Chair will recognize the right hon. gentleman who has a supplementary.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is no debate. I asked the minister the simple question: Are there dossiers on Members of Parliament? Members do not expect to be treated differently from anybody else, but Members of Parliament have the right to know whether this government has launched upon a system of looking into the lives of individuals through the Mounted Police.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I said that the department applied no general policy in this respect, and I might add that for the time that I have been Solicitor General, I have not seen the file of any member.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The statement that has just been made and the failure of the minister to answer adequately have left a very bad situation in this House. This is a breach of privilege. I will not bother Your Honour at this time with a review of the privileges of members of this House. I am not referring to privileges in addition to those to which all citizens are entitled but specifically to the privileges of Members of Parliament. The issue raised is the extent to which these privileges are being infringed. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That the whole question of the statement by Premier Campbell regarding dossiers on M.P.'s be referred to a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course the hon. member realizes that he cannot make this kind of motion without first establishing that there is a question of privilege.

Mr. Baldwin: I recognize that, Your Honour.

Mr. Speaker: The matter would have to be considered. The hon. member has sent a piece of paper to the Chair which indicates that he wishes to have this very important matter referred to a committee of the House. If the matter raised is that important, the hon. member would be the first to recognize that it would have to be considered by way of a question of privilege. This is the only way such a matter can be referred to a committee. I am not sure whether the terms of the motion would be appropriate. In any event, the Chair will give the matter some thought. If the hon. member wishes to submit advice to the Chair as to whether there is a question of privilege, this might be done in due course. I should think that would be the time the motion might be moved. In other words, the hon. member is indicating indirectly to the Chair and to the House that he will in due course seek to have the matter referred to a committee by way of a question of privilege. The Chair will consider the matter in this light.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say, by way of a point of order, that Your Honour has custody of the rights and prerogatives of the members of this House. I suggest to you that this is so serious a matter you ought to look into it personally in the next couple of days with a view to ascertaining the facts. You need not reveal them to the House at the moment, but this is something which contravenes every basic principle of Parliament. Your Honour is the protector of the rights—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not for those people over there who say "oh, oh". Those prospective heirs-apparent as parliamentary secretaries who interrupt continuously in this way do not understand Parliament. I suggest to you that this is something deserving of the fullest investigation, which should start with Your Honour, to assure that the kind of uncertain and evasive answers we have had today shall be cleared up by a proper conclusion as to whether or not Members of Parliament are subject to Mounted Police dossiers.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Murphy: On a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to remind the right hon. gentleman on the other side as to who raised this very important point.

FINANCE

DATE OF PRESENTATION OF BUDGET—METHOD OF MAKING INCOME TAX CHANGES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance regarding an entirely different matter. Is he able to tell us when he is going to make his budget presentation? Does he intend to include in that presentation changes to the Income Tax Act, or is he going to take alternative steps to introduce those changes and, if so, when?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I cannot indicate that date at the present time, but I shall do so at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, because of the importance of the situation and the anticipation in the country, can the minister tell us whether before the end of this month he will be in a position to disclose the date of his budget presentation and when he will introduce his tax changes?

Mr. Benson: I shall try very hard, Mr. Speaker. I can assure my hon. friend that it will not be before the end of this month that the introduction will take place, but I will try at the earliest possible date to indicate the procedures involved. As I indicated previously, the problem in this matter of tax legislation is one of drafting. I cannot give a precise date as yet, although I hope to be able to do so in the very near future.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO BY-ELECTION IN RIDING OF ASSINIBOIA

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the date of the by-elections to fill four vacancies in this chamber has been announced, and in view of the fact 35,000 people in the riding of Assiniboia are not represented, is it his intention to call for a by-election in that riding at an early date?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, at an early date.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING BILL—EXCLUSION OF CATTLE AND CALVES

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the fact that over the Easter recess the minister went home and has had the benefit of the thinking of the various cattlemen's associations, can he now say if he is prepared either to move or accept an amendment which would exclude cattle and calves from the ambit of Bill C-176?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. During the question period an hon. member cannot raise matters which are being discussed by the House. The hon. member is anticipating an order of the House. In the terms his question has been asked, it is not in order. Perhaps the hon. member might find some way to rephrase the question, but I doubt that he can find a way to make it acceptable from a procedural standpoint.

Mr. Downey: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister to indicate the attitude of the cattlemen's associations with which he discussed this matter during the Easter recess.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all the views of the various organizations, some pro and some con, are well known to all members of the committee.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND ACT PROHIBITING CERTAIN PUBLIC GATHERINGS—REVIEW BY SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Having seen into what deep waters his colleague the Solicitor General was drawn, can he now advise whether he has given consideration, under the appropriate section of the Supreme Court Act, to requesting a review by the Supreme Court of the Prince Edward Island act to prevent public gatherings?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we would not initiate a reference to the Supreme Court on a matter affecting provincial legislation. If that legislation is to be challenged in any way on constitutional grounds, the courts are open.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, would the minister indicate when, and in what form, this House will be discussing the question of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, at which time the question of the constitutionality of the Prince Edward Island legislation could be discussed?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Soon, Mr. Speaker.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REPORT ON FUTURE PLANS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Further to my question to the minister on April 1, I should like to ask whether he can now advise if he has received the report of the Cape Breton Development Corporation on the so-called master plan for future development of Cape Breton Island, and can he also advise when action will commence on the implementation of such a plan?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I understand that this plan has yet to the formally approved by the board of directors of Devco; once approved—and a study is now being conducted—I will be glad to relay its findings to the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I intended to ask whether the minister intends to table the plan. He continues to insist that he has never seen the plan and knows nothing about it. In light of the fact that the front page of the Cape Breton Post of Wednesday, April 14, carries a complete and comprehensive—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would like to ask his supplementary without making an argument in support of the question.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I have to lay some background for the benefit of the minister who is so vague and at a loss in respect of the whole situation. He does not seem to know where the plan is or if there is such a plan. In view of the fact that this newspaper report is so detailed and comprehensive that it cannot be speculative, surely, members of this House ought to be given—

Some hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Muir: Will the minister now give some information on the report?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister might want to reply briefly. Let me bring to the attention of hon. members that we are running short of time. We have only three minutes left for the question period and a considerable number of members have not had an opportunity this afternoon to ask questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I merely hope, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member will kindly send me a copy of the paper in which the report appeared.

[English]

Mr. Muir: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I should be very pleased to send a dozen copies to the minister if that will assist in stopping this government from playing so fast, so ruthlessly and so callously with the unemployed people of Cape Breton Island where unemployment is now up to 25 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

RAPESEED—CLOSING OF VANCOUVER FUTURES MARKET BY WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE—CONSULTATION WITH MINISTER

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the decision by the Winnipeg Grain Exchange to close the futures market for rapeseed at Vancouver, will the minister inform the House whether or not he was consulted before this decision was taken and whether the action can be attributed to the unsatisfactory operation of the futures market in respect of west coast operations?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I had some discussions with members of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, at least indirectly, about this matter. The explanation, of course, is one which would better come from the exchange than from me. The indication from members of the Grain Exchange was that they thought a single futures market operating on a base in Thunder Bay, with a premium for Vancouver delivery, might in fact lead to a steadier futures situation in the Vancouver market.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary to the question I asked the minister. According to reports we have had, it would now appear that purchases of rapeseed at the west coast can be made only on a spot basis at day-to-day prices, which is a rather difficult operation for purchasers. Can the minister inform the House of the outcome of the meetings held over the weekend in Vancouver in respect of these operations, and has he any plans for establishing a sound basis of marketing and pricing there?

Mr. Speaker: I trust the minister's reply will be shorter than the question asked because there are about 30 seconds remaining in the question period.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have no comment on those meetings at this time.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

SUGGESTED MAINTENANCE OF HALIFAX SAILORS' MONUMENT BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. I have given him notice of it. Would the minister consider having his department take over the sailors' monument at the south end of Halifax so that there will be a properly kept memorial for those Canadian servicemen whose grave is the Atlantic Ocean?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate the interest of the hon. member in this very magnificent monument, but there are no funds in my estimates for such an undertaking. There are quite a few monuments of this kind throughout the country and usually they are looked after by local associations.

BROADCASTING

QUEBEC—JURISDICTION OVER CABLEVISION

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Secretary of State.

Is the minister in a position to give some clarification about the request from the province of Quebec to retain its jurisdiction over cablevision?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I think that the Quebec Minister of Communications gave all the clarifications in his speech and I am not his official agent.

Mr. Beaudoin: I would like to ask a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Is the government prepared to leave to provincial authorities cable-transmitted television programs of educational nature?

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, the position of the federal government in the field of educational television was outlined a few months ago in a comprehensive statement I made on motions and to which I refer the hon. member. It would take too much time to explain once again the whole situation and the agreements we concluded with the provinces.

Mr. Fortin: May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: I shall recognize the hon. member for Joliette and as soon as he has received an answer, the Chair will call orders of the day. The hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the hon. minister.

Since the Quebec Minister of Communications has announced the introduction of a law concerning cable television, could the minister say whether he will soon meet with his Quebec counterpart to discuss this subject, or whether he really intends to let the Supreme Court settle the question?

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the alternative as formulated by the hon. member is a valuable one. I think that there are several other actions that both governments can take, further to personal conversations with a minister and the appeal to the courts. I feel that strategy, on either part, can be much more intricate, and procedure as well. I believe there is a possibility of preventing this difference of views from turning into a fruitless quarrel and, as far as we are concerned, we do intend to use all means to avoid a useless quarrel.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, before the question period began I attempted to gain unanimous consent of the House to deal with the growing concern and apprehension over implementation of the Opportunities for Youth program. Since the Secretary of State may not be here again for some days, and since there is urgency connected with the question, I wonder whether the House would allow the minister to clarify what steps are going to be taken to clear up the uncertainty about the criteria in respect of the program and the adequacy of funds.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the House for unanimous consent to return to motions to allow the minister to make a statement. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on a further point of order, I was not asking for a statement on motions but for a brief indication in answer to my question or a willingness to come here tomorrow to make a statement.

Mr. Speaker: Again, this would require unanimous consent of the House. We have now gone beyond the question period and there are a number of members who have been waiting for an opportunity to ask questions.

An hon. Member: About the same thing.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the importance of the matter raised by the hon. member for Egmont, and perhaps tomorrow he might be given some priority to ask the question and to invite the minister to make a statement.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, can we be assured that the Secretary of State will be here tomorrow because, in view of the half-hearted system under which the government operates, we can never be sure what ministers are going to be in the House?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

PROVISIONS RESPECTING INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT, COMMISSION, BENEFITS, PREMIUMS ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-229 is a bill designed to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act once again, but perhaps for the first time in a more comprehensive manner than has been the case on previous occasions. I do not intend to dwell at any length on the history of the existing act. The proposed bill is a very long bill. I think it would take too much time to cover it adequately. I hope, however, that during the debate on second reading, and perhaps in my closing remarks, I might do justice to this bill which I believe is for the general betterment of workers in this country.

I should like to remind the House that the original Unemployment Insurance Act has been around since 1941, almost 30 years. It has been one of the stable pieces of legislation in this country and has become familiar to all of us. Upon reflection, I think it is one of the most progressive pieces of social legislation ever introduced in Canada. It is interesting to note that back in 1941, when unemployment insurance was first implemented in Canada, the ceiling was at earnings of $2,000 a year. We can see that in 30 years times have changed considerably because even the existing act which we are proposing to amend has a ceiling of $7,800.

Before going into the details of the proposed changes, I should like to mention the work of the standing committee which discussed the white paper that was made public many months ago and tabled in this House, although not necessarily in that order. From that particular committee, which worked for many months and heard, I presume, some 60 odd briefs from labour and management, came, I gather, a unanimous report which was tabled in the House and which includes at least seven recommendations for improvement.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hope the minister does not mind my interruption. He said it was an unanimous report of the committee. I do not want to be placed in the same position as the chairman of the standing committee found himself in some time ago. So there will be no mistake, I must say that the report was approved on division.

Mr. Mackasey: I accept that, Mr. Speaker. I did not want to imply that amendments by any members of the committee would not be entertained. I am not aware of a minority report, but we never are during committee stage and second reading. Nevertheless, in accepting the reservation of the hon. member, I still think the work of the committee deserves some commendation in the House of Commons because, as I recall the events, the committee members were called upon to sacrifice some of the summer holiday period and meet in Ottawa to hear briefs, from labour, management and many different groups of people. Although the report may not be as unanimous, as I assumed it was, it is nevertheless a reflection of the committee's work at its best.

One thing from which we have not departed in this bill is the fact that the proposed new legislation will deal with a specific group of Canadians, essentially those who can be identified as being part of the work force of Canada. One of their basic characteristics, of course, is that they are in the work force but that periodically they suffer an interruption of earnings for a temporary period of time. In other words, unemployment insurance was never intended, nor is it intended, to look after the particular problem of people who are chronically unemployed or who are without jobs for considerable periods of time. These less fortunate people must turn to other programs for the type of financial assistance that is needed. There has been no basic departure from that particular condition.

The bill that is before us reflects to a great degree the recommendations in the committee report by implementing many of the recommendations that the committee made to the House. If there are a few that are not—and I will explain it later when we get back to committee—there could very well be other clauses. It is a lengthy bill. I might say, before I get into the bill itself, that it represents many months if not years of preparation, many meetings of the committee and much consultation with the provinces. As a result of consultation with the provinces there have been one or two changes in the bill which I think have made the bill a better one, for instance as I previously mentioned once or twice in the question period, we are no longer limiting referrals to the Department of Manpower and we are taking advantage of other social agencies across this country that can help people without work. We also indicated that when and if a province were to introduce on the provincial level, and for all residents of that province, features equal or similar to those provided by the new unemployment insurance act in the case of illness or maternity, we would gladly take this into consideration in assessing the rates of the workers in that particular province in order that there may not be duplication, overlapping or double taxation of the individual worker in that province. Particular clauses in the bill make this possible, when and if a province introduces some form of universal health insurance, which would provide income to workers who are out of work as a result of illness.

I think that those members who have been in close touch with the particular problem concerning the Unemployment Insurance Act in the past agree that the benefits paid to workers were very unrealistic if the act was to fulfil its main purpose, that is to help people who are temporarily out of work to find work without having to face the problems of insufficient income during the period of unemployment. In other words, we have substantially increased the benefits to which a person is entitled under the proposed act so there will be a direct relationship between the benefits received and the level of income that he has achieved over a period of time. It has been widely heralded in headlines that everybody on unemployment insurance would draw $100 a week. Of course, this is not true. People would draw two thirds of their income in most cases, with a maximum of $100, and people drawing $100 would be those whose average income over a set period of time was $150 a week or more. So there may be consistently with the proposed tax reform, and with equity of all types, benefits will be taxable in the same way as other forms of income are taxable. This is a departure from the present act. I might remind hon. members that at present benefits are not taxable, but the new benefits will be.

The second change makes universality possible. Universality was one of the recommendations in the Gill report and basically is the cornerstone of this legislation. We have tried, and I do not apologize for this, to make the coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act as universal as possible. We have not included self-employed people for a variety of realistic reasons, one of course being the administrative problems that this would create and another the fact that a self-employed person, has control over his destiny, over his profits and loss. Unemployment insurance is not intended to be insurance against a bad business venture.

[Mr. Mackasey.]

However, we have extended universality by removing the $7,800 ceiling on salaries and generally extended coverage to any member of the work force whose employer we can identify. This includes groups which have traditionally been exempted in the past, such as school teachers, army personnel, firemen, policemen and federal civil servants. These people will be included in the act for the first time. I think this is consistent with social insurance, social policy and social legislation. I would be the first to admit that many of the groups coming in are less likely—I hope for their sake—to ever have to draw the benefits of unemployment insurance than others who are less fortunate. Nevertheless, there will be many people coming in who should have been included many years ago, people who were left out for traditional reasons, such as social workers, casual workers working for different governments and municipalities.

• (4:00 p.m.)

It is significant that of the 1,200,000 who will be coming under the act for the first time, at least 700,000 are earning less than $7,800 at the present time, and only about 500,000 of those people coming into the plan for the first time earn above that figure. From this we can see that there has been unintentional hardship all through the years as a result of our not broadening the coverage to bring in many people who have had to get by as best they could. I refer to the chronically unemployed people and other people who, for one reason or another, have not been covered. This is one of the progressive features of this proposed legislation.

We have received many representations from groups who have opposed the concept of universality, particularly teacher groups. I have appreciated their contributions to the debate. I have met with most of their provincial organizations and, in the main, found that the concept was fairly acceptable to them, although there were exceptions in each group. But Mr. Speaker, there are many teachers who are prepared to come into the plan, understanding that we live not only in a new type of society in which technology can almost make a trade or skill disappear over night, but that in a period of high unemployment across the country the traditional characteristics of unemployment are changed. It used to be the case that the undereducated and the younger people were most affected, but now for the first time people with 20 or 30 years seniority—here I am thinking of people in the railway industry, of architects, engineers and bookkeepers—are finding that they may be threatened with unemployment. I am also thinking of many people who, even ten years ago, could reasonably be satisfied that they would not become unemployed, depending on their seniority and the development of the particular skills they possessed. But that is no longer characteristic of any industrial nation, and unemployment insurance will be of benefit to these people.

I would not want to leave the impression, Mr. Speaker, that all teachers across Canada are prepared to come into the plan, but I am saying that their organized opposition to its universality is not nearly as consistent as it was a month or six weeks ago. That has been due to the many meetings we have had with their responsible representatives, and to the many hours we have spent exchanging views and ideas. Now, I think the dialogue with the teachers centres more around regulations, and ways and means by which the plan can help them under certain circumstances.

I found that statistically almost 70 per cent of teachers are women, and they have absolutely no maternity coverage at all under the present collective agreements. We propose to provide unemployment insurance benefits to those people in the work force who are temporarily without earnings as a result of maternity. This is quite consistent with progress in an advanced industrial society. It is not revolutionary, because many countries around the world have already incorporated this feature into their plans. This is a way by which we can provide some security for the person who must retire from the work force in order to have a child.

I think that before we get too smug about women in the work force, we should realize it is a sad commentary that at least one million women in the Canadian work force are in it not because they want to buy a second automobile or a coloured television set but because their income means the difference between poverty and survival. When, in such instances, a woman is deprived of her income as a result of maternity, this creates a terrible hardship. I am hopeful that drawing unemployment insurance, after a two weeks waiting period, for at least 15 weeks will help the working mother.

Another reason for the proposed increase in benefits stems from the fact that many Canadians today drawing unemployment insurance must also draw a welfare cheque in order to support themselves and their families. There are very many Canadians who just manage to survive on two cheques, their unemployment insurance cheque and their welfare cheque. I do not want to bore the House with a great many statistics at this stage, but when the legislation is being examined by the committee we can provide full statistics for hon. member's who may be interested in them.

By increasing unemployment insurance benefits substantially we will affect savings of some $80 million under the Canada Assistance Plan, $40 million to the federal treasury and $40 million to the provinces. At this stage I am not going to bother breaking down the amount with respect to each province. This depends on the rate at which they pay out welfare, but the increased unemployment insurance benefits will mean that for the first time many Canadians will not have to live on two cheques.

Further, Mr. Speaker, the increase in benefits will postpone the day when people chronically unemployed must turn to welfare if they have no other sources of income. It can be said that the benefit structure has been developed by people who care about people. The argument that this will breed laziness, that it is catering to lazy people, is an argument that should not be raised in this chamber. But, Mr. Speaker, it is an argument that we hear too frequently. It is said that people are inherently lazy. That has not been my experience. Tests made in New Jersey indicated that even people living on a guaranteed income, everything else being equal, will seek work if at all possible. In fact they prefer to work rather than live on a guaranteed annual income, and I do believe that the overwhelming majority of Canadians in the work force would prefer a job rather than unemployment insurance or welfare, if they have that choice.

Universality, Mr. Speaker, will make it possible to reduce the contributions per week. At the present time a person earning $100 a week pays $1.40, and incidentally has no tax deduction for that $1.40 if perchance that person never draws unemployment insurance. It is now proposed that the rate be adjusted to somewhere between 80 cents and 92 cents, depending on the statistics that we are now finalizing. In any event, there will be a fairly substantial drop from the $1.40, and in addition the contribution will be tax deductible in the same way as are medical expenses.

Perhaps I am rather disjointed in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, because I am not following my text closely, but one thing about which I am most excited is the financing of the plan. What we propose to do in the main, is to limit the cost of the plan, up to a particular threshold which I will discuss in a moment, to the employer and the employee. The question of collections and that type of thing will be transferred from the Unemployment Insurance Commission to the Department of Revenue. In other words, on his T4 slip a person will receive a record of his contributions for tax purposes, and also for tax purposes a record of what he received. But what intrigues me about our format, so far as financing is concerned, is that the employer and the employee both will be paying their share when unemployment in the country is under the level of 4 per cent. This is the threshold that we have decided, and in a little while I will explain why it has been set at 4 per cent and not 3 per cent or 5 per cent, above which the state will contribute. But to that point, the employer and the employee will finance the plan.

Once again, and perhaps this has been due to lack of communication on my part, there has been the mistaken idea circulated that people with eight weeks contributions paid will get 44 weeks benefit. I have heard this said on radio and television by some well meaning people. It has also been said that a person with 20 weeks attachment in the work force will draw 52 weeks benefit. This is not the case. What a person with eight weeks attachment, between eight to 15 weeks attachment, will be eligible for is benefit for 18 weeks, and the person with 20 weeks attachment will draw 25 weeks benefit.

At the end of the eighteenth week when this normal benefit has run out, the probability of the person being re-absorbed into the work force will be assessed according to basic criteria, and part of the criteria will be the rate of unemployment in the country and the rate of unemployment in the specific region in which the person lives. It is logical to expect that with a 2 per cent unemployment rate, a draftsman in Toronto or an engineer in Newfoundland has a better chance of being absorbed back into the work force than if the unemployment rate were 5 per cent, 6 per cent or 7 per cent.

However, I repeat that it is following that assessment that we extend the 18 weeks benefit in movements of six weeks, depending on the deviation of the national rate of unemployment from the figure of 4 per cent. In other words, if the rate of unemployment across the country is 6 per cent, as it is now, this will extend the 18 weeks by 12 weeks.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Automatically?

• (4:10 p.m.)

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, sir. Then, of course, if you are still unemployed we would take into consideration the regional rate. The purpose of this is logical. It is sound insurance. We are insuring not what happened in the past; we are insuring the probability of your being reabsorbed into the work force and we must take into consideration the economic conditions of the country at the time.

Those hon. members who know more about economics than I, and I suppose that includes almost all hon. members of the House, can appreciate the effect that an injection of approximately $100 million for every one, per cent of unemployment in this country can have when we reach this particular plateau. The financial critic of the New Democratic Party would understand something that has evaded economists for years, the mechanism by which we can inject into the economy and into the hands of people who have a propensity to consume and spend, the money that is necessary when the economy needs stimulating. That is not hard to do. The problem has been to retrieve the money when the economy has been booming and when too much money has been in the economy. This feature of the bill will make this possible. If the rate of unemployment happens to be 6 per cent, that will mean an injection into the economy by the government, through the unemployed people in this country, of approximately $200 million. However, if unemployment were to drop to 4 per cent, by shortening the benefit period under which people are entitled to unemployment insurance, we will remove from the economy approximately $200 million.

Many features of the plan can be criticized objectively. I expect this and welcome it. On balance, I think these are all questions of degree. Should the waiting period be two weeks, or one week, or no weeks? We think it should be two weeks. We set two weeks because of the master plan we had in mind. We considered the cost of the plan and the need to provide maximum benefits at the lowest possible cost to the Canadian worker, particularly since he will be partly financing this plan. That has been one of the considerations. If you were to reduce the waiting period to zero, the cost would be astronomical. At two weeks we think the cost will be bearable and will permit us to build in this two thirds relationship as between benefits and a person's actual income. It is very easy to criticize or take objection to certain specific features of the bill. I only hope that hon. members who are here will approve of these changes, suggest modifications and improvements and try to look over the bill so that we can come up with the best possible legislation for Canadians.

There have been the usual criticisms, Mr. Speaker, that unemployment insurance is welfare in disguise. It never has been that and it was never meant to be. We have attempted to close up the unintentional loopholes that previously permitted welfare connotations to creep into the plan. One of the weaknesses of the present structure is this: it has been difficult for people legitimately in the work force for the first time to become identified as legitimate members of the work force. After you leave university or high school or teacher's college and enter the work force for the first time, you must be part of the work force for two years and accumulate by a tortuous formula 30 contributions—hon. members know all the rest of it—as well as so many contributions in the last year before you are eligible for any type of assistance. We propose to reduce that period. We shall consider someone as attached to the work force if that person has as few as eight weeks of contributions. I say that because we are interested in the future of that worker and not in his past history. I think this will be of tremendous advantage to the Canadian worker. This is his fund.

I have heard people saying, and read editorials to this effect, that after a contribution of $1 or $10, say, a person can draw $5,200. I could make a similar argument about the man who buys insurance on his home today and sees it burn down tomorrow, or about the poor fellow who buys life insurance today. It is small consolation for the widow to hear, "Well, your husband invested $50, and you got $10,000 four days later." Of course, the whole concept of insurance, which I need not explain to hon. members, is the pooling of risks. This is what we are doing. Of course, there will be some of these cases. However, our plan is actuarially sound in general and we know it.

I have mentioned pregnancy, Mr. Speaker, and we do not apologize for the inclusion of that feature. One of the greatest unintentional abuses under the present plan has stemmed from the fact that women who were about to have a child, as is their right, have gone to their employer and said, "I am sorry but I cannot continue working because I am expecting a child." In more cases than we realize, the well meaning employer has falsified the reason for that woman's dismissal. Then, the lady, either through the mail or by visiting the local office, will say, "I have been laid off owing to lack of work." She could begin drawing unemployment insurance and, unfortunately, in many cases draw it for 52 weeks. Now, we are making it possible for an employer to be honest. He can fill out a declaration that Mary Jones is retiring from work temporarily because she is to have a child. She does not have to falsify the reason for quitting and she need not feel like a criminal. She may go to the unemployment office and draw exactly what she is entitled to, 15 weeks coverage—that being nine weeks before the termination of pregnancy and six weeks after.

I think the inclusion or recognition of sickness as a legitimate reason for drawing unemployment insurance is long overdue. May I remind hon. members that, at the moment, if you are dismissed on Friday and establish your claim at the local unemployment insurance office on Monday then fall sick on Tuesday, you can draw unemployment insurance. On the other hand, if you fall sick between the day on which you are laid off and the moment of establishing your claim, you are ineligible. If you become sick and are laid off for that reason, you are not eligible. What we are saying, to simplify the matter, is nothing more than this. If you are laid off as a result of sickness, we are willing to weigh the conditions under which you can draw unemployment insurance if you are ready, willing and able to draw unemployment insurance. We will be prepared to recognize the fact that, because of a legitimate illness, you will not be able to work during the prescribed period of between two and 15 weeks. I think that all those who have looked in horror at this plan will understand that this is logical.

Another source of unintentional abuse has been seasonal benefits. As of November this year, seasonal benefits will be eliminated. These have been a source of abuse in a sense that many people were drawing unemployment insurance in our harsh winters who were not supposed to be drawing it. This plan is part of a total, social plan and is directed towards and earmarked for that particular group of Canadians who have contributed to and are normally part of the work force. The payment of seasonal benefits, as most hon. members know, stems from nothing more than a relaxation of the normal rules and regulations that apply during the rest of the year. We are paying unemployment insurance benefits in the winter months to many people who cannot really say that they are legitimate members of the work force. There are people who have collected stamps or the necessary attachments 24 months ago, say, and they can take advantage of the loophole. In addition, of course, seasonal benefits are no longer needed because one has only to be attached to the work force for eight weeks to qualify. This is basically the logic behind dropping seasonal benefits. I think, and I may be mistaken, that even if the present rules are relaxed a person must have 15 weeks of contributions to be able to draw seasonal benefits now. There may be some variation of that formula. Now, people will be able to draw seasonal benefits if they have a period of eight weeks of attachment to the work force.

Another source of abuse—and I use the word "abuse" in the sense that it can be demonstrated that the group I am about to refer to draws an awful lot of money out of the plan in comparison with the amount it puts in—has to do with people who are over 65. We have discussed this with many of their representatives. People drawing the Canada Pension Plan or the Quebec Pension Plan have indicated to all of us that they are prepared to withdraw from the work force. Many such people in all probability are drawing the old age pension, supplemented by some payment, I suppose, which is based on a needs test. They could very well be drawing a company pension as well. We do not feel as some felt in past periods of Canadian history, and I am referring to 1940 when the act was brought into force and to subsequent decades, that the average person over 65 should be forced to work. The Canada Pension Plan was introduced to make it possible for senior citizens to live in dignity. We now suggest that people who are over 65 and drawing Canada Pension Plan benefits are out of the work force. If they remain working they are not obliged to pay unemployment insurance premiums, but when they cease working they will not draw unemployment insurance. The relationship between their other pension plans and the unemployment insurance benefits they may draw is something we can discuss at the committee stage.

I made a promise in the white paper which I will repeat today. The fishermen will remain in the unemployment insurance plan until such time as a suitable plan is brought forward by another minister that is acceptable to their representatives and which in effect provides some form of insurance for these people. I am not talking about all fishermen. Many fishermen are easily identifiable as legitimate employees. I am talking about employer fishermen, the type who share their catch, but who have been identifiable by regulation as being employed. We will continue this until such time as a suitable alternative plan is brought in through legislation which is acceptable to the fishing industry.

Mr. Douglas: Will the minister permit a question? The minister has quite properly stressed the principle of universality. I think the new group being brought in represents a forward step. I ask the minister why we are then taking the backward step of taking the fishermen out of the unemployment insurance. I appreciate his statement that some other plan will be introduced. What is the rationale behind removing the fishermen from the Unemployment Insurance Act?

Mr. Mackasey: I do not want to get into a debate on the little issues. The rationale is that at the same time as I am bringing in this plan, I want to eliminate as much as possible anything that can be considered as having a welfare connotation. This is one of the legitimate criticisms of the plan across this country. Incidentally, anything that may be considered to be a welfare insurance plan becomes available when the government pays the cost rather than the employer and employee. I am not talking about fishermen in general but only a particular group, fishermen who can be identified normally as adventurers or self-employed people in the same way as self-employed machinists or self-employed lawyers. Many fishermen can be easily identified as self-employed.

A problem arose. Some of them earned $20,000 a year, but the bulk only earned a subsistence income. Ways and means were found which, in effect, stated that despite the fact that someone was classed as an employer, for the purpose of drawing unemployment insurance he is an employee. We are trying to be consistent in our approach to universality in the sense that we are trying to extend universality as widely as possible to people who can be identified as being employed, and identify that person's employer. This is not quite true of fishermen who sell their catch to a broker or dealer and, as part of the payment for the catch, ask the dealer to act as an employer for the purpose of providing coverage in stamps. I do not think the fishermen are particularly happy with this arrangement, but it has been traditional. It has been the tradition for 12 or more years. I made it quite clear in the white paper that we intend to continue this practice for the time being.

I do not know if and when an alternative plan satisfactory to the fishermen will be introduced. I have no way of knowing. I have given my assurance, and do so once again, that despite our efforts to reduce the welfare connotation, we are not going to eliminate the fishermen from the plan until we are satisfied that we have an alternative. By the strict definition of the act, they are employers, entrepreneurs, adventurers or whatever you like to call them. Again, my remarks do not refer to normal fishermen, people who work on trawlers and are easily identifiable as working for someone else.

Mr. Barnett: Will the minister permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The Chair allowed a question previously without any request to the Minister of Labour. We are not in committee at the present time. I invite the Minister of Labour to indicate whether he wishes to answer more questions at the present time.

Mr. Mackasey: I would prefer not to, Mr. Speaker. There will be an opportunity to discuss this feature in greater detail. At that time, I will be able to be more specific. I will have the facts and figures. As I am not using a text, I hate to be interrupted and then have to start all over.

There are two areas which are very important. I do not think I have emphasized them as much as I should have since the white paper was tabled. I refer to the implementation date of the act. Essentially, the implementation date of the act is January 1, 1972. I doubt whether anyone has a copy of the white paper in front of him. I do not.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister like my copy?

Mr. Perrault: He knows it all by heart.

Mr. Mackasey: No, I do not. As hon. members know, the implementation date is important. We do not want half the people in the country to start thinking that, commencing July 1 they will be eligible for unemployment insurance. The concept of universality comes into existence on January 1, 1972. This is an important point. New entrants will start contributing January 1, 1972, and be eligible for benefits as soon as they acquire the proper attachment to the work force.

What will happen in the interval between July and January? As some of the more learned members of this House know, this is a complex problem. The present rates are established, not in a haphazard manner, but in ranges. Those earning $100 a week are paying $1.40 and those earning $150 a week are paying $1.40. When it comes time to receive benefits, these benefits are calculated on the value of the stamp rather than what was actually earned. Administratively, this is very easy. Everyone with a $1.40 stamp receives $53, plus 10 per cent. In the transitional period between July 1 and January 1, there will have to be some adjustment of the rates for this short period for people earning over $100 but below $150. This means an upward adjustment of a few cents a week, not only to establish the actual salary, but to get ourselves on a sound financial basis. On the other hand, we will have to adjust the rates downward for those people earning $100 a week or less.

Because of administrative reasons, because we are turning over the collection and so forth to the Department of National Revenue and because the tax features only come into effect in January, 1972, any benefits drawn between July and January will be non-taxable. They will be at the new rate. In other words, benefits will be two thirds of the wages. They will not be subject to tax, therefore the contributions will not be tax deductible. I think this is a very fair adjustment during the transitional period which will be a very difficult period for the department.

On January 1, the Department of National Revenue will be seized with the responsibility of collections and keeping the records of contributions. This will eliminate many of the problems which create delays. People with three, four or five years attachment to the work force discover with horror when they come to our office that there is no record of their contributions. This is because they have not assumed their own obligation. They do not keep their record of employment which they receive from their employers. They do not keep these slips. Some may have worked for six different people. We have to help build the record for these employees. This takes weeks. All these delays should be eliminated.

Mr. Douglas: From July 1 to January 1, which eligibility provisions will apply, the present ones or the ones in the new act?

Mr. Mackasey: I will check the white paper to be sure. I am a bit confused. I have asked my parliamentary secretary to check it. I think it is the new provisions. If someone presently in the plan established a claim before July 1, it may be better to re-establish a claim with their new eligibility rather than the old. I think upon reflection I am correct in saying that the new provisions will apply for the present group of people, including the new benefits as well as a slightly revised structure of contributions for the present group of people for the period between July 1 and January 1, 1972.

• (4:30 p.m.)

This is joined to a concept of universality. The only people who may not be in the plan, and be identified as employees, are public servants of the various provinces. At the present time, public servants of the provinces, civil servants, if you like, are in or out depending on the whim of the province concerned. The present act makes their entry optional. In some of the provinces, at least, I shall not specify them, we get all the bad risks in a sense—we get the casual workers or the people who have no permanence. What we are saying now to the provinces in the new law is that there are no more options—either you are in, or you are out. The province then has to face the responsibility and the financial burden of providing some form of remuneration in respect of all employees, including those presently in the plan. In the light of the fact that collectively the provinces will be saving $40 million under the Canada Assistance Plan, it seems inconceivable that any one of them would wish to remain outside the plan, but as the bill is designed they do have that right.

I have pressed the provinces to say whether they are coming in or not. My communications so far have all been verbal in nature; I am meeting with the ministers of labour on Thursday and Friday hopeful that I shall be able to get firm decisions from some of the provinces on whether or not they intend to include their public servants.

Since the figure of 4 per cent has attracted a good deal of attention, I imagine somebody is going to suggest that the government has determined 4 per cent to be an acceptable rate of unemployment in Canada. Well, it is not my criterion. Like everybody else, I believe the acceptable rate of unemployment is the least possible rate. This is what we should be working toward. This should be our goal as a country. Our system is really on trial if we cannot operate on the basis of lower rates of unemployment than have been traditional, particularly in the light of the fact that the working force is growing at a tremendous rate. We have used the 4 per cent figure because 4 per cent, according to our computer estimates, triggers the government's contribution to the fund at a realistic level. If it were lower, the government's injection would need to be extremely massive, so massive that some form of additional income by way of taxes would be required. Five per cent would practically eliminate the government's contribution. So, we think 4 per cent is a realistic figure.

However, I am sure that when the rate of unemployment is running at 6 per cent the economists who work with the government planning fiscal and monetary policy cannot be immune to the thought that these additional two percentage points mean $200 million of injected capital into the economy, money which must be found somehow. So we have not set the figure of 4 per cent as an indication that the government is regarding it as an acceptable rate of unemployment for the future. The Economic Council suggested 3.8 per cent, and years ago it suggested 3 per cent. However, I am not interested in that debate. The 4 per cent happens to be a convenient point at which the government's injection of money into the plan is triggered. It could easily have been 6 per cent if 6 per cent would in some way provoke the government's participation at a realistic level. But it is interesting to note that over the last decade the rate of unemployment in Canada has hovered between 4 and 5 per cent on an average. This is due, I suppose, to many reasons which we do not wish to debate today—at least, I do not.

I believe I have covered most of the aspects of the plan. I now await the participation of other hon. members and later, perhaps when I close the debate on second reading, I may cover some of the points I have missed. We are bringing in a plan designed to increase benefits, reduce contributions, extend the period of benefit and make the plan much more acceptable. Maternity and sickness will be recognized as legitimate reasons for drawing unemployment insurance. Under certain circumstances, extended benefits will be paid for entirely by the government. The plan will be financed mainly by the employers up to the 4 per cent level of unemployment. When assessing the period during which workers are entitled to benefit we shall take into consideration not only the national rate of unemployment but the rate in the particular area where the worker lives. This can be considered in more detail during the committee stage. Admittedly, the waiting period would be extended to two weeks but, on the other hand, we have for the sake of simplicity got away from using the word "stages". We now refer simply to two phases, regular benefits and extended benefits. Reference to stage one, stage two, stage three and so on, was proving complicated. We speak now of two phases only, regular benefits and extended benefits. I think this is much simpler and hon. members will probably be able to understand the process a little better.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I know the entire country has been awaiting an explanation from the minister of this extremely important piece of legislation.

Many people have complained that the type of measure before us today is not concerned with unemployment insurance but, rather, with welfare. The minister has sought to explain that it is not. There are many who believe it to be a means of transferring payments made by people who would perhaps never—I use the word with some hesitation, because one cannot be sure—be in a position to draw benefits under this plan. The position taken by the teachers comes to mind. I know the minister has encountered some difficulty with them, indeed, all Members of Parliament have done so, in consequence of the argument that teachers enjoy security of employment. In this connection, it occurs to me that in the past month or so certain events indicate that the conclusion the teachers have reached in this regard is perhaps without good foundation. We have heard of provinces and local school boards in various parts of the country crying out because of the increased costs of education, and giving every indication that they intend to hold the line.

The minister will no doubt begin telling me how much the provinces and the cities will save as a result of bringing schoolteachers into the scheme. I do not quarrel much with him in this regard since I believe the universality of the program will in the long run benefit the schoolteachers themselves. What concerns me more is that this proposal seems to be an unwarranted intrusion upon the jurisdiction of the provinces in the field of education. I refer particularly to the Province of Ontario. It appears that if and when the legislation before us takes effect, and I am sure we all believe it will, since, after all, there are 155 members of the other side—

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): There are 160.

Mr. Alexander: We are whittling them down. In the near future, on May 31, they hope to bring themselves back to strength.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): You are right.

Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Alexander: I am engaged in a serious debate. I should like to point out that in the province of Ontario—I can only speak for this province as a result of information received—school boards will be facing, if numbers continue to remain constant until 1975, education costs of $3,319,000 in 1972, $4,917,000 in 1973, $6,639,550 in 1974 and $8,299,230 in 1975. This will reflect a corresponding increase in the level of contributions of employers in the province over that period.

The minister says that, having had several discussions with the provinces, everything now seems to be all right in terms of legislation emanating from the white paper, in view of give and take on both sides. In the long run, he says, we have now satisfied the provinces. I am just wondering whether this is the fact. Is the province of Quebec quite satisfied at this particular time? Similarly, is the province of Ontario quite satisfied? The great cry in Ontario now is "cut education costs". I do not want to be partisan but there are politicians in all parties who want to reduce the cost of education today.

I suggest that with this plan the minister has usurped provincial jurisdiction. Perhaps not intentionally, of course; knowing the charm of the minister, he just would not do that intentionally. Perhaps his officials were unaware of the importance of the problem of education costs. Many people in the province of Ontario and in other provinces too, and I say rightly, are asking how the federal government can do what it proposes to do. The people in the city of Hamilton are not only concerned about the cost of education in the year 1972; they are also concerned about what this cost means by way of increased property taxes. They realize that the system is antiquated, but nevertheless they can see no direct relief in sight.

The province is also concerned because it is attempting to hold the line on education costs. Members of all parties admit this. On the other hand, the minister is now involving himself in a matter about which, I am afraid, we shall have to have more definite answers, Mr. Speaker. Either the provinces know what sort of situation they are getting into or they do not. The minister has stated that the provinces will be glad to join the plan. I see the minister shaking his head. I understood the minister to say to the provinces that by getting into the plan now, and bringing in teachers, the government is going to save them money in the long run because they will not be required to devote any funds to welfare, at least to any great degree.

Mr. Mackasey: Would the hon. gentleman permit me to clarify something that I may have said unintentionally, so that he may continue his speech in the right vein. Whether or not the provinces come in has nothing to do with the school teachers. I do not want to leave the inference that the provinces are satisfied to come in as employers of public servants. The provinces have been satisfied with the changes in this bill. In so far as the department of manpower is concerned, whether the teachers come in or not has nothing to do with the provinces.

[Mr. Thomas (Moncton).]

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the minister is only partially correct, but I am sure he realizes that the moment we start increasing school board assessments the provinces become directly involved. This is all I am saying. As a matter of fact, there are some provinces that, because of peculiarities in their legislation, will be able to opt out as far as the teachers are concerned. Although I cannot put my finger on any province right now, one or two provinces hire teachers directly. I think they are New Brunswick and Newfoundland. So, you have the peculiar situation that some provinces that are concerned about rising school board costs would be able to opt out. At the same time, the province of Ontario is paying something like 56 per cent of education costs, and if all goes well is going to increase its participation.

This whole question is so interwoven with the government's unemployment policy and its fiscal and monetary policy that I would be remiss if I did not bring home to the minister several factors that I think he chose to ignore. He kept strictly to his act and said he would not become involved with government fiscal and monetary policy, a policy that has created hardship for a great many Canadians. Now, the minister becomes the shining knight charging into the fray, declaring that the solution is to pay benefits of $100 a week to those who can qualify. The minister is quite right; not everybody will receive the $100 a week, and these payments will not come into effect until January 1, 1972. A man would have to make $150 a week before being entitled to unemployment insurance of $100 a week.

The minister was fair to point out something that the media neglected to mention, I think, namely that the moneys received would be taxable. This is extremely important, and I am glad to have the minister repeat it. I know my hon. friends to my left will have something to say in this regard. Make no mistake about it, Mr. Speaker: we are for the principle of unemployment insurance. When the minister was explaining how interruptions in earnings can be carried further in terms of sickness and maternity benefits, I was surprised that he did not mention our senior citizens in that regard.

Mr. Hales: Yes, he did.

Mr. Alexander: Then, perhaps I was busy with something else at the time instead of paying strict attention to the minister. We recall that the Liberal government set out to curb inflation by creating mass unemployment. They did this by adopting a tight money policy which pushed interest rates sky high, increased taxes, limited the supply of new money, discouraged commercial building in certain provinces, placed severe restraint on federal spending, froze civil service hirings and lowered tariff barriers to force Canadian products to meet stiffer competition from outside.

In my opinion, these measures have not enabled us to win the battle against inflation, though in December 1970 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said:

> We have won last year's victory, the one against inflation. It is obvious from the statistics of the past two months that inflation no longer exists in Canada.

When we see that during the first quarter of 1971 inflation has soared upward by 1.2 per cent and unemployment remains uncomfortably high at around 6 per cent, this is quite a victory. The continuing large number of persons who are unemployed during 1971 points to a stagnation of the Canadian economy. The cost of the programs that the government insists on bringing in to revamp the entire social welfare system, whether people like it or not, will have to be met by many of those people who are starting to question government spending. I am just wondering who is going to have nerve enough to stand up and tell the government it must cut its spending and also cut taxes. I am wondering what would happen and how much support one would receive across the country. The outlook for 1971 would appear to be an unemployment rate fluctuating around the 6 per cent mark, a level we in this party find unacceptable, plus a cost of living index which will hit 4 per cent over the year if the present rate of increase continues.

The continuing large number of persons unemployed during 1970 and 1971 has a long-term dimension as well. The extremely rapid growth of the Canadian labour force requires the creation of an immense number of new jobs, about 1.3 to 1.4 million by 1975 to attain the full potential of the Canadian economy. To get this number of new jobs, the Canadian economy will have to grow at a rate in excess of 6 per cent per year. Dr. Haviland, a senior economist with the Economic Council of Canada—I am sure the minister is aware of him—has stated that a growth rate which taps the full potential capacity of the Canadian economy, about 5.25 per cent a year, is needed just to prevent existing unemployment from worsening. Since 1967, the Canadian economy has not been growing toward its full potential.

What I am trying to say is that a higher priority must be placed on the expansion of the economy in order to provide a higher level of employment throughout Canada. Only in this way can we develop a sufficient tax base on which the government will be able to finance the social programs it is attempting to implement at this particular time. We have made suggestions in this regard. We must get the economy moving. We have talked about the 3 per cent surtax and the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. We have talked at length about the white paper on tax reform. We are pleased to note that as a result of the dogged efforts of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) now has second thoughts about many areas of that white paper on tax reform.

We are all waiting now to find out just what the minister has in mind. We cannot continue having programs suggested by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) and others, which will increase taxes to the average Canadian. I understand the Minister of Finance wants a big chunk of the worker's dollar. I do not know how much we can spend. I wish these ministers would get together in order that we might know the combined total of their requirements. We might then have an attitude as to how much the Canadian people can stand. I have in mind taxation from the municipal level right through all levels of government in all the provinces and the implications of such taxation. I also have in mind taxation on the part of the "big daddy" who perpetually wants to put his grubby hands into my pockets. We, as politicians, are going to have to start taking notice of what is happening.

We must create a climate in which we can have full employment, or employment in the neighbourhood of the level suggested by the Economic Council. What does the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) have to say about this? Let me quote from an article by Richard U. Needham dated April 5, 1971 under the heading "The gospel according to Pierre".

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Alexander: I heard someone laugh, and I do not know what he is laughing about. I hope he is going to get up later on and make his own speech rather than sit there needling me. I should like to know what you have to say, knowing you come from an area which is sufficient in terms of work people. I want to know whether you think it is all right that we should have an extension of unemployment—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should address the Chair.

Mr. Alexander: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, I got carried away. Let me return to this article headed "The gospel according to Pierre" of April 5, 1971. I quote from this article in which Mr. Needham states:

> —Pierre Trudeau stated them with exceptional candor at Niagara Falls over the weekend, telling an audience of businessmen that they would have to become accustomed to the idea of large-scale unemployment—"if you want a highly developed technological society, you will not easily get full employment."

And then Mr. Needham goes on to state, and I refer this, through you, to my hon. friend:

> One might comment on this that Japan and West Germany have full employment—over-full employment—in a highly developed technological society. Both these countries have far more jobs standing open than they can fill. One might also ask whether Canada is, or has prospects of becoming, a highly developed technological society; aren't we still by and large, producers of raw and semi-processed materials? But let it slide. What Mr. Trudeau is saying is that we must accept high unemployment rates (right now, one worker in ten) as a necessary part of life.

I was prepared to think that the Prime Minister was attempting, in all seriousness, to say something in depth. Let me again quote from this article:

> Finally, we must note the Prime Minister's suggestion that people should not be compelled to work; they should do so only as, when and if it suits them. He agreed that Ottawa could use young Canadians (rather than West Indians) to get in the harvest; or it could send them to Northern Ontario, where the mines need workers—"We can do this if we are willing to do away with a free society. But if you have a free society, you will have a tendency for unemployment to rise."
> The message is clear. Where people are free not to work, free to be supported without working, a rising number must be expected to make use of that freedom. They will constitute a new leisure class, which the rest of us—the minority, it would seem—must accept; and not only accept, but maintain. Such is the Canadian future, as our Prime Minister sees it. Such are our new values, our new way of life. The prospect may well depress the middle class, the tired and worried people working the treadmill. Keep at it they must, no one's going to support them, they aren't even offered the alternative of the gas chamber.

That is the end of my dissertation on the comments of Mr. Needham.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this might be an appropriate time to interrupt the hon. member. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Veterans' Affairs—Suggested maintenance of Halifax Sailors' Monument by department.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions and public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PROPOSAL FOR GUARANTEED MINIMUM INCOME

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the possibility of passing a law under which every Canadian citizen, who is without work or other source of income, would receive a guaranteed minimum income as a way of recognizing, in a special fashion, the dignity, the value and the economic rights of the human being, in the context of the economic life of the nation, that the amount required for the payment of the guaranteed minimum income be derived from the national product so as to increase neither the taxes on individuals and companies, nor the cost of living, nor the price of any product or service; that this measure could, with advantage, replace the contributions and payments of all the systems of unemployment insurance, social welfare, family and personal allowances, Canada Pensions and Quebec Pensions, that the economic recognition of the guaranteed minimum income would be to the greatest advantage of all the citizens of Canada, and, at the same time, would be of great benefit to all the principal sectors of the national economy.

Mr. Speaker, I wish at the outset to quote statistics to show the importance of the problem we are dealing with.

According to poverty distribution in Canada in 1967, 18.6 per cent of Canadian families and 39 per cent of people without dependents had an income below the poverty level, namely $1,740 in the case of person without dependents and $2,900, $3,480, $4,060 and $4,640 respectively for families of 2, 3, 4 and 5 persons or more.

When considering special classes, more than 500,000 people over 65 years of age have an income below the above-mentioned levels. Moreover, there are about 180,000 disabled people who are in need, between the ages of 18 and 65, and nearly 200,000 mentally retarded youngsters under 18.

There is a total of about 150,000 mothers who bring up alone 330,000 young children and more than a third of those families have an income below the above-mentioned level. Almost 25 per cent of the 3,500,000 families with children under 18 are below the poverty level.

About 30 per cent of the unemployed people have a low annual income which classifies them as poor people. That becomes all the more serious at a time when there are more than 700,000 unemployed.

In face of such a problem, what is the solution offered by this government? The minimum salary was increased, but that does not concern unemployed people. They tried to increase family allowances in favour of the poor. However, that money was taken away from families whose income was in excess of a certain amount and that was done regardless of the taxable income and in making all family allowances taxable. We have seen an increase in the guaranteed income supplement to the old age security pension, but the basic pension has been the subject of no worthwhile change.

In fact, people who receive only this pension will find themselves worse off than before since only the supplement will be escalated.

Then the white paper on tax reform brings this messing round to a climax trough taxation of the income of those able to meet their own needs.

Under such a policy, this government takes away from one in order to give to the other. Accordingly we are witnessing, instead of an integrated income security system beneficial to everybody, an equalization of revenue prejudicial particularly to the middle classes. Considering the solutions resorted to by the governments up to now, one can readily see that no federal government ever dealt with the most important problem, that of garanteed minimum income. This is the solution that we of the Ralliement créditiste have been advocating for a long time, that is a solution which would recognize the dignity, the value and the economic rights of the human being.

Although we are convinced that such a system would be easier to implement under a Créditiste government, we believe however that it could be done under our current outmoded financial system. One fact is obvious: the present income security and welfare system does not work too well. The temporary changes repeatedly made by the government can only lead to chaos with a multiplicity of programs solving no specific problem. Under such circumstances, administration costs and disorders created by various administrations are also multiplied. That is why we are proposing the consolidation of all programs against poverty into a guaranteed minimum income. The guaranteed minimum income we are proposing is not directed against the honest workers now heavily taxed to ensure the livelihood of certain citizens whose only work is to deceive overworked social welfare agencies which are poorly equipped to separate legitimate claims from others.

We advocate the implementation of a minimum guaranteed income plan which would permit the government to set the tax exemptions at the appropriate level, which would permit the individual to keep his dignity, the unaided woman to take care of her child, and each unemployed to maintain his essential standard of living as long as he is jobless. Finally, we are advocating the implementation of a guaranteed minimum income plan which would keep our senior citizens and many other individuals from having to beg to live.

This plan would first fill the gap between the individual's income and the poverty line. It could be improved as our society goes forward. Obviously, the guaranteed minimum income concept is neither new nor original. It seems that most Canadians are in favour of it. All the opposition parties in the House have indicated they were in favour of this policy as well as several government members and some ministers.

Outside the House, other groups have advocated the concept of minimum guaranteed income. Almost all provincial governments have asked the federal government to establish it. Recently, the Castonguay-Nepveu Commission in Quebec has recommended a minimum guaranteed income of $2,000 for each individual, $3,400 for a couple and $405 for each child.

In January 1969, the Canadian Welfare Council stated that a program aimed at providing an adequate guaranteed income for all Canadians should be established as soon as possible. It has been noted that there is no right more important than an adequate income. We must introduce immediately that socio-economic objective in our system of values.

Likewise, the American committee for economic development has supported the setting up of a minimum guaranteed income based on need alone with concrete incentives for those who could work.

Colin Hindle in a study for the National Bureau of Economic Research has noted that a minimum guaranteed income system would be from 30 to 40 per cent more efficient than the present system which is aimed at fighting against poverty through various programs.

The hon. senator Croll, Chairman of the Senate committee on poverty, has been asserting for a long time that we should do away with this system and replace it by the guaranteed minimum income plan.

To these individuals and groups can be added several others, but because the government is opposed to it, we can only rely on grass-roots support.

In November 1970, delegates to the Liberal convention voted 659 to 187, and 117 abstentions, in favour of an income maintenance program to replace the present social security schemes. Furthermore, they asked through a vote of 594 to 250 that such a program be implemented before January 1, 1971 for all those whose income is below the poverty level as established by the Economic Council of Canada.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) replied that a guaranteed minimum income plan would be too complex and too expensive to administer.

Since the National Council of the Social Credit Party of Canada gave almost unanimous support to this proposal at its convention two weeks ago, and notwithstanding the right hon. Prime Minister's analysis of this plan, I now wish to seek hon. members' support so that the motion I have introduced be accepted, since it is also the right of the people of Canada.

The implementation of this measure can be considered in several ways. Since this government has many bright minds in its employ, I would let it up to them to take a stand and to select the most efficient way to allow Canadians to have a share in the consumption of goods and services which, for fiscal 1970-71, will exceed $80 billion.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): The motion before the House this afternoon, as put by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin), refers to the desirability of a guaranteed minimum income for all people in this country. The interesting part of this proposal is that he suggests this should be done without increasing taxes, causing inflation, or any change in the cost of goods and services. A few moments ago he referred to the ability of government technicians and people in the civil service, who have all the facilities to study this problem and come up with a solution. I respect the ability of our civil service, and I am sure that they are very capable, but whether they can pull this off and provide a guaranteed minimum income without increasing taxes is a large question.

The hon. member also suggested in the motion that this plan could replace our whole system of social security, including our old age security system and many other plans, including the Canada Pension Plan. Motion No. 31 calls for the establishment of a government program to provide a guaranteed minimum income to every Canadian citizen who is without work or other source of income as a way of recognizing the dignity, the value and the economic rights of the human being, in the context of the economic life of the nation. The motion also indicates that the funds required to finance such a guaranteed minimum income should be derived from the national product in a way which would not increase taxes or the cost of living or the price of goods and services, and that the proposed scheme should replace the wide range of government measures which provide income security payments to individuals and families in Canada.

In speaking on this motion, I would like to talk about the concept of the guaranteed minimum income first, and then say something about the suggested means of financing this proposal, followed by a discussion of the general proposition advanced in this motion that a guaranteed income program could replace certain of the existing income security programs such as the unemployment insurance and the Canada and Quebec pension plans. The concept of the guaranteed minimum income means that the state ensures that all of its residents are guaranteed a basic minimum income each year below which the income of no person should be permitted to fall. This does not mean that there should be a uniform income floor for everyone, for the concept envisages that the guaranteed minimum should be related somehow to the amount of income needed to purchase a minimum standard of living. Accordingly, the income floor can be varied to take into account differences in family composition and differences in relative need, depending on whether individuals or families are living in a high cost or low cost area and whether they are living in a rural setting or an urban area or a large metropolitan area such as Montreal or Toronto.

The concept of a guaranteed minimum income is a very intriguing concept and has stimulated considerable interest in recent years in Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom and elsewhere. The use of the guaranteed minimum income technique has been advocated by many people in all walks of life, representing both the right and left in our social and economic thought. Some are opposed to social welfare and see the guaranteed minimum income as a better alternative to the present mixture of social security programs, and one which will provide what they consider to be a more realistic system at considerably less cost. I must say that this is the thought being expressed in motion No. 31. However, at the same time, when we were debating back in December the old age security amendments and the amendments to the Guaranteed Income Supplement, it was widely reported by people in the Department of Finance that the guaranteed annual income system, even at the poverty line level established in 1967 by the Economic Council of Canada, would cost an extra $2 billion to be raised out of taxes from the general population. However, others regard the present social security system as inadequate and wish to have income support considerably expanded and extended. Still others see the guaranteed minimum income as a simple, efficient and final solution to providing income support to people in need. Most of us think of this as a new concept.

The concept of the guaranteed minimum income is not a new one. A scheme of guaranteed minimum income was used in England from 1795 to 1834 to subsidize the wages of agricultural workers in that country. The poverty of agricultural workers was serious, and no relief was possible under the Poor laws because they provided relief only to the sick, the disabled, the widowed, the aged and the destitute, but not to workers who were poor. The authorities were very concerned about the stories of violence among the peasants in France during the French revolution and tried to find a remedy. The solution became known as the Speenhamland system. In 1795, a group of magistrates met at Speenhamland in Berkshire and decided to make up the wages of agricultural workers to a subsistence level which depended on the cost of bread. They drew up a scale by which each poor and industrious person should receive enough income support to bring his wages up to three shillings a week for himself and one half of this amount for each other member of his family. This was at a time when the cost of bread was one shilling. As the price of the loaf of bread increased, the guaranteed minimum was increased accordingly.

This system, which became known as the Speenhamland act or system, was adopted by one county after another until it covered most of England except for the extreme north. The system had many unfortunate results. Wages were kept low, employers had little incentive to raise wages when they were being subsidized under the Speenhamland system. All workers, productive and unproductive alike, were treated on the same basis, and there was little incentive to work hard because all received the same wage regardless of work effort. Many people objected to the system because it was said to make workers improvident and lazy. Others contended that the system encouraged large families. The rates were inadequate to support a minimum living standard because they were based on the price of bread and not on total needs of families. These other needs increased relatively faster than the price of bread, and the allowances no longer provided a minimum level of subsistence. Finally, the cost of providing this subsidy became so heavy in the latter part of the period that the allowances were reduced and became less and less adequate in relation to the cost of living. The system was finally abandoned in 1834.

The concept lay dormant for many years. In World War II, a guaranteed minimum income was proposed for England by Lady Rhys-Williams. Her scheme proposed a universal payment or social dividend to everyone in England, provided for recovery of this payment from persons and families in the higher income classes through the income tax system, and suggested that the welfare system as it existed then be replaced by the social dividend.

An approach similar to the scheme proposed by Lady Rhys-Williams was suggested for Canada by a Canadian industrialist, D. B. Smith, in the Canadian Tax Journal in 1965. Under his approach, which he called "a simplified approach to social welfare" he suggested a social dividend payment of $1,000 for every adult over 21 years of age and $200 for every person 21 years of age and under. Smith reasoned that the Canadian welfare system could be rationalized by adopting his approach and eliminating present welfare programs and other income support measures. The cost of the scheme, $12 billion, would be financed by a special 40 per cent tax on personal income, while other government services would be financed by other taxes.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The approach suggested by Lady Rhys-Williams and D. B. Smith is what is known as the social dividend approach to the guaranteed minimum income. Under this approach a payment is made to all persons in the country, which may be differentiated by the age of the recipient or by some other factor, depending on the purpose and function to be served by the scheme. The financing of the costs involved would be carried out using a tax on income. The tax rate could be flat, or there could be progressive rates and, depending on the purposes of the guaranteed income program, these could apply from the first dollar of income, or from income above a prescribed base. Because payments under this universal approach will be high, a high rate of tax recovery will need to be applied. Normally, this approach envisages the replacement of all other income security schemes. However, this need not happen as such an approach could guarantee a basic income for all, even though other income security programs continued to function.

The social dividend approach integrates the income security system with the income tax system. An example of the social dividend approach is the old age security pension. This pension is paid to all persons satisfying residence rules who are aged 65 and over. The pension benefit is taxable, and is recovered from pensioners liable to pay income tax not at a special rate of tax but at the normal tax rates that apply on taxable income.

The other approach to the guaranteed minimum income is the negative income tax approach. This approach involves the making of cash payments by government to families and individuals whose incomes fall below a prescribed income level. This level could be the level at which a person would be liable to pay income tax, or it could be another level of income which is either arbitrarily determined or calculated because it bears a relationship to the amount of income needed to purchase a minimum standard of living. And as the hon. member for Portneuf mentioned, the Economic Council of Canada set the poverty line at something like $1,740 in their 1967 report.

Benefit payments can be calculated in a number of ways. In the pure negative income tax approach, benefits could be calculated on the basis of the unused tax exemptions and deductions to which the person would be entitled in determining his taxable income. Other variations offer a benefit based on the gap which exists between his actual income and the income level which corresponds to the minimum standard of living. The negative income tax approach normally involves a prior determination of eligibility in order that the benefit may be calculated.

Whatever technique is used, the guaranteed minimum income attempts to provide a person or a family with sufficient income to achieve a minimum standard of living. I suppose this is what is intended when the motion refers to "every Canadian citizen, who is without work or other source of income, would receive a guaranteed minimum income as a way of recognizing, in a special fashion, the dignity, the value and the economic rights of the human being, in the context of the economic life of the nation."

Many of the features of the guaranteed minimum income are excellent, and have advantages over the approaches under existing income security programs. Using this technique, benefits can be directed so as to provide large benefits to persons in the low income categories. Payments can be made on the basis of an income test and this would overcome the social stigma normally associated with welfare payments. Beneficiaries are not forced to undergo the social degradation of having their incomes and assets scrutinized and their way of life examined.

But while the approach has a number of advantages there are also a number of problems and limitations associated with it which cannot be overlooked. One of these factors is the cost of such a scheme. The motion suggests that the plan be put into effect by financing it "from the national product so as to increase neither the taxes on individuals and companies, nor the cost of living, nor the price of any product or service." This would be possible if certain of the existing schemes of income security were abolished and replaced by a guaranteed minimum income, provided the costs of the new guaranteed income scheme did not exceed the costs of the plans which it replaced, either at the time that the transition occurred or in the foreseeable future.

In this circumstance, we would be faced with the question of what type of guaranteed minimum income could be implemented, and of determining how adequate this scheme would be. Consequently one would need to ascertain which programs could be replaced, how much money would be released, and with this budget constraint decide who should be covered by the guaranteed minimum income plan, and what level of benefits could be provided. If minimum incomes can be provided so as to ensure a minimum standard of living within the constraints just mentioned, then and only then could you say that you had met the requirements as set out in the motion for financing such a proposal. However, if coverage is not complete enough and if benefits are not sufficient to provide a basic minimum, then obviously costs will rise, taxes will increase, and quite possibly prices will rise in the future as well.

I contend that a guaranteed minimum income plan cannot replace all of the guaranteed income plans now existing. Consequently, the amount of funds released will not be sufficient to finance a guaranteed minimum income plan which will provide a minimum standard of living. Costs will increase, taxes will rise, and prices will increase in consequence. This brings me to the final point with which I want to deal, the question of replacing other income security and social security measures with a guaranteed minimum income scheme.

One of the important questions is whether the guaranteed minimum income will replace in whole or in part, or supplement the present social security system. The existing social security system has evolved slowly over time in response to emerging social and economic needs. Programs have been designed to provide solutions to underlying social and economic problems, but the extension and scope of plans for development have often been limited by availability of financial resources, and by more urgent and important priorities for other areas of government spending.

The present system is not perfect, but it is a good system which is continually being improved as social and economic conditions change over time. The proposed changes in the White Paper on Income Security with respect to the guaranteed income supplement, the family incomes security plan, the Canada Pension Plan and the Canada Assistance Plan are examples of such changes. These will go a long way toward improving the social security system now and in the future. The existing structure cannot be slightly tossed aside in favour of a technique which is largely theoretical, and as yet untried in practice except in certain limited areas, unless there is a considerable amount of research and investigation into all aspects of the guaranteed annual income. Furthermore, the existing system provides health and welfare services as well as income support, so that the guaranteed annual income could only replace in whole or in part those programs providing income support.

With respect to possible replacement of existing income maintenance programs it is doubtful whether a guaranteed annual income could replace all income security programs. A program such as unemployment insurance, which we have been debating this afternoon, is designed to provide income for short-term unemployment to all covered members of the labour force regardless of annual income. It replaces temporary wage loss due to unemployment without requiring recipients to have less than some subsistence level of income to qualify.

The Canada Pension Plan and the old age security pension programs have as one of their objectives the provision of income support to aged, disabled and widowed beneficiaries regardless of their other income. Workmen's compensation is designed to provide for income support and health services arising from work-connected accidents or industrial disease. Consequently, the effect of introducing a guaranteed minimum income program on existing programs needs to be examined closely in relation to the social and economic objectives being served by many of the existing social security programs.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I speak for just a few moments in support of the motion of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin). Although I am not aware of all the complexities of the guaranteed income plan, which certainly is a complex idea and will need a great deal of further study, I think it is a worth-while idea to put before the House. At the same time I would point out the need of another group of people in this country, a group we all seem to have forgotten. I refer to those who are disadvantaged in Canada. One need only visit the poverty-stricken areas of this country to see how great is the need for guaranteeing a decent income in order to provide these poor people with the means for a basic existence.

Today in this House, Mr. Speaker, we were discussing unemployment insurance. We have legislated recently in respect of the old age security pension and veterans pensions. However, for some reason we have ignored those people who cannot work because of incapacity. There are provincial assistance plans in existence. Neither those nor the Canada Assistance Plan cover the needs of the people to whom I refer. We also have massive housing programs to which the government proudly points. They exist all across the country. We are told that the interest rates are low and that down payments are low. But there are people in this country who cannot afford even these low down payments or any rate of interest however low it may be. They cannot afford any kind of home and are forced to live in hovels that embarrass anyone who has seen them.

These people, Mr. Speaker, cannot invest one copper in an attempt to provide accommodation for themselves. They are the people of this country who cannot move. Some of them do not have legs and some are blind. We continue to expound about the wonderful assistance programs that we are introducing in Canada and all the while we ignore those who most need assistance. I have received many letters from people across the country who are existing on welfare. All they want to do is work and perhaps catch a little fish in order to augment their income, and they are not able to do so because of our system.

We have committees like the Senate Committee on Poverty which went across the country for a couple of years at a cost of $1 million. We have councils like the Canada Welfare Council looking into the problem. The government has given money to various organizations which are involved with the poor and try to show us what is needed to assist the poor. All the time, however, the poor remain poor and nobody here seems to want to do much about it.

Although I agree with the guaranteed income concept which the hon. member has suggested, it might be too early for such a program to be instituted. At the same time, I think we should help the people of this country who need our help. We should help the poor. No matter how one considers the gross national product should be divided, we must help our poor people.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased that this motion is before the House because it gives us a chance to discuss the important question of the guaranteed annual income and its relationship to poverty. Sometimes I think that the idea of the guaranteed annual income is an example of misplaced humanity. We may be making a great error in thinking that we can solve all our social problems by instituting a guaranteed annual income. I agree with hon. members who preceded me and I agree particularly with the mover of the motion. I agree with their sentiments and their concern for the poor. In my intervention I shall try to deal with the point: Can we really accomplish the worth-while objectives referred to, through a guaranteed annual income?

Without doubt, those who are old are entitled to their pension. When a person reaches a certain age he ought to be given his pension. There is nothing wrong with our present system that more money would not cure. There is nothing wrong with the idea of an old age pension helping those who are old. What is wrong is that the old age pension is not large enough. Pensions like the old age pension need to be larger. We need to enlarge them instead of talking about systems as if systems alone will solve anything. You need money to help the old and you must devote certain resources of the country to this end.

In many ways we are short-changing the aged in our society. We debate the form that the assistance should take. They do not care what you call it. They do not care whether you call it a demogrant or a guaranteed annual income. The name does not matter. What counts is the amount of money they get with which to buy medicine and with which to obtain the relaxation to which they are entitled after a lifetime of devotion to their country and paying taxes.

We could do a great deal more through family allowances. It has been my experience that people in this country are poor for one of a number of reasons. One major reason is children. Often people are poor when they have more children than they can support. Others are poor as a result of old age or illness. Surely we can take care of these problems through family allowances and larger old age pensions. We could take care of the problem of children by increasing taxes for some and by recognizing how much it costs to raise children.

In our market system we do not take into account a man's needs. The market system says, "We do not care about your responsibilities. We do not care how many children you have. This job is worth so much, and that is what you will get." The single man without any responsibilities except his girl friend, and the married man with a wife, children and other responsibilities, are paid the same salary for doing the same job.

The family allowance is a transfer of money and recognizes the failure of the market system to take into account the needs of people. The socialist, of course, believes in this sort of thing. He does not talk about paying people more than they are worth. He believes that when people need things and are entitled to those things, they should obtain them as a matter of right because they are human beings and members of society. But that is not what the market system says. We need a way of compensating for the absolute inhumanity of our market system which says that no matter what your needs are, the job pays so much and that is all you will get.

We can do a great deal simply by improving our approach to family allowances. We should do a great deal more for those who are obviously ill and who cannot work. We could do something for them simply by giving them a disability pension and by recognizing that they are not in the labour market. If they cannot work, we should pay them a disability pension of decent dimensions. To some extent we have done this sort of thing with our veterans allowances. I agree that the war veterans allowance is not the most perfect instrument in the world, but at least in giving veterans this allowance our approach to them has been far more worth while than has been our approach to society in general.

I think the time has come for us to treat members of society generally in the way that we have treated veterans under the veterans allowance approach. Veterans are paid an allowance when it is recognized that they are not capable of doing certain work. Sometimes they are partially disabled and we pay them a pension for life. We should let these people go into the labour market and earn more money, if they want to, without taking away their pension in the form of graduated income tax.

There are many advantages to the demogrant system. Under it we can make social value decisions and judgments about all kinds of things which we think are important. We can decide the kind of transfers that ought to take place as between one group and another in order to bring about a society with greater justice than at present. The system has great flexibility. Transfer payments that are made should be made on a universal basis and without the means test.

If the old age pension is paid to a millionaire, we can take back the amount paid by way of income tax. It seems to me that the approach we have adopted to the old age pension is good. The old age pension scheme is probably one of the best schemes ever devised in this country. The remarkable change that has taken place among the older people of Canada is attributable to the old age pension. I think it is the kind of program which ought to be continued. We ought to concentrate on making similar payments under a demogrant system.

I do not believe there should be any payment to those who are capable of working or being in the labour force. I think that such payment would be a total disaster for our society. I want to give Your Honour two reasons for saying that. I am very suspicious of governments which hand out welfare and try to cover up welfare with economic policies that are mad. The economic policies of this country have gone mad. There is no substitute for full employment. That is where our emphasis should be. There should be jobs for those who are capable of working. We should not back off that goal one iota. There should be a program of income supplement for those who are not in the labour force for one reason or another. For those who are capable of working, there should be full employment, training and mobility programs. Unemployment insurance should be available to take care of short-term unemployment or transfers between jobs.

The guaranteed annual income has become a motherhood thing in this society. I became suspicious of it when I discovered that the extreme left and the extreme right agreed on this program. I asked myself if it were possible for the left and the right to agree on the program. Was this program so desirable that it warranted such universal approval?

An hon. Member: Strange bedfellows!

Mr. Saltsman: Strange bedfellows is right. I think it was the extreme right, not the left, that was right. I suspect that the argument for the guaranteed annual income consists of simply shrugging your shoulders and saying we will always have some poor and some misfits. The argument is not to worry about changing or retraining them. The basis of much of our charity is to simply pay them off. As in any kind of production, they argue that we must expect a certain amount of loss which is to be written off. I refuse to write off any human being.

If a person is capable of being retrained and improving his position, we should concentrate on this instead of putting him on pension. People should receive a pension if they are old or ill: no one argues against that. However, if they are capable of joining the labour force, jobs should be available for them. The situation is something like motherhood. Motherhood can be a great joy and blessing, but it can also be a curse. Excessive motherhood can be an excessive curse.

We have to be careful with all these programs. I might not have said some of these things 20 years ago when we lived in a society which was very much work-oriented. We had a strong Calvinist tradition. That is changing. Our society is not as work-oriented as it once was. To say that we can depend on the work motive to overcome people choosing welfare rather than work is less true today than it was years ago. It is good that it is less true today. In my time we were too work-oriented; we were inclined to say that work was an end in itself rather than a part of life.

The situation is more difficult today. At one time work had some meaning. People took pride and satisfaction in the creativity of work. This is becoming more and more difficult in our modern society when we push buttons or file fenders as they go by on an assembly line. Work is just plain, dogged hard. A person receives little joy or satisfaction from standing in an assembly line eight hours a day working in tune and in time with machinery. The young people today want meaningful work. Who can blame them? They want work in which they can express themselves. While they have the desire for more expression and meaning, work is becoming less and less that way. There are fewer and fewer opportunities for people to develop and express themselves within the context of the factory system.

Another structure is developing in our society of which we must be aware. There are classes in every society, although many people would like to ignore this fact. The traditional class has been the working man against the entrepreneur. There have been classes of religion against religion, race against race, free trader against protectionist and resource industries against manufacturers. We have always had these groups.

We now have another group which is overlaying our whole traditional structure. At the first level of this group are the young, those who are attending school and not yet in the labour market. There are more and more of these people. They are staying in school for longer and longer periods of time. At the other end of the scale are the old. There are also more of them. As we improve our approach to medicine and science there are more opportunities for people to live longer and enjoy life more.

In the middle is the group that has to pay for both ends. That group is becoming relatively small in comparison with the one at the beginning and the one at the end. There is a limit to what this group is prepared to bear in the way of taxation at any given time. This is something that we must face. I wish this group would be willing to pay for anything we want, but there is a constraint. We have been lavishing far more of our resources on the young than the old.

Our old people are getting short-changed. We must do something about this situation. Young people are remaining in school beyond the point of real education or training. They are kept off the labour market because the government has not been able to solve simple economic problems such as providing employment opportunities. They are being kept in cold storage, which is very expensive. They are being kept in school beyond any real necessity for keeping them there. If we had all the resources in the world, and if the question of cost and resources was not involved, we could say "So what" and let them stay there as long as they like. However, if in order to keep them there we let the position of the older people, the poor and the sick deteriorate, we are wrong. The young have many years ahead of them. Those at the other end of the spectrum have only a limited time. To say that we will solve the problem 20 years from now is of no use to them. They are entitled to our consideration and compassion. The old are entitled to a fair distribution of the wealth of our society.

We are faced with a very great problem in the sense that we live in a society that has wealth side by side with indescribable poverty. This is our shame. Something must be done about it. My plea is that if we decide to do something about this situation, we do not go for slogans, fancy language or forms that have appeal but we take a hard and realistic look at the problem. We must develop our resources in order to provide full employment. If not, we will not do very much. We must concentrate on sound economic policies, something which this government has not done for the past few years. Once we have sound economic policies, we must make a value judgment of their importance in order to help the old and sick in our society who are most in need of our compassion.

Mr. Joseph-Philippe Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my remarks on this subject by commenting on certain observations made by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). I do not believe it is necessary to go back almost three years, when this government came to power, to demonstrate the concern it has shown for those in receipt of the old age pension and those who have to live on low incomes generally.

Within the last few months the government has brought in legislation pertaining to a guaranteed income supplement. Old age security benefits have been increased, veterans pensions and allowances have been increased and increases in unemployment insurance benefits are, of course, currently under discussion in the House. Changes designed to benefit many people are being undertaken in the family allowance program, and the Senate, through one of its committees, is currently considering this aspect of the subject.

[Translation]

However I would like to refer to the remarks made by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin). In fact, the principle of a guaranteed annual income is extremely attractive and has raised considerable interest particularly in Canada and the United States.

Many people from all ranks of society and representing the right as well as the left have advocated a guaranteed annual income plan as a novel means of income support. Some of these people are opposed to social assistance, but they consider the guaranteed annual income a better system than the various social security programs being implemented at the present time. They add that this system would cost less and be more realistic. Such a project has also been advocated by many other people who consider the present system as inadequate and would like a much larger income support to be provided.

Even though the principle of a guaranteed annual income has recently been much publicized, it is not a new idea. Several aspects of a guaranteed income plan are excellent and advantageous compared to the measures now in effect to maintain a certain level of income.

Indeed the system allows for bigger payments to families and people with lower income, and would cost less than some existing social security programs. Certain amounts can be paid subject to a simple means test, which does away with the feeling of shame often associated with welfare benefits.

This method does not require that potential beneficiaries submit to the degrading procedure of a means test, an assessment of their assets, their standard of living, measures provided for by provincial systems which fall partly within the scope of the Canada Assistance Plan. Although those benefits are important, the plan entails certain inconveniences and limitations which must be questioned. Too often, those who advocate the adoption of a guaranteed income know nothing of the obstacles, or, if they are aware of them, they choose to ignore them or minimize their consequences. It might be useful to speak about the problems related to the use of the guaranteed annual income plan as a means of income support.

One of the important questions is to know whether the guaranteed annual income will take totally or partially the place of the present welfare system or if it would be added to it. The present plan was slowly developed so as to meet social and economic needs. Programs were established in order to bring solutions to problems, but their scope was often limited by financial resources and the importance of other budget items.

The present plan is not perfect, but it is a good one and it is improving as social and economic changes take place. It is not possible to give up inconsiderately the present structure for a new and mostly theoretical formula, since it has been tested only in limited areas, without conducting a considerable amount of research and studies on the various aspects of the guaranteed annual income. Furthermore, the existing system provides health and welfare services, while the guaranteed annual income could only replace, in whole or in part, the programs providing financial assistance, and even in such cases, it is not sure that the guaranteed annual income could replace them all.

We find, for instance, that the unemployment insurance plan is designed to provide workers with an income during short unemployment periods, whatever their annual income. Benefits temporarily replace the loss of income caused by unemployment, without requiring that the income of the recipients be lower than the vital minimum.

The Canada pension plan and the social security system have another object, that is to assist the old, the disabled, widows, whatever their income may be.

The workmen's Compensation Board aims at meeting financial and medical needs resulting from accidents or industrial illnesses.

This is why the establishment of a guaranteed annual income system, under existing plans, should be closely considered, keeping in mind the economic and social objectives of the present social security system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The private members' hour having expired, I now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

[English]

Perhaps I may be allowed to express my personal regret at losing a good companion and seatmate in the popular and effective former member for Brant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): At the same time, I should like to offer congratulations and best wishes to Jim Brown on his appointment to the bench of the province of Ontario, where I am sure his fairness and good judgment will continue to be of service to the province.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, you speak for all of us.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

PROVISIONS RESPECTING INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT, COMMISSION, BENEFITS, PREMIUMS, ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackasey that Bill C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to preface my remarks by indicating how appreciative I am of the attendance of the minister this evening. I do not like to pat him on the back to any great extent—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Pat him a little lower down, then.

Mr. Alexander: —but it shows that he, among very few of his colleagues, not only started the debate on this bill but wants to hear the views and submissions, and I think constructive criticisms, of the members of this House.

When I was speaking at five o'clock I was giving the House some indication of the Prime Minister's attitude to working and not working. This leads me to ask what this piece of legislation will do for the people in the Atlantic provinces where presently exists a situation of chronic unemployment due, I contend, to the policy of the government. Its regional expansion program, according to what I have heard in this House, is not the best legislation, nor is its implementation benefiting to any great extent those people in need.

Unemployment figures as at the end of March indicate that in the Atlantic region there were 70,000 people unemployed. This is why I continually emphasize the fact that if the development of this great nation is to go forward, the main priority should be that government policy ensures that as many people as can be absorbed into the labour force are given gainful employment. I cannot help but re-emphasize that in order for us to raise sufficient funds to achieve this objective we must have an adequate tax base.

There are several sections in this bill raising questions of interest and concern and calling for deep consideration, not only by members on this side of the House but by members on the other side. Unemployment insurance programs should maintain a proper balance between providing temporary income maintenance and facilitating reabsorption into productive activity. Therefore, with all due respect to the arguments of the minister, I question whether the reduction of the qualifying period to an eight-week attachment to the labour market is practicable in view of the probable abuses that this will encourage. Further, such a short period of time does not indicate even a strong seasonal attachment to the labour force.

I should like to know why the minister picked on the period of eight weeks. Would not 12 weeks have been more in keeping with creating incentives to enable people to help themselves? The reduction of the qualifying period to eight weeks would be of little assistance even to the growing number of young persons with no experience who are neither eligible for unemployment insurance benefits nor for retraining programs. It is significant that the white paper and the legislation which follows it is silent on this very important matter.

I think we have to create a climate wherein employment is available. Unemployment is not unemployment when it is self-induced, self-inflicted or a matter of choice. I suggest that the eight-week period should receive close examination because I believe there are many people in Canada concerned about this aspect of the legislation. Just imagine, Mr. Speaker, a person becoming eligible for benefit under the Unemployment Insurance Act after a minimum period of eight weeks. As the act now stands, people qualify if they work 32 weeks out of 52, though I stand to be corrected on that. I should like to know why there has been such a big reduction in the period, and I hope the minister will provide an answer. We feel that it is a disincentive, that it will stifle initiative and, most important and lasting, it will encourage people to take the attitude: Why should we work, when the government will look after us? This is an attitude taken, not by the majority of people but by too many of the minority.

We may be able to make some improvement in this particular area. In this regard I should like to draw the attention of the minister to an article that emphasizes very graphically the point I am trying to make. I refer to an article that appeared in the Globe and Mail on Thursday, September 24, 1970. I should like to read it in depth because it illustrates the thinking of many people in connection with the new unemployment insurance legislation. The article reads in part:

> The flaws in Mr. Mackasey's proposals are more basic. He appears to have made little effort to separate the seasonal worker, who does not expect year-round employment, from genuine members of the labour force. There are many seasonal workers, who do everything from packing apples to picking tobacco to serving as clerks during the Christmas rush. Many of these people not only do not expect to work full-time, they do not want to. What is more, they can never expect to pay enough into the insurance pot to balance what they will withdraw from it. Therefore they are not insuring themselves against unemployment; they are taking a cheap ride on the backs of those who are.

This is a point that concerns many people and it is why I feel the eight-week period must be examined closely. The article continues:

> Mr. Mackasey proposes far too easy access to benefits, which are already too accessible to seasonal workers. The present plan requires 30 employment weeks in the previous two years to establish eligibility for benefits. The new plan would provide some benefits after eight weeks of work in the previous 52 weeks and full benefits after 20 weeks in the previous 52.
> Plainly the need is to separate seasonal jobs from full-time jobs, with only the latter being insured. Income supplements to seasonal workers should be provided as welfare on the usual means test; and those seasonal workers who work only for pin-money would not receive benefits at the expense of the real work force.

That is the bone of contention, whether in fact the eight-week period is consistent with the initiative and desire of a person to become a productive member of the work force. We have to give this question consideration. I was impressed when the minister indicated that he would like higher benefits to be paid at this particular time. He then became concerned with the administrative hang-up and was not able to bring himself to accepting a suggestion the opposition has continually made. Because of the gravity of the situation we have suggested that these people should be collecting more money at this time. In view of the unemployment induced by the government, it is amazing that the minister could not see his way clear to do this now instead of waiting until some time in July.

I remind the minister of the gravity of this situation by stating that at the end of January, 1971, there were 844,000 claimants, some 26 per cent more than the 672,000 registered for benefits a month earlier, and 28 per cent more than the January 30, 1970, total of 659,000. We are talking about a significant number and saying there is no technical or legal reason why increased rates should be withheld until some time in July, 1971. I hope that when the minister replies, after listening to several speeches, he will give us a better reason than he has given so far as to why he cannot implement the suggestions we have made, thus alleviating some of the pain, suffering and hardship of those who are confronted by unemployment.

We have argued for an acceleration of the implementation of the new rates, and continue to do so. The government has admitted responsibility in the area of cyclical unemployment, and since the new act suggests that the government assume the costs of financing when the unemployment rate exceeds 4 per cent, it is reasonable that the government should accelerate its program to respond to the present employment crisis. The urgency of the unemployment situation in terms of numbers and the present inadequate level of benefits, keeping in mind the recent cost of living index, suggests that moral considerations at present far outweigh bureaucratic ease of implementation some time in July.

There are other matters in this bill and I will touch on a few of them. My colleagues in this part of the House will elaborate and perhaps bring home several points which because of time I will not pursue. I should like greater elaboration in respect of the self-employed. As far as I am aware, no argumentation is made by the minister for this categorical exclusion. Since the proposals of the white paper are designed to broaden coverage rather than restrict it, a better explanation from the minister is required.

Of course, there are difficulties to be encountered in the inclusion of the self-employed. However, it would be sheer intellectual and moral laziness by the government to exclude the self-employed rather than attempt to surmount these difficulties. Unemployment insurance is basically a plan of income maintenance. Consistent with the philosophy of the Carter report and the tenor of the white paper on tax reform, which call for taxation from all sources, the white paper on unemployment insurance and the ensuing legislation with which we are now dealing should be concerned with the maintenance of income from all sources. Here we get a picture of universality once again.

However, the insurance principle militates against the inclusion of self-employed persons per se because no effective regulations have been established to screen those who have voluntarily severed self-employment. In many situations the integrity of the fund demands the exclusion of the self-employed where checks against fraud are totally lacking. Nevertheless, it is my respectful submission that the government should make a serious attempt to develop regulations for inclusion in the legislation so that the insurance principle will not be endangered and the principle of income maintenance can be properly extended. Also, they must be more precise in that endeavour. The Canadian economy is far more interdependent than the government seems to imagine. For many individuals, the semantics and characterization of self-employed are extremely misleading. By far the majority of those who are today called self-employed, whose annual income is derived from a form of self-employment but whose self-employment clearly depends upon a third person, could easily be incorporated into the act with the aforementioned considerations in mind. These are the "franchisees."

I was very impressed when the minister first started to deal with this bill. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) posed a question to the minister. The subject was of vital concern and I thought the minister would see his way clear to explain the situation. He indicated it was a marvellous suggestion but not one he had heard just recently. He indicated it was being considered and that he hoped to delve into the matter and come up with some answers.

Let me indicate to the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that "franchisees" would include taxi drivers, gas station operators, chain food and entertainment operators, life insurance salesmen, door-to-door salesmen, farmers under supply management, etc. The franchise factor would be quickly ascertainable by the commission, allowing it to determine whether the applicant had lost his franchise or had surrendered it; whether he has been laid off or had quit. I think this is probably what bothers the minister, although I know he is always concerned about constructive criticism. I hope he has second thoughts, because we intend to talk about universality. The suggestion is that 96 per cent are covered, which means that 4 per cent are not. A reasonable suggestion is that this 4 per cent represents the self-employed or the "franchisees" who are deserving of more consideration than the minister and bureaucrats have given them.

I should like to touch upon another controversial issue, the experience rating factor. This is a highly controversial and ill-advised proposal of the new act, at least as far as I am concerned. The proposal is to institute experience, or what is more commonly called merit rating, whereby adjustment of employers' contributions may be applied according to their record of lay-offs. The government has made no final decision on the proposed formula for determining merit rating to establish contributions by employers. The Commons committee suggested it be judged in accordance with the industry involved. Whatever the formula, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully state that I will not accept in any way, shape or form the proposal of experience or merit rating, whatever the term may be.

The arguments presented by the white paper is really attractive rhetoric. We have heard many comments on this question both pro and con. There was some merit in the arguments of those who were against this type of proposal. The white paper suggests that the introduction of experience rating will more properly allocate the cost to employers according to their lay-off pattern as well as serving as an incentive to create more stable employment patterns. No one is quarrelling with such motives. However, I should like to re-emphasize what is said by the Gill report as well as by many economists and representatives of both employees and employers. They state that this type of involvement requested by the minister is an ineffective and counter-productive tool to accomplish the aspiration of stable employment pattern. I think it is necessary to refer to the Gill report and place some of the thinking expressed there on the record. The minister and I had a little discussion about this matter and he said, "This report is not quite appropriate in 1971." For the life of me I cannot see why it is not. I should like to refer to a few passages in the Gill report:

• (8:20 p.m.)

It will, we think, suffice for present purposes to indicate, as follows, the main reasons why we do not recommend the adoption of a system of merit rating.

We favour a system of broad pooling of risk and this is the foundation of our recommendations for universal coverage. We believe that the frictional unemployment that can properly be taken care of by a plan of unemployment insurance is a more or less normal phenomenon of a free economic system, but it emerges strongly in certain industries and occupations in the system and scarcely at all in others. This variation is not, however, the result of particular management decisions. It is, instead, a function beyond the control of the employers concerned.

The report states, further, that merit rating would have the result of raising the contribution rates for some of the basic industries that play an important part in Canadian export trade and that this would put them at a competitive disadvantage in international markets.

Also in the report we find this sentence:

We have not observed any decisive evidence to substantiate the claim that the operation of a merit rating system would have any significant effect in reducing unemployment.

That is a very significant and important phrase. I do not know whether it has been ignored by the minister and his department. The report continues:

There is some evidence to suggest that the existence of merit rating encourages undesirable practices on the part of some employers. They may tend to oppose claims merely for the sake of improving their position with respect to merit rating. They may oppose socially desirable extensions of the unemployment insurance scheme for the same reasons, and they may indulge in practices relating to hiring and firing of employees designed to minimize the effect on the unemployment insurance plan.

The Canadian Labour Congress opposes merit rating because of this danger. In the United States, where merit rating still largely persists, General Motors employs a team of lawyers who automatically challenge every applicant for unemployment insurance benefits. Other criticisms have been raised. The merit rating system has regional and structural bias. Government officials insist that industry by industry merit rating is administratively and politically impossible. However, juxtaposing all firms against an average national lay-off rate would heavily favour mature, central Canadian business and industrial structures and would actively harm growth and depressed areas.

Growth industries have higher lay-off rates simply because of their dynamism. Many stagnant industries have low lay-off rates and would be rewarded even though they often require, according to government policy, swift, efficient out-mobility. The textile industry, for example, could be penalized for rationalizing even though that is the intent of other government policies and accounted for by special manpower programs. Generally, merit rating would encourage rigidities which government policies and the Canadian economy cannot afford.

Merit rating may bias hiring practices. The incentive, if it worked, could bring direct hardship to the very people it aims to assist—working people in search of permanent employment. Since students and casuals are excluded from the merit rating, industries with fairly flexible work patterns might be encouraged to lower the quasi-permanent or permanent component of their work force and opt for a higher percentage of student and casuals for merit rating considerations. Although government officials have not seen such a possibility, it was accepted as possible while quite extraneous to the intent of the new act. Clearly, it is unacceptable to improve the employment problem of students and casuals at the direct expense of the regular work force. The risk should not be taken.

While the private sector must be more involved in the amelioration of frictional unemployment, the experience rating proposals should be rejected. More creative and informed government action is required in this regard. I would suggest the following proposal to significantly assist the Department of Manpower in finding work for the frictionally unemployed. Manpower is presently hindered from making a full contribution primarily because very few employers provide advance notice of lay-offs, commonly called manpower's low penetration rate. It is significant to point out, also, that the provinces are moving in the area of frictional unemployment with legislation to provide notice of lay-offs to employees in order that they can take early steps to reduce the injury of frictional unemployment. Ontario has such a bill and, as a matter of fact, so has the federal government. The federal bill I believe is Bill C-228.

However, I should like to emphasize that on constitutional grounds federal notice of lay-off legislation will be irrelevant to the majority of the work force. I conclude in respect of the experience rating, or the merit rating as the case may be, by stating that this is a move away from the principle of universality. It is a penalty placed on the employer who accepts willingly or unwillingly the high risk enterprise and it constitutes an administrative nightmare which cannot have a helpful effect on the employment situation.

We urge the government to include a penalty, by way of unemployment insurance contribution rates, for employers who do not simultaneously notify the Department of Manpower when they notify their employees according to the provincial notice of lay-off legislation. The federal government should insist that Manpower receives the same courtesy as employees in each province.

We have heard a lot from the minister about administrative costs. This has bothered many people. I heard the minister say that he picked out a figure of 4 per cent whereafter the federal government would become involved. He said he could have picked 5 per cent or 6 per cent. I would like to know why he chose 4 per cent, because notwithstanding what the minister indicated I believe it can be related to policy. I knew the minister would smile when I said this because he pre-empted me by saying he knew what I would say. However, I still say it. I say that so long as the minister thinks we can get away with 4 per cent, it would seem to be quite logical—he gave some indication of the government's fiscal and monetary policy earlier—that the government does not necessarily take a very active interest in what has happened.

This is why I would like further information on the figure of 4 per cent. Here we are faced with 6 per cent and I do not think we will get away from that area in the near future. Perhaps the government can justify, through the minister, in more detail the implications and requirements and why 4 per cent was chosen. I believe one must consider the fact that the government, through its fiscal and monetary policies, has brought upon this nation unemployment to an unprecedented degree.

Mr. Bell: Deliberately.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, deliberately. When I think of that, it would seem more obvious that we should have an explanation from the minister. There is one thing I should state in respect of administrative costs. The Gill report also had something to say about this question. I notice the minister is looking at his watch. I think I have time to deal with this matter and I would appreciate it if the minister would stay and hear me.

Mr. Mackasey: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I was looking at my watch because I have to take a pill.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, the Gill report was very emphatic in this regard. It recognized the dangerous conflict between proper administration and high benefit costs and proposed a plan of extended benefits to be financed by the state at the time of high employment in part to regularize the burden of the fund. However, it concluded that the federal government should continue to cover administrative costs nevertheless. The Gill report's arguments have been neither accepted nor rejected by the legislation with which we are now dealing. The report states:

• (8:30 p.m.)

It is in the national interest ... that unemployment insurance be administered in such a way that it is fair to all and that abuses be kept to a minimum. The responsibility for seeing to it that the established rules are adhered to is one that is linked to the responsibility for applying the compulsion that makes all employees members of the plan ... Further, the administrative machinery should be designed in such a way as to make available as much information ... as will be useful in the carrying out of a national employment and manpower program. For all these reasons, we recommend the continuation of the present practice whereby administrative expenses are met by the government from its general revenues rather than by the insurance fund.

This is from Mr. Gill, the acknowledged expert in this matter whom the minister has chosen either to ignore or on whose opinion he places little emphasis. Let me go on to another very tricky area which is also very controversial—the first benefit period. The new act suggests that first benefits be paid after a two-week waiting period at which time a three-week payment may be made. At whose discretion will the payment be made? Will it be by way of ministerial prerogative? I do not think anything in the act qualifies "may" or explains it.

The rationale of the government for this structure is twofold. They claim it is designed to provide an incentive to find work. How in heaven's name can you say that when you give a man $300, which is the maximum benefit he can receive, it can be called an incentive to work? The Minister may have an answer but I doubt very much that he can convince this House. He may be able to convince the government, but I think it will take much of the minister's verbal gymnastics to convince me that when you pay a man $300 this is not a disincentive. I do not see how it can be anything else. It is also stated, as the other portion of the rationale, that it reduces the administrative costs normally incurred as soon as the person enters the regular benefit stream.

In the committee analysis of the white paper, let it be known now that we in this party rejected this proposal and still do. The act now has a one-week waiting period and the first cheque is for only one week of benefits. The three-week advance in inequitable because it is made no matter whether work is obtained one day after the benefit payment, in which case it would be a bonus, or three weeks after. Since the bonus factor could amount to as much as $100 a week, it is probably better to maintain the higher administrative costs in the interests of equity and the preservation of man's initiative to become a member of the work stream.

The legislation presents no evidence or argumentation that this structure would in fact provide an incentive to find work. It is an experiment which I believe this country can ill afford to accept. On the contrary, it appears to provide an incentive to wait for two weeks before seeking employment in order to obtain the three-week benefit. How you can read into this portion of the legislation any other rational conclusion is beyond me. Accordingly, we in this party will be emphasizing that this factor can be looked upon as a disincentive, stifling personal initiative, which should not be the object of unemployment insurance legislation.

The minister mentioned sickness and pregnancy benefits. It took me some time to appreciate that this was an extension of interruption of earnings. It was difficult for me to figure out how it could be called that, but I am prepared to accept it, particularly because of the anomaly which exists with respect to a person who is unemployed, then becomes sick and can receive unemployment insurance, whereas those who are sick initially cannot benefit from the unemployment insurance scheme. The scheme includes women, of course, who are part of the work force to an increasing degree. This is a problem we must face; I hope that one of my colleagues will have more to say on this subject, particularly with respect to sickness and pregnancy benefits, because it is wide open to potential abuse. I think that in this area we must be extremely careful. We must try to improve this act. I hope the minister will understand that I am not being facetious or partisan when I say that I hope, because of the newness and earth-shaking implications of this legislation, the minister will consider safeguards to possible abuses.

We say that the proposal has merit in maintaining the integrity of the unemployment insurance plan. The Canadian Labour Congress and government officials suggest that assistance in this area is practical for the fund because present disqualification clauses cannot stop fraud and invite health hazards to pregnant women. Some women remain at work until the last moment, with possible detrimental effects to their health and productivity. Some women are in collusion with their employers to be fired or laid off in order to be eligible for benefits which they would otherwise not receive.

Who will determine who is sick? Will it be determined by doctor's certificate? When will he have to supply this information? These are the type of questions that make the average taxpayer extremely concerned when he sees people taking advantage of a system. Because of lack of proper investigation we might not prevent even minimum abuses. Teachers may have more interest in the pregnancy section when they start to rationalize their inclusion. But it should not be considered that this is an effective welfare plan for pregnant women for two reasons. First, the burden of support rests with only two sectors of the tax base—employers and employees. Second, it is inequitable as a welfare scheme because it gives benefits, not according to need but according to previous income, and it only provides benefits for working women.

I should like the minister to answer this question regarding the family unit: Should we not consider that a woman whose husband is making $15,000 is in a position to have, through her husband, the required treatment out of their joint income I think this is extremely important. The maternity benefit plan should be considered as temporary income maintenance in light of its removal of the human and institutional damage caused by cheating. However, the act's proposal should be integrated with broader aspects of social welfare policy regarding the needs of all pregnant women. Perhaps the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) will be interested in this question, because we should not deceive these people. If we are going to look into the entire needs of women we should use a fine-tooth comb.

In closing I would like to touch on another area which gives me some concern. I refer to our senior citizens. It is hard to pick the proper word. I do not want to say that the government has shown unconcern for our senior citizens, but it has certainly adopted some unrealistic approaches to them. This makes me a little worried. However, in all fairness I have to admit that we are now talking about retirement benefits. This was a very touchy topic during the committee meetings. In this regard I quote from issue No. 9 of the committee proceedings, page 9:28, as follows:

5. Unemployment benefits for interruption of earnings due to retirement.

[Mr. Alexander.]

The case for the provision of unemployment insurance benefits for interruption of earnings due to retirement presents certain difficulties. Indeed, a number of witnesses fully in support of UIC benefits in the case of interruption of earnings by sickness or pregnancy expressed opposition to the provision of the proposed retirement benefits.

While in the main concern in the matter of sickness and pregnancy included interruption of earnings benefits related to a discussion of the type of program and vehicle appropriate for such benefits, the very existence of a valid contingency at the time of retirement was denied by several witnesses and briefs. It was maintained that if a need exists—

This is what is important just as the committee recommended.

It was maintained that if a need exists in the transition from work to retirement, it cannot be said to constitute an interruption of earnings.

A number of witnesses also drew attention to the fact that by accepting Canada Pension Plan or Quebec Pension Plan, an early retired person would have access to $720—while if he did not retire, he would receive as much as $5,000 in the first year.

There is another matter which I would bring to the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker. This was contained in a submission by the Canadian Fertilizer Association—and I do not stress so much the name of the association as the content of its submission. At page 9:62 there appears the following:

While it may not be desirable to provide retiring workers with a nominal lump sum payment in lieu of benefits, the proposed five weeks lump sum payment—

There was an error there: it should have read "three weeks."

—could easily be abused and apply an unnecessary burden on the unemployment insurance fund. It would, we suggest, quickly become normal practice on retirement to forgo application for Canada pension and old age security benefits for a time to take advantage of the proposed five weeks lump sum handout.

Again, Mr. Speaker, it should have read "three weeks lump sum handout." The problem I am faced with in respect of the lump sum payment in the initial instance, after a person has a 20-week involvement with the work force, is that it becomes almost possible to accept a further lump sum payment even though this may affect our senior citizens. I want the minister to convince me that what he is doing is right, because it is not my intention to quietly sit here and not see our senior citizens, those on the verge of retirement, get what they deserve after spending considerable time in the work force.

Why are they getting a lump sum? Is this a gift? Is it to tide them over a certain period? If they are on the verge of becoming involved with the Canada Pension Plan, they may be about to retire and may have money coming in from another pension scheme. I would like the minister to explain this to me so there will be no misunderstanding about what the government is attempting to do. In the first instance, as I said, it seems the government is attempting to create a group that will get the three-week payment. Now there is to be another group with a three-week payment. I suggest these are bonus payments. Even the first case is questionable, but we must have conclusive evidence with respect to the second. We must know why the minister believes it is necessary that people who are about to leave the work force and get a pension, be it the Canada pension or the Quebec pension, should get this $300.

There are many other points that I could raise with respect to this legislation, Mr. Speaker. I know that a number of my colleagues wish to raise certain matters which they believe the government should be interested in and upon which it should be prepared to act.

I hope that through the minister's efforts, those who are in need right now will be permitted to acquire benefits under the new scale. We all know that the maximum now, $53 or $58—I forget which—is totally inadequate in view of rising costs and the frustrations that accompany the provision of non-deferrables such as clothing, mortgage payments, food and medicine. I hope the minister will show consideration in this area. His reputation would be greatly enhanced if our suggestions were put into effect.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, among my souvenirs I have a number of items that came to me from the files of my predecessor, the late J. S. Woodsworth. One of them is a leather-bound copy of one of the first unemployment insurance books which was given to him, along with a letter from Hon. Norman McLarty, who was Minister of Labour at the time, in recognition of the part Mr. Woodsworth had played over a number of years in urging the adoption of unemployment insurance. I mention that, Sir, so that our credentials in this area will be established. We have long been advocates and supporters of the principle of unemployment insurance.

Our understanding of unemployment insurance, so far as its essence is concerned, is that it is an arrangement under which those whose income comes from employment pay into a fund, so that if they are out of income there is something they will receive that is theirs as a matter of right. One of the critical requirements is that there be no means test on such benefits, no looking at what other members of the family may have. Rather, it is an arrangement under which workers have their income protected when that income is interrupted because of loss of employment.

Even though we have long been advocates and supporters of unemployment insurance, it is our strong contention, as was suggested this afternoon in another debate by my colleague from Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), that the main aim of any government should not be just to come up with a perfect unemployment insurance plan but to come up with policies that provide for full employment. We recognize that in the course of history this has seldom been with us for any extended period of time, and so we assert that we must have a program of unemployment insurance. But, Mr. Speaker, we urge the government not to use such a program as an excuse for policies that lead to unemployment.

Having mentioned one or two items of history, and bearing in mind some of the remarks of the hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat, may I mention that in 1940 the British North America Act was amended. There was written into it, in section 91, authority for the federal Parliament to pass legislation with respect to unemployment insurance. I press the point that workers who happen to come under provincial labour jurisdiction are not out of bounds so far as federal unemployment insurance is concerned. Indeed, I suggest that no workers are out of bounds so far as unemployment insurance is concerned, because authority for such legislation is contained in our Constitution, the British North America Act.

There are a great many details in this legislation and it is only natural that the place where we shall go into those details and try to bring about changes—indeed, a number of changes are still desirable—will be the standing committee to which this bill is to be referred. Therefore, those of us who speak on second reading do not feel obligated to cover all points. There are a few points, however, that I should like to mention at this stage of the debate. The pattern of my remarks is one that I have followed quite often. To begin with, I shall indicate a number of things in this new bill that are good and that we warmly welcome. While I am discussing those points the minister's face will be as bright as his shirt and he will enjoy what I have to say. But then we shall come to the other side of the coin, to the three or four things in the bill that we find not satisfactory.

An hon. Member: Then his face will be as black as his suit.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought the minister was about to say that he would have to change his shirt at that point, but there is no provision in our rules for that being done in the House of Commons.

May I refer to some of the reasons for our welcoming this bill. I indicate, first, our pleasure that the scale of benefits that may be paid under this legislation represents a considerable increase over the benefits now payable under the Unemployment Insurance Act. At present the maximum is $53 a week, plus the 10 per cent "Benson bonus" that was provided a short while ago. That was about the only time that that man ever provided for a bonus.

Once the new legislation is in full effect, a maximum payment of $100 a week will be possible for those whose normal wage is $150 a week or $7,800 a year. Not only are there these higher benefits which are based on the proposition that benefits shall be 66⅔ per cent of the wages that a person has been earning, but there is also provision—I think the minister referred to this matter this afternoon—for those benefits to escalate to 75 per cent if a person's period of unemployment continues beyond a certain length of time and if that happens at a time when there is a high level of unemployment in the country.

You will not hear any remarks from me to the effect that those benefits are disincentives, or anything like that. For far too long we have been concerned about what happens to people whose earnings are interrupted because of lack of employment, and we will not indulge in that kind of approach. We welcome the higher benefits that will be paid under the new unemployment insurance legislation. They will not be benefits at a level at which one can merely keep body and soul together; they will be benefits that will bear some relation to a person's wages, that will enable people who are out of work to keep in the swim, to keep up their hopes and to keep up their morale.

A second feature that we like is the wider coverage that is provided under the bill. This coverage is wider and more extensive in two main respects. On the one hand it brings within its scope a number of employed persons who for many years have been exempt from the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I think that perhaps it was a mistake that they were ever exempted. I think, since we were introducing unemployment insurance that was to cover people who made their living from employment, that all these people should have been included from the start. If they had been, many heartaches might not have been experienced and we would not have, heard the kind of arguments that we have had to deal with lately.

Not only does this bill widen the coverage in that it seeks to take in all those who are employed, but it abolishes the ceiling that exists under the present act. As the minister said this afternoon, when the legislation was first introduced 30 years ago, that ceiling was $2,000 a year. At present it is $7,800 a year, but even that ceiling is being abolished. As I understand it, workers will pay unemployment insurance premiums on their income, but only up to the ceiling of $7,800 a year. If employed persons earn more than $7,800 a year, they will not go off the unemployment insurance rolls but will continue paying premiums at the $7,800 a year level. As a result their benefits will be geared to that figure. We think this is good. We approve this wider coverage and this approach to universality. I shall say something more about that when I speak about the other side of the coin, about those parts of the minister's bill that contain shortcomings.

The third thing we welcome in this legislation is the inclusion of coverage for loss of income due to a person's being off work as a result of sickness or pregnancy. When the legislation was first brought in many years ago there was no provision for unemployment insurance to be continued in the case of a person who lost his job, qualified for benefits, began drawing them and then took sick. That injustice some of us in this House railed against for many years. It was finally corrected and I am glad that we are now going a step further and saying that when workers cannot receive their normal income because they are sick or pregnant, they shall be covered by this legislation.

Some people have said that with this kind of provision perhaps the name of the legislation ought to be changed. What is in a name? Some suggest that a change in name might make the bill a little better. At any rate, let us agree that we are concerned not only about whether people are at work or not, but whether workers have an income. If workers who depend for life itself on employment and on the income from that employment suffer a cessation in that income, there ought to be legislation to cover them. We are glad that the sickness and pregnancy provisions are included in this legislation.

I make the comment, in light of something that was said a few minutes ago, that I think we should accept the principle advocated in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, namely, that women stand on their own feet. We have to move more and more in that direction. I do not think there should be a means test on unemployment insurance. I do not think that a pregnant woman seeking a benefit, one who is off work because of pregnancy, should be asked any questions about the income of other members of her family. Once we get into the business of means testing we destroy the basic principle of unemployment insurance.

The fourth element in this legislation that we welcome is the provision for shorter periods in order to qualify for unemployment insurance benefit. Some people think the periods have been made too short, that it will make it awfully easy to obtain benefits, and so on. The possibility of obtaining employment is becoming more and more beyond the control of the individual. Whether or not employment is available is a social fact. It is something about which government policy has a great deal to do. As long as people can establish genuine attachment to the labour market, they should get the benefit of this legislation. As a matter of fact, I suggest that we might have to go further.

There are times when people such as teachers—and in this respect I take their side—undergo several years of training to become qualified and then find there is no job available. They are just as much attached to the labour market as the worker who has had eight weeks unskilled labour in a factory. I am glad to see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) nodding his head. He agrees that in some cases we will have to find a way to provide these benefits for those who have worked for fewer than eight weeks. What the government is doing through this legislation is recognizing the right to coverage, provided a genuine attachment to the labour force has been established. I believe I have said enough that is good about this bill to bring a smile to the face of the minister. I would not want him to think—

Mr. Mackasey: Lower contributions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister wants me to refer to the lower contributions. That is good. Is there anything else that I have missed?

Mr. Francis: You are doing very well.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope the minister, who is adding to my list of favourable items, will be ready to add to my other list. He probably has one or two he will mention.

The first point I want to make with regard to shortcomings in the legislation is in connection with the waiting period. I know the argument. I heard it in committee and the minister gave it again this afternoon. It is really the old trade-off argument which we get from this government. The minister said we could have a shorter waiting period but it would cost so much we would not be able to provide certain other benefits.

The workers of this country have been studying this bill. They are not unsympathetic toward it. They regard it as their legislation and they take a certain amount of pride in it. One of the things that worries them is this longer waiting period. It gets a bit confused. Although there was not supposed to have been a waiting period for the last while, there really had been a week. Now there is to be a two-week waiting period. As I work it out, there will be three weeks. During this period people will have to wait before they can collect unemployment insurance benefit.

The previous speaker was concerned that once people have established a benefit period they can pick up the benefit for three weeks. He was concerned about that being a disincentive. I think it is the other way around. A person who is genuinely attached to the labour force—and he has to be that to get the benefit—after a couple of weeks receives pay for three weeks. He is told that if he can get a job before his three-week period expires, he will be that much money ahead. That is what he will do. Far from being a disincentive, it is an incentive to people to get back into the labour market.

Apart from that, I am afraid that this period of having to wait before there is any income from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, income that is the right of the workers, is something we will have to tackle all over again. We tackled it very thoroughly when the committee was studying the white paper. The minister, his officials and others were very persuasive. They used the cost argument, the trade-off argument, and so on. This is one instance where we are having a bit of participatory democracy. We did not get it with regard to the old age security legislation. In this case the workers and trade union bodies have been seeing it. I say to the minister that this point is of very real concern. I hope that when we get into committee we will be able to shorten the waiting period rather than lengthening it.

The second matter about which there is great concern among trade union bodies and workers generally is the whole question about the definition of earnings, particularly the earnings that a person might have in a waiting period or during a period when one is receiving unemployment insurance benefits. This is one of those cases where the definition is not in the legislation. The definition of earnings will be left to regulation, but it will be very important that the definition be such that people will not be given something with one hand only to find that it has been taken away with the other. The minister is a member of a government that is very good at that. This was done to the old age pensioners on the guaranteed income supplement, and to recipients of war veterans allowances. I hope there will be a different kettle of fish in this instance and the minister will not do the same as his colleagues have done.

Speaking of fish, I might say in passing that one of the angles of this bill that is causing concern is the position of fishermen under it. But I do not intend to go into that question: my colleague, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett), promised the minister this afternoon by implication that he would go into it very thoroughly. The point that my colleague and others wish to make is quite sound. It is fine to have the minister's promise that fishermen will continue to be covered under this legislation until one of his colleagues introduces something else that is satisfactory. However, it is very difficult to know in advance whether that something else will be satisfactory.

I move on to another point which is perhaps one of the most crucial with regard to this legislation. I refer to this business of setting a threshold at 4 per cent. I suppose this is an area in which we can engage in debate, use of words, semantics, and so on. We can do this on both sides. But it seems to me the minister and the government are not going to get away with their insistence that writing this 4 per cent figure into the bill will not sanctify a level of unemployment at 4 per cent. I can see this coming just as sure as anything. As long as the level of unemployment does not exceed 4 per cent, hon. gentlemen on the other side will say, "This is full employment."

The minister said this afternoon that he was proud of this legislation because when the level of unemployment rose above 4 per cent it triggered the flow of government money into the unemployment insurance program, and since such a flow of money would be triggered, government economists and other who make government policy would say to themselves, "We cannot continue doing this. We must do something to establish policies which create unemployment." I say that if this is the way it works on the basis of an unemployment figure of 4 per cent or 5 per cent, it will also work at unemployment rates of 2 per cent or 3 per cent. Two per cent is no better than 4 per cent for the unemployed man who is down at the bottom. But from our point of view it would be a lot better if government involvement in the financing of unemployment insurance began at a much lower level. In the committee we argued that it should be 2 per cent. If we could even get a compromise between the two figures, it would be an improvement.

My contention is that the present procedure will give an air of respectability to 4 per cent unemployment which will vex us for a long time to come. Don't tell us the government is not prepared to countenance 4 per cent unemployment; we have a Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who is prepared to accept 6 per cent, and got even more. I urge the government to reconsider this part of the program.

The old Unemployment Insurance Act involved the government right from the start. We presently have a 50-50-20 formula. Hon. members who were on the committee understand that formula. Even the white paper made the mistake of saying it was 40-40-20. I wonder who wrote that? We have a program at the present time under which the employer makes a payment and the employee makes a payment; these add up to 100 and then the government pays an additional 20 per cent of that total amount. The fact is that the government is involved from the first. Indeed, at the present time it pays not only 20 parts out of 120, which is $16\frac{2}{3}$ per cent, but it also pays the administrative costs.

I am familiar with the argument that there are some expenses below the 4 per cent level which the government will pay. I realize, also, that once unemployment amounts to more than 4 per cent, government costs will skyrocket while costs to employees and employers will not increase. But we are concerned about bringing unemployment down. Once this level of 4 per cent has been set as the point at which the government comes in, getting unemployment down to 4 per cent will be the sole aim of government policy, and I for my part insist that this is not good enough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister also told us this afternoon that under the new legislation certain benefits will accrue to unemployed persons when the national rate is above 4 per cent, benefits which would not accrue to them when the national rate is below 4 per cent. It would be hard to explain to an unemployed person, whose need is just as great when the national figure is 3.9 per cent as when it is 4.1 per cent, that although in one case he will get the additional benefit, in the other case he will not.

It seems to me that the benefits which accrue to workers drawing unemployment insurance should, if they are to be flexible, be geared to the duration of that person's unemployment rather than to the national average, the general condition in the country. This whole concept of a 4 per cent threshold is one which needs to be examined all over again in committee. We went into it exhaustively, in both senses of the word, in the committee which considered the white paper, but it is so crucial to the legislation before us that I urge that we do so again when this bill gets back to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Speaker, I come now to one of the principal items of criticism which I wish to raise. Here I am meeting the minister with respect to the attribute of this legislation of which he is most proud. He is proud of the fact that this bill has adopted the principle of universality. This is true up to a point but—and this is the trouble—it is true only up to a point. The minister has tried to bring within its four corners all persons whose living depends on the money they received because they are employed, whether they are shopworkers, railwaymen, teachers, doctors, lawyers or whatever—if they are employed as opposed to being self-employed. But even though he has widened the net and brought in many more people than were eligible before, he has not touched the self-employed at all.

The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) reminded us that we raised this question in committee one day when the minister was there; the minister took it seriously and undertook to have it studied, but later we were told it was too complicated. In this age of computers which can do the wonderful things the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) told us about this afternoon, I do not think it is beyond the wit of the people in the department to devise legislation which would protect the incomes of all our people.

The argument the minister used in defence of the payment of sickness and maternity benefits—and I agree with him 100 per cent—was that what he is protecting is the income of these people; the purpose of unemployment insurance is to see to it that those whose income is interrupted have a source from which to draw income to replace it. This is just as important a need for self-employed people as it is for employed people. If the minister really wants to bring in legislation which measures up to the billing he has given it, he ought to go a lot further and introduce a bill which would protect the incomes of all our people whether employed by others or self-employed.

Many of the criticisms of this legislation which are being made—I do not agree with them, but one can read them in some of our newspaper editorial columns—are to the effect that this is not really unemployment insurance, but welfare; that it really involves the taxing of certain groups, and so on. I suggest this would disappear if we were presented with a plan into which everybody would pay in order to protect his income against a time when that income might be interrupted because of loss of work or conditions over which the person concerned had no control.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Some of the people who do not like being covered say that the plan is not really universal after all; that they are being brought in while others are not. Let us get everyone into the plan. As a matter of fact, what is wrong with Members of Parliament being in the plan too?

Mr. Mackasey: Agreed.

Mr. Francis: Agreed.

Mr. Perrault: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have three votes. Are there any more? There seems to be more support for my proposal on the Liberal side than on this side. I guess they are anticipating the result of the next election. When I have advocated this proposal in some quarters, the retort has been made, "You mean, if a member is defeated at the next election he gets paid out of the unemployment insurance fund?" I suggest that while there is no means test in the Unemployment Insurance Act, there are provisions about going on pension and some MP's around here will be going on pension when they are defeated; so there could be a relationship between those two situations. Others would get other jobs. The result would be that not too many would collect from the plan. I think the moral effect of the answer it would provide to some of the critics would be worth our making a payment as well. The minister does not need to throw in his little piece about the premiums having been reduced, because they have not been reduced by very much. In view of the little bit that it is, less than $1 a week—

Mr. Mackasey: For new entrants.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, for new entrants—I think it is a shame that we are not paying into the scheme. We are saying that the virtue of this legislation is its universality. This afternoon the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) told the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that in this country universality means all citizens, including Members of Parliament. So I ask, why are we not in this plan too?

The feature of this legislation of which the minister is most proud, namely, universality, does not quite stand up. He has made the legislation just about universal for those who are employed and receive wages or salaries. This is what the scheme is—a plan under which people, whether poor risks or good risks, pay into a fund so that if their employment is interrupted they receive a benefit. The principle is a good one, but it would be better for society if it extended to all of us. I hope that some very serious thought is given to this proposition of real universality so that with respect to this and some of the other points I have mentioned the bill will come out of committee an even better bill than it is now.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles-Eugène Dionne (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the remarks I intend to make on Bill C-229, an Act respecting Unemployment Insurance in Canada, I wish to point out a few aspects which I consider important, particularly the existence of unemployment here in Canada before the legislation was passed in 1940.

I am trying to be realistic and to tackle this subject while taking into account the actual facts. I do not believe any serious people would ever claim that an unemployment insurance legislation can solve the unemployment problem, since it has been proved that unemployment existed before the passage of the legislation. As a matter of fact, it is higher today, in spite of the many years of implementation of that legislation and its regulations.

I do not believe that Bill C-229, which is the subject of our debate today, includes appropriate proposals to solve the unemployment problem. The proposals included in the white paper were examined in committee and used in the drafting of the bill now before us. But that does not represent a solution to the unemployment problem and it is quite easy to prove it.

The object of this measure is to help unemployed people either by reducing the inconveniences due to the lack of income, by paying them benefits or helping them to get suitable employment.

I admit that many investigations were made since the passage of the measure in 1940 and that many changes were made in the attendant regulations. A commission of inquiry of the Unemployment Insurance Act presented quite a voluminous report in November 1962, and in 1970 and 1971, we studied the proposals included in the white paper tabled by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey). I am happy to point out here that those proposals were studied with that spirit of co-operation that always prevailed among the committee members.

Representations were made by several organizations that had the privilege, through their representatives, of expressing their opinion on the advantages or disadvantages of the implementation of the proposals included in the white paper.

Judging from Bill C-229, I find that very few changes have been made even though the officials of various associations have objected to certain provisions of the white paper.

I propose to make some suggestions which I find practical and which, in my humble opinion, would make it easier to understand the various requirements of the act and regulations. I hope that the decision-making authorities will take them into consideration in due course.

I wished to make these few points at the beginning of my remarks so as to give the House a better understanding of the reasons for my attitude towards the proposed amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

• (9:30 p.m.)

In short, Bill C-229 is not the solution to the unemployment problem but a palliative required by an ailing economic system. It would be more logical to set up an economic system based on natural order and on the logic of facts instead of putting up with the disastrous consequences of an economic situation based on a financial system continually in conflict with current economic realities. Obviously, the situation would be quite different if all the workers could find a suitable job at will.

I also wish to point out the inconsistency between the supporters of full employment—"everybody harnessed", as in some socialist countries—and the supporters of the financial system responsible for inflation and unemployment.

For our would-be socialists, lack of planning is usually responsible for all those unfortunate happenings. It has become the fashionable expression. In the meantime, full employment is still being urged although any sensible person will recognise it as almost impossible in a world where machines have been replacing man to an astonishing degree these last years.

I shall not dwell at length on this contradiction so obvious to the reasonably well-informed observer. It is clearly difficult to reconcile those two contradictory proposals: full employment and unemployment. Even though we are living in a society where the supporters of contradictions seem bent on convincing themselves that their claims are well grounded, we must nevertheless try to be logical.

Failure to be logical among the supporters of this same financial system has largely contributed to creating periods of unemployment. The Canadian people who have been through the 1929 to 1939 recession know that it is following that sad period, which showed the absurdity of the system, that we heard about an Unemployment Insurance Act. The party politicians created study groups, convened their projects officers who travelled through various countries, trying to discover the causes of unemployment and the means used elsewhere to fight it.

Programs aimed at the distribution of direct relief were tried. Some valid men were even enrolled for 20 cents per day at Valcartier and elsewhere. There was no question of classifying the unemployed into categories; it was a total economic chaos. More than half the people were experiencing hardship and lack of money was responsible for all those periods of anguish. The gamblers in matters of money and credit had lost their bearings on the stock exchange in the course of that crisis of collective hysteria.

Having in mind this situation, I wish to say this respecting Bill C-229: I invent nothing when I say that the Unemployment Insurance Act which was enacted several years ago and amended now and then, is not sufficiently well understood by the workers, and I may add that this can be attributed to several reasons. One of the main reasons is that politicians elected with the support of financiers ask their legal counsels to draft a piece of legislation with enough restrictions to ensure the Fund's protection while allowing workers who become unemployed to receive benefits if they meet the requirements established under the plan; the first requirement is that they must have paid their contributions. The politicians in power are thus treated to some political campaigning at the taxpayers' expense by playing up an increase of weekly benefits up to $100 though it is obvious that the number of those who will qualify will be quite small.

But this helps keep hope alive among the thousands of unemployed who find themselves in a demoralizing position.

I have often said in this House that legislation should be drafted in intelligible language so that misinterpretations or even confusion could be avoided.

To prove my point, I will quote a few clauses of the bill, which contains 157 of them. Clause 23 reads as follows:

Waiting period

23. A claimant is not entitled to be paid benefit for a week in an initial benefit period until following the commencement of that initial benefit period he has served a two week waiting period that begins with a week of unemployment for which benefits would otherwise be payable.

Can you imagine what an unemployed will take that to mean? In clause 24, under the title "Rate of benefit", one can read in subparagraph (i), and I quote:

... but the maximum weekly amount of benefit payable shall not exceed sixty-six and two-thirds per cent of the maximum weekly insurable earnings and the minimum weekly amount of benefit payable to a claimant described in subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (b) shall not be less than seventy-five per cent of one-third of the maximum weekly insurable earnings.

Let us imagine what a poor unemployed will make of that. It is well known that that allows public servants—and I will explain it presently—to prepare the kind of regulations which leave all kinds of openings. There are loopholes in the law which will let anything through.

An hon. Member: An elephant.

Mr. Dionne: Yes, an elephant.

[Mr. Dionne.]

Such drafting requires public servants, who are responsible for implementing the law, to formulate regulations which will have to be enforced and which will be used to establish the eligibility of unemployed to benefits.

That is why numerous misunderstanding problems occur regarding the recognition of the rights of some unemployed.

Let us remember the measure provides that there must be communication between officials of the Commission and those of the Department of Manpower and Immigration and, sometimes, those of the regional offices of the welfare department in order to help people without income find some means of subsistence. Let us try to imagine what could happen in some cases.

I hope all unemployed will be understood. Their problems are complicated enough without their having to suffer the bad temper of some officials who do not always realize they owe their jobs to jobless, and the demoralizing effects that ensue.

A better legislation might hold them under the law of gravity, allowing them to keep both feet on the ground, and would doubtless spare them swollen heads, which often lead some of them to think better of themselves than they should, with the result that some of the unemployed suffer real hardships.

I feel that it would be in order, as I have already mentioned, to make a few suggestions which could, to my mind, be included into the new law. They could replace harmful clauses or be added to the 157 clauses already incorporated into Bill C-229.

The necessary steps should be taken to indicate on the insurance cheques what period they cover. With computers, it should be possible to add that detail; it would help clear up many problems and let the unemployed know for what period insurance is being paid. It seems to me this should be simple enough to do, and it would do away with many inconveniences.

In the second place, we should find a way to cover operators of equipment such as trucks, tractors, caterpillars, skidders and others.

A rate could be set for the services of the equipment and another for the wages of the operator.

Those adjustment procedures for unemployment insurance are quite important, since in many cases, the owners of those machines are not included in the class of workers to which the legislation and regulations apply. They are often considered as truckers and craftsmen or sub-contractors.

• (9:40 p.m.)

One should reconsider the possibilities of entitlement to benefits of some employers who have gone bankrupt. According to their type of work, they may have been considered as employers, since their undertaking required the employment of a few workers, and because of particular conditions, their business becomes unprofitable, and after having paid unemployment insurance contributions, being occasional employers, they cannot get any help, when they are struggling with serious problems.

Appropriate means should also be found to make casual workers, such as carpenters, labourers and others who work for several employers eligible for benefits. According to the principle of universality, these workers, who do some repair jobs at different periods, do not contribute to unemployment insurance and, therefore they cannot draw benefits. Yet they could show that they have worked for three, four or six months for various employers.

An exclusion notice should also mention in large letters that the applicant may appeal the decision and this without any expense, which is very important.

Moreover, the department officials' names should be typed at the bottom of their letters, as generally their signatures are not legible.

In my opinion, various matters should be taken into consideration, such as the number of weeks of waiting, and regions should be determined with regard to the percentage of unemployment rate. This is not mentioned clearly enough in the bill.

It would be in order that the new legislation be flexible enough in its administration so as to favour really those who are the victims of unemployment.

While seeking to determine the advantages and the disadvantages of the new legislation for a married worker without children who would earn $100 a week, I tried to figure out what would happen after 40 or 52 weeks of work and I let my colleagues free to draw their own conclusions about it.

Let us assume that an individual works 52 weeks at $100 a week. He would receive then a gross salary of $5,200, and for the same time, his $1.40 unemployment insurance would be $72. The federal tax for 52 weeks at $8.30 would amount to $431.60. The provincial tax, at $4.95 a week, would amount to $257.40. Premiums to the Quebec Pension Plan, for 52 weeks, at $1.59 a week, would amount to $89.68. Medicare, at 80 cents a week, would total $41.60. There remains a net salary of $4,313.92.

If he works during nine months or forty weeks, he will earn a gross salary of $4,000. At the rate of $1.40 a week, unemployment insurance will cost him $56. Federal income tax will amount to $332 and provincial income tax to $198. Contributions to the Quebec Pension Plan will total $63 and those to Medicare will be $32. His net salary will therefore amount to $3,318.40. Furthermore, at the end of the year, there would be a reimbursement on federal income tax in the amount of $137, one from the provincial income tax of $198 and another from the Quebec Pension Plan of $2.44. Medicare would reimburse $32. and for twelve weeks he would receive unemployment benefits that would amount to $58.30, producing a total of $699.60. The government would have reimbursed $1,069.04 leaving him a net salary of $4,387.44. Thus, the employee who would have worked nine months would have received $75.52 more than the one who would have worked the whole year.

Those who have worked throughout the year will have paid out $886.03 to the government and those who have worked nine months will have cost the government $1,060.04. The cost of the proposed reforms must also be taken into consideration. Since the government is to assume total responsibility for payment of contributions so long as there are to be unemployment percentages, taxes must be expected to increase in some way or other as under the present system our administrators have no other source of revenue. Care must be taken not to exhaust the reserves of forbearance of those who are fortunate enough to have an income but are beginning to show signs of impatience when faced with the amount of taxes they have to pay. This should be looked into carefully.

To obtain an idea of the cost of the proposed reforms, a comparison should first of all be made between present contributions and those which will come into force under the new system. An index of present costs appears on page 20 of document No. 72-516 (December 1969) entitled: "Labour costs in the manufacturing industry in 1968." Under the heading "Unemployment insurance", it is found that in the manufacturing industry, the contribution rate has increased to $48 in 1968, representing 8 per cent of the gross earnings.

For the employers engaged in the manufacturing industry, the weekly cost of unemployment insurance, therefore, comes to 91 cents. And as employees pay the same rates as their employers, their contributions are then 91 cents per week on the average.

The 26th annual report of the Unemployment Insurance Commission published in 1969 for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1967, shows both the employees' and the employers' contributions for the year under review.

Employers and employees together have paid $343,800,000 into the Unemployment Insurance Fund. One wonders what their contributions would have been had they been subject to the plan advocated in the white paper.

According to the proposed plan, employees earning less than $100 per week would have to pay contributions varying from 71 cents to 88 cents, or an average of 80 cents per week.

At the same time, for salaried people earning more than $100 a week, contributions will range from $1.06 to $1.32, or an average of $1.19 a week.

Now, according to the 1969 issue of the publication "Taxation Statistics", which gives an analysis of the returns of individuals for taxation year 1967, some 5,365,269 returns indicated incomes of less than $5,200 a year, or less than $100 a week.

Granting that all of these individuals, or most of them, come under the new plan and that their contributions average 80 cents a week or $41.60 a year, they would have paid a total of $223,195,190 into the Unemployment Insurance Fund in 1967.

For the same year, there were 2,768,426 returns indicating incomes of more than $5,200 a year, or more than $100 a week.

If their contributions to the Fund had averaged $1.19 a week, or $61.88 a year, as proposed in the white paper, they would have paid the sum of $171,310,200 in 1967. In other words, if all individuals had contributed according to the scale of the white paper, they would have paid the sum of $394,505,391. Since professionals, self-employed persons, dealers and others are not subject to unemployment insurance, one must take into account only salaried persons or employees of concerns or institutions, employees of various governments and other unclassified employees, to discover that employees represent 83.5 per cent of individuals who filed income tax returns.

Thus, the employees would have contributed approximately $329,412,001 to the Unemployment Insurance Fund in 1967, according to the scale of the white paper, namely a sum almost equal to the total of aggregate contributions by employers and employees for that year.

We have seen previously that the average contribution of employers in the manufacturing industry in 1967 was $48 per year or 91 cents per week.

Now according to the white paper proposals, the group of employers accounting for a low unemployment percentage will pay from 71 to 88 cents per employee per week and the group of employers registering a heavy percentage of unemployment will have to pay between $1.42 and $1.76 per week per employee, which is almost double the 1967 average, and the group of employers between the first two will have to pay between 99 cents and $1.23 per week per employee.

If the share of the state earmarked for the re-establishment of the unemployment insurance fund could be easily figured under the former system, it is almost impossible to know what the state will have to pay under the proposed system.

In conclusion, employees will pay on the whole almost twice as much as in 1967; most of the employers will pay as much as regards the first category and almost twice as much for the two other categories, while the taxpayers may expect tax increases when unemployment exceeds 4 per cent. For three years, unemployment has exceeded this level and in some areas it is almost twice as much. Therefore heavy tax increases should be expected.

Also, the white paper says very little about what it will cost the state to help the unemployed.

Under the current system, it is easy to calculate this share. It amounts to 20 per cent of the contributions plus the administration costs.

Under the new system, the state alone will bear the cost if unemployment exceeds 4 per cent as well as the additional cost of the benefits of phases 1 and 2 and of the first part of phase 3.

In addition, when the regional rate is over 4 per cent and exceeds the national rate by 1 per cent or more, the state will assume the costs already mentioned, as well as the benefits of phase 5 during 18 other weeks.

Tables 7 and 8, which appear on page 36 of the Canada Statistical Review of July 1970, show the number of unemployed by region, as well as the regional rate of unemployment.

One realizes that the rate of unemployment exceeds the standards proposed in the white paper for areas in the Atlantic provinces and Quebec.

Considering all those circumstances, we must be careful in enacting this bill and amend it according to what the circumstances require. I do hope that these few suggestions I have made will be considered in the best possible spirit.

[English]

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that I have before ten o'clock I should like to make a few comments with respect to our committee's work and, with your permission, I will continue my remarks tomorrow afternoon.

As chairman of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration I might say that last fall we spent much time studying the white paper on unemployment insurance. It is a pleasure for me to make some comments at second reading stage of this new act. Last June the white paper on unemployment insurance was referred to our committee, and later that month the committee issued an invitation for briefs on the subject from all interested individuals and organizations. The committee began its hearings in Ottawa in mid-September during the summer recess and continued until early November. Thirty-six meetings were held and we heard the presentations of 33 organizations representing management, labour and the new groups of employers and employees which it was proposed to insure for the first time.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and Unemployment Insurance officials were heard and questioned by our committee on many different occasions. After numerous in-camera sessions by the steering committee and the whole committee, and with the reliable assistance of our consultant professor, Mr. Gilles Paquet, and our committee clerk, Mrs. Santosh Sirpaul, the committee reported to the House of Commons last December 18.

I would like to thank all members of the committee who devoted so much time to this study last fall. I am sure they will find it a very viable background for a clause by clause study of this bill when it is referred to us after second reading. In particular I would like to thank my vice-chairman, the hon. member for Gamelin (Mr. Portelance), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Perrault), the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) who spent much time in discussion and in drafting our committee's report.

While our committee's proceedings were not as nonpartisan as those of another committee in which I have spent much time, namely, the Committee on Veterans Affairs, we have been able to get along quite well and I believe I am very fortunate in being chairman of such a conscientious, hard working and courteous group of Members of Parliament.

During our extensive hearings a few particular aspects of the unemployment insurance proposals were raised frequently. I would like to deal with some of them in the short time I have tonight, and tomorrow. First of all, I suppose that the basic question was whether we should have as universal a coverage as possible. As hon. members know, the legislation proposes covering all employees except the self-employed, with the exception of a very small group that will be exempted mainly because their earnings are either too casual or too intermittent in nature.

Our committee heard groups such as the Canadian School Trustees Association, the Canadian Airline Pilots Association, the International Association of Firefighters, the Canadian Nurses Association, the Canadian Teachers Federation, the Public Service Alliance of Canada and the Professional Institute of the Public Service in Canada, which represented a great many of the 1,200,000 new employees to be insured for the first time. The briefs from these associations, on universal coverage, varied from that of the Canadian Teachers Federation, which was against it, to the Canadian Nurses Association which favoured the concept.

I think many of us have always thought that nurses had one of the most secure professions in the world, that they could move anywhere and easily pick up a job because of the high demand for their services. I believe our committee members were astounded to hear that nurses were unemployed in some parts of the country, particularly in some of our cities. So they saw the proposal to give nurses unemployment insurance coverage as being of real benefit to the 50,000 nurses in Canada.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

VETERANS AFFAIRS—SUGGESTED MAINTENANCE OF HALIFAX SAILORS' MONUMENT BY DEPARTMENT

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I asked the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) a question concerning the sailors' monument which looks out over the Atlantic from the south end of Halifax. This monument was built a few years ago by the Commonwealth War Graves Commission in co-operation with the Royal Canadian Naval Association. It had previously reposed on Citadel Hill, but because the hill was shifting and they could not get a firm foundation, it had to be taken down to more level land. For some years the Royal Canadian Naval Association has paid the light bill to keep the monument lighted. Now the association has indicated it can no longer pay this bill which I think is in the amount of approximately $1,500 a year.

On February 22 I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) or his parliamentary secretary, on the "late show"—this mystic hour to which all Ottawa flocks—whether the Department of Transport could use the light on this memorial as a beacon which would be of help to shipping. I must report that the department was kind enough to check out the request. Unfortunately, it decided that the light could not fill the purpose of a beacon. So now I try again, with the Department of Veterans Affairs to keep this memorial light alive.

The minister gave his answer earlier today. Since he and I are very civilized people, I will not quarrel with the answer he gave and will not even try to repeat it, because he will give it in a few minutes and we will have it on record, but more amplified than the answer he gave in the question period. I have to accept his answer in good faith, because I put to him a question some weeks ago and he and his department were good enough to look into it and to give a serious response. But I am left with the fact that there is no answer regarding keeping this memorial light going.

It is a fact that 24 naval vessels were lost in the various battles of the Second World War in which Canada and the Royal Canadian Navy engaged—these battles being primarily in the Atlantic, some in the Mediterranean and one at least in the Pacific—and that 1,981 members of the Royal Canadian Navy lost their lives in these battles. I presume that most of them lost their lives in the Atlantic. For those facts I used as a source the Encyclopedia Canadiana, at page 380.

To put my request in a final sentence, Mr. Speaker, if the minister indicates that the Department of Veterans Affairs cannot take this on as a national monument—my argument has been that for the 1,981 men who lost their lives in the Atlantic Ocean, this memorial at the south end of Halifax is in fact their gravestone—and undertake its perpetual lighting, I shall turn to the Department of National Defence and finally to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development because of the historic site connotation; and if these three steps fail I will turn toward setting up some kind of private trust.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said this afternoon in reply to the question put by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), I can well understand the interest which he has in this monument. I believe that the Halifax memorial is a very impressive one and I know it means much to many people in the Halifax area and elsewhere. This monument was erected jointly by the government of Canada and the Commonwealth War Graves Commission in 1967. The land for the monument was provided by the Point Pleasant Park Commission and the monument was built near the site upon which the original memorial was erected following the First World War.

The floodlighting of the memorial was arranged by the Royal Canadian Naval Association in conjunction with the Point Pleasant Park Commission. At that time, in 1967, it was pointed out to the association that it was not within the authority of the Commonwealth War Graves Commission to instal floodlighting at memorials and crosses of sacrifice. There are some 22 crosses of sacrifice throughout Canada and no provision has been made for the floodlighting of any of them.

As I said this afternoon in reply to the hon. member's question, there are no funds provided in my department for this purpose. It has always been felt that local initiative could be enrolled and should be enrolled for this type of embellishment, thus creating more local interest in the memorial. I am sure that the hon. member, with his power of persuasion and his very civilized manner which I regard very highly, could succeed in enlisting the support of local veterans' associations and community associations. I am sure this would be a great source of satisfaction to himself as well as stimulating local interest in the monument—not only in the monument but in the supreme sacrifice of those to whom it was erected. If the hon. member wishes to tackle other departments on the subject I can only wish him good luck, but my advice is that he should try to enlist local support.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.06 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, April 20, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—KEEPING OF DOSSIERS ON MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege in respect of which I have given Your Honour notice. Since it affects an issue which we discussed yesterday in the House, I understand that oral notice has been given to the Solicitor General as well.

When I raised my question of privilege yesterday I think Your Honour quite wisely indicated that before the matter was decided Your Honour might wish to avail yourself of assistance and advice from other members of the House on the general issue of whether or not there is a prima facie case of privilege, in the absence of which, of course, no motion could be put.

Let me make it clear at the outset that I do not challenge the right of the authorities, including the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, in matters involving the criminal law or security to deal with Members of Parliament as Canadians in the same way as other Canadians are dealt with, subject, of course, to their traditional rights and privileges which I shall cite to Your Honour later.

There was one exception to this. There was a fascinating case in the United Kingdom in 1939 when Mr. Duncan Sandys, a Member of Parliament, came into possession of certain information with respect to the armed forces. This is a well known case and is cited in many of the authorities. How the information came into Mr. Sandys' possession is not clear, but he went to the Minister of Defence and asked that it be confirmed. He said if the information was given to him he would remain silent. The minister did not confirm the information but shortly afterward Mr. Sandys was served with a summons. He went into the House, raised the matter as a question of privilege and, as I understand it, the House took the position that only with the approval of the chamber could the summons proceed. This approval having been given, the matter went forward to trial. That is really not the case here.

What we are dealing with here involves the traditional and proverbial rights of Members of Parliament. Both May and Beauchesne deal with this question to some extent. May, for example, in the eighth chapter of the seventeenth edition at pages 122 and 123 states that it is not proper to impugn the conduct of members in the House or to threaten them with future exposure if they take part in debates of the House. The author goes on to say—I am now quoting from page 123:

> Conduct not amounting to a direct attempt to influence a member in the discharge of his duties but having a tendency to impair his independence in the future performance of his duty will also be treated as a breach of privilege.

I intend to establish my case by quoting to Your Honour statements from Hansard and from an interview conducted outside the House with the minister. It may be possible that the information collected with regard to Members of Parliament has been collected for no good reason and with no thought of future action, but if this is the case these files are no more than the product of a bureaucratic pack rat and ought to be destroyed.

• (2:10 p.m.)

I should like to quote from the British Bill of Rights:

> That the freedom of speech in debates or proceedings in Parliament are not to be impeached or questioned in any Court or place out of Parliament.

This surely remains in force, Mr. Speaker, even if Members of Parliament do not know whose conduct is being impeached or questioned or for what reasons.

Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, paragraph 119 (2), reads as follows:

> Freedom of speech is a sacred principle and if there is a place where it should be fully respected that place is the Parliament of the nation, and it is the Speaker's responsibility to see that this principle is not infringed upon.

Attached to the fourth edition of Beauchesne is a very interesting annex dealing with a report brought in by the United Kingdom Parliament on April 5, 1939. It is a very lengthy and useful report but I shall quote only two brief paragraphs. At page 428 of Beauchesne we find this statement:

> The dignity and independence of the two Houses...are in great measure preserved by keeping their privileges indefinite. If all the privileges of Parliament were set down and ascertained, and no privilege to be allowed but what was so defined and determined, it were easy for the executive power to devise some new case, not within the line of privilege, and under pretence thereof to harass any refractory member and violate the freedom of Parliament.

My second quotation from the report is as follows:

> Your committee would emphasize a point mentioned in the report which they made to the House in the last session of Parliament, namely, that the privilege of freedom of speech enjoyed by Members of Parliament is in truth the privilege of their constituents. It is secured to members not for their personal benefit, but to enable them to discharge the functions of their office without fear of prosecutions civil or criminal.

Having cited that as a very brief synopsis of some of the law, practice and precedents, I now put before Your Honour some of the statements made in this House yesterday and later outside the House. I am referring to page 5032 of yesterday's Hansard, and my first quotation is from a question put by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander). He asked:

> In view of the fact that some time ago one of the officials of the RCMP indicated to me during a meeting of the justice committee that perhaps there would be files on Members of Parliament in the event that complaints were made by constituents or members of the public, would the minister now advise whether, in the event of such complaint against a Member of Parliament, it is the policy to compile a dossier relating to that member?

Your Honour intervened at that point and then the hon. member resumed by asking:

May I ask whether, in the event of a complaint by a constituent against a Member of Parliament, the RCMP, rightly or wrongly, would compile a dossier relating to that member?

The ultimate answer given by the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) was:

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to make a statement on motions. I feel I have replied to the question and if the member does not understand me clearly, I wish he could be more specific.

A little farther down on the same page the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) asked this question:

However, at this time I should like to ask him—

He is referring to the Solicitor General.

—through you, Sir, whether it is now the practice of the RCMP to photograph, and in other ways cover public meetings in which members of this House, as well as civic officials, might participate, as was recently indicated by the premier of Prince Edward Island?

The answer of the Solicitor General was:

Mr. Speaker, some hon. members seem to think that they are in the United States. I do not know whether it is the practice or not. What motivates the decisions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is the need to take action. There is certainly no systematic policy about citizens. Events lead us. If some methods have to be used with regard to an individual, it is because there is a clear indication that it is necessary.

On page 5033 the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked a question, the last part of which is as follows:

Will the minister give his unequivocal answer that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, for whom he speaks in this House, have not, and are not continuing to have, dossiers on Members of Parliament? Let that be clear and let the House have the answer.

The minister replied and I shall only read the latter part because the first part consisted of an eulogy of the RCMP, with which none of us differ, Mr. Speaker. He said:

Now, I find no provision in the law—and if there is, I should very much like to be enlightened about it—to the effect that Members of Parliament are not also citizens, that they enjoy complete immunity and that they can do anything. If the House wishes to pass such a provision, the people will think that hon. members constitute a special category of citizens in this country.

The right hon. member proceeded to ask another question:

Mr. Speaker, there is no debate. I asked the minister the simple question: Are there dossiers on Members of Parliament? Members do not expect to be treated differently from anybody else, but Members of Parliament have the right to know whether this government has launched upon a system of looking into the lives of individuals through the Mounted Police.

The minister replied:

Mr. Speaker, I said that the department applied no general policy in this respect, and I might add that for the time that I have been Solicitor General, I have not seen the file of any member.

Mr. Speaker, later, outside the House, the minister was interviewed and the report contains two or three brief statements which I think are very relevant to this issue. This question was asked:

Does the RCMP have dossiers on all Members of Parliament?

A. I prefer this way to put questions than to be a little arrogant.

Q. No, sir, but you can't have dossiers on every citizen in Canada so I know that the RCMP have dossiers on some Members of Parliament?

A. Personally, as I said in the House, personally I never asked to see one dossier of a Member of Parliament and I have never asked to make an inquiry on one Member of Parliament—

The minister gave a further answer with which I should like to conclude, Mr. Speaker:

They might have dossiers on Members of Parliament. I am sure that they have dossiers on some Members of Parliament. You have Members of Parliament who are former civil servants and when a civil servant has to have access to top secret of course he has to accept the security clearance. This is normal and I think this is good.

Q. Now are you saying that it is not the policy to have dossiers on all M.P.s and you are also saying that you are not sure whether or not these dossiers do exist?

A. I am saying that there is no policy to the effect that we will have a dossier on all Members of Parliament. This is the information I have and this is the instruction—and also I am ready to give at any time but I am sure that I don't have to give those instruction. This is the practice.

Mr. Speaker, let me conclude with this very brief argument. I suggest that if you consider the compilation of all the questions and the answers given by the minister you will find there is no clear and categorical denial of the fact alluded to in the form of these questions, that dossiers are being kept in respect of some Members of Parliament as legislative representatives and that this constitutes an infraction of the privileges and immunities of this House. I suggest that this constitutes intimidation and a type of constructive blackmail that can only result in the diminishing of the freedom of members of this House. Surely it comes squarely within the definition of privilege which I have just outlined.

This refusal to give a straightforward and honest answer would be bad enough in connection with any government, but when it comes from a member of this administration which, with a few exceptions and in spite of some rather unbelievable expressions of affection for the parliamentary system, has shown by its actions that it is dedicated to the continuous erosion of legislative independence and freedom, it is unacceptable.

The neat question for Your Honour to decide now is whether a prima facie case has been made out, because more hinges on this than just this question alone. The minister's refusal to answer a consistent line of questioning both inside and outside the House must be interpreted as meaning that the minister is refusing for a very definite reason, and that reason lies in the fact that some dossiers are being kept and some scrutiny is being maintained on some Members of Parliament in their capacity as members. Does this extend to the point of interfering with the telephones of members of this House? There is no question that if they can do the one they can do the other. I think this is an extremely important issue to be decided.

If the facts raise a reasonable probability of a prima facie case, then I suggest to you as Mr. Speaker and as a lawyer that the implications of a prima facie case are not such that we have to establish the point beyond a reasonable doubt and not even by a preponderance of evidence. If the facts indicate to Your Honour there is a doubt, that there is a possibility that the actions of the government and of the police authorities suggest there has indeed been maintained some form of scrutiny or some form of dossiers on Members of Parliament in the exercise of their legislative capacity as representatives of the people, that is a prima facie case. I would go further and suggest that if there is any doubt a parliamentary committee might well make an examination and assist Your Honour on that point. The matter is one which is entirely for Your Honour to decide and in doing so I think Your Honour is entitled to ask for assistance either in the form of advice from individual members or from a committee. I suggest further that if Your Honour should conclude there is a prima facie case on these facts, I would be prepared to consult with Your Honour and the House leaders concerning the form of the motion which might be put.

Mr. Speaker: I have listened with much interest and attention to the hon. member for Peace River. I do not wish to suggest that no reply should be made by someone on behalf of the government in respect of the hon. member's question of privilege, but in view of the prescription of the new rules the Chair has had an opportunity to give the matter serious thought, to look into the precedents and to consider the background of such questions. Therefore I believe I am in a position now to give my view, right or wrong, but I can assure hon. members that the conclusion to which I have come has been reached after listening very attentively to the hon. member and particularly after considering the matter since yesterday when it was first raised by the hon. member for Peace River.

The hon. member has, according to the provisions of section 2 of Standing Order 17, given notice to the Chair of his intention to raise the question of privilege he has now stated to the House. In his written notice the hon. gentleman stated that it was his intention to raise the same issue in relation to which he endeavoured to propose a motion during yesterday's sitting. That point may not be material at this time but I do suggest to the hon. member that what he raises today is a new and much broader question than the one he raised yesterday. In the notice given by the hon. member it is stated:

> The issue involved of course is the breach of privilege involved in the extent to which there is likely to be intimidation of Members of Parliament to the extent to which they are subjected to scrutiny and inspection, and have records kept of them in their capacity as Members of Parliament by the RCMP or others on behalf of the government.

RCMP Files on Members of Parliament

This morning I had occasion to look back over the records of the House beginning with the year 1946 and I find that the question of alleged dossiers on Members of Parliament as such has been raised on a number of occasions. I might even say that it has been raised regularly and that there are many citations or quotations which hon. members might want me to bring to their attention. In particular, I might refer hon. members to Hansard for July 5, 1946, the first year in which my search began, at page 3201, when the then Minister of Justice stated in part:

> The hon. member also asks if there are any dossiers on Members of Parliament. There are no dossiers on Members of Parliament as such.

Again, on January 29, 1958, as recorded at page 3948 of Hansard, the matter was renewed in relation to a question on the order paper. The then Minister of Justice provided an extended reply to the question. A similar reply has been made in answer to similar or related questions on a number of other occasions. In the time at my disposal I have come across the following examples: Hansard for October 29, 1962, at page 1011; Hansard for November 4, 1963, at page 4341; Hansard for November 28, 1963, at page 5210; and Hansard for May 3, 1966, at page 4632. Additionally, hon. members may be interested in reading the debate of some length on the very same subject which is recorded at pages 5161 to 5166 of Hansard for June 25, 1959.

The conclusion to be drawn from the questions asked and the answers given over an extended period of years is that hon. members have had reason to believe that dossiers might well exist in relation to individual Members of Parliament in their capacity as citizens at least, if not in their capacity as members as such. Also, in the same period the suggestion has come from successive ministers that if such files exist they relate to individuals in their personal capacity and not in their capacity as Members of Parliament.

The question is whether there are any special circumstances which might indicate that what was not considered privilege in previous years might be made the subject of such a question at this time. In my view there could be a prima facie case of privilege only if there were specific allegations or special circumstances leading to the conclusion that police or other activity is of such a nature as to interfere with a member in the discharge of his responsibilities in Parliament.

Hon. members may refer to Erskine May's classic definition of privilege often quoted in this House as it appears at page 42 of May's seventeenth edition. Parliamentary privilege is defined as the sum of the peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the high court of parliament, and by members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions, and which exceed those possessed by other bodies or individuals. Thus privilege, though part of the law of the land, is to a certain extent an exemption from the ordinary law.

According to this definition, privileges are those special rights recognized as belonging to Members of Parliament over and above the law of the land as it applies to other citizens. Parliamentary privilege is the sum of extraordinary rights claimed by Parliament for itself to ensure that Parliament can function freely and without hindrance. These privileges are very limited in scope, and parliamentary law itself prescribes that this scope cannot be extended. Essentially, parliamentary privilege is, therefore, freedom of speech beyond the prescriptions of the common law in reference to libel and to slander.

Does parliamentary privilege as thus defined include a special right and exemption from the law, a special privilege providing an exemption from a practice which applies to other citizens equally? Do the very particular circumstances alluded to by the hon. member for Peace River constitute a prima facie case of breach of parliamentary privilege which might be referred, as suggested by the hon. member, to a committee for the purpose of advising the Chair?

I must say in all honesty and after much consideration of the matter raised by the hon. member for Peace River and the very important points made yesterday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert that it would be difficult for the Chair, in view of past practice, to conclude that in the present circumstances there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege. I suggest to hon. members that it would be imprudent of the Chair to project the question of police files beyond the circumstances or conditions raised by the hon. member and beyond the particular circumstances alluded to by the minister in his reply to the House and in the statement made outside the House to which the hon. member for Peace River has alluded.

For the time being, and considering the very special circumstances, I cannot find a prima facie case of privilege on the facts as presented to the Chair thus far. I think I should insist that I consider the matter to be a very serious one, that certainly I recognize the duty of the Chair on behalf of all hon. members to ensure that it will be possible for them to discharge freely their responsibilities as Members of Parliament, and if any special circumstances were brought to the attention of this House and to the Chair that hon. members in any way, by police or other practices, were in some way intimidated in their work or prevented from discharging their duties freely and without hindrance I would have no hesitation in recognizing the matter as a breach of privilege. But I must rule at the moment on the particular circumstance brought to the attention of the Chair and decide whether there is a prima facie case of privilege on this basis. My finding must be that there is not.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I shall wait until the Minister of National Defence returns to the House in order to welcome him back to Canada properly.

[Mr. Speaker.]

OIL

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—STUDY OF EFFECTS OF POSSIBLE POLLUTION FROM TANKERS—MEETING WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of the growing evidence of increasing support in the United States for the Trans-Alaska Pipeline System, now supported by the President's Economic Council and by the U.S. Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Maurice Stans. Has any study been made by his department as to the possible effects of large oil tankers travelling between Valdez and Cherry Point and other points on the Pacific coast and, if such a study has been made, has it been completed and will it be made available to the members of this House?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would assume that by "possible effects" of the transportation of oil the hon. member means the possible effects of some disaster, natural or otherwise, in the transportation of oil. The answer is that studies are under way on this question and have been for some time, not all related to the particular project to which the hon. member has referred but generally in connection with our environmental studies. With respect to the west coast route we also have a study under way at the present time with regard to additional navigational aids and various forms and devices that might make the route safer. This study is not completed, but when it is I see no reason why it should not be made available to the House.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister if the information which his department has already collected as to the possible damage to the fishing industry and to the coast of British Columbia has been transmitted to the government of the United States, indicating the Canadian government's concern and the Canadian people's concern regarding the possible ecological damage to the west coast?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the normal channel for the transmission of such information would be through our own Department of External Affairs. The Department of Transport has certainly made all of the data available to that and other departments of the government, and I am sure that at least in part it has formed the basis of the communications and the fears that have been expressed already by that department.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct one further supplementary question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been corresponding with the United States Secretary of State regarding a possible meeting, may I first ask the Prime Minister if such a meeting has definitely been set, and if in the meantime the Canadian government has made any representations that the TAPS program not be proceeded with because of the possible dangers to the west coast of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the meetings to which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has referred in this House have taken place. I do not know when they were or are to be scheduled.

[Later:]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have an answer to a question which the leader of the New Democratic Party asked me earlier, if I might be permitted to give it. It relates to the meetings between the Canadian government and the Department of State in Washington on the question of the pollution of the Pacific as a result of possible oil transportation from Alaska to the northwestern United States. I have been informed that there has been agreement to set the meetings for May 3 and they will take place on that date.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has a supplementary to the prior question.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I have a question related to those asked by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands of the Minister of Transport. Are any discussions or negotiations going on with the province of British Columbia leading to the establishment of permanent protective arrangements, along the lines recommended by the Arrow task force, for oil leakage prevention and clean-up on the Pacific coast?

Mr. Jamieson: Not specifically with the government of British Columbia as of this moment. However, the recommendations that came from a committee of this House and from the McTaggart-Cowan group with regard to the establishment of a contingency plan are nearly completed. Many parts of them are in fact complete, and when this is done we will be discussing them with all of the provinces that have coastal waters and that are concerned about those waters, as we are. That should be within the next month.

NATIONAL PARKS

QUEBEC—ESTABLISHMENT OF PARK IN TÉMISCAMINQUE

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who is also responsible for national parks.

Are discussions taking place with Quebec authorities at the present time concerning the establishment of a national park in Témiscamingue?

Hon. Jean Crétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there are no discussions taking place at the present time concerning the establishment of a national park in Témiscamingue. I know that all Quebecers feel it would be desirable to develop national parks not only in Témiscamingue but in other areas of the province as well.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister.

Can he tell us if any action is now being taken by his department for the restoration of the ancient fort of Ville-Marie?

Mr. Speaker: I believe that the supplementary question could be put on the order paper. And I wish to point out to hon. members that I have always had serious doubts about questions of the kind asked by the hon. member. In any event, I assume that he has obtained the information that could be useful to him.

[English]

I believe the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe has a supplementary question.

BONNE BAY—LETTING OF CONTRACT FOR SURVEY WORK

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. Georges-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, would the minister indicate whether a contract has been let to do survey work on the national park in western Newfoundland, Bonne Bay park?

Mr. Speaker: Again I suggest that question might well be placed on the order paper.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

MEASURES TO ALLEVIATE EFFECT OF COST OF LIVING INCREASE ON PEOPLE WITH LOW INCOMES

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Can he tell us what are his intentions as regards the substantial increase in the cost of living during the past month? Since this increase affects low-salaried employees and people receiving old-age security pensions, does the minister intend to take steps to offset the effects of this increased cost of living on elderly people or low-income groups?

[English]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the annual increase at 1.9 per cent was the lowest experienced by any western country, and therefore any change in policy to deal with that for the moment satisfactory situation would have to be made by the government and announced by the Minister of Finance from time to time as would be appropriate.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Could the minister say whether, following this cost of living increase, he has given new directives or contacted the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission in order to request explanations on the failure of this agency?

Inquiries of the Ministry

[English]

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF COMPULSORY WAGE AND PRICE CONTROLS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the recent statement by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to the effect that the all-item cost of living index rose by 1.2 per cent in the first quarter of this year, the largest advance in over a decade, is the government now considering compulsory price and wage controls for specific industries or for the entire economy?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, of course any announcement like that would be made at the appropriate time and not during the question period.

Mr. Ryan: Has the minister caused preparations to be made in the event a decision is taken by the government to impose controls, and has he consulted with the provinces about expected or anticipated co-operation in the event a decision is taken to bring in controls?

NATIONAL SECURITY

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—REPLY TO QUEBEC REQUEST

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act which will die a natural death, as I hope it will, at the end of the month. Is he now in a position to say whether the government intends to permit it to die and not introduce other legislation or whether the government has in mind changes in the Criminal Code designed to cover the general situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the right hon. member that an announcement will made on this before the end of the month.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. There is a delightful air of uncertainty about the Prime Minister which I can understand in view of the division in the cabinet. I would ask him, however, if the government has replied to the request of the government of the province of Quebec for permanent legislation to cover situations such as that which arose last fall? Has there been a reply and, if so, what was the nature of that reply?

An hon. Member: Take it up with Dalton Camp.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there has been no written reply by myself to the Premier of Quebec. We have considered his letter and are taking into account representations which he made to me. He, too, will know the answer before the thirtieth of the month.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I realize it is very imprudent to try to get an answer from the Prime Minister on this but I would ask if a reply was sent by any minister of this government to the government of Quebec in consequence of the request that was made in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I feel sure I am right in saying there was no reply. It is conceivable there has been one but I doubt it very much. The letter was addressed to me and I did not answer; therefore I cannot see how any reply would have been sent to that letter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You were away at the time.

Mr. Trudeau: I might add that, as I told the House earlier, there have been verbal discussions on this subject between the Premier of Quebec and myself.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister in connection with the request made to Ottawa by the Quebec government, Mr. Speaker. Is any further legislation necessary since the premier of the province of Quebec has assured the European countries that all is well in that province?

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Joliette, who wishes to put a supplementary question.

[English]

I wonder whether I could invite the co-operation of hon. members so that we might try to consider more subjects than we did yesterday. I still have to recognize a number of hon. members who did not have an opportunity to ask their questions yesterday. I undertook that I would look in their direction early in the question period and I am counting on the co-operation of all hon. members in order that I might be able to achieve that.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Since the special measures must be repealed at the end of the month, can he tell the House whether there will be a meeting with the Quebec premier in this connection before then?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not aware of any such meeting being planned, Mr. Speaker. Apparently, the Quebec premier is in Europe and I personally do not expect to meet him to discuss the matter referred to by the hon. member before the end of the month. However, as the hon. member knows, I am always open to such proposed meetings.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED BUGGING BY ELECTRONIC DEVICE OF RESIDENCE OF ST. JEAN-BAPTISTE SOCIETY OFFICIAL

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Solicitor General. I would ask whether he has received a report from a Mr. Cossette, chairman of a section of the St. Jean-Baptiste Society of Montreal, that his personal residence was bugged by an electronic device and, if so, what is he proposing to do about it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I indeed received a wire from Mr. Cossette, which he had first sent to the Minister of Justice, and in reply I intend to point out to him that no Canadian law forbids such practices, as the hon. member knows. Naturally, the practices are open to anybody, police forces as well as private detective agencies and ordinary citizens. This means that anything goes.

As for this case, I shall simply say that the established practice in the House has been, for a long time, even when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was Prime Minister, to consider such matters as not in the public interest, which does not mean that my answer is either positive or negative.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister. Has the Solicitor General ordered that the device be removed from the home of Mr. Cossette?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, if someone loses a pencil in a house, I doubt that it is up to the federal government to go and find it. Now, as I have indicated, there is nothing illegal about the object in question, or any other for that matter, being in the possession of the government or an individual.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are a number of supplementaries but I believe I should return first to the hon. member for Greenwood.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, in light of what the Solicitor General has told us, can he say whether the government is giving consideration to bringing in legislation which would make it illegal to instal these electronic listening devices in the private residences of citizens without a court order.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that a committee of the House has looked into the question and submitted a report; the cabinet is now in the process of studying the matter.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not intend to reply to the gratuitous falsehood expressed by the minister but I do intend to ask him a simple question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Did the Mounted Police plant a listening device in the home of Marcel Cossette? It is as simple as that.

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I merely wanted to remind the right hon. member that when he was Prime Minister, the Minister of Justice of the day used to answer exactly as I have done.

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, these hypothetical statements do not in any way answer the question. The Solicitor General should be able to tell the House whether this was done. Members of Parliament are beginning to wonder if this is happening elsewhere as well.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. My backbenchers are again being lost in the shuffle and I propose to defend their rights this afternoon.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ELK ISLAND—ANIMAL STARVATION—INVESTIGATION OF WILDLIFE SERVICE AND PARKS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development if he has had an opportunity to review the situation at Elk Island Park which resulted in mass suffering and starvation of elk and other wildlife and the subsequent mercy killing operation? Can the minister indicate whether a full investigation will be launched into the functions and responsibilities of the Canadian Wildlife Service and the parks administration with particular reference to this incident?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, my Parliamentary Secretary answered a similar question on the day the House adjourned some time ago and there is nothing that I could add to the comments he made on that occasion.

[English]

Mr. Mazankowski: In view of the fact that an elk feeding program was not instituted as suggested by the minister in answer to a question I posed to him and which is recorded on page 3865 of Hansard, can the minister indicate whether this development reflects a change in policy or is it a failure in the administration of existing policy?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the National Parks Branch or the Canadian Wildlife Service cannot possibly foresee all the weather changes liable to occur during the winter season. That was an unusual situation in that area and I am sure that the National Parks Branch and Canadian Wildlife Service employees will record this experience and know how to face any similar conditions in the future.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON TRIP TO AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I want to welcome him back from his south seas holiday. It is nice to see him again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Yewchuk: Could the minister indicate if he will be making a statement on motions to report on his trip?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker, I still want to know whether the minister will be making a report to the House of Commons by a statement on motions.

FLOODS

REGINA—FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I was going to direct my question to the minister in charge of the Post Office but as he has stepped out of the chamber I will direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Since it appears that recent flooding conditions in Regina were contributed to by a more rapid run-off of spring water caused by the greater acreage of summerfallow encouraged by Operation Lift last year, will the federal government give consideration to assisting the province of Saskatchewan and local communities—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that his question is asked in the form of an argument.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ALLEGED DELAY IN SUPPLYING INFORMATION TO MANPOWER CENTRES

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that information on the student militia and civilian employment phase of the Opportunities for Youth program has not yet reached Manpower centres, even though it was indicated that it would be done early in April, will the minister investigate this situation in order to avoid similar delays under the works projects and report to the House at the earliest opportunity?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): My understanding is that it has been circulated Mr. Speaker, but I would be glad to check on the hon. member's allegation.

AIRPORTS

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE—JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTE BETWEEN FEDERAL AND QUEBEC GOVERNMENTS CONCERNING PROJECT WORKERS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I wish to direct a related question to the Prime Minister in view of the fact that a question regarding manpower has been raised. My question deals with the recent report to the effect that constitutional hangups have shut down the biggest project in Quebec, the Ste. Scholastique airport, and my understanding that the jurisdiction of the federal government regarding manpower has been challenged by the province of Quebec. How long has the government been aware of this situation and what means has the government at its disposal to resolve this very serious problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that the first part of the question is in order but certainly the second part is. Perhaps the Prime Minister may want to reply.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Certainly, Mr. Speaker. We have been aware of this very regrettable problem for several months. There has been a long series of meetings with Quebec officials to try to resolve this problem. I hope it will be satisfactorily resolved. It is an almost nonsensical situation when there are so many unemployed—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: —that because of a constitutional quarrel workers are not working on this very large and important project. The point of view of the federal government has been made known to the province of Quebec. We have repeatedly indicated our desire to go ahead with the project. Of course, we have no authority over labour laws in the province. We are trying to get the province of Quebec to find a solution which would be in the best interests of the workers.

Mr. Alexander: In light of the fact it appears that the province of Quebec denounces the authority of the federal government in this very touchy area, is the Prime Minister in a position to advise the House what further steps are being contemplated if the province of Quebec continues its stand regarding the position of the federal government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as a long-term solution the hon. member probably knows that the question of jurisdiction over the whole area of Manpower has been raised at the constitutional conferences. It has been discussed at the constitutional conferences and will be discussed again. In the meantime, I cannot see any solution which could be imposed by force by the federal government. I repeat that we are continuing to seek an amiable solution to this problem with the provincial authorities.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Brandon-Souris on a further supplementary.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture. Can the minister indicate whether there has been a cutback in summer job opportunities in the experimental farm services related to the Opportunities for Youth program?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this is hardly a supplementary, but as the question has been asked the minister might reply briefly and quickly.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I will check into it, Mr. Speaker. I do not believe there has been a cutback in summer job opportunities.

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—CONSULTATION BY ONTARIO AND QUEBEC WITH FEDERAL GOVERNMENT ON VALIDITY OF PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. Did the governments of Ontario and Quebec consult with the federal government on whether the legislation passed by those provinces restricting the import of farm products might be considered ultra vires by the federal government and contested in the courts?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I am not sure I seized the import of the question. I might attempt to answer by saying that the question has been raised at federal-provincial conferences at least twice. As we indicated in the House following those conferences, there was general support for the federal legislation on farm marketing and there was general support for the position that this would be the best possible solution. Some provincial delegations did, of course, suggest a reference to the courts, but the consensus seemed to be that legislation was the proper way. At that time we indicated our regret that the legislation had been stalled for so long by the opposition.

STUDY OF CLEANING OF SHORES OF ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Can the minister tell us whether it is correct that his department, in co-operation with the Department of Public Works, is making a study on the cleaning and development of St. Lawrence river shores between Quebec City and Montreal?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I am not certain about that question, Mr. Speaker. I will have to take it as notice and get an answer when I can.

HOUSING

REHABILITATION OF HOMES IN TORONTO

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing. In view of the fact that Montreal has applied for financial help from the federal government to renovate 100,000 homes over the next 10 years, will the minister give the same consideration to metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the question of rehabilitation of homes in Montreal was the subject of discussion about a month ago with Montreal and Quebec government officials and members of my staff. We made no precise commitment to a program of rehabilitation except to examine it as well as many other urban programs and problems in Montreal. As far as Toronto is concerned, several months ago we offered the city of Toronto a loan fund at low interest rates to be applied to the rehabilitation of homes. We are asking the city of Toronto to advise us on the details they would like to apply to the implementation of that program. I am certain the people there are aware that this is a much more complicated situation to deal with than had been apparent at first. With no criticism of them, I think they join us in recognizing that we have a lot to learn about this. We want to proceed with this program.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

EFFECT OF IMBALANCE UNDER UNITED STATES-CANADA PRODUCTION SHARING AGREEMENT ON FUTURE CANADIAN PROGRAMS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of questions I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence arising out of his discussions with United States Secretary of Defence Laird, but I will accept Your Honour's admonishment. Arising out of his discussions with the Secretary of Defence, Mr. Laird, and having in mind particularly the imbalance Mr. Laird has drawn to our attention with reference to the 12-year old defence production sharing agreement, will this be a major determining factor with respect to programs that we have in the offing such as the replacement for the Argus, will we go ahead with the Orion or will the economic factor not be a consideration?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): I would like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of the question. I confirm that the primary dominating factor will be the defence consideration. With regard to the military question as to what position will be taken on the long-range patrol aircraft, I confirm that no decision has been made. While the primary consideration will be the military one, a very important subsidiary one will be the opportunities through this program for creating further employment for Canadians.

Mr. Forrestall: Can the minister give the assurance I am sure all Canadians are looking for that there will be no serious reduction in the number of jobs available to Canadians in the coming year, 1971-72, as a result of the attitude of the United States with respect to defence sharing? In other words, are we going to lose any jobs in the next year?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is rather difficult to predict, Mr. Speaker. It depends on United States orders. With regard to defence programs, either in the United States or Canada, obviously there is not as much buying in Canada as there was in years past. I cannot give that definite assurance.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—SUFFICIENCY OF FUNDS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON CRITERIA AND OBJECTIVES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I had hoped that today, Mr. Speaker, I might have been able to direct this question either to the Secretary of State or to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the importance of the Opportunities for Youth program, would the Prime Minister tell us, now that the deadline has passed and the projects have been received, whether there will be sufficient funds available to cover the projects in respect of which applications have been made and, second, when we may expect a more complete statement on the criteria and objectives involved since there is uncertainty in the country as to the extent to which this program will help those in need of jobs so that they will be in a position to return to school in the fall?

[Mr. Andras.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I did discuss this matter with the Secretary of State following the hon. member's question yesterday. He tells me he will bring the subject back to cabinet in order that the success of the program, together with various questions raised by the hon. member, may be assessed. I am sure he will wish to report in due course on the success of the program which he tells me is very great.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am grateful to the Prime Minister for his assistance in this regard. Can he tell us how soon we may expect a more complete statement from the Secretary of State, having regard to the shortness of the time available and the large number of students who are even now coming on to the job market?

An hon. Member: Very shortly.

Mr. Trudeau: I heard the answer from over there, Mr. Speaker. I hope it will be very shortly.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the statement by the Secretary of State that one in three of these projects may have to be rejected because the $15 million allocation is not sufficient, and bearing in mind the disappointment which many who have worked hard preparing these projects will undoubtedly feel, may I ask whether the $15 million is a fixed sum or whether the government would be prepared to consider increasing it so that all legitimate projects submitted can be accommodated?

Mr. Trudeau: The $15 million or thereabouts was part of a larger sum amounting to $57 million, I believe, set aside for summer projects. In considering the report to which I have just referred, we shall see whether there is any money left over from some of the other projects and, if so, it might be reassigned. This may not be practicable, however, because according to interim reports the government's program has been effective and successful in most areas.

ASSISTANCE TO APPLE INDUSTRY BECAUSE OF IMPORTS

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I should like to address this question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister made representations to the Minister of National Revenue with a view to the necessary action being taken to bring some relief to the hard-pressed apple industry by curbing the importation of apples and apple products?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker. There have been several interdepartmental meetings respecting that matter.

MANPOWER

EMPLOYMENT PLANS FOR THOSE LOSING JOBS AT WINNIPEG AIRCRAFT OVERHAUL BASE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): My question, Mr. Speaker, is directed to the Minister of Supply and Services. In view of the sharp staff reductions at the Winnipeg aircraft overhaul base, and in light of the commitments made earlier to the government of Manitoba and to former employees of Air Canada that the base would continue as a viable operation for a number of years, may I ask whether the department has worked out any plans for further employment for the hundreds who are being dismissed?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): It is correct, Mr. Speaker, that the United States Air Force intends to phase out the T-39 program. This will be done during the summer months, and there will still be some planes going in as late as September. During this period my department and other departments will be working to find ways to increase the workload.

AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION ACT TO PROVIDE MORE REALISTIC RAILWAY PASSENGER POLICY

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the government received and heard an important submission from the Canadian Railway Labour Association. My question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Have the minister and his department given any consideration to amending the National Transportation Act in such a way as to provide new directives and thereby open the way toward a more relevant and realistic rail passenger policy in Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I will consult Hansard because that sounded like a pretty good preamble.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED CUTBACK IN DELIVERY TO APARTMENTS, OFFICE BUILDINGS AND SHOPPING CENTRES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have a question for the minister responsible for the Post Office. Is it the policy of the Post Office Department, as charged by the president of the Letter Carriers Union, to cut back delivery in high-rise apartments, large office buildings and shopping centres?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Coté (Minister without Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Dinsdale: Can the minister give an assurance that there is no threat to job security as charged by the president of the union?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Coté (Longueuil): We have hired over 600 more letter carriers than we had in 1969.

NECESSITY FOR STAMPS IN MAILING INCOME TAX RETURNS

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): My question, too, is directed to the minister in charge of the Post Office. Has there been some change in the postal regulations which makes stamps necessary on completed tax forms going to the tax data centre in Ottawa?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Coté (Minister without Portfolio): Stamps have always been necessary.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

FARO, YUKON TERRITORY—PLANS FOR SEWAGE TREATMENT PLANT

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): My question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Has the hon. gentleman's department any plans for a sewage treatment plant at Faro in the Yukon Territory, having regard to the involvement of the federal government in the building of the new townsite?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I must take the question as notice. I shall inquire and get in touch with the hon. member directly on this subject.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PRESENCE OF DEPARTMENTAL OBSERVER AT LAVELL HEARING

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Is an observer from the minister's department watching the progress of the Lavell case which is presently before the courts?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I don't know if there is an observer on the scene but we are following with much interest the legal proceedings that are being carried out in Ontario.

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the minister undertake to give Mrs. Lavell some sort of relief by legislation or regulation if the courts are not able to do so?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is hypothetical.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ASSURANCE THAT ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE DEVICES NOT USED IN COMPILING DOSSIERS ON MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): My question is directed to the Solicitor General. In cases where dossiers are prepared on Members of Parliament for whatever reason, will the minister clearly and unequivocally assure the House that the RCMP has not used and will not use electronic surveillance devices when compiling such dossiers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I said, I believe police methods have to be applied to all citizens and that in law, they are all equal. That means that when the RCMP have reasonable motives to make an inquiry they do use all legal methods available.

[English]

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Can the Solicitor General tell us whether members will be allowed to see these dossiers, if they exist, particularly their own?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF NORTHUMBERLAND CAUSEWAY BY PRIVATE INTERESTS—FEDERAL ROLE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the hon. gentleman now been advised of Premier Campbell's representations in favour of the construction of the Northumberland causeway by private interests, and can the minister tell us what role he will be playing in this latest resurrection?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): So far, all I know is what I read in the papers.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Malpeque.

Mr. Yewchuk: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Malpeque. Is the hon. member for Athabasca rising on a point of order?

Mr. Yewchuk: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry my question sounded funny, but I think the minister was ready to reply and I should like an answer.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Malpeque.

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PROPOSED CHANGES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would he make a statement on motions, or at least table a statement on motions, in the near future giving a comprehensive outline of the proposed changes in the connecting ferry services between Prince Edward Island and the mainland?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that during my absence the letter or wire that I had sent to Premier Campbell of Prince Edward Island was at least made available to members from that province. That is as comprehensive a statement as I have at the present time. If there is anything further or more specific any hon. member would like, I will do my best to get it, but that is the situation at the present time.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that in that statement there was no mention whether the Gray would provide winter service at a time when it is vitally important to have icebreaking as well as rail service to and from Prince Edward Island, could the minister clear up what is a matter of major concern to the people of Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am in the process of doing that. I had a wire from the premier of Prince Edward Island this morning asking me that very question and a reply to it is being drafted. I should be glad to make that available as well.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day. Is the hon. member for Timiskaming rising on a point of order?

Mr. Peters: Yes, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I should like to ask the House Leader whether, in view of the interest of the government in Bill C-176, he would have it reprinted now so that we can satisfy requests for copies of the bill. I did raise this point in committee and requested that 2,000 copies be printed. The committee agreed to my request and then it was found that this was a responsibility of Your Honour. This is the reason I raise the point in this way.

Mr. Speaker: The information which the Chair has received through the usual channels is to the effect that there has been a reprint and that the reprinted copies are available at the present time. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

PROVISIONS RESPECTING INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT, COMMISSION, BENEFITS, PREMIUMS, ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Monday, April 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackasey that Bill C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. David Weatherhead (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in making some comments shortly before ten o'clock yesterday evening on the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, I was pointing out I was going to discuss some of the main points that came before the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration during our long hearings on the white paper on unemployment insurance last fall. I stated that the first point we should consider was the question of universality, whether all employees should be covered by unemployment insurance or not. Then, I went on to say that we had heard a great number of briefs on this subject, that some of the new groups, such as the Canadian Teachers Federation, did not appear to favour universality as far as their teachers were concerned. But other groups coming in for the first time, such as the nurses, did favour universality because some nurses are now finding themselves unemployed for the first time.

Continuing my remarks, I should like to say that some of the teachers are not happy at being covered by unemployment insurance, and Members of Parliament have been the object of a quite well organized campaign by some teacher organizations in recent months to make their objections known. They have every right to mount such a campaign, as has any other group or individual who wish to make their views known to the government and to Members of Parliament.

However, it was the committee's opinion, and my personal opinion also, that the contingency of interruption of earnings is not now restricted to certain groups in Canada, as it may have been in earlier years, and that therefore no employee should be excluded from coverage if it were possible to include him. Many of us, including myself, would like to see as a matter of principle the self-employed covered also in order that the sharing of the financial burden of unemployment be as widely spread as possible. So far, however, neither the unemployment insurance commission nor the government have been able to come up with any formula that would enable them to decide when a person who is self-employed could justifiably claim he was out of work. I note that in his remarks last night the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pleaded for coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act for the self-employed, but he did not say just how this was to be done or how abuses could be prevented.

Many tend to think that most of these 1,200,000 employees being insured for the first time are relatively highly paid people with very secure positions. However, more than one-half of these new entrants, including many working in hospitals and charitable institutions and many working for governments at the various levels, earn under $7,800 a year at the present time. Teachers have been very secure in their positions in past years. However, with the introduction of the birth control pill, the strict financial restrictions being placed on school boards for the first time since the depression of the 1930's, and with the introduction of new teaching techniques via closed circuit TV, cable, etc., it would be a brave teacher who could be sure that his or her job is completely and absolutely secure for the next 20 years. There are similar uncertainties in the public service at all levels. People in certain job categories are being let go for almost the first time, and the armed forces are being reduced in numbers and becoming more selective in personnel; and the same applies to other groups to a greater or lesser extent.

Although groups such as the teachers and public servants do have more risk of unemployment than before, it is true to say that they are still a very good risk as far as unemployment insurance is concerned. By including in the scheme these better risk groups and all employees earning over $7,800, we will be able significantly to help the financing of the main reforms in this legislation—much higher benefits, shorter qualifying period, etc. This will help keep off welfare people who have contributed to unemployment insurance, often for a great number of years, but who are unfortunate enough to find themselves without work for perhaps the first time.

Many of the unemployed find themselves getting various small amounts, up to $58 a week in benefits, and there is no way they can finance themselves for very long without many of them going on welfare. However, if the same workers who have paid into the plan for years get two-thirds of their income in benefits, which in areas like Toronto would mean that most would receive benefits of between $75 and $100 a week, then they could hold their heads high and get along without welfare for a considerable period of time. Similarly, the much shorter entry requirements of eight weeks for partial benefits and 20 weeks for full benefits, rather than the 30 weeks over a two-year period as before, will be of particular benefit to younger people who have a difficult time getting established in the work force, and who unfortunately make up a disproportionately large share of the unemployed.

After the tax deductible features are considered, the teachers and others being covered for the first time will be asked to pay a net of about 40 cents a week commencing on January 1, 1972, which will be increased to a net of about 80 cents a week once the plan is completely operative. In my personal discussions with teachers both at a recent teachers convention here in Ottawa and at meetings in various parts of my constituency, I have found them very reasonable and largely willing to be covered once they are made aware of the whole situation; and I believe this is the case with the other groups also.

Before leaving the subject of new groups who will be covered for the first time, my friend the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) devoted considerable time in his opening comments yesterday to what he called the adverse financial impact on the local school boards of having to pay the employers' share of the cost of covering teachers under unemployment insurance. He recited some escalating figures in that regard for the next few years, and I must confess I did not jot them down. However, I believe my figures more or less agree with his and show a cost of $3,600,000 to Ontario school boards in 1972 and a cost of $6,500,000 in 1975.

I believe though that additional costs, Mr. Speaker, should be kept in perspective. It should be noted that the province of Ontario gave about $814 million to the Ontario school boards last year and the school boards raised about as much again through municipal taxes. Accordingly, even in 1975, $6.5 million out of a figure now spent by Ontario school boards of $1.6 billion would be less than one half of one per cent of their education budget. On the other hand, the Ontario taxpayers will be benefited by paying an estimated $22 million less for welfare because of the increased benefits, a shorter eligibility period, etcetera, under the new legislation. Therefore, we have a $6.5 million additional cost on one hand, against a $22 million saving on the other, and the same principle applies to the other provinces.

One of the other matters that kept coming up in brief after brief was that of the proposal to experience rate employers. The proposal was that employers be experience rated according to their particular lay-off patterns as compared to the lay-off patterns of employers as a whole. On this basis, it would be possible for employers with a very high lay-off rate to pay up to double the employee rate. The basis for these proposals was primarily to try to encourage employers to plan their work better over the whole year and to avoid as much as possible lay-offs for seasonal or other reasons. The other reason was to make the industries with the worst lay-off patterns pay more of their share of the unemployment insurance benefits that result from the lay-offs they initiate. The Unemployment Insurance Commission showed our committee figures which stated, for instance, that in 1968 the manufacturing and trade and commerce industries put $37 million more into the fund than their employees drew out in benefits, while the construction, forestry, fishing and trapping industries withdrew $94 million more from the fund than they contributed in that year.

The briefs indicated mixed views on experience rating, with some labour briefs being in favour and some opposed. The same split in opinion appeared in management briefs. Perhaps the strongest argument against experience rating was that lay-offs in some industries were due to causes beyond the control of the employers; weather, seasonal factors, economic policies, and so on. However, only industries with abnormally high lay-offs will be affected by higher contribution costs. Another criticism is that experience rating would constitute a penalty to high risk enterprises. However, there may well be employers who find it profitable to operate with a highly fluctuating labour force, relying on unemployment insurance to provide assistance to those who are unemployed. This practice should certainly be discouraged. It should be emphasized that the lay-off factor in all likelihood will be based on a running three-year average which will smooth out abnormally high single year costs over surrounding years.

The committee, after listening to these and other arguments on the subject, agreed to the concept of experience rating of employers in general, but suggested that each employer within a given industry be experience rated against others in that industry rather than against all employers in all industries in Canada as a whole. It seemed to the majority of the committee that it would give more incentive to, say a firm in the construction industry, to reduce wide variations in its lay-off patterns if it were competing in experience rating against other construction firms only and not against the lay-off patterns of all employers in Canada. The new act does provide that the "commission may make regulations to provide a system of experience rating" with respect to employers premiums to the fund, which I believe is fully justified and in many ways essential to the new plan. However, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) has indicated before our committee and elsewhere that he has an open mind regarding the application of experience rating and he is fully committed to discuss all the details of its application with all interested groups, before it comes into effect in 1974.

One of the other proposals that received great attention in our committee was the inclusion of sickness and pregnancy benefits in the unemployment insurance program. This new legislation allows the payment of benefits of up to 15 weeks, after a two-week waiting period when the employee has worked 20 weeks in the past year, has had to leave work and has had his or her unemployment benefits interrupted because of sickness or pregnancy. There is no question that this varies one of the supposed long-standing requirements for unemployment insurance benefits, namely, being ready, able and willing to work. However, this requirement has been subject to an exception since 1953 which allowed those who fell sick to receive benefits, but it did not extend to employees who lost their earnings because of sickness.

In other words, if any employee at the present time falls sick after he commenced receiving benefits he is allowed to continue to receive them, but an employee who has to leave work because of sickness is not covered. This seemed to be a great anomaly to the committee, and very detrimental to an employee who had to leave work because he was sick. The International Labour Organization convention advocating the provision of maternity benefits is accepted by most as one that ought to be dealt with. It is also recognized that wage loss insurance or salary continuation insurance is not available to a large part of the labour force, and that it is a desirable objective that most employees require this protection in the early years of service with any one employer before they have acquired much seniority.

I believe I am right in saying there are about three million employees at the present time who are not covered by any private plans for salary continuance during sickness. Most of these work for employers of fewer than 10 people and it is very difficult for such groups to be insured under private plans. Some groups that came before our committee stated they favoured the pregnancy and sickness proposals in general, but they thought they should not be included in an unemployment insurance act. However, it should be emphasized that this is not sickness and pregnancy insurance as such. It is not available to everyone who becomes sick or pregnant, but it will provide unemployment benefits only for employees who have worked for 20 weeks in the last year in the case of interruption of earnings due to sickness and pregnancy.

There are about three million working women in the labour force today and they are and have been for a long time a very vital part of our work force in Canada. Many have worked continually for a long time, have paid into the unemployment insurance fund for a long time, and then decided to have a child. As the minister stated yesterday, a large number of women work to provide the necessities for their families. Therefore, I believe they should be entitled to unemployment insurance benefits for a 15-week period to enable them to have a child. This, tied into amendments to the Labour Standards Code now before the House with respect to maternity leave, will give the female employee significant new rights to which, in my opinion, they are well entitled.

There was considerable discussion in our committee on the impact that the unemployment insurance benefits for interruption of earnings caused by sickness would have on present private employer-employee sickness plans. It was originally envisioned that the Unemployment Insurance Commission would be a second payer, to pay the difference between a private work-related plan and the total of a two-thirds benefit for the up to a 15-week benefit period. However, it soon became evident at our hearings that these private work-related plans would be quickly renegotiated between employers and employees to put the UIC into the position of first payer, with the private plans picking up supplementary coverage to top off the UIC and/or plan for coverage after the 15-week period.

While about two-thirds of the employees in Canada have either no sick leave insurance at all or else have sick coverage inferior to that proposed in this new legislation, there is about one-third of the work force that is covered by private work-related plans which give them as good or better coverage in this field than that proposed now by the government. It, therefore, became highly questionable whether the government should disturb these good plans which now provide this adequate coverage to these workers. Accordingly, there is a provision in this new act which allows the UIC to give a rebate in premium to an employer to cover the sickness insurance portion when that employer has as good or a better private sickness plan for which he is already paying. If part of that private plan is being paid for by employees also, then the employees will get a pro rata share of that rebate.

Before leaving the subject of sickness and maternity benefits, I think I should mention that the question of abuse control in this area has been thoroughly considered. I believe the member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander), expressed some fears on this subject last night and it was discussed from time to time in our hearings. However, the duration of benefits payable in sickness will be governed by consultation with medical authorities and will be payable only on presentation of a medical certificate authenticated by a member of the medical profession. The UIC has a great deal of experience in control and prevention of abuse which is just as applicable to sickness as to other benefits. Indeed, the UIC has been criticized by some in the past for being too strict in abuse control. The two-week waiting period for benefits of course will automatically rule out eligibility for short-term illness which causes great expense in some of the private plans where the waiting period is sometimes as short as two or three days. In addition, any work related sickness or injury will not give rise to a claim for benefits under unemployment insurance as such contingencies are covered under various provincial workmen's compensation acts.

I certainly do not have the time now, Mr. Speaker, to go into a detailed commentary on all the other diverse aspects of this new legislation. However, one of the points that both the hon. member for Hamilton West and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre raised last night concerned the advisability of making a non-returnable three-week lump sum benefit payment in advance after the two-week waiting period. We heard in committee the argument that it would be a deterrent to looking for a new job quickly and, on the other hand, that it would be an incentive to do so. It seems to me that those who see it as a deterrent to seeking early alternative employment have too gloomy a view of human nature and have also ignored the high cost of living, particularly in our urban areas.

Let us consider the case of the $150 a week worker in Scarborough who is suddenly laid off. First of all, he will have to go two weeks without any income at all, and so loses $300 less tax right there. Then, he is entitled to receive $300 unemployment insurance benefits less income tax of say about $60 for the next three weeks instead of $450 less tax if he were still working. Accordingly, for the first five week period of unemployment he would receive a net of about $240 from unemployment insurance benefits rather than $750 less tax which he would have received from his ordinary employment. Now, the member for Hamilton West or others may think that this unemployed man, who is probably a skilled worker, will be tempted to stay home and not look for work in these circumstances. However, I strongly agree with the member for Winnipeg North Centre on this particular point. I believe that particular, proud, skilled craftsman will want to get back to work as quickly as possible; that he really will not be able to afford to stay at home, and that the three-week guaranteed benefit payment will be an incentive to search for new work immediately. Our committee did recommend that this lump sum three-week payment be made in two instalments, to help tide the worker over that period. I understand that the government is thinking seriously of doing this, but the basic right of the unemployed person to three weeks of benefits after a two-week waiting period, whether or not he finds a job in the meantime, should remain.

I am sure other members will have very worthwhile contributions to make in this debate and I shall look forward to hearing them. I could have said a lot more about the value of the greatly increased benefits, the reduction of the premiums to those presently covered, the shorter number of weeks that have to be worked to establish eligibility, the tax deductible features of the premiums or deductions for the first time, the fact that benefits will be taxable for the first time to ensure that the more highly paid seasonal worker pays his full share of tax, and the financing arrangements which will be purposely very costly to the government if unemployment is at a high level. I believe the minister and the government are to be strongly congratulated in presenting to the House this new unemployment insurance act which includes so many kinds of benefits for the Canadian workers, male and female, and indirectly to their families. I am looking forward to the thorough discussion of the bill in our committee.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my first observation regarding Bill C-229 respecting unemployment insurance in Canada is that the wrong minister is taking responsibility for its introduction. The bill is, in all essential respects, a piece of welfare legislation and, as such, it should be the responsibility of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) to guide this complicated and exceedingly baffling piece of legislation through Parliament. If any hon. member thinks I am being facetious in my observation, I would suggest that he turn to the white paper entitled "Unemployment Insurance in the Seventies" on which the bill is based. In the second column on page 8 thereof he will find the phrase: "benefits will be higher, more related to earnings and given more on the basis of need than length of time in the work force".

What insurance scheme, Mr. Speaker, provides benefits more on the basis of need than on earnings? This is not a concept found in insurance schemes, but it is certainly the basic concept of every welfare measure. Now, if the government wishes to establish a guaranteed annual income, then let it have the courage to come before this House with measures which clearly state such intentions.

I have studied with great care the government's white paper "Unemployment Insurance in the Seventies" and the bill now under consideration. I have studied the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration in an effort to come to as broad an understanding as possible of the government's proposals and the extent to which they represent a genuine improvement over existing legislation. I have no quarrel with the proposition that the present scheme requires overhauling. However, Bill C-229 certainly does not accomplish what is needed in this vital field. The scheme which the government now proposes is doomed to failure from the outset, within their concept at any rate, because it is actuarially unsound. It is most interesting to note that the white paper makes no attempt to document statistically the claim that the government will be able to provide increased benefits to a much larger segment of our work force on the basis of reduced premiums. This is simply an absurd impossibility.

The whole matter of the actuarial unsoundness of the proposed legislation is one with which I should like to deal at length on another occasion. However, for the moment I should simply like to make some short observations regarding the alleged savings in costs under this proposed legislation. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) claims that there will be two major savings, one in the amount of $160 million which will result from having an extended waiting period for benefits from the present one week to two weeks before a claimant is eligible for benefits, and a second major saving of $120 million, allegedly to result from the elimination of the government's seasonal unemployment benefits. Unless the government intends to deprive certain people who now have benefits under the existing act from having them under future legislation, these savings are entirely illusory. The matter of the alleged savings of $160 million, which the government claims will come about by extending the present waiting period for benefits from one to two weeks, is in no way supported in the government's white paper.

While the government proposes that one must be unemployed for two weeks before he becomes entitled to initial benefits which then become payable to him on the first day of the third week of his unemployment, it ought not to require a great deal of imagination or foresight to see that many eligible claimants will simply defer taking employment until they have been unemployed for two weeks and one day, thereby becoming eligible for three weeks of benefits, rather than accepting employment a few days prior to this date and thereby depriving themselves of the three week's benefits to which they would then be entitled. The proposal the government has made in this regard simply invites flagrant abuse. Moreover, the first week's benefits to which a worker is entitled by reason of having paid into the fund are confiscated if he secures employment within the first two weeks of his unemployment. The repudiation of the validity of the alleged saving of $160 million by extending the waiting period to two weeks is contained in the government's white paper. Again, I would direct hon. members to page 20 thereof and this paragraph dealing with phase one:

> Past experience indicates that it takes three to five weeks to find employment under normal conditions.

By the government's own admission, Mr. Speaker, under "normal conditions", which we have not had for some time, it takes a job applicant longer than the two week waiting period provided in this legislation to find employment. How, therefore, can they say that the legislation which they propose will effect a saving of $160 million by increasing the waiting period before entitlement to benefits from one to two weeks? This merely delays payment of benefits, but that is not the same thing as saving the benefits.

The government also alleges a second saving under this proposed legislation of $120 million arising from the elimination of seasonal benefit payments. What then is to become of the people who now receive these benefits? Surely, they will have them replaced by some other type of benefit, or is the government simply going to leave them to their own fate? Fishermen were one class of people who benefited from these provisions, and the government mentions in its white paper that special provisions for fishermen will remain. I presume that these are going to cost money, and in all probability more money under the proposed legislation since the benefit payments are higher than under the existing act. The question which I want to have answered is: how much will these benefits cost and what will the real saving be which the government alleges will be made through the elimination of seasonal benefits.

Since becoming a member of this House, I have read a great many white papers and reports by special committees, but none has been so bereft of substantiating evidence or documentation as the white paper on unemployment insurance. The most elaborate and far reaching claims are made without the slightest shred of evidence to support them. On page 5 of the government white paper we find this:

> Persons with a short work history may have even greater problems than those who have a long term labour force attachment. Allowing workers to take early advantage of an unemployment insurance program prevents them from falling into unstable work patterns. Instead, they are effectively integrated into the productive main stream.

My question is, very simply, how? The real problem of our economy is in creating new jobs, in revitalizing various segments of our industry and in bringing about taxation measures which offer a genuine incentive to increased productivity. Welfare measures of the kind proposed in this legislation will do nothing to create jobs. They may very well, however, have the detrimental effect of creating large classes of people who are capable of work and desirous of being gainfully employed but who, by reason of the government's mismanagement of the economy, will become nothing more than recipients of monthly handouts from the state, subsidized by those people who are productive members of the work force and by their employers.

The government's assumptions throughout the white paper have been based on a national unemployment rate not in excess of 4 per cent. Largely through the government's own efforts this country has in the past year been plagued by a national unemployment rate which is very nearly twice this figure. I wish that I could see on the horizon clear signs that in the next very few months the national rate of unemployment would return to levels of 3 per cent or 4 per cent, but I do not. I think we must, therefore, take very lightly the claims which are set out in the white paper assuming that the national rate of unemployment will be 4 per cent or less.

At current levels of unemployment, and by that I mean the level of unemployment which has persisted in the past year, the unemployment insurance fund would operate at a deficit of approximately one half billion dollars on the basis of the schedule of payments and the period of payments proposed in the act now before the House. I make this claim on the basis of a lengthy and most detailed study on the financial implications of the government's proposed changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act by a prominent Canadian chartered accountant, whose views were substantiated by an independent actuarial consultant. They were further discussed at length and in person by him with the officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the result of which was to force him to conclude that however desirable may be certain features of this proposed legislation they cannot be implemented under existing circumstances without the fund operating at a deficit of some several hundred millions of dollars.

I note the following in the white paper:

> The government is not only willing to help the unemployed and the less advantaged by providing a system of incomes support during an adjustment process; it is also ready to assume the cost of extra unemployment insurance benefits when the national unemployment rate exceeds 4 per cent or when regional unemployment is over 4 per cent and exceeds the national average by more than 1 per cent.

This certainly appears to be a very generous statement for the minister to make. However, I wonder where he believes the means will be found which will enable the government to pay these extra benefits. It is the people of Canada, the taxpayers, who will assume this cost. Who else but the people of this country provide government with the funds to carry out such programs? I suggest that the present bill is simply a further example of the government foisting on the people of this country socialistic measures which are neither wanted by the vast majority of the people nor needed, nor are they within the financial means of the country. In reading the minutes of the proceedings and evidence of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration respecting the white paper on unemployment insurance, I was struck by the fact that the overwhelming number of witnesses who were heard opposed this bill. That should provide reason in itself for the government to consider whether it would not be best to rethink its proposals on unemployment insurance.

Perhaps these objections were best summed up in the presentation made to the committee on October 13, 1970, by the Canadian Teachers Federation. The federation said in its brief:

> There is no doubt that the present unemployment insurance scheme, if it is to continue to exist requires over-all reform. Proposals to improve the financial condition of the fund by drawing in groups with a low expectation of claims are not new. We have consistently opposed them on the grounds that they represent selective taxation of an inequitable kind. They are not made more attractive by the addition of benefits which are generally already enjoyed by those whom it is proposed to include, nor by the addition of a highly doubtful claim to universality. From our point of view, even within its own terms, the present proposal for amendment of the unemployment insurance scheme creates more difficulties and anomalies—and of a more baffling kind—than it resolves.

Also, in an editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 2 of this year, headed "Unfair Tax" we find the following:

> It has been obvious for some time that, whatever else Canada's revised unemployment insurance plan will be, for many people it will not be insurance. People who have no need for such a plan, and who cannot hope to benefit or receive protection from it (which is what insurance is supposed to do) will be paying, in effect, an additional compulsory tax. And employers will be levied a similar tax.

As insurance, this has little to be said for it under any circumstances; it has even less to be said for it when the employer is the already overburdened ratepayer. Yet, this is what the new plan will involve with respect to unemployment insurance for teachers. The Manitoba Teachers Society has estimated that the cost to Manitoba school boards will be in the neighbourhood of $1 million a year, and this figure is borne out by an independent study made by the Manitoba Association of School Trustees. The trustees estimate that the cost per teacher will be $25 in 1972, rising to $62 in 1975. For Manitoba's 11,500 teachers this will mean a cost to property owners of over $280,000 in 1972 and over $700,000 by 1975.

So, you can see that the cost of unemployment insurance will fall on the homeowner and will increase property taxes, something that we do not desire at this time.

When one remembers that under the proposed legislation one can become eligible for benefits with a minimum period of eight weeks attachment to the work force, and when one is mindful of our present levels of unemployment and our slow rate of economic growth aggravated by the high rate at which people are coming onto a depressed labour market, I submit that what is being proposed in this legislation is a program of such vast and devastating consequences for the public purse of this country that it cannot but result in the imposition of increased taxation measures which only remove from our enonomy money which is badly needed to lift it out of its present shameful condition.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Charles Turner (London East): Mr. Speaker, as a member of Canada's working force for many years, I have had the pleasure of paying unemployment insurance contributions for over 25 years with the knowledge that I would not draw benefits from the plan until I retired. However, I always had the guarantee that in the event something did happen to my job, I could apply for and receive benefits for many weeks until I was once again employed. The Good Book tells me that I am my brother's keeper. Therefore, I have willingly contributed to help my sisters and brothers who have not been so fortunate as I have been.

I know what it was like to be without a steady job during the dirty thirties. I know all about the hardships of looking for a steady job and having many employers tell me, "Sorry, nothing today." I would like to point out that in the thirties we had no unemployment insurance plans for the unemployed. I was very fortunate that, because of musical training, I could always go out and make a few dollars. Thousands of unemployed Canadians were not in that position and had to fall back on welfare.

In July, 1941, the Liberal government of that day brought Canada's unemployment insurance scheme into operation. The act provided for earnings-related contributions and benefits through a systems of earnings classes, and established an earnings ceiling for coverage of salaried and weekly wage employees based on their annual rate of earnings. In these basic respects, the principles underlying the scheme are the same today as they were in 1941.

The new unemployment insurance act contains self-adjusting features which are based on a moving average of "average annual earnings." The average annual earnings for a year will be calculated as the average of salaries and wages actually paid to employees in Canada, based on information set out in returns under the Income Tax Act and supplied by the Department of National Revenue. The people of this nation need and are entitled to three basic security plans during their lifetime: unemployment insurance benefits in the event of loss of job, lay-off or sickness; medicare coverage for all health services; and a good retirement plan when their working days are over. Bill C-229 goes a long way towards helping to alleviate the hardships of unemployment through loss of job or sickness.

The inclusion of sickness and maternity benefits in the proposed legislation has given rise to a great deal of discussion. I think it well to note that the inclusion of sickness benefits in the unemployment insurance program is not a new concept, but rather is one that has had considerable support over a period of time. The extension of payment of unemployment insurance benefits to persons who became ill while on claim became law on May 14, 1953, although the bill introduced by the government did not extend the payment of benefits to persons who lost their earnings because of sickness. The arguments against the inclusion of sickness and maternity benefits have been directed mainly to the extension of unemployment insurance into the health insurance area rather than dealing directly with these situations according to the best political and social principles.

Mr. Speaker, 35 per cent of the Canadian work force is organized and, therefore, has some form of income sickness insurance. It must be recognized that wage loss insurance or salary continuation is not available to a large part of the labour force, and it is a desirable objective. Most employees require this protection in the early years of service with any one employer. I am convinced that the unemployment insurance program is the proper vehicle with which to achieve these desirable coverages. When workers are sick the landlord still wants his rent or mortgage payment. The groceryman still wants cash for his groceries. Therefore, the sick worker must have some protection, otherwise he will find his savings eroded and he will wind up on welfare.

This bill attempts to fill what is a substantial gap in the coverage offered by private carriers. For example, most private insurers are unwilling to provide coverage for groups of fewer than ten employees. I understand that there are about 300,000 such establishments in the country. In addition, a great many existing plans do not offer a comparable rate of benefit nor a comparable ease of entrance. A federal public servant, for instance, requires five years of service before he can accumulate sick leave comparable to the 15 weeks maximum sickness benefit proposed in the new bill.

Another good feature of this legislation is the portability between employers. Very few of the private plans are portable, and this can and does create a hardship for an individual who is required to change his or her employment. I think it is important to point out that the control of abuse of sickness and maternity benefits will be governed by consultation with medical authorities, and that these benefits will be payable only on presentation of a medical certificate.

One of the basic features of the proposed unemployment insurance program is the lowering of the qualifying requirement to eight weeks of attachment to the labour force in the last 52. This is a proposal that received a great deal of attention during the deliberations of the parliamentary committee. I note that the representative of the Conservative party has questioned the proposal to lower the barriers for entry into the plan. However, there was no suggestion made as to what the minimum entry requirement should be. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) suggested that the reduction of the qualifying period would encourage abuse, but on the other hand noted that the program would be of little assistance to the growing number of young persons with no work experience who are not eligible for jobless benefits nor retraining programs. I wish I knew what the hon. member was advocating. Either he is for or against this aspect of the proposal; he cannot be for and against.

I was gratified, on the other hand, that there was very little criticism or objection in the parliamentary committee report concerning the new plan to lower the period necessary to qualify for benefits. There were a number of statements in briefs about minimum attachment to the labour force, but these varied from recommendations to increase the present length of attachment to the labour force to reducing it to zero for those just entering the labour stream. It goes without saying that setting the minimum attachment to the labour force before being eligible for benefits is a matter of judgment based on a number of considerations, such as the objectives of the program, other conditions of entitlement, and probably the administrative mechanisms that are in place to reduce to a minimum the possibility of abuse.

I must emphasize that the lower qualifying requirements have been proposed only after a considerable amount of research and study centred around the motivation of the individual, the needs of a worker when faced with a loss of earnings, and the ever-changing composition of our society, which brings with it a reshaping of the labour force and its attendant dislocation of individuals. The results of these studies have shown us that no rigid guidelines are available from which we could formulate a hard and fast rule for qualifying, but there are indications that current conditions require a re-orientation of our thinking in terms of providing protection and assistance to members of the labour force. Therefore, we must look to our objectives in deciding on a level of minimum attachment.

We cannot ignore the deplorable fact that under the current plan several hundred thousand workers who become unemployed cannot meet the existing requirements. Persons in this situation generally turn to public welfare agencies for assistance, and are faced with a level of subsistence which is inadequate to meet their needs. The psychological effect of this situation on the individual who is without work does not need to be emphasized because every indication is that he will have a much more difficult time in finding steady employment than the person who, through steady attachment to the labour force, receives a level of benefit which is acceptable during the time he is looking for suitable employment. One of the main purposes in reducing qualifying requirements is to provide a minimum benefit to those people who have a short work history, as it is often this group that has the most difficulty in becoming re-employed.

You are aware that benefits under the present act are related to length of attachment to the labour force and bear no relationship to the difficulty in becoming re-employed. More specifically, qualification is established by having made 30 weekly contributions over the past two years, eight of which must have been in the last year. Entitlement to benefit, therefore, is based on past history rather than on prevailing economic conditions. These conditions, of course, bear heavily on the ability to find employment and the proposals in the bill take them into account in the determination of entitlement to benefits. With today's rapidly changing economic environment, the very large relative increase in the number of younger people in the work force, and the increased mobility of the working population, it has become necessary to relate entitlement of benefits to a much shorter and more recent work history.

The hon. member has stated that any unemployment insurance scheme must maintain a proper balance between providing temporary income maintenance and facilitating reabsorption into the labour force. I could not agree more, Mr. Speaker, and the proposals of the bill are designed to do just that.

Another factor which enters into this consideration is that of cost. A balance has to be struck between what you are trying to provide and the cost of providing it. We can increase the cost of the program by lowering the qualifying requirements to nothing, as some have suggested, or we can reduce the cost of the program or provide better benefits by increasing the entrance requirements as suggested by those who are more conscious of costs and have expressed fears about abuses. Let me reassure you, Mr. Speaker, that the studies carried out to establish the costs for the new program have shown that this balance can be reasonably established with a work force attachment of eight weeks in the last 52 weeks.

The qualifying conditions that are part of the proposals of the bill will provide a substantial measure of short term financial support, in the event of unemployment, to the Canadian labour force. This financial support, coupled with the other services which the government plans to make available to claimants, will ensure that proper guidance and motivation are provided to the person who is faced with the loss of earnings. In view of the factors I have just put forward, in terms of cost and in terms of reasonable attachment, I am confident that the qualifying requirements are compatible with our rapidly changing labour environment. I would not like to depart from the principles of the bill because it seems to me that to do so would be an injustice to Canadians who participate in the development and enrichment of our country.

In this fast changing society in which we live, the working force of this nation needs protection from loss of jobs and this new unemployment insurance act helps Canadians in the event that changes have to be made in their work pattern. Many Canadians during the past few years have found that in this machine age many jobs have been eliminated and, therefore, in the transition period of retraining for a new job some form of income protection for all Canadians is needed. Unemployment insurance in the past has helped immensely during this change period, and therefore this new bill is most welcome. In my opinion, all Canadians, including the self-employed, should have protection and I sincerely hope that ways and means can be found to make this plan truly universal.

No government likes unemployment or inflation, but history has proven that we have high and low points in our economy and, therefore, we must have some kind of income protection during those low points. This new unemployment insurance act will help many Canadians during the trying days of sickness and unemployment and, in my opinion, it is a desirable piece of legislation. I congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) for looking ahead and providing the kind of income protection that all Canadians require.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) made it clear yesterday that, generally speaking, members of this party welcome this first complete rewrite of the Unemployment Insurance Act since 1955, while indicating also that there are some parts of it we would like to see changed in a way which would lead to an improvement. It is not my intention, Mr. Speaker, to attempt to cover the same ground that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre dealt with last night, but rather to deal with a couple of particular aspects of the whole question of the application and administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act which I feel are pertinent to this debate.

In view of one or two remarks made by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie), I would like to suggest that his opinion that this was welfare legislation rather than insurance legislation indicated a very misleading appraisal of the intent of the bill. I suppose one could indulge in semantics by saying that any kind of insurance plan is welfare legislation because essentially it is a matter of a group of people sharing the risk of the individual suffering a mishap or disability. I would assume from what the hon. member for Dauphin said that he will be opposing this bill at the conclusion of second reading, and I will be interested to see whether he follows his remarks with his vote.

I should like to make one further reference to his remarks, Mr. Speaker. He suggested that the overwhelming number of witnesses appearing before the committee were opposed to the bill. He argued, therefore, that the bill must be basically wrong. I think his remarks would be much more illuminating had he taken the time to list the type of witness who appeared before the committee to register opposition. I think it would be clearly revealed from the record that most of the witnesses expressing opposition were from the elements of our society most concerned with extracting their pound of flesh from the working people of this country, either by avoiding paying any increases in wages or by getting it from the workers in their capacity as consumers. I was very concerned that the greater number of the witnesses who appeared before the committee represented such an imbalance of opinion in this country. I am glad to note that the members of the standing committee which dealt with the white paper did not yield to the pressures of vested interests.

When we were considering changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act in 1955, I can remember saying in this House that I should like to see the day when all workers in Canada who had made one premium payment into the fund would be qualified for benefits. This goal is not achieved by this bill, but I mention it because the hon. member for Dauphin suggested rather sneeringly that since a person could be eligible after an attachment of only eight weeks to the labour force this was a welfare measure.

I should like to address myself to one particular aspect of the bill to which the minister made reference in his opening speech, Mr. Speaker. I refer to the stated intention of the government, which is long standing, and the stated intention in the bill as it is before us, that sooner or later coverage of fishermen under the Unemployment Insurance Act will be discontinued. The minister said that the coverage will continue until it is replaced by something else. This is certainly what the bill proposes. The minister suggested that it will be replaced with a suitable plan, but he did not say to whom it would be suitable nor did he give any indication what the nature of the plan might be. In considering this bill, we are faced with a situation where we are in effect asking the fishermen of Canada to buy a pig in a poke. They do not have any idea what may be brought forward as a replacement for the coverage they now enjoy.

There have been some rumours emanating from the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) that there may be some form of catch insurance. It has been rumoured that this might be covered by a payment of something like 7½ per cent of the gross value of the fisherman's catch. To the best of my knowledge, there has been no official statement from either the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) or the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry as to what may be in store for the fishermen as an alternative to unemployment insurance. This House should not give approval to the passage of this bill until we have some definite indication as to what the alternative will be for the fishermen. On the other hand, we could amend this bill to incorporate benefits for the fishermen under the plan on a permanent basis.

When I directed a question to the minister, he gave his assurance that coverage will continue until there is a replacement. I reported this to the fishermen in my constituency. I said I accepted the minister's word at face value. I say to the minister that the fishermen to whom I have talked are not prepared to accept that statement as something to which they can agree in relation to this bill, without discounting the truth of what the minister said. As far as I have been able to ascertain, the fishermen would sooner be provided with definite coverage under the Unemployment Insurance Act, which is in the tender hands of the Minister of Labour, than be pushed more completely under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In British Columbia, where we have been having legislation by press release with regard to the licencing of salmon fishermen, the fishermen want no part of any scheme that the Minister of Fisheries is likely to devise. If for no other reason, I urge the House to reconsider the position of the fishermen under this legislation.

I find it completely incomprehensible that the government would even think of bringing forward this piece of legislation for second reading without at least having given first reading to the measure in the mind of the government as far as the fishermen are concerned. It is not as though this idea had been suddenly sprung upon us. It has been lying around since 1961 when the Gill commission report was tabled. There has been adequate time for the fullest consideration to have been given to possible alternatives for the fishermen. In the absence of any such alternative at this time, we can only conclude that the government has failed to come up with any alternative that approaches what they, let alone the fishermen, feel would be a suitable alternative.

The fishermen feel as though they are being pushed from pillar to post. They are becoming increasingly desperate. If they are not made the victims of incursions from foreign fishing fleets, they are suffering from the degradation of the environment as a result of other industrial activities in this country. They are constantly being hemmed in by new and more restricted legislation of the Department of Fisheries in an effort to conserve depleting stocks of various fisheries. The amount of time which fishermen are allowed to work is being reduced. They become involuntarily unemployed at the whim of the Department of Fisheries. If any group of workers is subject to the hazard of interruption of earnings, it is the fishermen of this country. This is one of the most important omissions in the thinking of this government with regard to what should be considered a more universal application of unemployment insurance.

In his speech, the Minister of Labour stated that there are welfare connotations attached to the present unemployment insurance scheme for fishermen. I do not quarrel with that statement, but I would like to point out if there are welfare connotations attached to the plan which was developed for fishermen, they were brought in by a Liberal government. I can remember when the then Minister of Labour introduced this plan after I had been arguing for coverage for the fishermen of British Columbia for two or three sessions. I remember saying to the minister that even in their wildest dreams the fishermen never expected the government to come up with a plan like the one that was being introduced then.

In many respects, the existing plan is completely topsy-turvy. The fishermen in British Columbia who need the coverage least are able to draw the benefits. The men who suffer are not eligible because of the lack of the necessary number of fishing stamps. It is true that more money has been paid out of the fund to fishermen than they have contributed through their premiums. I think if one were to examine the situation closely, occupation by occupation, he would find a great many other groups of workers in various parts of the country that have drawn more by way of benefits than they have put into the fund by way of premiums over the years.

Rather than maintaining this present unsatisfactory position which leaves the fishermen up in the air, not knowing where they are going to be, the sensible thing would be for the members of the standing committee of this House who study this bill to do a thorough rewrite of the present arrangements for unemployment insurance coverage for fishermen. For a long time, I have been saying that they are obvious faults and flaws in the present arrangement. In fact, I have been saying this ever since the plan was introduced. I think this would be a realistic approach for the committee to take. Even at this time, I hope that on reflection the Minister of Labour will accept this idea and persuade his colleagues in the cabinet also to accept it.

The minister did make reference to the old argument that fishermen are self-employed as an excuse for eliminating them from coverage under the plan. But everyone who really understands the situation in the fishing areas of Canada knows that fishermen are working people subject to the interruption of their earnings to a larger extent than many other categories of workers. As far as I am concerned, this is all the more reason for devising a technique to make sure that they benefit from coverage, not on the basis of welfare but as participants in the work force. It is true they may have more tools and equipment with which to carry out their occupation than other workers possess, but many of the workers covered by the legislation do provide at least part of the tools required to enable them to do their jobs.

My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre touched upon this question of unemployment insurance for self-employed people and expressed some hope that coverage could be extended so as to cover this class of worker. A good deal of experience has been accumulated about this particular group, the fishermen, because they have been covered by the act for a number of years. A start in the direction indicated by my hon. friend might well be made with this particular group of workers. We could examine the flaws in the existing plan and devise steps to correct them, for it is not beyond the bounds of reason that the present arrangements could be rewritten so as to eliminate some of the present anachronisms. Thus, I hope the committee, when it studies the provisions in this bill intended to continue temporarily coverage for fishermen will examine this question again, get to the bottom of it and come up with a solution better than the nebulous suggestion made so far from the government side about providing some other suitable plan.

There is one other matter I should like to talk about for a little while and it has to do with the administration of unemployment insurance. When this bill becomes law, the Unemployment Insurance Commission will again be charged with the administration of the system. As in the past, the Commission is given wide latitude in respect to the way in which the administration is carried out. I notice there is a clause in the bill before us which provides for the Commission to establish branch offices as it sees fit, and a similar section exists in the present act. I have been looking over a book called "Instant World" which was tabled in the House recently by the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans). There is one sentence in it which strikes me as being most apropos to the whole matter we are considering. If the minister will look at page 39 of this publication he will see that in summarizing the seminars which were held on the subject of telecommunications and computers the following words are used:

> It was evident that most participants were deeply concerned with the need to put "soul" into the system.

I believe this is an ever-growing concern among people throughout the world. They seem to feel lost in some vast, soulless system which crushes and grinds them until they do not know which way to turn. The aspects of this feeling which are brought out in the report on telecommunications and computers to which I have just referred are in many ways frightening. I now suggest that many Canadian working people have gone through some frightening and frustrating experiences of lack of soul in the administration of unemployment insurance. The fact that we are now revising the act gives us an opportunity to deal with these shortcomings in a way which has not been possible for a long time. It is essential that we do so. We could develop the finest system of unemployment insurance benefits—on paper at least—that could be imagined; it could look perfect in its provisions, even to somebody like my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre, yet if the cheques did not get out of the computers and into the hands of the workers the whole system would be worth less than the paper on which it was written.

At least some of the working people in Canada, and, to my knowledge, a good many of the working people in my own constituency, feel so frustrated by the remoteness of the administration of unemployment insurance, so helpless when faced by these impersonal machines, that they have given up trying to get the benefits to which they are properly entitled. They say it is easier to go down to the welfare office and get social welfare payments. In fact, some of the workers on Vancouver Island have been doing just that.

I bring this up because going about my constituency during the recent recess I sensed strongly that this feeling had been growing to such an extent as to put the whole concept of unemployment insurance in jeopardy. The feeling has been aggravated by the introduction of computers into the system of administration, though it does not arise entirely from suspicion of the computer. I have here a file which dates back to 1967 when a policy of phasing out local unemployment insurance offices was inaugurated. I suppose that in my constituency there are some 70,000 people, many of whom may be subject to interruptions in their earnings to a greater extent than are workers in other parts of the country, yet there is not one properly qualified unemployment insurance claims representative in the whole constituency.

I have been raising this matter ever since this phasing out first took place. I have some letters that admit there were some bugs because it was something new, that assert that this business of handling claims by long distance would settle down and there would be no further problems. But these problems have kept recurring and recurring, and quite frankly all the answers I have been able to get in this House have simply been an attempt to smother the situation in soft soap. That is the only way I can assess the situation judging by results. The situation in this last winter has, if anything, been worse than before.

I do not know that I want to take the time of the House to read the kind of replies that I have received from ministers of labour and top administrative officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in Ottawa because the list is lengthy. I have some correspondence of more recent vintage which I will refer to, but I wonder what is the use of even bothering the genial Minister of Labour about this? Certainly, unless something a little more drastic happens than has been the case in the past when I have written to the minister or the commission or asked a question in the House, this situation is not going to improve.

I should like to make reference to an answer I received on a "late show" presentation in 1969. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour concluded his reply with these words:

> I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that persons living in Campbell River are receiving good and fast service from the Unemployment Insurance Commission, as is the case everywhere in Canada. However the commission will re-examine its operations in the area to determine whether it would be possible to expedite the system somewhat at periods of peak claim activity—

That is the kind of answer I have been receiving ever since 1967 about this administrative question. I did receive some more communications earlier this year. I have one from the secretary of the Port Alberni local of the IWA dated February 18, 1971. Part of this letter reads as follows:

> The number of calls that we have had for assistance are beyond numbering and I would guess that during the months of December and January there were telephone calls at our expense at least once every second day. In addition to those calls the Nanaimo Unemployment Insurance Commission office has co-operated in placing calls back to this office.

I want to make it very clear that I am not speaking in condemnation of the attempts that have been made by some people in the field to cope with this problem; it is simply that they have not been given the tools or the direction to do the job. The letter I have just referred to was prompted, I may say, by an advertisement that appeared in the Vancouver Province for Thursday, February 18 last. It is headed "suburban Service for UIC Claimants" and goes on to list handy addresses where people can obtain "closer to home services" from the commission. Yet if one of my constituents has a problem he wants to discuss with a properly qualified claims officer of the commission, not one can be reached within less than 50 miles and most have to go a good deal further than that.

This letter goes on to point out that during the two previous months interviews, investigations and phone calls had taken up practically half the working day for one person in one local union office. It continues:

In other words, this office has replaced the now closed Unemployment Insurance office that used to be in Port Alberni. In addition to the technical problems at this end the new computer in Vancouver has just raised particular hell. Some legitimate claims have taken as much as two months to unscramble and there are still some being processed.

The letter then gives a detailed outline of the situation, and at the end of the letter there is a postscript which I offer to the minister for this consideration. It reads:

You can tell the Unemployment Insurance Commission people in Ottawa that we want some service for our members and if we cannot get it in the way that we have suggested then we have fully qualified stenographic help in this office and the UIC can give them a course of instruction, and help pay the cost of their wages for supplying a service that is legitimately the cost of the Commission.

I have another letter from what is commonly referred to in British Columbia as the Loggers Local of the IWA. Its offices are located in Vancouver but they serve a very wide stretch of territory in the logging industry. The letter talks of the particular conditions of the last winter. Normally, the office might handle 20 inquiries in the December 1 to January 31 period. The letter continues:

This year we have been besieged with more than one hundred calls. We obviously are not the only ones receiving complaints as it has been nearly impossible to make telephone connection with any of the numbers (listed and unlisted) that we have for various Pacific Coast U.I.C. offices. Many times we have had to resort to letters to try to find someone to provide some answer to a claimant's complaint. Even when telephone connection is made, it is a matter of days (or longer) before any kind of answer is provided.

The inquiries and complaints may be mainly divided into two groups. The first is the group that file and a month later have either received absolutely nothing or some who have received bi-weekly forms and a punched code card which indicates that no decision has been made in their claim. The second group are those who not only have a frustrating wait before anything is received from the U.I.C., but then they finally receive a letter or a punch code card "number 5" which advises them they have insufficient contributions. From their own knowledge and from our records, we know that the computer has been given erroneous information. The claimant is forced to go through a time consuming and often costly process of obtaining a duplicate record of U.I.C. contributions for the past two years. This again is time consuming and when finally completed and submitted (for the second time) to the U.I.C. office, he then commences the delay problem experienced by the first group.

The answers being provided to us by Commission officers are:

a) There has been a constant flood of claims

b) New staff hired are inexperienced

c) The Commission is using a new "faster" type computer

d) There is a lack of communication between the Commission Office and the separate computer centre. The Commission Office does not know what the computer is doing for (or to) a claimant.

The answers are no answer! They do not speed up the handling of claims for benefit. There is no evidence of feeding the computer the correct information the first time. What effort would it require for the computer to advise the Commission office what it is doing to a claimant's claim for benefits?

Then, the letter goes on to refer to the bulk system and what that has done as far as some of their members are concerned:

Our members are not only unhappy, they have been made angry by frustration. Many have been forced into financial hardship. This government has dangled a tantalizing carrot—a white paper on future unemployment insurance benefits—but has failed to even properly provide existing benefits. This government needs to be reminded that an unemployed person needs benefits when he is unemployed—he and his family cannot live on nothing. Retroactive benefits are not the answer after a man has used up his savings or gone into debt or his employment is resumed.

Attached is a list of details about particular claims problems. I have had occasions when problems have come to me directly. I have picked up the phone and called the regional office in Vancouver, as a result of which something happened. I know of one or two instances when people have communicated directly with the Minister of Labour about a particular problem. Probably he has picked up the phone and obtained results. The number of people who do that kind of thing is very small, and the number of people who should have to do that kind of thing should also be very small. This may not be a problem all across the country, for the minister has said, if I recall his statement correctly, something like 96 per cent of claims are being processed on time. I do not know whether that is a national average or that an analysis has been made of any regional or district average. I do suggest that when this type of situation develops after the commission has had from 1967 until 1971 to iron out the bugs in closing the local offices, there must be something wrong with the concept of administration.

I think this inhuman, depersonalization of the system is basically wrong and that perhaps some of the so-called efficiency experts who may have been engaged by the government or the commission to advise the administration on how to use electronic devices have overlooked what must be a very important factor in any insurance scheme operated socially or otherwise. I mean the ability of an individual claimant to have some kind of personal contact with someone who is fully qualified to discuss a particular situation and give proper advice.

One of the steps taken was the implementation of the program of so-called unemployment insurance agents. As far as I know, these people are not properly trained claims officers. From information I have they may be able to help an individual fill out an original form, but if there is any real problem they are not competent, trained or qualified, and do not have the communications facilities to deal with these problems.

Just as important as the terms and details of benefits to be provided under this act is the way in which this new unemployment insurance act is going to be administered when it comes into effect. It should be done in such a manner that the whole concept of insurance will be something the Canadian working force can be proud of and support. I hope the committee will fully assess this aspect of the matter during its meetings with members of the present commission and the minister when they appear before the committee. Unless this kind of situation I have tried to describe is given some attention, the whole scheme is bound, sooner or later, to crumble and fall to the ground. I am sure the minister would not want to see that happen.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the most important bills to come before this chamber in a long time. It is important because it affects 96 out of every 100 working people in Canada. Let me congratulate the minister upon the method he has chosen to bring such an important bill to the attention of the people of this country. He introduced a white paper which was referred to the Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. At that time the committee heard many witnesses who gave their views on the contents of the white paper. The minister has now introduced the bill, and we are about to give it second reading in order that it may be returned to the committee for further study. I do not know what better method he could have adopted to make this information available to the people of Canada.

In order to keep my remarks in some sort of chronological order, I should like to deal with four points. Is Bill C-229 a welfare scheme or an insurance plan? I should also like to refer to the universality concept. I will then say a little about administration and the real problems that will be involved in this regard. Under that heading I will have something to say about the two weeks' waiting period. I will then refer to reasons for having the Department of Manpower, the Department of Labour and the unemployment insurance offices amalgamated as they used to be. The minister, by introducing such a bill is providing reason enough for having these offices united as they were in the past. What could be more related than an office dealing with a man out of work and an office paying him benefits? These are related problems. This Government separated these offices and the communication among them at the present time leaves much to be desired.

In the opening paragraph on page 103 of the Gill report, under the heading "Conclusions and recommendations", we find the following:

—we believe that a plan of unemployment insurance should be designed to take the first impact of unemployment and should be based on insurance principles—

We find the following in the next paragraph:

—insurance is indemnity for loss... the concern of unemployment insurance is to indemnify insured persons for loss of wages resulting from unemployment.

The report goes on to point out that a man cannot be said to lose what he never had. This was a reference to seasonal workers under the existing plan. If a man works from April 1 to December 1, and is normally idle during the rest of the year, it cannot be said he has lost any wages during his off season. It may well be that such an individual needs and deserves some form of income assistance, but that is not the role of a real unemployment insurance plan.

The Gill commission felt that the unemployment insurance fund should be confined to the payment of indemnity for wages lost as a result of the failure to obtain employment. I could continue to quote from this report but I think I have said enough to bring the thinking of the Gill commission to the attention of the minister. The report states further:

• (4:50 p.m.)

... the insurance concept has been pushed more and more into the background.

The plan is neither a valid insurance plan in its present form nor is it a socially desirable type of income supplement.

Is it a welfare or insurance plan? When I take a look at the bill and find that the following things can happen, I cannot help but think that it is a welfare scheme and not an insurance scheme. A person who has only worked eight weeks of the year can qualify for benefits. A person who had worked for a period of from 8 to 19 weeks could qualify, depending on national and regional unemployment rates, for benefits of 8 to 51 weeks. The benefits could be as high as $100 a week. It would be possible for a person to contribute as little as $15.80 to the scheme and draw out as much as $5,100. I should like to ask the minister if he believes this is actuarially sound and if so, whether it is an insurance scheme, a welfare scheme or a hand-out.

A person who works for 20 or more weeks in a year and loses his job could automatically collect three weeks benefits even if he returned to work the very next day. The amount could be as high as $100 a week. Therefore, a person could collect $300 even if he returned to work the next day. This is called an incentive to find work. I would say it is an incentive to sit at home. A person who was not looking for work could collect as much as $100 a week for three months and receive $1,200 in that period before the unemployment insurance commission would even attempt to determine whether or not he should be receiving benefits. He could collect $1,200 before the counselling service which is to be established would inquire into the problem and try to determine why he had not obtained a job. Under this bill, I understand it would be possible for a woman to work for eight weeks in order to obtain pin money. She could work during November and December in the Christmas rush in a department store earning pin money and collect $800 worth of insurance when laid off while her husband might be earning a salary of $15,000 or more a year. I ask you, is this a sound insurance plan?

When such things are possible, I hope the committee will examine this bill very closely. It would seem that by this bill we would be producing a work force with bad work habits. I believe I have said enough to bring before the House the question of whether or not this is an insurance plan or a welfare plan.

Now, what about the universality concept? All of us have received letters by the hundreds from school teachers all across the country who complain about being included in this new plan. If the minister wishes to make this a universal plan, then I suggest that everybody should be included in it, even Members of Parliament if you like. If it is to be universal it should include all professions such as doctors, dentists and others. If there is to be universality, the plan should be applicable to all professions. If it is not to be applicable to all professions, then the teachers should not be included. We should not make fish of one and fowl of the other. They should be all treated alike and I believe the teachers have a very good argument. If they are to be forced into the plan, then they are right in saying all the other professions should be brought into it as well.

There is no provision in this plan to take care of the taxi driver, the self-employed person, or the man running the corner variety store who is struggling to make a living. He is not insured by this plan but is just as entitled to be covered as is anyone else, and perhaps even more so because he must slave away in an attempt to keep the wolf away from the door.

In talking about teachers I might mention that in my area, the Wellington County Board of Education area, I believe the figure in respect of the cost of insuring teachers is something in the area of $75,000, half of which, or roughly $38,000, will be borne by the school board. The only way this $38,000 can be raised is by taxing the poor property owners who are now burdened to the hilt with taxation. Now, by insisting on the teachers entering the unemployment insurance scheme we are placing an additional burden on these taxpayers. At a time when we are trying to relieve the property owners of extreme burdens we are about to add another burden which will virtually break their backs. We are close to that point now.

Each of the 1.2 million more people who are to be brought into the plan will have to pay, I think, $62 per year. Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe I have said enough about universality. If we are to have universality it should go all the way; if not, then we will have a real problem on our hands in respect of the teachers organizations.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being five o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall)—National Parks—Bonne Bay—Letting of contract for survey work.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CANADA PENSION PLAN (PENSION INDEX)

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE PENSION TO FULL EXTENT OF INCREASE IN COST OF LIVING

On the order:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill C-34, An Act to amend the Canada Pension Plan (Pension Index)—Mr. Macquarrie.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I wonder if the Chair might apologize to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) before he begins his remarks by stating that it would seem to be incumbent upon the Chair to refer the hon. member for Hillsborough to the procedural difficulties in respect of the particular bill standing in his name. I shall ask the hon. member, and other hon. members who wish to do so, to assist the Chair in respect of the procedural point before a ruling is given. I might point out, however, to hon. members and to the hon. member for Hillsborough, that in a statement by Mr. Speaker of October 20, 1970 near the commencement of the present session of Parliament His Honour referred to this and other bills as bills in respect of which he had some doubt concerning their procedural acceptability.

I might read briefly from His Honour's statement at that time. He said:

> Another aspect of the matter is that there is an increasing tendency to include money provisions in private members' bills. Honourable Members know that the time honoured practice has been to include such proposals in the form of a private Members' motion rather than in a bill.
>
> In many cases in the past, in order to meet the convenience of honourable Members, the consideration of the Second Reading of such bills was entered upon. It seems to the Chair that such procedure is not good Parliamentary practice.

His Honour then went on to refer to several bills, including the one standing in the name of the hon. member for Hillsborough. Then, he continued:

• (5:00 p.m.)

> The Chair considers that in drafting of bills more care should be exercised to ensure that financial provisions are not included in such bills. When the aforementioned bills and any others which, on closer examination, appear to contain financial provisions are called for debate, I propose to examine the question of whether or not such bills are in order from a procedural standpoint.
> At that time hon. members who have sponsored these bills will have an opportunity to satisfy the Chair that the bills are in order from such standpoints before proceeding to a substantive argument about the merits of the bills.

In the light of His Honour's statement I would have to say to the hon. member for Hillsborough, as Mr. Speaker did some months ago, that there seem to be serious considerations about the procedural acceptability of this bill and that it would seem to be in conflict with the procedures in the Standing Orders relative to imposing a charge or impost. Therefore, I would like to invite the hon. member for Hillsborough and other hon. members who would like to assist the Chair to do so from a procedural standpoint. I would ask them to confine their remarks at this point to the procedural argument as to whether or not the bill is acceptable. I will then make a ruling, and, of course, if I find the bill acceptable we could embark on the substantive debate.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have been reflecting upon Your Honour's words and consulting authorities, both living and dead, in the weeks since.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Which were the more helpful?

Mr. Macquarrie: The words of the living ones were more readily accessible and more voluble. I base my right to proceed on the grounds that this measure, in fact, is not a levy upon the revenue of this country as set forth in the statutes of this country and in the Standing Orders of this House. If I believed that the enactment of such a bill did in fact appropriate a part of the public revenue, as understood by the statutes and by our rules, if I thought it was a tax or an impost, I would realize of course that we would require a recommendation to this House accompanied by a message from the Governor General. The pension plan fund is, however, not a part of the public revenue, nor is it funded by the collection of any tax or impost. Moneys are not public revenue, taxes or imposts merely because they are collected by or paid to a public officer of the government of Canada. What we have here is a measure dealing with contributions. In the government publication "The Canada Pension Plan", put out by Information Canada over the signature of the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) we find the following opening statement:

> The Canada Pension Plan, inaugurated in 1966, is a contributory social security program designed to provide a basic level of protection against the contingencies of retirement, disability,—

In other words, the moneys whereby a measure of justice would be given to the recipients of the Canada pension cannot be a result of a tax imposed by this legislative body, rather do they come from those funds which are contributed by the would-be pension recipients. I do not want to labour at length on this, but the whole discussion of the Canada Pension Plan in this House offers what I believe to be very helpful suggestions for underpinning my faith in the procedure upon which I am not engaged.

The resolution introducing the Canada Pension Plan reads in part:

> —to provide further that all expenditures under the Canada Pension Plan, including costs of administration, shall be financed from contributions by employees, employers and self-employed persons.

Very clearly, the whole operation, administration and otherwise, once the pension plan has been set up as it has been for several years, is dealing with contributions. This is something quite different from the restriction which is placed upon us in this House in reference to taxes and levies of that kind.

I think that there may be some living authorities about us who might want to assist Your Honour on this point.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I confess that I do not have the substantive material before me which I would like to have to assist you, but I simply wanted to comment, before you made your ruling on this, that the test is not simply whether the funds which make up the pension fund itself come entirely from contributions and therefore whether those funds would be used or disbursed in a different way. The test has to go beyond that to see whether or not in the implementation of this legislation further federal expenditures would have to be made by the government. If the result of an increase in benefits paid under the scheme is to cause in any way, directly or indirectly, an increase in federal contributions or federal administrative costs of that scheme or expenses by the government, which of course have to be drawn out of the revenue, then the legislation is repugnant without the proper recommendation from His Excellency.

That is a very general comment, but I confess that I do not have the details of the plan before me at present.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I recall that there have been discussions with regard to this point in the past and that there have been some rulings. If I may say with the greatest respect, some of them have been at the time rather confusing and, I think, erroneous in that if one examines the Canada Pension Plan there is not one penny's contribution from public funds to the administration. The act is very specific in this regard, that the contributions from individuals and from employers constitute the sole source of the funds plus the earnings on the loans made to provincial governments. These are the sources of revenue for the fund, and there is no provision whereby, if there is an increase in payments to any individual, whether by direct change in the scale of payments, this increase in payments to survivors would be chargeable to the Crown. It will not disturb ways and means one iota. Therefore, I put it to you that hon. members of this House are within their entire competence in putting forward amendments to a public act, such as the Canada Pension Plan Act, whereby the payment of benefits under the act may be varied, and that is all that the bill of my colleague attempts to do.

I invite any of the hon. parliamentary secretaries who may wish to attack this point of view to point out where in the act there is even one split penny that comes from the public purse and that has to be provided by ways and means. Therefore, since there is nothing whereby ways and means is affected, it is fully within the competence of hon. members, whether on this side or on the opposite side, to move an amendment to the act, and it does not require a recommendation from His Excellency nor a bill to be brought into the House by a member of the government.

Therefore, I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that the point of order taken by the government representatives, challenging the competence of my colleague from Hillsborough in putting forth this bill, is not well founded.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of indulging in a bit of repetition—and that has happened before in this place—I would like to emphasize the point that has been made by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), and just now by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), that the financing of the Canada Pension Plan is unique.

There are other propositions that are financed mainly by the contributions of people, for example, the pensions paid under Public Service Superannuation Act, but this one is even more strictly financed by those who contribute to it than any other. For example, in the case of the Public Service Superannuation Act the contributors provide the money out of which the pensions are paid, but the government provides the cost of administration. However, in the case of the Canada Pension Plan all of the administration costs are charged to the Canada Pension Fund.

As a matter of fact, if one will look through the estimates in the big blue book one will see, in the case of almost every department, some item that has to be the subject of a double entry so that every last penny that it costs to administer the Canada Pension Plan—including the salaries of those who work for the plan, including the rental of space, and all the rest of it—is charged to the fund. There is not one cent that is charged to the general revenues of the country.

I rely on my memory for what I am going to say for the next few minutes, and if I am found to be wrong I am sure somebody will draw that to my attention. However, I think my memory is pretty sound on this.

When the Canada Pension Plan legislation was brought in back in 1964—we dealt with it in 1964 and 1965—the government made the point that this was to be financed entirely by the contributors, namely the employers and the employees. Someone, therefore, raised the question as to why there was a Governor General's recommendation. My hon. friend close by says it was Mr. Nasserden, at the time one of the Conservative members from Saskatchewan. So, my memory is confirmed. The answer was that some government money would be needed as a loan initially to get the plan started, and it was only because there was some money needed in that first year that a Governor General's recommendation was required at all. To show how clean its skirts were, the government drove home the point that once the plan got going the government would not be out one red cent, or a cent of any other colour, and that the entire financing of the plan would be paid for by the contributors.

As I say, I am simply repeating what my two hon. friends nearby have said, but I think it applies with particular force in relation to this bill. Therefore, if my hon. friend from Hillsborough is merely proposing that which involves some other use of the funds that are in the Canada Pension Fund, in order to escalate pensions by more than 2 per cent per year, it seems to me he has the right to do that.

If I recall correctly, Sir, you were in the Chair in committee of the whole on March 30 when I moved an amendment having to do with the Public Service Superannuation Act. My amendment sought to establish the proposition that certain reductions in the pensions of public servants who retire early should not take place.

Mr. Francis: I remember that.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friend from Ottawa West says he remembers it. I would expect him to remember that day. It was argued against my amendment that it was a charge on the treasury. I argued that it was not, that any extra money was to be drawn from an account, and I emphasize that I used the word account, not fund, but that the real test was that to put this amendment into effect would not require an additional vote of any money whatsoever. Your Honour found that amendment to be in order. In all fairness I should say you admitted that the point was not completely clear, but your initial reaction was to rule in favour of it and even after argument—I make the point that it was after argument—you ruled it was in order. It was then put to the committee of the whole. Later on, it was put to a vote. Unfortunately it was voted down, but for procedural purposes it stands as a precedent.

Now, I double back for a moment to make the point that in the case of the Public Service Superannuation Act, although the moneys that are used for the paying of pensions come entirely from the employer and the employees, the administration costs in that case are paid by the government, but in this case they are not—not at all. And I submit, Sir, that if you were right on March 30, as I think you were, in ruling my amendment to Bill C-207 in order, you should follow suit and rule this bill in order today.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join briefly in the arguments that have been presented to Your Honour and to recall some of the wording in the resolution that was presented to the House when the Canada Pension Plan was introduced on October 28, 1964. But before I read portions of the resolution, I agree that up to that point the moneys had been spent by government departments with reference to the setting up of the plan, particularly with reference to the studies that had preceded the setting up of the plan, in that very special sense, involved an expenditure of tax moneys, of Her Majesty's revenues, in relation to that legislation. These moneys had to be spent so that the expertise established for publication of these ideas could be incorporated into the Canada Pension Plan itself.

• (5:20 p.m.)

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has recalled, the then member for Rosthern raised with the prime minister of the day the question of why there should be a resolution when the Canada Pension Plan was to pay its own expenses. There were exchanges between them, and perhaps I should read what the prime minister said then:

> The fact is that it will cost some money to get this plan into operation, as my hon. friend must know. Afterwards, when the plan is in operation, the expenses will be borne by the fund.

I therefore suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the resolution that was brought in then was really for the technical purpose of covering the expenditures borne by the Crown up to that point, to get the plan assembled, to have the expertise available before all these ideas were put into the Canada Pension Plan legislation. Thereafter the plan was on its own, as it were. Indeed, when I read that part of the resolution Your Honour will find that the plan was required to pay back all these expenses that had gone into the formulation of it.

With that as a rather long preamble, here is the resolution that was presented to the House on October 28, 1964. I shall not read it all, but I shall read the pertinent parts. It begins:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure, to be known as the Canada Pension Plan, to establish in Canada a comprehensive program of retirement pensions payable to contributors;

Then, there is reference to supplementary benefits, widows, orphans, the disabled, co-ordination under the Old Age Security Act with benefits payable under the Canada Pension Plan, and then these words:

> —to provide for the adjustment of pensions and other benefits in line with increases in earnings and the cost of living;

You will note there is no reference to any ceiling there, Mr. Speaker. Reading further, and I think this is important:

> —and to provide further that all expenditures under the Canada Pension Plan, including cost of administration, shall be financed from contributions by employees and employers and from contributions by persons in respect of self-employed earnings.

I simply reinforce the statement of purpose mentioned to Your Honour by my colleagues this afternoon. Perhaps before I sit down, however, I should make this further point: the legislation having been altered by the very sensible amendment of the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie), when at any stage could the trustees of the Canada Pension Plan come back to this Parliament and demand money for the operation of the plan? When could there be any requirement whatsoever that so much as one red, black or blue cent of public money be put into its operation? I suggest you could look from one end of the plan to the other, whether in its present form or, hopefully, as amended by the hon. member for Hillsborough, and not find any such obligation.

I would respectfully suggest to your Honour that it would work a hardship on the backbench members of Parliament if a very narrow construction were placed on the rule about the introduction of measures calling for expenditures. I think, first, the rule would have to be pretty severely twisted to cover the circumstances that arise in the bill of the hon. member for Hillsborough, but in any event it would be a most narrow and unfortunate construction if the Chair were to say that this bill was outside the competence of a private member.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should like to thank hon. members for their assistance on this procedural point. As has been pointed out, it is one that is not without much difficulty. Certainly, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has pointed out, the acceptance a few weeks ago of an amendment with respect to the superannuation fund legislation might be parallelled to the bill we have before us. At that time I indicated I had some very serious doubt as to the acceptability of that particular amendment. There is a difference however, and if hon. members want to make supplementary arguments I would be pleased to hear them at the risk of taking the time of the House. I have a further problem with the bill now being considered by the House and that is with respect to clause 3 of Bill C-34 which refers specifically to expenditures as follows:

> Expenditures under this act shall be provided under section 104 of the British North America Acts, 1867 to 1970.

My main confusion in this respect arises from the use of the words "expenditures under this act".

Having indicated this very serious further concern that I have, I will not base my ruling on it. It seems to me that the whole problem revolves around the question of whether the contribution, voluntarily or involuntarily, constitutes an impost as understood by the provisions of our financial practice or by the terms of our Standing Order 62. All hon. members will agree that we must start from the position that financial expenditures are to be provided as described in the words of Standing Order 62 (1). The Standing Order reads as follows, in part:

> ... for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to the House by a message from the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

The provisions of Standing Order 62 refer specifically to imposts without defining, in particular, what should be considered as an impost.

It seems to me that Bill C-34 must be construed to be a measure to appropriate a part of the revenue obtained by way of an impost. It would be imprudent, I suggest, to contend that such contributions are voluntarily and generously proffered by all working Canadians. In other words, contributions to the Canada Pension Plan are indeed an impost or levy, required to be paid under the provisions of the plan.

In conclusion, it might be helpful were the Chair to read the provisions of citation 8 of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition which read as follows:

> 8. (1) The proceedings of the Houses (Senate and Commons) are governed by statutes, by rules and orders adopted by themselves, and by those usages which have grown up in the course of time and consequently become a part of their own practice or are derived from the common law of Parliament by which they have consented to be guided in all matters of doubt.
> (2) The usages of Parliament are to be collected from the entries in the Journals, from the history of parliamentary procedure, from the treatises on parliamentary practice that have been published from time to time; and from the observations of experienced members, and the remarks of the speakers in the House of Commons, with relation to the forms and methods of proceedings, as contained in the published debates.
> (3) "In the interpretation of the rules or Standing Orders, the House is generally guided, not so much by the literal construction of the orders themselves as by the consideration of what has been the practice of the House with respect to them."

I suggest to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) that the Standing Orders and the financial practice of this House present an insuperable barrier to his proposed bill, and the established practices of this House and the Standing Orders dictates that the Chair must rule that Bill C-34 should not be proceeded with at this time.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that it shall be called six o'clock?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We might as well.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At 5:35 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

PROVISIONS RESPECTING INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT, COMMISSION, BENEFITS, PREMIUMS, ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, when the House proceeded to private members' business at five o'clock I had just commenced my remarks concerning Bill C-229 respecting unemployment insurance. I had indicated the four areas I hoped to cover and I had dealt with two of them—first, whether this was a welfare scheme or an insurance plan and, second, the question of universality. I should now like to deal with the third point, which concerns the administration of the proposals contained in Bill C-229.

Administration is an area in which there is likely to be considerable trouble. First of all, I can visualize the difficulty administrators will encounter in explaining the need for a two-week waiting period. As you know, Mr. Speaker, under the present plan there is only a one-week waiting period. Even so, each member of this House has had unemployed people contact him to say they have survived the waiting period but were still waiting for a cheque; their money had all been spent and they needed groceries; they were in great need of these cheques, but for some reason which was not apparent to them the cheque had been held up.

One can readily understand what hardship the proposed two weeks' waiting period is likely to impose. People are likely to say: We paid into this plan and therefore we expect payment immediately. They were satisfied to wait one week, but they are not likely to take kindly to the idea of waiting two weeks. Perhaps the committee will give further thought to this feature of the legislation.

Then there is the question of the way in which earnings are to be defined. This is a far-ranging issue and a considerable problem has arisen in this area under the terms of the present act. I have in mind the situation likely to be encountered by a man who is a part-time farmer, working in a factory—perhaps he has a farm of 50 or 100 acres—who is laid off at the factory at a time when he has agricultural products for sale. The valuation of these products, as income for purposes of the act, has always caused a great deal of difficulty, and for this reason I hope the definition of "earnings" will be spelled out in the regulations in a fair and equitable way.

Also, I wonder how this legislation will apply to people who have completed an adult retraining program of 25 weeks or so, who have passed the course and are ready for a job. If there is no job available in which they can use their improved skills, will they be eligible for unemployment insurance benefit? Situations of this kind have caused difficulty under the provisions of the existing act.

Administrative confusion is likely to be caused by provision for variation depending upon the national unemployment level. If the national level of unemployment stood at 4 per cent or lower, ten weeks' benefit would be available to insured persons; if the national rate were between 4 and 5 per cent, workers would be entitled to 14 weeks' benefit, and if the rate rose above 5 per cent they would be eligible for 18 weeks' benefit.

Can hon. members visualize administering this bill under those provisions? Suppose the Dominion Bureau of Statistics said today that the unemployment rate was 4 per cent: the fellow who put in his application for unemployment insurance yesterday would be eligible for 10 weeks benefit, but those who apply tomorrow would be able to draw 14 weeks' benefit. This illustrates the difficulty which arises when one establishes a dividing line. We have experienced this difficulty in connection with other legislation. In this case I can visualize chaos within the Unemployment Insurance Commission offices under the new provisions which rely on the percentage of unemployment to determine the number of weeks for which a worker is entitled to benefit. This is a nightmare that the administrators will have to wrestle with unless the committee decides to make a change to this part of the bill.

I should like to say a word or two about why these two departments should be one department, as they were previously. I refer, of course, to the Department of Labour and the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The Unemployment Insurance Commission used to be in charge of the national employment service. People who were unemployed went to one of the NES offices to register. In the same office the decision was made whether they were eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. There was close liaison between the two branches. After all, what could be more closely related than a man out of work and a man seeking employment or unemployment benefits?

There is an Unemployment Insurance Commission office in the centre of Waterloo, near where I live, and this office covers a radius of about 100 miles. The staff is responsible for seeing that people in this area who are unemployed are paid benefits. The Manpower offices in other centres try to find them a job. The staff of the Manpower office may send a worker to a job similar to what he had before, but if he is not accepted or if he turns down the job, the Manpower counsellor has authority to decide whether or not this person should continue to receive benefits. He makes out a form and sends it to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, which thereupon rules on eligibility for benefits.

In many cases this is not being done. I had a case where a man was on unemployment insurance benefits for ten months, no effort being made either to find a job or to ascertain whether he should still receive benefits. There are many cases of people being sent out to take jobs which they refuse to take and their benefits continue to be paid. In some cases the counsellor in the Manpower office—who of course is extremely busy because of the high unemployment rate—takes a week to fill out the form, and the Unemployment Insurance Commission office, which likewise is busy, takes another week to process the form. This means that the man in question receives two weeks' benefit to which he may not be entitled.

This matter was brought to the attention of the House by the Auditor General, who on April 6 appeared before the Public Accounts Committee which at that time was examining the affairs of the Department of Manpower and Immigration. As reported in the minutes of the Public Accounts Committee for that date, the Auditor General said that in 1969 he had sufficient staff and time to audit the books of only 14 out of 254 Manpower offices. Last year, 1970, his staff had the opportunity to audit only 33 offices out of 338.

What did the Auditor General find as a result of these audits, Mr. Speaker? He found that as a result of lack of communication between Manpower and Unemployment Insurance Commission offices $3 million in benefits was paid out to people who should not have received that money. And this after auditing only 33 out of 338 offices! Had the books of all the offices been audited, I wonder what the final figure would have been. Reading through the minutes one sees what a great old American game of pass the buck has been going on between the Unemployment Insurance Commission staff and the staff of the Manpower offices. There is not the liaison between these two offices that there should be. In view of the new bill that the minister has introduced, I am sure he will realize that sooner or later these two offices must be joined together. This is all the more important in view of the projected national unemployment rate as a basis for determining the number of weeks eligibility for benefit.

I should also like to ask the committee that will study this bill to examine the counselling provisions. As I understand it, the Unemployment Insurance Commission will hire many counsellors to interview people who are unemployed for a certain time in order to ascertain why they have been unable to find employment. The counsellors will probably tell these people to go to the Manpower offices. This is another reason why the two departments should work hand in hand. Perhaps they will tell unemployed people to see a welfare officer because this is in the nature of a social assistance plan. However, I can see the staff of the Unemployment Insurance Commission increasing markedly with the employment of hundreds of counsellors. This is added expense and the administration of this new plan will get out of hand.

Before concluding my remarks I should underline the fact that this new bill makes no provision to deal with the following situation: I have always thought that there was something radically wrong in principle with the unemployment insurance plan. To explain what I mean, let me give an example. Suppose a carpenter becomes unemployed and applies for unemployment insurance. According to the act as I understand it, an unemployed worker must be referred to similar work and pay. In the case of a carpenter, in other words, he must take a carpenter's job. If no such job is available to him but there is a job available pumping gas, the carpenter has the right to refuse that job and to take instead the $100 a week that we are now proposing to pay. I contend that the principle that a physically able workman should take any job available, providing the pay is reasonable, rather than collect unemployment insurance, is a sound one.

I hope that this new Unemployment Insurance Act will bring a new approach to unemployment insurance. I hope that fraudulent practices will become a thing of the past. I hope greater efforts will be made to apprehend those who receive benefits to which they are not entitled, and that they will be dealt with accordingly. As I say, I hope the new act will introduce a new concept of unemployment insurance. I am glad the minister has taken care of one point that I am sure every member of the House has had brought to his attention.

People have said to me, and I am sure to many other members, that they have paid into the unemployment insurance fund all their lives and should be entitled to something. This has been one of the greatest areas of criticism and objection to the system. In order to get something from the fund, some of these people avail themselves of various means. The minister has now said, as laid out in this bill, that when a person reaches age 65 and is receiving the Canada pension he will be given a three-week lump sum. This could be a maximum of $300 or graduated down according to the individual's income. This is a wonderful thing, because those who have paid into the fund will get something out of it.

I close by saying that the bill has some very good and some very poor points. I will find it very difficult to support it in its present form. I hope the committee will amend the bill to change some of the areas which involve welfare rather than insurance. If that is the case, I will be happy to support the measure.

Mr. Jim McNulty (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak in support of a bill that I consider to be one of the most significant pieces of social legislation in our country's history. It ranks with similar measures which have been introduced by Liberal governments—measures designed with one purpose in mind, to improve the situation of the individual Canadian.

With the introduction of this new legislation, affecting as it does the lives of millions of Canadians, a new philosophy has become evident in the policies governing unemployment insurance. It is a philosophy of meeting the realities of life in Canada with far reaching and flexible programs designed to meet the individual needs of the men and women who make up the work force. One of the more forward-looking features of this new plan for unemployment insurance in Canada is the introduction of the claimant assistance program. Its aims are simple, easily expressed and understood, yet of such far reaching importance that its role cannot be underestimated.

Others in this debate have brought our attention to the fact that a temporary interruption of earnings can occur in almost any work situation. In short, seniority, good work performance and the nature of your profession are no longer adequate insurance against this contingency. In addition, you have been made aware of the meaningful steps taken to increase the benefits to expand the ease of access to the plan and the provisions for extended benefits in the face of adverse economic conditions. All these things represent tremendous improvements in the legislation.

I should like to say a few words, however, on a feature of the plan that represents not simply more of the same but, rather, a fundamental addition to the services available to individual Canadians through the unemployment insurance device. I am referring, of course, to the claimant assistance program or interview system. Through this procedure every claimant, who has been unemployed for more than eight weeks will be asked to participate in at least two interviews designed to motivate and inform him in respect of his personal search for employment.

In essence, the primary objective of the claimant assistance program is to provide information and assistance to claimants in order to help them find employment. With almost 97 per cent of all Canadian workers being included in this new unemployment insurance plan, it is well suited to assist claimants since an unemployed individual's first contact with government at any level is invariably through the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

The claimant assistance program can aid a claimant to develop and carry through an effective job search plan. It can also direct him to the wide range of Canada Manpower programs which are now available and, in many instances, toward other social development programs which are designed to meet specific individual needs. In order to meet this considerable responsibility, the new claimant assistance program will provide a much needed liaison between the Unemployment Insurance Commission and other government departments, agencies and programs. This will provide better and more efficient working relationships and co-ordination of effort to provide the claimant with the assistance he needs in the form of job search techniques, labour market requirements, retraining programs and social development services which may apply to his situation.

Research projects which have been conducted in several communities have indicated the worth of a service dedicated to examining the root causes of a man's unemployment problem and providing concrete, helpful answers. For instance, in one case a mechanic found himself out of work: in an interview with a claimant assistance guidance officer, he disclosed the fact that while he had been offered employment, he was unable to accept it because his tool-kit had been stolen. The guidance officer was able to put him in touch immediately with an agency which could assist him by providing the required tools. That man went back to work happy.

In another instance a claimant, driven to distraction by financial worries, pointed out that even if he got a job he was faced with other problems. His family was due to be evicted that day. A telephone call from the guidance officer to a most understanding and co-operative landlord soon removed that worry. The man went back to work. While these are isolated, personal problems afflicting just two people, the record is full of instances where material assistance offered by trained and competent people has materially assisted a man's or woman's return to employment far more quickly than in the past.

The claimant is invited to a personal interview, to review his case, with a guidance officer of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. During that interview every effort is made to develop the claimant's interest in solving his employment problem. The claimant's skills and experience are explored and steps are taken to sort out reasons which may have contributed to his unemployment. If the claimant is in fact available for work—and as hon. members know, some of them are not—a job search plan is developed to meet his specific needs. In addition, referrals are made to job training and placement agencies such as Canada Manpower centres and other social development agencies where requirements for this type of assistance are identified.

If the unemployment continues, the claimant is requested to return for a second interview. At this time the claimant and the guidance officer jointly review both the information and guidance provided to the claimant during the first interview, how well he had used the information given him and whether he had taken advantage of the different services to which he was referred. A search is carried out to discover causes for his unemployment, which may not be readily apparent, and to develop a new job search plan tailored to the claimant's needs. It is hoped this new service will materially reduce the length of time a claimant is jobless by promoting a far quicker return to full-time work. From research studies, there are strong indications that this can be accomplished by a more personal and direct approach than has been used in the past.

May I emphasize and underscore the fact that this is not some sort of a critical, carping police action designed to keep people in line. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) has made it quite plain that what occurs between the guidance officer and the claimant is privileged and every claimant interviewed will be assured of this fact. If in the course of an interview an irregularity is discovered in his claim, his attention will be drawn to that point and he will be advised that it is his responsibility to make the facts known. The officer conducting the interview cannot assume the individual's responsibility: what the claimant does is up to him and his conscience. Such a program geared to modern day conditions represents, I believe, one of the more forward steps taken by any government in dealing with human problems on a human level.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, at a time when unemployment has reached appalling levels, everyone must rejoice at any improvement in the plight of the unemployed. That is why the system put forward by Bill C-229 seems to be effective, at first sight, particularly because the unemployed will be able to receive increased benefits more in keeping with their needs.

But finally, it is realized that the proposed system can only work over a short period, in view of the federal government's present policy. Should the government persist in the belief that inflation can only be curbed through unemployment, the unemployment insurance system will become inadequate, because the number of unemployed will be too great.

It can be seen that the unemployment insurance plan works fairly well when it is a matter of seasonal unemployment or of unemployment of short duration, or when the number of unemployed is not high. However, when the unemployment rate reaches a high level, as it does today, the plan becomes deficient and inadequate. In spite of that, the government has decided to deal with the problem from the standpoint of benefits, that is in a superficial manner.

By increasing the benefits and extending the benefit period, the government believes that it has solved the problem. The government could be right, if there was a decrease in the unemployment rate, but, on February 23 last, the President of the Canadian Labour Congress, Mr. Donald Macdonald, stated that, because of the government's present policy, unemployment would last for several more years.

In the newspaper La Presse of Monday February 15, it is reported that Mr. William A. Dyson, president of the Canadian Welfare Council and member of the Castonguay Commission stated that the rise of unemployment could become a permanent phenomenon in our society. He added and I quote:

> Apparently, the level of unemployment is not as important as it used to be, since production is increasingly dependent on industries, businesses and services using machines and computers.
> Consequently, the means of production and wealth derived therefrom make the producing mechanism less and less dependent on workers, managers and experts.
>
> There is no doubt that we are now witnessing a deep economic alteration. The machine is now liberating the man of tomorrow from an incredible number of menial tasks. However, while being liberated, he becomes unemployed. We know that problems are appearing much more quickly than legislation is improving.
> Consequently, the thriving community must ask itself how it should provide for the needs of those who are no longer useful in the productivity process.

The hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) stated recently that the high unemployment rate was no cause for alarm, that it was normal. This means that the services and recreation are and will be more important than ever. But instead of tackling the whole problem, the government divides it into various areas: unemployment insurance, family allowances and heaps of other things so that it is impossible to find either a challenge to work or any improvement of recreation which would normally tend to increase the quality of life. So the government offers a solution to an immediate problem rather than an adequate solution that would encompass the future.

As neither the present government nor any traditional political party seem willing to accept valuable solutions in matters of unemployment, namely monetary solutions, it follows that the present system which is split in layers only takes care of particular cases and disregards general needs. For this reason, the various plans and programs, that is, family allowances, unemployment insurance, old age security pension, are far from being integrated and what we have been suggesting for years is to integrate all these plans into one aimed at providing a vital minimum, which would help solve all the problems at the same time. This is a plan which was accepted in principle at the Liberal conference of last fall, but which the federal government has not deemed proper to translate into a policy.

Following the rejection of such a policy, this government has kept on introducing white papers and legislations which do not deal with the basic problem but which somehow are more or less popular because they improve conditions in a particular field.

Since we must consider a specific bill and since this is not a comprehensive policy, as it should be, I should like to pass on to the analysis of this legislation. It would appear, in this great legislation, that contributions are required even from those who, apparently, enjoy security of employment, that is teachers, federal public servants, etc. This means that benefits higher than those of the present system and extended benefits will be paid for by the contributions of those who will never need them, so that 96.3 per cent of the Canadian labour force will participate in the unemployment insurance plan. Such a scheme seems far from the original principles according to which nobody was supposed to contribute among those who were not likely to be out of work, and benefits were indeed paid for by contributions of the unemployed themselves, the government and employers. Thus the new system would become a welfare scheme, something which was consciously avoided at the beginning.

Suppose we agree that those who have job security must participate in the unemployment insurance. How come then federal public servants are included under clause 3, on a mandatory basis, while provincial civil servants are not necessarily covered? If the principle applies to one of the categories, there is no reason to make a difference between them.

Besides, if almost universal contributions are required, why impose a ceiling on contributions, so that those who earn but a low income should maintain the system while those who are better off pay only a small portion of their income?

Still, even if the unemployment insurance plan becomes a welfare scheme, the benefits still depend on the contributions of the taxpayers; they do not effect those who have not contributed long enough, that is, those who are seeking employment for the first time and cannot find any, which is the case for most young people. Those unemployed must turn to welfare, whatever form it now assumes.

It is easy to see how abuses are perpetuated by the system. For instance, the Toronto Globe and Mail dated March 16 criticized the government for having used the individual as a basis instead of the family: the income of the individual is taken into account, and not that of the whole family. To my mind, if the system is to be fair, the realities of life—and the family is one of them, should be considered.

I therefore think it timely to mention, although I am not particularly expert in that field, that clause 44 of the bill seems to me most unfair because it tends to benefit the employer. Clause 44 deals with a stoppage of work during which a claimant is entitled to benefits.

That clause applies also in the case of strikes or lock outs. Although I recognize that no parties should be subsidized in a labour dispute, I cannot imagine how the two situations are similar.

In the case of a strike, workers go on strike knowing that they will get no income during that strike; it is their choice. But when it comes to a lock out, the situation is altogether different. Employees would be deprived of their benefits in spite of the fact that it is the employer who is the actual cause of the work stoppage. They would really be unemployed, but not receiving benefits, although they have paid their contributions. This does not seem fair at all, as the employer would enjoy a considerable advantage in an industrial conflict created by himself.

Accordingly, I wish to suggest that the application of clause 44 be restricted and not extend to cases of lock out.

In my opinion, a lock out is tantamount to a lay off. The employee takes no part in the employer's decision, which deprives him of his income for the duration of the lock out. In such a situation, an employer would have nothing to do for his employees to agree with his requests. He could use the unemployment insurance system in a negative way.

So, I suggest that application of clause 44 be restricted to a strike as defined in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act.

Another important point, in my opinion, to suggest to the minister who sponsors this bill, has to do with regulations. The act is one thing: it is a step towards legislation, and regulations are another. To qualify or, as we say, to be entitled to benefits, present regulations provide that the most recent period, that is the last 24 months elapsed before the filing of a claim has to be the qualifying period for regular or seasonal benefit, whatever the case may be.

Now, with respect to workers or persons that already have paid in their contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Fund, there are exceptions but I will indicate only two of them. The two-year period may be extended, for instance, in the case of a person having been self-employed and, secondly, in the case of a Canadian who has been imprisoned. I have nothing to say against the people who devised those regulations but in my opinion, it is not normal that some people should be so readily deprived of their rights. Among these people, I might mention our soldiers' wives who have to accompany their husbands to every corner of the earth.

Since the military camp of Valcartier is situated in the electoral district of Portneuf, I met some of the wives who were really dissatisfied with this system. In fact, after having contributed to the development of our economic life through regular work in a Canadian industry, or office or elsewhere, these people who often paid their contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Fund during three, four, five or even seven years accompanied their husband to Germany or elsewhere; on their return to Canada at the end of two years or more, several of them able to return to work are forced to remain idle because their employers have replaced them, or else because Canada has few opportunities to offer at the present time. Therefore, they go to Canada Manpower Centres where they are made to understand that they have lost their rights since a period of two years has elapsed between the time they paid their contributions and the filing of a claim.

Therefore, I would ask the minister to kindly reconsider this point in order to bring the necessary changes so that the views of military men may be eligible for the same benefits that some Canadians have accrued while they were in prison. It is not a privileged treatment but, in my view, the wives of military men deserve as much consideration as the former inmates of a prison.

Also, under this bill, the government proposes to make more flexible the insurance periods that would entitle the unemployed to benefits. And this period would be based on the unemployment rate. I am seriously concerned by this procedure, and so should be those who are going to be victimized by its implementation. In my view, the legislation should specify the areas and the rates of unemployment concerned. The bill is not clear enough in this respect as it stands now.

Since several of the Commission's offices have been transferred over the years from rural areas to urban centres, it might happen at a given time that some areas with a high number of unemployed should cease to be considered as separate entities since they would be confused with urban areas where the economic situation is somewhat better.

The small offices have been closed down under the pretence that centralized service allowed for higher quality. But since this kind of operation has been launched, the many complaints I have received from some of my constituents clearly evidence the fact that the results have not lived up to the promises. Various points should be taken into account, such as the length of the qualifying period. So far, that is under the present act, the waiting period was of one week only and it is now proposed to extend it to two weeks. This is sheer nonsense if you consider the increase in the cost of living and the immediate needs of all Canadian families.

As to disqualification notices—another point I wish to deal with—the Commission should spell in bold type that the claimant may appeal the decision and submit his case to the arbitration board, and this at no cost to him.

Unfortunately, under the old legislation, the invitation to excluded unemployed people to put their case before the board of referees did not appear most of the time on the forms. In other cases, it was on the back of the form but in very small print.

To me, the Unemployment Insurance Commission in this regard could unfortunately be compared to bad insurance companies whose contracts are drafted in such a way that they can pay as little compensation as possible.

We know that in many fields the government was remiss about its responsibilities. Since many workers are unemployed at the present time and former employers are not there anymore we must more than ever reconsider the eligibility to benefits for certain employers in adverse circumstances following the failure of their concern. Those people were once considered as employers since they were employing workers and on account of special circumstances their firm became unprofitable. After having contributed to the Unemployment Insurance Fund as employers, they cannot get any benefits.

We know some of those former employers who contributed largely to the Unemployment Insurance Fund since its foundation and who are now facing serious problems.

Since all members are eligible to a pension after a few years in Parliament, even after defeat, it would be logical to afford real protection to all those who helped to build this country as we know it today.

I should like to deal also with the problem of many workers who are not eligible to unemployment insurance benefits because they worked for several employers. Among those people we find carpenters, labourers, painters and craftsmen of all skills who, at different times, have participated in various kinds of works. In my opinion, we must find a means whereby those people can prove that they have worked over three, four or six months.

In our upside-down system, the Canadian people and mainly the unemployment lack everything because there is too much of everything. Those who went through the recession period of 1929 to 1939 are still convinced that our system is absurd. The fact that the planners and researchers hired by the government over the last 30 years have not yet found the causes of unemployment nor permanent remedies is enough, I think, to incite the young people to proceed to a true personal analysis of the present situation and of the solutions put forward by the members of the Ralliement créditiste.

It is true that this bill makes a lot of publicity for the government since it provides for the possible payment of $100 in weekly benefits but we know quite well that the number of unemployment that will get this amount will be quite limited.

Also about this new legislation on which new regulations will be based, I only wish one thing: That all the unemployed be included. In fact, their problems are complicated enough already without their having to suffer from the ill effects that usually accompany the initial implementation period of any new legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude my remarks while reserving the right to make further comments and possibly propose amendments at another stage of this debate.

[English]

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, since the publication of the white paper on unemployment insurance I have received a great deal of correspondence and communication from the people in my riding expressing their concern with the contents of the white paper. I must say that the vast majority of conversation I have had with my constituents supports the general principles outlined in that document.

I would like to review some of the issues that have been discussed in respect to Bill C-229. Many have expressed concern that the proposed plan would remove the concept of mutual insurance under the present plan in which there is an entitlement of one week's benefit for every two weeks attachment to the labour force, to a maximum of 52 weeks of benefit. This concern would appear to be based on the mistaken assumption that insurance principles require benefits to be related more to the number of contributions made than to the loss against which they are insured. In fact, I suggest that the opposite is the case, since the first premium normally provides complete and immediate protection.

With this philosophy, neither fire, life nor automobile insurance is true insurance. In this context, the proposed plan adheres more to insurance principles than the present act. Duration of benefits will be determined by the time needed, based on statistical probabilities, to become re-employed, and not to the previous number of contributions which is not relevant to the earnings loss being experienced. Of course there will be some people with only eight weeks of contributions who will draw up to 44 weeks of benefits, just as there are those who after one or two premium payments will collect for a fire loss or a damaged automobile. This is a normal insurance situation.

Others have criticized the proposed plan as moving away from insurance and closer to welfare. I think the opposite is closer to being true. Benefits are still related to previous earnings and not to need, as with welfare, and in the case of welfare there is normally a means test. In this case there is none whatsoever. Further, the present act includes several welfare aspects which will now be eliminated. These were added since 1940 and ignored the basic insurance principle that only a small percentage in any group of contributors will in fact become beneficiaries. They include the payment of benefits to those in seasonal industries, and special coverage for self-employed fishermen. These two groups invariably collect benefits in the off-season. For example, self-employed fishermen collect benefits equal to about nine times the premiums contributed. This situation is rectified in the proposed plan by eliminating seasonal benefits and by eventually replacing coverage for self-employed fishermen with a plan designed specifically for them.

Furthermore, where an extended duration of benefits is required because of local or national conditions of unemployment, it is recognized that this cannot be insured in the normal way and that the cost should be borne out of ordinary tax revenues. Economists generally agree that in times of high unemployment this injection of capital through the spending of individuals is the best way to stimulate the economy and that it is logical that such cost should be met from general revenues.

Then there is the argument, on the basis of an apparent misinterpretation of the white paper, against the proposed change in the number of employment weeks needed to qualify. Under the present act a worker must have been employed for at least 30 per cent of the time over the past two years to receive any benefits. Under the proposed program a worker must have been employed for at least 40 per cent of the time in the previous year to qualify for the full range of benefits, which is 20 weeks in the past 52 weeks. This is an increase in the qualifying requirements and not a decrease, as has been suggested.

However, it should be mentioned that for some people with an attachment to the labour force of eight to 19 weeks, or employed for 15 per cent to 38 per cent of the time in the previous year, the new plan would provide less than the full range of benefits except in very extreme circumstances of high national or regional unemployment. It is here that the plan recognizes the government's responsibility for the unemployed worker when these extreme circumstances exist.

In passing, it may be well to correct the erroneous comparison of maximum entitlement in the present and the proposed plan for a worker earning $100 a week. Many have implied that an employee earning $100 a week for eight weeks would be eligible to receive benefits of $100 a week for 51 weeks. This is not the case. In fact, this worker would receive only 66⅔ per cent of his insurable earnings, or $67 a week, and not for the full 51 weeks. His maximum benefit duration would vary from 18 weeks to 44 weeks, depending on the unemployment rate. It is also important to note that this benefit will be taxable.

It has also been stated that a worker, under the present plan, may contribute only $42 and is then eligible to draw $2,756 in benefits, compared with $15.80 in contributions and $5,100 in benefits under the proposed plan. First, Mr. Speaker, these calculations are incorrect. For a 30-week attachment to the labour force, the present plan provides for $42 in contributions and eligibility for 15 weeks at $58 per week, for a total benefit of $870, untaxed, compared with $23.70 in contributions and from $2,144 to $3,417 in benefits under the proposed plan, which would be taxed. Second, it is clear that the contribution in both cases is insignificant in relation to benefits, as it should be if the insurance principle of being covered from the first premium is accepted.

Others have referred to the large group of people who are constantly floating in and out of the labour force. However, as with the present act, those who are in fact defined as being out of the labour force are not eligible for benefits. The substance of this is in the definition of the words "out of the labour force." In the proposed plan, as in the present act, unemployed workers must be capable, available and actively searching for work to be considered eligible for unemployment insurance benefits. Furthermore, every claimant is subject to a well defined and efficient benefit control system. This system has been developed over the years and resulted in some 83,000 claimants being disqualified in the fiscal year 1969-70. Recently in the Public Accounts Committee we heard of disqualifications for refusal to accept work dropping from 21,229 to 2,024 since the separation in 1966 of the National Employment Service from the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the creation of Canada Manpower centres. This tells only part of the story because it does not take into account the benefit control procedure which has been revised to detect ineligible claimants independently of Canada Manpower centres.

When people refer to the possible misuse of the lump sum payment of three weeks' benefit by people entitled to it, by having worked 20 weeks or more I think that to some extent these are valid questions. But we have to make a value judgment whether there should be a three weeks' benefit payment or not. Frankly, I am of the view that the payment of three weeks' benefit will be an incentive to the unemployed to get back to work earlier than they would normally. This view was endorsed by the Parliamentary Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration in their final report on the white paper published on December 16, 1970. It must also be emphasized that the proposed program is based on a two-week waiting period, which is a greater incentive to find work than the present one-week waiting period.

Many are also confused about the effects upon the middle-income group, which includes those with incomes of between $7,800 and $12,000 a year. They mistakenly believe that the 1,200,000 proposed to be covered for the first time are made up of persons solely in the middle-income group. In fact, these new entrants include 700,000 persons earning less than $8,000 per year who work for hospitals, charitable institutions, police forces and federal, provincial and municipal governments. It is proposed to extend coverage to only 500,000 additional middle-income persons, and the repeated implication that all the 1.2 million newly covered employees are in the middle-income group is not valid.

I have heard it stated that the middle-income group will be paying an "added tax" of $62 per year in the form of unemployment insurance with little or no chance of drawing benefits. However, there are 750,000 persons in the middle-income group now covered under the present plan. They would, it is estimated, contribute $33 million more than they would receive in benefits in 1972 if the present plan is retained. Under the proposed plan, this situation is reversed so that the middle-income group, including new entrants, will receive $20 million in benefits in excess of contributions, with the preferential contribution rates given to them in the first few years. When the plan matures, this difference will still be about $8 million. This improved contribution versus benefit comparison can be explained by the reduction in contribution rates, income tax effects, the increase in benefit rate and the provision of sickness and maternity benefits.

I should note that these figures are based on employee contributions only, but even if employer contributions are added into the calculations there is still a considerable improvement over the present plan. The assumption that those in the middle-income group will significantly increase contributions to the fund, without a proportional increase in benefits, is not supported by the facts.

Experience rating of employers has been introduced into the proposed plan because increasingly large subsidies are being paid by workers and employers in certain industries to workers and employers in others. It is considered unreasonable for an employer who may have negligible lay-offs to pay the same contribution rate as another employer who has a high lay-off rate, leading to a disproportionate consumption of unemployment insurance funds. It is, therefore, an objective of the proposed plan—as is the case with most insurance plans—to more equitably allocate the premium cost to where the benefit cost arises. It is appreciated that there will be some cost effect on industries which have benefited from this hidden subsidy, but economists now agree that the price of a product should reflect its true cost or, if subsidies are needed, they should be paid through some other program.

The parliamentary standing committee has endorsed this approach. Further to this, an experience rating system will provide an incentive for employers to stabilize employment patterns in order to take financial advantage of the reduced contribution rates which result. It is noteworthy that the proposed experience rating system will be phased-in over the years 1972 to 1974 with the full application not being implemented until 1976. Hence, all employers will have sufficient time to adjust their employment patterns.

Some constituents have expressed particular disappointment in the proposed program's plan to "get the unemployed back to work". In fact an entirely new proposal, the claimant assistance plan, has been devised for that very purpose. It is intended that this plan will become effective before the first interview. Immediately upon applying for benefits, an information kit will be given to those for whom it is suitable. This will provide details to assist the claimant in a rational job search. The first interview comes later because it has been found that 45 per cent of the claimants find work in the first eight weeks and for them interviews would be redundant.

The reasoning for the second interview at approximately the fourteenth week is much the same and is a recognition that a person out of work that long may have a special problem. Accordingly, the second interview will be more searching, so that the interviewer will have a better chance of establishing the problems the claimant is encountering in finding work. It is felt that through this system, in conjunction with public and private job placement agencies and social development groups, an unemployed person is likely to return to active employment much sooner. In fact, several pilot studies have established that programs such as the claimant assistance program can help a claimant, on average, to return to work up to one week sooner than otherwise. This is a 10 per cent to 15 per cent improvement.

It must not be assumed that the claimant assistance interviews are mainly to detect abuse. This is not the case. The Unemployment Insurance Commission staff involved in these activities will be kept entirely separate to prevent an unnecessary confusion of roles which could reduce the effectiveness of both programs. In fact, the existing benefit control procedures of the commission are quite adequate to control abuse. In 1969 the program against fraud and illegal benefit claims was applied more widely and new techniques and methods were instituted. These new criteria are now being applied to concentrate investigations in areas and groups which have indicated the greatest incidence of abuse. During the 1969-1970 fiscal year the benefit control procedure resulted in 83,000 disqualifications. All were required to repay the amounts they had wrongfully or improperly obtained. This effective control procedure will continue to operate under the new proposals.

In conclusion, it is well to stress that the proposed plan has been formulated as a result of lengthy and in-depth study. This investigation has extended over a number of years, commencing with the Gill report of 1962 and culminating in the white paper of 1970. Further, the proposed plan has been subjected to intensive study by the parliamentary Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration. During this study many interested groups took the opportunity to present briefs and make recommendations. The results of this investigation endorsed the basis of the proposed program.

I support the philosophy of social insurance on which this plan is based and the objectives of short-term financial assistance for the temporarily unemployed. But even more I endorse the aspects of this bill which will give guidance, direction and help to the unemployed and assist them to more quickly become productive workers in our society.

I am convinced that the unemployed need, and must have, financial help; but such help must never become our prime preoccupation, because their basic need is to be given an opportunity to get back into the work force at the earliest possible time. It is in this area that we, the government of Canada, must extend our greatest efforts.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I think all of us in the House, and certainly those who would criticize the bill before us, will admit that the administration of any unemployment insurance act is a difficult job. I think we would have to agree with the basic principle of unemployment insurance in a country with a climate such as ours where many areas of the work force are unable to go about their tasks in the winter months.

The bill before us and the increases therein represent one or two situations either of which has rather severe implications for our country. The near-universality of its application may well indicate that the government has privileged information which forces it to conclude that the long-term outlook for our economy is so bleak that it is essential that workers in hitherto stable occupations as government service, teaching, nursing, the armed services, law enforcement, hospital services and the executive levels of employment must at the earliest date be afforded the protective benefits of unemployment insurance. If this is not the case, I can only conclude that workers in these occupations are being hopelessly taxed to provide a guaranteed income of as much as $100 a week for what is becoming an alarmingly large segment of long-term unemployed workers in our economy. As I said before, abuses of the act cause the most alarm to the greatest number of people.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Throughout the winter a great many figures have been bandied about in the House. We have had seasonally adjusted and unadjusted figures The fact remains that there is a considerably large group of unemployed. There is today an undesirable and unbearable amount of unemployment in Canada. Somewhere along the line we have to do some soul-searching because we are paying out vast amounts of unemployment insurance which of course, come from taxes collected.

I picked up a copy of the March 5 edition of the Calgary Herald from a random pile in my office. Before I go into the figures that I arrived at on counting the job opportunities and situations wanted, I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to page 4508 of Hansard for March 23. In answering a question with regard to West Indians being brought into Canada for farm work, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said:

> Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member on that score. The purpose of the Manpower centres is to send the unemployed or the students to take part in this work.

The Prime Minister was referring to the work which West Indians will be doing on the farms of Ontario.

> But, once again, facts reveal that there are in Canada some types of work which the unemployed and the students refuse to do; this proves, by the way, that the rate of unemployment is at times somewhat artificial.

The significant part of the answer is that there are some types of work which the unemployed and students refuse to do. I agree that everyone should have a choice. We cannot take away this basic decision. However, this group that refuses to work when there is work is exercising its choice. In many cases the financing on which they depend comes from tax dollars. The taxpayers do not have an opportunity of refusing the right to pay taxes.

We have a great hard-core of unemployed in this country. In some areas of the country this has gone on for generation after generation. I refer to welfare in particular. The fact is that they are given the choice whether to work or not. We are obliged to care for them. On the other hand, the taxpayers who provide the money are not given that choice. If they were to apply their rights and privileges to whether they paid taxes or not, their property would be taken away and would become the property of the state. This is a very significant factor. We should take a long look at moving the unemployed to areas where jobs are available.

On going through the March 5 edition of the Calgary Herald I found there were 260 job opportunities and 25 career opportunities. As a balancing factor, there were 36 situations wanted. On that particular day there were 285 job and career opportunities, compared with 36 situations wanted. The job opportunities were not merely at one end of the scale; they covered the whole gamut from the most unskilled to requirements for the most highly educated and highly skilled jobs. There were ads for agents, salesmen, domestic help, female stenos, waitresses, hospital personnel and teachers. This seems unjust when the unemployment insurance pot is being depleted. I suppose what I saw in the Calgary Herald would be indicative of the majority of newspapers in Canada. These employers need people to work for them, yet we pay out vast sums of unemployment insurance and make the pot a little sweeter.

In my opinion the proposed measures in this legislation perpetuate in a dangerous fashion the failure of the government to treat the root causes of our social problem. Canadians need programs and legislation which stimulate a depressed economy by increasing as rapidly as possible the rate at which our unemployed and workers coming into the labour market for the first time can find employment. One of our greatest depressants in the creation of new jobs becoming available to Canadians is the white paper on taxation and the concern it has caused throughout the nation. Tragic as many of the proposals in that white paper were, the time lag in tax change legislation coming forward as a follow-up to the white paper, and the uncertainty it has created in the country for a great length of time, has been one of the major reasons for unemployment reaching and remaining at its present level.

Legislation which merely makes unemployment more bearable and provides for payment of substantial benefits after so short an attachment as eight weeks to the labour force can only create a climate of acceptance on the part of the hardcore unemployed of Canada. They know that the government will look after them. Instead of placing priority on conditional employment insurance benefits, we should be reducing taxation as a means of reactivating our economy. We should be proposing measures which would bring 1¼ million people into the labour force. We should not be embarking upon more schemes which would drain from the economy unemployment insurance funds amounting to several hundred millions of dollars which are needed to promote expansion of business and industry.

If taxes were lower, if the future were not so uncertain, a great many more people would be hired, a great many more people would be employed. But businessmen and industrialists in this country are afraid to do any more because the government's bite is just too large; the services are getting out of hand. In times of high unemployment such as we have experienced in the past year, the premium rates for this insurance scheme will, on the government's admission, be increased to compensate for the large benefit payments envisaged. Thus, at the very time when the economy needs increased purchasing power the necessary increase will be denied in part by the provisions of the bill before us; employees negotiating wage and salary settlements will demand that those settlements reflect the cost of meeting unemployment insurance premiums.

Employers, of course, will be obliged to pass the cost of these new settlements, as well as the cost of their premium payments, to users of their products or services. In considering these proposals to extend the benefits of unemployment insurance we should take account of the considerable number of businessmen in this country who are being forced into bankruptcy. Many businessmen have paid into this scheme, yet when they go bankrupt they find themselves without recourse in terms of unemployment insurance benefits. I suggest to the minister that since he is including so many new categories in his scheme, he might just as well include bankrupt businessmen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Before they go bankrupt.

Mr. Saltsman: Welfare for the rich—that's what we need.

Mr. Downey: What possible justification can there be for the inclusion of professional athletes in the new groups of workers compelled to pay into the fund? If there are sound reasons for including professional athletes, surely the same reasons ought to apply to professional musicians and actors, poets and painters, philosophers and magicians, since I would assume their employment prospects could be at least as hazardous as those of policemen or teachers.

Might I say as an aside that in the farming communities of the west, alarm has been caused from time to time by the growth of Hutterite colonies. These people are very good farmers. They farm on a communal basis and do so well that individual family farmers sometimes find it difficult to compete. Clause 4(e) of the bill before us contains a provision which, it appears, would make the existing competitive advantage even greater. I shall read the appropriate words from the bill which would exempt colonies from unemployment insurance:

> The employment of a member of a religious order who has taken a vow of poverty and whose remuneration is paid directly, or by him, to the order—

And so on. This provision would, I believe, place the individual family farmer in a worse competitive position vis-à-vis the Hutterite colonies. Then, again, what possible justification could there be for the government proposing that a retired worker should receive benefits for a period as long as 18 months? This could cost as much as $7,800 per person. Further, what justification could there be for providing benefits lasting up to 15 weeks in the case of pregnancy? Surely pregnancy ought to be regarded as a voluntary act by which a woman removes herself from the work force, unless of course the woman is the head of a family in the sense that her husband is unemployed during that period, or since becoming pregnant she has become widowed or divorced. This matter needs looking into again.

I commend to all hon. members the reading of the brief presented to the standing committee on October 22, 1970, by the Canadian Association of Equipment Distributors. In particular I should like to quote one portion of a paragraph from this submission as follows:

> We are very much disturbed by the further incentives to idleness and work avoidance which seem to be built into the new proposals. Far from there being indications of any vigorous intention to tighten up against the abuses well known to occur under the present system, it appears that the work-shy are likely to enjoy more generous treatment than ever. We believe that the proposed qualification of eight contribution weeks in a 12-month period is totally inadequate to constitute any form of attachment to the labour force. Since the earning of as little as $25 in seven days can comprise a contribution week, we have the situation that a person who has earned only $200 in a 12-month period (which at some current labour rates can mean as little as 30 hours' work in 12 months) is considered to be a bona fide member of the labour force entitled to enjoy unemployment benefits as an entrant to the system.

I believe that rather than devote enormous resources and funds to providing palliatives for the unemployed, the same resources and energy should be channelled into the more positive role of providing employment. We have to recognize that there are many thousands of citizens in our society who through no fault of their own require assistance in various forms from the state in order to enjoy a proper and decent livelihood, and I would support all measures that are directed toward the welfare of such people. I believe in social reform, but I say there is a distinction between socialism and social reform. They are two very different entities. Socialism increasingly fosters the belief that the state will provide all the essentials of life from the womb to the tomb.

Mr. Saltsman: Hear, hear!

Mr. Downey: The only thing wrong with that concept is that in the process of bringing it about, our freedoms are destroyed. Someone said that the power to tax was the power to destroy, and this is what we are experiencing. If hon. members think this is an overstatement I suggest they read the representations made on this bill to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration; they will find that the overwhelming majority of those submissions, including those from the unions, were opposed to the bill as it now stands.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I intend to say some critical things about the bill before us and the way in which it is set up, but before doing do I should like to say some complimentary things about the minister. I see the minister presenting this bill as conducting a one-man subversion of his own government: in fact, what this should be called is the "Bryce Mackasey fiscal policy." He is making sure that his government, which has been responsible for some of the highest levels of unemployment the country has ever seen, will not be able to get away with it in future without paying a very heavy price. If they create unemployment, they will pay an awfully high price. The proposals that the minister is putting forward provide a kind of built-in stabilizer.

An editorial in the Toronto Star pointed out, I think correctly, the fiscal nature of these proposals. As unemployment decreases, so the fund will build up. The assumption is that unemployment will decrease and that also there will be an increase in inflation. The building up of this fund will sterilize a certain amount of money by withdrawing it from circulation, and this will have an anti-inflationary effect. If unemployment increases above 4 per cent—I quarrel with that figure; I think it should be only 3 per cent—then the government has to put in money, and this will have an expansionary effect. If the government does have a tight monetary policy and a tight fiscal policy, then the "Bryce Mackasey fiscal policy" will come into operation and frustrate the government's intent.

It is to this extent that I congratulate the minister on what he is doing. With the modesty for which the minister is renowned, he said in his opening remarks that he was no economist. May I say to him, through you, Mr. Speaker, that he is probably the best economist on that side of the House, even though he does not want to take credit for it.

All of us agree on the need for an income maintenance policy. I do not think there is any quarrel with the argument that those who are unemployed should receive some kind of assistance, particularly when the overwhelming majority of people who become unemployed do not do so because they want to, but because they have no choice. After all, it is not their decision to be unemployed.

Quite frankly, I think the arguments I have heard from my friends in the Conservative party, such as that the waiting period is too short and the attachment period to the labour force is too short, are spurious. Why worry about the length of time workers are attached to the labour force? If they are unemployed and are members of the labour force, they require some kind of assistance and should receive assistance from the unemployment insurance fund.

Let me also say that no matter what kind of program we ultimately bring in, in terms of social policy there will always be a need for an unemployment insurance program. As I said yesterday on the guaranteed annual income, I see the concept of a guaranteed annual income for those who are not in the labour force, though I cannot see it for those who are in the labour force. I think unemployment insurance will always have relevance to people who are in the labour force.

What is my quarrel, then, with the kind of bill now before the House, with the kind of ideas that have been put forward by the minister? My quarrel is that in fact he is giving us a welfare program and is calling it unemployment insurance, and I resist this kind of phoniness. But perhaps the minister has no choice. His government is not prepared to bring in a comprehensive income maintenance policy. It is not prepared to bring in the kind of social measures that are required in this country. Therefore, the Minister of Labour has to sneak them in as best he can—and he sneaks them in through the unemployment insurance program. My concern is that, well motivated though he may be, by doing this to some extent we discredit the whole concept of unemployment insurance and run into all kinds of problems in terms of acceptability.

Mr. Alexander: You would throw the bill out.

Mr. Saltsman: Contain yourself, my friend. I know my friend is a man of infinite curiosity and I shall try and satisfy him later.

Mr. Paproski: Back to the convention hall!

Mr. Saltsman: Yes, back to the convention hall. As a matter of fact, I had the pleasure of reading the very good intervention made yesterday by the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and I noted that he took rather strong exception to those who were trying to talk while he had the floor. I would only say to him that I hope he will extend to me the same courtesy he asked of those who were impolite enough to interrupt his remarks.

Mr. Alexander: I extend my apologies.

Mr. Saltsman: I have heard my hon. friends in the Conservative party denounce the Unemployment Insurance Act as a kind of "boondoggle" to the workers. They say it is abused, that it is taken apart. You would think, Mr. Speaker, that this fund was designed to provide opportunities for working men to avoid work. What these members fail to appreciate—and I am surprised at this—is that the unemployment insurance fund is really a subsidy to industry. I am very unhappy that industrialists and businessmen in this country keep pointing their finger at the workers.

Let me recount an experience that I had on a plane coming back from Vancouver. Sitting beside me was a very prosperous man—at least so he told me.

Mr. Mackasey: He must have got on at Calgary.

Mr. Saltsman: He was a fruit grower from British Columbia. Most of the time he spent with me he was denouncing his lazy workers because they worked only so many weeks of the year and collected unemployment insurance the rest of the time. I asked him why he did not employ them all year round so that they could not collect unemployment insurance—because of course, you can only get insurance if you are laid off. I said to this man, "You say that they quit on their own and that you want to keep them. These workers cannot collect unemployment insurance until they have gone through a waiting period". Then he told me he could not use them all year round. I then asked him who was being subsidized.

That man could not survive without the unemployment insurance fund, and he should not survive. There are too many industries in this country evading their responsibilities and passing the buck to the public. We have seen this with pollution and with unemployment insurance.

I also have serious reservations about a fund of this sort that does not rate industries. I think industries should be rated. In fairness to the bill I should say that there are some weak provisions in regard to a low rating, a high rating and a medium rating; but in my view the gap between them is not wide enough. All industries should be experience rated.

I think that one of the best programs in this country is workmen's compensation. Looking back over the history of workmen's compensation we see it has had an admirable effect on the prevention of accidents in factories. Most of us who have been working for quite a while remember the time when no one cared much about accidents in industry. After all, that was part of the price that you had to pay for the production of goods. But when workmen's compensation boards started to give certain industries a high accident rating, these industries began employing safety officers in their plants. They began to scratch their heads and introduce safety devices, paste up posters in plants and promote educational programs. They did everything they could to ensure that they would not be put into a penalty position as a result of accidents in their factories—and that is the way it should be.

Too many industries have been living off the unemployment insurance fund, and the chief beneficiary of the fund has unfortunately not been the working man but, rather, the inefficient industries of Canada. This is a matter we must examine closely. If we are critical of unemployment insurance, and if there is cause to be critical, let us put the criticism in its proper place.

There are, of course, workers who abuse a fund of this sort. In any society consisting of millions of people you will find individuals doing things with which we do not agree. But my experience, and I think the experience of anyone who wants honestly to examine the behaviour of the working man in our society, is that he does not want to abuse the fund. By and large the labour force plays fair. If workers become unemployed, in most cases it is not their fault. They do not collect from the unemployment insurance fund of their own volition.

We can remember industries that as a matter of habit hired all kinds of people when things were good, and laid them off just as fast. The automobile industry was one of these. When automobiles were selling they would have high employment, but when things slowed down they would throw their workers on unemployment insurance. This continued until the unions stepped in and said they could not operate this way. The unions have made it too costly for the automobile industry to hire and fire on this basis.

These industries used to raise the argument that they could not organize their operations this way because their business was seasonal. They said they had to lay off people, but in fact this turned out not to be the case. When they had to pay these people even though they had laid them off, they stopped doing so and began to use their head in terms of levelling off the ups and downs of the industry.

I remember the $500 winter works bonus which was paid to the house building industry in respect of each house built during the off-season. Until that time virtually everyone in the house building industry told us there was no way they could build during the Canadian winter. They said it could not be done. The construction industry has been notorious for its lay-off pattern. The industry hired men for a day, a week or a month and then laid them off. The industry has had no sense of obligation to these people. There is no long-term attachment in most cases between the employee and the employer. Once there was a bonus involved and the industry knew there was some benefit if it built houses in the winter. Consequently, there was a great deal of construction in the winter.

One of the things we must look for today is a guaranteed annual wage. We must tell industries that they are obliged to treat their blue collar employees the same as the white collar man rather than as parts of a machine which can be shut down and started up again. They do not treat the office staff this way, so why should they do this to the men in the factories? The argument to the effect that they cannot organize the men in the factory does not hold water, because when they have to do this they do it.

We must emphasize this matter and use the unemployment insurance fund to stimulate this kind of approach. There should be a heavy penalty imposed, by way of the unemployment insurance fund, on employers who traditionally lay off workers at certain times each year, or those who do not exercise responsibility toward their workers. Let me go a little further and say something that may sound harsh. If industries cannot run their businesses in a way which will provide decent employment the year round with only lay-offs which cannot be avoided, they should not be in business. These industries receive fantastic sums from the public purse—and to add insult to injury it is very often the same industries which belabour the working man for abusing the unemployment insurance fund. They do so without taking into account the fantastic subsidies they receive and the abuses of the fund.

This erratic hiring and firing of the labour force locks people into poverty. It prevents their looking for other jobs. They hang on when they should get out. This enables them to attain a marginal existence when in fact there is not much hope for them in that industry. This practice undermines the retraining and mobility of our people. What we have in many cases is an insurance subsidy paid to industry. It is not any more an insurance program for workers in the real sense of that phrase.

If we are talking about insurance in comparison with welfare, the risk has to be unpredictable. That is what insurance is all about. If you know that certain industries lay off people in the same month every year for the same period of time, which many industries are doing, that is not unpredictable. Unpredictability is an element of insurance. You must feel that the reason you are taking out insurance is that you do not know what will happen, but it might happen. Very often we know what will happen, and when that is the case we can no longer call it an insurance program.

When the act was first brought in a limited number of people were covered. With a great deal of accuracy I think it then could be described as an insurance program. In many ways the premium was related to the risk. There was an unknown element in terms of the occurrence of unemployment. Essentially, what we had was a small group of industrial workers covered by the program. As the years went by, a greater number of people became covered under the plan. This occurred for various reasons, some of which were political. The governments of this country did not have the courage or intelligence to decide that we needed some kind of support for those who were displaced or suffered in our economy through no fault of their own. These were the people swept under the cover of the unemployment insurance fund. This was good politics because it usually happened around election time. Every time this happened, the program became something less an insurance program and more a welfare program. This is what the minister has inherited, and he must deal with it.

I note in the bill an attempt to devise a program for fishermen in particular. They are to be kept under the umbrella of the unemployment insurance fund until that is accomplished. This must be done because you simply cannot chuck people out, whatever the arguments happened to be when they were originally included. They require some kind of protection and we cannot rid ourselves of this protection until we create another kind. The Gill report took a very strong stand about the need to find a method of offsetting the unemployment insurance benefits for seasonal workers in Canada. This thinking also applies to fishermen and a host of industrial workers whom we do not think of as seasonal but who fall within a seasonal pattern.

I do not think the provision for maternity leave is good. I do not quarrel with the concept. Many countries have maternity benefits and perhaps we should have them as well—but how does this fit into an insurance scheme? Is maternity an accidental thing? It may be in some cases. Are you going to include maternity cases when a girl says her pregnancy was an accident? What about maternities that are planned? How do you justify putting them in an insurance scheme? On what rationale could you extend maternity benefits under an unemployment insurance scheme? If you are to have this kind of insurance scheme and maternity is not the result of an accident, what about planned maternity? Why should this be restricted to women in the labour force? What about girls who are not in a labour force and who have accidents? What are we to do with them? I am not asking the minister what he would do personally, and I do not intend to repeat what Mackenzie King said when he was asked about the Doukhobors, but this provision does not make much sense to me.

The minister suggested that by including a maternity leave provision we could cut down on abuse. I find this difficult to understand. Maternity benefits will be provided for up to 15 weeks. In his opening remarks he said that some people are now receiving benefits for 52 weeks as a result of maternity. What is to prevent their getting 52 weeks under this measure? I suggest they could obtain the same 52 weeks' benefit and that this will not correct any abuse. If these people want to go through the same rigamarole they now go through, they will get their full time. This measure will not change that situation. So I am pointing out through you, Mr. Speaker, to the minister the absence of logic. There may be a lot of humanity in this provision but—

Mr. Mackasey: I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if I might ask a question. I compliment the hon. member for his contribution to the debate in respect of experience rating, but so that I can formulate my thinking for my rebuttal tomorrow I wonder whether the hon. gentleman is agreeing that seasonal workers such as fishermen should eventually be removed from the unemployment insurance scheme.

Mr. Saltsman: If the minister is asking for my opinion, I believe I would say yes. I think seasonal workers generally— I would not say fishermen in particular—should not be in the unemployment insurance scheme. This is a personal view. I am sure there will be some disagreement by other people in my party. The inclusion of farm help is another move in this direction. The extension of coverage to salaried employees is another move in this direction. The coverage in respect of people taken ill while on insurance, although humanitarian and understandable, is another move away from the principle of unemployment insurance. One of the things Mr. Gill pointed out in his report which is difficult to justify is the inclusion of students from whom unemployment insurance is taken, yet who will never qualify to receive benefits so long as they continue to be students. The bill before us makes some gesture in the direction of relating premium to risk, but it is minimal and I believe it should do far more.

I should like to say a few words about the position of teachers. I have had an opportunity to hold a number of discussions and meetings with teachers. I believe it is unfair to misinterpret the teachers' position as one of wishing to be excluded from unemployment insurance. I think they very clearly stated in their brief that their quarrel is not with being included in the scheme, not with paying a premium but, rather, with the way it is being done and the artificiality of the argument that is being used.

If what we have in this country is a program which started as an unemployment insurance program and which is to be turned into a welfare program or a partial welfare program, it should be paid for in that way and not on a premium basis. A major portion of the cost of the premium should be paid by the public treasury. I want to leave aside for the moment the "Mackasey fiscal policy," which is a good policy, and simply say we are moving the other way.

The minister said we would save in the order of $80 million from the Canada Assistance Plan by including this program, so the government's contribution is becoming less and less. The government is providing more welfare and is paying less. Even that 20 per cent of 16½ per cent which my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) so carefully calculated is being taken out. The government is thrusting the burden on the people coming into the scheme now and is asking them to pay out of proportion to their risk. The minister nods his head. Let me ask him what sort of sleight of hand he has used to justify what he has done. He is now including more people. He is lowering the premium. He is reducing the government's contribution and is paying higher benefits. If the people who are being added are not to be taxed—that is what it is, a tax—out of proportion to the risk they represent, how does the minister work this financial miracle?

Mr. Mackasey: I wonder whether the hon. member would like the answer now, or when I am summing up tomorrow evening. I have an intriguing thought that I can increase the benefits, lower contributions and everything else and do all the things the hon. member has suggested. The point is that I am applying the insurance concept by pooling risks. I know people coming into the plan will be contributing to the total risk, and I am sure the hon. member as a good left-winger would agree with the concept that they should be their brother's keeper and help each other. Basically, this is what we are asking teachers to do.

Mr. Saltsman: I am not quarrelling with being my brother's keeper. The minister is making a very Tory-like argument. He wants to tax less and pay more. How is this to be done? Admittedly, the minister is increasing the benefits and reducing the premium because he is pooling the risk. There is only one conclusion: the new people coming in will be paying more than they are receiving. Why do we not say it that way? Really, this is the crux of the teachers' argument. They will incur risks, of course, but we are not being frank about their position. They are being taxed in excess of other people who pay into the unemployment insurance fund. I believe this is so, because I do not know how else the minister can work it out. He has proven his brilliance in economics according to his fiscal policy and I would not wish him to lose that stature by arguing that it is otherwise, that is, that it is not a fact that the new people coming in will pay more than they will receive.

We can argue that a new situation has arisen and many people who were included in the past, who might logically have considered themselves as not prone to some of these risks, are now prone. There is some truth in this argument and I believe even the teachers would admit it. However, I believe if we are to tax the teachers more heavily than other people—because ultimately it becomes a tax—we should at least have the courtesy to be frank and not suggest that they are coming into the program and will receive benefits equal to their contribution.

I have spoken privately to many teachers who have said that if they are to be their brother's keeper and pay a tax, then everybody else should pay the tax. If this program is to have a welfare connotation, part of which is to be paid by premium and another part to be paid out of tax revenue by people according to their ability to pay, then I say we are moving backward. Even the government's contribution is being withdrawn. The whole thing is being thrown back on the payers of the premium and the new people coming in. I suggest that this is unfair.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, will the minister confirm that we will continue this debate tomorrow?

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I hope we might finish it by tomorrow evening.

At ten o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, April 21, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

VACANCY

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the representation, namely:

Albert B. Douglas, Esquire, member for the electoral district of Assiniboia, by decease.

Accordingly I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

WIRETAPPING OR OTHER ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave of the House to present a motion under Standing Order 43. Before members on the other side of the House respond with an automatic "No", may I indicate that I have given advance copies of my motion to the government house leader as well as to certain other members of the House. I believe it is a motion that calls for no argument whatsoever. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

That this House, as a matter of principle and in defence of its undoubted privileges, records its opposition to any wiretapping or other electronic eavesdropping on its members by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police or by any agency on behalf thereof.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. The motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. I notice that the President of the Privy Council wishes to rise, but I have to bring to his attention and to the attention of the House that no debate is permitted by virtue of the Standing Order. The Chair is limited to asking whether there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and the motion cannot be put.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who said no?

• (2:10 p.m.)

WIRETAPPING, SURVEILLANCE AND PREPARATION OF DOSSIERS—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter requiring the urgent consideration of the House, in a vein similar to the motion proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Therefore I ask the unanimous consent of the House to consider the following motion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie):

That this House do now require the Solicitor General to appear before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs to consider the following matters:

1. The criteria upon which wiretapping, surveillance and the preparation of dossiers are initiated in this country;

2. The process by which dossiers are compiled and/or verified in this country by members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police;

3. The freedom that the security and intelligence directorate of the force has to initiate surveillance of any nature on M.P.'s without prior approval of the Solicitor General;

4. The wiretapping of the home of one J. M. Cossette, a resident of the province of Quebec;

5. The responsibility of the Solicitor General, either by omission or commission, for infringements upon the rights and privileges of all Canadians who are presently under surveillance, whether they be members of this House or not, and,

That such meeting take place between the Solicitor General and the Standing Committee before the first day of May, 1971.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Egmont. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43 before this motion may be put from the Chair it requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: In the absence of unanimity, the motion cannot be put.

CONTROL OF COMPANIES BY CAPE BRETON CORPORATION

Question No. 994—Mr. Fortin:

1. Has the Cape Breton Development Corporation obtained control of the companies which it now manages and, if so, is it the intention of the Corporation to indemnify the former owners (a) in cash (b) in bonds yielding interest?

2. Has the Corporation finished the inventory of properties to be expropriated and, if so, has this inventory been registered at a Registration Office?

3. Will the appraisal be based on (a) the value of the assets on the balance sheets (b) the direct evaluation of the assets (c) the stock capitalization (d) others?

[Translation]

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. The Cape Breton Development Corporation (Devco) has never controlled or managed the companies mentioned in S. 2(d) of the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act. The assets (but not the shares) of those companies were expropriated by Devco on March 30, 1968. On May 15,

[Mr. Speaker.]

1970, the Deputy Attorney General of Canada, on behalf of Devco, commenced proceedings in the Exchequer Court of Canada to have determined the amount of compensation payable for the assets expropriated; in these proceedings the companies concerned were offered the sum of eleven million dollars in full settlement of all claims for compensation for the assets expropriated, subject to the set-off mentioned in S. 12(3) of said Act.

2. Pursuant to S. 10 of the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act, a plan of the real property expropriated by Devco was filed in the Office of the Registrar of Deeds for the County of Cape Breton, at Sydney, Nova Scotia, on March 22, 1968, as Instrument No. M612. The inventory of personal property expropriated by Devco was registered the Office of the Registrar General of Canada on March 19, 1968, on Film 217, Document 183.

3. The Crown's appraisers have valued the assets expropriated upon the basis set out in S. 12 of the Cape Breton Development Corporation Act."

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION—APPOINTMENT OF AUDITOR

Question No. 995—Mr. Fortin:

1. Since the establishment of the Cape Breton Development Corporation (a) who was appointed auditor and under what authority (b) what is his annual salary (c) has the Auditor General been appointed auditor or co-auditor and, if not, for what reason?

2. What progress has been made in the nationalization and expropriation operations of this Corporation?

[Translation]

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. (a) Touche, Ross, Bailey and Smart of Halifax, N.S., under authority of P.C. 1967-2099, November 2, 1967. (b) Charges are based on services rendered in respect to each year's audit. (c) No. It has not been the practice, where independent auditors have been appointed to audit the affairs of a proprietory corporation, to appoint the Auditor General as well.

2. Please refer to the answer to Question 994.

PERSONNEL OF AMERICAN SUBSIDIARIES, 1970

Question No. 1,033—Mr. Yewchuk:

1. In 1970, how many employees, hired by American subsidiaries in Canada, were laid-off?

2. In 1970, how many employees, working for American subsidiaries in Canada, went on strike?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1 and 2. Information not available.

Questions

FOOD AND DRUG DIRECTORATE PUBLICATION RX

Question No. 1,119—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Does the January issue of the Food and Drug Directorate of the Department of National Health and Wealth publication RX list prices from different manufacturers for three different drugs and, if so, is one such company Empire Drugs?

2. Was the Empire Drug Company delisted between January 1 and January 15, 1971, from the list of companies conforming with standards 74-GP-lb?

3. What is the purpose of deleting a company from the list of companies conforming with standard 74-GP-lb?

4 Are federal departments and agencies restricted or prevented from purchasing drugs from companies not conforming to standard 74-GP-lb?

5. Did the official publication of the Food and Drug Directorate omit any company that conformed to the standard from the list?

6. On what date was the January issue of the RX bulletin released?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Part I, Yes. Part II, Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Canadian Government Specifications Board Standard 74-GB-lb is considered as a guide to assist drug purchasing agents of the Government of Canada. In general, companies deleted from the list of those conforming with standard 74-GB-lb are not considered eligible to tender on drugs purchased by the federal government. On occasion, however, drugs are purchased for federal use from firms whose names do not appear on 74-GB-lb, if the product involved is of a specialty nature.

4. See answer to question 3.

5. No.

6. The January 1971 issue of RX was released on February 17, 1971.

Questions

NEWFOUNDLAND—ASSISTANCE UNDER DREE

Question No. 1,185—Mr. Marshall:

Has the Province of Newfoundland applied to the federal government for assistance under the Department of Regional Economic Expansion to establish air landing strips at (a) Cartwright (b) Mary's Harbour (c) Springdale (d) Grand Falls (e) Wesleyville (f) Bonavista (g) Catalina (h) Winterland (i) Harbour Buton (j) Channel (k) Port-aux-Basques and, if so, what assistance will be given by way of grants or loans?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No.

DEPARTMENT OF REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—INCOME DERIVED FROM COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,191—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Nil.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CRIMINAL CODE—OFF-TRACK BETTING OPERATIONS

Question No. 1,204—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. Since the 1969/70 amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada, has the Minister of Agriculture received from any provincial government any request for the Minister's approval of off-track betting operations to be conducted by governmental, municipal, community or private interests and, if so, how many applications were there from each province?

2. What was the decision in the case of each of the said applications?

3. If any were refused, what were the reasons given for such refusals?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. The Attorney General of Alberta has requested the Minister of Agriculture to authorize off-track betting to be conducted by the Western Canada Racing Association Ltd., at their Edmonton and Calgary Race tracks.

2. No final decision.

3. The Attorney General of Alberta and the Western Canada Racing Association Ltd. were advised that the decision in this matter would have to be delayed and considered in the context of off-track betting generally, which has been discussed by the federal and provincial Attorneys General.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—SELECTION OF TEACHERS FOR OVERSEAS POSITIONS

Question No. 1,234—Mr. Fairweather:

1. What are the criteria used for the selection of teachers for overseas positions with the Department of National Defence?

2. For the 1971-72 program, how many applications were (a) received (b) accepted from the Province of New Brunswick?

[Mr. Benson.]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): 1. Applicant's academic qualifications, special skills, ability and training; degree of competency based on the assessment by the local responsible superintendent of schools; personal suitability; age, marital status and, if married, the number of children in the family. Each candidate must also pass a medical examination for duty in Europe.

2. This year slightly over 800 applications were received for some 130 vacancies. Competition for each position was keen and only the best qualified and most competent teachers were selected. Thirty five school boards in New Brunswick were asked to nominate teachers for overseas assignments. Only eight boards responded, nominating a total of 18 candidates. Of the 18 candidates, one was selected, one failed to complete and return the required documentation and the remaining 16 were not given assignments because no suitable vacancies were available.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—INCOME DERIVED FROM COMPUTER SERVICES

Question No. 1,270—Mr. Robinson:

What income, if any, is derived from the computer services provided by the Department of Justice (a) from other departments (b) from sale or services to industry (c) to provincial government departments (d) to municipalities?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): None.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PLYWOOD INDUSTRY

Question No. 665—Mr. Fortin:

1. During each of the past five years (a) what was the production of plywood in Canada (b) what were the exports of plywood (c) what were the imports of plywood (d) what were the custom duties on plywood?

2. Is the government considering the problems of the plywood industry in general and more specifically those of the Sogefor Company, and (a) if so, what solutions have been or will be applied (b) if not, for what reasons?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. 209 is acceptable to the government.

INFORMATION CANADA KITS, FEDERAL EXHIBIT PROGRAM

Motion No. 209—Mr. Mather:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the Information kits prepared by Information Canada for all of its exhibits in the federal exhibit program.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN CATALINA EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT LIMITED AND PRIME MINISTER

Motion No. 206—Mr. McCleave:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the letter dated in March sent by Catalina Exploration and Development Limited to the Prime Minister, and the reply thereto.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. 206 is acceptable to the government subject to the usual reservations concerning confidential documents and to the authorization of the government authorities concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the parliamentary secretary, is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jerome: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Notices of Motions Nos. 207 and 208.

STUDIES UNDER "FEDERAL PRESENCE PROGRAM"

Motion No. 207—Mr. Mather:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all consultant studies, research studies or publications prepared by Information Canada in its "Federal Presence Program".

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Hon. Robert Stanbury that no studies or publications have been prepared for the "Federal Presence Program" of Information Canada. Under these circumstances I would ask the hon. member to consider withdrawing his motion.

Mr. Mather: I withdraw, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

FILMS PRESENTED AT TERRE DES HOMMES BY INFORMATION CANADA

Motion No. 208—Mr. Mather:

That an Order of the House do issue for a transcript of the special films presented as part of Information Canada's federal exhibit program at Terre des Hommes.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Hon. Robert Stanbury that the film being prepared for the Information Canada exhibit at Terre des Hommes is a short animated treatment of the theme of the citizen solving problems through a democracy. Since there is no voice or verbal presentation, there is no manuscript in the usual sense of the word. I therefore ask the member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Mather: I withdraw, Mr. Speaker.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should remind the parliamentary secretary that it is preferable and indeed required by the rules to refer to an hon. member either by his constituency or by his responsibility in the administration and not by his name. I appreciate that at times, in some respects, there are difficulties, but I am sure the parliamentary secretary will want to bear that in mind.

Mr. Baldwin: There should be more anonymity.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—EXPRESSION OF CANADIAN OPPOSITION—PARTICIPATION BY BRITISH COLUMBIA IN MEETING WITH UNITED STATES OFFICIALS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport who I see is on the roster today. It is prompted by the information given the Leader of the Opposition in Alaska yesterday by Professor Weedon indicating the paucity of research concerning possible effects of coastal and water pollution from the TAPS route. Is the minister in a position to assure the people of Canada that the government of Canada will present to the United States government its strong opposition to the TAPS project which threatens the Canadian people with an ecolocatastrophe?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to inform the minister of this question as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether there is a cabinet-wide position on the TAPS route, and will this be made clear to the Canadian people and the Canadian Parliament at an early date?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The subject has not been the object of policy by the government.

Mr. Macquarrie: I have one further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Considering the fact that the British Columbia government, in contradiction to his own government, has a strong and clear-cut position on the matter, will negotiations be entered into with the United States so that the government of British Columbia might be invited to the May 3 conference?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the May meeting in Washington between officials of our government and the United States government is to discuss this position and to express the views which the Secretary of State for External Affairs has expressed in the House, that is to say, our very serious concern about the possibility of pollution if this route is adopted.

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister indicate whether there have been consultations with British Columbia about the forthcoming meeting on May 3?

Mr. Trudeau: I could not say, Mr. Speaker.

WELFARE

INELIGIBILITY OF PERSONS ON STRIKE FOR PAYMENTS UNDER SASKATCHEWAN ASSISTANCE ACT—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENT ON BREACH OF AGREEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that the Saskatchewan government by Order in Council has decreed that no person on strike is considered to be eligible for assistance under the Saskatchewan Assistance Act, and in view of the fact that the money paid under that act comes in part from the federal government under the Canada Assistance Plan, can the minister say whether he is getting in touch with the government of Saskatchewan concerning this breach of the agreement under the Canada Assistance Plan?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have to advise the hon. member we would have to know the particulars of each individual case involving an application for social assistance. We would have to have knowledge of the facts concerning whether or not it was a case of genuine need and whether in fact the assistance was denied contrary to the basic criteria as to need established under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the minister ascertains that this is the case, will he be in touch with Saskatchewan about it?

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIP BY INDIAN AFFAIRS MINISTER TO AUSTRALIA AND NEW ZEALAND—FAILURE TO INCLUDE RALLIEMENT CRÉDITISTE MEMBER

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Yesterday, in his reply to a question put to him by the member for Athabasca, he said that he had visited several countries, including Australia and New Zealand, for the benefit of Canadians and he added:

—and I know that the hon. member deeply resented not being chosen by his party as a member of the delegation.

So, my question is the following: Can the minister outline the reasons that prevented him from asking our party to appoint a representative in the delegation that was visiting those countries?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have formed a delegation comprising three government members and two members of the Opposition. I thought that it would be sufficient to represent the House of Commons. The delegation did quite a good job during that trip.

Mr. Caouette: I should like to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I do not want to know whether the delegation did a good job, but if the minister recognizes that there are four political parties in the House and that each party is entitled to be represented on any Canadian delegation.

FINANCE

OVERDUE INDEBTEDNESS OF PAKISTAN TO WORLD BANK —CANADIAN POSITION IN LIGHT OF INTERNAL CONFLICT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is for the Minister of Finance. Would the minister advise the House whether Canada has joined other members of the World Bank in indicating to Pakistan that its overdue indebtedness to the World Bank can no longer continue and that in this way the World Bank is taking a position of putting pressure on Pakistan in light of the recent troubles in that country?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I should like to take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

PROVINCIAL AFFAIRS

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND ACT PROHIBITING CERTAIN PUBLIC GATHERINGS—REVIEW BY SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the apparent conflict between the Prince Edward Island Public Order Act and the freedom of assembly guaranteed by the Canadian Bill of Rights, and the dubious constitutional validity of the act, is the government giving consideration to an early referral of that act for the judicial determination of the Supreme Court of Canada?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I was in Prince Edward Island yesterday where I met the premier of the province on several matters including the current recently enacted piece of legislation. I also met a delegation from a committee which has been formed to protest that particular piece of legislation. I said to them, as I have said to the House, that the federal government does not intend to refer the provincial act to the Supreme Court of Canada by way of a reference, and that, if citizens of Prince Edward Island feel that it should be challenged the ordinary courts are available to them. I also said to the citizens committee that the power of disallowance had not been used since 1943.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the practice of disallowance has, for all intents and purposes, gone out of use in recent years, would the Minister of Justice say whether in his discussions with the premier of Prince Edward Island the premier gave any indication that this act might be withdrawn or amended?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Whatever action the premier intends to take, he will make it public in the ordinary way, I would imagine.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REQUEST THAT MINISTER MAKE REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is for the Secretary of State. In view of the questions in the last couple of days with respect to the Opportunity for Youth program, may I ask the Secretary of State, because of the considerable concern and interest in this program, whether he might be prepared to appear, along with the staff responsible for the program, before the Standing Committee on Manpower and Immigration to give a progress report about the program and to reply in detail to many of the concerns and criticisms that have been expressed over the past two or three weeks in order that the program may be implemented with full effectiveness?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, should I be invited to appear before a committee of the House because the committee feels my presentation to be useful, it would not occur to me to elude this appearance. However, I should like to tell the hon. member that as early as tomorrow, on motions, I intend to make a statement on this program which will represent, to a certain extent at least, a report on the present status of the project the hon. member mentioned in his question.

[English]

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his willingness to make a statement tomorrow. When he makes it would he address himself particularly to the criteria and objectives of the program and whether there will be sufficient funds to handle all the worthy projects that have been submitted by the youth of the country?

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, when the Secretary of State makes his statement on motions will he indicate to the House whether programs will be fully approved or will some of them be given only partial approval in order to allow the $15 million allocated to be spread out to cover a greater number of projects?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that the question asked by the hon. member and the previous question are in the form of helpful suggestions to the minister. The House must assume that the suggestions will be taken into consideration by the minister. If they are not then hon. members will have an opportunity to ask other questions again tomorrow.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—INVOLVEMENT OF MUNICIPAL OFFICIALS

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, with respect to this program I would like to ask the Secretary of State if it is the policy of the government, as stated by a government official, to keep municipal civil servants from getting involved and, if so, to what programs in other departments does this policy also apply?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the question surprises me as I have said here repeatedly that any civil servant of whatever level of government could get involved in these projects and contribute as much as possible to them. However, it is clear that if "get involved" means receive a salary from the budget of the project that is excluded, as was moreover clearly stated from the start.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize a last supplementary on this subject. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris.

SUMMER LANGUAGE PROGRAM—ISSUING OF INSTRUCTIONS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question concerns the summer language program. Have specific instructions been issued to the AUCC which administers this course and, if not, could the hon. gentleman inform us when this information might be going forward?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Unless I am mistaken, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is one year behind our time. Indeed this year, according to the latest news, this project is not administered by the AUCC but by the Council of the Ministers of Education of Canada who have agreed to consider the matter and to advise the department of the Secretary of State as to the way these courses could be organized.

GRAIN

POSSIBLE INCLUSION OF RAPESEED AND FLAXSEED UNDER CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD JURISDICTION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister who reports for the Wheat Board. While normally the question I have in mind to ask might be subject to criticism at this time, because of rumours in western Canada to the effect that rapeseed and flaxseed are now going to be brought under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board, and as there is naturally widespread interest because the number of farmers who have gone into the production of these crops runs into the thousands, is the minister prepared to say that, in so far as granting power to the Wheat Board, on proclamation, to include either or both of these grains within its jurisdiction is concerned, it is not the intention of the government to have the Wheat Board do the marketing of those two types of seeds either during the present crop year or in the next succeeding one?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I certainly welcome the opportunity to make clear what the position will be in the proposed legislation which is now before the House. There has been no decision at all to put rapeseed, flax or rye under the Wheat Board but only to include the power, by proclamation, to extend the Wheat Board Act to these grains. No decision of that sort has been taken by the government. The question has been under consideration and study, both by farm organizations and by a group under my direction, for some time, but certainly there is no imminent decision in this regard. The rapeseed market has in fact been working rather well in its existing shape.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the simple question is this: if the government does not intend to use the power, then why is it bringing in legislation to permit the use of power that it has not in mind to use?

RAPESEED—CLOSING OF VANCOUVER FUTURES MARKET BY WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, further to a question I asked the minister earlier this week regarding rapeseed to which he replied that the explanation for the closing of the futures market at Vancouver had better come from the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, since no public explanation has come from the Grain Exchange can the minister now inform the House of the reason for closing the Vancouver futures market?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Again I would remind the House that I cannot speak about the thoughts and intentions of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, but certainly their total effort has been an attempt to provide for the country and buyers abroad a futures market which is reasonable and stable and one which produces a proper relationship with a decent price to the producer in Canada. They have had discussions about the closing of the Vancouver futures exchange as such in order to bring about a better result in the relationship of futures to current prices. There are further discussions now as a result of this action by the Winnipeg Grain Exchange and some further action may be taken by them. I am kept informed and I am assured that the total objective is to attempt to provide a stable and well operating futures market.

Mr. Gleave: In view of the fact that this has not been a stable market and has not returned just prices, can the minister inform the House of the basis and the procedure by which purchasers can now buy rapeseed for future delivery at Vancouver? Can he also answer the question I asked the other day, namely, what was the result of the meeting in Vancouver to discuss this subject?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I cannot add anything at this time. The situation is fluid and the Grain Exchange is looking at alternatives. I think there may be further information for members before very long.

WHEAT—PROVISION OF EQUITABLE PRICE COMMENSURATE WITH COST OF PRODUCTION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the government has rejected the realistic two-price system for wheat, can the minister indicate to the House whether any other proposal is under active consideration to provide the wheat producers of Canada with an equitable price commensurate to a degree with the cost of production within Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I hope that within a few days I will be able to put before the House for first reading a bill regarding the stabilization plan which will include a transitional payment of $100 million.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that we could spend the whole question period on this fascinating subject, but we should go on. The hon. member for Portneuf is anxious to ask a question on a different subject.

PUBLIC SERVICE

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE—ALLEGED PREFERENTIAL SALARY TREATMENT FOR TORONTO EMPLOYEES COMPARED WITH QUEBEC

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wish to direct to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Is the hon. minister aware of serious complaints lodged by federal civil servants employed in the family allowance branch in Quebec City, to the effect that because of the department's practice of classifying employees doing the same kind of work, the officers on duty in the Toronto office receive $1,000 more annually than those in Quebec City?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that this question could easily be put on the order paper. If the matter is at all urgent, then the hon. member should give me the required notice and I shall see to it that the matter is discussed on adjournment.

AUTOMOBILES—UNITED STATES CUSTOMS COURT DECISION RECLASSIFYING CANADIAN-FORGED PARTS AS DUTIABLE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, just before the Easter recess I directed a question to the Minister of Finance concerning a decision of the United States customs court imposing an import duty on Canadian-forged auto parts, which appears to be in violation of the United States-Canada car pact.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has the answer to this question and I am sure he will give it to my hon. friend the next time he is in the House.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPLACEMENT OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—OPPORTUNITY FOR DEBATE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Minister of Justice. As there are only six more parliamentary days before April 30—I am sure the minister is well aware of that—can he advise the House if the internal difficulties that the government has experienced in connection with the type of measure to replace or deal with the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act have been resolved? Can the minister now tell the House in what form the government intends to introduce discussion of this matter in the House, and will he repeat the assurance that it will be in such a form as to permit the House to debate and discuss the matter and give the government the benefit of its advice?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to accept the preamble to that question. The Prime Minister dealt fully with the same question yesterday. Certain issues will be brought before the House in such a form that the views of the House may be ascertained.

REPLACEMENT OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Justice inform the House whether, prior to the introduction of any measure in the House, there will have been consultation with the provinces on the nature of any provision that might be put before the House?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Whatever is put before the House in whatever form, Mr. Speaker, will imply, either before or after, very close consultation with the provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

As the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act will expire on April 30, can the minister tell the House whether he met the Minister of Justice of Quebec lately to discuss the special powers or whether he has replied to the letter from Quebec requesting an extension of these powers?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, when I met the premier of Quebec some two weeks ago, to discuss negotiations on the revision of the Constitution, we discussed the Act which is now in force and the possibility of passing a new one. The premier of Quebec had then invited the Minister of Justice of Quebec, Mr. Jérôme Choquette, to take part in these discussions.

COMPULSORY PROVISION OF STRONGER BUMPERS ON AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport? Having in mind the action taken by his counterpart, the Secretary of Transport in the United States, requiring that all passenger motorcars by a certain date in 1972 be equipped with proper defence bumpers to replace today's costume-jewelry type bumpers, can the minister inform the House whether similar consideration is being given to such a requirement in Canada?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the officials who have responsibility for auto safety are now devising new regulations with regard to automobile bumpers. As a member of the committee I believe the hon. member knows that the situation is that we work closely with the American safety authorities in this regard. I would expect that our standards will be similar and certainly not less than theirs.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR INTEREST-FREE LOANS FROM FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the visit by the premier of Quebec to various European countries.

Since Mr. Bourassa has made it known that the purpose of his trip is to obtain investments for Quebec, an expanding province, did the premier of Quebec—or his government—make an official application to the federal government or to the Canadian International Development Agency to obtain interest-free loans for the development of the province?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member want to put a supplementary question?

Mr. Fortin: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

In the light of the very eloquent answer which was given to my first question, I should like to put the following supplementary question: Has the federal government in mind the setting up of an agency which would play the role of the Canadian Development Agency with the various provincial governments in need of money to speed up their economic development?

Mr. Rondeau: Tax development.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have so many programs which do what the hon. member wants that I do not know why he would like to have an additional one. We have the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, we have equalization payments and we have also a series of programs under which the federal government pays to developing provinces huge amounts which will nearly reach one billion this year. These are not interest-free loans but grants taken from the other provinces' taxes. So I am at a loss as to what the hon. member wants to know.

Mr. Fortin: A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

I would like the right hon. Prime Minister to tell us if he has officially received from the Quebec government a request similar to the one made by the latter to some European countries, asking them for investments in Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the federal government does not invest in Quebec in the same way as private European undertakings. The premier of Quebec did not make such a request, which by the way I would find inconceivable.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has already asked two supplementary questions regarding that matter. I will recognize the hon. member later.

[English]

For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster.

[Mr. Fortin.]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In connection with the preparation of the forthcoming budget, is the minister receiving the active advice of the hon. member for Trinity either through that great, democratic body, the Liberal caucus, or on a personal basis?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question as asked is in order.

Mr. Bell: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It would have to be a new question because the hon. member cannot ask a supplementary to a question that is clearly out of order.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I direct an entirely new question to the Prime Minister in connection with this matter. In view of the Prime Minister's willingness to forget the past, would he take back the lonely hon. member for Trinity into the cabinet or at least make him a minister of state, because—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is in the form of a suggestion. Again he must assume that it will be considered.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PURPOSE OF ASSIGNMENT OF INVESTIGATOR TO SYDNEY OFFICE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In asking this question I appeal to his well known sense of justice and fair play. Is the minister aware that an investigator has arrived at the Sydney unemployment insurance office from the regional office at Moncton? Also, after due investigation on his part would he advise whether this man's job is to ascertain who leaked the information that plans were under way to phase out or close down the commission's office in Sydney?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have serious doubts whether the hon. member's question is in order. He will recognize that this is a matter of very specialized importance. I wonder whether the hon. member does not think that this is the type of question which could well be considered at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I rephrase my question. May I ask the minister—I realize that he is responsible for the Unemployment Insurance Commission and am aware of his interest in matters of this nature, if he would check with the officials of the Unemployment Insurance office and ascertain if such is the case and that there are Gestapo tactics in the Unemployment Insurance Commission?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary or rephrased question is not in order. He is asking the minister to investigate. He has the right to assume that his request will be considered.

CONCENTRATION OF FACILITIES IN MARITIME PROVINCES —ELIMINATION OF EMPLOYEES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour if there are plans at present to further concentrate the facilities of the Unemployment Insurance Commission in the Maritime provinces in one or more centres, thus eliminating employees in such centres as Charlottetown and elsewhere?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think what both hon. gentlemen probably are referring to is that, in conjunction with the proposed legislation that I hope will be adopted by the House very shortly, there will be a reorganization within the Unemployment Insurance Commission, precisely as hon. members opposite have been asking for the last couple of days, in order to provide better service for the Canadian public. This is the prime responsibility of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I can assure the House, however, that in this reorganization we do not contemplate reducing the work force in the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Labour avoided answering the question asked by the hon. member for Malpeque about the matter of concentration. Is it not true, despite the minister's several assurances to the contrary, that the Unemployment Insurance Commission has shown a film across the country which indicates that their program is directed toward centralization?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's supplementary question is in the form of an argument. He has asked the minister whether it is not true that such and such a thing has happened. Perhaps the minister might like to reply to the question. It seems to me, however, that the question was asked in an argumentative form. I will not be argumentative and will therefore invite the minister to reply.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious that some of the functions now carried on across the country will be centralized. This is quite consistent with the introduction of modern communication techniques and with the introduction of computers, for instance, which make it possible to centralize certain functions in particular areas. The point I wanted to make is that this will not necessarily mean any reduction in staff in the local areas. It will simply mean that employees will be trained to perform some other function.

Mr. Dinsdale: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Two hon. members seek to ask supplementary questions on this subject, but we have only a few moments left. I wonder whether we might not go to the next subject.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTRODUCTION OF BILL IN UNITED STATES CONGRESS TO ABOLISH GREEN-CARD COMMUTER SYSTEM

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Does the government plan on taking any action or holding any discussions in respect of the bill introduced in Congress earlier this month that would abolish the so-called green card commuter system under which thousands of Canadians cross the United States border each morning to work and return home in the evening?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the question is, of course, one of great importance to us and to many Canadians. Accordingly we are watching the situation very closely.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

SUGGESTED VISIT TO RUSSIA BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. WHEAT—PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL BOXCARS TO EXPEDITE MOVEMENT FOLLOWING RAILWAY STRIKE

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. He may want to discuss this matter with his colleague, the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. In light of reports emanating from the western grain trade to the effect that a reduction in wheat sales of some 50 million bushels in the current crop year will result from the recent rail strike in the western regions, will the minister make a special effort and prevail on the railways to provide an extra allocation of rolling stock with a view to recouping the lost grain movement before the end of the current crop year?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will be glad to take the hon. member's advice about consulting with the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, and I have already made similar representations to the railways.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRANSPORT

REVIVAL OF NEWFOUNDLAND RAILWAY PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Transport. In view of the Canadian Transport Commission's new objective, released yesterday, to develop a basic transcontinental railway passenger service which will satisfy the needs of the travelling public, and in view of the commission's firm decision that transcontinental passenger service will be continued, is it the intention of the minister to submit requests or suggestions to the commission to revive now the Canadian National passenger service in Newfoundland in order to make the system truly transcontinental?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if I may borrow one of your phrases, the hon. member's question is in the form of a representation and he can only assume that it has been noted.

NATIONAL PARKS

SHIP HARBOUR—PREVENTION OF LAND SPECULATION

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In view of widespread rumours that have very serious connotations, can he inform us whether he has consulted or will consult with the officials of the government of Nova Scotia with a view to taking steps to preclude land speculation in connection with the proposed Ship Harbour National Park?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, as far as the possible location of a park and the control of the land where it will be are concerned, the government of Nova Scotia has the exclusive power to take the necessary steps liable to prevent any speculation on that land. We will have no jurisdiction until an agreement has been signed by the two parties.

[English]

Mr. Forrestall: In view of alleged widespread speculation involving one of the worst types of crime that can be perpetrated against the public purse, would the minister undertake to satisfy himself and the House that the rumours are false, or otherwise?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to know whether or not there is speculation, but I will relay the hon. member's representations to the government of Nova Scotia.

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION RESPECTING CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the fact that last week in St. Thomas the hon. gentleman declined to give any information about the proposed legislation relating to tobacco advertising but said he would do so in the House of Commons, does he propose to introduce this legislation for first reading and make a statement or has he now decided to listen to reason and not introduce the bill at all?

SUGGESTED PENSION INCREASES FOR RETIRED EMPLOYEES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the minister now in a position to report to the House on the success of his efforts to persuade the Canadian Pacific Railway to grant pension increases to its retired employees similar to those granted to pensioners of the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I can report success in conveying the message effectively, I think, but beyond that I have nothing to report.

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will press on.

STE SCHOLASTIQUE—JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTE BETWEEN FEDERAL AND QUEBEC GOVERNMENTS CONCERNING PROJECT WORKERS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. What is the major issue in contention between the federal government and the government of Quebec regarding manpower difficulties in the construction of the airport at Ste Scholastique, and are similar disputes likely to arise in other provinces?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt very much that the hon. member's question is in order. It seems to me it is a question which invites a very general statement and I would think that kind of information ought to be given to the House on motions.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister a question.

Yesterday in reply to a question from the hon. member for Hamilton concerning the Ste Scholastique airport and in view of the conflict between the federal and provincial jurisdictions in labour matters, the Prime Minister stated that he would try to help Quebec to find a solution, adding that he was pursuing his efforts to come to an amicable agreement.

In view of this answer and the existing conflict in this matter, is the Prime Minister ready to make a statement to clarify the existing situation as soon as possible?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to add which may clarify the situation. The positions of all parties are publicly known; everyone knows the part played by the government of Quebec, the unions and the federal government in this area. There is no statement to add to this.

[English]

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Labour regarding the Ste Scholastique confrontation. Is there to be a meeting between himself and the provincial Ministers of Labour this week and, if so, has the Minister of Manpower been invited to take part in the discussions, particularly with regard to Ste Scholastique airport?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): There is a federal-provincial conference of Ministers of Labour taking place tomorrow and Friday, but the Ste Scholastique question is not on the agenda for the simple reason there is no conflict or difference of opinion between the Department of Labour in the province of Quebec and the Department of Labour in Ottawa as far as that site is concerned.

Mr. Alexander: Since there seems to be some conflict between the federal department and the provincial department in connection with pay scales, I would express the hope that the minister might elaborate on this question by way of a statement on motions. My supplementary is really directed to the Minister of Manpower. I would ask him whether he would agree to make a definite statement at the earliest opportunity with respect to the demands made and positions taken by the province of Quebec in this very touchy area in order that the House and the country can be informed completely as to the positions taken in connection with this matter?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): If there is anything useful to bring before the House, beyond the positions which have been made public and are known, I will do so.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

VISIT OF QUEBEC PRIME MINISTER TO PARIS —HOUSE ARREST OF CANADIAN STUDENTS

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice.

Inquiries of the Ministry

During the Quebec premier's visit to France, several French-Canadian students were placed under house arrest. Has this measure been taken because of instructions given by the Canadian Minister of Justice to the French police and, if so, what were the reasons for it?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Joliette.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I believe the hon. member for Charlevoix has a supplementary to the question he put a few minutes ago.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to clarify my question for the Minister of Justice since I do not know whether he understood it well. I should like to know whether French-Canadian students were put under private surveillance as a result of instructions given by the RCMP to the French police.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That question should be put to my colleague the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Dinsdale: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I am raising this question at the earliest opportunity and in a manner which will not interfere with the right of backbenchers to ask questions. I wanted to raise it as a supplementary. Touching the matter of correctness of information supplied, the Minister of Labour indicated that there would be no loss of employment as a result of his centralization program. In this connection I would like to give him the opportunity to put the record straight if there has been misinformation inadvertently given. Would this apply to an office such as Brandon which is suffering a reduction in staff—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is not a question of privilege. The hon. member is really seeking to ask a supplementary question, possibly a legitimate supplementary question, but I would respectfully suggest to him that perhaps this might be done tomorrow. I appreciate it is a matter of some importance and that the hon. member is anxious to obtain supplementary information, but I do not think it can be sought and given except by unanimous consent of the House. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris will recognize that other hon. members were deprived of the opportunity to ask questions or supplementaries because we ran out of time. Unless there is agreement on the part of all hon. members to pursue the question further, I do not think the hon. member can do so under the guise of a question of privilege.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Dinsdale: On the same question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, my point is that the minister has misinformed the House, which I think gives rise to a legitimate question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a question of privilege. The minister may have misinformed the House, but unless the hon. member is prepared to make a charge and suggest that the minister has wilfully misled the House, he has no question of privilege. Orders of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière is also rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, if I had asked the question during the question period, you would surely have told me I was out of order. Here is my question: What were the fees paid to the firm of Touche, Ross, Bailey and Smart of Halifax for auditing the books of the Cape Breton Development Corporation?

I was told, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is out of order. I point out to him that it is against the rules to ask a question after the question period has expired, under the pretext of rising on a question of privilege. If the hon. member really wants to rise on a question of privilege, I shall hear it and indicate to the House whether it is in order and can be discussed. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I was getting to the heart of the matter.

At that point you called me to order and rightly so. I therefore had the following question put on the order paper: "What is his annual salary?", to which I got the following answer:

Charges are based on services rendered in respect to each year's audit.

Mr. Speaker, that means that a member of parliament cannot find out how much of the public funds have been spent or allotted to certain expenses ordered by the government.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that my rights are encroached upon in this connection and that I am absolutely entitled to know why the government has appointed that firm, how much it was paid and why this task was not entrusted with the Auditor General of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the hon. member that he must comply with the Standing Orders of the House. If he wishes to rise on a question of privilege, he must do so in accordance with the Standing Orders, giving the required notice. Now, since the hon. member has not given that notice, he cannot evidently rise on the question of privilege to which he referred.

[Mr. Speaker.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT, 1971

PROVISIONS RESPECTING INSURABLE EMPLOYMENT, COMMISSION, BENEFITS, PREMIUMS, ADMINISTRATION, ETC.

The House resumed, from Tuesday, April 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackasey that Bill C-229, respecting unemployment insurance in Canada, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, I gather there is a disposition to have second reading of this bill settled today and referred to committee for study. At least, that is the case if I interpret correctly the prevailing winds, or lack of the strength of same. My remarks will therefore be brief; I simply want to make two points for the consideration of the committee.

The first point concerns the subject on which I, at least, receive most correspondence with regard to the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I refer to whether or not teachers should be exempt from its provisions. I do not know what the situation is in the rest of Canada, but I do know that in Nova Scotia, and more particularly in the metropolitan area of which my seat forms part, a great number of teachers have been thrown out of work as a result of changes in the economic climate and the policy of the new provincial government. While I used to think that the teachers had made a perfectly legitimate case for not coming within the unemployment insurance provisions because they were a class that had not the same unemployment problems other classes had, I now have to change my mind as a result of the conditions to which I have just referred.

I realize that there are still professional associations representing the teachers that stoutly maintain that teachers should not be part of the class that has to make contributions for unemployment insurance coverage. Although they may speak for the majority within that class, as far as I am concerned if I am called upon to protect the rights of even 10 per cent of a particular group, then I shall stand in Parliament and do my best to protect those rights, and this I do now.

I would also make the other point, which I think is an important one. I do not think that seniority in any profession counts for a damn today, if I may put it as bluntly as that. Times are changing. The fact that somebody is a perfectly good teacher in today's age or was five years ago, does not mean that he or she is equipped to be a good teacher in the Sesame Street type of education that we will have in time to come. In short, the fact that a teacher was good in the past or is good at the present time is no passport to security or to the assurance of a job in that profession, indeed in any profession though especially in the education field, which is responsible for seeing that our children, our children's children, and anybody else's children for that matter, are taught to be the best type of citizens in today's rapidly changing world. I do not think there can be that much security, that much ossification, in any profession. I could talk about my own profession of the law, or even of medicine, but I shall confine myself to the teachers, and because I mention them by name I hope that no one will misunderstand. I am dealing really with the rapid changes in society and what I think our attitude to society should be.

One year ago I think I would have resisted the proposal of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) to put teachers within the concept of universality, but I do not do so today. I do not do so because I know that hundreds of teachers in Nova Scotia will be thrown out of work, as doubtless they will in other parts of Canada as well. I have to think of these people. In doing so, I take the risk that the 90 per cent who will not suffer unemployment will frown on me for what I say; but somebody has to work and fight for minorities, and this is what I am proposing to do.

The ironic thing is that because the minister is introducing universality, and including the teachers within the terms of this act, some unemployment of teachers will result. In short, the municipalities of Canada will have to raise taxes in order to pay their share of unemployment insurance premiums for their teachers. Municipal taxation being what it is today, the more taxes the municipalities raise the more they will have to compress their budgets in other respects. This in turn means that somewhere along the line more teachers will be knocked off the payroll. As I say, this is one of the ironic but immediate results of the minister's policy. Nonetheless, on balance I think we have to support it, and unless there is some very compelling evidence to the contrary given to the committee that is to study this bill, on third reading I shall certainly support the principle of universality for teachers.

The second matter I wish to refer to is one with regard to which I would ask the Minister of Labour's cooperation in adding his thoughts to my own. It is a matter that I have not studied in depth as I should but which came to my mind a few days ago. I have informally scouted it with the minister, and perhaps because of the special role that I have within the ranks of my party in this Parliament it made a greater impression on me. I refer to whether unemployment insurance should be extended to some of the inmates of federal penitentiaries in Canada. I have uttered what to some is a fantastic proposition, one that most people would regard as absurd—not irrelevant, but at least absurd. However, I think the suggestion demands a public airing, and I should like to pursue it for a moment or two before terminating my contribution to this debate.

When the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs visits certain federal penitentiaries, its members are always taken to the workshops and made well aware that within these institutions there are hundreds of men and some women who are given specialized training each year as mechanics, tailors, barbers and the like. It seems to me that surely we can devise some sort of formula to bring them within the operations of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. I do not know how this can be done. Perhaps this proposal has never been set down on paper. But I hope that both the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the people who are charged with the responsibility for correctional services in Canada will give some thought to the proposal so that when the bill is before the committee they can say whether the idea is or is not feasible.

I should like to give the House some idea of the numbers involved here. I quote these figures from page 58 of the Annual Report of the Solicitor General of Canada 1969/1970. In that fiscal year—it is called a fiscal year rather than a penitential year—those on the registers of federal institutions in Canada, of which institutions there would be a little more than two dozen, totalled 7,009 males and 109 females, for a total population as of April 1, 1969 of 7,118. Of those, 4,180 men and 71 women were admitted during that year. There were 5,860 transfers in and 5,860 transfers out. There were 1,896 males and 35 females who received direct discharges at the expiration of their sentence, and 1,947 males and 45 females who received direct discharges by parole. The total discharges for either expiration of sentence or parole amounted to 3,950 males and 81 females. As of March 31, 1970 the number of inmates registered was 7,239 males and 99 females, so there was an increase of about 200 in the prison population as of that time.

On the basis of these figures, I suggest we would be dealing in terms of unemployment insurance with at least several thousand people. Perhaps all 7,000 would not be getting unemployment insurance as a result of being inmates in a federal penitentiary at one time, but this scheme could cover a fair number of them, thereby providing some relief from the anxieties they face when they come out into the world. The lack of funds is probably a major reason for recidivism; that is the return of a former inmate to his criminal tendencies which gets him back in the penitentiary.

This is not a revolutionary idea. People have thought of this before. I think with a little coaxing the John Howard Society might be tempted to give some advice to the committee and the minister. I am sure the personnel of correctional services in penitentiaries are responsible people. The officials of the Unemployment Insurance Commission must have some ideas in this regard. Members of these bodies, as well as officials of the manpower office, have a responsibility to come forward and present their ideas along this line. These people might be very unpopular if they expressed views in favour of this suggestion, in view of the fact that a few hardened thugs managed to persuade a great number of other people to ransack the Kingston penitentiary. I hope we will not be so emotionally upset by what happened there that we will turn our backs on an idea which makes sense.

Within the penitentiary set-up there is training so that the occupational skills of the inmates can be used. They are engaged in productive enterprise. They fix up cars, make suits and the like. This may be done under a system where they return to the institution at night instead of going to the friendly local tavern to take advantage of that atmosphere. This system involves work and it gives a little dignity to these people who, for the most part, have none. For these reasons, I hope the minister will indicate during his reply on second reading that he intends to commence studying this proposal, and I am very hopeful that something will result from the suggestions I have made this afternoon.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, this bill is of very great interest to a great many people in my riding, indeed to a great many people in the Vancouver area and in the province of British Columbia. These people, being British Columbians, are inclined to concentrate on the features which fall short, even before they consider the good things because they know the evils and bitter results of unemployment. These people want me to make it perfectly clear that they do not consider this bill as being a cure for unemployment. They want it made abundantly clear to the people in this House, and in this part of Canada, that there is a wide sector in this country which will be affected by this bill only in a marginal way. A great number of people will not be covered or looked after by it. It is not the perfect umbrella for all of those in the working force caught out in the rain of unemployment. It has shortcomings which the committee will be dealing with as they did during the consideration of the white paper.

Recently I had an opportunity of meeting with a large number of representatives from various labour unions in the Vancouver area. They emphasized that the two-week waiting period was much too long, and that this waiting period worked out to three weeks under certain circumstances. And construction workers in many cases must establish two qualifying periods each year. As a result, the waiting period for them is often closer to five or six weeks during the course of the year.

These representatives asked me also to point out the lack of a definition of earnings as one of the shortcomings. They feel it is unfortunate that a definition of earnings is not in the bill but is to be left to regulation. They feel that earnings should not include what they may be able to pick up casually during this waiting period, or what they might obtain in some other way. They feel that the definition of earnings ought to be very lenient and broad.

These representatives do not like the 4 per cent unemployment threshold upon which the government assumes the burden of unemployment insurance. They feel that if the government accepts the figure of 4 per cent before assuming responsibility this will become the acceptable minimum rate of unemployment. The unions in my part of the country, and I believe all across Canada, do not feel that a 4 per cent level of unemployment is acceptable.

On the other hand, they and I believe that this bill is an improvement over the present one in many areas. A great many people believe that if anyone can save this government from going down the drain it is the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), and that by bringing forward this piece of legislation he may do a lot in that direction. That is because the minister has shown some conception of the conditions working people are up against when faced with interruption of income.

My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has gone over the major points of the bill very thoroughly. There are only two features of it I wish to deal with in detail. Our colleagues who are members of the committee will go into all the points I have mentioned as well as a great many others. I should like to refer to that part having to do with the inclusion of benefits for sickness and maternity.

• (3:20 p.m.)

As members of this House are aware, I have been trying for the past three sessions to introduce a bill which would handle the question of maternity benefits and the allied question of maternity leave. I believe when the minister gets around to his second piece of legislation concerning labour standards we will then have, with the provision in the unemployment insurance bill, what I was seeking to accomplish in my private member's bill which could not be received. As a matter of fact, because one member of our group last evening opposed the inclusion of maternity benefits in this legislation, I wish to make it abundantly clear that my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre and I have spoken out very clearly in favour of the inclusion of maternity benefits in the unemployment insurance legislation. As proof of this I should like to read what I said on November 3, 1970 when I spoke on my maternity leave bill which the House very kindly permitted me to introduce, having first of all eliminated the money provision which will now be looked after under this proposed legislation:

> The great value of the unemployment insurance proposals is the fact that during her 15 weeks of absence due to pregnancy the woman will receive two-thirds of her previous earnings. I should very much like to have been able to bring in a similar proposal in this bill, but the rules did not permit me to do so. However, I shall content myself with congratulating the minister and supporting his proposal fully.

I wish to reiterate that today. I believe the minister is to be congratulated for having brought in the maternity benefit provisions in this legislation. I know it was not easy for him to do so because there were many people—employers' representatives—who appeared before the committee when the white paper was under discussion who tried their level best to have this provision removed from the legislation. It might be that there is a better way in which to bring in maternity benefit legislation. But in the absence of such proposals, I would not want to miss the opportunity we have to include it in this legislation.

I should like to say this is a good provision. It has been long anticipated and desired by women. The minister, when speaking on the 19th of April a few days ago, stated the case very clearly and eloquently. He stated it much better than I could have done myself. For this reason I wish to quote his words:

> I think that before we get too smug about women in the work force, we should realize it is a sad commentary that at least one million women in the Canadian work force are in it not because they want to buy a second automobile or a coloured television set but because their income means the difference between poverty and survival. When, in such instances, a woman is deprived of her income as a result of maternity, this creates a terrible hardship. I am hopeful that drawing unemployment insurance, after a two weeks waiting period, for at least 15 weeks will help the working mother.

I wish to echo the sentiments of the minister in this regard. Yesterday it was stated that it was a poor idea to provide maternity benefits in this legislation because maternity is not a predictable interruption of income. I would indicate that the reasoning behind the introduction of this benefit is precisely the reasoning behind the introduction of sickness benefits. Sickness is not a predictable interruption of earnings either. One cannot predict when sickness will hit a worker either male or female. If any member in this House believes that maternity is a predictable occurrence or a predictable hazard, I believe he should take another good look around him in this twentieth century. A realistic look at the birth statistics in this country today would lead anyone to conclude that maternity is not a predictable hazard any more than sickness is a predictable hazard. This is precisely the reason I and others wish to see birth control and contraceptive information publicized in this country.

Maternity is a hazard of the most unpredictable kind, probably even more so than sickness if such is possible. The number of women who can be affected is very great. Of all female employees covered under the Public Service Employment Act, 57.4 per cent, nearly 60 per cent, have children and 46.3 per cent, nearly 50 per cent, of these women are the sole support of their children. In spite of these facts, women are treated as though they are temporary accidents in the labour force and as though if they are made sufficiently uncomfortable they might go away. This provision in the unemployment insurance legislation is a recognition by the minister that women are in the labour force to stay, that women have every right to have time off in order to give birth to their children in safety and comfort and have them looked after so that they may become the future citizens on which the whole community will depend. I wish to congratulate the minister, not only for his good political wisdom and sense but for his humanitarianism and farsightedness in this regard.

Now, I should like to deal with a point which has been touched on in a slightly different way by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). I refer to the inclusion of different types of workers under the unemployment insurance legislation, and more particularly teachers. We in this party have long held that all working people ought to be covered by unemployment insurance. I am very glad the minister is insisting that fishermen be covered under this legislation until some other coverage is provided for them. I should like to see seasonal workers treated in the same way. Until other provisions can be made available to them, I believe they should be given some coverage under this legislation. I hope the minister will not rest content until seasonal workers are given some other kind of coverage to protect them against the hazards of unemployment. Certainly, when there is a policy which involves the buying up of boats and depriving the smaller fishermen of their employment we must have some kind of umbrella under which they can be looked after until such time as they can be reabsorbed into other employment.

I believe, however, that other groups should be included in this scheme as well. In addition to teachers, it should include doctors, lawyers, engineers and other people including the self-employed. These people should also come under unemployment insurance. I am glad we have changed our attitude in respect of teachers. I believe teachers, doctors, lawyers and other people have previously been left out because of a basic hangover from the old days when professional people were considered to be a class above and apart from people in working class groups. Today, these people are beginning to be regarded as forming sections of the people who work in the community. I should like to see a revision of the Unemployment Insurance Act which would include doctors, engineers, lawyers and other people who are in a more secure position perhaps than others. I remember the occasion years and years ago when Sir Winston Churchill introduced the social security scheme in Britain which was based on the Beveridge Report. At that time Winston Churchill used this phrase. He said: "This legislation aims to bring the magic of averages to the rescue of millions". It is bringing the magic of averages to the rescue of millions which makes any of these social insurance schemes work. If we bring in just the bad risks, it will cost these bad risks more and the coverage will be less good. We have to bring in the good risks in order to cover the poorer risks—the less secure people—to the fullest possible extent and to give them the best possible coverage.

A few years ago, before the conversion of the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave), some of us felt that, precisely because teachers and other groups were in a more secure position, they should be included in this legislation. I have made this argument to the teachers before now. For years as a property owner in Vancouver, which I am not now, I paid school taxes on my property, even though I had no children. Why was that? The fact that I had no children did not mean I had no responsibility for children. The community's children were my children and it was in my interest, not only from the standpoint of being my brother's and sister's keeper but from the standpoint of self interest, to pay my share of school taxes. Educated children mean educated citizens. Educated citizens are good citizens, not only physically but emotionally and in every other way. In the same way, because teachers were in a more secure position I think they should have been included years ago in the legislation so as to lend their greater strength and greater security to the scheme.

However, I now think like the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, that teachers are experiencing the same insecurity, although maybe to a lesser degree, as the people now covered by unemployment insurance. Teachers today are coming to realize that they also need unemployment insurance. I foresee the time when even doctors, lawyers and engineers will be glad to come under the umbrella of the community in the form of unemployment insurance. I think the day is coming, and I am glad to see it coming, when they also will be brought under this umbrella. So, I believe that we should provide the widest possible coverage under this legislation.

The argument has been advanced that if teachers are brought under this scheme they will have to gouge school boards for higher salaries so that they can afford to pay unemployment insurance contributions. The school boards, in turn, will have to gouge the public so as to obtain more funds in order to pay the gouging teachers to pay the gouging Unemployment Insurance Commission. I think this is the reddest of red herrings that could be drawn across the trail. If the process of gouging has the effect of making Ottawa realize that it has to divvy up its taxes with the municipalities on the basis of their need, so much to the good. If the municipalities, teachers and other people at the local level need more money, it will be but an additional piece of leverage to get Ottawa to redistribute the taxes that it collects in a much more equitable manner between Ottawa and the municipalities of the country which really need them. If the provincial moneybags find themselves caught in the middle of the process, we shall still have to find a way of bringing the municipalities in on the consultation.

We in this party are thoroughly in favour of this Unemployment Insurance Act as far as it goes. We think that it can be improved. I, for my part, would like to see these improvements given very close attention because they are the product of the experience and the thinking, not only of labour unions across this country but of a great many professional people who are now coming to realize that this is also their scheme. The sooner they are brought in under it, the more secure they will be and the broader and more safe the unemployment insurance scheme will be.

Above all, I want to put in a word for the women in the labour force of this country who now know that one of the great hazards to the security of their homes and their children will be removed. They will now be able to take time out to have their children in an honest and straightforward way, to make arrangements for them and to go back to the labour force, with their seniority and job rights protected—that is, when this legislation is complemented shortly by that under the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. So, I feel that the minister deserves a great deal of credit for swimming against the mainstream of his party's policy, which I feel he is doing in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) I should tender apologies to him. The Chair has attempted to alternate speakers during this debate from one side of the House to the other. After the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants had completed his remarks, I proposed to give the floor to the hon. member for Ottawa West, but I am afraid I was mesmerized by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis). At present the Chair having presented apologies to the hon. member, will recognize the hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Good for you, Sir.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): I agree with you, Mr. Speaker, that all of us have been mesmerized by the fine speech by the hon. lady who has just spoken. I find myself in substantial agreement with what she said, which is not always the case, but this afternoon I found her remarks to be particularly interesting.

In introducing the debate on second reading, the minister, who is now in his seat, said that the legislation had been drafted on what he said, in a casual way, was the unanimous report of the committee examining the recommendations in the white paper. The hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) then rose and said it was not quite an unanimous report but rather one that was adopted on division. I think the debate has shown the extent to which there has been agreement coming from the committee. I was one of those who attended most of the committee's sittings. We heard a number of very forthright briefs attacking the principle of the legislation and the basic features proposed in it. But I suggest that anyone reviewing the Hansard record of this debate and reading the speeches of the hon. member for Hamilton West, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who are both in this House at present, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) the leading spokesman for the Creditiste party, and the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Weatherhead) would, I think, be more impressed by the degree of unanimity than by the amount of criticism and difference. There are things that can be done to improve the bill.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I dislike interrupting the hon. member's fine speech up to this point but in order that the record be clear may I point out that the reason I mentioned that the standing committee's report was not unanimous but was passed on division was that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had indicated earlier, in regard to the Public Accounts Committee, that he did not understand why the opposition was questioning the report of that committee since it was unanimous. Surely, the hon. member would not want me to fall into that trap. This was the reason I pointed out the lack of unanimity, and the minister then expressed his regrets for having indicated that it was a unanimous report when, in fact, it was passed on division.

Mr. Francis: I certainly accept the hon. member's remarks. All I was trying to do was to indicate the degree to which there was basic agreement on the bill. This was the only purpose I had in mind. I certainly recognize that there are differences; the hon. member's speech made this abundantly clear. We can anticipate that at the committee stage a number of amendments will be proposed. The hon. member who has just spoken is a very highly regarded member of this House, and I am sure he does not misunderstand anything that has been said from this side.

But, Mr. Speaker, one of the things that was attacked before the committee was the provision of sickness benefits. I have not seen any statement, or heard any member of this House say, as was said before the committee, that the principle of establishing a new type of administration within the Department of National Health and Welfare, which would in effect duplicate the provision of an administration for collection of contributions, the determination of eligibility for payment of benefits, and so on, makes sense. But we had that kind of argument put before us, not once but frequently, in a series of briefs that came before the committee.

I note, for example, that the question of the need for co-ordination of this measure with other social measures has been mentioned by a number of speakers, and I am sure will again be examined in committee. Some of the benefits for those with lower incomes are not going to be adequate. Those in the categories of lower incomes are certainly going to find the initial waiting period difficult. There will have to be a measure of co-ordination with the Canada Assistance Plan to take care of situations where there will be genuine need, especially, in the case of families and dependents. This, we know, will have to be done, and I think all hon. members recognize it. But the problem is the most effective means of working out the arrangements that will be recognized as necessary.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is a surprising degree of acceptance of the principle of universality. I say surprising because of the attacks, again that were made in some quarters, in the representations before the committee. The principle of universality has perhaps been attacked most vehemently by the spokesmen for the teachers groups. I found the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), of the hon. lady for Vancouver-Queensway (Mrs. MacInnis), and of the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) in particular—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): She may be a queen but the constituency is Kingsway.

Mr. Francis: I thought I said that, but I am getting a little flustered this afternoon. I found their remarks particularly interesting in this respect because all of us, after hearing the evidence, after listening to the teachers' delegation, after reading their brief and meeting with them, are substantially convinced that we should not breach the principle of universality under the bill for this group or any other group.

Indeed, the criticism, such as it was, that came from the other side of the House concerned the inability of the government to bring within coverage of the act certain categories of self-employed persons. I believe it was the hon. member for Hamilton West himself who said that unemployed persons cannot be really unemployed as a result of their own decision. He gave a definition that unemployment is not unemployment when it is self-induced, self-inflicted, or a matter of choice. This is exactly the problem in self-employment. The decision of someone to go into an individual type of practice, in a profession, in a business or service trade and the decision when to cease employment is a decision made by one person. This type of decision should not render the person eligible for benefit.

The problem of working out administrative devices and checks to prevent abuse in the self-employed area is very difficult indeed, and it is precisely for administrative reasons that the government has not moved in this area. It is not for reasons of principle. If we could devise the means I am sure the minister would be delighted to accept the idea of bringing self-employed persons within the act. He would have to be certain there would be some type of objective determination of unemployment, some type of protection against intentional abuse. Hon. members on the other side of the House who said we should be covering such persons did not offer any specific means of doing so. They merely said that something should be done in this respect.

At this stage of the debate, Mr. Speaker, it is not easy to add very much that is new, but I want to touch on one area in particular where I think we should try to set an example. I hope the provinces will not opt out of coverage for provincial civil servants under the act. I hope they will recognize the virtues of the principle of universality as such, that they will elect to have their public servants covered under the act, just as the federal public servants will be covered.

I also hope that at committee stage there will be a close examination of the problem raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely, how to cover Members of Parliament themselves under such a scheme, not that I am so worried about large scale unemployment in this area.

Some hon. Members: Why?

Mr. Francis: I have not found it very hazardous employment. But the hon. gentleman pointed out that there are certain pension provisions that intervene, and anyway a number of hon. members have means of going to other employment very readily. However, there are some who may be getting a little on in years and for whom interruption of service in this place would create problems of adjustment. I am not thinking in terms of benefits to hon. members but in terms of the principle of universality.

A number of the teacher groups have thrown this in our face. They have said to us, "You are not covering Members of Parliament, so why should you cover us"? I think we should, at least for the sake of moral example, consider covering Members of Parliament. However, the problem here is in terms of defining an employer. An employer of a Member of Parliament does not exist in the same concrete sense as an employer does for other people who are on a payroll. But, Mr. Speaker, there is a precedent. When it came to the enactment of the Canada Pension Plan a special wording was adopted which had the effect of maintaining the tax exempt status of the contributions made by members to the Canada Pension Plan, and also in effect permitting the government of Canada to make its contribution as an employer for this particular group. I have had some discussions with public servants who are in charge of administering this area, and I do not think there is any insuperable difficulty in adopting the wording that was used for the Canada Pension Plan. This would call for an amendment at the committee stage, and I sincerely hope that hon. members who serve on the committee will give consideration to doing this.

I think the principle of universality is something that should be respected for all groups. I think that the moral example should be set by hon. members in this place. I think that the problem is of sufficient magnitude that it warrants a special amendment when we examine the legislation in committee.

In opening my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I said that the debate has revealed the extent of agreement much more than the committee proceedings would reveal. I think the agreement by members of all groups represented in the House on the general features of the legislation is something that stands out in the Hansard record, but there is no question that at the committee stage the usual careful examination clause by clause will be conducted by members of the standing committee to which the bill will be referred. I look forward to the opportunity of participating in at least some of the committee sessions at that time.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, on rising to make a few remarks on this bill I do not wish to repeat what some of my colleagues, both in my own group and in other groups, have said, nor do I intend to do so. However, I do wish to deal specifically with a few items. It has been said, and I generally agree, that there are some very good points in the minister's legislation. There are a few that are not so good, and there are quite a few that need a great deal of clarification, which I hope will come at the committee stage. I would like to bring a few of these to the attention of the minister and of his parliamentary secretary.

It was interesting to note during the debate, particularly this afternoon, the references to the principle of universality. I must say that in general terms I quite agree with it, but I must point out that the actuarial basis for unemployment insurance, as it was originally envisaged in the 1930's when it was first contemplated, has been widely departed from in the intervening years. I am not saying that it is not a good thing there has been a departure from this principle. From what I have been able to gather, most members of the House intend to support the bill on second reading, as do I. After certain explanations and clarifications, and perhaps even some amendments to improve the bill, we hope to be able to support it on third reading. Even if the bill has some bad features, one is faced with the situation of not wanting to throw out the baby with the bath water. We will cross that bridge when we come to it and hope that it will not be necessary to give other considerations to the matter.

The first thing I should like to deal with specifically, Mr. Speaker, is the question of administration. Even if legislation is perfect, in theory if not in practice, unless it is well administered and the purposes and objectives carried out, it is of no practical use. During the last couple of years the administration of the present act has deteriorated. I think the previous minister of labour and the present minister have been sold a bill of goods by some well meaning but unrealistic members of the public service. It is all very well for the minister and members of the government to say that they have a wonderful new way of administering the act, namely, by a computer in Belleville. That city is far removed from the industrial heart of the province, not that I have anything against the city, but this could cause endless delays in the payment of claims. No matter how many explanations are offered or how good the plan is supposed to be, the fact is that it does not work very well.

I have been a Member of Parliament for 19 years and until this new system came into effect I had not received more than one or two complaints a year regarding the payment of unemployment insurance claims. We warned the minister what would happen with the new system and our worst fears have been realized. There has been nothing but trouble. Just this morning I received nine letters of complaint from people who were not receiving payments. Fortunately, unemployment in my part of the country is somewhat less than it is elsewhere. I could spend a lot of time going into detail but I do not think it is necessary. I have sent certain suggestions privately to the minister and to other committees of the House. The fact is that the present system of administration, brought in a couple of years ago, simply does not work.

Offices in small, medium and fairly large industrial centres were closed in order to try to standardize claims, but unemployment insurance claims do not lend themselves to standardization, Mr. Speaker. Members of Parliament and civil servants are accustomed to filling out forms but even they sometimes make mistakes. People with language problems and Canadians born in this country but not as literate as they might be, experience difficulty in filling out forms and make mistakes. An incorrect form going through the computer can result in disqualification of the claim.

Then, there is the routine of having the claim reviewed. If the claimant does not live in one of the centres he may have to telephone or travel 50 or 60 miles to get information and clarification. These things annoy working people. The minister has promised to clear them up, and I think he has tried very hard, but it is like the legend of Hercules trying to clean out the Augean stables—an almost impossible task. The old system may have needed improvement but the new one, though it may make things easier for the staff of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, does not make it any easier for working people to get their claims processed. I hope the minister will try to persuade his people to reconsider the new system using the computer. It would cost a lot of money to get rid of the computer now and restore personal service but I think it might be worth while.

I want to make one thing clear, Mr. Speaker. Any member of this House who represents an industrial area has many complaints. I do not mind dealing with them but there is no reason why working people should experience a delay in having their claims dealt with. They should not have to approach their Member of Parliament in order to have their claims paid. I have had nothing but co-operation from the office in London, Ontario but still, a constituent would not have to come to me if the system worked properly. The minister has given his word to try and improve it and I am sure he will. He would save the time of the members of this House who should be doing other things.

A number of provisions in the bill still need to be clarified. I have read through it carefully and I notice there is provision for a number of regulations. Perhaps the minister will clarify this at the committee stage, although he may have an earlier opportunity to do so. I should like to get clarification on the question of moonlighting. I know that a new clause of the bill provides that if a person does one day's work a week as a cleaner or a gardener, he is exempt. What about the person who works at the steel company of Canada for eight hours a day and then takes an extra job for two or three hours a day, four or five days a week? Is he to pay unemployment insurance? Where is the line to be drawn between working one or two hours a week or three or four? I hope the minister will clarify this situation.

I hope there will be provision for some ministerial discretion in this bill. In the present act there are all sorts of situations which were clearly never contemplated by Parliament and, as a consequence, people have been subject to severe penalties. There is the McKenzie case in my own area. The man had a cattle sales arena and when some of his farmer neighbours brought their cattle in to be sold they stayed to help out. If the sale was a success, they got $5 or $10. If it was not, they got nothing. However, McKenzie was penalized severely for not paying unemployment insurance. It was a ridiculous situation and certainly never one contemplated by the act. I could cite a few more examples but will not take up the time of the House. In that case, I might say, the minister was co-operative and tried to be helpful, but the senior members of the commission did not seem to pay much attention to the minister. When the matter was being discussed with the minister, the commission went ahead, apparently unknown to the minister, and seized the bank account of the gentleman in question. I hope that in future it will be possible for the minister to exercise a little more control over the activities of the senior members of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. They are acting in far too arbitrary a manner, and I hope that the new legislation will enable the minister to exercise more control.

There is something else which ought to be clarified in the new legislation, namely, the difference between an independent contractor and a contractor of service. I admit that even in law, even in regular jurisprudence, it is sometimes hard to tell just who is an independent contractor and what constitutes a contractor of service. The law seems to indicate that it depends on the facts of the case. Time after time this question has come up in connection with the administration of the present act. It would be helpful in the administration of the new act if it could be clearly set out, and possibly this could be done at the committee stage, who, for the purposes of this act, will be considered as an independent contractor and who will be considered as a contractor of service. I say that because much of the time of Members of Parliament has been needlessly taken up in bringing this matter before the commission. I hope that that problem will be clarified at this time.

I come now to something a great many people have spoken about, the question of teachers. The principle of universality in connection with this bill has been mentioned. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) referred to it. The good lady wanted to include doctors, lawyers and everybody else in the scheme. Perhaps that would be a good idea in certain kinds of social communities. I do not think it would be in this one, for the reasons pointed out by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis). It seems to me that we are heading towards some form of guaranteed annual income. I would not disagree with that at all. I think that this probably could be a pretty good idea, depending on how it is worked out.

The late Senator Wallace McCutcheon, who by no stretch of the imagination could be described as a socialist, felt that we ought to have some scheme of this nature. He thought you could probably pay more money to people and raise the minimum poverty level if you got rid of most of the present schemes that provide assistance. He thought that the money you would save administratively would provide a much larger income to needy people. If you abolished half the administrative officials and amalgamated the administration under one department, you could save a great deal of money. I agree. perhaps, that the guaranteed annual income is the goal we should be heading for, and everybody should contribute towards it. I certainly would not disagree with that idea at all; but it would depend, of course, on how it is all worked out. The principle is good, I think, and I gather that the minister is edging in that direction.

I think there ought to be larger unemployment insurance benefits, because of inflation in the country. I agree that larger benefits ought to be paid. What I do not like in the present act and what I do not agree with is this: why should one or two groups be penalized and be discriminated against? You will hear people arguing that we are not really discriminating against teachers; but it certainly appears that way to me. I think, if we are to pay larger benefits, and I think that is a good idea in view of present economic conditions in Canada, we should all pay towards the plan and not "stick" one or two groups with a large part of the burden. I do not think that is fair.

Then, it is not clear just who is a teacher under the act. I hope the minister will clarify this in his remarks. Apparently "teacher" does not include a university professor. A teacher apparently is one who teaches in a public school or in a high school. That, Mr. Speaker, does not make much sense to me. If a teacher teaches Grade 13 in a high school, he is caught in the new scheme. But if he teaches Grade 13 in a university, and some universities have the equivalent of Grade 13, he is not caught in the scheme. Then, what is the position of these other quasi-universities or colleges as they are known in Ontario, where specialized courses are taught for a couple of years? I am referring to places such as Fanshaw College and Scarborough College in Toronto, as well as other colleges. Are they to be included? I hope that the minister will clarify for us who is to be caught. In other words, when is a teacher a professor and when is he a teacher? I think that some pretty arbitrary lines will have to be drawn, and I hope that the minister will clarify the matter.

Then, we must consider the practical question of how the payment of premiums is to be enforced against the teachers. As I understand it, in the province of Newfoundland teachers are employed directly by the provincial government. That will mean that the provincial government of Newfoundland will have to pay contributions to the scheme. If the government agrees to this there will be no difficulty. Then you come to the province of Ontario, where I come from, where the arrangement is somewhat different. There, we have regional school boards. These, of course, are emanations of the provincial governments or creatures of the province as they are sometimes called in rather unflattering terms. I do not see how, under the constitution, the school boards in Ontario can be made to pay contributions into the scheme unless the provincial government consents. That, of course, is different. Otherwise, there is no way that I know of by which school boards can be made to pay contributions into the scheme, anymore than municipalities can force the federal government to pay municipal taxes on federal buildings. We know that, for practical purposes, grants in aid are made available. However, unless the provinces consent, there is no way in which this provision can be enforced. I hope that the minister will cast a little light on that aspect when he answers some of our questions.

One of the problems that the provinces will have to consider, with the limited tax possibilities at their disposal after the big federal tax grabs over the years, is this: if they agree that school boards are to make these contributions, how are these to be financed? You know, Mr. Speaker, exactly who will pay these contributions. It will be the property taxpayers of the municipalities. The contributions will be passed on to them, and that will add to our current inflationary difficulties. Perhaps the minister will make some comment about that.

That is about all I wish to deal with at present. We hope that the minister, either at this stage of the bill or in the committee stage, will answer some of the questions we have asked about some of these matters. We do not want to vote for a bill or give it our unqualified support unless we know what it is to do or what the answers will be to some of our questions. We look forward with interest to some of the minister's answers.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, after having studied in detail Bill C-229, and after having considered the various representations thereon which I have received from employers and employees who will be affected by its provisions, I am greatly concerned over its inevitable intrusion into the area of municipal taxation. This bill proposes to include municipal employees, teachers, nurses, hospital workers and others whose earnings are either directly or indirectly paid from taxes raised on real property. I am told by school boards in my riding that projections show a one mill increase in property taxes to cover their share of this plan. At a time when the government seems to be so vitally concerned with preventing a second round of inflationary pressures on our economy, I cannot understand why it proposes to include, against their clear wishes, employers and employees in a scheme which is neither needed nor sought by either, and which can only result in substantial additional costs being passed down the line inevitably to the individual property owner.

With the exception of professional athletes, Mr. Speaker, whose proposed inclusion in this act borders on the ridiculous, the other proposed entrants are engaged in occupations which have the highest stability rates of all occupations in the country. These people and I, feel that the government is imposing a selective and discriminatory new form of taxation on them to provide increased benefits both in time and in payments to those people who are engaged in occupations which make them the real beneficiaries of this act. If this is a genuine insurance scheme, then let it operate as such. Let those people who have most to benefit by it, pay premiums accordingly. Let it not be used to implement a policy which is basically dishonest, whereby the government attempts to rationalize bringing under the protection of the Unemployment Insurance Act employees in Canada who least need and who least desire compulsory protection.

One of the bodies from which I received a representation opposing this bill was the Manitoba Association of Schools Trustees. They said, and I quote:

> Our most serious objection to the proposed contribution by school boards is that it would be paid out of money raised entirely by taxation on local property, a source which is already severely overburdened and in dire need of assistance from senior governments. We recognize the constitutional problems which over the years have given federal governments some difficulty in doing what they would like to have done in support of education, but to invade our already inadequate source of revenue would be a most damaging blow to local governments and one which, we sincerely believe, could not really be intended by our national government.

Let there be no doubt in the minds of hon. members that it is not only employers who are opposed to this legislation. Appended to the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration of October 13, 1970 is a representation received from the Manitoba Teachers Society that said, and again I quote:

> Historically, the Society has opposed it on two related grounds. The first of these was that by the nature of their work operating under annual contracts, and because of the shortage of teachers, there would very seldom be times when teachers would actually benefit from an unemployed insurance scheme and that such inclusion would simply mean that there would be one such section of the population, not affected by unemployment insurance, elected to help pay for unemployment insurance and that this would therefore be a discriminatory tax on teachers. The second point was that at a time when the provinces were seeking to get more federal monies for provincial education, the federal government would actually be forcing a flow of provincial education money to aid the federal government for other purposes.

I trust it is now abundantly clear to the government that the economy cannot at this time sustain measures which would result in further tax increases. The effects of the bill before us, if it were passed into law, cannot but be otherwise. To me, as well as to other hon. members, I am sure, it is of great significance that in the white paper entitled "Unemployment Insurance in the Seventies" the government made no effort to document clearly its claims regarding the cost of its proposals to bring about changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. At current levels of unemployment, I am confident that the unemployment insurance fund will operate at such deficits that it may be necessary for the government to increase premiums far beyond their present levels, thus aggravating an already excessive taxation burden being carried by the vast majority of Canadians, particularly in my province.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): I do not think anyone in the House seriously quarrels with the principle of unemployment insurance, the principle that insurance should be provided to deal with the consequences of involuntary unemployment. Nor do I think anyone seriously quarrels with the idea that the benefits provided under today's legislation are unrealistic and that they ought to be increased so as to be more in line with living costs. But we on this side have serious reservations with respect to many of the clauses contained in the legislation before us, such as the provisions shortening the period of time required for eligibility, provisions for the supervision or lack of supervision, of the administration, and so on. If the government is prepared to accept some of our criticisms, criticisms we believe to be justified and worthwhile, then I am sure this bill will make reasonably good progress. But we are bound to set out our objections in the hope that they will be considered by the government and that amendments will be introduced in committee to correct some of the less acceptable features of this legislation.

There has been a great deal of discussion as to whether this scheme represents insurance or welfare. I do not intend to enter into this discussion myself, except to say that in my opinion many of the features of this legislation amount to welfare rather than insurance. Let me correct some of the statements which have been made by members on the government side. One of their spokesmen said, for example, that when a man buys insurance the amount of the benefit does not depend on the number of contributions he has made. In other words, a man could buy life insurance today, and if he were to die tomorrow, his heirs would collect. This is true, but I should like to point out that if a person sets out to buy commercial insurance, he immediately finds that premiums are rated according to the degree of risk. If I have terminal cancer, or any terminal disease, no life insurance company will insure me. If I have a history of heart disease, I may be able to get insurance but my premium will be rated much higher than that of a healthy person. Similarly, fire insurance is rated according to the degree of risk, depending upon where the property is located and so on. This is something which members on the government side have chosen to overlook or ignore. Then again, the purchase of commercial insurance is voluntary. If I feel my risk of loss is not sufficient to justify the cost of the premiums required, I do not have to take out insurance. In any case, I am not obliged to carry fire insurance or life insurance, for example. But here we are being forced to contribute to a plan whether we want to do so or not. This is another fundamental difference, one which lays emphasis on the welfare aspect rather than the insurance concept.

As an example, may I direct your attention to what I believe to be a glaring weakness in the program? This program would offer insurance to persons who enter employment for a definite, stated period of time, perhaps two months or three months. When they leave that employment they will be in a position to collect benefits. I have in mind students who engage in summer employment. A university student probably takes employment from May 15 to September 15. Both he and his employer know that he will be employed only for a definite period. At the end of that period, he will leave. But, as I understand it, under this legislation, since he has been attached to the labour force, he would be able to draw benefits the following summer. The parliamentary secretary shakes his head. I am glad to note his action. I hope the minister will correct the impression which has been created. This will satisfy one of my objections to the legislation.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Mackasey: If the hon. member would permit, I just want to make one point. He is absolutely right. A student who draws eight weeks attachment or more to the work force this summer will be entitled to unemployment insurance within a 52-week period provided he cannot find work the following summer. So to that extent it is in his interest. Under the present act if a student works this summer he will pay unemployment insurance contributions but will never draw any insurance.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): I thank the minister for his intervention which has confirmed my understanding of the act. This brings me to my next point. One of the chief criticisms I have heard made of the present act is that a student is assessed for unemployment insurance premiums on his summer employment, even though both he and his employer know that the employment is only temporary and that the student will never need the protection of the insurance scheme. I have always believed this to be wrong. This same student will have income tax deducted from his pay. But when he files his income tax return, if he does not fall into the taxable bracket his contributions for income tax will be remitted to him. It has always been my contention that it is unfair to tax a student for the one situation and not the other. If the student is entitled to an income tax rebate, his insurance contributions should also be rebated.

It seems to me that this legislation is a move on the part of the government to correct this situation. In other words, if a student cannot get work the following year he will at least draw a benefit. But I submit that the government is going about this in the wrong way. This will be a very expensive method of reimbursing the student for his insurance contributions. I know I will be told that there are administrative difficulties here, but if the Department of National Revenue can make these repayments, why cannot the Department of Labour? Instead of allowing a student to collect eight to 12 weeks benefits the following year, why can we not tell the student that his insurance contributions will be rebated to him the following year?

I do not want to leave the impression that I am unsympathetic to the plight of students in the summer time. Three of my own children have gone through university and I know the problems that they had to make a little money in the summer to tide them through the following year. But the situation of students in modern society is quite different from that of ordinary workers. Just what is a student's income? Today it is a hodgepodge of summer earnings, scholarships, bursaries, money received from parents and part-time earnings during the winter. So, it is illogical to try to maintain some fictional income for the months of May and June, for example. All I am saying is that if we do want to assist our students—and God knows they need it in view of the employment situation this summer—then let us assist them in some way other than this. Let us assist them through summer employment programs rather than using the vehicle of unemployment insurance as a means of granting welfare assistance to students. This is another reason I and a lot of other critics say that this bill departs from the insurance principle and becomes a welfare measure.

As the House knows, members of my party are not in accord with the principle of establishing an eight-week qualifying period. We think this too short an attachment to the labour force. We think it will lead to abuses by many of those workers who are in and out of the work force almost like a door opening and closing. We think the period is too short and that this is one of the provisions that should be changed; and no doubt amendments by members on our side will be introduced in committee.

The government is preaching universality of this bill. While they talk of universality out of the one side of their mouths, out of the other side of their mouths they tell us that the program cannot be universal, that certain people cannot be included in the program because of administrative difficulties. I cannot buy this argument. I have heard it said today by one member opposite that the self-employed person has freedom of choice in regard to when he is working and when he stops working. This is not quite true. What about the commission salesman who is employed not by one firm but represents half a dozen firms in a given area and works on a commission basis? Under the present act he is not insurable, and as I understand it he will not be insurable under the new act. If I am wrong about that I should like to be corrected.

Even though such a person is employed by several firms, he has no control over his terms of employment. If one of his employer firms suddenly decides to drop one of his lines, then he loses it and that is all there is to it. If he loses five or six different lines, then his employment has gone. This is why I do not buy the argument that a self-employed person has freedom of choice regarding whether the works or not. This argument does not apply either in the case of many franchise holders. Although it might be their own fault, if something happens to take away their franchise then they are out of work; there is no freedom of choice there.

If the minister is going to be sincere when he says this program is going to be universal, then why should not the workers in the two examples I have just given be included in this legislation? I do not buy the argument of universality. After all, the government cannot have it both ways; either the scheme is universal or it is not universal. If we are going to accept the principle of universality then let us make this legislation truly universal. I suggest that instead of 4 per cent of the labour force not being covered, this figure should be reduced to half of one per cent or something like that. Certainly, the scheme should be much broader than it is.

In all this debate to date on this proposed legislation very little mention has been made, certainly by members on government benches, of the over-all cost of this program. We have been told that by enlarging the scheme and spreading the risk we will make this program less costly to those who take part in it. That is only a half truth. As a contributor to the fund, I may find my premium reduced from $1.40 to 90 cents, or whatever the figure is—I am not concerned with exactitude here. However, a steady worker, one who, if this legislation goes through, could be referred to as one of those fortunate people who never happen to be laid off, will find himself paying just as much or maybe a little more than he is at the present time. I say this because in order to absorb the extra cost of national unemployment over 4 per cent, the government will have to draw funds out of general revenue. I have seen various estimates of the extra cost of this program ranging anywhere from $300 million to $500 million or $600 million.

Let us suppose that the extra cost will amount to $400 million. As far as I know, there is only one place where the government can get this $400 million and that is from the taxpayers' pockets. So that a person employed today will have his insurance premium reduced by 30 or 40 cents a week, but at the end of the year when the government has to cough up $500 million he will find himself paying more income taxes, sales taxes and provincial taxes to cover the cost of extra welfare. I venture to say that in the result he will be paying more for insurance coverage than he is at the present time.

This is a factor that the government has failed to mention, and it is a very important one. As some of my colleagues have pointed out, today taxpayers are about at their wits end. It is all right to say that this program is only going to cost $400 million, but raising this $400 million will mean extra taxes for the taxpayers of this country. This will be an extra tax that is laid on the backs of those people that the government seems to use to fight its battles. The middle income group is the largest taxpaying group and history will probably show it is the group with the best record for steady employment. The more steadily this group is employed the more this scheme will cost it, because this is the group that pays the taxes. I should like to hear something from the minister about this aspect. What does he think this program will cost and can our economy stand it? Here we are facing a battle with inflation which was supposed to have been won in December. That battle obviously has been lost. Unemployment has reached an almost all-time high. How can our economy absorb another $400 million or $500 million per year in taxes?

Let me speak very briefly about another aspect which worries me, and I am thinking of the cost of administration. I am one of those individuals who is not too happy about the administration of the present scheme. I was not happy about the division of powers between the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower in 1964. I have always felt that the body which handles the funds and decides the eligibility of claimants should also have the power to search out jobs which suit these people on the unemployment insurance rolls. I do not think I am alone when I say that since that division of powers, the administration of the program has become much less controlled than it was previously and that there are far more abuses. I am very critical of manpower policy because I do not feel these officials are making an honest attempt to get people back to work and off the insurance roll. These officials are not equipped to do this and do not have the proper rapport with employers. They do not seem to be able to match the employers' needs with the skills of the employees they have on hand.

When we look at this legislation, we see that it provides for greater benefits, a lesser time for qualification and that it relaxes the present inadequate supervision. Even under the present legislation there is not proper supervision. At one time an unemployed person had to stand in line in order to pick up his cheque. He was told to either go back to work or he could not draw benefits. Today, the unemployed person sits at home and gets his cheque by mail. Under this scheme, that individual will wait for two weeks and then draw three weeks' benefit. It will not matter whether he goes back to work.

The sponsor of this bill has told us it will act as an incentive to people to go back to work. I cannot buy that and I cannot see the logic of giving an individual $150 or $300, then expecting that he will go out and find himself a job. Human nature being what it is, I suspect the tendency will be for these people to wait until the three weeks' benefit is gone and then look for a job. This is what disturbs me regarding the lack of proper supervision and administration of this act. The minister should give serious consideration to bringing these two departments back together. It was a serious mistake in the first place to separate the Unemployment Insurance Commission and the Department of Manpower. It is all right for manpower to carry out certain functions, but I am firmly convinced that we must have one agency issuing money and acting in respect of replacement. Only then will we have control over this program. I seriously suggest that the minister take action in this regard.

I am quite anxious to see this bill referred to the committee for study. I have outlined some of the things I think are wrong with the proposed bill, and I can assure the government that when it gets before the committee there will be amendments proposed by members on this side. I hope the government will take serious note of some of the objections we have raised. They are not frivolous but rather objections which concern us and every taxpayer who today is loaded with taxation. These people do not honestly know whether they should keep on working or go on unemployment insurance or welfare. If the government gives consideration to our criticisms, I am sure the bill will be received favourably in the committee.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I wish to assure the minister and hon. members present that I have no intention of prolonging the debate at this time. There are two very good reasons that I should not do so. Most of the things I would like to say have already been said by other members and would only be repetition. As a result of something now before the committee, I feel the remarks I would be prepared to make might be better left unsaid until that committee makes a decision.

Let me ask the minister to give consideration to one problem which has been uppermost in my mind. This provision for placing teachers under the Unemployment Insurance Commission Act can only have a detrimental effect on the communities surrounding my home and other municipalities throughout Nova Scotia. The minister knows of the unemployment picture in my area. He knows that, because of the mining situation, the local school boards have been operating in the red for quite some time.

The inclusion of teachers under the Unemployment Insurance Act will increase the costs to these mining towns by $13,000 or $14,000 annually. The people of these areas are greatly concerned about costs faced by municipal school boards. I am sure these facts have been drawn to the minister's attention. Only two months ago, the committee recommended an exclusion when there was a valid constitutional or administrative reason. The exclusion of teachers in the circumstances to which I have referred could well come within either of those two categories. The administration of this inclusion will prove costly to these municipal school boards. Under Section 91(1) of the BNA Act, the teaching profession falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces. For that reason, there might be a violation of the constitution if teachers were brought under these provisions. The minister seems to be accepting this suggestion very quietly. Probably he has other ideas in this regard.

Let me draw the minister's attention to the principles of unemployment insurance. I do not think I can do this in a better way than by quoting Sir George Perley who, on March 8, 1935, at a time when the Unemployment Insurance Commission was being considered and some four or five years before it came into effect, said, as reported at pages 1530 and 1531 of Hansard for that date:

> Stated in general terms, unemployment insurance can only be satisfactorily extended to persons in employments where there is a material degree of unemployment and where the employment is carried on at such places and under such conditions that it is reasonably practicable to adopt a scheme of unemployment insurance with real advantage to the persons insured.

Sir George Perley was quoting from a memorandum prepared by Mr. A. D. Watson, Chief Actuary of the Department of Insurance, and Mr. M. C. MacLean of the Bureau of Statistics. I think this statement applies as well today as it did when unemployment insurance was in its infancy. There is no real advantage to teachers in buying, as I say, this type of insurance. If there were, I am sure quite a few teachers would be quite willing to come under the Unemployment Insurance Act. As it stands now, however, the majority of teachers throughout this country have the impression they would be paying into an insurance fund from which they would collect no benefits whatever.

Then, there is the matter of the additional cost to the municipalities. In the mining towns in my community, the school boards would be faced with an additional annual cost of $13,000 or $14,000. This is a matter of great concern to them. Of course, it is of concern to the Nova Scotia government, which is doing its utmost to cut back on educational costs, that at this time there is a program being introduced in the federal House which would add greatly to their costs. I understand that the province of Newfoundland hires its own teachers and, therefore, in that case the provincial government would be responsible for every school teacher on the payroll.

I should like to say a few brief words in respect of the questions put to the minister this afternoon concerning the problem of centralization of the different government departments. I should like also to refer to the Sydney area, although it is not in my constituency and, therefore, I am not trying to promote something for my constituency. Sydney is located in the industrial centre of Nova Scotia. When the federal government decides on any centralization program, I believe it should take into consideration the location in which the departments might be centralized. I think, if any centralizing is to be done in Nova Scotia in respect of his department, the minister should give serious consideration to the Cape Breton area, which is the industrial heart of Nova Scotia, and is the area in which the unemployment picture is worse than in any other part of the province.

As I said in my opening remarks, I shall restrict myself to the matter which is before us at the present time. However, in speaking of DEVCO I wish to assure the minister that at no time have I complained of the administration of the UIC or what it is doing in this regard. I repeat this statement in order to assure the minister, and I have given similar assurance to the head of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, Mr. Des-Roches, not only by phone but also by letter. I have given the assurance that the violations which have been carried on by DEVCO are not something for which I am blaming the UIC. But I do believe this is an area in which the minister could exercise his influence so that the men concerned are not deprived of the unemployment insurance payments, not by the UIC but by a Crown corporation. I would ask the minister to give every consideration to providing assistance in this particular area. I believe the minister and the UIC should use their influence in this regard. This matter is well covered in section 58 of the Unemployment Insurance Act and is also covered in the new legislation. There is a provision that no one can touch a man's UIC benefits. There is one exception of which the minister is well aware. The only body which can withhold UIC benefits or take advantage of the UIC fund is the commission itself, since it is authorized to hold back an amount of money which may have been overpaid on a previous occasion. The commission is permitted to withhold that amount of money from the next payment.

There is no provision for anticipation. It is in this area that the DEVCO corporation has gone astray. DEVCO certainly anticipated when it came up with its pre-retirement plan. The idea was advanced that the UIC fund could be used to supplement the first year's retirement of any individual so long as he was qualified to collect UIC benefits. Since we are dealing here with a Crown corporation, I would ask the minister to use his influence and authority by implementing section 58 of the Unemployment Insurance Act to ensure that these men can fully recover this money. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) said that these men are entitled to money over and above the pre-retirement leave plan. The Minister of Regional Economic Expansion said that full benefits would be made available. Let members be fully aware of the fact that although I asked about the 10 per cent increase made available on January 3 this year, this is not the question the minister answered on that particularly day. I shall paraphrase what he said on that occasion.

In answering a question at that time, the minister said there had been a meeting of the board of directors of DEVCO in the last few days at which time it was decided to grant full benefits to the retired workers. I ask that this decision be implemented and that the minister use his influence and authority to see that section 58 of the Unemployment Insurance Act is carried out to the fullest extent. I repeat that the answer by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion on that particular occasion was not given in reply to another question. I was not asking about any board of directors meeting or the decision made at such a meeting. The impression has been prevalent throughout Cape Breton that full benefits will accrue to those men who have been pre-retired. This can be done under the provisions of Section 58 of the present act, and again I ask the minister to please give this matter his consideration.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, the measure of the efficacy and value of an act depends much upon the public's estimation of that act. It does not matter whether there is bureaucratic treatment of the legislation because, in so far as good legislation is concerned, it is the public's estimation of it which is important. It is some 35 years since we have had unemployment insurance legislation in this country and, frankly, we know that over the years there has been growing dissatisfaction with unemployment insurance as we have known it. We have had the Gill Report which arose out of the clamor and dissatisfaction on all sides. The Gill Report contains certain suggestions. I am not able to say how much of the Gill Report is contained in the white paper and in this present legislation, except that undoubtedly the philosophy of some of its recommendations has found its way into this legislation. I think it would be a very grave misleading of the public if legislation which is to be placed on the statute books as unemployment insurance should be nothing but a thinly disguised welfare measure.

I will suggest to the minister that the public will determine whether, in practice, it is deemed to be a welfare measure, in other words a national milk cow for those who do not want to work. Let us not be too pretentious or too sanctimonious and say that all Canadians are willing to work. That is a lot of poppycock. It is human nature that the more these benefits become available, the more there will be havens for those people who will not have to work but yet gain some advantage. You will get more and more people who will be moving into those particular areas, and who will ultimately be quite content to give up what could be for them a higher standard of living, but one for which they do not want to make an effort or be subjected to the responsibility of work. The number of those people grows. Although the proportion of the population involved may be relatively small in percentage figures, yet that percentage is the one that is seen.

After all, the population of this country as a whole is no different from an individual. Normally, we are not aware of all the parts of our body so long as they are functioning and in good health. But if one only gets a pimple on a cheek or a bruise on an arm or a leg, it is that ailing part that the individual notices. I suggest to the minister that the public reaction with regard to a measure such as this will be its estimation and its judgment of the ailing parts. It is for that reason we must be very careful that this act be not subjected to abuses and that it not create a haven for those people who are unwilling to make an effort.

I am afraid that with regard to the eight week's qualification period there are in far too many areas of this country people who have the conception that unemployment insurance payments are rocking chair money. They either organize themselves in rotating crews, so that one man can periodically go off, or make work schemes. The minister knows that this practise has existed over the years. If the formulation of this act makes this practise easier through the shorter qualifying periods, there will be more and more people who will avail themselves of unemployment insurance payments.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) knows that one of the essential elements in the productivity of this country is not only the skill of its working force but the discipline of that force. We know that, in many instances, if a man feels it does not matter how he carries on, that he cannot be fired or that if he is fired because he has done his work wrong or is not producing enough, he can fall back on unemployment insurance rather easily, he will have no fear of insecurity and the discipline of the work force goes by the board. This Unemployment Insurance Act was put there for the purpose of protecting the worker against involuntary loss of work. May I suggest that dismissal for improper performance should not be covered by a provision that is there for the involuntary loss of a working opportunity. It all depends on administration of the act whether the appropriate discipline in a working force can be maintained.

I should now like to put to the minister certain questions. I was not able to obtain answers from his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). This question seemed to take the minister by surprise yesterday in committee. I refer to the provisions under part VI of the act, first, that there shall no longer be an unemployment insurance fund as such but merely an account in the public accounts of Canada known as the unemployment insurance account. All payments will be funnelled into the consolidated revenue account. We want to ask why there has been a change of practice. It has been suggested to me that the unemployment insurance fund as presently constituted had to be invested in Dominion of Canada securities. The securities, of course, carry interest rates. Of course, the unemployment insurance fund benefitted from the interest payments, but it will no longer be necessary for that procedure to be followed under the unemployment insurance account; in other words, the fund need not receive any interest as it did in the past. It is an account receiving the contributions, the penalties, and any interest on penalties as well as any recoveries, but there is no question of any interest on a fund. There is no longer a fund. The money belongs to the government, which it did not before. It was money that had to go to the unemployment insurance fund under the Unemployment Insurance Act and could not be used or transferred to any public account.

However, there is nothing in this bill that would prevent a transfer from one account to another. There is a provision that the Minister of Finance may authorize in accordance with such terms and conditions but not such rates as he may prescribe the payment of interest on the balance of the unemployment insurance account. That means that if there is a certain tight fiscal year, budgetary stringencies, the minister can quite readily say that he will postpone the payment of any interest, or he can even waive it. I recall certain practices of that type which were attempted in the past with regard to certain accounts, but they were soon smelled out.

• (5:00 p.m.)

Since a change is being made, I insist that the burden of demonstrating the reasons for that change being made lie upon those who are making the change. Nothing was said in the white paper in connection with this nor was anything said in the committee report. Neither was any reason given for it being done. Since I find myself charged, on behalf of my party, with the responsibility of the fiscal policy of this government, I want to know why there is this change from specified funds into the consolidated revenue account? We know that in the past we had problems with regard to the Public Service Superannuation account and the Armed Services Superannuation account. We know there was a problem with the CNR pension fund, and also with the CPR pension fund. Not one of them is funded.

In this connection, the government is actually taking a retrograde step. I would have hoped it would have funded the unemployment insurance account, but the minister shakes his head. That would have given the workers of Canada, those who contribute to the unemployment insurance fund, the advantages of the profits built up as a result of inflation, and what have you.

Mr. Francis: Just like they were about 1962.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): So far as the Public Service Superannuation account is concerned, the same thing should have been done. Why did we have to go through the changes that we did? Why were people denied for so long the additional payments to which they should have been entitled? It was because, under the Public Service Superannuation account, we were told there was actuarily no way that this could be done. The reason was that there was no proper funding.

I am not going to point the finger at any particular administration. I say that this is a fundamental weakness in these matters, and there is no reason why the accumulations in the unemployment insurance account, if properly funded, should not be available for financing economic development of this country, not just to be used as transfer payments which frankly are non-productive.

The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) can shake his head all he wants, but I can use the moneys from a fund for economic development on the basis of loans that are repayable to the fund. In that case the loans are up against the yardstick of having to produce. Transfer payments from one class of taxpayer to another are up against no yardstick except popular demagogic appeal. There is no other measure as to the efficacy of transfer payments. They are merely transfers from those who are producing to those who are going to use them, and there is no yardstick as to their efficacy. After all, these are moneys that are taken from wages, not as taxes. Are we again going to have the government members talking out of both sides of their mouths, as they were yesterday, and as I say the ruling from the Chair was. It was talking out of both sides of its mouth when it was talking about contributions to the Canada Pension Plan being in one case plain tax and in another case merely a contribution. That is talking out of both sides of one's mouth, and cannot be held logically to be correct. But in this particular case, it is not a tax. However, the government is making it the equivalent of a tax since it is going to go into the consolidated revenue account.

The Canada Pension Plan does not go into the consolidated revenue account. There is a fund and the moneys are loaned out. That fund earns money for the benefit of the people who make the contributions. Why not have the same benefits accrue to the unemployment insurance fund? You could have a mix in the investment accounts of government obligations. The government could get access to this fund, and provincial administrations could also have some access to financing—industry—mortgages—the proper mix under the Trustee Act. In that case, then, I would say you could put the unemployment insurance fund to a double purpose. This would also meet the obligations of protecting a real insurance fund, of protecting the workers and at the same time giving them the benefit of their money, not government money. There is not any government money in this at all, not now. There will be if the country has unemployment beyond a certain rate.

If the government had to contribute that would be a super bonus. This might be a social concept that the government, because it may have had to impose certain fiscal measures and certain monetary measures that brought about a rise in unemployment, is under a responsibility to alleviate the results of that action. But surely to goodness, there is a real case to be made that this fund belongs to the people who contributed to it and under the present instance the government is taking it. As a matter of fact, all the moneys that are presently in the unemployment insurance fund are going into that particular account.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Isn't it also true, if there is not sufficient money in the account to pay the benefits called for under the act, that the government is obligated to pay those benefits?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I will grant you that.

Mr. Otto: Then why have a fund?

Mr. Francis: 1962.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The reason there are insufficient funds is that the government has, likely for fiscal and monetary reasons, as it did this year, created unemployment whereby there has been an excessive drain. That is the part of the social measure that the government could contribute to this fund, the same as in 1962. If this thing had been properly funded in 1962, that might not have happened. The government used a free flow of funds through the unemployment insurance account as one measure to revitalize an economy that was already sick late in 1956.

Mr. Francis: But—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member had his opportunity. I will ask him to please let me continue my case. The unemployment insurance fund, of course, had heavy calls on it, from late 1957, or principally from 1958 through to 1961, and the government used it as one means to stimulate the economy. Loans were made to the fund, not direct drafts, and I would think that an investment fund can have loans made to it. But I am making the case here for a proper funded account, an insurance account, and I want to know from the minister why the change to merely an account?

There are two other little matters I want to refer to, and then I shall sit down. First of all, I think the experience rating concept may have some difficulties in it. I think, essentially, this is right. In other words, where there has been a very high incidence of unemployment, then just like in insurance I think the people involved have to pay a higher premium. However I want to point up one item as a matter of caution, and this is a derogation from my real acceptance of experience rating. It is that in so many of the construction trades the hiring and the firing are not handled by the employer. There are many subtrades and the journeymen working for subcontractors are placed in, on, or off a job by the union hiring hall. If this turnover, which is artificial as far as the employer is concerned, is used as an experience rating in order to penalize the employer then I think that is wrong. I hope that the minister can tell us how he can go against that. If he can, then I say that by and large I am quite happy with the idea of experience rating.

The other thing is that all of us have received representations from teachers, nurses and other groups hitherto exempt and now to be included. I have always felt, personally, that the various exceptions which existed in the past and the confusion of seasonal workers with regular workers, created the greatest difficulties in the application of the Unemployment Insurance Act. I know that a lot of teachers are going to say this is merely a tax but many other people will have to pay, too. An argument I heard this afternoon was to the effect that they were going to be pretty well set. With security of tenure, it was hoped that no one would lose employment and therefore why should they pay? But in those provinces where we have to pay annual premiums for medicare, we hope we are not going to have to avail ourselves of the service. I pay premiums for medicare in the province of Alberta, but I certainly hope that I never have to use it. I will admit that this is going to cause some real problems, and I am not too sure that there was adequate consultation in regard to this. We only know that the body economic and politic of this country is bearing an excessively high load for the cost of education. The minister knows that every penny that is paid either by the teacher or the employer is going to come from the taxpayer because in the next round of negotiations after this act comes into force the unemployment insurance contributions of the teachers will be part of the fringe benefits to be exacted from the employer. Therefore we, the ultimate taxpayers, the consumers of this country, will have to pay the shot. To that extent, we all share this additional burden. I hope the provincial civil servants will come in, as I would not want them to opt out of this scheme.

This afternoon I raised the question about the member of Parliament on salary. Does he qualify? He is not under a contract of employment, so I don't know. There is no formal contract, but I would like him to try to step out of it. He can resign, but until he does somebody is bound to pay him. It seems to me there are counter obligations and, in fact, a contract and therefore he should be entitled to contribute. If you lose an election, you could sit back and draw $100 a week for the next 52 weeks. The only thing is you would be trying to obtain the same kind of employment. I suppose the same type of test will be applied as in the past—the minister shakes his head. There is going to be a change. Perhaps there is that silly limitation that used to apply that unless the job is exactly comparable the claimant could engage in some sort of flim-flam with the commission and would not have to work but could draw benefits.

I could add a lot more, Mr. Speaker, but I have heard that I have overstepped the time allotted to me. I hope to see amendments in the committee. I would like to see the bill go to committee, but I will make up my mind on the bill when it comes back.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I just finished a lengthy discussion with the chairman of the Agricultural Committee regarding that famous marketing bill, so I may apologize to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) if I throw a few cattle and hogs into the unemployment insurance bill. This afternoon we find ourselves debating this piece of legislation before it goes to committee. The legislation is the result of a white paper which had some exhaustive study in the labour committee of this House. This was the best they could devise.

I read the minister's speech when he introduced the bill and I note that he said it is for the general benefit of the workers—and I underline that word "workers"—in Canada today. The main purpose is to help people temporarily out of work. That is what he said. The government adopts the idea of universality but the bill does not include the self-employed. That is a queer definition. The principle of universality is accepted but the bill immediately excludes some of the people who are paying into the unemployment insurance plan, as the self-employed are in many cases. The minister shakes his head in the negative, but he did not let me finish my sentence. One can readily understand that anybody who is self-employed and employing others is paying into the unemployment insurance fund. Now, the minister nods in the affirmative, Mr. Speaker, so we have finally reached an agreement on that particular statement. The self-employed in many, many cases do pay into the unemployment insurance fund.

Now, this fund is basically a product of the depression. It first appeared in legislative form in 1934 or 1935. I see the minister is eager to correct me again, but I am not going to accept it at this time. It was ruled ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada and it is interesting to note that other acts can still be ruled ultra vires by the Supreme Court of Canada. I would not like to think that this is one of them, but one could envision other bills of this House that could be so ruled. This unemployment insurance scheme or the application of some form of unemployment insurance was ruled ultra vires in 1937 or 1938. It was brought in again in a more acceptable form to the Supreme Court in 1941 and has been amended from time to time since.

Mr. Barnett: Don't forget the amendments to the B.N.A. Act.

Mr. Horner: I thank the hon. member for the correction. It required constitutional amendment and was brought in again in 1941. Since then, we have had a series of amendments and studies on the unemployment insurance scheme and the practical application of it. The most recent study was carried out in the early 1960's, by the Gill Commission. This was an exhaustive study on how the act should be amended and changed. I notice that in the minister's remarks he attempted to hang some aspect of this bill on the Gill Report. It is hanging very, very shakily and I am sure the coat hanger will soon be pulled from the wall because this bill cannot find any real or permanent basis for its origin in the Gill Report.

• (5:20 p.m.)

This bill does nothing more than impose a tax. It adds an additional tax to our society. Whether it will be of benefit to the general worker is debatable. In his remarks the minister seemed to envision huge amounts of unemployment in the years ahead among people whose occupations we today consider as secure, people such as the civil servants of Canada, firemen, policemen, members of the RCMP, teachers, etc. Of course, considering conditions in the public service at present, there may very well be huge lay-offs in the public service. However, the possibility of disruption in our public service will not continue for very much longer. Nevertheless, this bill will impose an additional tax on us.

Let us look at it that way and analyse one of the basic difficulties of our economy. What will we find? We see that workers go out on strike for higher wages. For the sake of argument, let us say that a union threatens to go on strike unless its members receive a 10 per cent wage increase. Let us say the workers are granted this increase; yet, because of the built-in costs of our society, they will take home only about 4 per cent of that increase. The additional 6 per cent will go towards taxes of one sort or another, income tax, the unemployment insurance fund, a whole host of organizations, and so on.

Mr. Bigg: For a check off.

Mr. Horner: Yes, for a check off, for union dues and so on. Only about half of the increase is taken home by the worker to his family. In other words, we have built up a costly society in which a worker must work. It costs a great deal for a worker to work. The society he works in is affected by the total of the 10 per cent increase the worker has been granted, to cite the example I am using and that 10 per cent increase in his wages is reflected in costs throughout the rest of society. So, because the worker only takes home about 4 per cent or 5 per cent, or about half his increase, after two years or whenever his contract expires he must seek an additional 10 per cent increase. People wonder why there are these continuous rounds of wage negotiations. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) has tried to persuade unions to spread out their demands over three years as opposed to the two years for which they sometimes settle. The extended period only postpones the next cyclical increase. We must go to the root of the problem and determine why there are these cyclical increases. We must analyse these cyclical increases. Very simply, we have built into our economic system too much overhead and expense. It costs too much to work. An analysis of this bill reveals that it constitutes an additional tax. By passing this bill we shall contribute to increasing the cost of a person's working.

In his speech, the minister referred to the guaranteed annual income and cited the experiment going on in the United States. He said that it is amazing that some people on a guaranteed annual income still want to work. Well, man is not content to be idle. He wants to do something; I agree with that. But he does not necessarily want to stand on an assembly line tightening bolts or packing and cutting meat. He wants to do something that will occupy his mind and keep his body in good physical tone. We cannot describe work that way. Common sense shows us that work must be described as the doing of something that must be done at a specific time and place. I do not deny what the minister tried to say in his speech, that even though people get a guaranteed annual income they will want to work. Nevertheless, he defined work very loosely.

In this bill we are providing for a tax on people who are now working because our society says we need built-in security. I have come to the chamber after studying exhaustively another piece of legislation that attempts to build in security and my thinking has now evolved to the point at which I think that man's security can perhaps best be placed in the hands of the Lord. Perhaps only there will he find security.

An hon. Member: Who pays the bills?

Mr. Horner: Perhaps that security is cheapest. This bill seeks to create security, yet we are discussing some workers who will never claim benefits.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is eternal security.

Mr. Caccia: Send the bills to the Lord.

Mr. Horner: Perhaps if we had a little more faith in the Lord we would not need the bill.

Mr. Caccia: Send Him the bills.

Mr. Horner: Perhaps if the hon. member had had more faith in the Lord we would not have needed the bill in the first place.

Mr. Caccia: Send Him the bills.

Mr. Dinsdale: This government has taken the place of the Lord.

Mr. Horner: This bill seeks to impose a new tax on some who will never claim benefits. The minister said that people on radio and television have said that a man can work for eight weeks and then collect benefits for 52 weeks. The minister said that was completely wrong. A man must work for eight weeks, and can then collect unemployment insurance for 18 weeks. However, if the national level of unemployment is about 4 per cent, he can collect it for another 12 weeks, thus increasing the period to 30 weeks. The minister also said that if the regional rate of unemployment is above 4 per cent, the man can collect for another period as well. I see the minister nodd ng affirmatively. Clearly, what people on radio and television have said about a man working for eight weeks and then collecting for 52 weeks is perhaps not far from the truth. I see the minister again nodding his head affirmatively, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps that is closer to the truth than one might think.

In essence, this bill ignores the common interpretation of "insurance". In his speech the minister said that, certainly, some fellow would pay a little bit and collect a whole lot, and he drew an analogy between payments and benefits when a fellow's house burns down just after he has paid a premium on his insurance policy. I think the examples the minister used were poor. The premium you pay on an insurance policy is rated according to the risk of your collecting under the policy. Your car insurance premium is related to the possibility of your having an accident and the amount of damage your car can cause in an accident. In this scheme, there is no relationship between the premium a man pays and the risk of his being out of work.

Mr. Perrault: That is not true at all.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: I hear a comment from the parliamentary secretary. He says that is not true.

Mr. Perrault: Have you read the experience rating section?

Mr. Horner: I did not read the parliamentary secretary's speech and, as a result, I do not know what his intentions or beliefs are. When he makes it, I will.

Mr. Perrault: You should read the white paper before you speak.

Mr. Horner: I read the white paper very carefully. But to get back to the point I had reached when I was interrupted. Many people will not have occasion to collect benefits at all. We are told that some civil servants are to be included but that civil servants employed by the Quebec government will not be included, because they do not wish to be included. Will the same conditions apply to all other governments? I see the minister nodding his head in the affirmative. Is the option being given because these people will likely not have much occasion to collect, or because of the constitutional aspect? Again, I see the minister nodding in the affirmative.

But what about the position of schoolteachers? What about the additional cost to the municipalities which would be imposed by what is, in effect, an additional tax, an extra burden on the educational system? Surely, there is a constitutional question here which is closely parallel to that raised by civil servants working for a provincial government. In essence, the teacher enters into a contract with a municipal government, so there is a close parallel here. Reading the minister's speech, I notice that he held a long consultation with the teachers and that after he had talked to them most of them were in favour of the legislation before us. Well, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman could not have talked to the teachers in the constituency of Crowfoot because I have certainly not found them to be in favour of this legislation. Indeed, very few of them want any part of it. So here is legislation which will tax people who in all likelihood will never be able to collect.

Then again, consider the amount a person can collect. An insured person is able to draw two-thirds of his income up to a maximum of $100 a week. This is a substantial amount in most regions of Canada. Perhaps it would not keep a person very well in Toronto, but in a lot of the smaller towns $100 would keep a person very well. The minister made no mention in his speech—I admit I did not read all of it—of the number of irregularities which are presently taking place in the use of the present Unemployment Insurance Act. I suspect that the number of irregularities will be tripled, at least, if the bill before us becomes law, and that they will be far more difficult to assess. I say they will be more difficult to assess because of the variations in entitlement to benefit for which provision is made, depending upon the national average of unemployment. This will make the administration extremely difficult.

Another point I should like to deal with before closing is that at the present time one-fifth of the amount contributed to the fund comes from the federal government. The present bill will remove the federal government's responsibility to contribute whenever unemployment falls below 4 per cent. Should the figure exceed 4 per cent, either nationally or in certain regions the federal government would make a contribution. What is the government proposing to do? It is proposing to use this act as a means of directing money to certain regions. The minister nods in the affirmative. The equalization payments which the have-not provinces presently receive are apparently not large enough; the funds which those provinces receive under the regional economic expansion program are not sufficient, and additional methods are being used. I well remember the speech made by the hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) in connection with the textile industry. He said the government's proposals in that connection meant nothing more than welfare for textile industry workers in the province of Quebec. Here again, in the bill before us, we find payment being directed toward regions of Canada which experience high unemployment rates.

If we really wish to rid the country of unemployment, and I am thinking now of regions where unemployment is what one might call permanently high, it is time we assessed the position nationally in an effort to determine where the best opportunities of employment are available for people who at the present time are more or less perpetually out of work in regions which have a consistently high rate of unemployment. Perhaps it would be better to induce them to go to other regions or to take up other lines of work which would draw them out across the country where greater opportunities will exist for them to reach fulfilment as individuals. Too much of the legislation which has been placed before this House—and the present bill is like the others in this respect—is of a kind which limits scope for opportunity or the desire for advancement. Before passing any bill, hon. members should ask themselves whether it would widen the opportunities available to the average Canadian, whether it would stimulate the desire to seek opportunity. This bill fails to meet these criteria, particularly on the second count, and I therefore hope that when it is referred to the committee it will be subjected to an exhaustive study, that it will be examined to the fullest extent. I should like to think that major changes could be made to it, changes which would result in a more useful bill for those who will have to resort to it, perhaps through no fault of their own, in the years ahead.

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I do not quarrel with every feature of this bill. But there are a great many features in connection with the Unemployment Insurance Commission with which I should like to quarrel. Let me say, in all fairness to the minister, that in my opinion he is one of the more conscientious ministers in the cabinet. I see his executive assistant has just arrived in the gallery. In face of the massive unemployment we are encountering this winter, the hon. gentleman's executive assistant, on behalf of the minister, has been most co-operative. There are some aspects of this bill which irritate a great many people, not only in my own constituency but elsewhere. I receive a lot of correspondence from people in other constituencies, too.

Getting back to the cost of education, most local school boards will eventually have to raise another 2½ to 3 per cent on top of their present commitments to pay for teachers' contributions to the unemployment insurance fund. Certainly, the minister has picked a very lucrative field in the school teachers. Any insurance company would say he was taking a very good risk because teachers do not expect to be unemployed, especially those in the profession today. Those who are trying to enter the field will probably be unsuccessful so will not be affected by these additional contributions.

In my riding of Victoria-Haliburton, it will cost school boards alone approximately $200,000 or more a year. The teachers do not oppose this legislation because of the extra tax involved, which I grant you is probably benefitting the less fortunate people; they are opposing it because the teachers, as a group, are being singled out to pay this tax. It rubs them the wrong way and I can well understand it. The minister is invading the field of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) here.

I have also received letters from municipalities which take objection to this increased cost. All of us know today that the municipalities are limited in the amount of tax dollars they can raise. Now, they are being asked to surrender a percentage of money that they could probably apply to other uses. This money is going to fatten the treasury of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Not long ago I heard one hon. member say that the government has been talking out of both sides of its mouth, on the one hand talking about subsidizing the municipalities, and on the other hand talking about taking money from the municipalities. The municipalities would like to know where they stand. In fact, this is one of the main objections to taxing the teachers.

So much for the teachers. Let me return to the subject of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. A few years ago, in the name of efficiency unemployment insurance offices were moved out of the smaller centres. The government wanted centralization so these small offices were closed and offices were opened in larger municipalities. Then, it was not long before these were closed and the UIC moved to an even larger area. Then, the UIC got involved in the computer field. We were told we had to have centralization so that we could use the computers. Let me say right now, Mr. Speaker, that as far as these computers are concerned I wish they would use them for ships' anchors or something like that. I know of nothing else that creates more problems for the rank and file Canadian who is applying for unemployment insurance.

What happens when you telephone the local office to try and get help for people who are in need? Many of these people do not have any money in reserve, certainly not the less fortunate of whom I spoke a few moments ago, to tide them over the six or eight weeks or even longer they have to wait for assistance. In the case of one of my constituents, after I had contacted the Unemployment Insurance Commission and tried to straighten out his claim I was able to collect $875 in back money owing to him. How many Canadian on the payroll and receiving a cheque every week put money aside for when they are unemployed? This sort of delay illustrates the inefficiency today of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Certainly, computers do not provide the answers.

The staff of the UIC feed these computers with cards and have to wait three or four days for results. By the time the postal service has handled these complaints another three or four days are lost. On average, I receive five or six complaints a day about the Unemployment Insurance Commission, late payments and disqualifications. Surely, all these people cannot be wrong. After I delve into their problems I usually manage to achieve something like a 95 per cent success rate. If they were wrong in the first place, how could I win their case for them? I must say that I have received a lot of co-operation from the executive assistant to the minister. I do not want to belittle the staff of the commission either, because they have been most co-operative. But their hands are tied by this massive machine which, in its own time, passes out information that is fed into it from the other end.

This is why I was disappointed to hear the minister say today that he was introducing centralization. Efficiency is not closely related to centralization, especially in this field. When this bill is sent to committee, I hope to be present and to bring up some of these matters for the attention to the minister. After all, the people most affected by its provisions are those who can least afford to be.

Another matter I would draw to the attention of the minister concerns the application forms that have to be filled out by persons who become unemployed. Probably these people are not all blessed with an education, and they cannot understand some of these complicated forms. I am sure the minister will admit that we could devise a form more readily understandable by these people. Not all of them have this difficulty but many do. I often help people who come into my office on Saturday mornings to fill out these forms. They tell me: "I do not understand this letter that I got last week telling me I am disqualified, that I do not have enough stamps, when I have been contributing for 20 years". I can produce letters like this. Again, this letter is probably the work of the computer to a great extent.

These are just a few of the matters I wanted to raise. When this bill goes to the committee, I hope serious study will be given to these problems. If so, I am sure we can produce a bill much more readily acceptable.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. If the minister speaks now with the consent of the House he will close the debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am torn between two responsibilities here. One of them is to get the bill through by six o'clock, realizing that this is Wednesday; the other is answering in the 10 minutes at my disposal the questions that have been raised. Or perhaps these could be left over to the committee stage when I can deal with them in detail. I do not know whether hon. members opposite desire a recorded vote before six o'clock.

However, I should like to answer the question that was raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who seemed very anxious to get some information about the amount of money in the present unemployment insurance fund that is going into the Consolidated Revenue Fund at the present time and which draws interest, and will continue to do so. No change has been made in this respect, with the exception that under the new concept there will not be $400 million or $500 million of taxpayers' money always in the fund because the rates will be adjusted annually. The idea is for the whole plan to finance itself as it goes along. Periodically, once a year in November, we will adjust the rates according to the experience of the past year. Once we reach 1975 and the plan has accordingly been adjusted as far as the transitional period for new entrants is concerned, contributions by management and labour will be fairly stable. I have already mentioned on previous occasions that the government will absorb the extraordinary cost features of the plan which come into effect at the 4 per cent level.

There have been a lot of valid arguments made, one of which concerned the administration and service of the UIC. I have already promised, without going into this in detail at this time, that we will be restructuring UIC services when this bill becomes law. This has been a non-partisan debate in every way because everyone who has participated has been interested in this matter. I assure hon. members that the prime responsibility of civil servants and those people who work in the Unemployment Insurance Commission will be to offer a maximum service to claimants and to the employers. That is the way it should be. In order to do this we will have to reorganize personnel within the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

We cannot have things both ways; that is Members of Parliament constantly coming to us and saying do not change the set-up but at the same time wanting to make changes to benefit people.

I used the word "centralize" today, and I think that may have been ambiguous. I was, however, thinking in terms of certain functions that can be centralized. We will, in general, be decentralizing the offices in order to provide more claimant services to the people. In other words, we will be setting up more offices around the country that will specialize in providing information and assistance to claimants. We have already done this in Toronto where we have opened up five new offices. We have used the phrase "satellite offices", which might not have the best connotation, but the primary objective of the offices is to give service to the customer—the claimants.

Hon. Members of Parliament have a legitimate concern about some of the problems that have created these two and three-month waiting periods before an individual can draw unemployment insurance. In many cases there has been a reason for this, and that is the need to help a claimant build up his claim. Perhaps during the last two years an individual has worked for five different employers and unfortunately has lost his own records. The present regulations require him to keep his records. That individual goes from one job to another. At best when we are faced with this situation we have a 50-50 proposition. Many individuals who have been fully employed for years all too frequently just assume they will never be unemployed and forget about their records. Possibly they do not realize their own obligation. An individual of this type will come into an unemployment insurance office and ask for his benefits for 52 weeks which he feels he should draw because he has been employed for four years, but he has no proof of past employment.

Some members have talked about abuses to the fund. If we are to prevent abuses we must at the same time make sure which people are entitled to benefit. This involves a matter of judgment. I could speak at some length about some of the arguments that have been presented, but I am pleased to note that many of the remarks of a member of one party have nullified the remarks of another member of that same party. Some members in the official opposition talked about universality. I believe the hon. member from Halifax endorsed the introduction of teachers into the plan, while others have been opposed. Perhaps if the time were available I might suggest that they read each other's speeches. The same thing happened in respect of the NDP.

I think we have a moral obligation to fishermen. We have helped them out for 10 or 12 years. We must make sure they remain in the unemployment insurance plan until an equal or better plan is devised. There might be a slight difference of opinion in the NDP, but from the contributions to the debate I would have to say that the official stand of that party is to keep the fishermen in the plan as long as there is no better system.

In so far as maternity benefits are concerned, again I think the general position of speakers for the NDP, with one exception, is that we should pay benefits to those people who are temporarily without work as a result of a pregnancy. I might remind hon. members that our research indicates that over a million women in the work force today are there for no other reason than to add to the family income. This sometimes means the difference between poverty and existence. When such a person becomes pregnant, you can envisage the terrible hardship this can invoke on an individual family. Very often the husband is a semi-invalid. There are many reasons for women working. It is too easy to generalize by saying they are working for pin money, for a second television or automobile.

There are many points I could raise. I do not know what the feeling of hon. members is, whether they want me to go beyond six o'clock or provide answers in committee.

Mr. Alexander: Answer in committee.

Mr. Mackasey: I will try to answer a few more points in the next three or four minutes. I have had no less than 18 meetings with school teachers' groups. I cannot get overly excited about the concern of boards of trustees. If I had the time I would indicate the exact additional burden placed on the school board by employer contributions as compared to the wage demands made by teachers over the next few years. I am hoping concern of the teachers is such that they will show some responsibility the next time they enter collective bargaining for increased wages to which, no doubt, they are entitled. When you look at the fact that across Canada the allocation to school boards in various provinces runs to $2 billion, and that out of that this new burden to the school board will be .38 of 1 per cent, that argument is very ridiculous. It is obvious that it has been introduced by certain school teachers in the hope that their trustees might take up the battle for them.

I think it was the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) who said quite adequately and eloquently today that all this will fall back on the taxpayer. I admit that. This is the same taxpayer who today finances the Canada Assistance Plan. Under this insurance plan, we will take a burden to the extent of $80 million from the Canada Assistance Plan because the increased benefits will make it possible for people drawing unemployment insurance at lower levels not to have this supplemented by welfare in order to exist. Their unemployment insurance benefits will be high enough to put them past the threshold at which they are eligible for welfare.

I can promise hon. members that they will have an opportunity to participate and be heard in respect of this plan. Our efforts and desires are to help people. We have already arranged to make it possible to overcome some of the limitations of the computer. We will be able to find out within 24 hours why a person's card has been rejected. We are doing this through the use of microfilm and other methods of communication now available.

In so far as making this plan truly universal by covering the self-employed, every country that has an unemployment insurance plan has tried to do this without success. The only place this exists now is in England and it is done there by way of a means test. I do not think we want to introduce that in this country.

We have talked about teachers and professionals. We must remember that many doctors, lawyers, scientists, engineers and many other professionals work in large numbers for an identifiable employer, whether that employer be government, private institutions or a collective professional enterprise, and they will pay unemployment insurance. It will only be the truly one-man operation that will not pay. We will even be able to bring in some of those through regulation if we can find ways and means of identifying them, as we have done with the fishermen who are classed as employees rather than self-employed people.

I do not want to take up any more time and I wish to thank members for their courtesy in letting me get this bill through today. I can understand some members have had to curtail their opportunity to speak. They will be able to take advantage of this opportunity later on. We are meeting tomorrow with the ministers of labour from the provinces on a general basis rather than just in respect of unemployment insurance, so I am pleased to have been given the opportunity to get this bill through today.

I hope I have not missed any point that is of great concern to an hon. member. The matter of the eight weeks has bothered some members. Others have asked why we should adopt the two-week period instead of a period of 10 weeks, 12 weeks or 14 weeks. I must say that this is a matter of judgment. We have not had a chance to talk about it thoroughly here, but we assume that the eight weeks will indicate some attachment to the work force. Everything will be done through claimant services to get people back to work sooner. We have set up test projects in Hamilton and other cities and find we are getting people back to work a week or ten days earlier than previously.

Having regard to the three-week lump sum, I think upon reflection we will probably divide this into two payments within a period of five weeks. I must remind hon. members, in conclusion that the two-week waiting period is a substantial deterrent against abuse. Two weeks waiting period plus three weeks at $100 would mean that one would draw $300 and today one would wait one week and would draw four weeks benefit, or $200 and some odd.

The second thing is, I must remind members that we have eliminated many of the sources of abuse in respect of seasonal benefits. The fact that we are making the unemployment insurance benefits taxable will certainly be a disincentive to those who have attempted to use the fund by living on unemployment insurance during the winter months when conceivably they could find work.

In respect of merit rating, I can only suggest to members of the House who want a good in depth explanation of merit rating and why I believe it is logical and valid that they might read the speech of the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), at least that part of the speech where he was honest in his approach and not trying to be politically expedient and all things to all people. At least in respect of merit rating, he expressed his true philosophy as did the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) today who indicated that merit rating will penalize, if you want to use that word, certain industries which in the past have taken advantage of unemployment insurance to subsidize their work force, keeping it immobile and having it ready, willing and able to work whenever the need is felt.

I am thinking particularly of the construction industry. I have no apologies at all for the construction industry. Upon reflection, it is one which lobbies at every opportunity in this House of Commons against hours, against wages and against various standards. I do my best to accommodate them. I am not unaware of the problems they have and I also am not unaware of the fact that merit rating conceivably could place an added burden on the employers in the construction industry, but since merit rating is not to come in until 1974, 1975 and 1976 there will be ample opportunity in the interval to sit down with recognized employer groups to work out a suitable method of merit rating. We may possibly consider merit rating a construction firm against a construction industry, measuring its performance against the experience of other people in that particular industry rather than industry in depth. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the House for its courtesy.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, before you see that the clock is slightly in the vicinity of six o'clock, I wonder if I could ask the Parliamentary Secretary if he would confirm the arrangement I made with the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) that tomorrow we will deal with the Yukon Minerals Bill.

Mr. Jerome: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. We propose to call, as the first order of government business tomorrow, the Yukon Minerals Bill and presumably there would be further discussion tomorrow concerning whether we would continue with that item on Friday or go on to the legislation in respect of the Labour Standards Code.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow. I take this opportunity to wish hon. members a very quiet, enjoyable evening and a good night's sleep. I remind them that such benefits are not guaranteed by any paid insurance scheme.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

YOUTH

STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE ON OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, on March 16, the Prime Minister made the following statement in the House of Commons:

[English]

We are saying, in effect, to the youth of Canada that we are impressed by their desire to fight pollution, that we believe they are well motivated in their concern for the disadvantaged; that we have confidence in their value system. We are also saying that we intend to challenge them to see if they have the stamina and the self-discipline to follow through on their criticism and advice.

[Translation]

Since the closing date for the submission of proposals under the Opportunities for Youth program, April 15, is now past, I should like to report briefly to the House on student response to the Prime Minister's challenge.

As you are aware, the Opportunities for Youth program for which $14.7 million have been allocated is but one aspect of the over-all 1971 summer employment program. As well, there are the traditional employment programs in the public service, the militia, travel and exchange, hostels and kiosks, language training and athletic scholarships which, in all, account for a total expenditure of $57.8 million. All these programs have been most favourably received and are well in progress.

It can be said without exaggerating that in every part of the country, in large urban centres and rural communities, young people have responded to Opportunities for Youth program with an enthusiasm, generosity and imagination which provide tangible and striking proof of the creative ability of the young generation and its desire to contribute to the economic and social development of our society.

To date, from all parts of Canada, we have received more than 8,600 proposals representing a total value of approximately $150 million. More than 148,000 jobs would be created by these projects if they could all be implemented. The vast majority of jobs, or 50,000, would be created in the province of Quebec through 2,485 schemes involving a cost of $59 million. Ontario follows closely with 2,900 proposals for the creation of 47,900 jobs at a cost of $40.8 million.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[English]

From British Columbia, 833 proposals were received for the creation of 14,000 jobs at a cost of $17.1 million. From the Prairies came 1,000 proposals for 14,600 jobs at a cost of $15.6 million, and from the Maritimes, 1,410 projects for 19,800 jobs at a cost of $17.2 million.

What are the students proposing? To offer rehabilitation services for blind children; to assist remote pockets of the population which have little or no access to medical and dental care or to the social services available in major centres; to undertake community development projects which would be unprofitable for the private or public sector; to conduct scientific or sociological research designed to produce immediate benefits to the community; to establish contact with the disadvantaged segments of the population, elderly persons and transient youth to encourage them to take part in examining and solving their own problems.

Several proposals are of a cultural nature. Theatre companies will perform in remote areas. Several young people will organize workshops to enable persons who do not normally have access to the visual arts to become acquainted with this field.

There is something contagious about the idealism of youth. Nevertheless, if public funds are to be used to meet this idealism, a number of government requirements must be satisfied.

As you are aware, by the criteria established for the program, proposals which do not involve sufficient student participation or represent merely a financial extension of provincial or municipal services may not be approved; also excluded are profit-oriented schemes and projects which would benefit only those whom they would employ, etc. Each project is carefully assessed and will be approved only if we are sufficiently assured of its successful implementation.

The Opportunities for Youth Secretariat which is responsible for the study of all project applications presents its recommendations to a committee of senior officials of my department. Before any decision is taken, provincial and municipal governments concerned are consulted as well as other federal departments to establish the validity and viability of projects. Finally, a federal interdepartmental committee oversees the program to ensure that it is carried out in accordance with the criteria established and announced earlier by the government.

Despite the size of the demand and the value of the projects, the government must pick and choose. Beginning next week, authors of the proposals will be informed of decisions reached, a process which will continue to mid-May so that all projects may be fairly and equally assessed. Some persons have doubted the students ability to respond in time to the Prime Minister's challenge. The number of applications belies that suggestion. I wish to assure all those who have taken up the challenge that the government on its side will respond to their requests in good time.

[Translation]

Finally, one thing is certain, Mr. Speaker. Because of the very nature of the program, what government support is enabling young people to accomplish will not reduce the level of employment in other sectors of the labour market.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State, in concluding his remarks dealing with the Opportunities for Youth program, said that some persons have doubted the students ability to respond. I think he might well have indicated that one of the chief persons who seemed to express doubt, though perhaps in a subtle way, was the Prime Minister himself in the remarks he made on March 16. Perhaps the minister himself has also been surprised by the degree to which young people from all across the country have responded. But I can say for members on this side of the House that we have never doubted the capacity, interest or ability of youth to respond.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): With the kind of response that the Secretary of State has indicated this afternoon, I believe we have been fully justified in that faith. The question that will be asked today and in succeeding days as this program is implemented is whether the faith of the young people in their government will be justified.

I am afraid that in the remarks of the Secretary of State this afternoon little has been said to relieve the growing fears and apprehensions that many, if not most, of the young people who willingly accepted that the government was acting in good faith when this program was announced will soon be receiving their pink, red or green slips in the mail telling them that their projects will not be accepted.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): For days and weeks members on this side of the House have been asking for a clear statement of the criteria and objectives to be used with regard to this program. One would have expected, in fact, that the Secretary of State, who is a reasonable and intelligent individual—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —would not risk the public embarrassment that he has obviously brought upon himself this afternoon by making this kind of presentation without in effect saying to the young people of the country: Here is the basis on which we plan to deal with the Opportunities for Youth program. Instead, what has he given us? He has given us three negative criteria. I will not repeat them; they are in the minister's statement. But he said nothing to answer the essential questions related to the growing problem of unemployment and student unemployment across the country, nothing related to the criteria of regional need, nothing related to the problems of the individual financial need of students, nothing related to the whole question of initiative which was referred to earlier by the minister in charge of housing, nothing with regard to the format of organizations that might be submitting projects, and nothing with regard to the size of projects, the amount of money to be expended and the size of salaries. The list goes on and on. In effect the Secretary of State this afternoon has offered no direction and no understanding to the young people of this country. One is led to believe that in the final analysis the decisions that will be made will not be made on the basis of any kind of criteria but will be made mostly on the basis of influence and accident. That is not good enough for this kind of program.

We have heard far too many reports, since a special staff was assigned to look after this program, of pure and simple administrative chaos. Members who have had the opportunity to visit the staff working on this program and who have perhaps been in the unfortunate position of trying to contact them by telephone, which I am told is almost an impossible exercise, know that there is extreme disorder in the administration of this plan which was brought in far too late to be implemented with any kind of effectiveness. In addition, seemingly the government has taken positions that make absolutely no sense in light of the large number of students who desperately need work this summer. The decision that none of the money awarded through this program can in any way be related to gainful employment or to profit seems totally stupid when one realizes that if the $15 million allocated for the Opportunities for Youth program had been used in many instances as seed money, as it could well have been because we have heard of some projects submitted on that basis, it could have a ripple effect that would have provided $50 million or even $70 million worth of employment for students this summer.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The Secretary of State told us that the requests submitted amount to some $150 million in terms of forecast expenditures, but he has not answered the basic question of just how much beyond the original allocated amount of $15 million the government is prepared to go. A few days ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in the House that there might be some possibility of using money from other programs in the $57 million allocation, but anyone who thinks about that answer must realize we will only know if that money is available at the end of the summer, not now when money must be available if projects are to be implemented.

I believe we are faced with a most serious situation in this country and it will become increasingly serious as we realize how little the government is prepared to implement the program it announced a little more than a month ago.

The Secretary of State this afternoon quoted the Prime Minister as follows:

> We are also saying that we intend to challenge them—
>
> The young people,
> —to see if they have the stamina and the self-discipline to follow through on their criticism and advice.

Mr. Speaker, I think that phrase of the Prime Minister must now be turned toward him. If I may say it directly to him, I would say that the young people are now saying to you, Mr. Prime Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to tell the hon. member that he cannot say that, and at the same time I must remind him of the terms of Standing Order 15 which allow an hon. member to comment briefly on a ministerial statement. I think the hon. member is exceeding the limitations prescribed by the Standing Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to trespass on the good nature of the Chair.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I presume that your interpretation of "brief" and mine may be somewhat different. To conclude, I would simply say that the young people are saying to the Prime Minister, in his own words, that they have the stamina and the self-discipline. They have accepted the challenge in very large measure, and now they want to see if he has the stamina, if he has the intestinal fortitude, to follow through on their suggestions and their advice. If there is not a response adequate to meet the obvious interest and enthusiasm of young people, if indeed the government has added to the cynicism of youth about its governments, then if there is unrest and disillusionment, even violence on the part of young people this summer—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Irresponsible.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —Mr. Speaker, then we will all know—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —who it is—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must call on the hon. member to extend a measure of co-operation to the Chair. He knows that according to the Standing Order his comments must be brief. I realize it is difficult to determine what "brief" means, that "brief" is a relative term and that the hon. member's standards may be different from those of the Chair. But I would point out to him that there are other limitations and prescriptions provided in the Standing Order which the hon. member should keep in mind. I hope he will soon allow an opportunity to other hon. members representing other groups in the House to make their comments on the statement made by the minister.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I will simply conclude by saying that if the government is not able to respond in a positive and generous way to this initiative of young people they will know who to blame.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased to have the minister's statement because it gives us some indication of the current situation regarding the long-delayed Opportunities for Youth program for student employment this summer. We are extremely pleased at the response of students and young people across Canada to the kind of opportunities and challenges that were placed before them. We agree that they should be congratulated on this score. The young people of Canada have demonstrated once again that they possess initiative and imagination. We do not agree, however, that the government should share in the congratulations. I say this, Mr. Speaker, because if the youth of Canada have made the kind of response that has oversubscribed the budget ten times, then it is incumbent upon the government to respond in turn to the students.

The only reason there has not been an even greater response by youth is the long delay of the government in revealing any kind of program at all. There is nothing in the total program, Mr. Speaker, to have prevented the government announcing it in December. If it had been announced then instead of late in March, giving students and young people less than a month to apply, certainly we could have had orderly and thoughtful discussion and evaluation of particular projects. We would not have encountered the chaotic conditions faced by the Opportunities for Youth office today with a veritable Everest of applications. Obviously the delay on the part of the government and the consequent rush of applications is bound to cause chaotic conditions, is bound to cause wastefulness and is bound to cause some projects requiring a great deal of thought to be applied for without sufficient study of their implications.

While $15 million sounds very generous, we should put this amount in its proper perspective. At the most, $15 million will provide 15,000 students with $1,000 each to go back to university, but we all know that the average cost of attending university is approximately $1,500 a year. We should recognize too, Mr. Speaker, that 990,000 students, nearly a million, will be looking for work as soon as universities and the senior grades of high school finish their terms.

I have been approached to assist on student projects, Mr. Speaker, and I advised the applicants that the forms would be available at Canada Manpower offices. But five days after the announcement by the government no forms were available at Canada Manpower offices on the Pacific coast.

We in the NDP are concerned that some very worthwhile projects have been turned down and we are concerned that there has not been enough time for proper assessment. We would urge the government to make certain that project announcements are made early in another year. We know that some of the YMCA projects such as Echo 71 have been turned down and this was a vital and well thought-out project.

Mr. Speaker, we also fear, as do the other opposition parties, that perhaps a good deal of the money will go to the wise boys on the inside, those who have the inside track. I do not think, with the kind of procedure we have seen this year and the kind of rush to award hush money for kids, that we can seriously expect anything else.

• (2:30 p.m.)

I conclude by saying that the students have responded magnificently. We knew that they would respond and that they would respond imaginatively and with a great deal of initiative. Will the government please consider responding, in its turn, to the students?

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) is a joker. He mentions certain words which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said last March 16, and I quote:

—that we believe that they are well motivated in their concern for the disadvantaged;—

That is true!

—that we have confidence in their system of values.

Mr. Speaker, I need hardly say that these remarks recalled by the hon. Secretary of State are correct. But it is just as true that the system of values of students and young people is not that of the government, and the proof is on page 3 of the press release of the hon. Secretary of State, and I quote:

There is something contagious about the idealism of youth.

How marvelous!

Nevertheless, if public funds are to be used to meet this idealism, a number of government requirements must be satisfied.

Well, what are those government requirements? The Prime Minister has said that young people have an excellent scale of values but the policy of the government consists in asking them to initiate projects, to show enthusiasm and generosity. Besides, that is exactly what they do. The government has been unable to create any jobs since it came to power whereas our young people have found 148,000 within three weeks. That is not where the problem is. It is in the financing.

[Translation]

I should not like to take up the House's time unduly, but a remark of paramount importance must be made. The total Opportunities for Youth program budget is $14.7 million, of which $5 million is to be attributed to the province of Quebec. Now, Quebec students have submitted more than 2,485 projects. And how much is available to meet these needs? Five million dollars?

It means that the government, when indulging in propaganda pandering to public opinion was merely performing a farce. It means that the budget established by the government curbs the enthusiasm, the generosity and the initiative of young people who must continue tightening their belts, since it attributes only $2,200 for the implementation of each project in Quebec.

[Mr. Rose.]

The amounts allocated to projects from other provinces are just as ridiculous. This is absolutely unfair. It is a farce that cannot be tolerated.

There is a problem in the field of employment in Canada; young people are quite willing to help build their country, to help fight pollution and to dedicate themselves body and soul to this task. But after two pages of political gags, the government sets a limit, as stated at the top of the third page of the ministers statement. Despite the quality of the projects, the generosity of our young people and the obvious needs, some limit will have to be established because of other government requirements.

In the very first pages of its statement, why has the government sought to amuse the public by pointing out the existence of a so-called jurisdictional conflict between Quebec and Ottawa, if it was not to make them forget the financial limits it was imposing?

In our view, it is dishonest, on the one hand, to create enthusiasm and to appeal to the generosity of our young people, and, on the other hand, to strangle this enthusiasm, to dilute their efforts and to prevent them from making any progress.

That is the same as saying—even if this brings a smile to the faces of some government members—that Canada's number one problem has nothing to do with need, labour, ideas, enthusiasm nor generosity. It cannot be said that young people do not love their country, but they are smothered by the lack of financial means because the government systematically refuses to make them available. The government not only does a disservice to those young people but it deludes them, since it is in the pay of financiers.

This is why I say that this statement is nothing but a clever political scheme and a foul trick, because the minister is a joker.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

TRIBUTES TO LEADER OF NEW DEMOCRATIC PARTY ON RETIREMENT—SUSPENSION OF EVENING SITTING

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a suggestion to the House in connection with the sitting later today. As a prelude to that suggestion I should like to draw to the attention of the House that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), the Leader of the New Democratic Party, will be honoured tonight in Ottawa by his followers who are meeting in this city to choose a successor to the distinguished gentleman.

While many of us will be absentee well-wishers, it is still worth mentioning that this recognition of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is well deserved because of his long service to this House, interrupted by very long service as premier of Saskatchewan, and because of the service that he has rendered to the country as a party leader. We want him to know as he is basking in the glow of congratulatory comments tonight that we also acknowledge the contribution he has made, that we are aware that even though he will not be leader of his party next week he will still continue to be a member of the House, and that we shall look forward to hearing his witty and incisive contributions to the debates of the House. We want to assure him that he has earned that special place in the House of Commons that comes to very few people in the service of the House.

With that introduction I am sure I have convinced the House that it would be appropriate to suspend the sitting of the House tonight so that the members of the New Democratic Party can attend and so that we can privately celebrate this occasion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: But since I still wish to gain a little bit of time for government business from this act of generosity, may I suggest that we consider government business from five o'clock to six o'clock and that we suspend the sitting for the rest of the day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the House leader of my party suggested that since I have known Tommy Douglas for so many years I might say a few words. I join with the government House leader in supporting the tentative motion that he has placed before the House. Seldom have I been able to speak in such unqualified terms in support of his views as I am on this occasion.

• (2:40 p.m.)

The wonderful thing about the House of Commons is that we sit here from day to day and get to know each other. With only 18 feet separating us, we develop that appreciation of the Parliamentary system that on occasions such as this sweeps aside every suggestion of partisanship.

One of the greatest parliamentarians, Sir Winston Churchill, had one political opponent who in debate it was said he feared above all others, Aneuran Bevan, the incomparable, a man with not Scottish but Welsh incisive wit. He passed away rather suddenly. Sir Winston was approached by his chief secretary who proposed that Sir Winston should say what was in his heart of hearts concerning his political adversary. The relationship between Sir Winston and Nye Bevan had never been of the very best. The press wanted to know what Sir Winston really thought of Nye Bevan. When asked, he said "Are you sure he is dead?" In that reply there was no bitterness or invective. There was simply a tremendous tribute.

I have known Tommy Douglas since 1935. I remember him in the House during the dark days of the early 1940's. He was here until he relinquished his position as a member of the House of Commons to become leader of his party in the province of Saskatchewan in 1944. For 17 years he was the premier of that province. He then decided that he should come back to the House of Commons and we have had him here for nine or ten years. His has been a remarkable record.

Mr. Douglas is an outstanding debater, a man with a sense of humour that has always denied vindictiveness, however strongly he has expressed himself, an admirable exponent of that parliamentary system to which you and I, Mr. Speaker, and members in all parts of the House give their allegiance.

He will be 67 years of age later this year. It is a good thing he is not in Newfoundland, in view of the measure introduced in that province yesterday whereby all members of the legislature must be out at age 70. It has not been passed yet, but I have a strong feeling toward that legislation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. member has been a great crusader. I have often disagreed most strongly with him. I do not share his political philosophy, but this does not deny my uttering these words of appreciation for one who has given such devoted service to my province and this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) does not often accept my suggestions, but I have one to offer him now. As a member of the Privy Council of Canada and as one of the three surviving members of the Imperial Privy Council, the other two being the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent and the Right Hon. L. B. Pearson, I suggest, with that humility that an opposition member must at all times exhibit, that this House express its appreciation by having the NDP leader given the honour of membership in the Privy Council. For 17 years he was the premier of his province. All other premiers in 1967 were made members of Her Majesty's Privy Council. He deserves that recognition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, we join the hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) and the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) who spoke about the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) in laudatory and sincere terms.

Mr. Speaker, more than any other, our party has been able to appreciate the contribution made in the House by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, the leader of the New Democratic Party, since the members of our party and myself are seated close to him.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have the same knowledge nor as long a political experience as those who spoke before me, and as a member elected in 1968, I should say that I have always been much impressed by the gracious condescension and the constant concern the NDP leader showed towards new members whatever their party regarding their speeches and contribution in the House.

I often noticed that when a young member of any party is rising to take part in a debate in the House, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands remains in his place and listens to the whole speech. When the young member has concluded his speech, the worthy leader of the NDP, this great figure of Canadian politics will very often go and congratulate or tease him and also encourage him. Very often he will say to him as he said to me: "I do not share your views but if you continue in this course I am not likely to succeed in convincing you but you have many chances that I will not believe you either".

Mr. Speaker, this is a remarkable feature of his character which shows that the hon. member is not here simply to fight, but rather to defend a philosophy. And what gives us a great deal of joy today, it is to learn that even though he leaves the leadership of the New Democratic Party he will still work as a member of this House. And, in this regard, needless to say that we are convinced his participation in the business of the House will be most useful.

Therefore, we want to join our colleagues, both on the government and on the opposition sides, in extending to him our most sincere congratulations on his long and very brilliant career; we hope that all Canadian youths will follow the example which the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands set so brilliantly and with so much dignity for them.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the warmth of the tributes that have been paid to the leader of the New Democratic Party and in light of the story told by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), I feel I should assure the members of this House, and also the many New Democrats who are within the sound of our voices, that Tommy Douglas is not dead. Indeed, both on his behalf and on behalf of my colleagues I want to say a very warm word of thanks to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen), to the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) and to the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) for their very kind words concerning the contribution that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has made to the deliberations of this House and to the social progress of Canada during the past several decades. We who perhaps know him best—and I happen to have known him personally for 44 years—are very proud of what he has done. We feel that in that far off day when the story of Canada is written his name will be in the history books along with other names of which we are also very proud. I have in mind J. S. Woodsworth and M. J. Coldwell, his predecessors as leaders of this party.

• (2:50 p.m.)

All of this is about a proposal that the House adjourn at six o'clock today so that we can enjoy without inhibition the events of this evening. I hope that some members from other parties will join us because it will be a very enjoyable evening. We agree to adjourning at six o'clock, and I say to the Liberals that when their leader wants to step down we will do the same for them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the House will adjourn at six o'clock and that private members' hour will be dispensed with?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

OIL

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter requiring the urgent consideration of the House, namely, the failure of the government to construct a policy for presentation at the May 3 meeting with the United States on the TAPS oil tanker route as revealed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the House yesterday. Therefore I ask the unanimous consent of the House to consider the following motion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie):

That this House instruct the government to establish, as formal cabinet-wide policy, that Canada must be a formal party to the decision on the initiation of the TAPS tanker route and that at this time Canada refuses to give its support to the TAPS project because the research and analysis into the pollution risks in both Canada and the United States is both incomplete and unco-ordinated.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's motion is made under the terms of Standing Order 43 which requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN PETITIONS AND REPORTS THEREON TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Victor Forget (Saint-Michel) moved, seconded by Mr. H.-Pit Lessard (LaSalle):

That the petitions of Central Del Rio Oils Limited and Mic Mac Oils (1963) Ltd., tabled after the period stipulated by Standing Order 90, be referred to the Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills and Standing Orders, with the third report of the clerk of petitions presented to the House on Friday, April 2, 1971, in order that the committee might be able to make the recommendations it deems advisable.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the please of the House to adopt this motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ASSURANCE THAT MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT NOT KEPT UNDER SURVEILLANCE BY ELECTRONIC DEVICES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether he can give a simple guarantee to the House that there is presently no police or other government surveillance by electronic telephone devices or otherwise made or recorded in respect of Members of Parliament with regard to any aspect of the performance of their parliamentary duties?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Certainly not as members of parliament, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: Will the minister make a specific statement at this time that there will be no such surveillance made or carried on hereafter?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, not in the performance of their duties as members of parliament.

[English]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. In view of his replies earlier this week regarding the actual procedure in use in terms of granting authorization for the gathering of dossiers and the use of wiretapping and other surveillance procedures, would the minister be prepared to make a statement in order to clear up the considerable fears and uncertainties that have been created during the past few days?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, it might not be clear in the hon. member's mind, but should he refer to questions and answers I think he will find some logic in what I said.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a very precise supplementary to the Solicitor General.

Are hon. members' telephone lines on the Hill watched?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I think one can draw appropriate conclusions from the answers I have already given.

[English]

USE OF ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE DEVICES BY NATIONAL DEFENCE EMPLOYEES

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I would direct to the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister say whether in fact employees of his department are involved in any wiretapping that there may be and the use of any electronic devices of this nature? If so, is he involved in any decisions on whether or not wiretapping should take place?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can respond quite categorically to the second question by saying that I am not involved. While the Canadian Armed Forces are very versatile, I do not think that the capacity to wiretap is one of the qualities that they have.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister say categorically that no employees of his department are involved in any of this wiretapping?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, again I say quite categorically that I have not been involved in it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): If hon. members will please contain themselves, I know of no capacity of this kind, nor in fact whether there has ever been one in the department. However, I shall be glad to inquire.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order in regard to the answer given by the Solicitor General to the previous question whether or not telephones on Parliament Hill were or were not tapped. This matter is within your jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker. In my opinion the Solicitor General should not be permitted to say that this is none of our business and that we can check some of his replies. I take no objection to the question about the dossiers. I have had one for 20 years. If the RCMP want to know where I am going, they can phone me up and I will tell them.

My point of order is that the telephones on Parliament Hill fall within your jurisdiction, not within the jurisdiction of the RCMP. To be fair and factual to the House, the Solicitor General must reply in answer to that question that the RCMP have not tapped telephones on Parliament Hill; otherwise he is in contempt of Parliament and of every Member of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: I do not object to playing around with wiretapping, and the minister can be as flippant as he wishes in this regard, but I think this is a much more serious proposition. If someone should say that the RCMP had members of your staff or some such thing it would not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has sought the floor on a point of order. He has made his point of order and certainly it is well taken in that any activity on the Hill is a direct responsibility of hon. members, exercised through the Chair. There is no question whatsoever that if hon. members want to know if there is any such activity being conducted, an inquiry would have to be made, I assume through the Chair, in so far as the House of Commons is concerned. In this respect, I should think an inquiry should be directed in the usual way, according to the prescriptions of the Standing Orders and the practice of the House.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak to the point of order. At the time the Chair was occupied by your predecessor there was one such inquiry made, and during Your Honour's term another such inquiry was made. I am wondering whether I would be in order in asking that the results of both those inquiries be made known to members of the House and, since the matter has been raised again, that Your Honour undertake a further inquiry to ensure that this activity is not being conducted.

Mr. Speaker: The question is an interesting one, although it is not put in the usual way. We could get into rather odd and difficult situations if hon. members during the question period, whether on a point of order or a question of privilege, requested the Chair to undertake investigations. The hon. member is quite right when he says that inquiries were made. He is one of those who, some years ago, requested that such an inquiry be made, and that request was made in the appropriate way. In view of the fact that the matter has been raised by hon. members, and certainly in view of the fact that it is one of interest to hon. members on both sides of the House in all parties, I would certainly consider it my duty to look into the matter in the manner suggested by hon. members.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

ALLEGED BUGGING BY ELECTRONIC DEVICE OF RESIDENCE OF ST. JEAN-BAPTISTE SOCIETY OFFICIAL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Solicitor General—keeping in mind the answer he gave me last Tuesday—if he could state in this chamber that federal police has never bugged Mr. Cossette's residence in Repentigny and, should he answer in the negative, when will the RCMP be allowed to take possession of the device which has been inadvertantly misplaced in Mr. Cossette's home?

Mr. Speaker: It seems the hon. member is substantially reiterating a question which has been put a few days ago and I should point out that I do not remember exactly the answer given by the Minister at the time. If the hon. minister wishes to add something to his answer of last Tuesday, he may have the floor but it seems to me the hon. member is only repeating the question he already asked.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member seeking the floor on a question of privilege?

Mr. La Salle: I wish to remind the Chair that if I repeated the question it is because I have yet to receive a valid answer; I have been told that if someone happens to lose a pencil it is not the duty of the RCMP to go and pick it up; I wonder if the RCMP would not have lost a bug in Mr. Cossette's residence. If this were the case, I think the hon. minister would be in a position to answer my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member suggests he is not satisfied with the answer he received but I do not think he is entitled to ask the question anew.

The hon. member may rephrase his question at some other time if he seeks additional information. Even if the question has been put to the minister yesterday, I do not see why the hon. member should keep asking the same question as long as he does not get a satisfactory answer.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

KEEPING OF DOSSIERS ON MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—ACCURACY OF INFORMATION

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. In view of the increasing accumulation of these files and dossiers, I wonder whether he could indicate to the House what steps are taken to verify the accuracy of the information and to protect the rights of the individual who may not be aware that information is being accumulated about him which may not be entirely accurate?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, it seems that pretending there is a dossier or that electronic devices are being used in an office or an apartment becomes a question of social status. I reply to the hon. member that he must first tell me he is sure of having a dossier before being able to have a look at it.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will allow the hon. member the opportunity to ask a supplementary, but after that perhaps we might move on to the hon. member for Moose Jaw who has been patiently awaiting an opportunity to ask his question.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am sorry the Solicitor General misunderstood the import of my question. It is a well known fact that one branch of the RCMP has the special function of making and keeping these files. I am merely asking about the policy of his department. What assurance is there against a build-up of inaccurate information which could greatly prejudice the position of the individual involved?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I already said that there is no systematic policy to the effect that every member would have a dossier. There is none either to the effect that every union leader in Canada would have one.

YOUTH

SUMMER LANGUAGE PROGRAM—DECISION AS TO ADMINISTRATION

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. In view of the minister's statement today concerning the Opportunities for Youth program, or the results of that program, and in light of the fact that universities have closed or will be closing at the end of this month, can the minister say whether there has been a final decision as to who will administer the second language exchange program involving 2,500 students?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I know what the language exchange program is. I know of no program by that particular name. It might be bursaries for the study of a second language or the member might be referring to the travel and exchange program. There exists no such thing as a language exchange program. Therefore I do not know exactly what the hon. member is talking about.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, the phrase I used was "the second language exchange program" as referred to by the minister in Winnipeg when he announced the Opportunities for Youth program. If he is not aware of what I am referring to, perhaps he could indicate whether there has been any determination as to who will administer the program involving 2,500 students inasmuch as there has been no decision up to this time regarding how they should apply or who will accept applications.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Once again, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the hon. member means by a "language exchange program" which would involve 2,500 students. In fact, there are exchange travels through Canada which involve about this number of people and there are language courses which concern only 1,500 people.

The announcement I made dealt with one or the other of these programs. If, then, these are language courses, they are administered in co-operation with the Canadian council of education ministers; the travel exchanges are directly administered by the Secretary of State.

AGRICULTURE

EFFECTS OF ALLEGED MILK SHORTAGE ON EXPORT OF CHEESE

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

I wonder whether he could tell us what steps the government intends to take to fight the current milk shortage which is jeopardizing our cheese exports to Great Britain?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is not an over-all shortage of milk, although there may be some temporary or local shortages. I can advise the hon. member that we have been producing sufficient cheese to meet all of the markets with the exception of those we have had to subsidize very heavily.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall be happy to look into the matter.

GRAIN

WHEAT—CLOSING OF 1969-70 POOL ACCOUNT—FINAL PAYMENT—INTERIM BARLEY PAYMENT

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Can the minister indicate whether the pool account for wheat for the 1969-70 crop year has been closed out yet by the Canadian Wheat Board? Can he indicate also whether there will be a final payment on wheat for 1969-70 and when it will be in the hands of the farmers?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the pool account referred to by the hon. member has not yet been closed, but the closing is fairly imminent. Of course, the exact financial state of the account will be reported to the House in due course after the closing.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary in respect of the operations of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that it is almost two months since the announcement of the interim barley payment, can the minister also indicate if all payments are now in the hands of farmers? I ask this question because I understand some payments have just gone out within the past few days.

Mr. Lang: I shall be glad to ascertain for the hon. member whether, in fact, all payments have now gone out.

AGRICULTURE

APPLES AND BEEF—RESTRICTION OF IMPORTS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture which I ask on behalf of the apple and beef producers of Canada. Because of the severe hardship being caused by the importation of cheap beef from Australia and New Zealand, and also apples, would the government take action immediately to place restrictions on these unwarranted imports?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speakin so far as apples are concerned, there have been a number of interdepartmental committee meetings with representatives of the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Finance, the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Trade and Commerce and so on. I am sure the hon. member is aware of an offer we have made to deal with part of this problem through the Agricultural Stabilization Board. So far as beef is concerned, I cannot agree that the imports of beef have had a detrimental effect on the market within Canada, because what is coming in is of a kind and quality in respect of which there is insufficient production in Canada to meet the demand.

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR AID BY CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of National Defence.

Hon. Donald S. Would the minister tell the House whether or not that inquiry has been completed?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I was awaiting the question to again give the reply. The inquiry has been completed. I have received a verbal report. Nothing abnormal has been found, despite the allegations that were published by some newspapers and the absence of any anomaly is confirmed by the fact that the Auditor General of Canada has since examined that administration and found nothing abnormal.

POTATOES—REQUEST BY PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND NEW BRUNSWICK FOR ASSISTANCE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Hon. H. A. HOGS—FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE BECAUSE OF DEPRESSED PRICES

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in view of the continuing decline in the market price of hogs and the hardship this is causing hog producers, may I ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he has given serious consideration to taking such action as is necessary to ensure that moneys will be paid out of the agricultural prices support fund to give assistance to these farmers during this crisis period?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as I have replied to the hon. member a number of times, we are required under the Agricultural Stabilization Act to support the price of hogs at 80 per cent of the ten-year moving average. When we did the calculations for 1970 the amount for that year was substantially higher than 80 per cent of the ten-year moving average. I am sure that when we get to 1971 the calculations will be somewhat different because in the early part of 1970 hog prices were still relatively high. But when we reach the stage at which we do these calculations we have an obligation under the act.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question on behalf of those hog producers who may not survive until 1971. Would the minister consider calling together the advisory committee of the Agricultural Prices Support Board to see if it can give him some advice which would enable him to take some action?

Mr. Olson: There was a meeting of that advisory board within the last three weeks, I believe.

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. Will no further calculations be made in respect of the price received for hogs across Canada with regard to the subsidy payment until after the year 1971 is complete?

Mr. Olson: No, Mr. Speaker. I did not say at the end of the calendar year. I said at the end of the year when we normally make these calculations. I should like to have an opportunity to correct this after checking with my officials, but I believe that in the calculating of hog prices we do this from September to the next September.

GRAIN

RAPESEED AND FLAXSEED—OPENING OF VANCOUVER FUTURES MARKET—PROTESTS AGAINST INCLUSION UNDER WHEAT BOARD

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. It has to do with the inclusion of rapeseed in the bill which has received first reading and is now before the House. Will the minister advise the House whether or not the futures market in Vancouver in connection with flaxseed, rapeseed and the like has now been opened? Will he also say whether in the last 24 hours messages have been received by the government and/or the Wheat Board from major importers in Japan taking strong objection to the inclusion of rapeseed under the Wheat Board and preferring the futures system in order to permit them to fix their requirements and, in particular, to meet the competition of soya beans and the like?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I know of no messages from our buyers in connection with the Canadian Wheat Board Act, although any messages may simply have not come to my attention yet. As indicated yesterday, there is certainly no intention to make such a decision to change the marketing without full consultation.

On the question of the futures market, I have been informed that the Winnipeg Grain Exchange is now satisfied with the arrangements which have been made or are being proposed to be made in Vancouver to allow for the exchange of paper in connection with rapeseed, and accordingly they have decided not to discontinue the Vancouver futures. There were certainly representations from our buyers abroad in connection with this futures market, but they will of course be extremely pleased that the net result of the action which has been taken will be to improve the futures market operation in regard to Vancouver futures.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I ask the minister—I do not often ask a question unless I know the answer but on this occasion I do not know the answer—whether the rapeseed marketing committee has reported?

Mr. Lang: The oilseeds marketing committee filed a report with the government some time ago, but it led to the opening of some additional questions in connection with the marketing of oilseeds and further work was invited in connection with those questions. I have not yet received the final report in regard to that further work.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In so far as the interim, not the final, report is concerned, did that report recommend that flaxseed, rapeseed and the like should come within the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board? If not, why has the government suddenly decided to ask for this legislation?

Mr. Lang: The first report from the committee, which was in the nature of a final report but upon which they were asked to do further work, recommended that appropriate information about the advantages of the different systems of marketing rapeseed be obtained and be presented in full to producers and that a plebiscite be held among producers to determine their choice of the form of marketing. The further work being done is, in fact, in connection with the information required.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will there be a plebiscite?

RAPESEED—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRICING AND MARKETING

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly asked the minister in charge of the Wheat Board for information in connection with the operation of the futures market for rapeseed at Vancouver. May I now ask the minister whether he will soon make a statement on motions informing the House as to what is actually taking place in the pricing and marketing of rapeseed through the futures market at Vancouver?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I will give consideration to doing that, although I think the basic information is available on request from the Grain Exchange itself. I must say I have been working very closely with the Grain Exchange. I appreciate very much their co-operation and interest in trying to improve the futures market and the results for the farmers and producers of rapeseed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair feels that perhaps we should go on to another subject, but since the hon. member for Lisgar has been waiting for an opportunity to ask a supplementary question, perhaps he might be recognized for that purpose.

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE ON MARKETING OF RAPESEED FROM PRODUCERS AND OTHERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): I should like to direct this question also to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Would he be prepared to table in the House the contents of the many telegrams and telexes he will be receiving from the producers, exporting agencies and countries in Asia because of the dramatic effect that the government's actions have had on the rapeseed industry in Canada?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): I do not know that I can table the correspondence that relates to the item referred to by the hon. member, since I think most of the correspondence received to date has related to actions taken by the grain exchanges rather than by the government. But I see no particular objection to tabling a good deal of this correspondence.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—INCREASE IN AMOUNT OF MONEY ALLOCATED

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): I have a question for the Secretary of State arising out of his statement earlier today that applications for the $15 million Opportunities for Youth program now total $150 million. Is consideration being given to increasing the $15 million available?

COMMUNICATIONS

BUILDING OF SECOND GENERATION DOMESTIC SATELLITES BY CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is for the Minister of Communications. Has the Department of Communications come to the conclusion that Canadian industry will not be able to build the second generation of domestic communication satellites but instead will limit itself to supplying parts for these satellites as in the case of the building of the Anik satellite?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): No, Mr. Speaker. Such decisions are seven or eight years away.

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the brilliant achievement of the Canadian industry in building the Alouette series of four satellites, a program that was commenced in 1958 and completed just three weeks ago at Vandenberg satellite launching base under the title of Isis II, at which both the minister and I were present, will he now give the assurance to the Canadian industry that it will be given the opportunity to continue its achievements in building the communications technology satellite?

Mr. Kierans: No one in Canada has any doubt at all about the technological capacity of the Canadian industry, especially in the field of satellites. The problem would then become one of the economic and marketing risks of constructing whole satellite systems, and those are economic decisions that can only be taken at the particular time and in the particular circumstances.

FISHERIES

SWORDFISH—ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN BECAUSE OF POLLUTION

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I had a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry, who was in the House but who has now left the chamber. In his absence, I will direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the serious economic problems that are faced by swordfishermen in Atlantic Canada as a result of the arbitrary regulation concerning the mercury content in swordfish, has the government developed a program to date which will be helpful to the fishermen formerly involved in this industry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take notice of the question, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

TORONTO—FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN METRO CENTRE COMPLEX

Mr. S. Perry Ryan (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing and urban affairs. Is the government participating in the planning, financing or intended occupation of the CNR-CPR complex known as Metro Centre in Toronto at the present time?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): We have had no formal discussions with or approaches by the people more directly involved in that project and consequently there is no direct financial involvement through that medium at this time.

Mr. Ryan: Is future participation expected?

Mr. Andras: We have had no proposals, so I would have difficulty in responding to that either positively or negatively. We will listen to any proposals they make within the areas where we have authority.

THE PRIME MINISTER

SUGGESTED VISIT TO PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Having in mind his scheduled trip to the Soviet Union and also Canada's improving trade and other relations with the People's Republic of China, would he give consideration to visiting the latter country as well as the former?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for missing the first part of the question but, so far as I understood it, I wish to say I am not giving consideration at the present time to travelling to any countries in an official way beyond next month's planned trip to the Soviet Union.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—REDUCTION OF ALLOCATIONS TO INDIVIDUAL PROJECTS TO COVER MORE PROGRAMS

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of state. Since it appears likely that many of the excellent and worth-while applications for grants under the Opportunities for Youth program may be approved in principle but ultimately rejected for lack of funds, will his department given consideration to trimming the financial allocation to individual projects so that the $15 million can be spread out to cover a larger number of student programs?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am not only prepared to consider such a proposal, but that is the spirit in which we are working and in which we select projects, except for some whose scope and very nature demand a given dimension and which cannot readily be subdivided. Clearly, we want to give the greatest possible number of groups the opportunity of undertaking projects.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, there are ongoing meetings between CMHC and the Newfoundland housing authority, which is the provincial government, with regard to escalating the quantity of shell housing, and many other innovative approaches. Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the whole decision with regard to the full complement of CF-5's will be made known when the white paper is tabled in the House. BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government house leader as to the business of the House for tomorrow and for all of next week? In his answer would he say if he has yet secured authorization from his colleagues as to when he may place on the order paper notice affecting the future of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act?

Mr. MacEachen: The next item of government business is the Yukon minerals legislation, followed by the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, the Farm Products Marketing Act, Bill C-176, and the Canada Wheat Board Act. In reply to the final question, I would like to advise the hon. member that when I do seek authority I am sure I will get it, but I have not sought that authority yet.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YUKON MINERALS ACT

ADMINISTRATION, ACQUISITION AND RECORDING OF CLAIMS, ETC.

The House resumed, from Friday, March 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-187, respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Nielsen (p. 4009).

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is exactly 48 days since the Yukon Mining Act was before the House and, on that occasion, I had gone about two thirds of the way through my speech so I welcome this opportunity to complete the remarks I was making at that time. It is rather difficult to join up the two sections of a speech after an interval of almost seven weeks, but the point I was making in the first part of my talk was that there is a desperate need for us to process more of our raw materials in our own country. While I do not have time to go over all the points I made about seven weeks ago, I intend to express my thoughts on what I feel we should be doing with the mineral resources so abundant in the more northern parts of Canada.

The philosophy of this government, it seems to me, is to make this nation of ours a supplier of raw materials for the markets of the world. It is true that some raw materials must always be sold, but we say it is time to slow down this type of economic development, which in the long run will do immense harm to various sections of Canada, and lay out long range plans for the establishment of industry in our country based on our abundant supplies of various raw materials.

I feel there is an obvious need to establish policies, legislation and administrative capability which will ensure that northern environments will be protected while they undergo mineral exploration and possible development. We must make certain that traditional renewable resources, such as the Arctic ecology, the wild life, and so on; are not wasted or desecrated in a search for wealth that may, in many areas, turn out to be futile. It is for this reason, especially in the north, that we must be extremely careful to preserve for future use the land and its ecology upon which the native people and the residents of the area may eventually be forced to depend for their livelihood. This is the reason we must know what is in the land use regulations and how they will ensure this protection. This is why members of our party and other groups have been urging the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) to introduce the land use regulations without delay. We must have them if we are to have a logical and sensible development of oil and mineral resources in the north without immense damage being done to the ecology there.

The record of the federal government in effectively promoting the integration of the native people in our north country into the expanding economic activity which is going on there is both tragic and disgraceful. Adequate plans have not been made to either protect the environment and the wildlife upon which many natives depend or to establish a basic economy which could offer them alternate employment.

Let us look at some facts in relation to the native or indigenous population in our Canadian north. This indigenous group includes the Indian, the Eskimo and the Métis groups. The total population of the north was about 43,000 in 1966; this includes both the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories. Of this total about 17 per cent of the total population in the Yukon and about 63 per cent of the total population in the Northwest Territories was in this indigenous group. The average for the combined territories was about 43 per cent. This means that of all the population in the north, 43 per cent belonged to the Indian, Eskimo or Métis groups.

In the mining industry, however, we find about 4½ per cent of the work force coming from the native inhabitants. This figure has absolutely no relationship to the percentage of the total population which natives form. In 1968, there were 11 operating mines in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, employing a total of 2,002 people. The total indigenous employment on these projects was 91 men, or 4½ per cent of the total. In the Yukon there were 28 out of a total of 820 and in the Northwest Territories 63 out of 1,182 men who were engaged in the mining industry.

There are reasons for this low employment rate, such as the lack of skills, and there is no doubt about that. Then, there is the fact that the employment agencies are centred in Vancouver and Edmonton. But these figures, however, show the dismal failure of federal policies as they relate to the native population and the percentage of employment we should expect them to get from the development of the resources in the land where they have lived for generations.

The Yukon area has always been noted for its mineral wealth and the exciting period of the gold rush in 1898 is well known to most Canadians. However, it is only within the past ten years that increasing attention has been paid to the rich storehouse of wealth in the territories. Prior to 1964, the average number of claims staked north of 60 totalled something below the figure of 6,000. During the next five years there were five major staking rushes, reaching a peak of 52,000 claims staked in 1968. This represented a tremendous level of activity in exploration and development. In the early 1960s the annual value of minerals produced in the north approximated $30 million. By 1969 this figure had increased to $153 million and there were 11 major mines in production. Many other large mineral deposits have been discovered and are now undergoing evaluation and feasibility studies. It is of interest to note, however, that 64 per cent of the value of minerals produced in the north in 1969 came from foreign-controlled enterprises.

Petroleum exploration activity built up gradually through the early 1960s and then gradually tapered off until the major discovery of Prudhoe Bay, Alaska. This discovery sparked an unprecedented acceleration in the search for oil in the Canadian north. An additional 250 million acres were quickly brought under exploration permits and early in 1970 we found over 440 million acres were under permit. This virtually blanketed the whole of the potential oil bearing formations in the north. Where there had been $32 million expended on oil exploration in 1965, it was estimated that $75 million would be spent during 1970. Eighteen exploratory wells were drilled in 1965, and 56 wells were drilled in 1969. The discovery of oil and gas in the Arctic by the Imperial Oil Company and Panarctic Oils is an indication that activity as far as oil exploration is concerned will continue and grow in the years ahead. However, it is again of interest to note that of the land held under petroleum exploration permit in northern Canada, 69 per cent is held by foreign controlled enterprises.

There is no doubt that the federal government has sparked the oil and mineral exploration which has gone on in the north. A number of federal incentive programs have been set up and many of them are certainly required. I would like to believe that all these incentives were designed to assist in the development of our mineral assets for our own use. This is why we should have more processing of these resources in our own country. All of the incentives to corporations to which I have referred have had some effect on northern development. They have been costly to the Canadian taxpayers. Again, I must point out, however, that the statistics show that about two-thirds of this northern development is being undertaken by foreign corporations. This means we are subsidizing foreign promoters and companies to come into this resource rich land and take their pick of the best minerals available. It is not too comforting to realize most of the processing is not done in our own country. Over 60 per cent of our mineral output is exported and with that export, of course, goes thousands of jobs needed by Canadians today.

There is no distinction made between foreign corporations and Canadian ones. Already more than 60 per cent of Canada's mining industry is owned or controlled by non-Canadian interests. We are therefore providing vast amounts of taxpayers' money in developing these resources, in providing incentive and tax exemption plans to encourage numerous foreign corporations to develop Canadian resources for export. Canadian are being deprived of jobs which could be provided by the processing of minerals in this country. Canada is then forced into the position of re-importing the finished products at higher prices.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is time thoughtful Canadians began to look at the whole approach of government to resource development. We are gradually losing economic control of our country. We are gradually losing economic control of our vast stores of natural resources. Regardless of what individuals say, once you lose the economic control of your country, you lose political control. This is the position in which we find our country today, Mr. Speaker, and it is high time Canadians in every walk of life began to demand that the government take measures to restore this economic control to Canadians. At the same time, our people should insist that there be a major change in economic policy as far as the processing of raw materials is concerned. Far more of this processing must be done in our nation. It is in the processing of raw materials that the real job producing possibilities lie.

Canada has the raw materials. It has the workers. It has the educational and the technical skills. Yes, it also has the capital with which to start an accelerated program for this type of development. If this Liberal government is unwilling to move along these lines, then the people of Canada should turn them out of office and call for a new approach to the solving of unemployment and the stabilizing of industry in our nation. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in the bill before us there should be a clause which should insist upon the processing in Canada, preferably in the Yukon Territory itself, of all the minerals mined in that area. I urge that the members of this House study this proposal and make amendments to the legislation before us which will at least give us a start in this direction.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on Bill C-187, an act respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory, I think it is important to examine the climate for investment in the Yukon. I am speaking, of course, of climate in its broadest sense, that is, social, economic and political. In attempting to come to an understanding of the government's policy concerning the political climate for the development of our natural resources in the Yukon Territory, I should like to draw to the attention of all hon. members some very interesting remarks on this subject which were made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) at the 1971 symposium on "Petroleum Economics and Evaluation", sponsored by the Dallas section of the Society of Petroleum Engineers, to whom the hon. minister spoke on Tuesday, March 9, 1971.

The minister's office was, of course, kind enough to issue a press release of his remarks and I should like to quote from a paragraph on page 5:

> For over a century, Canada has avoided establishing barriers to the flow of this investment, except in certain limited fields, and has offered a stable environment for investment. This investment, of course, must operate within controls which protect legitimate Canadian interests. At the present time, some Canadians are asking themselves if there are ways of increasing their own investments in their own economy, or if the present controls are adequately protecting Canadian interests. The point I want to emphasize to you today is that foreign capital need not fear such questioning, for we will remain an open country seeking positive, not negative, answers to these questions.

That particular quotation ends here, Mr. Speaker. However, I should like also to quote a remark made earlier in the same speech:

> We will continue to require large amounts of capital to maintain our pace of development and expansion. While much of this investment will come from within Canada, a significant part of it will have to come from outside our country.

The remarks which I have quoted, which were made by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, would, I think, lead any reasonable person to conclude that Canada was seeking and welcoming foreign investment as a means of developing our vast natural resources since this appears to be, as indeed the minister clearly suggested, beyond the present capacity of Canadians themselves.

Notwithstanding the very forthright encouragement and invitation to Americans in particular to continue their participation in the development of our natural resources, the same minister, when addressing this House on second reading of Bill C-187 in the same month of March, had this to say regarding non-Canadian participation in the development of the mineral resources in the Yukon Territory:

> Mr. Speaker, regarding Canadian ownership and participation requirements, you will note that such provisions are being included in the new act. This will ensure that new mines in the Yukon meet reasonable requirements of Canadian ownership.

The quotation ends here, Mr. Speaker. It is interesting to note, in contrast with the minister's speech in Dallas, just what he regards as "reasonable requirements of Canadian ownership". The proposed act, unlike the existing act, introduces Canadian ownership requirements which in effect state that a lease to mineral rights can be granted only to a Canadian citizen or to a corporation incorporated in Canada, and that 50 per cent of the outstanding shares of such corporations must be issued and beneficially owned by Canadian citizens or other such Canadian corporations. While this stipulation does not apply to leases and claims existing prior to the date on which this new act may come into effect, it nevertheless effectively discourages any future development of such existing claims or leases by foreign corporations or the development of new claims or leases by them. While it is possible for a company to circumvent the 50 per cent

Canadian ownership requirement by becoming a public corporation, some firms are forbidden to become a public corporation until they have satisfied certain prior commitments to their original shareholders. Indeed, this is the situation of Anvil Mines, the largest mine in the Yukon.

While I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is bilingual, I do not think that he should speak two different languages on the important matter of the development of our natural and national resources. In his speech in Dallas, he certainly gave unbridled encouragement to outside parties to come and participate financially and technically in the development of our resources. However, in the same month the same minister spoke about foreign participation in the development of the Yukon's natural resources in quite different language. In contrast to his remarks in Dallas, he advocated clear and strong measures, the practical effect of which for the Yukon will be that foreign investment will seek out other provinces, such as British Columbia, which do not have such hostile impediments to the development of their mineral resources.

I think, Mr. Speaker, we have seen what the political climate is in relation to the proposed Yukon Minerals act and that climate is not inviting. I should like now to say a few words concerning the economic climate of the Yukon. Mining has always been an endeavour for the hardy and the courageous. The Yukon requires these qualities in perhaps larger measure than elsewhere because of its remoteness, its long and deterring winters and the great practical as well as natural obstacles which have to be surmounted in order for a venture as uncertain as mining to be successful. The economic requirements for mineral development in the Yukon can only be described as stupendous.

To give hon. members a concrete example of the level of capital which is required to develop a mineral resource in the Yukon, I should like to quote from the experience of Anvil Mining Corporation Limited, a company incorporated under the laws of British Columbia, which operates an open pit lead-zinc mine and concentrator in the Yukon Territory about 130 air miles north and east of Whitehorse. Anvil Mining Corporation employs some 360 workers and supervisors and has just completed its first year of operations. It has invested in excess of $120 million in its mining operations in the Yukon Territory and has yet to realize a profit from its investment, although the outlook for this is exceedingly favourable, at least under the present act. This company is 60 per cent owned by a United States corporation; without this financial participation it may well be that this particular venture could never have been started.

It is estimated that in 1970 the mining industry in the Yukon accounted for over 50 per cent of the economy's output. Perhaps as much as three quarters of the work force of the Yukon is employed either directly or indirectly in the mining industry. I submit that the economy of Canada, to say nothing about the economy of the Yukon Territory, is already suffering from sufficient ills and anxieties to preclude additional ones being introduced. I submit that the government ought not now to be considering restrictive measures against foreign participation in the economy of the Yukon and increased royalties on the mining industry, while at the same time continuing to hold over the heads of potential investors the uncertainties of the government's new taxation measures which, on the basis of the thinking evidenced in this bill and on the government's recent actions, will only aggravate the economic problems of the Yukon.

The government, with its army of economists and other advisers, should know that under the best of conditions it would be a challenging task to attract all of the capital which this country needs to develop an area so remote and costly to develop as the Yukon. The economic climate of the Yukon is such that it cannot afford to sustain the vagaries, inconsistencies and ill-considered proposals that are advocated in this proposed legislation. The social and cultural development of the Yukon is inevitably affected by its economic climate which, in turn, is governed by the political climate set by the government of the day. There are, I submit, Mr. Speaker, great hardships in this proposed legislation. I am confident that these will be dealt with at length by other members of my party.

I should like, for the moment, to remind all hon. members that the Yukon is in a particularly vulnerable position, perhaps even a defenceless one, when we remember that it is a territory as opposed to a province. As such, it is lacking some of the means by which a province would resist the measures which are proposed in this bill. I believe, however, that because of the precarious conditions which do exist, the government is under a special obligation not to treat the Yukon as a ward of the state, but rather should remember that governmental policies which do not promote full political, economic and social development in any region of our country must inevitably be self-destructive.

The proposed legislation gives us grave cause to question the government's wisdom and intentions. Let us remember that in June of 1967 the government and the mining industry held extensive discussions in Ottawa regarding what should be included in a new act. The mining industry came away from this conference having reached a consensus with the government. However, it is interesting to note what they now say. I would like to quote briefly from their submission to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On page one of their brief, the Yukon Chamber of Mines states and I quote:

> The Chamber is profoundly disturbed, however, that the government has taken the opportunity since the consensus reached in 1967, to drastically alter the basic philosophy of the legislation on a number of key points to the serious detriment of the mineral industry and hence to the detriment of the economy of Yukon residents.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the act which is before us for consideration should show greater evidence of more equitable treatment by this government of the people in the Yukon Territory as well as those people from abroad who have invested their resources, time and aspirations in the development of this great region. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the kind of treatment which this proposed bill would mete out to the people of the Yukon Territory illustrates clearly the need for this House to consider at a very early date whether the time is opportune to confer upon the Yukon territory and MacKenzie territory the sovereign status of provinces. I believe that provincial status for both the Yukon and MacKenzie territories would benefit our citizens now living there, eliminate some important difficulties which they are now experiencing and, as well, prove to be a measure with broad popular support.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) has covered the greater part of the position of the New Democratic Party with regard to the bill before us, not only in the remarks he made today but in the previous segment of his speech on March 5. I do not intend to attempt to cover all of the ground that he did in the two parts of his speech. However, I propose to underline one or two aspects of the bill which he discussed.

The minister will recall that a good portion of the hon. member's speech was devoted to the question of the need for ecological protection in the Yukon territory. He emphasized the fact that we are still in the dark as to what the government has in mind in this connection and made particular reference to the action of Parliament last year in making some amendments to the Territorial Lands Act. We still have not had the regulations under that act presented to us which we were assured would be drafted to give some substance to the amendments passed last year. The minister may have some valid reasons for the delay, but I remind him that he assured the standing committee, when we were considering that bill, that a draft of those regulations would be referred to that committee for consideration last fall. We are well into spring and, indeed, approaching summer, but we still have no detailed knowledge of what the minister has in mind.

I think I am correct in saying that the minister made some statements to the effect that discussions had been held with mining interests in connection with the proposed regulations for the areas in which they were interested in the Yukon, and that some understanding had been reached. There should be some understanding between the minister and the members of this chamber as to what is contained in the regulations. That kind of understanding and knowledge should have priority over any behind-the-scenes agreement with the mining interests.

Mr. Chrétien: It is not with the mining interests, it is with the territorial councillors.

Mr. Barnett: The minister made reference to the territorial council. I may be in error, but I recall him stating that some discussions had been held with the mining interests. I gained the impression that the minister was, in effect, telling us that the mining interests were satisfied with what the government had in mind.

Mr. Chrétien: They will never be satisfied.

Mr. Barnett: Perhaps the interjection by the minister has put the situation in a more correct perspective. I remember being slightly puzzled at the time. I understood him to say that the mining interests had been easily and completely satisfied.

Mr. Nielsen: In no way.

Mr. Barnett: This brings to mind the fact that the Yukon is one of the more historic mining areas in Canada. It shares this position with the province from which I come. For quite a number of years I lived in a historic mining area of Canada which predates the Yukon, namely the Cariboo mining country of British Columbia. Anyone with that kind of background association, and who has lived in a mining camp area, can understand the minister's interjection about the mining interests never being completely satisfied.

• (4:10 p.m.)

In considering a bill of this kind, I think we should have in the background of our consideration the basic pattern that was set in the real pioneering days of the mining enterprise in this country. This pattern was started, at least in western parts, when man was lured to look for gold. In many respects this proposed law is repeating a basic concept of mining law that was designed to bring some semblance of order to the way in which individual prospectors and miners could utilize mining resources, at the same time avoiding a repetition in Canada of the law of the six-gun which one hears prevailed in the country to the south during the days of the California gold rush.

Mr. Nielsen: We have that order now in the existing act.

Mr. Barnett: In effect, Mr. Speaker, that is what I was saying. This law is a repetition of this basic concept that was built up in Canada and which goes back to the days when British Columbia was still a Crown colony under Governor Sir James Douglas, and Sir Matthew Begbie, our first chief justice, sometimes known as the "hanging judge", was keeping the boys in order in the mining camps of British Columbia. By this I mean that a large portion of this bill is taken up with the technicalities of how claims can be staked, where they can be recorded, how they can be recorded, and what has to be done in order that those who originally staked them can go ahead and exploit the mineral resources beneath the surface. I do not think any of us will quarrel with the need for the application of this basic concept of bringing in some rule of law to govern this particular type of activity. The question in relation to this bill is whether this is being done in a proper way or not.

I should remind the House, in view of the time lag since this bill was last discussed, that my colleague the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) did indicate we were not prepared to support the amendment which actually is the subject matter of this present debate. I should like to restate our feeling on this. Basically, it is that we should reserve our judgment on this question until the committee has had a full opportunity of listening to the pros and cons as they are put before us by the various interested witnesses. In saying that, I am not being directly critical of the hon. member for Yukon for having proposed the amendment, because as we all know he has a very special knowledge of and relationship to the situation in the part of Canada that he personally represents. We want to weigh the evidence that will be placed before the committee before making up our minds whether or not the provisions contained in this legislation are good, bad or indifferent. Then, based on that we may or may not wish to propose amendments to the committee.

From my own experience in the province of British Columbia, I would say that the era of the free-wheeling miner of the days of the gold rushes of the 1860's and of 1898 in the Yukon is all too often perpetuated beyond its time. As an elected representative of the people of Canada, I believe the time has come when we should sprinkle a little salt on some of the representations made by the mining interests. My colleague from Kootenay West has already made clear that large mining corporations today, in many cases multi-national corporations or corporations that are almost completely controlled in one way or another, principally by our neighbouring country, are asking us as legislators to accept attitudes that were taken in the days when it was man against man in the search for gold nuggets or the mother lode. Certainly, I feel this is something to which we should not agree.

This is one of the facts of life that the hon. member for Yukon and the people of the Yukon must recognize. By and large, the Yukon has been a relatively isolated mining community, but one of our constitutional responsibilities at the present time is to point out to the people of the Yukon that they are part of Canada, that the concepts that are applicable in other jurisdictions should also be applicable in the Yukon. I well realize, of course, that my basic philosophy in regard to the jurisdiction and ownership of natural resources is very different from that of my friend from the Yukon. As far as I am concerned, let me say at once that our natural resources, particularly the non-renewable resources, whether in the Yukon or in British Columbia, in Quebec or in Labrador, should more and more be regarded as the property of all the people of Canada, not only of those living in Canada at this particular time but the property and heritage of future generations.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Barnett: Yes.

Mr. Nielsen: If the hon. member believes in that philosophy, does he advocate that the resource jurisdiction now held by the provinces be returned to the federal authority?

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Speaker, I have no dogmatic answer to that question, but I will say that personally I think if we are going to have a truly rational use and exploitation of our resources, this is one question that should be considered in relation to the development of a new constitutional arrangement within confederation. As a matter of fact, I think in many ways this is a much more basic consideration than some of the aspects of constitutional jurisdiction and possible constitutional amendments that I have heard debated at length. We have to devise some methods which will not centralize the administration in one spot in the country. We must give greater recognition to the concept that these resources are a national heritage which we, as Canadians, hold in trust for some of the people who live in other parts of the world. I say this in response to the question asked by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), but without particular reference to the Yukon Territory or its aspirations to move more rapidly toward full provincial status.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I make these remarks as a result of having lived in the Province of British Columbia since 1952, where we have witnessed the never waning ambitions toward parochialism displayed by the government of that province. I should like to make it quite clear to the hon. member for Yukon that I am basing these remarks very much on my observations of what has been going on in my own province, and in many cases this has been contrary to long-term national interests of Canada. Without going into this, let me say in passing that one of the prime examples is the attitude displayed in respect of the development of the resources of the Columbia River. The attitude shown by a former Liberal administration of Canada was one of a willingness to acquiesce too readily. However, I am straying from the subject matter of the Yukon minerals bill. I shall try to relate my remarks more directly to that matter.

As I said earlier, the hon. member for Kootenay West talked about our belief in protecting our ecology. He also expressed his interest and concern about the lack of opportunity for the native population to participate in mining activities in that part of Canada. Let me relate some of my remarks to the Canadian native population, not directly in that area of employment by mining corporations of Indian people but more in respect of their basic rights to the lands of the territory.

Let me say at once that this question is not restricted to the Yukon Territory alone. This is a question about which I have a basic difference of opinion, particularly in relation to the policy which has been announced by this government. In response to a question in the House not long ago, the minister expressed the view that all of the lands in the territories belong to the Crown, except those which have been specifically alienated. He said this was the basis of jurisdiction in the territories and to a large extent in British Columbia. In the territories there are not reserve lands set aside. The position of the government is that the Indians, Métis and Eskimos do not even have squatters' rights in the land in which their forefathers have lived since time immemorial. This attitude is carried forward in this bill. I might say that had the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) not been preoccupied he intended to deal with this aspect of the matter.

I wonder whether the minister has acquired any new outlook or attitude on this question as a result of his recent visits to New Zealand and Australia. One part of this bill relates to the acquisition and recording of mineral claims. It refers to the method to be used and the individuals who may acquire claims. It contains a proviso which exempts certain lands from being staked for mineral claims. It makes it clear that you cannot stake mineral claims on any lands to which the National Parks Act applies. It also makes it clear that you cannot stake a mineral claim on any land used as a cemetery or a burial ground. It goes on to refer to other applications of this exemption principle.

One can search in vain for a proviso in this bill which prevents anyone from staking and applying the full jurisdiction of this act to land that might be occupied by Indians. I suggest this is indeed regrettable and a revealing feature of this legislation. This is not confined solely to the Yukon Territory. This is much more pointed in respect of the Yukon Territory than it is in respect of British Columbia, Labrador or Ontario, because the Yukon has a common boundary with one of the newer states of the United States, namely the state of Alaska, which up until recently held the status of a territory. I cannot help but wonder what the Indian people of the Yukon are thinking about the attitude and ideas being displayed by the government of Canada compared to those being discussed in the United States Congress.

Although the matter has not been finalized, there is a concrete proposal before Congress that involves the payment of something in the order of $1 billion to the aboriginal inhabitants of the state of Alaska for their rights to that land. The proposal provides that there shall be hundreds of thousands of acres set aside for their continued use and over which they will have jurisdiction. It provides that under these arrangements the natives will receive royalty payments as a result of the exploitation of the resources on and beneath the ground. When this arrangement is completed, these people will not have to care whether the Anvil Mining Corporation or other mineral companies hire them. They will have some rights and resources which will stem from their basic heritage in that land which they and their forefathers occupied long before we came.

So far as I am concerned, when we deal with this bill, we re-emphasize what is the greatest Canadian shame. We have absolutely refused, so far as the government is concerned, to recognize that those people have any rights, that they were here before those people to whom we so often refer as the founding peoples of Canada. These are rights which should be recognized as being more basic than the constitutional rights of French-speaking people, English-speaking people or people of any other language in Canada. One of my basic objections to a bill of this kind is that it turns over, so far as the exploitation of minerals is concerned, to any individual 18 years of age or over on his own behalf or on behalf of any corporation authorized to carry on business, the territory for the staking of mineral claims, except in national parklands or other exempted parts of the land, without any consideration at all of the idea of there ever having been a human being on this continent before the colonialists, be they French or English, arrived here.

Since we are talking about land near Alaska, I suppose I should say "or be they Russian". Perhaps getting that close to home I should say "or be they Spanish", but as we know the Spanish heritage is left in Canada only in the form of a number of place names which grace the province of British Columbia. Part of the name of my constituency is one such name. "Alberni" comes from "Don Pedro Alberni". So, we can forget about the colonialists from Spain and from Moscow, and think in terms of the fact that we, as a result of our rights in a sovereign state, are the inheritors of the colonizing regime of Britain and France. As I have said before in this House, while Britain and France have been doing something about unwinding their colonialism in Africa and Asia, we in Canada who are the inheritors of the colonizing regime are doing nothing to recognize the basic rights and basic freedoms of the people who were here before our colonial ancestors arrived.

Nothing in this bill gives any recognition of the fact that there is a single Indian who is native to the Yukon Territory. We know there is not as high a percentage of Indian population at present in the Yukon Territory as there is in the Northwest Territories, but the principle is the same. To me, the situation is highlighted by the fact of the juxtaposition of the Yukon Territory to the State of Alaska. What I have in mind perhaps is not something which could be done in dealing with this legislation. I am not sure the act could be amended to recognize the situation I have tried to describe, although some of us may have a crack at it when the bill reaches the committee. This, of course, is a broader question which in large part lies beyond the scope of this bill. Certainly, however, it is highlighted by the manner in which the bill is drafted in respect of the right, in practical terms, of only a few larger corporations to exploit the natural resources which lie under the ground of the Yukon Territory. Apart from any other considerations involved, I think when we reach the committee stage of this bill I should like at least some consideration to be given to this particular aspect of it.

Mr. Stan Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, in dealing with Bill C-187, the Yukon minerals bill, I should like to comment at length on the new royalties which are proposed in this legislation and the adverse effect which these, if carried forth into law, will have upon the economy of the Yukon. In order to assess the full implications of these measures for the Yukon, I think it would be helpful if we were to turn our attention to that curious document published by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), which most of us had thought was a white paper on taxation but which we have been recently informed is merely a document containing some proposals for tax reform. In any event, on page 65 thereof, paragraph 5.32 we find this:

> At present the profit derived from the first three years of operation of a new mine are exempt from Canadian corporate tax. This provision provides an incentive to corporations to commit the large amounts of money necessary to develop a mine, and recognizes that this commitment must often be made at a time when the extent and quality of the ore body cannot clearly be ascertained. However, the government believes that in many instances the three year exemption is too generous. Neither exploration and development costs nor depreciation need be deducted during the exempt period. As a result, many more than three years profits are effectively exempt, and taxpayers can recover much more than their investment without becoming taxable.

Notwithstanding the admission by the Minister of Finance of the risks involved in mining, he, nevertheless, advocates in his "proposals for tax reform" that retrenchments be made in this important concession to the Canadian mining industry which in many respects has been responsible for its significant growth.

It is interesting to note the remarks of the Senate Standing Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, in its report on the white paper, particularly as stated at page 37. The report notes that the estimated net foreign earnings of the Canadian mining industry amount to some one billion five hundred million dollars per year and that the mining industry's activity has benefited all sections of Canada significantly. The Senate report acknowledges that substantial profits have been realized in the mining industry. It also acknowledges that corresponding risks have been taken. I can only commend to those hon. members who might be inclined to support the finance minister's views the remarks contained in paragraph 11, page 38 of the Senate report which I should like to quote:

> The defect in the white paper's approach to the financing of the developing of mineral deposits is that it fails to take into account the essential difference between the two types of investors and the demand of the risk investor for rewards that are commensurate with the greater risks in this area of mining development. The proposals to permit new mines under certain conditions to write off 100 per cent of the cost of mining machinery and buildings to allow deduction of the cost of acquisition of mineral rights as part of the cost of exploration and development are in the opinion of your committee completely inadequate as a reward to attract the financing to begin a program of exploration and development of mineral resources.

Some hon. members will no doubt be tempted to point out that since the publication of "Proposals for Tax Reform", the Minister of Finance has made certain concessions which will affect the taxation of the mining industry. One of these concessions is that the federal tax abatement for mining will be increased from 10 per cent to 25 per cent. What we must, however, bear in mind is that the Yukon territory is not a province, and consequently the benefit of this abatement does not apply to it. Mining in the Yukon is thus placed in double jeopardy by the completely illogical position of being subject not only to a new scale of higher royalties as proposed in the bill under consideration, but also to materially higher taxation than mines in other provinces as a result of the new taxation measures proposed by the Minister of Finance and which, for some curious reason, he claims to be reforms.

I submit that the government simply cannot have it both ways. It is completely unreasonable for them to expect to have high taxation rates apply in high risk industries. The government must also be mindful of the fact that Canada is not the only country with vast undeveloped natural resources. While of course, at least until very recently, our stable political climate and the existing taxation incentives have served as inducements to foreign mining interests to participate in the development of our resources, we would be nothing less than naïve to think that the measures which are proposed in the present bill, plus the impending measures which loom on the horizon in the government's taxation plans, will serve to retain and permit continued foreign participation in this very costly and high risk segment of our economy.

I submit that it is further evidence of the inconsistencies of the government's thinking for it to have a Department of Regional Economic Expansion concerned with promoting economic growth in the slow growth areas of our country, while at the same time the same government proposes measures which will obviously compel mining interests to seek more attractive areas, and possibly areas outside of Canada, in which to invest. Certainly the Yukon territory would not be an area in which these companies would invest should these ill-considered measures come into law.

Surely, the royalty rates which apply to mining in the Yukon territory should fully reflect the fact that mining operations there will not benefit from tax abatement provisions because the territory is not a province. Moreover, they should also reflect the fact of the enormous distance which the ore has to travel from its original source to its marketplace, thus making the operation far more costly than if it were located in the lower regions of Canada. The precise details of the royalties provisions in the proposed act are far too lengthy and complicated for me to deal with specifically and individually at this time. However, hon. members will find upon studying them that not only do the royalties reflect an increase from the preceding act, but they are as well clouded with uncertainty for mine owners by the provision for extensive administrative discretion concerning the amount of the various deductions which the government will permit mines to claim in arriving at the value of their output in the course of any year.

I have tried to make clear that high levels of taxation and high levels of development in the Canadian mining industry are incompatible. I think this claim is borne out in the submission made to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development by the Yukon Chamber of Mines, and I should like to quote their remarks in this connection. On page 7 of their brief the following is stated:

> This high level of exploration activity is unlikely to continue in 1971. Respondents to a questionnaire circulated to this chamber, to major exploration and junior mining companies who had carried out Yukon exploration in 1970 almost unanimously reported reduced exploration budgets for 1971. Replies from 39 companies which spent $5.7 million in 1970 forecast expenditure of only $2.3 million in 1971, a drop of some 60 per cent. This sharp drop can be partly attributed to reduced operating profit due to lower metal prices, and junior mining companies being unable to raise risk capital on the stock exchange. However, nearly all respondents indicated Bill C-187 and the white paper on tax reform were factors in their decision to reduce their budgets.

I suggest that there is ample evidence in the experience of other countries to enable us to see that it is never a difficult thing for a government to drive foreign investment from a country. When so many Canadians regard government bonds or real estate holdings as vastly preferred investments to participation in our natural resource industries, I think it would be negligent of us not to give the most careful scrutiny to the implications of the legislation before us. It is easy to say that those people in the mining industry are pleading a special case, and no doubt to some degree that is so. I am, however, well satisfied that their experience is such that it behooves us to give it the most careful consideration before we reach any conclusions concerning it.

The Mining Association of Canada has published an interesting little booklet, on page 2 of which are contained some remarks regarding certain factors which have contributed significantly to the growth of the mining industry in Canada. The third paragraph reads as follows:

Confidence that the ground rules will not be changed have been a vital factor in the growth of the mining industry to its present size, a growth which has been at least at twice the rate of the over-all Canadian industrial sector. This certainty of government and public policy has encouraged the mining industry to undertake the long term risks involved in pushing further into the unknown and undeveloped parts of the country.

The mining industry in the Yukon has been developed on the basis of courage, optimism and good faith. Just when it is beginning to show signs of its full potential, let us not rush in with untimely and unwarranted measures that could well lead to its destruction. Any benefits which the government might derive from increased royalties on mining in the Yukon territory could well be offset by mining companies directing their future explorations to more favourable areas. The economy of the Yukon is so demonstrably tied to mining, that it ought not to require any great insight to anticipate what the effects on it will be if mining ventures are driven from it or discouraged from expansion by legislation which is of such a negative and restrictive nature as that proposed in the present bill.

Before concluding, I think it could well be suggested at this time, in view of the ever expanding interest by the Canadian people in the question of economic nationalism, that this would be a place to start with positive suggestions or proposals to the Canadian people to allow them to participate in the development of the resources of this country.

I feel that all the discussion which has taken place during the past six or eight weeks about our losing control of our resource industries has been really unnecessary. First of all, I believe that the resource industries to a large extent are subject to governmental control and regulation, and so long as the country or the provinces having jurisdiction over these resources, have the proper rules and regulations and those rules and regulations are enforced, then we should not really worry about who owns the resources. Ideally, of course, I think that Canadians should own Canadian resources, but I would not be prepared to opt for government ownership if that were the only way we could have Canadian ownership.

It is the function of the government to create the proper atmosphere to draw Canadian funds into developing areas. For too long we have been operating on the basis that we have been at a disadvantage compared with people who are not Canadians. We can point to examples where our own money has been used by foreign companies to develop our resources. A major illustration of this is the petroleum industry in western Canada. To a large extent the petroleum industry in western Canada, which is more than 50 per cent foreign owned, was developed with Canadian funds, but Canadians were unable to have the same advantage in the use of their funds as foreigners had. This situation has gone on for too long. Here, we have an opportunity to reverse that trend, to set up a royalty schedule which would give a clear advantage to Canadians who would take the risk of developing these resources. I would urge the government to consider taking this important step. In my opinion, this is the only practical way in which Canadians will roll back the high percentage of foreign ownership, particularly in the resource development field.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of pleasure I take the opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-187 in support of my colleague from the Yukon and of other members on this side of the House who have spoken. It is very clear that hon. members on the other side of the House do not intend to take part in the debate. This debate is very complex. It goes far beyond the reaches of the Yukon, and certainly is of much more significance than just the specific aspects of it that apply to the northern part of Canada. The thing which struck me most forcibly about the hon. member for Yukon's objections to the legislation was his concern about the regulatory powers being given to the minister and the government in relation to the mineral code of the Yukon, and I suppose we can say to the mineral code of the north. This is a clear indication of excessive government intervention, involvement and control in the development of the northern frontiers of the Canadian nation.

The hon. member was very concerned about this. From talking to people who are conversant with that part of Canada, I understand that this bill has already had a significant impact by scaring away capital necessary for the development of the northern parts of Canada. Already we are reaping the negative benefits of a piece of legislation which is still before the House, but which hopefully will be withdrawn and will never become part of the law of the land. Although I do not represent the Yukon, the Northwest Territories, or even Labrador, I have a particular interest in the northern part of Canada because I feel that it epitomizes the youth, vigour, and the potential for development of the Canadian nation. It is the great frontier of our resources. Unlike Ontario, which is highly industrialized and developed, the Yukon, the Northwest Territories and Labrador are relatively undeveloped, despite the fact that people have been working in those regions for centuries.

The great industrial complex of Ontario, of Montreal, and many of the great industrial complexes of certain parts of the United States, such as the New England States—Pittsburgh in particular comes to my mind in connection with Labrador—depend on northern Canada for their existence. This is their resource area, and this is the area in which we need the clearest kind of direction and legislation, particularly with respect to our foreign ownership and our taxation policies.

When I was 16 years old I worked, for the first time in my life, at Schefferville, or Knob Lake as we called it, which is on the borders of Newfoundland and Quebec. I may say that Quebec is still concerned about the legitimacy of the border between it and Newfoundland, which was established back in the early part of the twentieth century, but that is a political debate which has little significance in connection with this bill. That particular community of Knob Lake, in the wilderness of Canada, at that time had a work force of over 2,000 people, all entirely depending on the development of the mineral resource of that part of the nation, which is iron ore. I worked on building a railway which runs from Seven Islands, Sept Isles, some 360 miles to a little known community. That railway was being built by the Quebec North Shore and Labrador Railway, for the specific purpose of developing iron ore resources. It indicated the extent to which people are willing to risk their financial resources in order to develop something of great potential. Frankly, in most cases, the aspiration of the developer, be he an individual or a company, is to make a killing. Developers have an ambition to increase their wealth and financial power. We have to build enticements and attractions into our taxation policies to draw Canadians with power, vision, determination and drive into remote parts of Canada to develop the natural resources of our country.

I have not been in that area since 1956 or 57 but I have had occasion to visit many other newer mineral developments, and other kinds of resource developments. If the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Peddle) were present, Mr. Speaker, with his expert knowledge he could give you in more detail some idea of the $1 billion development project taking place at Churchill Falls, which last year was employing a work force of 6,400. I visited Churchill Falls and was told at that time that it had the second largest labour force in North America, the largest being engaged in the American space program. The total financial resources required for the project come from private sources. I cannot say exactly what proportion of them is made up of American dollars but I want to tell you one thing, Mr. Speaker, that we were not too concerned with the question of whether they were Canadian, Chinese, Russian, Indonesian or American. As long as we got the development, we were quite happy to see it, the largest hydroelectric project in the world, employing a labour force of 6,400 persons. This labour force will be reduced over the next five years as the project develops, but the main thing is that we are getting this major development all out of private capital.

• (5:00 p.m.)

In St. John's, Newfoundland, last year I listened to the competent new President of Brinco, Mr. Mulholland, who spoke before our Finance Committee and presented a report on behalf of his company. He said that if the uncertainty which now enshrouds the taxation system in Canada, and encompasses every way of life, had existed when the promoters of Brinco contemplated the Churchill Falls project, it would never have gotten off the ground. I thought that a very dramatic statement by a businessman in Canada. He also said that the $500 million development on the lower Churchill, the Gull Island development which would cost half a billion dollars would never be developed with the present lack of incentive and tax uncertainty in the Canadian nation. This is as close as I can come to his words, but I think they sum up dramatically the uncertainty and concern in the minds of Canadian developers and businessmen as far as development in the north is concerned.

I should like to suggest that every member of the House of Commons visit Labrador before the project is completed, and after as well. It is the most magnificent development that I have ever seen. I felt like Gulliver in the land of the giants. Everything from the wrenches to the butter dishes in the dining room, which holds 3,000 people, was out of proportion to reality. One expected to see men ten or 12 feet tall walk around the corner. This is the kind of development that we have now in northern Canada, in the last great frontier, the great Labrador mainland part of the province of Newfoundland. It is only one of several types of development in that part of the country, an area which in the next 20 or 30 years will contribute much to the development of our nation.

In that part of the country there is no one who is a drag on the Canadian public. Everyone is contributing heavily in taxation through force of circumstances. With the positive taxation position of the Labrador part of the province, Newfoundland is more significantly a financial part of the nation than most Canadians realize. There are other areas of that country which are developed. I refer to Wabush and Labrador City, which has a population of about 8,000, and its twin city has about 7,000 or 8,000 people.

What has all this to do with Bill C-187 which is before us? I do not exactly understand the purpose of the government in introducing this measure, but it does give Members of Parliament a chance to expound on some of their attitudes toward foreign ownership and such matters. One aspect of this bill is that it places an embargo on investment in the Yukon. Reading the bill, and the remarks of the hon. member from the Yukon, makes me wonder if it should be classified as kite flying. Is the government flying a kite to see how this kind of thing works in the Yukon? Is the Yukon being used as an experiment, an economic guinea pig or is this a specific policy to be applied to the Yukon with no relevance to other parts of Canada? The government seems to be declaring some of its foreign ownership policy in Bill C-187. Is it the intention of the government to seek the reaction of the Canadian investor to the stand it has taken? The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) today asked the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) when he would be willing to make a categorical and definitive statement on Canadian ownership. The minister replied that he was not ready. He has not taken up any stance as yet.

Our party has suggested some guidelines to follow in trying to classify Canadian industry into areas where we would demand complete Canadian control, areas where there would be at least a major equity owned by the Canadian government and areas which would be completely free for any kind of investment from any part of the world. We do not know where this government stands on foreign ownership, and I am a little scared of placing complete restrictions on the flow of foreign capital into Canada. I must add that this is my own position and not the position of my party.

A recent book by Mr. J. J. Servan-Schriber, "The American Challenge", sums up the dilemma of the American investor regarding American control, the superiority of American technology and managerial skills on the one hand and the incapability of certain countries, such as Canada and many European nations, to finance their own projects and thereby retain a certain amount of independence. This is great political hay. People can say that we have to be careful not to have American domination and control. But these are not the things that worry me. What does worry me is that we have the resources which are being exported to other nations without due regard to further refining, further development and further processing within our own country. I am much more concerned that we should adopt policies in 1971 which would take effect in the next ten years to try and get maximum employment from our resources.

The history of Great Britain shows that their mercantile policy of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was to bring in raw materials from the colonies, such as Newfoundland, India, the great African nations and Canada, to refine these and resell the goods to the colonies at a substantial profit, thus ensuring employment in Great Britain. That policy may have been responsible for the several centuries of British economic domination of the world. Certainly, we have learned from that experience the need for Canada to adopt policies which will ensure a greater labour return from our resources.

My own native province of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and the Gaspé area of Quebec were exporting almost every pound of fish to the American nation without being refined. All the processing of our marine resources was done by American labour. Economists have calculated that if we could adopt a proper tariff structure and proper trade relations with the United States regarding that product, we could obtain the maximum return from the processing and almost overcome all the economic disadvantages and the unemployment problems of the Atlantic region. That is a complicated question which time does not permit me to develop.

Another example is the minerals which go from Labrador to the United States market. They must be responsible for some of the boom experienced in the industrial centres of the United States. Timber would be another example. My friends from British Columbia probably know the correct technical terms relating to this subject. It is my understanding that we take raw logs, without processing them, and ship them in that state to the Japanese market. They might be logs that are five inches or five feet in diameter, as the case may be. I understand from my friends from British Columbia across the way that we may be able to do something about this. Nevertheless, at present we ship that kind of resource to the Japanese market. Also, coal from Alberta is shipped to Japan to keep the great industries of Japan going. I believe that an NDP member has said that for every job created in Canada by the export of these resources, 20 jobs are created in Japan. In other words, we are exporting coal worth one job and creating in Japan manufacturing worth 20 jobs. The Japanese send the finished products back to us. There are companies on the east coast of Canada involved in the manufacturing of paper which are required by the provincial government concerned to send logs abroad for processing. Certain Canadian companies are sending logs overseas to feed their paper mills in England. I am talking about the Bowater Company on west coast of Newfoundland, which is required to export a raw product.

Why has nobody launched an offensive to determine how best we can retain these resources in Canada so that we may obtain a better labour return from our resources and overcome unemployment? That concerns me much more than where the dollars come from for the development of these resources. We do not want to say to a company wishing to go to Schefferville, Whitehorse or Prince Rupert, "You cannot go there because you are financed by American capital." Nevertheless, we ought to lay down guidelines as to how such companies shall operate and how our resources shall be developed, as well as the extent to which resources shall be permitted to leave Canada in a raw state.

In any event, I have only scratched the surface of any arguments about resource development or foreign ownership. I sympathize with the position of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). It seems that under Bill C-187 the Governor in Council—and it is the government's favourite pastime to enact legislation which says that the Governor in Council can do certain things—can lay down regulations the effect of which will be to scare away capital seeking to develop the mineral resources of our north. If the government is flying a kite, if it is bringing in a sort of trial foreign ownership policy, if, as suggested, the Yukon is being used as an economic guinea-pig, then I suggest that the bill had better be scrapped quickly or delayed. I do not know what tricks the hon. member for Yukon may have up his sleeve. In any event

I suggest that further consideration of the bill ought to be deferred for six months or two years. I think we ought to reassess the impact that this bill will have on the development of the Yukon and the development of the north generally, because certain implications flow from the effect that this bill will have on Yukon development. The Yukon Territory is a province. No provincial government, on behalf of that territory, can exert pressure on this government. No Yukon provincial government exists to say to the federal government or the Prime Minister, "We question this and want you to reconsider it." The hon. member for Yukon has the burden of speaking for that part of Canada. That is why he has taken up the fight on behalf of the territory and why I and others are concerned about it.

I should like to see other hon. members speaking up against what appears to be an attempt to impose much more state control. I do not mind if I sound like an old Tory—that is another four letter word. The premier of my province talks about a Tory as if that were some kind of unclean animal. I always sort of cringe when I hear him talking on his morning open line program. Of course, "Joey" is also a four letter word, something he has not realized. If I sound like a Tory, I make no apology. I feel that those developing the northern part of Canada must be considered. They have the youth, vigour, drive and determination to develop our resources. That is where the future of Canada lies and those resources have hardly been touched. They are practically unknown. The area is not developed. Its great hydroelectric potential has not been developed. Its minerals are undiscovered. We do not know much about the north, despite all the exploration that has taken place. The area epitomizes the Canadian dream. I do not want the government to do anything that will impede that development. We must look to the north for our future.

Instead of bringing forward legislation like Bill C-187, I should like to see the government come forward with a declaration of expectations, aspirations and goals relating to the development of the north. In conjunction with these expectations, aspirations and goals, let us build in some kinds of incentives that will enable Canadians to apply their energies with greater determination for the development of the north.

When the white paper on tax reform was first introduced, certain tax exemptions enjoyed by Canadian mining companies were to be taken away. That scared away certain anticipated development in the north. As a matter of fact, recently the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador said that a $160 million development at Wabush was cancelled because of tax uncertainties. The Minister of Finance was so scared about the possible effects of the white paper that he has amended it even before bringing it forward as legislation. I do not know whether hon. members are aware of this. Even before bringing forward that white paper as legislation, the Minister of Finance changed some parts of it. As I understand it, he did not allow mining companies the sorts of tax concessions they enjoyed formerly. He modified the provisions of the white paper regarding tax concessions in order that mining companies could go ahead with greater confidence.

I should like to see the government of Canada outline a definite policy on takeovers and foreign ownership. It should let us know where we are going. This has been a very brief commentary, Mr. Speaker, and it has been ad hoc to say the least. As the bill progresses, and as hon. members contribute their thoughts, we should become more conversant with its details and add our individual two cents worth of contributions when it comes before the House again.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if I might have the consent of the House to revert to motions for the purpose of making an announcement in which I think the House will be interested.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

HOME OIL COMPANY—ANNOUNCEMENT OF RETENTION OF CONTROL IN CANADA

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not having made this announcement in the normal fashion on motions earlier in the day but I was not able to make the announcement until all stock exchanges in Canada were closed, which was at 5.01, according to my understanding.

I am pleased to report to the House that control of Home Oil Company Limited has been retained in Canada. Mr. R. A. Brown Jr. has entered into transaction with Consumers' Gas Company of Toronto, under which Consumers' Gas will acquire the controlling interest of Mr. Brown and his family in the voting shares of Cygnus Corporation Limited which, in turn, controls the voting shares of Home Oil. The details of this transaction will be announced by the parties sometime later this afternoon. Consumers' Gas Company is owned by approximately 28,500 shareholders, of whom 97 per cent are residents of Canada.

I obtained the consent of the parties to make this announcement first in the House, because I know that the House is extremely interested in this matter. The House was very helpful in the debate on the matter and I had undertaken to members of the House to keep them posted, as soon as I was able to, about any dealings with respect to this company.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious from the tenor of the announcement the minister made this afternoon that, in his negotiations, he accepted the advice of members of the official opposition. In his remarks, the minister expressed appreciation for the high quality of the debate that revolved around this important subject. After all, the Home Oil Company is one of Canada's great independents. As I recall the debate the essence of the information was that there is in Canada sufficient capital resource and Canadian initiative in these matters if the government would only clarify its confused thinking on its resource policies.

• (5:20 p.m.)

One of the greatest deterrents to resource development for the past year or more has been the on-again off-again debate and discussion precipitated by the ill-conceived white paper on tax reform. It was obvious that it had created a pall of uncertainty which made it impossible for Canadian investors to anticipate future prospects with respect to their investments. By the announcement which has been made in the House that negotiations have been going on behind the scenes by the minister, on behalf of the government, in order to assure the parties which might be concerned in making this achievement possible and retaining the Home Oil Company in the hands of Canadians, the government has made it clear that there will be no threat to Canadian investors in the legislative proposals that will be brought down as a result of the extensive discussions on the white paper. I hope that legislation will be before the House at the earliest opportunity.

If these behind the scenes negotiations have been going on, and if this assurance has been given, for example, to the Consumers' Gas Company, it is only fair that other potential investors in Canada's resource industry should have the same assurance, so that the uncertainty or confusion can be dissipated as quickly as possible. We can then resume the development of our Canadian resources in the best interest of Canadians in all parts of the country. This is encouraging news. I am sure that if the government will pursue other developments with the same vigour that it has exhibited when sorting out this difficult matter, there will be many such developments to cheer for in Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, first may I say that it is good to have announcements like this made in the House of Commons. I noted that the minister enjoyed doing that on this occasion. I trust he will keep it up.

We welcome the fact that the government has been able to announce that the control of Home Oil is to be retained in Canada. The only comment I want to make is that the minister was right the first time; public ownership would have been even better. Bearing in mind what was just said by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), I suggest to the government that instead of taking wrong advice from the official opposition, it would have been better if they had consulted us.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say how pleased we were to hear the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) announce that Home Oil Company has been sold to Canadian residents. However, the term "Canadian residents" worries me a little. I would have liked it better if the minister had used the simple term "Canadians", because "Canadian residents" suggests those people may be foreigners who have a few holdings in Canada without being Canadian citizens.

I believe that by and large we may be happy because the deal seems to indicate at least that the government is going in the right direction.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The House will now resume consideration of the business interrupted by the announcement by the minister.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YUKON MINERALS ACT

ADMINISTRATION, ACQUISITION AND RECORDING OF CLAIMS, ETC.

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-187, respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Nielsen (p. 4009).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the House ready for the question on the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Nielsen) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. Is it the wish of the House that the Chair put the question on the main motion?

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I think it is the wish of the House that the motion be discussed later. I wonder whether the government House leader can tell us if we are to pursue the same discussion on this bill tomorrow.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker; that is the intention.

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock, pursuant to Special Order made earlier this day, this stands adjourned until eleven o'clock tomorrow.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Special Order.

1915 ARMENIAN MASSACRE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I would like to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to discuss a truly urgent and important matter, namely the slaughter of Armenians in 1915.

Canada itself was party to the signature of the Sèvres Treaty, Section 88 of which provided for the return to the Armenian people of the lands they had been despoiled of following a premeditated genocide. The year 1971 marks the 56th anniversary of this Armenian genocide by the Turks in 1915, an event which should bring all Canadians, and particularly the House, to pause for a moment and pay tribute to the 1.5 million Armenians who perished violently during—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member knows that under Standing Order 43 he must propose a motion to the House and indicate why it is urgent that such motion be considered before other questions on the order paper.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I was getting to the heart of the matter.

Canada is involved and Canadians, who with reason believe themselves to be a peaceful people, should demand that justice be assured to this unfortunate nation whose lands are under foreign domination. The House cannot ignore this fact, especially on this 56th anniversary, to be celebrated tomorrow, April 24.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member wish to present a motion? He has invoked Standing Order 43 and, in accordance with the rules, he must indicate the content of his motion and give a copy of it to the Chair. If the hon. member does not wish to present a motion, we shall have to proceed to another subject.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ASSURANCE THAT MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT NOT KEPT UNDER SURVEILLANCE BY ELECTRONIC DEVICES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, in view of the equivocal nature of the replies of the Solicitor General to questions yesterday concerning electronic surveillance of the telephones of Members of Parliament I should like to ask him whether he has inquired into the question of whether the offices of Members of Parliament and their telephones are being subjected to any kind of electronic surveillance or monitoring?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I imagine, following the questions put yesterday, that you intend to consider the whole matter and I think that it would be unadvisable for me to make further comments.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: That question, with respect to the Solicitor General, was not put to him yesterday, Mr. Speaker. The question today is whether or not he has caused any inquiry to be made into the question of whether or not the offices or telephones of Members of Parliament are subjected to electronic surveillance or monitoring?

I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, since the minister is shy about answering that one. Can the Solicitor General exercise procedures to ensure that he is informed prior to and after any electronic surveillance or monitoring of the telephones or offices of Members of Parliament?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, once again I have clearly indicated that there was no general policy. I have the greatest respect for the Speaker of the House and I will be ready to answer similar questions when the Chair has considered the problem raised yesterday by the members of the opposition.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question. The Solicitor General obviously does not appreciate his own responsibilities with respect to the RCMP. The RCMP does carry out this kind of activity, and I am not—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot make a speech; he can ask a supplementary question. He has asked the question originally and he has asked a supplementary question. He now has the floor for the purpose of a further supplementary question, which is quite in order, but it should be a question.

Mr. Nielsen: Obviously the Solicitor General requires explanations before answering questions. Since he is responsible for the RCMP, can he assure the members of this House that he is exercising his responsibilities to ensure that he is informed both before and after any electronic surveillance or monitoring of telephones in the offices of Members of Parliament?

An hon. Member: Answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can ask a further supplementary question, but the hon. member for Joliette also has a supplementary question to ask. For the moment the hon. member for Yukon has the floor.

Mr. Nielsen: I will try once again, Mr. Speaker. Is the Solicitor General prepared to assure the members of this House that the government is prepared to consider the policy that the Speaker of this House be fully apprised of and agreeable to any and all security activities in the parliament buildings by agents of the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that at this stage he may be coming a little close to the position of the Speaker. He has asked a few questions. I recognize that there is a problem which is somewhat complicated, and I think the hon. member is right when he asks questions relating to the responsibility of the minister regarding the RCMP. Of course I would not want to get involved in a debate in any way, and this is why I did not intervene at an earlier point in the questions asked by the hon. member.

I recognize that there are two responsibilities, first, in respect of what goes on in this building, which is the responsibility of the Speaker and, second, what may go on in the administration of the federal police, which is the responsibility of the Solicitor General. I would suggest to the hon. member that perhaps the last supplementary question may not be quite in order because he is asking a question which perhaps might be related to the office of the Speaker. I want to assure the hon. member that the questions he has asked yesterday and today have been noted.

Mr. Nielsen: At the risk of being overly insistent, may I point out that I was directing my question to the Solicitor General and confining it to his responsibilities only. May I put it once more so that it may be clarified for Your Honour.

I am asking the Solicitor General whether he is prepared to assure the members of the House that the policy of the government will be to keep Your Honour informed and fully apprised as to any electronic surveillance or monitoring which is carried on by agents of the government, and particularly by those for whom the Solicitor General has specific responsibility, namely, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Mr. Speaker: Again I have to rule that the question is out of order. I must suggest to the hon. member that what he is asking for is in a way hypothetical or theoretical. He is inviting the minister to indicate what the reply would be to inquiries that would be made of him by the Chair, and in this respect the question goes beyond the limitations of a question that may be asked at this time. The hon. member for Joliette.

Mr. Nielsen: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, affecting the privileges of all hon. members of the House, perhaps Your Honour might permit the Acting Prime Minister to assure members of the House that this whole matter will be referred for inquiry to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I put that question to the Acting Prime Minister.

[Later:]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Solicitor General. Would he explain his use of the word "precedent" last night when he was referring to this matter of electronic bugging? He referred to a precedent. Would he explain that to the House?

ALLEGED BUGGING BY ELECTRONIC DEVICE OF RESIDENCE OF ST. JEAN-BAPTISTE SOCIETY OFFICIAL

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I hope I will get a clear answer. I must make a new attempt and ask a direct question of the Solicitor General. Once again, expecting him to be as precise, I ask him if the RCMP did or did not instal a wiretapping device in the residence of Mr. Cossette and in the affirmative, when will it be asked to remove it?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated, those devices are available to all citizens and if the person concerned is able to establish to whom the device belongs, whether it is an individual or an organization, it is up to him to do it.

Mr. La Salle: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister assure that the RCMP did not instal any device in that house?

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, I have also replied to this question by stating merely that it is never in the public interest—and the hon. member should be aware of the practice in this House—to answer affirmatively or negatively to this type of question.

PURCHASE OF CONTROLLING INTEREST IN HOME OIL BY CONSUMERS GAS—TAX TREATMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. My question relates to the announcement he made in the House yesterday afternoon concerning the purchase by Consumers Gas of Toronto of a controlling interest in Cygnus Corporation, and hence a controlling interest in Home Oil. In view of the participation of the government in the discussions that led up to this purchase, can the minister say whether the parties were given any assurances by the government concerning tax treatment?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the parties concerned were given no assurance of any kind, nor did they ask for any assurance of any kind or discuss tax concessions with the government in respect of their transaction.

OIL

PROPOSED PUGET SOUND-CHICAGO PIPELINE—OIL SHIPMENTS FROM ALASKA—POSSIBLE POLLUTION PROBLEMS—EFFECT ON CANADIAN MARKET

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Can he inform the House if the government of Canada is aware that oil companies are considering the construction of a major pipeline from the Seattle-Puget Sound area to Chicago, and has the government knowledge of the volume of oil that will be shipped from Alaska to the Seattle-Puget Sound area?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): In regards to the volume, Mr. Speaker, that depends on the quantum of the find at Prudhoe Bay. To date the companies have kept this information confidential, so we do not know what total volume will be found. We have only estimates that have been made. With regard to a pipeline from Puget Sound to Chicago, I have no knowledge of any specific plan by any company to build such a line.

Mr. Comeau: Has the government carried out any studies on the probability of pollution problems in the Puget Sound area in relation to the various amounts of oil which might be moved to Seattle from Alaska?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there have been any specific studies as to the pollution hazards in the Puget Sound area which I could bring to the attention of the House. As the hon. member knows, general questions of pollution by reason of tanker movement from Alaska are very much in the mind of the government, and I believe discussions at a very high level will take place in Washington shortly as announced by the Prime Minister to the House.

Mr. Comeau: A further supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Has the government carried out any studies on the possible effect on the Canadian oil market of such a pipeline?
