PRIVILEGE

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—INACCURACY OF CANADIAN PRESS REPORT

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. As a result of the opposition motion I presented last week on behalf of my party, the Canadian Press, unintentionally, I am sure, published what I feel certain is an inaccurate and unfair report, and I quote:

> The solution favoured by the Ralliement Créditiste, on the contrary, would be abolishment of the Bank of Canada and granting to each citizen a national dividend proportionate to his needs.

I suggest what should have been reported is that the Creditistes, on the contrary, propose "using" the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member. At any rate, I take it for granted that he has stated his case with regard to the account given of a speech he made in the House last week. I wish to point out to the hon. member that the Chair has not received the notice required under our Standing Orders and, in the circumstances, the matter cannot be discussed further.

FULL EMPLOYMENT AS ECONOMIC GOAL—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the doubt created by the annual report of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, which suggests that full employment should not be sought because slack in the economy is necessary to keep inflationary pressures in check, and in view of the need for a clear commitment to a full employment policy by this House, I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> That this House affirms that full employment remains a priority economic goal for this country and that employment for all who are willing and able to work is a social right.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. The motion, to be moved under Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous agreement. The motion cannot be put.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move a motion under Standing Order 43. I do so on account of the outrageous and inflammatory statement made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky, during last weekend, to wit that unemployment is a necessary evil to avoid price increases. This statement suggests that nothing will be done to find jobs for the unemployed and other persons seeking work. It is urgent to know what the government intends to do in that connection.

This is why I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault):

> That the question of unemployment in Canada be submitted to the consideration of the proper committee and that the salary of the Governor of the Bank of Canada be reduced to the average income level of the unemployed and this until normal employment conditions are restored in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion moved by the hon. member for Abitibi. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is no unanimous consent, so the motion cannot be put.

Recruitment of Francophones

PUBLIC SERVICE

STATEMENT ON PROGRAM FOR HIRING FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, on January 26 of this year I gave assurance to the House that the hiring of Francophone university students would not be charged to contingency vote 5 of the Treasury Board without first advising the House.

I am pleased to advise the House that the government, on the recommendation of the Treasury Board, has authorized the expansion of certain departmental programs and projects involving positions where French is the language of work. The total personnel costs of these programs will be approximately $2 million and the number of personnel involved will be 276.

I outlined in my statement to the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee on March 9 the government's policy of making the Public Service progressively more representative of the two major linguistic communities of Canada. "In accordance with this policy, it is a basic goal of the government to assure equality of opportunity in the Public Service to both French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians."

I went on to say that this would be achieved through the progressive identification of positions as requiring a proficiency in both languages or a proficiency in French or in English, through increasing and improving the language training facilities for both Anglophones and Francophones, and through "the accelerated recruitment of Francophones to the Public Service and development of those already in it."

I noted that, to achieve these goals, departments would have to adopt carefully elaborated manpower development plans.

This program represents a step in the direction of achieving the objective of a more representative Public Service. Specifically, the government proposes to allocate $2 million among ten departments which have submitted proposals for extending certain programs which, at one and the same time, would contribute to the realization of program objectives and would involve positions in areas of the Public Service where French is normally used. The experimental French language units to which I made reference in my statement on March 9 will not be involved since none has yet been established. Of the 276 positions, 128 will be administrative trainees, and the balance will be junior positions in the social science, biophysical sciences and applied science fields.

It is proposed that the program extensions involved, and specifically, the increase in the numbers of positions in the Public Service, be financed out of the contingency fund.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the President of the Treasury Board for providing me with a copy of his statement in advance.

[Mr. Speaker.]

I accept, of course, the principle of equality of French and English in the Public Service and the importance of the Public Service representing the reality of the country.

I have said before and I say now that this or any government must be careful in attaining that representation that it does so in such a way that there will be no sense of injustice on the part of any group within the Public Service.

The confusion and secrecy that surrounded this particular program when it first became known was a perfect example of how not to proceed in matters concerning bilingualism in the Public Service. The present statement by the minister is at least an improvement in that regard in that it is frank and open except that, with regard to the number of persons and the cost of their employment the minister's statement is still vague.

I think that the people of Canada, and the Francophone graduates involved will want assurances that this program does not involve make-work projects. As the minister pointed out, it does not involve any experimental unilingual units because he says that none of these has yet been established. However, it does involve the expansion of existing programs and projects which involve positions where French is the language of work. In other words, the inference will be drawn that there may be other projects equally as meritorious as those that are being expanded but that these have been chosen because French is the language of work in these projects. Language of work will appear to many Canadians to be a rather new and curious principle upon which the Treasury Board recommends the establishment of particular projects.

I must tell the minister that the timing of the program is, in economic terms, unfortunate. In addition to the mass unemployment that prevails across Canada, it is public knowledge that it has been the policy of the government over the past year or more to cut back on the numbers of federal public servants. To what extent has this policy been changed and what is the policy now? In other words, if this is a program purely and simply to hire French-speaking Canadians without reference or relation to the government program in general, then I suggest it will not be acceptable to Canadians and it will not be acceptable to French-speaking Canadians.

The question we must ask ourselves is whether such a program really serves either Canadian unity or the legitimate Francophone presence in the federal Public Service. We must recognize the fact that there will be suspicion among non-Francophone Canadians. In the interests of harmony I think the government must allay that suspicion. That is why I suggest to the minister and to the government that it as quickly as possible present all available details of the programs involved.

I note that the minister says that in the ten departments concerned new employees and additional work on already existing programs will be involved and that their work will more effectively contribute to the goals that these programs are designed to achieve. That may be a welcome assurance but I hope the minister will be able to tell us in the near future what departments are involved in the interest of national unity and in the genuine interests of the extension of Francophone participation in the Public Service.

• (2:20 p.m.)

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I think no one will quarrel with the minister's statement that it is desirable to make the Public Service progressively more representative of the two major linguistic communities of Canada. Nor can anyone quarrel with the statement that the government wants to assure equality of opportunity in the Public Service. Nevertheless, neither the statement the minister made today nor the statements he has made previously have cleared up a number of very important questions. On January 25 the minister's office issued a press release, a copy of which I have in my hand. It begins by saying:

> Treasury Board President, Honourable C. M. Drury, stated that recent press stories purporting to reveal a secret government fund of $2 million for special hiring of Francophones for the Public Service have been seriously misleading.

The statement goes on to say:

> It is understood the government expects to recruit some 1,250 post-secondary graduates during 1971 and these Francophone positions would be part of that total if the departmental proposals were approved.
> "So far as the $2 million is concerned", the Minister said, "this has not been allocated to any specific program . . ."

The question which arises in my mind is, if the government has in mind hiring 1,250 post-graduate students in 1971, why would Francophone graduates be treated any differently from the others? It seems to me that there should be no difficulty in the government advertising for 1,250 positions and stipulating that 276, or whatever number the government feels is a fair percentage of the applicants, must be Francophones, and that the other merit qualifications will apply to all positions, whether the persons concerned are Anglophones or Francophones. Why is it not possible to deal with all graduates on the same basis while at the same time specifying those who must have French as their mother tongue. I find it very difficult to understand this difference in treatment and I think the public will find it very difficult to understand.

We are not opposed to having a fair percentage of Francophones in the Public Service. What we are anxious about is to guarantee that the merit system will continue to apply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The minister has not dealt with that point at all. Will the only qualifying criterion for these 276 be that French is their mother tongue?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Douglas: If they are appointed to positions when they apply for these jobs, will they be required to go through the Public Service in the usual way if these jobs become vacant? In other words, I think the House and the country want an assurance from the minister that the merit principles laid down in the Public Service Act are not being bypassed in some way. When the government picks out 276 and provides for them under the contingency vote, while the balance of the 1,250 university graduates are to be hired through departments, naturally, there is some concern whether or not the merit principle is being preserved. I hope the minister will seek the earliest occasion possible to make a statement telling us how the merit principle is going to be preserved.

From what I can gather from press reports, another reason for misunderstanding is the fact that the Public Service Alliance have not been consulted about this matter. If they have been consulted more recently, I hope the minister will inform us. Those who are concerned about the security of the positions of those who are in the Public Service, those who are concerned about maintaining the merit system, ought to be allowed to discuss this matter with the government so they can be assured that what the government is doing is simply guaranteeing that there will be a reasonable percentage of French-speaking persons in the Public Service and that in so doing the government is not in any way abusing or bypassing the merit system which all of us want to see preserved.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the partial achievement of the basic goal to assure equality of opportunity in the public service for both French and English speaking Canadians would make us feel very elated if in so doing, we could at least achieve the true equality that all Quebecers long for.

Mr. Speaker, the remarks that we have just heard from the leaders of the Progressive Conservative and New Democratic Parties leave us wondering as to the possibilities of reaching, in a near future, this equality hoped for by all French Canadians. We are so far from this hoped for equality that this timid effort looks like a revolution to some of our colleagues, while to us, from Quebec, this is but a first step toward the establishment of a beginning of justice.

Mr. Speaker, I do say, a first step and a very timid one, particularly when we read the minister's statement that the $2 million earmarked for the purpose will be distributed to only ten departments. Does this mean that the French Canadians have no interest whatsoever in the other departments which have submitted projects to extend certain programs and that those who have not submitted a project are not serving French Canadians? I would be inclined to think about that. Now we can see how very timid and weak this step is.

How can anyone take exception, how can the majority of this country, which should represent the opposition, talk about being unfair towards Anglophones?

A little further, it is said:

> —would contribute to the realization of programme objectives and will involve positions in areas of the Public Service where French is normally used.

In other words, wherever there are crying injustices, wherever French is not used, nothing will be improved since it is said that improvements will be made where French is normally used.

Mr. Speaker, all this goes to prove that this is a very timid step. This is a beginning, a very slow evolution, and in fact the core of the problem does not really involve linguistics but an active participation of French-speaking Canadians not only in legislative debates, but also in drafting these pieces of legislation and administrating this country that one would wish bilingual and bicultural.

The time has now come to stop procrastinating on this matter and start acting. Action will have to be stepped up considerably if these objectives are to be realized before Quebecers decide to do so themselves without the help of the nine other provinces.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPORT BY MINISTER ON VISIT TO AFRICA

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to report to the House briefly on my recent African trip, in the course of which I visited the Ivory Coast, Nigeria, the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Tanzania and Zambia.

This was the first series of visits by a Canadian foreign minister to Africa south of the Sahara. It enabled me to learn something, but all too little, of the countries visited. It gave me an opportunity to emphasize to the various governments the depth and continuing quality of the Canadian commitment to Africa, of which I saw convincing evidence through my meetings with more than 1,000 Canadians actively engaged in co-operative development projects—missionaries, CIDA people, CUSO volunteers and, of course, the personnel of our diplomatic missions. I also arranged for our ambassadors and high commissioners in the countries I could not visit to join us at various places in Africa in order that I might profit from their advice.

Development assistance is and will remain the largest element in our activities in Africa. This is at once a measure of the need of the developing countries there and of the opportunity Canada has to contribute its resources, human and material, operating equally in English and in French. In certain of the countries visited, I was able to give formal effect to aid arrangements worked out over the last year or so, some of which will have an immediate beneficial impact on our domestic economy.

I also visited the headquarters of the East African Community, which is a form of common market composed of Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda. I learned at first hand of development plans from the African leaders, and saw how Canadian assistance programs fit into these plans and the part they may be expected to play in the future. In all five countries, I was assured that Canadian involvement in black Africa is welcome and expansion of our present efforts is sought. African leaders in the countries I visited told me that the Canadians there were doing an excellent job and that the countries concerned could not get enough Canadian manpower. In Tanzania, for example, President Nyerere indicated that he would be delighted to receive thousands of Canadians, compared to the few hundreds there now. The Canadians I saw confirmed, for their part, the need for continued Canadian presence in Africa. It became clearer to me from day to day that our involvement has raised the expectations of our African friends and that we must continue and strengthen our partnership with them in the development of their countries.

During my two weeks in Africa I found the governments preoccupied with the intractable problems of Southern Africa. These issues have been fully explored in Commonwealth conferences, most recently at Singapore in January. I urged upon the African governments our view that the Commonwealth is an essential forum for discussing the difficult matter of racial discrimination and its repercussions.

In all five countries, Canada's stand on Southern African issues was well understood and accepted. African leaders I met expressed their satisfaction with Canada's position on these problems as expressed by our public statements and our voting record at the United Nations.

In my discussions with African leaders, I emphasized the need for a peaceful solution to the problems of Southern Africa. Large-scale hostilities in Africa could only bring about the ruin of the economy of the black nations and destroy any hope for the betterment of the life of their peoples. Such hostilities would inevitably involve outside powers and threaten a new conflict equal in magnitude to the tragedy of the Middle East or Viet Nam.

I think we should realize and accept that our capacity to influence the white racist minorities in Southern Africa is limited and can best be exercised multilaterally through the United Nations and the Commonwealth. What we can do ourselves is to offer economic and political support for the developing countries of black Africa. In this way, we can make a positive contribution to the solution of the deep-seated problems of Africa, and it is here that our energies should be focused. This is bound to be more rewarding for Africans and Canadians alike than wasting our energies in empty gestures designed to tell the world of our moral rectitude on racial questions.

I discussed the question of La Francophonie with members of the governments in the Congo and the Ivory Coast, and explained Canada's position concerning this group of countries which are united by the French language and culture.

I assured them that Canada was completely committed to co-operation with French-speaking countries in general and particularly to the Agency for Cultural and Technical Co-operation of which we are full members. I took this occasion to express our hope that the African countries would be participating equally fully in this organization to promote understanding and mutual assistance. In my opinion such full participation will permit more rapid and complete development of all the people concerned.

I also remarked that although our assistance to French-speaking African countries had begun slowly and modestly, it was our intention, now that it has reached the same level as our assistance to the Commonwealth African countries, to continue it not only for the benefit of the receiving countries but also to reaffirm Canada's bicultural character.

[English]

My tour of Africa, while all too brief, left me with a number of warm and deep impressions.

First, Canada is highly regarded and its name stands very high in Africa. Africans have given us their confidence, and it is this trust which creates an obligation on our part to share with them some of our resources by participating as partners in their programs for economic and social development. This can be achieved by offering to Africa the best in Canada from those fields where Canadians have achieved excellence and special expertise.

Such a joint venture will benefit not only Africans but Canadians. The Canadians serving in various capacities over the continent, old or young, missionaries or volunteers, CIDA personnel or businessmen, are engaged in useful, constructive and essential projects. On their return to Canada, what they have learned about the common human condition will stand them in good stead and will help us all to a better understanding of the world we live in. If one is seeking economic justification for external aid, as development proceeds, African countries will become markets for Canadian products, particularly capital goods, and mutually beneficial trade should increase. Already, in some of the larger countries like Nigeria and the Congo interesting commercial aspects are arising.

Our co-operation with and assistance to Africa can become among the best and most realistic expressions of our national character. Canada and Africa have been enriched by two great European cultures and languages; both Canada and the African countries I visited are engaged in the strengthening of their national unity and sovereignty; like the countries of Africa, Canada is still in the course of development, and, along with our African friends, Canadians abhor the immoral and inhuman policies implemented by the white minority regimes of Southern Africa.

I return from my tour with the conviction that we must continue and increase over time our contribution to the economic development programs of our African friends. Our co-operation with Anglophone and Francophone countries of Africa reflects our own national personality. Our participation in the harmonious economic development of African countries constitutes, I believe, the best way of promoting peace through social justice and the most effective response to the challenge of racial inequality in Southern Africa.

On my way through London to Africa, I met with the Secretary General of the Commonwealth, Mr. Arnold Smith, and on my return journey I gave him some of my impressions which I thought might interest him in his official capacity.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I must begin, as I am happy to begin, by welcoming the minister back. We followed with interest his pilgrimage across Africa. We noted his activities. He was at a zoo. I hope he got along there as well as his chief did in another place.

I want to assure the hon. gentleman that while he was away the Acting Secretary of State, the President of the Treasury Board, did not let him down at all by giving away any information on any question he was asked.

The statement the minister has just made is not an earthshaking statement. It is, rather, one of those comforting and comfortable documents to which I find it impossible, even if it were my wont, to take violent exception. Perhaps it was somewhat less interesting than the very good press reports we read of his journey. He started in the Ivory Coast where he was reported so favourably impressed with the views of the president of that country. I was wondering whether he embraced the views of that gentleman on the Middle East war and its correlation with the South Africa situation.

Then there seemed to be a change as he continued his journey and moved toward a position that has become so common in the Canadian voting pattern in the United Nations, something of an abstention. The minister also abstained on a very important matter about which I hoped he would make an announcement during his tour, namely, the opening of a diplomatic mission in Zambia, a country that is so vitally concerned in the grave problems and terrible assaults on human dignity now troubling southern Africa. I would say to the minister that I am convinced that the opening of a mission in that country would have been more valuable and vital than any of the gifts that he dispensed or announced. I hope that some day he will be able to convince the President of the Treasury Board that we should open a mission in Zambia as well as one in Algeria. Or is it the case that austerity can be broken for Algeria but not for Zambia?

I was impressed with the minister's statement in reference to moral rectitude and agree with what he said. The minister spoke of abandoning the practice of wasting our energies in empty gestures designed to tell the world of our moral rectitude on racial questions. I am profoundly in agreement with this. For so long have we practised this. There was a time when Canada was regarded as a sort of omnipresent saviour of the world everywhere we were expected to go. Now I fear there is a tendency to become the cloistered saint, but we do not give up our preachments because we sometimes avoid our commitments. It will be a mark of maturity if we drop our pious preaching of pusillanimous platitudes and move on to accept those commitments that we can meet and are prepared to meet. I salute the minister for his statement and I admire his precepts, but he might well become his own first convert to that very fine exhortation.

I was impressed too with the non-reference to the freeing of the inhibitions on our aid. When the minister was in Africa I read that he said to the President of the Ivory Coast, I believe it was, that Canada would adopt a more flexible attitude on the question of tied aid. However, I saw nothing in his announcement and heard nothing in the television programs over the weekend to indicate this.

I agree wholeheartedly with what the minister said in his statement—indeed, he made this point twice—about the Canadian volunteers, the CIDA-CUSO people. He did not mention the CESO people who are sometimes called the "paunch corps", which of course is most unkind! These are the people who, in my opinion, are the real ambassadors of this country, and I am so glad that the minister reported on their behalf. Many of these people, young and old, before they go out to foreign fields are briefed by the minister's department, I believe quite well, but I have never heard of any of them being debriefed when they come back. When we send hundreds of young people to various parts of the world, are they not a magnificent store of information, a group of sensitive and informed people? I believe that the minister's department should make contact with them and thereby broaden their knowledge and Canada's capacity for doing good work. That is a suggestion I would make.

There may be, indeed there are, many questions which should be gone into, this having been a very important tour on the part of the minister. Therefore I hope he will be with us in the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that we may have time to discuss these questions. We have had too many months elapse without an external affairs debate in the House, and I might say I am very upset about that. Perhaps at least in committee we can look more fully into the visit to this great continent, a continent that has been silent for so long and which only in our own time has moved into the international scene. It is a vital part of the world, one massive in its geography, immense in its problems and magnificent in its possibilities. Let me assure the minister that I, and I am sure I speak for my colleagues, agree with him that we must continue our partnership with the people of this great continent from which he has just returned.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I should also like to welcome the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) back to the House from his trip to Africa. We are very pleased that he is the first Canadian minister of external affairs to visit Africa. We think his visit coincides with a growing interest in Canada in the problems of Africa. I am certain that the minister's visit to that continent will enable the Canadian government to formulate policies which will be of benefit to the continent of Africa.

We support the minister in his statement that we must both continue and increase our contributions to the economic development programs of our African friends. We also agree with his statement that we in Canada look with abhorrence upon the inhuman policies of the white minority governments in Africa.

While the minister has made these statements, with which we all concur, there are a number of things that happened during his trip about which I hope the minister will make a statement; they are not included in the statement he made today. I might make reference to the plea of Mr. Kaunda of Zambia that a Canadian mission be opened in Lusaka. I know that the minister could not make a statement to that effect while he was in Africa without the concurrence of the cabinet. I think we will all await with great interest the result of the minister's consultation with his colleagues, which I hope will be a decision to have a Canadian High Commission in Zambia.

I would also have welcomed a statement from the minister on Mr. Kaunda's plea in regard to the Canadian government trying to persuade the Aluminum Company of Canada to stop supplying material for the Cabora Bassa dam in Mozambique. One Swedish firm has already withdrawn because it had some reason to believe that this aluminum would be processed in Rhodesia and consequently might violate Sweden's commitment to observe the economic boycott of that country. I hope the minister will look into this matter and, if he finds that this aluminum is going to be processed in Salisbury, Rhodesia, that Canada will not allow the Aluminum Company of Canada, or any other company, by subterfuge make Canada violate its commitments regarding the boycott of Rhodesia.

One of the matters that disturbed some of us who followed the reports of the minister's visit was the somewhat equivocal stand that he took with respect to the white minority governments in Africa. It is true that he spoke out with plenty of rectitude about the inhuman policies that they are pursuing, but I noticed that after agreeing with the president of the Ivory Coast he ran into some difficulty when he was in Nigeria. The press reports General Yakubu Gowon as saying:

> Gowon gave Sharp a hard line on southern Africa yesterday, rejecting the "dialogue" approach to solving the racial issue.
> In an interview shortly after an hour long meeting with Sharp, Gowon said the white minority government of South Africa wants to "lure" top black African leaders into a dialogue over the racial question.
> South Africa would treat these leaders well and offer them "chicken-feed economic aid," he said. But having pacified its neighbours, South Africa would then do nothing about the plight of its own black subjects.
> "To me, that thinking stinks," Gowon said.

I hope we will not be equivocal in our stand with respect to the white minority governments in southern Africa but will make it abundantly clear, not only by the platitudes uttered by the minister but by our actions, that we stand with the black people of Africa who are seeking to obtain democratic rights for their people without relation to race, colour or creed.

The only other thing I should like to say is that I notice the minister said that Canada stands ready to help fly maize into Zambia if the white minority governments in Africa continue to block imports of that country's staple food. This, of course, would require a very heavy expenditure by the Canadian government, but it would be the kind of gesture the people of black Africa would understand. I hope we will have a statement from the minister fairly soon as to just how he is prepared to carry through that offer and whether the Canadian government is prepared to fly food into Zambia if as at present that country is thwarted in its efforts to feed its own people because of the actions of the white minority governments in southern Africa.

We welcome the minister's statement. We approve of the ideas he has put forward with regard to aid to Africa and his abhorrence of the policies pursued by the white minority governments in Africa. All we ask now is that the minister put these fine statements and this excellent rhetoric into practice by some hard government policies.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the minister's return and the report he has just made, indicate that I had no reason to be concerned. Indeed, I was afraid the minister would venture much too far in the jungle and cause a revival of ancient and long-gone cannibalistic traditions.

From what I can gather from his report, the minister merely visited the better developed African areas, met the authorities of those five countries that had made their requirements known and that thanked him for Canada's aid which is relatively recent at least with respect to the Francophone countries where it has been in existence only for the past few years.

Mr. Speaker, we followed the trip of the minister to that part of the world and we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, believe that Canada should not neglect any country in its international relations.

However, we wish the minister and the government would have the same consideration for Canadian areas that are also underdeveloped and as such live now in poverty and misery.

We are aware that Canada is helping various countries, not to extend its rule over them as some others would, but for commendable motives, that is to promote among countries of those areas the peace we would like to see in other parts of the world such as Asia.

Mr. Speaker, we would like also to see peace assured in underdeveloped areas of Canada where there are today ferments of revolution caused by undeserved misery, in the midst of abundance. While maintaining our assistance to those countries as much as we can, I believe the government should pay more attention to our own undeveloped areas.

NUMBER OF PERSONS REGISTERED FOR ADULT TRAINING COURSE

Question No. 1,095—Mr. Fortin:

1. How many persons were registered full-time for an adult training course given by the Department of Manpower and Immigration at the end of (a) December, 1969 (b) January, 1970 (c) December, 1970 (d) January, 1971 (e) February, 1971?

2. How many persons completed a training course in 1970?

3. How many of these persons were unemployed when they began taking the course?

4. What percentage of those, who took this course in 1970, have been able to find employment on completion of their course?

[Translation]

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. (a) 52,759, (b) 68,496, (c) 57,849, and (d) 83,712, excluding workers being trained by employers under contract with the Department of Manpower and Immigration. (e) Information not yet available.

2. 176,582 trainees completed courses under the Canada Manpower Training Program in 1970, excluding part-time trainees, and workers trained by their employers under contract with the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

3. 52.2% of those referred to full-time training in 1969-70 were unemployed at the time of referral.

4. Information for 1970 is not yet available. However, of some 154,000 full-time trainees who completed their training in 1969-70, 38,600 were apprentices, nearly all of whom, under the terms of their apprenticeship, expected to return to work for their employers immediately upon completion of their courses. Of the remainder, a sample survey indicates that 74% of respondents were employed three to four months after completing all of their course work.

NEWFOUNDLAND—RDIA APPLICATIONS

Question No. 1,103—Mr. Marshall:

1. (a) What firms in the Province of Newfoundland submitted applications for Regional Development Incentive grants and were turned down (b) what were the reasons in each case?

2. Has DREE completed the study of the Regional Development Incentives Act programs in the Province of Newfoundland and, if so, what were the findings?

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): 1. Applications for incentives are confidential business information, unless and until an offer is made and accepted by the company.

2. The study presumably referred to is an industrial opportunity study. It is in progress.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—OFFICER REQUIREMENTS

Question No. 1,108—Mr. Forrestall:

What is the current requirement per year of new officers in the Armed Forces and, of these, how many at university graduate level?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): In 1971-72, 749. Of these 358 will be graduating from subsidized university training plans and 140 will be commissioned from the ranks. Of the remaining 251 it is hoped as many as possible will be university graduates, or, as a minimum, hold a diploma from an accredited technological institute. Any additional requirements may be met by enrolling high school matriculants through the Officer Candidate Training Plan. Once the current force reduction has been accomplished it is estimated that the annual requirement for officers will be approximately 1,100 per year, 60% of whom we hope will be university graduates.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES—RECRUIT INTAKE

Question No. 1,109—Mr. Forrestall:

What is the ratio (numerical rather than fractional) of recruits as to enlisted personnel required in the Armed Forces to maintain an adequate complement?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Approximately one to eight.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING FOREIGN INVESTMENT —NEW MEASURES TO ASSIST SLOW-GROWTH AREAS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance concerning unemployment, perhaps especially in the province of Quebec. In view of the importance the government of the province of Quebec is attaching to foreign investment in the creation of badly needed employment in that province and, indeed, has been looking as much to New York as to Ottawa in that regard, is it the policy of the government to encourage such foreign investment or is it the intention of the government to restrict such foreign investment in Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend knows that there are very few restrictions on foreign investment in Canada at present and that the government's future policy with respect to foreign investment is being studied by my colleague, the Minister of National Revenue. The government will be making a general statement in this regard in due course.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to ask the minister whether he proposes to remove the uncertainties existing in the minds of foreign investors with regard to policies of ownership and taxation, and can the minister indicate whether there is any way in which a foreign investor can get an answer today from the government of Canada with respect to either of these questions?

Mr. Benson: With respect to the problem of foreign investment in Canada there are, as my hon. friend knows, very few limitations on foreign investment in Canada. With respect to the matter of future tax policy in the country, we have undertaken to bring forward legislation with respect to tax reform in the near future.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the retroactive measures that the government has adopted, that assurance may not be of any comfort to anybody. I should like to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Development whether, in view of what can properly be described as the failure of his policies in areas of slow growth such as the Gaspe and others, he proposes to do anything to remove these uncertainties, and in particular whether he proposes to introduce any new measures to encourage such areas of slow growth?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Leader of the Opposition will appreciate that a question couched in such terms is not in order, but the matter being of wide general interest the minister might wish to reply to the question.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I feel the hon. leader of the opposition should perhaps look at the statistics on the results of the programs adopted by the department; he would then see how many jobs have been created and how much money has been spent, specifically in his province. However, that does not meet the needs of the economy generally speaking, and simply stating without any reservations whatsoever that our programs have been a failure is really akin to irresponsibility—

FINANCE

PROPOSED FOREIGN TAKEOVERS—CRITICISMS BY BANK PRESIDENTS—REMOVAL OF EXEMPTION PROTECTING BANKS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the statements made by certain bank presidents in New York criticizing the government of Canada for interfering with certain foreign takeovers, I should like to ask the minister if the Canadian Bankers Association or the two bank presidents in question have ever made any representations to the government asking the government to remove the exemption which protects the banking fraternity against foreign takeovers?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I heard some reference to this government in exile speaking over the weekend. I have asked for a transcript of what was said.

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK SERVICE CHARGES—AMENDMENT OF COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I address a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the banks, in toto, are going to raise the charges to their customers by very large amounts, and in view of the fact that both the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Finance have said they have no jurisdiction over the banks in this regard, is the government planning to bring in any legislation which would bring the chartered banks of Canada within the ambit of the Combines Investigation Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is usual for the House to wait for the bill to be introduced to know what it will contain. I cannot add anything to what was said the other day by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that this matter was being looked into as the result of the study on combines which was made by the Economic Council of Canada.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Was the parliamentary secretary reflecting government policy when he said that perhaps we should be considering nationalizing the banks?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is not in order.

[Later:]

ALLEGED DISCOURAGEMENT OF BUSINESS EXPANSION DECISIONS BY GOVERNMENT ECONOMIC ACTIVITIES

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In view of the statement by the heads of Canadian chartered banks in New York last week to the effect that the activities of the federal government in nine specific economic fields have discouraged Canadian businessmen from making the decisions which are necessary for the satisfactory expansion of their operations, is the government reconsidering its policies in these fields so that it may help rather than hinder this expansion which is so necessary to fight unemployment?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I think my friend should also ask for a transcript of what was said. It was not a statement by eight presidents of chartered banks but rather various statements by one or two about various aspects of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister aware of the fact that the following expression appears in quotes in the statement, that the Canadian government is scaring the daylights out of business and that they are not going ahead, therefore, to make the decisions that are necessary?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—STATEMENT BY GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the House whether he intends to take efficient steps against unemployment in contrast to the request made by the head of high finance, the Governor of the Bank of Canada?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that the Governor of the Bank of Canada has rejected fiscal or monetary policies as a way to attack unemployment.

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a supplementary question.

I wonder whether the Prime Minister has quite understood the question of the hon. member for Villeneuve who did not mention the Governor General of Canada but the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Could the Prime Minister say—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laprise: Here is my supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the Prime Minister say whether the statement by the Governor of the Bank of Canada was made at the request of the Prime Minister and of the Canadian government?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course not, Mr. Speaker, except that the law obliges the Governor to submit an annual report and as required under the act he did submit it to the Minister of Finance. Obviously, neither the Minister of Finance nor any other cabinet member have dictated this report to the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question?

In view of the minister's statement dealing with unemployment in Canada, is the Prime Minister ready to tell us if, following the statement of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, we can expect the government not to heed the requests of the Canadian public to solve, once and for all, this problem of unemployment in Canada?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN—APPLICATION FOR GRANT TO CONSTRUCT PULP MILL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. It has to do with an application made by the government of Saskatchewan for some $12 million for the building of a major undertaking in northern Saskatchewan, which will constitute the largest pulp mill in Canada, in which Parsons and Whittemore of New York, have the largest interest with the government of Saskatchewan having a small interest. The application was made some time ago and the delay is making it very difficult to get the work under way, as it should be, before the break-up in the spring. The matter has been before the minister for some time. Will he tell the House what the present position is?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): The application is being processed by the department. I think it will be forwarded to the Treasury Board in the coming days. As soon as it is approved by the cabinet, we will give an answer to the company.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister do something about rushing this matter? It has been before his department since January and it is the largest industry for which Saskatchewan has ever applied. With assistance going to other parts of Canada, Saskatchewan would like to be included.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—COMMUNICATION FROM QUEBEC ON EXTENSION OR EXPIRY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is for the Minister of Justice. Can he inform the House whether he has received any communication either from the Attorney General or the Premier of Quebec pursuant to a cabinet meeting which is supposed to have taken place last Friday to discuss the possible extension or perhaps the natural expiry of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No, Sir, I have not.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of previous answers given to this and similar questions, can the minister inform the House whether it is the intention of the federal government to act automatically on the request of the government of Quebec, or whether prior to any such request being received either he or the Prime Minister will take a position on this important matter?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the attitude of the government of Quebec is only one of the factors which the government will take into consideration.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of that answer by the Minister of Justice I wonder when either he or the Prime Minister will make a statement on motions indicating what other factors will be taken into consideration in the making of this decision?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Parliament will be taken into our confidence very soon, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH

STEPS TO COUNTERACT PHARMACEUTICAL INDUSTRY PROPAGANDA AGAINST USE OF GENERIC DRUGS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. What steps does the Food and Drugs Directorate intend to take to counteract pharmaceutical industry propaganda against the use of properly tested generic drugs?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may have noticed the announcement concerning the actions we are taking. One is that we are giving quality assurance with respect to many drugs. This has been going on for several months. We are advising the doctors, and everyone else on our mailing list, of our investigations so they can use their own discretion and thereby put more emphasis on low-cost drugs.

Mrs. MacInnis: May I ask when the first reports will be available on the directorate's testing of all brands of the 25 top selling drugs on the Canadian market?

Mr. Munro: Progressively over a period of a year. As we test them, gradually we make the results known.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PAYMENT OF UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFIT INCREASE TO MINERS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Does the Minister of Labour intend to see that the 10 per cent increase in UIC benefits, granted in January, will be paid to the miners and not to Devco?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think the idea is a good one, but the question should be put to the proper minister, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. MacInnis: As a supplementary question I would ask the Minister of Labour why he is deliberately deceiving me on this question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows very well he cannot suggest that another member is deliberately deceiving him or deceiving the House, or deliberately deceiving any person. I am sure that the hon. member, who has had numerous exchanges with the Minister of Labour in this regard, would not want to impute that there is an attempt on the part of the minister, or of any member of this House, to deceive him deliberately in this or any other regard.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I stand here in this House and confirm that the truth is stronger than our rules. To support this question of privilege I quote from the minister's own handwriting which reads:

If you ask me if Devco will absorb increase of 10 per cent of UIC benefits effective January 1/70—

He should have said January 3, 1971.

—I will answer that I intend to make certain that this extra monies go to the people it was intended for—the people and not the company.

The miners, and not the company. I am sick and tired of having the minister in charge of UIC benefits trying to pass on questions within his jurisdiction to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, who has no business at all dealing with the UIC. I repeat that the minister has deliberately deceived me on this.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is not permitted to say that.

Mr. MacInnis: I have said it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has some obligation, as do all other members of this House, to respect the rules and the practices of the House. Even if a member feels very strongly about a matter, even if he feels he should go as far as he can to promote a cause, he has no right to violate the rules of the House which command hon. members not to accuse another member of the House of deliberately deceiving him. Perhaps the minister might like to reply.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the letter which was described as in my own handwriting, and I stand by that letter. I do think that the unemployment insurance increase of 10 per cent should go to the miners and not to Devco. I challenge the hon. member to put a question to the appropriate minister—he may be surprised by the answer—if he is not just interested in making political propaganda out of this matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order. At the same time the minister is deserving of a suggestion from the Chair. He has no right to suggest that another member is asking a question or is making a statement with motives. I also suggest that the minister and the hon. member should have a conference about this matter. I realize that they have been discussing it together from time to time, but there should be some way in which the matter can be resolved.

Some months ago, by unanimous consent, the House agreed to send this very serious matter to a committee of the House, and I was hoping that the very difficult situation might be resolved before now. However, that still does not make it possible for the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond to say that another member has deceived him deliberately, and that it does not make it possible for the minister to impute motives to another member. I hope both hon. members will find it possible to indicate that they did not intend to make such statements.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully ask for a ruling on whether any minister can shift the responsibility for answering questions on matters which come under his jurisdiction to another minister? In other words, are we now permitted to ask any minister in the House questions on any subject, or should questions be restricted to the jurisdiction of a minister?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot ask for a ruling in general or in theory. The hon. member knows, as do all hon. members, that a ruling was made a long time ago that questions can be answered only by ministers who have responsibility for specific fields of administrative duty. I have made that ruling myself on a number of occasions. I make it again today.

Sometimes it is very difficult for the Chair to determine which minister has a particular responsibility, but I think the Chair is entitled to accept the word of a member of the cabinet that a certain question does not fall under his jurisdiction. If a minister makes that kind of statement, I think the Chair is authorized to assume that it does not come under his jurisdiction. This is the ruling which I am making, and which has been made previously by the Chair on a number of occasions.

Mr. Norman A. Cafik (Ontario): Supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure whether the hon. member's contribution is supplementary to the point of order, the question of privilege, or the question raised originally by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, and I would like to direct it to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Will the minister assure the House that the full benefits of the unemployment insurance increase will, in fact, be made available to the Devco workers?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there has been a meeting of the Board of Directors of Devco these last few days, and it has been decided to grant full benefits to retired workers. There was never a question of deducting from workers' pay cheques any amount whatever from unemployment insurance. There has merely been a question of deducting from the contribution to the pension fund by Devco the supplementary amount paid by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. That is why the matter comes under the jurisdiction of my department.

[English]

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, before I put my supplementary I would very much like to thank the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion for the statement he has made with respect to full benefits.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the hon. member asks a question I think he has a responsibility to this House, and to the Chair, to recognize that his words have gone a little too far in accusing a minister of deliberately deceiving him. In 100 years of parliamentary history that has never been accepted as a parliamentary term. It should be possible for the hon. member to co-operate with the Chair and amend his suggestion. It has always been possible to suggest that an hon. member has misled a member or has misled the House. I would suggest that perhaps the hon. member might give some thought to making a distinction on that basis.

Mr. MacInnis: I would like to follow up the supplementary question I—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has no right to ask a supplementary until he has indicated whether he intends to accept the suggestion the Chair has made, which is a very reasonable suggestion. The hon. member knows that an attempt is made by the Chair at all times to co-operate with hon. members and to make it easy for them to make their points when they are representative of the views of the people they represent. I suggest very candidly, honestly, and with all good will to the hon. member, that it would be very easy for him at this point to indicate that perhaps his words went a little too far and that he would be satisfied to say that, although he has been misled, or the House has been misled, he has not been misled intentionally or deliberately.

Mr. MacInnis: With all due deference, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely apologize to you for putting you on what might be considered a very touchy spot. Nevertheless, I know you will handle it properly and I will probably wind up before a committee of this House, but I stand here now and maintain that the truth is stronger than any rules of this House.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not hear too well over here but I found nothing particularly offensive in the hon. gentleman's remarks. The Scots and the Irish have mental telepathy, and I understand that the hon. gentleman's main concern has been the miners of Devco. He has communicated with me on half a dozen occasions, both verbally and in writing and I am quite satisfied with the turn of events. The important thing is that the workers of Devco, through my representations to my colleague and representation by other members, will receive, although there is no legal obligation on the part of Devco, the 10 per cent increase in unemployment insurance benefits. I am quite prepared and happy to let the matter rest there.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not entirely satisfied with the suggestion made by the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I really do not think it is for the minister or the person who perhaps has been aggrieved to say that he will not pursue the matter. It is not the minister who has been offended, it is the Parliament of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I doubt very much whether we can allow this kind of incident to go without notice. It certainly is most unpleasant for the Chair. The hon. member has always been kind to the Chair and has co-operated with me, but at the same time he must realize that there are limitations to what can be done and what cannot be done. I have invited the hon. member to co-operate with me. I wonder whether the hon. member might not like to take into account the words of peace extended by the minister. The minister has indicated that he is prepared to forget the incident. It seems to me this is a good basis on which we might forget about the matter. If the hon. member were to take the same generous position as the minister, I think we could go on to pursue the business of the House. I would invite the hon. member to give this some thought. I am sure he has it in his heart to be as generous in this regard as the minister has been. I would invite him to do this.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, it is very hard to resist your appeal and on the basis of the words of the Speaker I would apologize to the Chair. I hope that this apology will stir the committee into meeting on this very serious matter in Cape Breton. There have been only two committee meetings since the petition was put before the House. That petition having been accepted by the House, I think it is time this government gave justice to the miners of Cape Breton because I have been pursuing this matter for three years.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has been generous enough to tender an apology, and I doubt whether we should go any further. I realize it is not easy, when an hon. member feels he is really fighting as objectively and strongly as he can for the people he represents, to go further than the hon. member has done in this instance. I can assure the hon. member and the House that I am satisfied, but I hope he will keep it in mind that if the same words are repeated, and the same incident happens, I will have to take the same stand and ask for withdrawal, apology or rectification, which the hon. member has been generous enough to make.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—AVAILABILITY OF GUIDELINES AND APPLICATION FORMS—NUMBER TO BE EMPLOYED

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether the guidelines and application forms necessary for those interested in participating in the Opportunities for Youth program are ready? Have they been made available to prospective applicants in the various cities of Canada and, if so, can they be made public by the minister today?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Besides, information concerning this program and the conditions for participating will be made known to hon. members within a few hours.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether he can give the House an estimate of the number of students who will be employed this summer under the program and the length of such employment. Has the government calculated this?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I am unable to give an estimate concerning the Opportunities for Youth program, due to the fact that on the one hand, some people will be involved in this program as mere participants while on the other hand, some young workers will be paid to accelerate, improve and promote this participation. It would not be therefore without some misgivings that I would at this time attempt to give an estimate the inaccuracy of which could justifiably be criticized by the hon. member should my projection happen to be false.

PLANS RESPECTING PROVISION OF SUMMER HOSTELS FOR TRANSIENTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement that the government will support local initiative in connection with youth hostels, can the minister give the House any more details of the government's plans regarding summer hostels for young transients?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, an objective of 200,000 bed nights was mentioned, and this objective will be achieved through local, municipal and provincial initiative, with the help of special funds provided for this purpose in this year's summer employment program.

[English]

TIME LIMIT ON APPLICATIONS UNDER OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether there is a fixed time limit for applications under the Opportunities for Youth program to be filed in Ottawa?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there is no set date, but for those who wish to submit projects, the best time would be "as soon as possible, if not sooner", as the saying goes, and certainly not later, at any rate, than April 15 next.

[English]

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, the April 15 deadline was the date I was going to suggest. I thank the minister.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—METHOD OF ALLOCATING FUNDS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister state whether the moneys available for the Opportunities for Youth program will be allotted on a first-come, first-served basis or on a regional basis? Are there regional ceilings or provincial ceilings on the moneys available or will this aspect be covered in the press release?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I have not heard the last words spoken by the hon. member. To his first question, my answer is that all the factors he mentioned will be taken into consideration, according to some order of priority, but not necessarily the order in which they were listed by the hon. member.

[Later:]

PLANS RESPECTING PROVISION OF SUMMER HOSTEL FOR TRANSIENTS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the hon. Secretary of State a question concerning his hostel program for transient youth. Could he tell the House whether he has met with Quebec authorities with regard to this hostel program for transient youth which, it would seem, is exclusively under provincial jurisdiction since it is connected with education?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, we have not had a special meeting devoted to the matter of young people's hostels, but we have had meetings where this matter was brought up. The government of the province of Quebec has agreed, as we were agreed before, that hostels for transient youth providing studying, education and folklore training facilities, etc., may and in fact do come under provincial authority at the present time. But the provinces, Quebec included, also admitted that federal authorities are responsible for setting up shelter-type hostels where the stay is limited to one or two nights and which would allow all young Canadians to travel across the country.

[English]

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—PUBLICIZING OF INFORMATION IN ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State arising from the statement he made that applications for summer employment should be in by April 15. Can he say whether, in this regard, his department is conferring with any other department, such as the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in order to bring this information to people in isolated areas who may not learn of it by April 15 unless it is brought to their attention by one of those departments?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REFUSAL OF RAILWAYS TO ACCEPT CONCILIATION BOARD REPORT ON DISPUTE WITH LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—DEPARTMENTAL ACTION

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): I have a question for the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. After 15 months of negotiations between the railway companies and the locomotive engineers, has the minister received news that the railway companies have turned down the recent report of the conciliation board? If so, will the minister state what action his department is taking to bring the parties together?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, a report has been made by the conciliation board which has been released. It places the unions in a strike position within a reasonable period, about a week, and the companies in a lockout position. I would anticipate the next step to be mediation.

INTERPROVINCIAL MARKETING—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO SUPREME COURT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Justice. It arises out of the question I asked him last week. Has he, since then, read the decision handed down by the Manitoba Court of Appeal with regard to the interpretation of section 121 of the British North America Act, and is he now prepared to say whether he will permit a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada on the interpretation of that section?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, yes, I have, but I am not in a position, until I have received further advice from the officials of the department, to say what action we are going to take. The position, as I see it at the moment, does not differ from the statement that I made earlier to the House, that in order for there to be a successful reference to the Supreme Court of Canada there must be agreement not only on what questions of law are to be determined by the court but there must also be agreement on the facts. Speaking to the latter situation, we have no satisfactory statement of agreed facts.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, is the minister not aware of the old saying that where there is a will there is a way? If he does not act, western Canada will become convinced that there is no will.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK SERVICE CHARGES—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the great concern being voiced by the public and members of the House of Commons about the increase in service charges by the chartered banks of Canada, would he refer this issue to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think, really, that it would be proper to make such a reference, but I will be glad to consider the matter.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, while the minister is considering this question, would he also consider asking the committee to look into the behaviour of the banks in terms of making irresponsible statements on government policy?

GRAIN

INQUIRY AS TO POLICY RESPECTING FARM STORAGE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Since he is advocating that 200 million bushels of wheat less should be held in commercial positions and that a comparable amount of barley should be on hand for potential sales and since there will be an increase in rape grown, thus creating a storage problem for farmers, will the minister be announcing a policy dealing with farm storage?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the amount of grain in storage at the present time may not necessarily increase. The hon. member is right in referring to some indications that we probably could have a larger inventory of barley compared with our overly large inventory of wheat for sales in future, but the total situation need not worsen.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Despite the assurances by the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, will the minister consider reducing the 12 per cent sales tax and, in addition, introducing legislation which will provide for low interest rates in connection with farm storage which will become necessary?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that I understand the purport of the question. If my hon. friend is asking that I abolish the general sales tax in Canada, I may say that it is not our intention to do so.

PRAIRIE GRAIN STABILIZATION PLAN—REPAYMENT OF CASH ADVANCES FROM TRANSITIONAL PAYMENTS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. Does the minister intend to force farmers to pay back outstanding cash advances from the $100 million payment which is to be made and which he announced last week?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it might be ordinary practice to require any defaults to be taken into consideration, but certainly ordinary, outstanding indebtedness under cash advances will not be offset against the payments.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

RENEGOTIATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND DEVELOPMENT PLAN BY FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Is he now in a position to answer the question I asked last Thursday, which the Prime Minister took as notice on his behalf, regarding any request from the government of Prince Edward Island to renegotiate the comprehensive development plan operating in that province in light of the very high level of unemployment existing there which is now, I believe, above 13 per cent?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, the program concerning Prince Edward Island is under constant review to keep up with new developments. We are always in touch with that government and after all it is rather encouraging to see that this year the unemployment rate is lower in Prince Edward Island in spite of the situation in Canada in general.

[English]

[Later:]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question that is supplementary to the original question. I think, first of all, that the minister's information is wrong. Unemployment is higher—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has the floor for just a few seconds. We are fast reaching the end of the question period.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the clearly stated implications that the plan would be renegotiated shortly, as agreed when the plan was originally signed, may I ask what provision the minister is making for public submissions from the people of Prince Edward Island with respect to the effectiveness of the plan and possible alterations in it?

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if both governments have agreed to hear the parties concerned. I will inquire about it. As for myself, I have no objection.

[English]

REPORT OF ATLANTIC ADVISORY COUNCIL ON OPERATION OF ACT

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since unemployment in one province is substantially higher, can the minister say if he has received the report of the Atlantic Advisory Council and its review of the Regional Development Incentives Act which was intended to try to upgrade the effectiveness of that Act in one province in eastern Canada? If not, can he say when we will receive the report?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think that the department has received this report which is now under consideration. As soon as we are in a position to draw conclusions, we will inform the House accordingly.

INDUSTRY

INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT ON CANADIAN PUBLISHING ASSOCIATION PROPOSALS—ASSISTANCE TO PUBLISHERS OF SCHOLARLY AND ARTISTIC WORKS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. May I ask if he has had time to consider the proposals put before him by the Canadian Publishing Association on March 2? If so, when may we expect a statement in the House about proposed government action relating to those recommendations?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I can only answer that the conclusions drawn from those consultations are still under consideration, but I cannot say when a statement will be made on motions.

[English]

Mr. Rowland: Has the minister requested the Humanities Research Council and the Canada Council to consider ways and means of assisting the publishers of scholarly and artistic works in Canada, and enhancing that assistance?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, both councils took part in our consultations with the publishers, so they are perfectly aware of both updated requirements and available resources.

COST OF PROGRAM FOR HIRING FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Will the $2 million referred to for the program within the ten departments be spent on all 1,250 recruits for the Public Service or only on the one-quarter who are Francophone?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): No, Mr. Speaker. The sum in question relates entirely to the 276 Francophone persons I have mentioned.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): My question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. For some time now the minister has been promising the House a white paper on immigration and matters dealing with the Immigration Appeal Board. From time to time he has told us that this will be forthcoming. Is the minister now in a position to tell the House when this document will be forthcoming?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): That was not exactly the way or what I have been promising, Mr. Speaker. I hope that legislation dealing with the Immigration Appeal Board and some related amendments will be before the House before long.

METHOD OF PAYMENT OF UNIVERSITY GRADUATES HIRED OTHER THAN UNDER FRANCOPHONE PROGRAM

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): My question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Of the 1,250 post-secondary graduates the minister referred to in his statement of October 25, including the 276 who are to be looked after by a special contingency vote, how are the balance to be provided for?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): The balance will be part of the main estimates, Mr. Speaker. Provision will be made through the main estimates for the approximately 1,000 which it was contemplated earlier would be recruited in the Public Service this year.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre apparently has a supplementary question. With the consent of the House, he will be recognized. I suggest that further questions might be asked tomorrow.

PROGRAM FOR HIRING FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—LANGUAGE QUALIFICATION

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Will completely bilingual applicants of merit be recruited for the 276 jobs referred to or only those whose mother tongue is French?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think it should be made clear that preference will be given to those whose mother tongue is French. What is being sought is a twofold objective: one, to increase the representation of the French-speaking linguistic community in the Public Service and, two, an ability to efficiently work creatively in the French language.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

TEXTILE AND CLOTHING BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT, INQUIRIES, REPORTS, ADJUSTMENT ASSISTANCE FOR WORKERS

The House resumed, from Thursday, March 18, consideration of Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 2 (Mr. Horner). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion, will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Textile and Clothing Board Act

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved motion No. 3:

That Bill C-215, An Act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other Acts in consequence thereof, be amended by striking out lines 45 to 48, inclusive, in subclause (2) of Clause 17 at page 7 thereof and by substituting therefor the following:

"an interim basis pending its evaluation of the plans."; and by adding immediately after sub-clause (2) of Clause 17 at page 7 the following:

Full report to follow

"(3) Where the Board makes a report under subsection (2) recommending that special measures of protection be implemented immediately, the Board shall, not later than one hundred and eighty days after the making of that report, make a written report to the Minister as required under subsection (1) containing its recommendations with respect to the textile and clothing goods that were the subject matter of the report under subsection (2)."

and by renumbering subsequent subclauses accordingly.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief. Since this amendment has been proposed, as you said, by me, it is normal that it be the subject of certain explanations on my part.

The first part of the amendment reads as follows, in English:

[English]

—an interim basis pending its evaluation of the plan.

That is just going back to the original wording of the clause.

The second part, i.e. new Clause 17(3) is an amendment to implement more directly and slightly alter the concept or intention the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) had in mind when submitting his amendment which was adopted by the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The hon. member said at that time that it mattered little to him whether the period were to be 90 days or more. Besides, I have already consulted the hon. member for Edmonton West about our amendment and I am under the impression that he was in agreement with our proposal: a limit of 180 days instead of 90 days, to keep in line with the time limit prescribed for application of the surtax under Section 7(1)A of the Customs Tariff. The surtax could be one of the instruments resorted to in case of emergency, as described in Clause 17(2).

We believe that this amendment which reflects the ideas of the hon. member for Edmonton West is a good one and I thank him for it. It states that a final report should be presented, prepared within one hundred and eighty days following an interim report and that interim measures will be taken only under unusual circumstances and not to delay the recommendation of the government's Board.

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the comments of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), I must thank him for his co-operation with regard to this clause, although I would like to elaborate on why I insisted on a ninety-day delay at the beginning.

The hon. minister used another criterion based on customs tariff, while I based my argument on the Anti-dumping Act. Actually, we are dealing with two parallel situations. According to the Anti-dumping Act, the tribunal has 90 days to complete its report, if abuse is involved; in fact, the duty of the textile board or advisory committee is of the same nature—to determine if there is abuse. And there are probably surveys now being taken about other plans.

I have no intention of quarrelling with the minister, but I would like to show him why I did relate the time period to the Anti-dumping Act instead of the customs tariff.

As to that, I think that the objective has been reached and that there will be no endless waiting period; on the contrary, a deadline will be established and the Board will have to hurry and complete its work or at least advance it rapidly enough.

So, Mr. Speaker, I welcome this new amendment from the minister now that we both have had an opportunity to let our thoughts mature.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion no. 3 (Mr. Pepin) agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), on behalf of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) moves motion No. 4 as follows:

That Bill C-215, to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other Acts in consequence thereof, be amended by deleting the word "may" from Clause 24 in line 19 at page 11 and substituting therefor the word "shall".

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I am holding the fort. This amendment was put forward by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) after his attendance in committee. What he is actually leading to is, rather than merely having a permissive power in so far as the actions of the board are concerned, it shall be mandatory.

I was not expecting to speak on this particular motion, Mr. Speaker. I have been advised that the hon. member for Crowfoot was attending a meeting of the Agriculture Committee which in its wisdom, I would say nonsense, insisted, upon the motion of the government majority that that meetings be held at this time when we are engaged on the report stage of this bill. He has to come over from the Committee on Agriculture, and I will hold the fort until he does.

Clause 24 reads as follows:

Reports of the Board to the Minister made under section 16 or 17, modified in such manner as in the opinion of the Board is necessary to give effect to section 23, may be published with the approval of the Minister.

It is important that one should pay attention to the particular wording. After all, clause 23 deals with confidential information, and therefore the board has it within its power to amend any confidential information. Clause 23 reads as follows:

> Where information that is in its nature confidential, relating to the business or affairs of any person, firm or corporation is given or elicited in the course of any inquiry, the information shall not be made public in such a manner as to be available for the use of any business competitor or rival of the person, firm or corporation.

I think we would all agree with this. I am surprised the minister was not prepared to accept in committee the position taken by my hon. friend from Crowfoot in this regard because, after all, clause 23 is mandatory, so the board's report cannot contain any confidential information. The effect is, therefore, that the report to the board has already been cleaned up or has had removed from it anything which might be offensive to clause 23. What possible objection could there be in these circumstances to publication, and why should publication not be made mandatory?

The best the minister might say is that an enlightened minister would publish all reports which are prepared in the light of the wording of clause 24, because under clause 24 the board cannot include in its report any confidential information. The effect of clause 24 as now drafted is therefore, that there are two screens. First, the board may say: well, no, we are not going to present it for publication. Second, the minister may withhold his approval for publication of the report. In other words, there are two possibilities of withholding the report which conform with clause 23. The fact is, though, that I do not feel there should be this double obstacle. If the amendment of my hon. friend from Crowfoot is accepted, it means that the board would be directed to publish but the minister will still have some right of review to make sure that the information conforms with clause 23. It seems to me that while it may be said that this is not a particularly important point my hon. friend does have a good point here and I am quite prepared to support him. I did not say anything about it in committee, but since my hon. friend has raised the point now I can see that on balance, in the combination of clauses 23 and 24, the amendment makes eminent sense and I would so move.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I apologize for being a few minutes late, Mr. Speaker. I thank the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for moving the amendment in my absence.

The essence of my submission here is contained in the old adage that it is not enough to be just, one must appear to be just. The question is, how can the public really determine whether the degree of protection advocated by the minister on the recommendation of the board has been correctly assessed unless the report itself is made public? If we read this bill carefully, we realize that provision is already made for the exclusion of confidential information. The minister also has a prerogative in this respect. In these circumstances, why is publication of the report being withheld? It is obviously not possible for the public to judge whether the minister has acted correctly on the basis of the report from the board unless the facts are available. As reported at page 15 of Committee Report No. 22, the minister had this to say:

> Let me answer in four parts. First of all, I will remind you what the powers of the Board are. The Board has final authority in determining injury, or threat of injury and in determining the value of the plans. When it comes to the degree of protection needed or not needed, they make recommendations to the Minister, and the Minister takes the ball from there.

Then, he went on to say:

> Dealing with your second point, during the research, during the inquiry the Board is making, I do not think the Minister will have contact with the Board—

He is really saying, here, that the inquiry will be carried out in an unbiased manner.

As reported on the following page, page 16, the minister outlines the Board's duties at length. Then, he goes on to say:

> Then I defend in public whatever decision the government takes. I am quite sure that I will not be able to escape that and I have no intention of doing so, either. Whatever the decision is, the associations, the groups that have taken a certain position during the inquiry, will either bless the government or attack it for the decision it has taken. So I presume my job will be to justify the decision of the government.

How can the public determine whether the minister was justified in reaching the decision he did if they are not given the facts? Suppose, for instance, the board were to recommend that certain imports be held up for a period of one month until further examination could be made to determine whether or not a section of the industry really did possess a viable international market. Suppose the board makes a lukewarm or hesitant recommendation involving some degree of protection, and the minister comes out blatantly for wholehearted protection for a longer period than the board itself had recommended. How can we know the real strength of the board's recommendation to the minister unless its recommendations are made public? Must we judge in the dark or shall we be able to judge from knowledge? Surely, any government which seeks to project a concept that it is dealing with educated people would wish to make the facts known so that the public could judge whether or not the minister was acting in a correct manner. I see the minister nodding his head in approval. I take it that perhaps he will accept my amendment to clause 24.

There is no specific reference in the amendment to confidential reports; it has reference to the publication of reports and whether a minister will make public published reports. The protection of certain industries in Canada may prove harmful to trade, and in most cases the minister will attempt to protect his decision making authority, I suppose, by making reports public only a long time after the issue in question has died, though the minister shakes his head. Since he is so concerned, I should like to read to the House a little more from the committee report because this point was brought up over and over again. In committee proceedings No. 15, the hon.

member for Coast-Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre), as reported at page 15:17, put this question:

> Would you permit a supplementary here? Is there any provision in this bill which obliges the board to make public the fact that it is about to give consideration to a matter and is there any provision for it to advertise its hearings so that interested parties may attend?

In other words, the hon. member is really posing two questions. Firstly, he wants the hearings to be advertised so that interested parties can attend, and he is also asking whether there is any provision that obliges the board to make the facts public. Then, the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) said:

> There is provision for the board to make reports. There is one problem in the kind of detailed reports that are made, and that is that much of the information that is gathered is of a private commercial nature.

I am not advocating that reports of a private and confidential nature be published but that published reports be made public; it is as simple as that. Following a similar line of thought, the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman), after a lengthy argument over this concept, as reported at page 21:6 of committee proceedings No. 21 said:

> Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I tend to agree with the argument you make about the board receiving submissions from all interested parties, that the general rule be public hearings for each inquiry and that the decisions and the reasons be made public.

Those are two quotations from Liberal and NDP members. The minister nods his head in approval from time to time. Surely, we can reach a consensus on the issue that decisions of boards appointed by the government should, wherever possible, be made public, particularly in a touchy situation where, in effect, you are deciding that some industries shall survive and others shall die. Some industries need protection, and as I say that protection may well affect the export of other goods, particularly when protection is continually being asked for against goods brought in from what I might call the low cost producers, the Pacific rim countries that are buying so much of Canada's raw materials.

It may even be the case that tariffs will be raised for short periods. Unless the public is informed of the duration the minister may, even unknowingly, extend the protection for a longer period than the board intended. If the public is informed it can quickly draw to the minister's attention the fact the period recommended by the board has expired. If the minister believes in an informed public, he should accept this amendment.

The acceptance of this amendment would mean that we, as representatives of the people, would know of the board's recommendations and of the action the minister is taking. We could then judge whether those decisions and actions are based on sound recommendations, or whether they are narrow-minded policy decisions that are geared to protecting rather than expanding Canadian markets or to saving sick and ailing industries that the minister says he is not prepared to protect himself. We should be in a position to examine the reports of the board in order to determine whether, in our opinion, these industries are sick and ailing or, rather, viable industries that are capable of forming part of the hub of industries that trade internationally in textiles.

This bill revolves around the principle of greater rationalization in the textile industry. If we are to determine whether the decisions of the minister are based on rationalization rather than protectionism, we must have the reports of the board. These reports must be made public so that we can make a fair and accurate assessment of those reports and the minister's decisions.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I wish to add my support for this simple but I think important amendment. Many of the duties of members of Parliament have now been assigned to committees and many of our public and civic responsibilities have been handed over to boards. This is why it seems to me imperative that we know what these boards are doing. Although I realize perfectly well that the final responsibility lies in the executive, it is very difficult for us to tailor the law so we are kept up to date with the multitude of regulations and decisions made by boards without full disclosure of the facts.

Although the committee system is supposed to streamline Parliament, in actual fact it means that a very small number of members of Parliament are intimately connected with many decisions that are made. It is true that the committee system should tend to streamline Parliament, but in the streamlining process I think we are tending to hamstring ourselves. Many times we in the House are told that legislation has passed committee. But the very strength of the parliamentary system lies in the fact that 264 members are able to probe the wisdom of the executive and of government appointed boards. If we had an all-knowing government, an all-knowing civil service and an all-knowing slate of boards, then we would not need a Parliament; but for well over 1000 years our people have found that the only answer to governments is an alert public, and we happen to be the representatives of that alert public.

We want to know on what recommendations decisions of the executive are based. It seems to me that this simple amendment now before the House strikes at the very heart of the democratic process. Although it is a privilege carefully to scrutinize the actions of boards and ministers, and of departments which have stripped us of a great many of our powers, it is impossible for us to keep a finger on everything that is taking place in this country unless reports of government appointed boards are published. These reports are prepared at public expense, often at great public expense, and many times the executive takes action on these reports having less intimate knowledge of the facts than the backbenchers of this House.

Often, the final decision is not ours at all. After a matter has been threshed out in committee and the committee has made its report, some board makes the final decision according to law. I might mention a few examples. In respect of the Board of Transport Commissioners what do we have to say about such things as changes in freight rates, changes in air fares or the elimination of services? Such decisions are made by the Board of Transport Commissioners. If this board, in certain instances, should make recommendations to the executive I believe we should know on what basis those recommendations are made. As the last speaker said, it is not good enough to have justice done. The public has a right to know it is being done and what the weighing process is. They want to know what tipped the scales in favour of this or that decision. As I said, it is not just our privilege to dig into these matters but our right. We intend to do this. I have no hesitation in supporting this particular amendment, and I would add what small voice I have to that of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the amendment moved by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) in respect of Clause 24 is a perfectly reasonable amendment. I intend to support the amendment and urge the government to go along with this change in the legislation. It may be a relatively small point in terms of the over-all framework of the bill, but nevertheless we think it involves some important questions. From the debate which has taken place on this bill, in the House, in the committee and now at the report stage, it is perfectly obvious that we are dealing with a very sensitive area of the Canadian economy. As legislators we are faced with a conflict of interest involving our need to promote export trade on the one hand, and the needs of the Canadian economy on the other hand. In addition, we must consider the needs of the 200,000 or so people who are dependent upon this industry for a livelihood. We do have a conflict of interest to resolve which poses some very difficult problems for the government, and which will pose very difficult problems for the board.

As has been noted, clause 24 gives the minister powers in respect of the publication of the report. A discretionary power is given to the minister to publish a report which may be abridged, as is considered necessary, to delete any confidential material. In respect of the proviso which is now contained in clause 24, which protects any information the minister may consider to be confidential, I believe it would be in the public interest, or in the interest of all concerned with this legislation, to ensure that there shall be reports and that the publication of the reports in whatever form shall be mandatory. I suggest this would assist the government in carrying through the principle of this bill, and in fact would lend itself to a greater degree of public confidence in the bill and in the operations of the board. Therefore, I would urge the minister to seriously consider this amendment and go along with other parties in approving it, thus improving the bill.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate those who took part in this short debate for the high quality of their intervention. I do not know how the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) spent his weekend, but his contribution was a great improvement over his performance of last Thursday. I say that with a smile and I know he can take it in a similar way.

It is difficult for me to answer the points raised because one is uneasy when he finds himself in the position of appearing to be against providing information to educate the public. If I am still in that position, it is after reflection, and I hope my argument will be accepted by my hon. friends.

First of all, may I repeat what I said on a number of occasions before the committee. It is the intention to publish all reports made under clauses 16 and 17 as soon as it will be possible to do so. It is the intention to publish them whenever it is possible to do so. There might be cases in which it would not be wise to do so. Let me give a couple of examples.

There might be situations, for example, in which the reports have been overtaken by events. This could very well happen. A report could be brought in and then events could develop which would make the report unnecessary. In this case, there would seem to be no purpose to be achieved in publishing the said report. Another example might be a situation in which there would be so much confidentiality in the report that, without the confidential material, it would be of little assistance. I might comfort my western friends on this point by saying that a similar situation occurs in respect of the National Energy Board which deals with a good western commodity, as we all know.

In any event this is my first line of defence for the position I take, which is one of opposition to the amendment. I have another point to make. The change suggested by the amendment from "may" to "shall" would not change anything unless a specific number of days were attached to the word "shall". If we were to say that the minister shall publish the report this would leave me as free not to publish it as if we said "the minister may". The change in words does not change anything in reality.

The only way to achieve a real change would be to say the minister shall publish the report in 190 days, 180 days or 90 days, which is a favoured period of my hon. friend from Edmonton West. If the suggestion should be that a specific number of days be indicated, then I would say that cannot be done for a number of reasons. Two situations might be created. The board might recommend to the government protection or non-protection. If the government should recommend non-protection, that non-protection may be given or may not be given by means of a decrease in the tariff. As Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce I would want to bargain this concession with our trading partners. If the other countries with which I am trying to bargain know there is a recommendation to that effect from the textile and clothing board, I am not in a particularly good bargaining position.

If it should be the other way around, and the board should recommend protection for a period of time and of a certain type, then if this were known to foreign exporters and to Canadian importers, they might try their best to swamp the market fast enough to avoid whatever decision in respect of protection the government might wish to take.

I have done my best to convince hon. members that the clause in the bill on publication of reports is not immoral and while being respectful of the axiom that Caesar's wife must not only be pure but appear to be pure, I have to anticipate the sort of problems which might occur.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? The question is on amendment No. 4, the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 75(11) the recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast-Chilcotin): I move:

That Bill C-215 an act to establish the Textile and Clothing Board and to make certain amendments to other acts in consequence thereof, be amended by inserting immediately after clause 25 at page 11 the following:

"26. The minister shall, within ninety days after the coming into force of this act and every ninety days thereafter, or, if parliament is not in session, on any of the first thirty days thereafter that parliament be sitting, submit to parliament a report respecting the administration of the act."

and by renumbering subsequent clauses accordingly.

The purpose of this amendment, Mr. Speaker, is similar to that of the amendment just preceding it. Essentially, it is disclosure. It is not my purpose to prolong this debate. For one thing, we are aware that there are already quite a few jobless people in many parts of Canada as a result of a sag in the textile industry. The longer this bill is delayed, the longer the beneficial aspects of its provisions for the jobless will be delayed.

In speaking to the motion, I will also take into account statements made last Thursday regarding relevancy.

However, in order to explain why I feel that there should be frequent and continuing disclosures, which this amendment would oblige, it is necessary for me to deal in general terms with this bill because I find that in some ways it is a rather strange piece of legislation. There is no doubt that its purpose is admirable, that being the rationalization of the Canadian textile industry, the winnowing out of inefficient sections of that industry, and the diversion of portions of the industry from unproductive lines into productive lines. I have heard no disagreement from any spokesmen of any parties as to the general desirability for this, and the minister will hear no argument from me against rationalization. In fact, I might say the same thing in other terms. I would suggest that it is essential for the good health of Canada, not only that efficient industries should have the chance to develop but that inefficient industries or industries which cannot adapt to changed conditions should retain that basic free enterprise right, which is the right to go broke.

So the ostensible purpose of this bill is supported by all the parties, if only because it represents an improvement over what we now have, and no doubt it will pass quite readily on third reading. I, myself, intend to vote for it on the basis that some improvement is better than none.

Nevertheless, I find it a curious piece of legislation and one which could be subject to much abuse, if not by this government then by governments to come. For this reason, I suggest to the House that it is not a piece of legislation which we should permit to be tucked cosily, neatly and quietly into the statute books. The actions which may be taken under this legislation should be constantly on view before the general public of Canada, because the general public will pay the bill for protection if protectionism is invoked. The consumer pays for protection. He pays just as surely, if not as directly, as if he were being taxed to support an industry. Every tariff increase, every import quota or voluntary export quota negotiated with a foreign government, every surtax, every action of any kind to choke off the flow of cheaper consumer goods into this nation, is a charge against the Canadian consumer.

Of course, restrictions on imports may be necessary from time to time. Not even those who most ardently support the principle of free trade have ever suggested that it can be introduced overnight, and no one in this debate has suggested that the textile and clothing industry of Canada should be suddenly stripped of the protection under which it has grown and its tens of thousands of workers thrown out on the street. This would be savagery.

However, disclosure,—and that is what the amendment deals with—a system of regular public disclosure of how this legislation is being used, is another matter. It is necessary, if the Canadian consumer is to get some idea of how much he is paying to preserve portions of the clothing and textile industries. Usually, the consumer does not know how much he pays. However, in a study for the Gordon Commission, Mr. J. H. Young made an estimate that Canadians paid about $1 billion a year for protectionist policies, which in 1956 represented about 4 per cent of the gross national product. I wonder what the figure would be today if it could be calculated.

During the committee hearings I had hoped to get some reassurance from the minister about Bill C-215. I had hoped that he would be able to reassure me and others that this legislation was not an instrument under which continued protection might be given to sections of that industry which were not earning their right to existence. But there was not sufficient assurance from him. Time and again the effect of the minister's answers was that Bill C-215 was not necessarily protectionism, but protectionism if necessary.

Let us see how far that protection might be made to extend. Clause 18 lists five matters to be taken into consideration by the textile and clothing board in making recommendations to the minister. I will not take the time of the House to read those five considerations, but I suggest that the terms are broad enough, particularly in subclause (a) regarding manpower and regional considerations, that Canadian governments under such a bill could still be protecting the manufacture of buggy whips and butter churns in this country.

The minister was at great pains to tell the committee—and I have no doubt that he will tell the House again today—that he is not going to use this legislation as an instrument to shield inefficient industries from the natural consequence of their actions. He spoke more than once in answer to my questions, and I will not take the time of the House to read from the committee's report, about the value of precedent in our Canadian system. The precedent, he said, will be set by board decisions in the direction of practical measures for the rationalization of faltering sections of the industry.

I suggest that these reassurances by the minister are not enough. This is no reflection on the minister. I know he recognizes the importance of international trade for this country and knows that we cannot afford to badly damage our image in the international community by actions which retard trade. I know that he has an abundant store of common sense, although he sometimes cloaks it under an urbane wit, but I suggest that this has almost nothing to do with this piece of legislation because what have the assurances of this or any other minister to do with a question of law?

Ministers come and go and the law goes on without them. Once on the books, the law goes on almost as immovable and unchangeable as the civil service. If it is a law that can be used by the government of the day when it chooses, if it is a broad law such as this one, who is to say whether this piece of legislation in the future will be a powerful, straight protectionist piece of legislation in its application?

I have said that ministers come and go. Governments come and go. We all come and go. We are all here in this House temporarily; in fact, the records show that we are here for very brief periods. There is about a 30 per cent turnover of members of the House at each election.

Mr. Pepin: That sounds like St. Augustine.

Mr. St. Pierre: I wonder, and I am sure the minister will be interested in this, how this legislation will be used in the year 1990, by which time the Conservative party might have bound up its wounds and regained power under the direction of the boys from Bay Street in Toronto? How might they use this legislation?

I had originally intended to move an amendment to put a life term on this bill, to have it automatically expire after ten or 15 years. But it seemed to me that this would make it lame duck legislation because obviously if the bill were to expire in, say, 1981, we could scarcely expect a manufacturer to undertake a new, high cost five or ten year development program under the terms of the act in 1978 or 1979.

What I am endeavouring to do by this amendment instead is to ensure that the consumers, the Canadian public, shall not remain in ignorance of what actions their government is undertaking, at their expense, to protect an industry. It does not, of course, suggest that the trade secrets of any plant should be revealed to competitors. That is taken care of in another clause of the bill. In any case, secrecy of information is at least dealt with in one part of the bill and, if I recall correctly, it is dealt with twice in the bill.

But what the amendment does attempt to do is to ensure that there will be regular public reports of what action the government takes under the terms of the legislation. Incidentally, the amendment is modelled on provisions in the Regional Development Incentives Act, which require the minister to submit monthly reports on the actions of his department. I think it would be unreasonable to expect a monthly report on this legislation. Probably in most months there would be nothing to report. At least many of us would devoutly hope that would be the case. But quarterly reports to the public, while Parliament is in session, seem to me desirable, and I would say a necessary safeguard in the interests of the general public.

I wonder if here, Mr. Speaker, I might anticipate some objections from the minister. Perhaps he has none and will joyfully welcome my amendment, but I must face the possibility that he will not. It may be said that the amendment to clause 25, which requires publication in the Canada Gazette of all regulations, is a sufficient safeguard. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest, and I have suggested it before, that the death of kings could be hidden if the news were published only in the Canada Gazette. But I am not going to pursue that argument.

After all, the Canada Gazette is available to everyone, and hopefully organizations and concerned members of the public will come to subscribe to it, and to check regularly upon it. It is at least a public record. But clause 24 deals with regulations, and not all the measures available to the government to protect the textile industry will necessarily be put into practice by regulation. I will deal with one important example. It is the arrangement of a voluntary export quota with one of our trading partners. We know how this is done. I think we know exactly how gladly other nations volunteer to restrict their sales into Canada. In effect, our trade minister of the day twists their arm until they volunteer. And, as with other forms of restriction on cheap imports into Canada, the Canadian consumer foots the bill by paying higher prices.

I submit that under this bill as it is now written, there is no requirement that this action be made public. The Canadian public would have no way of knowing to what extent voluntary export quotas were restricting the flow of goods into Canada. We do not know to what extent these are operative today.

Further, it may well be that many countries would prefer that such agreements with the Canadian government be kept secret. That might suit their convenience. But I suggest it does not well suit the convenience of the Canadian consumer, and in the balance I suggest the rights of our own citizens in this case must be paramount.

Unlike the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), I do not object to Clause 24. I feel that the minister does need discretion in negotiating with other nations on trade matters, and we should not deprive him of this right to secret negotiations. Someone said, I think it was Gracian, "To play with all the cards exposed is not only bad tactics but bad taste." And I know this minister would never be guilty of either. But when negotiations have been completed, when agreements have been concluded, then I suggest it is the right of the Canadian public to know within a reasonable period of time what those agreements were. This legislation should never be far removed from the scrutiny of the Canadian public.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I was intrigued to hear some of the statements made by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre). I think he decided to stake up and down both sides of the rink and see how many shots he could take at both goals. On the one hand, he was saying that the textile industry had to be protected and on the other hand, was saying that every time imports were curtailed in any way the Canadian consumer had to pay more money. He cannot have it both ways. I do not know which would cause the greater misery.

All of us know of towns in which textile manufacturers or converters had to close their plants due to a heavy infusion of imports. I need only mention one particular town, and I apologize to Mr. Speaker for doing so. We have only to look at the city of Cornwall and the massive body blows it was dealt as the result of low cost textile imports. My own city of Edmonton has had a record of highly fluctuating employment in the textile converting industry over a period of years. In fact it is a good, budding industry in my city and produces excellent goods. But in the face of unrestricted cheap imports, not one Canadian plant could continue to keep its doors open.

Who can argue in favour of closing down a plant, selling its equipment, disposing of management and laying off 2,500 operatives? Just look at the cost to the nation in employment retraining alone. I agree it should not be the policy of the government to support inefficient industry with tariffs and quotas. The hon. member for Coast Chilcotin was right when he said that if a person goes into business that gives him the privilege of losing money. On the other hand, in past years we have seen some towns totally destroyed as the result of selective massive textile imports.

I agree with the hon. member that publicity is necessary, but I do not know what actual purpose is served by the 90 day reports emanating from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, unless it is just like tossing up a ball. You show that one province is getting massive aid, and you wonder why this is being done. You wonder what strings are being attached to such massive financial assistance. How many of these plans will still be in operation in two years? In many cases the assistance given under the act is merely delaying what should have been a merciful death.

In committee I disagreed with the hon. member on the 90 day provision. I feel that a report of an advisory board such as this should be no more frequent than that of a review board. It is all very well to make commissions and boards prepare reports and to table them, but what do we do with them then? I would say that a good 60 per cent of these reports end up in the waste baskets. Indeed, some members do not even see them because they have given instructions to their secretaries to throw them away. I would much rather the provision were for one year than 90 days. But even on this point the bill was completely silent, unless the act comes under the regulation requiring an annual report to Parliament. But there is no such provision in the bill.

As I say, I do not like the 90 day provision, but since the hon. member put in a section which requires a report to Parliament on the operation of the act I will support his amendment.

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I did not have an opportunity of serving on the committee that considered this bill clause by clause. I would not pretend that I am an expert on the textile industry, and certainly I am no economic expert when it comes to dealing with free trade. However, I think it is very symptomatic of modern government that we are delegating a great deal of political power and authority to endless numbers of boards, commissions, Crown corporations and other agencies.

I recognize that the complexity of modern government demands this. Certainly, many who view modern government believe that Parliamentary institutions cannot function alone without appropriate delegation of their powers to other agencies. Sometimes, however, the delegation of authority from Parliament has political connotations, which can bring about disastrous results. You can have boards and commissions which in substance are acting in a political manner, such as the Canadian Transport Commission to a certain extent and the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to a certain extent. Such Boards can move absolutely contrary to what might be recommended if the problem they were considering were before the House. In my opinion, some of the decisions of those boards have been questionable. I do not want my words to suggest that the boards were not motivated in their decisions by what was good for the country, but I find that there is very little that can be done to change those decisions.

This bill before us seems to introduce the delegation-to-a-board principle into the textile industry. Certainly, there is some difference from the normal delegation of power in that this is an advisory board only. That is to say, it does not have the power to act. Nevertheless, it is difficult to conceive a situation where a minister of the Crown would act contrary to the recommendation of an advisory board appointed for the express purpose of relieving the minister from the difficulties and complexities of looking into a particular subject. My concern, therefore, is not that I do not think it is necessary. I think the minister's remarks throughout the course of debate in the House and committee should be accepted in good faith. He has said that this provision is for the benefit of Canadian industry.

My concern is twofold. First of all, as I read this bill it can serve the people of Canada in the way the minister suggests. It can be a very good thing, moving us progressively toward free trade with other nations, but it could also go in exactly the opposite direction. This measure could result in more protection for Canadian industry. Certainly, it could serve the protectionists within the country and not Canadian citizens generally. To ensure that the work of this board is in accordance with the principles enunciated by the minister, I think it is quite rational that there should be a report to this House from time to time. Such a report would also ensure that the aims and objectives of this piece of legislation were known to the public, thus enabling the public to determine whether or not the action taken was within the purview of what was intended in the first instance.

The amendment merely suggests that every 90 days the minister shall file a report to this House. It does not say that he shall reveal delicate and confidential negotiations which may affect our trade relationships with other countries. Indeed, clause 23 prohibits this; it merely says that he shall file a report. This report would merely cover what steps were being taken, what recommendations were being made and where we stood on the question of progressing toward free trade. Rationalization is a very good thing, but it can serve the principles of protectionism just as well. From time to time, I should like to see a report on how we are getting along. The minister defends himself on the basis that he cannot reveal these things, but I say that he is not compelled to reveal them by the nature of this particular amendment.

I fully support the amendment of the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre). I think it would be a good provision to have in the legislation with respect to this type of board. I draw your attention to the fact, Mr. Speaker, that if such a report is not made by the minister, then he could surely be asked questions at the time the estimates of his department are reviewed. All matters could be gone into extensively there. The excuses he used for not providing by way of statute that the report be made public are blown away when you consider that this information could be brought out by that technique if Parliament had the time.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion, I want to make it clear that I do not accept some of the philosophy expressed by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre) in support of his amendment. Nevertheless, on examination of this amendment I feel that it does have some merit and that the House should give it serious consideration. As has been noted, there is no provision for a report on the operation of the board in the bill. After all, this is a board which is being established not by any action of the government through its executive functions, but by this Parliament through the bill now before us.

It seems to me that Parliament has some right to expect a report on the operations of an agency which it establishes and to which it gives certain powers. On first thought, it might have been considered that subclause 2 of clause 25, which refers to the publication of regulations in the Canada Gazette, would have covered some of the concerns of the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin. I think it has been rightly pointed out that there are other matters upon which the board will have to conduct studies, as it is empowered to by this bill, upon which it will not be required to make any report whatsoever. I can quite appreciate that confidential matters will be considered by the board and that, in many cases, voluntary restraint dictates that there must be some measure of confidentiality with respect to what is undertaken. Nevertheless, I see no problem in the government providing Parliament with some report on the operations of the board.

For instance, one has only to look at certain reports which are tabled by the government. One report which I saw the other day was the report of the anti-dumping tribunal. That certainly was a skeleton report if ever I saw one. It gave a skeleton type of outline of the operations of the anti-dumping tribunal. Of course, any action taken by that body is expressed in the form of a regulation published in the Canada Gazette, so that one would not encounter some of the problems in that case which might exist with respect to the board we are establishing under this bill.

I do not think a minister exhibiting the qualities shown by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) would have any difficulty in dealing with any of the sensitive problems that may arise as a result of this amendment. After all, the minister has demonstrated on many occasions that he is the master of obscurantism. He has no difficulty in obscuring things when he so desires. He can embelish his presentation in a sea of words. Really, I must congratulate him on his talent and his facility in doing this whenever he wants to do so. He does it when it suits his purposes. Thus, I would say that it would not be difficult for the minister to ensure that the reports submitted to Parliament, as provided for in this amendment, are worded in such a way as to protect any matter which the minister might have to take into consideration. Thus, I hope that the minister will give some consideration to this motion and that we can have this change made in the bill before us.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, to be consistent, I must support this amendment as well. The art of being a good parliamentarian lies in one's being willing to compromise. It is refreshing to hear a Liberal espousing something that sounds like the concept of free trade. The last time I remember free trade being espoused was in the Dunning budget, almost two generations ago. I believe that anybody, in any corner of this House, who supports free trade will have little difficulty in finding support in Western Canada. Western Canada has only gone ahead twice. The first time was under a Liberal administration, led by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, when the matter of reciprocity with the United States was discussed. After that, western Canada went ahead on sporadic occasions when this country sought free trade in the markets of the world.

I should like to see more free trade, because I have seen what it can mean. At this time Chemcell has thought it necessary to lay off between 325 and 350 breadwinners in my constituency. The firm is keeping open that part of its factory that is producing textiles. I think we ought to look more closely at this. A third of the factory is busy producing textiles from petrochemicals and artificial fibres. If we cannot compete, in areas like the production of so-called Irish linen made in Red China, then perhaps we could concentrate on making materials in which we have the upper hand, materials made from cheap petrochemicals. I conclude in this category wood products. It is in these areas that an alert government of a progressive nation such as Canada could make headway, and it is here that we could bring about the rationalization of which the minister spoke eloquently when introducing this bill. I certainly support free trade, and I say without hesitation that I would support any group in Canada which espoused the concept of free trade. I believe that free trade and free enterprise is the only basis on which we can have a free world.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The question is on Motion No. 5, in the name of the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin (Mr. St. Pierre). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

[Mr. Burton.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I say a word about the forthcoming group of deferred votes? There has been some discussion on this and I think there is agreement along these lines: there should be an order of the House that these votes are to be deferred until the first item of business tomorrow. This would be of advantage to a committee that is not sitting in Ottawa today, the members of which could be here tomorrow.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, we confirm that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. In that case further consideration of Government Order No. 50 is to be adjourned until tomorrow's sitting of the House and, pursuant to Standing Order 75(11), the deferred votes shall be taken forthwith upon the calling of Government Orders. Is that agreed?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. St. Pierre: Mr. Speaker, I hope it is recognized that there will be a vote on the motion which we have just considered.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Yes. In connection with the request made by the hon. member for Coast Chilcotin, may I say that the vote on Motion No. 5 in his name stands deferred until tomorrow, when we shall take the votes on the other motions.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask if it is correct to assume that the business for tonight will be, first, the government organization bill, to be followed by the young offenders bill. Am I correct in that regard?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Citizenship—request for report on charges by Alex Bandy of Falsehood, deception and inefficiency; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Government organization—Proposed ministries of state; the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom)—Finance, Student loans—Suggested change in repayment requirements.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely, notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

CUSTOMS ACT

REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF QUALIFIED PERSONNEL AT AIRPORTS TO FACILITATE CLEARANCE OF AIRPLANE TOURIST TRAFFIC

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of making regulations, pursuant to paragraph (r) of section 273 of the Customs Act, so as to facilitate airplane tourist traffic at Canadian airports of entry by providing for the deputizing of qualified personnel now employed at management or administrative officers to handle customs clearance of such tourist traffic.

He said: Mr. Speaker, about a year ago I was privileged to present this resolution to the House. Although no opposition was forthcoming during the hour devoted to private members' bills, no direct action was taken to get Parliamentary approval. During the past year I have met with representative groups within the general aviation industry. On several occasions I have been encouraged by them to resubmit my resolution and continue the debate.

At page 897 of Hansard for November 17, 1969, my speech is recorded in which I endeavoured to explain the problems of general aviation as related to customs clearance for aircraft tourist traffic at ports of entry in Canada. I do not propose to repeat the explanation today. I am sure that most hon. members are familiar with the problems. I know that many members have received letters from aviation enthusiasts, businessmen and associations with regard to the problem relating to customs clearance for tourist traffic at airports.

I will attempt to suggest evidence which will hopefully provide the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) with sufficient proof to influence a new and realistic approach to this subject. However, I feel it is incumbent upon me to reiterate my remarks pertaining to the confidence of the travelling public in our customs and immigrations officials, especially their conduct in handling airplane tourist traffic. I suggest no criticism with regard to these officials in the performance of their duty.

Airports of entry differ from automobile ports because they are not located at the exact point of entry into Canada. Airports accommodating international passenger and commercial traffic are properly designated to serve the travelling public and in many instances are located two to three hundreds miles north of the Canada-USA border. Full time customs and immigration officers and offices are, of course, permanently located at international airports regardless of location. Light plane traffic is still permitted to use international airports of entry, and in fact, under existing regulations are encouraged to take advantage of this round-the-clock service, even though there is some doubt as to the advisability of mixing fast jet traffic with the slower light planes.

This resolution is designed to lend assistance and expedite customs clearance for light plane tourist traffic at smaller airports of entry located close to the border. Most of the smaller airports of entry are no longer provided with service beyond regular working hours, as well as weekends and holidays. I would like to qualify that statement inasmuch as some still have adequate service, but most are denied the service which allows for the convenience of the tourist traffic using aircraft. The system automatically causes inconvenience to customs officers as well as airplane operators.

I am pleased to extend the appreciation of dozens of pilots I have talked to, as well as organizations which have only compliments to hand out as far as courteous treatment is concerned. I'm sure the time involved in travelling to and from these smaller airports of entry create time consuming inconveniences to customs officers, especially where an office is staffed by one officer.

A study of the recent re-organization of district and area administrations indicates the Department of National Revenue and the Department of Immigration have improved the efficiency of service to Canadian communities without adding cost to the tax-payers. The temporary employment of university students during peak traffic periods during the summer is highly commendable and I am sure is appreciated by both the tourists and the students. Each year community airports are being improved and light plane traffic is gradually increasing. More and more people are taking advantage of the convenience provided by new sophisticated equipment found in modern light airplanes and small airports. They are able to avoid the congested highway traffic and get above the polluted air into the blue sky.

In Canada today there are more than 10,000 registered aircraft. Light aircraft account for all but a few hundred, and I include airline transports in this figure. I repeat, of the 10,000 aircraft, and I am referring to all aircraft apart from the military, light aircraft accounts for all but a few hundred. Our real tourist potential is most impressive. There are 700,000 licensed pilots in the United States. Out of 130,000 registered airplanes in the United States, 98 per cent are owned by non-airline people. The Federal Aviation Administration in the U.S. estimates that 50 per cent of all air passengers in the United States are carried by non-airlines aircraft. Therefore, flying tourist traffic offers great potential, but lack of customs clearance assurance at many Canadian ports of entry discourages our American friends from travelling to Canada in light aircraft.

The concept that only the idle rich can afford private airplanes is no longer valid. Canadians and Americans in all walks of life are registered owners and pilots. Literally thousands of farmers on both sides of the border utilize various types of aircraft to facilitate emergency trips to centres for repair parts, fence inspections, aids to round up of cattle, crop spraying and so on. The farmers like to be tourists as well. However, most airports are located some distance from our urban centres, hence the general public is unaware of the ever increasing light plane traffic. I suggest that those who are interested should visit their local airport, especially on the weekend when there is not convenient customs clearance, and count the number of airplanes. In fact, light plane traffic has been increasing so rapidly during the past few years that governments, in their wisdom, have been endeavouring to entice light airplane traffic away from major international airports in the interests of easing congestion. Governments have also been increasing aid for development of smaller airports in both rural and urban areas. Light plane pilots appreciate the concern of the Ministry of Transport and are happy to co-operate by utilizing airports outside the busy traffic patterns and corridors used by high flying, pressurized transports.

The resolution under debate at the present time has been criticized on the grounds that responsible airport managers or assistants would have difficulty in mastering the techniques relating to the duties of customs officers as established by existing criteria. It has been suggested that a conflict of interest might exist by virtue of the desire of airport managers to place priority on service to the travelling air tourists above the responsibilities of customs officers. This argument might have possessed some validity in days gone by when the gas boy operated the airport. Only in a very few isolated cases does it apply today. The airports which might qualify under the terms of reference of this resolution are usually owned outright by municipalities and operated by duly appointed airport boards under the able management of responsible citizens. Airport managers and their assistants for the most part are charged nowadays with the responsibility of administering strict rules as prescribed by the airport board and air regulations. Private operators handle gas concessions and engineering services.

I do not suggest, Mr. Speaker, that all existing small airports of entry in Canada would qualify. I am sure there are probably a sizeable number which would not expect to qualify under this resolution. But I do say there are many airports of entry which could and should qualify if the Minister of National Revenue were to establish criteria based on a fair approach to the situation. I am not sufficiently presumptuous to attempt to set forth essential requirements but perhaps I might make a few suggestions for consideration.

First, the effect of this resolution, if it is adopted, might apply only to airports of entry within reasonable proximity of existing customs offices. Second, applicants would be required to enter upon a period of training acceptable to the Department of National Revenue. Third, tourist traffic only would be handled by the deputized officers, and this would be done in the same way as students handle seasonal duties. There is considerable experience in this regard. Many commercial flights today cannot be handled at airports of entry and customs officers must make special arrangements for commercial entries. If there is dutiable merchandise of a kind not ordinarily carried by tourists, it must be taken to the downtown customs office, and so on. Thus, the separation of tourists from commercial traffic is not entirely new. Fourth, deputized officers would be responsible to local customs officers and would be called upon to provide essential reports on a regular basis as required. Finally, a small user charge would be imposed in order to eliminate any cost to the taxpayers as a whole.

You might feel, Mr. Speaker, that this is a generous statement to make on behalf of the various airport operators of Canada, but I can assure you there is a great need for traffic development at these airports in which municipalities, the business community and the flyers themselves have invested heavily to assist in the growth of the aviation pattern. I am confident that if criteria were established, together with a small user charge prescribed by the Minister of National Revenue, the airport managers and those who qualify to become deputized officers would be happy to co-operate in levying the charge; they would be glad to operate within the budget which might be made available, without cost to the taxpayer.

The greatest concern of the flying public centres on the fact that at many airports of entry after 5 p.m. on weekdays, all day Saturdays, Sundays and holidays, no service exists. This is unrealistic. Tourist traffic reaches its peak between Friday afternoon and Sunday evening. Service at weekends and after 5 p.m. is available at most airports of tourist destination only on payment of heavy travelling fees, anywhere from $12 to $30. The time taken to clear an airplane arriving with tourists is about 10 or 15 minutes.

In closing, I plead with the House to permit the referral of my resolution to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. I respectfully suggest that the proposition is practicable and worthy of further consideration. If the Minister of National Revenue, after committee hearings, could establish a pilot project I am sure the aviation industry would be grateful and only too happy to render all possible assistance to the department as well as to the customs collection officers, so that we could eliminate the serious problem to which I have referred, one which is confronting general aviation today when people are travelling in Canada as tourists.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in rising to support the ideal behind this motion. I have not had the opportunity to travel extensively by private aircraft but the complaints the hon. member has mentioned have been forcibly brought to my attention over the years by the operator of a small boat in a border area of southwestern Ontario. Getting properly passed through customs often poses a considerable problem, particularly at weekends when customs offices are open short hours at ports of entry which are operated on a seasonal basis.

As far as the customs officers themselves are concerned, may I go on record as stating that in most instances they are most co-operative. With plans properly made out in advance, customs inspection should not normally present any serious difficulty. I am more concerned about the situation where a large group of passengers arrive at one of our airports and some 100 or so people are subjected to delays that in this type of operation are literally abominable. These passengers do not know where their baggage is and they have to stand around waiting. This is where consternation reigns supreme.

An honest appraisal of the situation would lead almost anybody to the conclusion that these delays are definitely not caused by customs or immigration officials but, in my humble opinion, are caused by the administration and operation of the airport itself. Eventually, people's bags are found, though sometimes a report comes through that the bags of people who are in Ottawa are on their way to Winnipeg. However, my point is that delays at airports are primarily not the fault of customs inspectors.

I suggest that some streamlining of procedures, as is the case in other jurisdictions, could be made to assist the situation. For example, travellers could be placed on their honour to exit through one door if they have nothing to declare and to go another way if they do have something to declare. This procedure would be much better, it seems to me, than deputizing management or administrative officers, particularly at large airports, having full regard to the suggestions the hon. member made in connection with smaller airports.

For example, what management would be deputized at a large international airport? The manager of the cafeteria, the manager of the bar, the administrative officers, or whom? If these people cannot do a better job of effecting entry of tourists into this country than they do of sorting baggage, then I suggest that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray), who is in the House, better stick to the tried and true method of the trained and qualified customs examiners. I am all in favour of speeding up procedures adopted by administrative officers at our large airports, since they have not set any records in the handling of my luggage, but I submit that most customs officers are pretty efficient and surely their specialized training is worth something in this instance.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the notice of motion before the House, may I say I have great pleasure in suggesting that such a term of reference for the Standing Committee on Transport and communications would make for good debate. The hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) could elaborate on his motion in committee to a greater extent than he has been able to do in the House. However, I believe there is good reason for supporting the notice of motion in view of certain things that need attention, and of which I am sure the hon. member is aware. Regardless of how much we would like to believe that there is sufficient staff available at all times to effect speedy customs clearance, the fact remains that there are occasions when deputies are required. In this regard, one of the areas that bears considerable examination, in my humble opinion, is the method of handling the jumbo jets. Since we are just about to enter the jumbo jet age, I feel we should have some extra facilities and manpower to handle the increased number of passengers carried by these aircraft.

I was concerned the other day to discover that Air Canada is considering discontinuing two of its normal flights to Vancouver when the jumbo jets are introduced so that these large aircraft will be filled. To me this is a further indication that the arrival of a jumbo jet will require extra personnel to handle customs clearance, luggage, and passengers generally. At the present time we have a fairly efficient system of handling passengers at our airports. Yet we are bringing in the jumbo jet service without giving any consideration at all to the way we will handle their cargoes.

Further, it strikes me that the first image a tourist or visitor to Canada gets of this country is in the way he is treated at the port of entry. Unless we have sufficient facilities to cope with these visitors and to greet them properly, I am afraid our image is going to suffer.

I think the notice of motion introduced by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East at least opens the door to further consideration of this question in committee. Perhaps the government will think of other ways to handle the problem at that time, but surely at the present time we should allow this notice of motion to go forward to committee for discussion with a view to effecting speedy customs clearance. Even though there may be reservations about the mechanics of the notice of motion, we have no hesitation in giving our support to sending the motion forward to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by commending the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) for his initiative in putting forward for consideration the important matter raised in his notice of motion. I think I can say that this action on his part is typical of his continuing efforts as an effective and constructive member, not only on behalf of his constituents but also with respect to matters of public interest in general. I think I can inform the House that prior to the presentation of his motion today I arranged for the hon. member to discuss the proposal with senior officials of the customs and excise division as a way of aiding its meaningful consideration.

With reference to the remarks made by the last two speakers, I would certainly be pleased to hear from hon. members with regard to any problems they feel exist in relation to customs service in their areas so that I can have them looked into. Also, while the motion itself does not pertain directly to the matter of handling passengers from jumbo jets, I think I can say that planning to provide adequate customs service on arrival of jumbo jets has been carried out with the aim of ensuring that this kind of service is in fact available. I have been pleased to hear the compliments extended by hon. members to customs officers for the manner in which they have carried out their duties.

Let me now make a few comments on the subject matter of the motion itself. As some hon. members are probably aware, for many years prior to 1968 customs service for the clearance of non-commercial tourist air traffic in Canada was provided at all times without charge. The only cost to the parties accommodated was the payment of any transportation expense which departmental officers might incur in providing the service. Before 1968, call-out customs service was provided to what are known as health or pleasure flights arriving at any airport approved for customs entry. This meant that customs officers were on call during the hours of operation of these airports. Since service to these flights was not subject to special service charges, the Customs and Excise Division was obliged to compensate officers with overtime pay for providing clearances after their regular hours of duty.

I should like to point out, however, that current regulations do not permit the charging of special services other than for the transportation of an officer when pleasure craft clearances are involved. This meant that before 1968 a situation existed in respect of service at small tourist airports whereby operators were receiving service which far exceeded that accorded any other form of transportation and that the cost of providing such service was being absorbed by the taxpaying public generally. I think I can best illustrate the point by referring to the facilities available at certain highway offices on the Canada-U.S.A. border where service is provided during specific hours and persons wishing to enter Canada outside those hours must do so at points of entry where extended or 24-hour service is available, and this has been the case for some time.

During 1968 it was recognized that the financial obligations of the government under contract with its employee groups about pay for call-out duties had become quite significant. It was considered that if this trend was continued as a result of future negotiations, costs in providing after-hours service to tourist air traffic would be completely out of proportion to the cost of service rendered to the travelling public as a whole. In view of this, and because of the budgetary and manpower restrictions placed on government operations at that time, it became necessary to review this function to ensure effective operation within the budgetary means available to the department.

Therefore, a revised policy governing hours of service at customs airports for the clearance of pleasure aircraft was put in effect in the late summer of 1969. Under this new system certain airports were designated, in network fashion, throughout all regions of Canada at which aircraft arriving with destinations in Canada could report inward for customs purposes. All other small airports would be confined to regular port hours, Monday through Friday. The aim was to encourage operators of aircraft to make their after-hours clearances at the specially designated airports I mentioned.

Generally speaking, after-hours service continued to be available for any air traffic entering Canada in need of it, although not always at each individual landing strip or airfield in the country. It was realized that this network approach would not be completely acceptable to pleasure air traffic in all instances and that we could still expect requests for clearances at other hours at certain airports. Such additional call-out service could, under present regulations, only be provided on an advance notice basis and then, in effect, at the expense of the taxpayer at large.

As one can well appreciate, the necessary curtailment of hours at certain airports, which over the years had given unlimited service, has given rise to a series of representations by individuals and organizations as well as in the form of this private member's motion calling for legislation authorizing the appointment of persons other than regular customs officers to perform the customs duties after regular hours at small airports. While the motion has been given a lot of thought and in-depth study, I regret that it is not felt this proposal can be accepted, at least in its present form.

I am advised that the only existing exception to the present situation with regard to use of regular customs officers is in respect of certain remote locations in the Arctic where Royal Canadian Mounted Police officers are normally used as customs officers or, when none are available, other government officials are used. But I am informed that ordinary civilians are never used for the position of part-time or temporary officer in the Arctic area. So, as I have said, I think it could be argued that the hon. member's motion, at least in the form in which it has been presented today, is not acceptable for a number of reasons. Let me list some of these reasons for the consideration of the House. The department, in order to demand proper service, of course would be obliged to adequately compensate such persons for performing the additional duties, and this would likely be on the same basis as payment to regular officers for such service. However, it is felt the service provided would not likely be up to the standard required by the law the department administers, and departmental requirements.

Another point is that it could well be that questions might be raised concerning how the proposal would fit into the collective bargaining arrangements between the government and its employees. Also, it should not be overlooked that customs officers assigned to the clearance of aircraft are responsible not only for the administration and enforcement of customs laws and regulations but must also act on behalf of many other departments, such as Manpower and Immigration, National Health and Welfare, Agriculture and the Air Transport Committee, to name just a few. I have some doubt that my colleagues who head these other departments or are responsible for some of the other agencies concerned would want to have what essentially would be untrained and part-time personnel to carry out the duties required by these departments and agencies. I think the consent of these departments and agencies would be necessary in respect of any changes along the lines proposed by the hon. member. Of course, as I have suggested, persons outside the customs service certainly could not be expected to perform the work of the customs officers or work on behalf of the other departments concerned without appropriate periods of training.

With specific reference to the hon. member's proposal for the employment of airport management or administrative personnel as part-time customs officers, situations could arise where the airport attendant would be endeavouring to sell his services to the aircraft operator and, on the other hand, causing the operator to present himself, his aircraft and baggage for inspection. He would be called upon to question the operator relative to compliance with immigration regulations, to collect duties and taxes which may be applicable, and possibly would be required to initiate seizure action because of violations detected. I think it could be argued that such an arrangement could result in a conflict of interest on the part of the deputized individual.

Also, one could ask whether the general public would have sufficient respect for someone who was not truly a departmental officer. I say all this recognizing full well the positive development of local and municipal airports and the development of their staffs in recent years. I should say that as a result of the consideration of representations from the hon. member and others I have instructed senior officials of the department to re-examine and re-assess the whole subject of customs services to the travelling and importing public after normal hours at smaller airports throughout Canada. A very comprehensive study is being carried out covering the entire country from coast to coast and in the north.

At the moment, of a total of 138 airports, 67 or almost half are provided with customs service on an extended basis. That is to say, the services given are beyond the normal 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday business hours and vary according to the volume of traffic from 24 hours a day, seven days a week, down to the provision of service from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m. Monday to Thursday and 8 a.m. to midnight Friday to Sunday. An example of the latter is the airport at Regina. The remaining half of the total airports are provided with service from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. Monday to Friday with a few receiving slightly longer hours of service.

One-third of all customs airports are located at or near the Canada-U.S.A. border and give extended service to the public, while another third are too far inland to be reached by most pleasure aircraft. Aircraft, therefore, must also pass a number of airports providing adequate service en route to their destination in the remote areas. The balance of our ports are in the limited service category where requests for extended service cannot be justified under any circumstances.

The hon. member had previously suggested to me directly that more extended service is necessary at eight airports, namely, Goderich, Ontario, St. Jean, Quebec, Fredericton, New Brunswick, Moncton, New Brunswick, Digby, Nova Scotia, Weyburn, Saskatchewan, Pitt Meadows, British Columbia and Chilliwack, British Columbia. As a result, I asked that a study be made by the department of the total need for customs service at these and other airports throughout the various regions of Canada. With respect to the eight airports in question, the study to date appears to reveal that of these airports only Fredericton would be likely to qualify for additional service. The Fredericton situation is presently being looked into with a view to seeing exactly what changes could be made to provide more flexible service there.

Also, an extension of service in this way through greater flexibility has recently been put into effect in the Prairie region of Canada. It was recognized that existing circumstances differ somewhat from those in other regions in that the distance to be travelled can be quite significant, and also there was recognition of the fact that the Prairies had relatively few places where extended hours of service were available. This is similar to steps recently taken with regard to the Kitchener-Waterloo airport after it became apparent that the need for a form of extended service existed.

Accordingly, I recently met with representatives of the airport commission to discuss this matter after receiving representations from various members, particularly the hon. member for Kitchener (Mr. Hymmen). Pending completion of the comprehensive study I have mentioned earlier, a study which involves further discussions with other government departments concerned, I have asked Customs and Excise officials to interpret and apply the existing regulations with respect to service after normal hours at the Waterloo-Wellington airport and other similar smaller airports in the most flexible possible manner in order to accommodate the needs of the travelling and importing public who use such airports.

In conclusion, may I say that subject to the results that might arise from the further consultation and the studies now under way that I have just mentioned, the evidence presently available to the department does not indicate a clear need for additional designations of customs airports with extended hours of service. Also, the question of authorizing private and municipal airport personnel as special, part-time customs agents appears to present a number of practical difficulties, some of which I have outlined and which I think can well lead to the conclusion that the hon. member's proposal, at least in the form he has presented it—although the aims of the hon. member are understood and appreciated—cannot presently be accepted.

Let me assure the House and the hon. member that if our continuing studies lead to the conclusion that additional service is required, then the Customs and Excise division will certainly attempt, consistent with the resources available to it, to provide such service. I wish again to assure the hon. member that the important issue raised in his motion is under active study and I commend him for his initiative in presenting his motion, a step which assists us in the consideration being given to the important question raised by it.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take part briefly in this debate and to support the hon. member's motion. In my remarks I wish to broaden the subject somewhat. Perhaps you will not rule me out of order, Mr. Speaker, if I discuss the clearing of tourists and visitors to Canada through customs and extend it to those people who arrive by boat, by yacht and by pleasure craft in the Great Lakes area. I shall only take a minute.

Since the minister is in a mood to hear representations and maintain an open mind on the subject, I would ask him to give very serious consideration to a representation that has already been made to his department by letter. This matter concerns clearing of pleasure craft on the north shore of Lake Erie, particularly in Long Point Bay and the inner bay: The particular spot is Booth's Harbour. The Customs Department last year saw fit to extend, on a seasonal basis, a clearing station at this local marina where, by the way, very extensive facilities are being provided and extended to take care of American tourists.

The minister's department knows full well that this is an expanding business on the Great Lakes. The extension of the service on a seasonal basis last year was much appreciated. I understand it was done on a trial basis. This year the local marina at Booth's Harbour has been advised that the service is being withdrawn after only one year. Since the service and the marina are, as I have stated, in the process of expansion, I think it is only fair that the department should take another look at this service and give it at least a two-year trial to determine whether or not it is worth while, because this manner of visiting Canada is being used increasingly by pleasure craft through Lake Erie.

While I am on this subject I would like to express my personal gratitude for the way in which the minister's department a number of years ago handled a rather unpleasant incident in Port Dover, where U.S. visitors were given rather shabby treatment when they attempted to obtain customs clearance. This problem has been cleared up to the satisfaction of the community. I trust the minister will give the same consideration to the representation I now make to him, which I have already placed on paper by means of a letter to his department with respect to seasonal service in Booth's Harbour. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for letting me broaden the topic and make this representation to the minister.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, no one can listen except with sympathy to the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle) when he puts a case as cogently as he did here this afternoon. I was very happy therefore to hear the minister responding in a sympathetic way as indeed I feel he has impressed all of us in the House with the strength of the case he made for improved customs services for aircraft for tourism purposes.

However, and in spite of the fact that I think our feeling of sympathy is increased by knowledge of the member's own experience, flying not only for pleasure but for business, and in spite of the fact that most of us appreciate that general aviation in Canada has been neglected in the basic services it requires in favour of interest in very large hub airports, like the international airports and major airports in other cities, I think the case he is making really has to be made elsewhere than to the minister responsible for customs and excise.

To me, a very important consideration is a national airport system that will put the case for general aircraft facilities and service into perspective, so that this traffic will increase in keeping with improved ground and operational facilities and will so increase that the pressure on the customs people will be great enough to justify the additional expense of providing customs officers as suggested by the hon. member for Fraser Valley East (Mr. Pringle). I make this comment in light of some of the statistics which are available. I would like to refer particularly to a recent report of the Central Ontario Aviation Council which draws attention to this neglect of general aviation facilities, including those for tourist aircraft. For example, it points out that in North America there are some 3,000 commercial airliners, but they compete for airport space and indeed for air space with 154,000 general aviation aircraft. Among the latter are aircraft flying for pleasure. That is to say, there is a 50 to 1 proportion in which general aviation aircraft have a preponderance over the major airliners, and it is expected that by the end of this decade that proportion will be more in the order of 100 to one in favour of general aviation aircraft. Therefore, I suggest that the problem which the hon. member has put so cogently in front of us is going to intensify and that this will require the federal government—I think in this case, in collaboration with other governments in Canada—to come up with a national air transportation policy.

Such a policy should include the development of regional, subregional and area airports, not only to cope with this impending traffic but also to encourage its expansion for the economic benefits which it is bound to bring. So I suggest to the hon. member that I think the problem, which is going to intensify, will bring its own solution in its train—that is to say, the build-up in traffic will tend to justify the customs costs which the minister has indicated at present would not be justified.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) outlined very clearly the changes and improvements that have been made in the customs service to date. I took note of some of them as he went along. I was encouraged, as I am sure the hon. member for Fraser Valley East was, to note that there have been specific improvements along the line of his hopes since 1968. These included changes that brought increased customs services to a certain number of airports where they could be justified. They included changes that made emergency landings open to customs services without additional charges, and a very broad interpretation of emergency services was given. However, I think the problems which the minister mentioned are very formidable, particularly with respect to the solution that the hon. member for Fraser Valley East was putting forward, and for this reason I cannot support the specific proposals of the hon. member in this motion.

In addition to the problems of costs, I do not see how one can get around the problem of deputizing important customs functions to non-customs officers and, in fact, to civilians. Not only that, Mr. Speaker, but customs officers are also obliged to act on behalf of other departments of government when performing their duties, for example, for the Department of Manpower and Immigration, for the Department of National Health and Welfare and also for other departments.

So, Mr. Speaker, in addition to the high cost of supplying after-hours customs services, it seems to me that the hon. member's proposal meets these other formidable objections. It would be a downgrading of customs services. It would be offering a service that really is not adequate in a responsible sense. I suggest that the best solution is likely to be found by pursuing the present course, which is a continually close examination of the situation across Canada, adding after-hours customs services where and when they appear to be justified.

I suggest, therefore, to the hon. member that he should seek other proposals to put forward, because obviously the minister is looking at the matter very sympathetically. I wonder if a bonding system would make sense, so that a pleasure aircraft arriving for tourist purposes might be bonded at a regional airport and then be able to land at a more distant and isolated one where the officials at the airport, not being customs official at the time of landing, might be able to cope with the situation. I am sure that the hon. member, resourceful as he is, will come forward with other proposals that do not raise such formidable objections as have been raised to this current proposal.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. The hour for the consideration of private members' business having expired, I do now leave the chair.

[English]

I am encouraged to observe that hon. members are becoming a little more convinced that short speeches can contribute to a more effective exchange of different views among a greater number of hon. members, at least during private members' hour.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT OF PROVISIONS RELATING TO ARREST AND BAIL

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-218, to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. If at all possible, I should like to introduce an amendment, if I could have the consent of the House, at report stage and before we reach third reading.

Mr. Speaker: This can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Your Honour, this is an amendment which I circulated in an informal way to all parties. It was brought on at a late stage as a result of a delegation of judges of the provincial court and of the court of sessions in the province of Quebec. I should like, with the unanimous consent of the House, to read the amendment into the record. If consent is given, perhaps Your Honour would put the amendment to the House.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): My colleague, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang), seconded by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) moves:

That Bill C-218, an act to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal, be amended by deleting lines 21 to 23 on page 4 thereof and substituting the following:

(ii) in the province of Quebec, a judge of the superior court of criminal jurisdiction of the province or three judges of the sessions of the peace or of the provincial court.

I can give this amendment to the Table. I have already distributed it to members of all parties. I should like to explain it, for the record, to the House at the report stage. This amendment would provide the accused and the prosecutor in the province of Quebec with an alternative method of obtaining a review of the decision of a justice as to the pre-trial release or detention of an accused under proposed section 445A. The difficulty is that in the province of Quebec there are no county or district judges as we know them in other provinces, so this amendment is to provide an equivalent type of review.

In those provinces which have a county or district court, the party applying for the review could, under sections 445F or 445G as proposed in the bill, choose to have the hearing either before a judge of that court or before a judge of the superior court of criminal jurisdiction in the province. As there are no county or district judges in the province of Quebec, the review jurisdiction, under the present formulation of the bill, is vested only in a judge of the superior court of criminal jurisdiction.

In certain respects, jurisdiction under the Criminal Code of a judge of the sessions of the peace or a judge of the provincial court in the province of Quebec is similar to the criminal jurisdiction that is exercised in other provinces by judges of county or district courts. For example, by virtue of section 466(a) (ii) of the Criminal Code, a judge of the sessions of the peace or a judge of the provincial court has jurisdiction to try an accused person who elects to be tried by judge without a jury under part XVI of the Code.

However, because in the province of Quebec a judge of the sessions of the peace and a judge of the provincial court fall within the definition of "Justice" and are therefore empowered to make the original decision as to pretrial release or detention of an accused—unlike country or district court judges in other provinces—it would not be proper to invest a single judge of the same court with review jurisdiction. In these circumstances, as an alternative to a review by a judge of the superior court of criminal jurisdiction in the province of Quebec, the amendment would invest jurisdiction for review in three judges of the sessions of the peace or three judges of the provincial court.

This amendment, which was supported by a number of judges concerned in the province of Quebec, would make it easier for a review to be carried out in the more isolated areas of that province, because the applicant would not be required either to make his application in Montreal or Quebec City or await the sittings of the superior court of criminal jurisdiction in his own area.

I put the amendment to the House and suggest that it is really a technical one to overcome differences between court structures in Quebec and those in the other provinces.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seize the opportunity provided by the introduction of this amendment to ask the minister whether he has received representations from certain Quebec justices, including Mr. Justice Fabien, with respect to certain clauses of this bill providing that a police officer may decide for himself when making an arrest without warrant to release the person without bail? Has he contacted Mr. Justice Fabien and does he intend amending this clause in order to avoid unnecessary difficulties for police officers who, although highly qualified, may not always have the required training to make such decisions which heretofore were reserved to judges, in Quebec at least—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We must take it for granted that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) still has the floor, and that the question directed to him by the hon. member for Abitibi allows him to continue his speech, because the minister obviously cannot take the floor twice in support of that amendment.

On the other hand, it seems to me that the question of the hon. member is only remotely connected to the amendement under consideration, and it should have normally been asked to the minister on third reading. At any rate, since the question has been asked, the minister might want to answer it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I thank you, Mr. Speaker. We met with a delegation of provincial judges and judges of the sessions of the peace. In my opinion, judges are now satisfied with this amendment and with the specific question asked by the hon. member on this matter.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

Last week, at the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, amendments have been moved which were approved not only by provincial judges, but also by the Police Association of the Province of Quebec and other associations. I think that all those people are satisfied, and I just wrote to the judges and to the representatives of the Police Association on that matter. I believe that this will do it.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice? It illustrates, if I may say so, some of the problems we face in discussing a bill in connection with which there are no amendments on the Order Paper at the report stage. There is little opportunity for hon. members to ask questions until one reaches third reading stage, when it is really too late.

Hon. members who perhaps have read the transcript of evidence taken before the committee and yet still wish to ask a question for explanation are in this difficulty, as I am at present. This amendment deals with the definition of "court" for review purposes. What will be the effect of this amendment, in the minister's opinion, on those provinces which are changing the titles of certain of their courts? Instead of magistrates courts, we are now getting provincial judges. Actually, we are reaching the level that exists in the province of Quebec where you have a sessions judge and a provincial judge. In the province of Alberta, for instance, as of January 1 magistrates will become provincial judges, as they are in Ontario. Bearing in mind the definition of a judge and that the equivalent of a magistrate exists in the province of Quebec, and bearing in mind that judges may have the opportunity of sitting "en banc" to review an application for bail from the lower court, will the same privilege be granted to other provincial judges to sit "en banc" in review?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think the problem is solved by the fact that the definition is limited here to the province of Quebec, to take care of the particular situation there. As I understand it, in those provinces which are now reorganizing their courts and calling their magistrates provincial judges, there is in the legislation a clause saying that provincial judges, for the purposes of the Criminal Code, shall exercise the jurisdiction of a magistrate. Therefore, the problem alluded to does not arise.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I only want to say three or four words. Even though we have stretched the rules a bit, I trust that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is glad that we now have the report stage.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have always been content with the report stage and have always been generously treated by the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. members have heard the wording of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved that Bill C-218, to amend the provisions of the Criminal Code relating to the release from custody of accused persons before trial or pending appeal, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the third time?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): By leave, now.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, an interesting bill is before us and I hope my few words will be acceptable to the House. I think the bill embodies two propositions and I will put them into my own brand of English. One is: Don't put people in jail; putting people behind bars is a Canadian habit we should all try to discourage. My second colloquial proposition is: Just because they're broke doesn't mean they are criminals; or, people can be poor and honest. That is my way of looking at it. The minister put it in somewhat more refined English in the press release or communiqué which invariably comes out when a bill is read the first time in the House, dated January 22, 1971. He put it this way:

> The basic philosophy of the bill is that a police officer should not arrest a suspect if the public interest can be secured by proceeding otherwise; and that if a suspect is arrested and detained, his financial means should not be the determining factor in deciding whether or not he is released on bail pending his trial. The bill provides that the onus should be on the authorities to establish why bail should not be granted.

Perhaps because of that last statement several police officers' associations expressed concern to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. Their point was graphically made by a cartoon which appeared in an American publication. It depicts an American police officer standing in front of his desk sergeant. The police officer is saying, "I just made an arrest and I would like to call my lawyer."

Some of us are aware of the difficulties that police officers have encountered in an age where some rather important changes have been made to the law. I think I speak for members of the committee when I say that despite the protestations of police associations and some very distinguished police officers, they did not really make their case. However, because they were concerned about it, it would be worthwhile to request that after this law has received a fair trial of possibly one or two years the minister and his department keep an open mind on whether the fears of the police officers are justified. If police officers are being inhibited in their treatment of people they apprehend, some remedy should be sought in the future.

I wish to deal with the reason why police officers are concerned about the changes proposed in the bill we are now considering on third reading. I wish to quote from the 9th issue of the Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. At page 15 I directed a question to Mr. Robert Brown, the associate vice-president of the Canadian Police Association. This man is from Toronto. I quote:

> You seem to lay great stress on the danger of taking somebody who has been charged from the site of the arrest to a police station.

There are provisions that instead of the police officer trundling the accused to the police station, he may give him notice on the street that there will be court proceedings, and allow the man to continue on his way. I will give examples of this later. The police felt there was the danger of being open to some kind of civil action if they in fact took an accused to the station. I asked:

> Do you think it would be an inhibiting factor on police officers?

Mr. Brown replied:

> I think the way the bill is worded it would be because if that officer erred in judgment and found he had taken the wrong person to the police station, had taken a particular individual who should not have been taken to the police station, and that individual turned around and successfully sued him, there would be ramifications throughout all police departments across the country.

As a result of that and other evidence, changes were proposed which were satisfactory to the peace officers. They were in connection with what I call the power of non-arrest where someone is stopped and given notice that he is faced with a criminal charge but is not taken to the police station. Clause 436(2) of the reprinted and amended bill reads:

> (2) A peace officer shall not arrest a person without warrant for
> (a) an indictable offence mentioned in section 467—

I will deal with that in a moment. The clause continues:

> (b) an offence for which the person may be prosecuted by indictment or for which he is punishable on summary conviction, or
> (c) an offence punishable on summary conviction, in any case where
> (d) he has reasonable and probable grounds to believe that the public interest, having regard to all the circumstances including the need to
> (i) establish the identity of the person,
> (ii) secure or preserve evidence of or relating to the offence, or
> (iii) prevent the constituation or repetition of the offence or the commission of another offence,
> may be satisfied without so arresting the person, and
> (e) he has no reasonable grounds to believe that, if he does not so arrest the person, the person will fail to attend in court in order to be dealt with according to law.

That is quite a mouthful. I would like to be hidden in the cloakroom of the police academy when someone is trying to boil that down into simple language for someone who is beginning a police career. Subclause (3) reads:

(3) Nothwithstanding subsection (2), a peace officer acting under subsection (1) is deemed to be acting lawfully and in the execution of his duty for the purposes of

(a) any proceedings under this or any other act of Parliament, and

(b) any other proceedings, unless in any such proceedings it is alleged and established by the person making the allegation that the peace officer did not comply with the requirements of subsection (2).

In my opinion, and in the opinion of the members of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, this gives a great deal of protection to the police officer, almost to the point where unless he acted frivolously or wilfully there would be no possible way in which someone could come back on him for failing to give a person the right to return home instead of being taken to the police station. Be that as it may, the police officers were concerned.

After a two-year trial period this provision should be examined to see whether the career of any police officer has been hurt or whether legal proceedings have been instituted against a police officer. The minister nods his head: I think that is sufficient.

I said I would deal with those cases where a police officer gives someone notice that he will eventually be charged with one of a variety of offences. These include theft under $50, attempting to obtain something valued under $50 by false pretences and resisting or obstructing a police officer. I think there is a fat chance of that happening in such a case. If someone resists or obstructs a police officer, you can bet that he will go to jail, and he will probably go there in the old paddy wagon. These offences also include running a common gaming house, betting, engaging in a lottery and cheatin at cards. I can picture a police officer saying—"Tut, tut. I won't arrest you. You come down to the police station in your own good time." There is also the bawdy house offence, driving a car while one's licence is suspended, common assault, other types of assault and failing to collect a bus fare. If someone fails to collect a bus fare, he will not necessarily go to jail; he may ride the bus the rest of the way home and is free until his employer catches up with him.

There is the problem of discretion which exists when a police officer stumbles on one of these offences and must decide whether to take the man or woman to the police station or give them notice that they must appear at some other time. The minister said this: if you do not mind, Mr. Speaker, I will put it on the record because a number of police officers will be interested in this debate. They will probably not have ready access to the reports of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs but will expect to read something about it in Hansard.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Under the amendment now suggested—

That is, the change in this clause which I have read, as amended.

—the street officer's duty not to arrest would arise in relation to the summary or less serious offences although he would still have a discretion not to arrest, not to exercise his power of arrest in any other case.

THE CHAIRMAN: On the discretion of the officer?

MR. TURNER: On the discretion of the officer. He has that discretion now, Mr. Chairman. This bill converts the discretion into a duty not to arrest and we are talking in this amendment as to what offences this duty not to arrest ought to be attached to.

Under the bill as it now stands the duty not to arrest includes all offences except for murder. Under the suggested amendment, the duty not to arrest would be restricted to summary offences, and there are about 100 of those, the offences for which there is an option to proceed by way of indictment or summary proceedings and those offences under the absolute jurisdiction of a magistrate.

Some of the police officers presented a good picture of the difference between the problems facing a police officer in a metropolitan area and those facing him in a rural area. I think the point was thoughtful and I should like to put some of the argument on record. The point comes from Mr. Brown, president of the Canadian Police Association of Toronto. He talked about the heavy onus which falls upon police officers in the street under the terms of sections 437 and 438.

We intend to show, by exhibit, a number of items which could cause the officer on the street to accept certain identification as proof in dealing with a suspect. These identification documents, however, are either fraudulent or stolen. It is suggested that this is an urban police problem as opposed to rural.

Then they came in with a glittering array of documents, credit cards, student passes, train passes—you name it—anything which anybody can open up their billfold and look at; all the cards they amass there. All these cards are the subject of forgery or fraudulent reproduction. The point Mr. Brown was making is that the police officer probably does not know the person he is stopping for crime in a big city, but likely would know him if he stopped him for crime in a small town. In a big city the one thing he would want, anyway, would be some identification of the accused before he would let him go under his own power; and Mr. Brown points out it is easy for a person of criminal bent to have all kinds of false documentation upon his person.

Well, time alone will tell whether this ready access to forged or otherwise fraudulent identification is an inhibiting factor for police. Perhaps there will be cases where public outrage will be raised because of the ability to obtain forged documents of identity and the like. But to me that is not really an inhibiting factor. I do not think it is a difficulty in the bill; I think it is just one of the reasons for our having a whole lot of police forces. Another point the same Mr. Brown makes is with regard to the principle of persons attending for identification purposes. Persons released may not appear to be the ones who attend an identification parade. This comes from the 9th issue of the deliberations of the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Different suggestions have been made regarding the mechanics of such a change in procedure. These have included obtaining a thumb print of the accused at the time of apprehension which would be the most definite form of future identification. We must consider the larger forces who process a number of prisoners each day. An officer may apprehend a female with short hair but when she arrives for identification she may be wearing a wig which would change her whole appearance. A police officer may encounter some difficulty verifying the photograph as that of a woman he had previously apprehended, perhaps days before her identification appearance. The same could apply to a male with a beard and long hair who shows up clean-shaven and with a haircut. It would be almost impossible to identify the person from a photograph. We must also consider the number of persons a police officer contacts during his normal tour of duty.

I suppose that problem points up the fact that when in doubt the police officer will haul the fellow down to the jail for identification. That will be the big problem the minister will face because, let us face it, the minister is trying to cut down arrests and the arbitrary bundling off of people to put them behind bars for the night and let them argue for bail in the morning. In short, the minister is trying to achieve a more humane practice, but I suspect that unless you are stopped by your friendly, neighbourhood police officer who knows you, if you are arrested in a large city in Canada, 99.9 per cent of the time you will go to the jail and will have to argue your case before the desk sergeant.

I have two quick points to make before concluding. The first deals with guidelines for the detention of an accused in custody as laid down in new section 445A(7), which is to be found at page 24. I have already tried this one for size on some of my friends in the judiciary in Nova Scotia, and they found it vague. I do not know whether it can be any stronger than that which the minister and his drafters have brought before us, but for the record it deals with the detention of an accused in custody as justified on one of the two following grounds. In other words, it is an attempt to lay down guidelines for the direction of the judge or other persons who are dealing with bail.

(a) on the primary ground that his detention is necessary to assure his attendance in court in order to be dealt with according to law; and (b) on the secondary ground (the applicability of which shall be determined only in the event that and after it is determined that his detention is not justified on the primary ground referred to in paragraph (a)) that his detention is necessary in the public interest or for the protection or safety of the public, having regard to all the circumstances including any substantial likelihood that the accused will, if he is released from custody, commit a criminal offence involving serious harm or an intereference with the administration of justice.

That is, Mr. Speaker, if he is going to run out and try to "get at" Crown witnesses and suborn their testimony. But I think it does not express principles as quickly or efficaciously as Moses found when he brought those tablets back with him. The fact is that it does offer a primary and secondary line which judges should follow, and it may be worth while to look at again in a couple of years in light of the experience the minister finds the courts have in dealing with this problem. At least, to my mind it seems a reasonable direction.

Finally one is faced with the problem where a policeman has said: If you keep this man out of jail awaiting trial, he may go around committing other crimes. That is a pretty pertinent question, is it not? The Ouimet report, on which the bill is partly based, suggested having a registry in each province. In today's electronic age I am sure it would be possible to establish close liaison between the registries of each province so that police officers, judges or Crown attorneys could obtain very quick reports on subjects who had been apprehended and ascertain whether there was any likelihood of the person in question continuing to live a life of crime if given freedom.

Since I raised this point on second reading and it remained unanswered, may I just refer to Minutes of Proceedings No. 8 of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, where as reported at page 30 I made the following remarks:

My first question relates to a suggestion within the Ouimet committee report that there be a registry system established within each province so that a judge faced with the question—a police officer, I presume, too—whether a person should be allowed at large or kept in custody to await trial would have some quick way of finding out about that person. This seemed to be a point on which Ouimet relied heavily but is, of course, absent from the bill. In fairness to that report perhaps the minister should be allowed to say why it is not in there.

The minister replied:

I agree with that suggestion of the Canadian Committee on Corrections, known as the Ouimet committee, but it is an administrative matter rather than a legislative one—and it is an administrative one depending on voluntary co-operation by the provinces. Under the Criminal Code the enforcement of the criminal law has been delegated to the provinces. It is their joint responsibility and I will undertake, as I already have undertaken to the hon. member, to transmit the Ouimet committee report recommendation to the effect that a central registry for bail applications be set up if at all possible. It might well be one of the matters that could be submitted to the uniformity conference next year, and I will undertake to do that.

I continued:

I suppose, Mr. Chairman, to carry the point further, there even could be co-operation, in this communications age, in respect of one central registry—

The minister replied:

Yes, and I imagine it will be done on the computer system now set up which handles a number of offences in a statistical way, automobile offences and so on, and the bail application problem could be put on the same system of computers.

I am sorry to have taken up the time of the House to make these three or four points on the bill, but I thought they should be on the public record, more especially since we had fairly good representation before the committee from those who will either make or break this bill. There is no doubt that it is the police officer on the beat who will prove either that we have been indulging in a great act of wisdom or in an act of optimism that has no basis whatever in reality. It would be my hope—I think I also express the hopes of my colleagues—that this legislation will do exactly what is hoped of it.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on this bill. We had a healthy debate on second reading and a good discussion at the committee stage, so I shall confine myself to making just a few remarks. The test of the adequacy and strength of the bail reform bill will be shown when its measures are applied by an arresting officer, the officer in charge at a police station, magistrates, justices of the peace and provincial judges. The bill gives very wide discretion to an arresting officer, to an officer in charge and to justices of the peace. This will probably be a good thing because it will place on these people the onus of exercising good, common sense in regard to making arrests and permitting people to be released on bail.

In its present legislative form, the bill looks like a step forward. The principle that the financial means of a person who has been arrested and detained should not be the determining factor in deciding whether or not he should be released on bail pending trial is a step forward, as is the principle that the onus of establishing why bail should not be granted is on the authorities concerned. The test now in legislative form is whether an accused is likely to turn up for his trial. This test has been stated in many cases, and since we now have it in legislative form this is certainly another step forward.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that when the minister introduced the first bail reform bill in June he imposed on an arresting officer the duty of establishing reasonable grounds for justifying the arrest; no other grounds for arrest were adequate. The minister indicated at that time that any unjustifiable arrest might leave an arresting officer open to civil liability. Following conversations and discussions with police associations across the country, the minister made a substantial change in the bill which he later introduced. He has now set forth guidelines to assist a police officer who is making an arrest without warrant. These guidelines are to be found in section 436 (1) and (2). The police officer is also protected by the law, because the bill states that he shall be deemed to be acting lawfully and in the execution of his duty.

The fact that 90 per cent of all arrests are without warrant indicates the heavy duty imposed on an arresting officer in regard to offences under the Criminal Code. The law is now in the same position that it was in prior to the introduction of the bill—the onus will be on the person arrested to show the arrest was unlawful in order for him to succeed in a civil action. I am not being severely critical of the minister for his making that change. He has had the opportunity of speaking to police officers across the country, so we shall have to await the test of time to determine the adequacy and fairness of this provision.

I recall when we were in committee asking detective Syd Brown whether he had heard of any successful civil actions for unlawful arrest. If my memory serves me correctly, he said that in his 20 or 24 years' experience he had heard of no such successful action. There was certain apprehension on the part of the police in regard to the stringent sections in the Code prior to the second bill that was introduced by the minister. I think the minister will have to give some direction to arresting officers in regard to what they should do when making an arrest. The minister will probably have to set forth some of the charges in connection with which an arrest can be made, so the officer can issue the appearance notice at the time of arrest. I also think the minister will have to give similar indication to the officer in charge of a station before any issuance of a promise to appear on notice.

Time will indicate the effectiveness of these measures. We have given an arresting officer wide discretion, and I expect that in the application of the new law there will be wide variations of application. We shall constantly have to scrutinize the behaviour of arresting officers in relation to charges brought under the Criminal Code.

I am very pleased the minister has included a clause in the bill which gives a magistrate the opportunity, when imposing a sentence, to take into account the time an accused person has spent in jail while awaiting trial. This has been very important in the past when sentence had to be passed. One situation which comes to mind concerns a second offence of driving while impaired. Under the Code, if a person was found guilty of a second offence of driving while impaired the magistrate had no discretion; he had to impose a jail sentence of 14 days minimum or a maximum of 3 months. If such a person did not have bail money it meant that he could spend upward of a month in jail and then would have to serve the mandatory 14 days jail term required by the Code. The provision which gives the magistrate an opportunity to take into account the time in jail spent by an accused while awaiting trial is a great step forward.

My last point is rather important. We have permitted an accused cash bail or other security in cases where he does not ordinarily reside more than 100 miles from the place where he is in custody, with the onus on Crown counsel to demonstrate that none of the other methods are satisfactory. I am sure the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) did some mental wrestling in respect of this particular provision and has come up with something which he believes adequate, reasonable and fair. I should like to remind the minister of the question I posed to him the other day concerning students, young people, who will be travelling across Canada during the summer. I can picture many of these young people perhaps getting into trouble with the municipal police and finding themselves in a position of being 100 miles away from their ordinary residence.

It may be that Crown counsel will try to demonstrate there is no satisfactory method of releasing such a person. We heard of cases last summer where a number of students were detained under the vagrancy sections of the Criminal Code. It seems to me we should not continue this practice of harassing young people and students who travel across the country. The only way out in this regard is for the Minister of Justice to rescind the vagrancy sections of the Criminal Code. This would take away from the municipal police the power of harassment in respect of students or young people who travel across Canada. Therefore, I again plead with the Minister of Justice, in my awkward but persuasive style, to bring forward an immediate amendment to the Criminal Code to delete the vagrancy sections and stop police harassment of students who travel across the country in the summer.

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning I said the test of this bill is dependent on the wise discretion exercised by the arresting officer at the scene of the arrest, or by the officer at the station, the justice of the peace, the magistrate or the provincial judge in court. I should like to think the minister has taken a bold step forward with regard to protecting people from unlawful arrest and long detention while awaiting trial. I will probably have to wait at least a year to see whether I should throw accolades to the minister or continue the constructive criticism which from time to time I impose on him.

At this stage I am prepared to give the minister credit for this bill. I would say again that it is a mini-step forward with regard to our criminal law processes. I thought the minister took a big step forward in respect of the omnibus bill amendments to the Criminal Code. Now he has taken a mini-step. I should like to see him take another giant step by bringing forward another omnibus bill to take into consideration vagrancy, uniformity of sentencing and many other features with which I am sure he is anxious to proceed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to put a short question to the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert)?

Mr. Gilbert: Certainly.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): When the hon. member has an opportunity to cast his persuasive mind into the law, would he be good enough to look into the burden of proof that is cast upon someone who is arrested, in establishing a case of false arrest? He will find that the burden of proof has not shifted. Under this bill, the burden of proof remains with the police officer, if the arrest is not justified, to show reasonable and probable cause at the time. I believe the hon. member will find the burden of proof has not shifted.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether that is a question. Hansard, I trust, will not forget to put a question mark at the end of that statement.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Speaker, I am always delighted to have a lecture from the Minister of Justice because, as you know, I have not practised law for four or five years and have become a little rusty. I may have misread that clause, but I await the first successful action in respect of unlawful arrest. When Mr. Brown tells me there has not been such a case in 25 years, I cannot hold my breath while waiting for a successful action.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see the bill reach this stage. Reform of bail procedures is long overdue. Many anxious parents have wondered where a wandering boy has been, only to find some 24 hours later that he had become involved with the law. In many cases this has not been without cause, because sometimes young people have done something which, if not warranting arrest, warrants their being brought before a justice in order to give an account of themselves.

However, particularly in respect of a young person who has not done anything very serious, who has no record of previous brushes with the law and is a resident of the town concerned, it is particularly distressing for someone to have to go down to the jail and dig him out. It is always distressing. Also, when a young person is a long way from home and is trying to be independent, he does not like to have to phone home to mother the first time he has an extra bottle of beer or breaks an obscure section of the traffic act and finds himself arrested by an overzealous policeman.

I believe I know whereof I speak in this regard because at one time I was a green young policeman anxious for promotion. Sometimes the young green policeman who does not know his job is a little overzealous. He thinks it is easy for the young person to shrug off the fact that he has been arrested or detained. Such a situation is distressing to any well-meaning young person and certainly to all those who are near and dear to him and who have his best interests at heart. So I am glad to see this long overdue improvement made in respect of bail and the laws of arrest. I think, however, that an ounce of prevention—to be trite—is worth a pound of cure. I do not think that even with the law as it was there would have been very many arrests if all our police officers had been well trained in their duties.

Therefore I would appeal to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), because I know this subject is dear to his heart, to see that our police forces are adequately staffed. At present all municipalities are seeking money for low-cost housing, for anti-pollution, and for all sorts of improvements, and I think that the adequate staffing of police forces often takes low priority. I know the minister will use his best offices to encourage our municipalities, provinces and jurisdictions in which the federal government holds sway to ensure that police forces have the proper personnel. It is also very important to give our police forces proper training. I would like to see more facilities provided for our police colleges, not only to train young fellows on the beat but also to train higher ranks and to retrain some of the senior officers who set the tone of the whole police force.

On some occasions—rare, I hope—our police forces have been used as revenue men. Promotions are sometimes based on the number of prosecutions made. If this practice is allowed to go unchecked, a great barrier will be built up between the public and the police. Under no circumstances should we foster the belief that the police are anything but the servants of the public, in the highest sense. They are there for the protection of the public. The police, above all others, should be working to keep our young people out of trouble, rather than to lay traps for them or involve them in unecessary brushes with the law.

Until I read the bill carefully I thought there was a shift of onus which would put policemen on the spot and perhaps involve them in unecessary law suits. But as I read the legislation it seems that very little change is anticipated in this regard, and where a policeman has reasonable grounds for believing that an indictable offence has been committed, his powers will be very much as they were before, except for certain specific instances. He is given the same discretion if he acts in good faith, comes before the court at the correct time and explains the reasons for the arrest.

I never had any difficulty in this regard; I never arrested a member of the public without having reasonable grounds for doing so. Only too often the grounds are there. A well-meaning policeman, properly trained in the law, should have no difficulty whatsoever in establishing that he was acting in the best public interest, for the people and not against them. I do not think the onus which is put upon the accused or the person who thinks he has been subject to unlawful arrest is very great. Under section 436(3)(b) it appears that the onus is on the accused to establish a case against the policeman. But I think it is right that all he would have to do is allege that the policeman had in fact arrested him falsely, and I am sure that any justice worthy of the name would have the police officer come forward and explain why he thought it was in the best interests of the public to arrest the person.

I was also a little worried that this might be a technical act which would prevent the policeman doing his job while on extended duties, perhaps in the Arctic or in outlying districts where a justice of the peace was not available. However, I see that the onus is not necessarily on the policeman to bring the accused before a justice of the peace in the usual 24-hour period: the usual common sense of the Canadian public will prevail and he can bring the accused before the court within reasonable time. Here again, I do not think it would be difficult for the policeman to show the justice of the peace that it was necessary to bring the accused by dog-team from the Arctic Islands to the officer in charge in Aklavik, Coronation, or some such place where there was an effective or efficient justice of the peace.

So by and large I am pleased to see this long-awaited improvement to the Criminal Code in these two aspects. I have had considerable correspondence on this matter, perhaps because I have been a police officer. I will conclude after making one more request of the Minister of Justice, and that is that I think we are pitifully short of justices of the peace. I think that, particularly in cities, we should have justices of the peace on duty 24 hours a day so that in middle of the night persons arrested, particularly those from out of town, can come before a justice of the peace almost immediately.

With radio-equipped cars and the facilities we now have it should be a simple matter for a policeman to bring an accused before a justice of the peace and put the case before him briefly as to whether or not it is necessary to hold the man in custody. I think that particularly in our cities we should have justices of the peace on call so that these cases could be disposed of and so the onus of keeping the man in custody would not be upon the police. This would help to maintain the excellent relationship we have learned to expect between the police and the public. If the onus of keeping the accused in custody were taken off the police officer on the beat, he would then merely be a fact-finding man. In many cases the policeman is expected to use judicial discretion because the public thinks he is a fact-finder, judge, jury and court of appeal all in one.

[Mr. Bigg.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

PROVISIONS REGARDING CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS

The House resumed, from Thursday, January 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Goyer that Bill C-192, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and the amendment of Mr. Woolliams (page 2381).

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, a great many people across Canada are deeply concerned about this bill, the Young Offenders Act as it is called. Perhaps nothing could more effectively emphasize their concern or the need for modern legislation to deal with children and young people who have committed offences against society than the tragic case raised in this House last Friday by my colleague, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard). It was the case of a 14-year old boy sentenced to six years in penitentiary for the fatal beating last August of a 14-year old girl near Hope in the Fraser Valley. The boy was high on LSD at the time. It was all a terrible matter—but how was it handled? The judge, sending the boy off for six years to the penitentiary, said he hoped the boy would be sent to a minimum security institution. In other words, it was a case of out of sight, out of mind. What happens to that boy now? My colleague said he thought it was shocking that the boy should be sent to an institution which was nothing less than a school for crime.

The people of the country ask what will happen to this boy when he graduates from that school for crime? We have had a number of cases in my province—and I know there have been similar cases in other provinces—where young people, having been released from such institutions have committed even more dreadful crimes. This was because they had not been given the proper treatment or handled in a way that would guarantee their safe return to society. The case I have cited is an illustration of the failure of our method of dealing with young persons who have committed offences. It also points to the concern which people now have when they are faced with this new legislation.

Clause 4 of the bill reads:

This act shall be liberally construed to the end that where a young person is found under section 29 to have committed an offence, he will be dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision and to the end that the care, custody and discipline of that young person will approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by such a young person's parents.

But having given this lip service to the parenthood that was never extended to these delinquent young people, the bill forgets all about how successful parenthood works. In fact, it has been described by one official of the John Howard Society as a charter for young criminals. Any hope of providing the guidance and direction that such young people need, if they are to return safely to society, is doomed from the start. The bill starts out by paying lip service to the idea of rehabilitating young people, but then descends to a collection of legal terminology, spelling out the punishment that is to be given to a young person. The most damning criticism of the bill has come in a letter to members of Parliament and Senators from the Canadian Mental Health Association, in these words:

It is, in fact, a criminal code for children, which is distasteful in its terminology, legalistic in its approach and punitive in its effect.

In other words, the bill is clearly based on the old, outmoded concept of crime and punishment rather than on the new thinking of rehabilitation and redirection. Police techniques spelled out in the bill, such as fingerprinting, photographing and the establishment of criminal records that can only be removed under the criminal record act, surely have no place in legislation designed to approximate as nearly as may be the care, custody and discipline of young offenders by parents. If parents were to start out by fingerprinting, photographing and undertaking all these other legalistic things, very shortly they would have less, rather than more, influence over their children.

First of all, Mr. Speaker, we believe that the title of the bill is wrong. It refers to young offenders. We think this should read, as is the case in Britain, the Children and Young Persons Act, or simply the Young Persons Act. But that is the least of our concern. What is more seriously lacking in the bill is provision for an indeterminate sentence for children who have departed from the line of acceptable behaviour in society. How can a judge measure the exact amount of time required for treatment in the case of each individual? People's backgrounds, temperaments and requirements vary tremendously. I notice that Judge Little, chairman of the Ontario Juvenile Court Judges' Committee on Delinquency, commented:

They are assuming that a judge can measure the required amount of treatment. With a time limit, it's like taking a person out of hospital in the middle of treatment.

The Canadian Mental Health Association is even more explicit in this regard. It has stated:

A Criminal Code based on the notion that specific offences merit a specified range of punitive procedures may be appropriate for adults but definitely not for children. A particular offence may be committed by two children of the same age. In one case the total social, emotional and intellectual needs of one child may require only a suspended sentence; while the other child an indefinite and probably prolonged period of re-education, treatment and retraining may be required.

The experience in my province, Mr. Speaker, is that an indeterminate sentence is much better than establishing a time limit, because it allows the people who are dealing with the child to determine, as the child progresses, much more exactly how much time is required. Young people change very greatly during the age range covered by this bill. That brings up another point, Mr. Speaker. We are unhappy about that age range. The bill covers the age from 10 to 17 years. We think that the United Kingdom approach, where 14 is specified as the minimum age, is better; and we believe that 18 years should be set as the upper limit. This is in line with the kind of treatment that is being given in Holland and Sweden, countries which are using a far more flexible method of dealing with young people than that laid out in the legalities of this bill.

What is also lacking in the bill is any provision for after-care and rehabilitation following release. It seems to me that there is not very much sense in holding a young person in custody for months or years and then throwing him back into the same circumstances which caused the commission of the offence in the first place. If this bill is designed to rehabilitate young people and restore them safely to society, provision must be made for after-care and rehabilitation. It is no wonder that Dr. Marcilio, until very recently head of the Toronto Family Court psychiatric unit, was moved to comment:

These children are not young offenders. They are victims of situations, of phychiatric situations and emotional deprivation. Eighty-five per cent of the children who come to the courts need psychiatric understanding, he says, but the proposed bill would disregard a child's need for help.

And Judge William T. Little, chairman of the Ontario Juvenile Court Judges' Committee on Delinquency was quite specific in his criticism of the bill when he said:

The intent of the original act (the Juvenile Delinquents Act) was to have a social objective of the rehabilitation of children. It seems to me this intent has been lost in the new bill.

But it does not come out as rehabilitation and redirection; it comes out into a crime and punishment deal all over again. The minister said that the new bill will treat young people as more responsible beings. Surely, like the rest of us, he ought to know that young delinquents are not responsible, and cannot be responsible, unless we are prepared to provide a whole range of resources to help them. They would not have committed unacceptable social behaviour if they had been responsible human beings. It is useless to expect that by the fact of arrest and committal they will suddenly become responsible human beings.

It seems to me that with this sort of approach we have not learned very much over the last few years. If a whole generation, and perhaps more, of young people is not to be lost under this bill I think we must bring its provisions into line with modern scientific knowledge and thought. I realize that satisfying society's feeling of outrage and guilt by punitive legislation against young offenders might be sufficient for some people: they might think that this should be the purpose of such legislation. But it is certainly no way to help the young people of today to find their road through this time of confusion and change.

I do not want to minimize the fact that these young people have committed acts which are socially unacceptable. We cannot shut our eyes to that. They have to be treated and rehabilitated, not only so that they come out as human beings able to stand on their own feet but come out safe enough that they can be turned loose in society. They have to come out as responsible human beings. I realize that there are no proper institutions in the provinces at the moment but I think the federal government would be doing what it should if it helped in the financing and staffing of such institutions in order to give young people a chance to become rehabilitated and rebuilt into good citizens.

The Canadian Mental Health Association has said:

> In other words, legislation of this kind should be designed with the interests of this child as its primary concern rather than the seriousness of the offence.

Such legislation should be flexible. It should have in mind that these youngsters should not be forgotten by this legislation when it gets beyond clause 4 which reads:

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that where a young person is found under section 29 to have committed an offence, he will be dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision—

These are the ingredients which must go into any program which will help rehabilitate young people. Serious people who have been dealing with young offenders claim that these ingredients are not found in this new bill. In its recommendations, the Canadian Corrections Association stated as follows:

> The decision on whether a child goes to an institution and when he is to leave should rest with the child welfare authorities. Whether a particular child requires placement in an institution, and in which institution, is such a technical decision that it should be made by the child welfare authorities, not by the court. When the court thinks a child cannot be dealt with to advantage on probation, he should make him a ward of the provincial director of child welfare, or appropriate official, who will then make the decision whether foster home placement will meet the requirements of the case or whether an institutional placement is necessary. If institutional placement is indicated, the director of child welfare should decide which institution will best fit the particular child.
> Also, the decision as to when the child is ready to leave the institution can be made properly only by the child welfare officials who are in constant contact with his progress in the institution. The consent of the court for the child's removal should not be required.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with very flexible, changing and sensitive organisms when we are dealing with young people who have been bent and twisted, in many cases, by their home environment and the ignorance and neglect of the people who happen to be their parents. This happens all too frequently. If we are to use our best knowledge to try and help young people recover from the early twistings and distortions in their lives, we will have to be a great deal more flexible in our approach and less legalistic than is the case in this legislation.

I should like to reiterate the recommendation made in opening this debate by my colleague from Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), that we should seriously consider giving this legislation a hoist. We should allow the committee to go across the country and talk with people who have had experience in these fields, rather than some lawyers in ivory towers here in Ottawa. Lawyers do not always inhabit ivory towers, but probably too many of them had a hand in drafting this legislation. We have seen that the Canadian Corrections Association, the Canadian Mental Health Association and people like Judge Little in juvenile and family courts across the country are against this legislation because they think it is stiff and punitive.

It is a pity to put ourselves into a legal straitjacket when dealing with flexible human beings in a time of great change. Let us hoist the legislation until such time as we can bring modern thinking and modern penal procedures to the shaping and training of these youngsters.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-192 purports to improve the penal law affecting young people. I think it is trying to do too much too fast. It is like motherhood—we are all for it. We must be very careful when redefining the criminal law that is to affect young people below legal age, and I use the term "legal age" in anticipation of changes to the bill that will be made either immediately or when the bill goes back to committee.

We are trying to say in this bill that children not of legal age need not accept their full responsibilities in this field: they are not fully responsible in connection with other fields and activities. That does not mean that there is no evil-doing among young people. We make a big mistake if we think that with the stroke of a pen, by changing legalistic terms, we can rid ourselves of evil among human beings who are below legal age. We must be hard headed about this and say when something is wrong. Only by adopting a down to earth approach to these things when they come to our attention can we do something about them.

I trust that we have left the Dark Ages far behind. I hope it will not be necessary for me to speak tonight against the imposition of corporal punishment. I hope that has gone. I do not countenance it, nor do other progressive, well-educated, civilized men.

Mr. Gilbert: That is right.

Mr. Bigg: The first speech I made in this House was on the subject of corporal punishment. I said 13 years ago—and I have had no reason to change my mind—that nobody, but nobody, has the right to inflict corporal punishment on any person unless it is done through love, meaning one's parents. No legally-constituted group or authority, whether composed of psychologists, prison wardens or anybody else, has the right to punish me bodily. If we must err, let us err on the side of humanity—because unless done with love, corporal punishment does no good whatever. I am in some doubt even about the value of corporal punishment by one's parents. Sometimes as a last resort when she has tried all other psychological means of persuasion, mother applies her hand to that portion of the body which the Lord provided for it. But in society there is no love and, therefore, we must rule out corporal punishment.

When we talk about correction we mean that we must discipline a person. Here, presumably, that means taking away some part or all of one's liberty. I do not understand how in that area this bill takes a forward step. No matter what you call it, under this bill you will take away young people of tender years, lock them up and keep them away from the various sources of love which they most need. Apparently, in this society everything that is worthwhile costs money. I suggest that we must be prepared to pay if we are to be helpful in this field. To begin with, I think we might devote a sum—I take this figure out of my hat—of $20 million, which is only $1 for every man, woman and child in Canada, and set the money aside for proper research and groundwork in this subject. It is no good setting up institutions, reforming our laws and bringing in well-meaning changes if we do not know exactly what we are doing.

I do not think all our psychologists, social workers, policemen, lawyers, judges and members of Parliament put together can come up with a plan which will eliminate juvenile delinquency or criminal actions among young people. On the other hand, we must take a positive step now; it is long overdue, because thousands of lives have been broken as the result of our neglect in this important field. There are not enough psychologists, sociologists and allied workers in this field, and as a result I suppose we shall be forced to segregate these young people in institutions from other, so-called normal children. We must have a plan in this field.

I think this bill is hasty. If I may use a lawyer's term, I think we are putting these young offenders, or these young people who have made mistakes, in double jeopardy. We say we will not make criminals out of them, but the logic of this bill seems to indicate that we will take away their liberty and put them in the custody of people who in many cases are not trained in this field and are not willing to give the attention, technical care and skill that these young people require. They need highly skilled care.

We are expressing a pious wish when we say these institutions will give the young people concerned the kind of care a child may expect from his parents. I presume we mean good parents when we say that. In the present complicated society in which we are trying to raise children in concrete tanks instead of natural surroundings, it is not easy to raise children who are happy and well adjusted. Yet presumably we will incarcerate these young people in institutions and leave them in the care of untrained persons who will not provide the kind of care that, in our pious hope, we wish for. They will not take the place of parents and it is patently impossible for them to do so at present. I say that we must act, even though it may now be too late, and spend money to train the necessary personnel. We must be very careful to make sure that the groundwork is done.

The bill suggests, Mr. Speaker, that we treat these young offenders as persons who will be locked up until they reach the age of 21, or legal age—which may be 18 by the time the act is amended. We are to keep them locked up until they reach legal age and then, in some cases, try them for their previous crimes as fully-grown criminals. The trial might be 11 years after the crime, misdemeanour or breach of society's rules: it does not matter what nice name one wants to call it. Ten or 11 years after the crime committed by the child, the fully-grown person will be tried. What kind of necromancy will take place in connection with a person who grows up in an institution, facing a trial for something which he committed half a generation ago? During those 10 or 11 years he is expected to grow like a well-watered flower in the greenhouse.

What kind of personality do you think a child will develop if for 11 years he lives under the shadow of delayed justice and does not know what will happen to him? If he is charged with a capital offence, he might be sentenced to another ten years in custody. Then you will find a person of 30 leaving jail and trying to adjust to society. It is not necessary to be a psychologist to know what kind of a twisted human being we will have in those circumstances.

I have had experience with the law. The best way to prevent a crime or misdemeanour is to convince a young person that there is a better way of life. He must be shown that if he does something wrong, justice will be swift: it may not be fierce, but it will be sure, fair and swift. He must be convinced that the sooner he starts back on the right road, the better. In a civilized society, rehabilitation is the only excuse for having anything to do with these people. They must be brought back into productive society as quickly as possible, with little emphasis on revenge and much emphasis on understanding and forgiveness. There should be no suggestion of a ten-year delay in getting at the root of the problem. A young person must be convinced that there is a proper place for him in society. He must be told that he is a person who counts, who will fit in and will come into contact with the love of the human race.

We must go out on the highways and into the hedges to locate those who like young people. We must not only attract them by high wages: we require well trained, dedicated people to take charge of young offenders. Even with such people it will be impossible to replace parents, family, race, religion and persuasion. These people must be given the same start in life which many of us had by the accident of birth.

This all boils down to the fact that we are leaving out one of the most important elements—the willingness of the Canadian people to pay. This cannot be done easily. What kind of institutions are they going to be put in? Are they going to be put in places like Bordeaux jail, well-meaning orphanages or industrial schools? The people who operate these institutions are no doubt well-meaning, but it is shocking to know how often corporal punishment is administered. Corporal punishment which is administered, without love and understanding, to a child is completely wasted. The results inevitably bend the stick in the wrong direction. To beat a child you do not love will make him more hateful than before he committed the offence, midsdemeanour or whatever polite name it may be called when he does something of which we disapprove.

More social workers, psychologists and nurses must be trained. A great deal more than that is necessary. People are also required to look after recreation, including such things as teaching young offenders to play football. The people who staff our institutions are of a very high moral order. It is no exaggeration to say that a young male may be put in jail for three or four years for statutory rape. Statutory rape is committed when a boy of 16, for example, takes full responsibility for experimenting sexually. Where is the benefit of the doubt here? In Alberta, a boy of 16 can be jailed for contributing to juvenile delinquency because he had relations with a girl 24 hours short of her eighteenth birthday. Where is the benefit of the doubt there? If he is guilty of this offence, he may spend four or five of his difficult adolescent years in jail under homosexual guards—and certainly under the great threat of homosexual inmates.

The people looking after this young person should have the wisdom of Solomon and the integrity of a Roman mother. Where will we find such people? If we do not find such people, these young people will return to society after four or five years in such an institution so badly twisted that they will never become normal citizens. This will not be accomplished by this bill, the pious hope that we have done all we can for our young people because we no longer call them criminals. We are treating them like criminals; in fact, we are placing them in double jeopardy.

I do not suggest that the bill was not introduced with the best intentions. It has often been said that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. Are the good intentions to put young people into inadequate institutions, improperly staffed and subject them to the vagaries of sadistic guards or people who will use half-baked psychology upon them in an attempt to turn them into well adjusted, well trained, happy citizens? It is an impossibility! The members of organizations such as the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society can do something significant. Their funds should be enormously implemented. These dedicated people are now working to the best of their ability in institutions in which people are called criminals. How much more would they be willing to extend their facilities if we put a little money into their care and trained more of the same kind of people to move in with these young people to make a home as closely as possibly to a normal home? I am not necessarily speaking of people with university degrees, but people brought out of such societies as I have mentioned, the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society, men and women with a degree of common sense.

The work they have already done in connection with paroles is wonderful, and I suggest that the emphasis should be on parole. The emphasis should be on getting these young people outside the prison walls as fast as we can and into surroundings as normal, happy and homelike as we can. The whole emphasis should be on de-institutionalizing the whole process.

As my experience has been for most of my life with delinquents, both of legal age and under legal age, I am not suggesting we should not hold hearings. I am not suggesting we should not bring to the attention of young people the fact that society is not happy with the way they sometimes behave. On the contrary, we need more staff, we need more and better trained policemen, more knowledgeable magistrates to see that these young people get a proper hearing.

Only a few months ago I was talking about bail and an improvement in the bail laws so that we do not confine young people unnecessarily in jail, not even for an hour, if there is any way of making sure that they are not deprived of their liberty and if they can be brought before a justice of the peace or a justice of the court and have their case explained on neutral ground. As a former police officer, I would have been delighted at any time to have shared the responsibility for an arrest and the judicial part of the judgment with a reasonable man in the community respected at all levels of society, a man who had no axe to grind, no promotion to expect, a man who in many cases had an intimate knowledge of young people. He should be such a person. He should be a person who knows the young people in the community, and he should be able to say, "In my opinion this young man need not be kept in custody." That is the kind of person we need on the bench. It is people of this kind who should screen our children of tender years, the most important natural resource we have, and it is with this original judgment that the whole future of this child and/or his family should be determined.

Improvements in the law will be an empty gesture unless we have enough people who make it their business to see that these young people are not damaged and that young people who have already been damaged are not further damaged by the well-meaning custody of people who are inadequately trained to look after them or help them once we have taken them out of circulation. It is ridiculous to try to set rules for treating ten-year old children in exactly the same way as you would treat a 17-year old. This act must be more flexible than it is in its present state.

Again I come back to the idea that we must have men of common sense and training to decide that a child must be treated as a child. When a boy is getting to be 16 or 17 years of age—when he should be, and certainly could be, a man—he must not be treated as if he were a child of tender years. He must be shown that he owes it to himself and to society to accept some of the responsibility for his own rehabilitation. It would be ridiculous to take a boy of 16, in many cases fully capable of earning his own living, fully capable of fighting his way as a physical specimen through the world, and treat him as if he were a child just out of his mother's arms.

This bill should be divided into two parts so that we could get our thinking straight. One of those parts should be, if you like, a bill of rights for young people. We could put in it all the wishes, all the fine hopes for what we would do with young people. On the other hand, we should reform the criminal law in such a manner that a real effort would be made to set these young people on the road to recovery and to self-improvement. The only way of doing this is to completely forget any talk of punishment and revenue. The emphasis must be on providing an atmosphere which is closest to a happy home. An understanding of a child's needs should begin the day the authorities are aware that he has done something of which they disapprove. He must have competent help from social workers, psychologists, doctors and many people who do not fit into professional categories but who should be encouraged to give of their time and attention.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but it being ten o'clock a motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been moved and seconded.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

CITIZENSHIP—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CHARGES BY ALEX BANDY OF FALSEHOOD, DECEPTION AND INEFFICIENCY

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I asked the Minister without Portfolio in charge of citizenship if he would make a full report to the House in connection with charges of falsehood, deception and inefficiency levelled against the citizenship branch by a man in its employ, Alex Bandy of Vancouver.

The minister evaded a direct reply by indicating that the matter could be raised in the committee studying his estimates, and that as a member of this House I could discuss it there. I do not think this is good enough. The hiring and firing of Alex Bandy has raised a number of important questions involving government and public alike. Tonight I propose to ask some of these questions in the hope that this time the minister will realize the need for answers to be given in the House.

Why was Alex Bandy hired in the first place? As one of the leading figures at the poor people's conference from January 7-10, he was obviously acceptable to and trusted by low-income people on the west coast. Indeed, he had been the secretary of the Unemployed Citizens Welfare Improvement Council in Vancouver for some time. The citizenship branch hired him on January 15, five days after the conference ended. Why did they hire him? According to Marian Bruce, in the Vancouver Sun of March 15, he believed his job was to discuss with low-income groups the possibility of government funding for community service projects initiated by the organizations. But in February, he said, he was ordered to start gathering information about the groups, how strong each organization was and what each group's make-up was in terms of age, ethnic background and militancy.

Meanwhile, from the moment of his appointment on January 15 he was under fire, first from British Columbia rehabilitation minister Philip Gaglardi and other Social Crediters in the B.C. legislature. They were joined by Liberal MPs from British Columbia, one of whom declared that the appointment of "aggressive demonstrators" like Bandy was unacceptable to British Columbia's 15 Liberal MPs. Apparently there was little or no consideration given to the fact that he was accepted by British Columbia's low-income groups.

Up to this point Alex Bandy had refrained from public comment, partly, he said, because Ottawa ordered him to remain silent. But the avalanche of political criticism, plus what he regarded as the political investigation he was ordered to conduct into low-income groups, proved too much. He spoke out vigorously, attacking the project on which he was employed as a "pacification project" designed to pacify and control poor people's organizations. He said the $44,000 spent on the project was a waste of taxpayers' money; that it could have been spent much better in direct funding to citizen groups. From the point of view of helping poor people, this money had been wasted, and so he was fired by the citizenship branch. I suppose technically his contract ran out.

A story by John Clarke, of British Columbia, in the Globe and Mail of March 20 says that according to federal officials Alex Bandy's project was part of an over-all scheme by Ottawa to help poor people's groups to develop a stronger voice in influencing national policies. It was meant to give the poor as much chance as business, labour and other groups to influence government programs. If this is so, why did the government crack down on Alex Bandy when he started to criticize the direction the project was taking, which according to him was not the direction it was taking when he was first employed? The government certainly knew that Alex Bandy was an outspoken person. Was that why they hired him—so that he could articulate what the poor people were thinking? Or did they hire him with the idea that they could silence him when his opinion differed from that of the government? Is the government now going to give up trying to help poor people organize themselves? Or will it look for more "Uncle Toms" to be grateful to be taken on staff—grateful and silenced?

These are all questions that need answering. I believe the minister owes it to the taxpayers, and the low-income groups particularly, to give us a full account of the Alex Bandy affair.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the reply on behalf of the minister reads as follows. The federal government knew the risk it was running in appointing Alex Bandy to organize low-income groups outside the lower mainland. But to the federal government he had one thing going for him: he apparently could identify with the poor and the underprivileged. It obviously felt he could be a point of contact with the poor in its action, its research and stimulation of an employment project that was meant to help give them a voice in national policy development in the same way as business, labour and other groups. He has now thrown the job back in Ottawa's face with a confession that betrays the trust the government had placed in him and exposes a lack of understanding of the job. He says, "The idea of sending poor people out to research after poor people is giving some people a vested interest in poverty".

This is unworthy of a daring and imaginative proposal to get the picture of poverty from the inside, from those who suffer from it rather than from an army of social workers and statisticians. Surely, the government was saying, "We know about poverty from the outside; let's hear from the inside." To characterize it as a political subterfuge is misunderstanding the program's purpose and may deny the poor access to the one institution that can really help them, the government.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION—PROPOSED MINISTRIES OF STATE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, on March 17, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) dealt with the appointment of a science ministry. As recorded at page 4347 of Hansard, the right hon. gentleman stated:

> As soon as the House sees fit to pass the government reorganization bill we shall consider the appointment of a minister to deal with science matters.

I followed with a supplementary question in which I asked, in part, whether he would undertake to tell us, when the appropriate stage of the reorganization bill is reached in committee of the whole House, what other ministries of state, in addition to science, he proposes to set up in the near future. The Prime Minister replied:

> Indication has already been given that we would wish to have a minister of state designated for the purpose of looking at housing and urban affairs. That is one other area.

He then mentioned environment, but environment is specifically mentioned in the organization bill. Then later he said:

> —obviously I cannot foretell which areas might have to be covered by special ministers in the future. I have just mentioned two and it seems to me this clearly indicates the urgency attached to the passing of this bill by the House.

That is his argument. I thereupon looked back at the Throne Speech debate to see how the Throne Speech dealt with the ministries of state. I found these specific references:

> To foster co-ordination of the activities of all levels of government, and to contribute to sound urban growth and development, the government proposes the reorganization of its urban activities under the direction of a minister of state for urban affairs and housing.

In the next paragraph there is this reference:

> —the government will consider with care measures recommended by the Senate Committee on Science Policy and the Science Council of Canada.

Several paragraphs later we find this:

> There will be proposed the establishment of a department to be concerned with the environment and the husbanding of those renewable resources that are part of and dependent upon it, with a mandate for the protection of the biosphere.

There, Mr. Speaker, are the references to the guts of the matter of reorganization. Perhaps it should be noted that the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Andras), who speaks for the government on housing, mentioned in the special one-day debate on the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women that perhaps there would be a minister responsible for that as well. So we are probably being told by the government there will be a ministry of science, a ministry to deal with urban affairs and perhaps a ministry to deal with women. The Prime Minister suggests these can be established very quickly by the passage of his organization bill.

I am here tonight because I believe it must be made abundantly clear to the Prime Minister and his colleagues, if they do not know it now, that there are members on the opposition side and indeed on the government side who would like to make suggestions concerning what a minister of urban affairs should do; that there are members on all sides who would like to make known to the government what they believe any organization concerned with science matters should do; and that there are any number of members, if we are to have a minister responsible for the affairs and problems of the ladies of Canada, who I am sure would like to acquaint that person with their views concerning what his responsibilities should be and how they should be established.

So by laying out on Hansard the answer he did, the Prime Minister has in effect let a very large cat out of the bag. It is impossible now to take the organization bill and go through it quickly, because we know that when we come to the matter of the creation of these ministries of state we will have to put forward our views on urban affairs, on science policy and on the problems set out in the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. That will be our only opportunity to do so. If we do not speak on the organization bill we will suddenly find ourselves presented by the Prime Minister and the government with a fait accompli and the people will ask where we dunces were and why we had no suggestions or ideas to present to the government in setting up these ministries.

So if the government did not realize what problem existed before with regard to its organization bill, let me tell them that now they know and they had better get it divided first if they want some of the things like environment put into operation quickly, because I am afraid these other things will take a long, long time.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to answer my friend, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave). Perhaps his closing words are the best reason for passing this bill as rapidly as possible, because it presents the dilemma of trying to speed up the work of this House to try to obtain the apparatus of government which will allow us to deal with very important matters. Yet we see some very small issues on which the business of the House can be tied up for a great length of time.

The ministry for housing and urban affairs has been mentioned and it is quite clear to everyone that it is a priority for this government, as is the ministry of science. As was mentioned by the Minister without Portfolio responsible for housing (Mr. Andras), the establishment of a ministry concerned with the status of women is another possibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Danson: But the bill itself does give this flexibility to move. However, it raises the dilemma, which the hon. member mentioned, of how much debate we can stand and yet get along with the business of the House, with the things which we must do: what is the proper balance of debate that is essential to get the full expression of views from all sides of the House? It does give the government the flexibility to move without having to present a whole new reorganization bill each time it proves desirable for new ministries to be established. The concept of the ministries as policy-making groups, to avoid setting up a large bureaucracy and to have research and study in fields in which we are all concerned, is not in dispute. But it is impossible at this time to specify what additional ministries there might be if indeed they are ever filled.

The purpose is to give flexibility at that time. The three ministries which have been mentioned certainly have high priority for all of us in the House, particularly the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and others who are concerned about these three very vital matters to our country.

FINANCE—STUDENT LOANS—SUGGESTED CHANGE IN REPAYMENT REQUIRED

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, on March 8 I asked a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) regarding the repayment of student loans. My question was as follows:

In view of the present and expected high rate of student unemployment, will the minister consider making amendments to the student loan regulations so that students will not have to commence repayment of loans until six months after obtaining employment rather than six months after completion of studies, as is the case today?

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

In reply, the Minister of Finance said:

Mr. Speaker, this matter comes up for discussion each year between the provinces and ourselves. Of course, my hon. friend knows that where special circumstances exist the lending institutions can make provision whereby the repayment of a loan is deferred until the student is employed. Indeed, the repayment period can be extended up to ten years; the specified starting date can be varied by the lending institution.

Concern about this matter was first brought to my attention by one or two students who were concerned about finding employment upon graduation. As you know, today in Canada there are many students, not only those with B.A's but those who have Master's degrees and even Ph.D's who cannot find employment. Many of these students run up very large bills in student loans. This is also a concern of those who are not graduating from university, who for one reason or another have quit their studies. One of the reasons may have been lack of funds to finance their university education. In any case, Mr. Speaker, there is concern among many students about repayment of student loans.

Of course, all students want to repay these loans as soon as they can, but many of them cannot find jobs. If they cannot work out an arrangement with the bank or lending institution, they are in a real bind. The Minister of Finance said that special arrangements can be made with lending institutions. I would like to see provision for this written into the regulations, so that if a student cannot find a job he will not have to commence repayment of his loan.

Another matter which has been brought to my attention is that if a lending institution allows deferment of payment until the student has obtained employment, the student cannot obtain the same privilege that he had with regard to interest on the loan. If the government does consider amending the regulations, it should also take into consideration the matter of interest on student loans.

The reason this question comes to the fore today is that there is a great deal of unemployment in Canada. I do not want to get into a debate on that, except to say that possibly we have the highest unemployment rate in the industrial world. Some 8.1 per cent of our work force is unemployed. The government says this will be augmented by 1.8 million students, high school students, university students and post-graduate students this summer. When this happens, many students will have great difficulty finding employment. Even without taking students into account, the young people of Canada are bearing the brunt of the unemployment crisis because nearly half the unemployed are under the age of 25 years.

I would like the parliamentary secretary to give serious consideration tonight to this very small, piecemeal change or amendment to the student loans regulations, which would help students who will not be able to find jobs this summer and, more particularly, those who cannot find jobs upon completion of their university studies. I realize this would be only a very small step, but it would be better than nothing.

In the meantime, I hope the government will begin re-thinking its whole philosophy with respect to education, because I do not think the financial background of a student's parents or of a student himself should be the determining factor in deciding whether or not he can continue his studies at the post-secondary educational level. I ask the parliamentary secretary to use his influence with the minister to amend the regulations and not leave it up to the financial institutions. I would also like him to persuade the minister that interest rates be considered when talking about deferred payment of loans. This would be one small step that would help many students as they fight to obtain university or post-secondary education.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I should indicate that the government does not accept the forecast the hon. member has made regarding the consequences of students coming on the labour force, whether permanently or on a temporary basis, this year. There is certainly no admission or acknowledgement by the government that there are likely to be 1.8 million more unemployed people in Canada when the students come out of school this summer, as the hon. member would have us believe.

However, to deal specifically with the question he has asked, under the present legislation a student is not required to pay interest on a Canada student loan while he is a full-time student at an institution of learning that offers courses at the post-secondary level and which is so designated by the province concerned. For a further period of six months after he ceases to be a full-time student, he is not required to pay any interest nor is he obligated to make any payments on the principal of the loan.

The regulations under the Canada Student Loans Act contemplate circumstances when a borrower may encounter temporary difficulties which will result in undue hardship if he must repay his loan under the terms originally agreed with the bank. Accordingly, provision is made for the bank, in consultation with the borrower, to revise any or all terms of repayment. I should emphasize that any revision is a matter for decision by the banks, subject to the overriding requirement of the act that any loan must be repaid in full within a maximum period of ten years. Repayment terms may, with the approval of the Minister of Finance, be revised to include for a period of time the payment of interest only and, in exceptional circumstances, for no payment at all.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.23 p.m.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HOME OIL COMPANY—STATEMENT ON STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS BY GOVERNMENT TO ACQUIRE CONTROLLING INTEREST

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a statement concerning Home Oil Company Limited.

On the evening of Thursday, March 11, 1971, after the close of the stock markets, I advised the House that negotiations had begun that evening for the purpose of considering the possibility of acquiring from R. A. Brown, Jr., his controlling position in Cygnus Corporation Limited. I advised that I would give a further report in the event such negotiations reached a stage of firm understanding.

Negotiations have not reached such a stage, and we do not think it is either in Mr. Brown's interest or in the public interest for any statement to be made at this time regarding the details of these negotiations to date. The objective of the government throughout has been to retain Canadian majority ownership and full Canadian control of Home Oil. I believe this also was the clear consensus of this House as demonstrated by all parties in the debate of February 18 last.

The main effort of the government in past months has been to assist Mr. Brown to find a satisfactory transaction in the Canadian business sector. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on March 16, 1971, confirmed this position to the House. Mr. Brown has advised the government that he clearly understands the desire of the Canadian government. He has indicated to the government his intent to pursue the sale of his interest with interested Canadian private buyers who have now evinced an interest to purchase. This is in complete accord with the government's oft-stated objectives in the matter. The government will, to the end of these objectives, continue to keep the situation under surveillance.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that this statement has been made, if only to put an end to the cat and mouse game of late yesterday afternoon when it was stated that the minister would be making an announcement. I do not know if the purpose was just to titillate some people, but in any event we saw an unedifying tag game with the minister on this particular subject.

This statement is another clear indication of delay with respect to the government's oft-promised but as often delayed statement of its position with regard to foreign ownership. If we continue to get procrastination of the government with regard to this statement and continue to face ad hoc propositions it frankly creates an impossible situation for Canadian companies.

If the government is really interested in maintaining Canadian ownership of Home Oil, the best thing the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources can do is to get an undertaking from the Minister of Finance that the appropriate tax changes will be made which will put Canadian purchasers on an equal basis to that of American bidders. This is the biggest problem. It is no secret that there is a wide gap between the American and Canadian offers. This is mainly caused by the nonsensical position in which the changes in estate tax and in income tax, both personal and corporate, have placed Canadian industry and financiers in attempting to take over other Canadian industries.

We hope that present efforts will result in keeping Home Oil in Canada. On the other hand, there are some people who say that, because we have control of the marketing of oil and so on, the end of the world would not come if Home Oil did not remain in Canadian hands.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, we in this party are disappointed that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has not been able to work out a satisfactory deal with Mr. Brown, the president of Cygnus Corporation which in turn controls Home Oil. The minister said in his statement: "The objective of the government throughout has been to retain Canadian majority ownership and full Canadian control of Home Oil."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, we support the minister and the government in this objective. Our whole purpose in raising this matter from time to time is to ensure that Home Oil will remain under Canadian ownership and control. Contrary to the views of the previous speaker, I think it would be a tragedy if the ownership of Home Oil passed out of Canadian hands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: This is one of the few oil companies in Canada which is capable of becoming a major company. In my opinion, it is a tragedy for any country to have all of its oil production and processing in the hands of foreign corporations. It is a very poor indication of a country's national pride and sense of national identity.

The minister has not made it clear whether the federal government's offer has been withdrawn. He indicates that Mr. Brown has conveyed to the government the fact that he intends to pursue the sale of his interest in Home Oil with interested Canadian private buyers. If those negotiations are successful and the company is kept in Canadian hands we will be satisfied. If these negotiations do not result in a Canadian consortium acquiring ownership and control of Home Oil, I hope the minister can assure us that he will still endeavour to see that control of the company remains in Canada.

The minister may say, as he has on previous occasions, that he does not have the necessary power to ensure that ownership of this company does not pass out of Canadian hands. I say, Mr. Speaker, that the lack is not a lack of power; it is the lack of a government policy on foreign ownership.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: It is over three years since a royal commission reported on this matter. All this time we have been waiting for the government to produce a policy on foreign ownership. The Minister of National Revenue, who is charged with this responsibility, has not yet produced a white paper and the government has not yet produced a policy. We shall continue to face problems like the problem of Home Oil Company until the government gets busy and produces a policy on foreign ownership in this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased by the government's cautious approach to the settlement of the Home Oil problem, even though negotiations may not be as satisfactory as the minister might have wished.

We also feel, as we have already mentioned here, that ownership of the oil industry in Canada should remain entirely in Canadian hands, while suggesting that, as other members have pointed out, there is some contradiction in the fact that, where American investments in Canada are concerned, it is unfortunately more profitable to be American than Canadian. That seems illogical to us and we trust that before long the government will be able to review its fiscal and customs policies concerning American investments in Canada, in order to allow Canadians who would like to negotiate in such circumstances to have at least the same opportunities. We are not asking more than that, in spite of the fact that we should have more than that.

I know the minister seems to want to make some efforts with a view to keeping the oil industry wholly Canadian, but I am not yet convinced that the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray), is very helpful in that regard.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—FURTHER MEASURES TO STIMULATE ECONOMY

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. As the 97,000 people who are taking job training at present because they cannot find jobs, when added to the 675,000 who are listed as unemployed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, bring the total of unemployed to 772,000 for the month of February, or 7.1 per cent of the work force seasonally adjusted, the highest seasonally adjusted figure since the 1930's, would the Prime Minister advise the House if the government will not now reconsider its decision not to stimulate the economy and, by stimulating the economy, counteract this very serious trend which is causing great hardship and suffering throughout the country?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member might know that we are in fact, stimulating the economy, that we began a series of stimulations last March and that they have been added to successively over the following months. The hon. member knows that these measures come into effect with a certain lead time, and the effect is being felt now. If he will look at the economic indicators he will see that actually the economy is being stimulated to a substantial degree.

Mr. Hees: Does the Prime Minister not realize, having examined those figures, that those things which were supposed to be stimulated by the measures that the Prime Minister has referred to have not moved forward during the past 12 months at any greater pace than they moved in the preceding 12 months, and does he not therefore realize that the moves that the government claims to have made have been completely useless?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is not in accordance with the facts and therefore I do not "realize" this, as the hon. member says.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, it is in accordance with the facts, and if the Prime Minister would take the trouble to study them he will find that this is so.

OIL

PIPELINES—AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD ACT TO PROVIDE FOR CONSIDERATION OF ECOLOGICAL STUDIES IN PROCESSING APPLICATIONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources arising out of the statement of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry to the effect that the National Energy Board Act should be amended to provide that pipeline companies must present not only engineering and economic data but ecological data as well. Since this is in line with a statement the minister made in answer to a question of mine a couple of weeks ago, can he assure the House that some amendment to the National Energy Board Act will be brought in at this session to provide that ecological studies will be part of the process when the National Energy Board is discussing applications for the construction of pipelines?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): In my understanding, Mr. Speaker, the National Energy Board has construed the Act as meaning that they do this at the present time. But as the hon. member properly pointed out in the House, it merely refers to public interest or public good and does not specify ecological research as such. The suggestion made in the House by the hon. member is under active consideration. I hope to have some report to make in that regard in the very near future.

PIPELINES—PROVISION OF VETO POWER OR DELAYING CAPABILITY TO PROPOSED DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of his statement during the same interview to the effect that the new department of the environment ought to have either veto power or delaying capability with respect to the construction of pipelines, does the minister intend to introduce an amendment to the government organization bill, which is now before the House, to give to the new department this veto power or delaying capability?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): No, Mr. Speaker. There is no intention of amending the legislation. I think it is appropriate as it stands.

Mr. Douglas: If the minister does not intend to introduce an amendment, where will this new department get the power which the minister has said is most essential?

INDICATIONS THAT TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE WILL NOT BE PROCEEDED WITH

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Has the minister or any member of the government received any communication from the United States government, the government of the state of Alaska or any other source that the proposed TAPS pipeline will not be proceeded with?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any communication that it will not be proceeded with. However, I have noted the reports of the various environmental committees. I have noted the report of the United States Department of Defence and, within the last day or two, the report of the United States Department of Agriculture, all of which are critical of the construction of such a pipeline. Certainly this lends moment to the question of an alternative route, and it is extremely important that we in Canada consider the potential of the alternative route in light of these opposing factions to the TAPS line.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—MEETING WITH COMPANY PRESIDENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I have a supplementary question. I understand that the minister was supposed to meet with the oil interests yesterday, and I have not seen anything to the contrary. Is it tomorrow? If the minister or officials of his department have met with these people, what position did the government take? If they have not yet met, what position will they take?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and myself, the ministers who, by the guidelines, are to be contacted in the event of a possible application, are meeting tomorrow with the oil company presidents. These are exploratory discussions to ascertain the position of the companies vis-à-vis the potential alternative route and to determine what research has been done by them. They are strictly in the nature of exploratory discussions. No firm position will be taken at these meetings.

PIPELINES—EXPERIMENT AT INUVIK—TYPE OF STUDY—REPORT ON FINDINGS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabaska): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It is with reference to the experimental pipeline at Inuvik where a private group of the oil industry is studying the effects of a hot pipeline on permafrost. Can the minister indicate what kind of a study this is? Is it an engineering study, is an ecologist attached to the study group, and has the government received any report on the findings of this group so far?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): This is a test pipeline. There are two pipelines there, one suspended above ground and the other on a gravel berm. These are in the second winter of testing the flow of hot oil through the pipeline. Our officials, as well as those of various government departments, have had full access to all information and have been permitted to attend on site whenever they wish to take part in the experiments themselves. I do not believe there has been a report as such to date, but access to all technical and scientific information has been available to all departments of government.

Mr. Yewchuk: The minister did not say whether there was an ecologist attached to this study.

PROPOSED TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—REPORTED POTENTIAL LOSS TO BRITISH COLUMBIA FISHING INDUSTRY

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. It relates to a question I put to his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, last week. Can the minister tell us whether he or his department have under assessment and review a report from a source within the Department of Commerce of the United States that the construction of a pipeline and the operation of an oil tanker route down the Pacific coast could mean the loss of $100 million a year to the west coast fisheries?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Yes, it is under review from an environmental point of view.

MANPOWER

USE OF UNEMPLOYED AND STUDENTS INSTEAD OF WEST INDIANS TO PICK FRUIT

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

A few days ago, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration announced that seasonal workers from the West Indies would be hired this summer to help in picking and canning fruits and vegetables in Ontario. Could the Prime Minister then consider the possibility of assigning this work to our unemployed or to our students who for the most part will not find jobs this summer?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is a perennial problem and it must be recognized that this is a type of work that very often students or unemployed will not do. This is why the Department of Manpower and Immigration is admitting foreign workers on our labour market. Should students be willing to undertake this work, they would certainly have the preference.

I am not cognizant with the specific case the hon. member is referring to, but I know that this is a problem which comes up year after year with respect to certain types of work.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Would the Prime Minister consider inviting the young people to do that work during the holidays, not only in Ontario where fruit and vegetables are grown, but in every province? This would be much more efficient than having them travel.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member on that score. The purpose of the Manpower Centres is to send the unemployed or the students to take part in this work. But, once again, facts reveal that there are in Canada some types of work which the unemployed and the students refuse to do; this proves, by the way, that the rate of unemployment is at times somewhat artificial.

PROVISION OF WORK FOR CANADIANS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

May I ask the right hon. Prime Minister, in view of these opportunities to receive unemployed people from abroad, whether the Canadian government has any agreements to enable Canadians to work in foreign countries?

[Mr. Barnett.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is another series of programs concerning international exchanges. We send a number of students to work abroad, and in return foreign students come to work in Canada.

But this is a different matter from that raised by the member of the Ralliement Créditiste, and where indeed there has been no exchange, where there is work which could not be done if workers from the Caribbean countries were not admitted to Canada.

Mr. La Salle: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the statement by the Prime Minister to the effect that some unemployed people would refuse to perform such work, would the Prime Minister consider compelling Canadians to work if they receive any social benefits?

Would the government favour legislation requiring any government pension recipient to work?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, the government will not commandeer the work force. The whole political philosophy of the government is based on freedom of choice for citizens to work where they want.

USE OF UNEMPLOYED AND STUDENTS INSTEAD OF WEST INDIANS TO PICK FRUIT

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister has agreed that he would prefer to see young Canadians working in the fruit picking industry rather than wasting money on travel, would he consider subsidizing the wages of fruit pickers beyond the level the fruit industry is prepared to pay?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this is a very constructive solution. It is a type of work with which students and some unemployed persons do not want to occupy themselves.

Mr. MacInnis: A supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has a supplementary and I will recognize him, also the hon. member for Broadview; if he will kindly resume his seat I will recognize him. I bring to the attention of hon. members that we are not moving very quickly. We have spent quite a bit of time on two questions and I would urge hon. members to allow the Chair to pass on to the next question. For the moment the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond.

Mr. MacInnis: A further supplementary question for the Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker. Since the Prime Minister has agreed with the idea of young Canadians working in this industry but says it is not too attractive, does he not think that the money to be spent on travel should be used to subsidize the wages paid in order to make the work attractive enough for all young Canadians?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's supplementary is submitted in the form of an argument in support of his point of view. The hon. member for Broadview.

UNEMPLOYMENT—REPLY TO TORONTO PROPOSALS TO ALLEVIATE PROBLEM

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Has the Prime Minister given a formal reply to the mayor of the city of Toronto and Metro officials in regard to their reasonable plans for coping with unemployment, namely, by direct or shared-cost grants and also by extending the date for the expiry of seasonal unemployment insurance benefits?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have sent no letter to the mayor of Toronto since my meeting with him some days ago, but I cannot say whether other ministers have corresponded with him.

Mr. Gilbert: Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to give a formal reply to the mayor of the city of Toronto and Metro officials concerning their request?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker, unless that formal reply has already been given by some other minister, which I do not know.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HOME OIL COMPANY—POSITION OF MR. BROWN ON GOVERNMENT OFFER TO PURCHASE CONTROL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the statement that he read today concerning Home Oil, did the minister intend to advise the House in the labyrinth of words in which it was embalmed, that Mr. Brown was not going ahead with any transaction and had refused to accept the offers, or suggestions of offers and negotiations, made by the government of Canada respecting the sale of the shares in question?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I stated in one paragraph, and advisedly so, that I did not think it would be either in the public interest or in fairness to Mr. Brown, who is negotiating with Canadian companies, to disclose the tenor of any negotiations between the government and himself, and I do not propose to do so at the present time. I can only reiterate the statement that it is the purpose and desire of the government that this company remain, both in majority ownership and control, a Canadian company.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the minister will make no revelation in regard to the negotiations by answering the simple question: Has Brown told the Canadian government to take a jump in the lake in so far as its offers are concerned? Is Mr. Brown now enabled, if he so chooses, to sell and dispose of the shares as he deems fit to American interests, and what control has the government of Canada over any prospective sale that he may determine?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, in so far as jumping in the lake is concerned, I can assure the right hon. gentleman that if the government were to jump in the lake it would certainly jump into Diefenbaker Lake.

Mr. Horner: Then that would pollute it.

Mr. Greene: As I have indicated, Mr. Brown has clearly understood the government's desire, and he has conveyed to us the information that he is accordingly negotiating with Canadian companies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, since the minister has referred to Diefenbaker Lake I would point out that it is up to the Gardiner Dam and is unpolluted. May I ask the minister this simple question: Has Mr. Brown refused the offers of the Canadian government? Surely there is no difficulty about answering that. Second, may he now, if he so wishes, sell his interests to Americans?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, that is a hypothetical question and asks for a conclusion of law which my right hon. friend, as a learned parliamentarian and lawyer, I know would not wish me to state here. I did say, however, that Mr. Brown clearly understands the desires of the government and has conveyed to the government his intention to negotiate with Canadian companies, which I think would certainly be in keeping with the intent of the government and I think the intent of the House as displayed in the debate on this subject.

HOME OIL COMPANY—POSITION OF ASHLAND OIL COMPANY RESPECTING ACQUISITION

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I should like to direct to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Since the minister will not discuss the negotiations with Mr. Brown, can he say whether he has received any communication or has any understanding that the Ashland Oil Company has indicated to the government that it would no longer be interested in a deal in face of government opposition, and therefore Mr. Brown does not have any choice but to sell either to a private Canadian company or to the Canadian government?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as far as the communications between the Ashland company and myself are concerned, I should like to treat them as confidential for the time being at least. If the intervention of the government, with its financial resources, in this matter as a negotiating party has resulted either in American companies realizing the intention of the government to maintain this company as a Canadian company or has brought forth other Canadian companies that are interested, then I think the government has very properly used its responsibility and its powers in this regard.

TRANSPORT

BORDEN-CAPE TORMENTINE—RETENTION OF "JOHN HAMILTON GRAY" IN FERRY SERVICE BETWEEN OCTOBER AND MAY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the honourable and learned Minister of Transport on a matter causing great disquiet at this time to the people of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, namely, the proposed transfer of the John Hamilton Gray to parts beyond P.E.I. and New Brunswick. Is the minister now in a position to assure the House and the government of Prince Edward Island that the John Hamilton Gray will be on the Cape Tormentine-Borden run between October and May annually?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not altogether certain of the dates but I would like to make this suggestion. I had a very lengthy conversation with the premier of Prince Edward Island yesterday and I have undertaken to and have prepared a complete time schedule, in a sense, in regard to the utilization of the vessels. I have also indicated my answers to various questions that have been raised by my hon. friend and others. This information will be sent to the premier tomorrow morning, I believe, and I am sure he will have no objection to my making it available to all interested members. I think it covers all of the questions asked.

AIR TRANSPORT

USE OF AIR SPACE AND AIRPORTS BY SUPERSONIC PLANES—AWARENESS OF OTHER COUNTRIES OF CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. In view of concern being expressed throughout the world about the results caused by supersonic planes flying over and landing in countries, will the minister say whether Canada has made clear to all other countries its position on the use of our air space and landing at Canadian airports?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think it is generally known—certainly I have repeated it often enough—that at the moment there is a prohibition against the flight of any aircraft at supersonic speed over Canadian territory. I have certainly made that known, for example, to the United States. As to whether this information has been formally conveyed to other countries I am not sure; I have not done so personally.

Mr. Skoberg: Would the minister say whether he would formally convey that expression of opinion, which I heartily support, to the other countries of the world now engaged in supersonic aircraft programs?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's supplementary is in the form of a suggestion or representation.

[Mr. Greene.]

BANKRUPTCY

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO ACT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On December 18 the minister tabled the report of the committee on bankruptcy. On January 19 he told me that he hoped to introduce legislation after hearing representations from the public soon after the end of January. Can he now tell us when he proposes to introduce the legislation to amend the Bankruptcy Act?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are working on the report I tabled in December. I am still receiving representations from people who wish to comment on the report, so it is a little difficult for me to say, but I am hopeful of introducing a bill some time during the course of this session. That, however, depends on the nature of the representations made and their extent.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that if the minister would read his answer of January 19 he would see it was a little different. However, in anticipation of the legislation and in an effort to have widespread publicity and examination, since the minister would not send the report to the appropriate house committee, could he hurry up the legislation so that we might have a good long look at it before we have to deal with it?

Mr. Speaker: Again the hon. member has a supplementary in the form of a submission. He will have to assume it will be taken into account.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CENSORSHIP EXERCISED BY COLES BOOK STORES IN REMOVING BOOK, "THE UNHOLY LAND", FROM SHELVES

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice but as he is not here I shall direct it to the Solicitor General. Did the minister approve of the censorship exercised by the 30 Coles book stores in Canada in removing the publication, "The Unholy Land", written by Reverend A. C. Forrest, editor of the United Church Observer, from their book shelves, and has the minister in any way restricted this publication being published by McClelland and Stewart Limited?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I believe that comments on the matter are up to the Attorney General of the province involved.

POLLUTION

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—CONTAMINATION OF BEACHES BY OIL FROM SUNKEN "IRVING WHALE"

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Perhaps the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry might like to take note of it or even participate in the answer. It relates to a question asked a week ago by my colleague the minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —the member for Hillsborough. Just a future slip, Mr. Speaker. It concerns the sudden appearance along the northern shore of Prince Edward Island of oil globules that it is feared may be from the Irving Whale which sunk off the coast of Prince Edward Island last September. In view of the continuing concern and fear of possible pollution by the Irving Whale of Prince Edward Island beaches, can the minister advise whether his department has looked into this immediate problem and can he indicate what steps will be taken to remove the essential danger of the Irving Whale?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have conducted investigations to the extent it is possible while ice and snow remain on the beaches. In the first instance I think I can say without any qualification that the quantities involved in terms of what has come ashore are relatively small. A contingency plan is in hand to clean up any that may be present after the ice and snow leave the beaches.

On the matter of the ultimate disposition of the Irving Whale, this becomes a question of what is the most appropriate time to do it. We will certainly not do it unless there is complete agreement with the ideas of the government and the people of Prince Edward Island. I can also say in reassurance that investigations conducted recently indicate there is no oil at this time coming out of the hulk and that what has come ashore apparently has been the residue of what was actually spilled last autumn.

FINANCE

ABOLITION OF SALES TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Is the government considering rescinding the federal tax of 11 per cent on building materials, as requested by the Canadian Builders Association?

Mr. Speaker: I believe that this question was asked a few days ago. If the Prime Minister wants to answer it, I have no objection, but I suggest to the hon. member that this question, having been put several times in the last few days, should not be asked again today.

GOVERNMENT ADMINISTRATION

PROGRAM FOR HIRING FRANCOPHONE UNIVERSITY GRADUATES—DISCUSSIONS WITH SCIENCE COUNCIL OF PROPOSED URANIUM ENRICHMENT PLANT

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to ask the President of the Treasury Board. It is in two parts and concerns statements on motion, one he made yesterday and one I hope he will make. So far as the one made yesterday is concerned, will he assure the House that, notwithstanding the use of funds from the contingency vote, the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act will apply and, specifically, that the merit system will apply in respect of both employment and promotion? So far as the statement I hope he will make is concerned, can he say, as the minister responsible for the Science Council, whether there has been any discussion with the Science Council in respect of reporting to the House on the implications and ramifications of the Brinco announcement related to an enriched uranium process and how this might affect the federal governments' commitment in respect of the heavy water process?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, in reference to the first question I can reassure the hon. gentleman that the merit principle will apply in its totality in relation to the announcement I made yesterday concerning the hiring of some 276 Francophones.

In respect of the second question I do not know that the Science Council is going to undertake the kind of rather extensive study suggested by the hon. member, but I shall make inquiries.

Mr. Nowlan: A supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will appreciate that his question was asked in a rather unusual way. If hon. members are allowed to ask two questions at the same time dealing with entirely different matters, this may expand quickly to three or four questions asked by an hon. member on three or four different subjects. We are in a position now where the hon. member's supplementary may refer to either the first question or the second question raised by the hon. member. This is highly irregular. I do not think such a practice should be allowed. The hon. member, however, could ask one supplementary about one of the two questions he has asked.

Mr. Nowlan: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your indulgence. I was just trying to expand the subject matter of questions. This question is to the Prime Minister. As a matter of government policy, is there or will there be a review, in conjunction with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, of the implications or ramifications of the Brinco announcement in respect of an enriched uranium process and how this may affect the federal commitment to the heavy water process?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if it is proper to call it a review but there has been some correspondence with me on this subject and I have referred the matter to the appropriate minister. Of course he is studying the implications of the proposed project in respect of other governmental programs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CONTINUATION OF SPEAKER IN POSITION FOLLOWING NEXT ELECTION—SUGGESTED DISCUSSION BY PARTY OR HOUSE LEADERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Will the right hon. gentleman consider holding discussions with the leaders of the other parties in the House, or ask the House Leaders to hold such discussions, concerning the possibility of our taking appropriate steps so that after the next election we will still have as Speaker of this House, on a continuing basis, the distinguished gentleman who now occupies the Chair?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

INDUSTRY

CATALINA EXPLORATION COMPANY—ASSISTANCE TO AVOID TAKEOVER BY UNITED STATES INTERESTS AND LOSS OF JOBS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, so that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce will not feel neglected today, may I ask him if he is in a position to say what assistance the government intends to offer Catalina Explorations of Calgary and Halifax to avoid a likely takeover by American interests and the loss of some 300 jobs a little later this week?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my department has no program that could be used in this instance. A number of ministers have consulted on this question quite extensively in recent days. I am sorry to say there appears to be nothing in our program at the moment which would provide the rather large sum of money this company would need at this time to remain operative.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister or some other member of the government could indicate whether or not they are aware of the representations which were made over the weekend? Are any steps being taken to correct the situation that has led to the difficulties in which the company finds itself, particularly the specific difficulty caused by United States vessels coming within our three-mile limit to do seismic work when there are Canadian companies with ships adequate for this task? If they are aware of these reports, have investigations been initiated?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Perhaps I might attempt to answer the question. The issue of whether or not foreign-owned vessels may participate in this kind of activity was one of the subjects considered by the special commission on coastal shipping. Within recent days I have had that report examined and have extrapolated from it the references to the whole issue that we are now discussing. I am examining these to see if they would be of any benefit in these circumstances.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I bring to the attention of the hon. member that there are only six minutes left before the end of the question period. I ask for the co-operation of hon. members in asking short questions and of ministers in giving brief answers. I also ask that as few supplementary questions as possible be put.

Mr. Forrestall: Could the minister indicate whether or not Canadian companies involved in seismic operations off our coast will continue to have the protection that now exists in the statute of being assured that work as opposed to it being given to United States ships or ships of other countries or of other registry?

Mr. Jamieson: In view of your admonition, Mr. Speaker, I can simply say that certainly protection will not be any less. What we are seeking to do is to see whether we can expand the level of protection.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants in a moment but first I will recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

AGRICULTURE

ONTARIO HOG MARKETING BOARD RESOLUTIONS RESPECTING DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS AND AVERAGE WEIGHTED PRICE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether, in view of the resolutions passed at the Ontario Hog Marketing Board meeting on March 17 and 18, the minister is giving consideration to their suggestion that the deficiency payment program under the Agricultural Stabilization Act be amended to determine deficiency payments on a quarterly basis, and that the terminal market average weighted price be 100 per cent of the previous five-year average instead of 80 per cent as at present?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we always take very seriously the resolutions that are passed at meetings such as this one, but I do not believe that we are at present taking action to revise the Agricultural Stabilization Act in the very near future.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, on reflection I think the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East covered the subject I was interested in.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Further to what the Minister of Agriculture said, in view of the fact that the agricultural price support program is giving no support or no relief to hog producers under the present very serious circumstances, is the minister prepared to consider some course of action which would make the support price relevant to the present circumstances?

Mr. Olson: Of course we are considering that and we are very keenly aware of the seriousness of the situation. But the reason that the Agricultural Stabilization Act has not been invoked in this situation is that for a time up to less than a year ago when the hog producers were enjoying the highest prices—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Did the Prime Minister receive a telegram from the MLA for Grey-Bruce informing him that he had a sure-fire plan by way of a crash program to solve unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that this kind of question is hardly in order.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

REQUEST THAT CABINET NOT EXERCISE CLEMENCY IN CASES OF MURDER OF POLICEMEN

Mr. A. D. Alkenbrack (Frontenac-Lennox and Addington): My question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of Justice. In view of the recently expressed frustration of our police forces because of the cabinet's lack of compliance in support of the law courts in implementing the death penalty for apprehended capital murderers and in view of the rise in the incidence of capital crime.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask a direction in those terms. I suggest that he ask the question directly.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Will the minister henceforth admonish the cabinet, when considering their prerogatives, to support the full penalty of the law for first degree capital murder when dealing with the all too frequent instances of this kind?

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

MID-CANADA PROGRAM ON "WEEKEND"—ACTION TO RECTIFY ALLEGED DISHONEST PRESENTATION

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): My question is for the Secretary of State or, in his absence, the minister responsible. Following the absurdly distorted and derogatory mid-Canada program on CBC Weekend of March 14 and the subsequent numerous bitter representations to the CBC and CRTC, would the minister or his parliamentary secretary make inquiries and report as to what action both bodies intend to take in order to rectify this completely dishonest representation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take notice of the question on behalf of the minister who unfortunately is away.

VANCOUVER TRAINMEN'S WORK SLOWDOWN—ACTION TO ASSURE MAXIMUM MOVEMENT OF GRAIN

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for my friend, the Minister of Transport. In light of reports over the weekend from the port of Vancouver that because of the trainmen's work slowdown grain elevators are only working at greatly reduced capacity and when ships arrive the grain they are to load is not available, will the minister, in co-operation with his colleagues, the Minister of Labour and the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, move to rectify this problem with a view to increasing our grain movements to full volume?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Yes, not only in co-operation with the parties concerned but also in co-operation with the leadership of the unions who, I understand, is very much opposed to the actions which have been taken by some of the workers in this case.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

INTEREST ON DEBT

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Since the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority paid only $12 million in interest on the $18 million due in 1970, can the minister indicate whether he intends to recommend to the Canadian government to do what the American government has done and stop collecting interest on the debt of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority?

[English]

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): I can only answer that in the manner that I have on previous occasions. The report of Carr and Associates with regard to the future of the seaway has been published with a view to getting the widest possible cross-section of representations. When these have been received I will consider them and at that time decide what kind of recommendations to make.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

HAY RIVER—HOLDING OF COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS VEHICLE—INVESTIGATION OF BOMBING OF BUILDING

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I wish to answer the question which the hon. member for Athabasca asked me last week.

Following an investigation conducted by the members of the Hay River detachment of the R.C.M.P. after a bomb had exploded in the U.S. Traffic Co-ordinating Office building on February 13, 1971, a vehicle and all its contents belonging to the Yellowknife branch of the Company of Young Canadians were seized by the R.C.M.P. in Yellowknife on February 17, 1971, under a search warrant.

The vehicle and contents are being held following an order to hold seized objects issued at Yellowknife on February 18, 1971, pursuant to section 432 of the Criminal Code. The matter is being investigated.

TORONTO—REPORT ON MEETING WITH ONTARIO PREMIER CONCERNING SITE FOR NEW FACILITY

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport. Is the proposed meeting between he and the premier of Ontario scheduled for Thursday concerning the proposed new site for the airport outside of Toronto, and if this meeting is held Thursday will he report to the House on the following day, Friday?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Transport): Without being in the least facetious may I say that the meeting was held last Thursday. The outcome of the meeting was that I delivered to Prime Minister Davis a set of proposals, some ideas I had as to how we might proceed and move ahead with this project. The Prime Minister asked for a period of two to three weeks during which he and his new cabinet colleagues, or his colleagues in their new positions, could have a chance to examine them. I indicated that I would be available as soon as they contacted me for a supplementary meeting.

Mr. Danson: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister could ask his supplementary question tomorrow, although with the consent of the House the parliamentary secretary might be allowed to ask his question now provided we also agree that the hon. member for Churchill, whom I was going to recognize, be allowed to ask his question. The Parliamentary Secretary to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Mr. Barnett J. Danson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should be rising on a point of order, but I do want to ask the Minister of Transport if he was referring to the Prime Minister or the Premier of Ontario?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

HOME OIL COMPANY—REASON FOR REFUSAL OF GOVERNMENT OFFER TO BUY CONTROLLING INTEREST

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. With reference to the government's negotiations to purchase Home Oil shares, is the minister in a position to say whether one of the reasons Mr. Brown turned down the government's offer was the minister's insistence on naming a specific person to the board of directors, as reported on television news this morning?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I really cannot be responsible for what goes on on television in this country, and I think if I disclosed any portion of the negotiations my contention that they should be confidential would hardly remain valid.

Mr. Simpson: A supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the hon. member might ask his supplementary tomorrow. I tender apologies to the hon. member for Joliette, the hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley and the hon. member for Charlevoix, who have been rising with diligence throughout the question period. When reading Hansard I shall try to remember that they should be given some precedence tomorrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to suggest to the President of the Privy Council that if he were prepared to call second reading of three veterans bills which were introduced yesterday, we in the Official Opposition would be prepared to give them second reading without debate. The government might see fit to call them after the votes which are scheduled to take place have been concluded.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is our view as well. These bills having been placed before us in the proper way, we are prepared to give them second reading without debate so that they can be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, and if that is the general view of the House why not do it now?

Mr. MacEachen: Let us do it now, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

The House will now proceed to the deferred division on Motion No. 7, the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin).

Mr. MacLean: I rise on a point of order. Since the previous motion was defeated, I suggest that we consider this motion defeated on division.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There does not appear to be unanimity with regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member. In consequence thereof, we will have to proceed with calling the division.

The House divided on Motion No. 7 (Mr. Baldwin) which was negatived on the following division:

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

PROVISIONS REGARDING CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS

The House resumed, from Monday, March 22, consideration of the motion of Mr. Goyer that Bill C-192, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Woolliams (page 2381).

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, last evening I was not able to conclude my speech because we reached the adjournment hour. I do not hesitate to continue today because this young offenders bill has been considered by many responsible groups across Canada and, although they welcome certain features in it, most groups believe it to be a hasty measure. It is believed that many, if not all, clauses should be redrafted by a committee before we consider putting the bill into statute form. Many groups have expressed a desire to appear to state their views. Since these groups represent experts in certain fields, I believe they certainly should be asked to appear before we amateurs give final approval to this legislation.

One group to which I refer is the Canadian Bar Association. The Canadian Bar Association has attacked the bill from a legal point of view, citing the difficulties experienced by members of the bench, members of the bar and jurists all across the country. This association has presented a very short brief. On page two, the association asks to be allowed to appear in order to give us the benefit of the years of experience of its members both on the bench and at the bar. The Canadian Bar Association points out the difficulty under our constitution of bringing in an omnibus bill which would solve most of our problems. As I pointed out last evening, it would be very difficult to accomplish many of the things proposed in this bill unless we have the necessary plant. We need more proficient magistrates and policemen, and we need the physical plant. Anyone who has visited the jails, the penitentiaries, the industrial schools or the shelters which I believe they are called, for young females, knows these institutions leave much to be desired, not only in respect of the physical plant but also in respect of the personnel.

Members of this House would be shocked if they were aware of some of the corrective methods employed in these institutions. I wonder how many members know that in the industrial schools it is not uncommon for corporal punishment to be inflicted upon children ranging in age from eight years to 16 years. Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to imagine anything worse than a so-called official spanking being administered to a boy eight years of age who has no home, no friends and so far as he can see no future. It is bad enough for a boy to be locked up and deprived of his liberty, but it is even worse when someone who cares little for him, or if he does care does not understand him, inflicts corporal punishment upon him. Surely, it is not necessary for me to labour this point. When we add the suggestions contained in this bill in respect of indeterminate sentences and no final disposal of a case until the person reaches age 21 or perhaps age 18, as I hope will be the case, it is obvious that the accused person will suffer the worst kind of agony, mental agony.

Again I make the appeal that large sums be set aside for proper research in respect of all these matters. I know this bill is not yet law and, therefore, I appeal to the House and the minister to see that it is not rushed through. Although some of the provisions in this bill are needed very badly, the bill should be given full scrutiny. We should hear from such experts as there are in these fields. The John Howard Society, which has proven itself to be a friend of those on the wrong side of the law, with whom it comes in contact, wishes to appear. That society has many progressive ideas but it is pitifully short of funds to do the research work and provide the necessary personnel even for the jobs it is undertaking. At the present time, the John Howard Society is endeavouring to keep in contact not only with the young people but also the older citizens who are incarcerated in our institutions.

I do not think I am soft when I suggest that everyone connected with these unfortunate people should avoid using harsh treatment as much as possible. It is bad enough to be on the wrong track without also being called a criminal. I suggest that the preamble to the bill is very progressive, and I go along with it 100 per cent. I even go further. I say we must generate not only in our institutions but also in the minds of all Canadians the humanitarian approach, the progressive approach and the civilized approach. This will require a good deal of co-operation with our provincial authorities. Here, I might mention Alberta. An experiment is being carried on in Alberta at the present time. That province is experimenting with minimal security institutions. Rather than concentrating on any form of punishment for its own sake, or for the sake of revenge on the part of society, from the moment a young person or older person becomes involved with the law the accent is now placed on rehabilitation.

Under this Alberta program, as soon as possible the young person is put in healthy surroundings, working out in the fresh air with progressive minded people where the emphasis is on teaching him the joy of labour, which is surely an entirely new approach. Instead of sentencing a man to hard labour, he is given an opportunity to work, to learn something, to become progressive and to go out into the society of other young men. Instead of using work as a punishment, it is used as a road back.

I recommend to the committee that they invite some members of the corrective institutions in Alberta to come and tell us of the success they are having with these young people. The percentage of repeaters is dropping very remarkably and rapidly under this sort of treatment, which proves that the humane attitude is the only one which society can afford to take.

This is the only sensible approach, because anything short of this positive attitude is a waste of human beings. I agree with one of the previous speakers who said that he had never known anybody who came out of jail the better for having been in jail. In other words, the punishment of being locked up never did anybody any good at all. It may be that you have given the young offender time to think things over and hopefully steered him in the right direction, that you have put him into contact with people even in jail who really had his best interests at heart, which puts him on the right track. It is this contact with someone who cares that turns him back toward being a useful member of society. It is only the positive approach that does him any good. It is not the jail but it is the hand of friendship put out to him, perhaps by some member of the John Howard Society or by the magistrate who sentenced him to the loss of his freedom in the first place, that rehabilitates him. I am convinced, having had some experience in the enforcement of law, that in so far as the policeman who arrests him and the magistrate who sentences him are concerned, if they can convince him that they have faith in him he will start back on the road back to a normal life.

In many cases a person who has broken the law has not done anything worse than many of us who have never come to court. As soon as we can convince him that we are charitable and that we recognize he is not that much different from the rest of us, as soon as we show that we have faith in him and that people do change, that people can live down the mistakes of the past, he will start back on the road to a normal life almost before sentence is passed upon him.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. The hon. member can continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bigg: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall be brief. I cannot hope to cover all the points which I know will be discussed in committee. Before I resume my seat, however, I should like to appeal to the House to send this bill to committee so that each and every organization in Canada which has particular knowledge of these matters, such as the psychologists, the medical doctors, the John Howard Society and the Elizabeth Fry Society, the attorney generals' departments of the provinces, can be asked to present briefs. A measure to deal with young offenders has to be a joint effort because it is something which is more important than the constitution itself. I think the provinces might well bend to federal plans for such legislation. We are trying to have uniformity and we are trying to teach our young people that we are treating them all alike. This means we are approaching the whole problem with justice tempered with mercy.

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia-Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I was extremely pleased when the Throne Speech indicated that the government intended to bring in legislation to replace the Juvenile Delinquents Act. This decision followed many years of fact finding, study and decision by a special committee. I think the conclusion was correct, namely, that changes were necessary.

Attitudes concerning young people who get into difficulty by breaking the laws of the land have run the whole gamut of reason and emotion. They have also run the full gamut regarding who is to blame when a child runs afoul of the law. For example, attitudes range between the fault being totally that of our society or totally that of the young person who breaks the law. Surely, somewhere between the two, and not necessarily right in the middle, and we must look for the answer.

At one end of the attitude spectrum is Dr. M. P. Marcilio who said:

> They are victims of situations, of psychiatric situations and emotional deprivation.

At the other end of the scale we hear people saying, as did Mary McMorrow of Scarborough, when writing in the Globe and Mail:

> Such an approach—

Referring to Dr. Marcilio.

> —has probably caused more problems than it has cured. Even when this paternalistic sympathy and excusing is justified, is it a good reason to suit the laws to the weakeet and least responible in our society.

She also wrote:

> We spend millions nurturing responsibility through education and probably more pandering to irresponsibility through our laws. Any new law which would change this ridiculous situation is well worth trying.

Of course, she refers to the Young Offenders Act.

Another approach was that adopted by Mr. George Hendry of Highland Creek who also wrote in the Globe and Mail on this subject:

> A respectable kind of legislation dealing with crimes by youths will be, among other things, a law in which being young will not be a crime—that is nothing will be a crime for a youth which is not a crime for an adult and one in which youths will be guaranteed neither more nor fewer rights than adults. By and large, punishment should be for doing, not being.

With respect to this young offenders bill, in response to criticism by the Canadian Mental Health Association I gave the bill a more careful reading. I must confess that, having studied it clause by clause, I had to give some clauses more than passing attention because of the gnawing feeling that changes were necessary. On the whole, however, it is a first rate piece of legislation. I now find that my opinion has the backing of the Canadian Bar Association. They support the principle of the bill and make recommendations for some changes that may very well be acceptable to the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer).

I am not unfamiliar with the practice under the Juvenile Delinquents Act, having spent many years in Sarnia dealing with young people who ran afoul of the law, who were found guilty and thus, by definition, became juvenile delinquents. Some of their actions which resulted in these charges seemed to me to be absolutely stupid. I remember on more than one occasion asking these young clients "why did you do this thing?" I received more often than not their completely honest reply "I really do not know". Sometimes their course of action was dictated by revenge for some wrong, imagined or real. There were times when things were done on a dare, in order to be one of the boys. There were times when established authorities were not as reasonable as they might have been and when youths overreacted to a situation, as they might have been expected to do, but unhappily they ended up branded juvenile delinquents.

In addition to this practical experience, having read the bill and the criticisms of it by the Canadian Mental Health Association and others, and having read the ten page response written by the then solicitor general, the Hon. George McIlraith, as well as having made a point of being present for all of the debate—with the exception of two addresses which I subsequently read in Hansard—I am still satisfied that this is a good piece of legislation. With a few changes, it can be looked upon not as a criminal code for young people but as a bill of rights for young people.

When the Canadian Mental Health Association criticized this legislation, the role taken by some members of the opposition was predictable. They figured they had a good thing going and proceeded to the application of hyperbole in condemning the bill. Unfortunately for these few members of the opposition, the electorate are just a little too sophisticated to swallow the kind of criticism that they had for the bill. The Ottawa Citizen of Saturday, January 26, contained an editorial under the heading, "Critics Overdo It", which reads:

The scatter-gun attacks by the opposition against the Young Offenders Act are wide of the mark.

Improvements can be made. But to describe it as the "most punitive, enslaving, vicious and tyrannical piece of legislation that has ever come out of the legislative grist mill", as one member did, is melodramatic nonsense.

Another part of the editorial reads:

There are also references to the Criminal Code as applicable to the new act. Maybe they were made for the sake of brevity; after all, a driving offence by a 16-year old is similar to one by an adult. But if the Criminal Code references offend, the wording could be changed. And if some experts object to the law's name, it could be changed to the Misguided Youth Act. That should satisfy them.

I listened very carefully and read the speech of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) because I was surprised at the totality of his attack on this bill. Knowing that he had probably represented many clients under the provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, I thought he would have welcomed this bill as a major step forward. I would not have been surprised if he had attacked particular clauses in a general way, but he seemed to be suggesting that the young offenders bill was all bad. That really is not in accord with the facts.

I would have thought that the hon. member, or at least the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), would have discussed the bill with Mr. John Brown, the New Democratic Party member for Beaches Woodbine in the Ontario legislature. Mr. Brown is a founder of camps for emotionally disturbed children, and is probably best known as being director of the Warrendale home, about which experience he made a movie for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Mr. Brown takes umbrage at much of the criticism of the young offenders act. I suggest that there are few people in Ontario who are as familiar with the provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act as is Mr. Brown. What does he have to say about this piece of legislation?

On Friday, January 15, Mr. Brown appeared on the CBC program called "The Bruno Gerussi Show", and was interviewed by the host. I think a portion of the transcript of that interview should go into the record for the edification of all hon. members, particularly those who might not have studied the bill and who are concerned about some of the criticism of it.

Earlier Mr. Gerussi had had Mr. Don Sinclair from the Department of Reform Institutions of the Province of Ontario on his program, and Mr. Sinclair had been critical of the legislation. When the host, Mr. Gerussi, asked Mr. Brown to comment on that criticism he said:

Well, perhaps Don Sinclair is the one single person who has made improvements in reform institutions in Ontario. It bothered me a bit to hear him attacking a bill that I feel is really basically to the benefit of children in the province and I have a feeling—that of course he is an employee of the Department of Reform Institutions—they have been party to this bill and are voicing opposition in the hope that they can exercise some, either political influence or some changes in the act.

I think the bill is a good improvement over the Juvenile Delinquents Act, and I take exception to certain things that came out. For instance, in all of the criticisms of the act both by my professional colleagues and by reform institutions people, by Judge Little of the court, and so forth, has been sort of criticism of the language of the bill—that this was going to be a criminal code for children, that they used bad unprofessional terms for kids, and this is nonsense. I've been through the act; I see two places where they use the word inmate. The bill is called the Young Offenders Bill over the Juvenile Delinquents Bill. They speak of young persons continually throughout, and I just don't see that the language of the bill has any basis for criticism.

I think it very legal, very proper, and I don't know what else you would call a young person who is deviant. The psychologist and the pyschiatrist would call him a patient, and the social worker would call him a client, and the sociologist would call him a deviant. In the reform institutions they would call him a delinquent at the present time. I would call him a child, and the act calls him a young offender, which means he is a young person under a certain age and he has committed some kind of an act that is contrary to the codes established by the community.

There are some very important things about this act though that we should look at. Instead of calling it a criminal code for children it's a bill of rights for kids. Up to now it has been possible to charge children with juvenile delinquency if they had no place to live, and I myself engineered and set out a legal action against the reform institutions a number of years ago to defend a 15-year old who was declared a delinquent because she had no place else to go. So, I know some of the dangers to children.

These children are not defended. They usually, if they have parents—the parents are usually confused and don't know their rights and so forth; so a kid who doesn't have a place to go is suddenly declared a juvenile delinquent and sent off to a training school, and has the record of a juvenile delinquent for the mere fact that nobody cared enough for him to put him someplace.

The host then indicated that Mr. Sinclair had referred to the fact that under this bill a young person could be sentenced to a specific time, up to three years, and suggested in that sense that he is treated as an adult and as a criminal. In reply Mr. Brown said:

Actually I don't think that's true and I don't make that interpretation of the act myself at all. There are two aspects that go with that. One is that a child, as well as any other person, should have his civil liberties declared in law and rooted in law so that if they are violated he has some legal recourse to it. So, the access the child must have—a specific charge—that's one aspect of it, and I agree he should have a specific charge, and he should know that charge, and he should have the right to legal counsel and defence, and he is doing precisely that which the act sets out which it hasn't done before.

Then, in terms of the sentence all professionals would like to think they're God and they would like to think that they can judge how long a kid should be in their treatment and how long he shouldn't, and of course that's one of the great, great travesties on individuals at the present time.

Thank God even in the psychiatric hospitals there is a limit set for children. Usually in the pyschiatric treatment unit they say six months, and these are psychotic children. I don't see how the same government can say they need more than three years to deal with a delinquent child.

My hunch is that it is a very bad thing not to have a definite time limit because it means a child can get lost. We have a large number of children in the province of Ontario who have gotten lost in our institutions, and this act, not just in Ontario but across the country, says this will not be possible in the future.

It says many other things very definitely and specifically that are helpful, that protect the child and set limits on the professional person who helps the child, in terms of length and what he must do, but doesn't interfere with good treatment for the child.

Throughout the act they are advocating good treatment, and the nicest thing about the act is it says that a child should be treated with the respect and the responsibility that a parent would exercise over his child in each of these instances.

The host, Mr. Gerussi, picked that up and said:

That immediately becomes debatable and one of the reasons so many children are in trouble is because the parents do not, don't know how, have no judgment about exercising parental care.

Mr. Brown's reply to that was:

But let's look at it. The fact of the matter is the majority of children do all right, and it is precisely because they are involved with parents who exercise a proper care over them. In terms of numbers there's a small minority over the total population who have difficulty, and in those instances the parents are not—for one reason or another—and the act specifically says they should be placed in such circumstances, and the people who take them be charged to be responsible as a good parent would be responsible for his child.

It was interesting to note that after all these pleasant things Mr. Brown had to say about the bill, the host ended with the comment, "Mr. Brown thinks that Bill C-192 has some merit." What are my personal conclusions? I agree with Mr. Brown that this is a better piece of legislation than the present act and I have already used his words that it is, in effect, a bill of rights for children. This bill, in my opinion, can lead to the road to reform.

No legislation, Mr. Speaker, can make a policeman kind, a judge fair, a probation officer objective, a foster parent compassionate nor a social worker dedicated. We give them solely the framework within which to work, and then provide the safeguards in the bill as protection for the young person. The government, recognizing it cannot through legislation change a person's attitude, have endeavoured in clause 4 to at least set the kind of guidelines that they would like to see followed by persons operating under the provisions of this bill. The bill states loudly and clearly to the judge, to the policeman, to the probation officer, to the foster parent, to the social worker and to any others who are operating under its provisions as follows:

This act shall be liberally construed to the end that where a young person is found ... to have committed an offence, he will be dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision—

The government, recognizing the prime responsibility of parents for their children, has taken the steps feasible to require the attendance of the parent with the young person when he is being dealt with pursuant to the provisions of this bill. Some people would change the name of the bill to something like The Young Persons and Children's Act. I believe this view is shared by other members. With the greatest of respect to their opinion, it seems to me that this bill is not applicable to all young persons or all young children but only to those who break the law. Happily, they are a very small segment of our over-all population of young people. I am not certain that this point of view which they express or which I express, is particularly important and I would have no fault to find if the Solicitor General saw fit to change the name of the bill.

I am somewhat concerned about the age factor. It seems to me that 12 years of age might be more appropriate, but then I ask myself how we are to cope with a 10 or 11 year old who breaks the law. I think the young offenders act protects this position and gives probation officers, psychiatrists, sociologists and others the opportunity to help these young people, possibly by the court adopting the suggestion of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), namely, distinguishing between a summary and an indictable offence. I am not too upset over the word "inmate" nor the reference to the Criminal Code, but if a word with a similar meaning but more euphemistic could be found, then I doubt if the Solicitor General would object to that kind of an amendment.

I know my colleagues on the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will give this bill careful scrutiny. I share the view of the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Murphy) that lawyers can deal with this kind of measure because they have had to cope with it on a daily basis. I respect the position of the Canadian Mental Health Association. If they feel as strongly about this bill as they seem to in their correspondence and their brief, and if they are in fact correct in the long run, I hope that position will prevail. To date, however, I have not read anything nor heard any debate that would dissuade me from the view that the young offenders act is a much improved piece of legislation over the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, in the next few minutes I wish to deal with the amendments that I deem necessary before the adoption of Bill C-192, an Act respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act.

First of all, I wish to say that the proposal is positive as a whole. In my view, young offenders represent a concrete reaction to the numerous contradictions of Canadian society. They should therefore be considered not as wrong-doers but as victims. As Judge Trahan of the Juvenile Court, where I had been invited, said last Thursday: "If it has showed on the parents, it is the children who will reap the avalanche."

Mr. Speaker, as elected representatives of Canadian society, we must endeavour to make available to these young offenders all the means required to ensure their complete and satisfactory rehabilitation.

In examining the bill before us today, I realize that the government is making a worthwhile effort to improve the present act which, as you know, goes back to 1929. It is therefore absolutely necessary that young delinquents be considered in the light of twentieth century thinking and that these young people called destructive elements of society in the old days, and by direct consequence rejected by it, be today deemed victims of the conflicts within our civilization.

The young people have a dynamic but deviated personality which must be set straight and put to use for the improvement of our society so that they will become law-abiding citizens.

As I said before, I believe that the bill is acceptable as a whole. However, to my mind certain amendments would greatly improve the scope of Bill C-192 in respect of its practical enforcement.

Therefore, my remarks are aimed mainly at bringing to the attention of the government the risks of interference with human and judicial freedom that certain ambiguities in this bill seem to allow.

Clause 2(o) of this bill provides that a probation officer shall be appointed by a judge.

So as to enable the House to see it, I shall quote this paragraph:

"probation officer" means a person appointed or designated as such under an Act of the legislature of a province, or a person designated in writing by a judge to perform the duties of a probation officer generally or in a particular case;

I object strongly to this state of affairs, for the four reasons that follow.

First, it does not rest with the judicial power to make a decision which comes under the administrative power. We cannot leave it to judges to appoint policemen, or even clerks of the court and much less the support personnel. It will be agreed that a judge cannot appoint probation officers, either because, if it were so, we would be restoring the family compact and setting the stage for influence pedding, and I strongly disapprove of that.

Secondly, I consider that the provisions of that clause leave too much discretion to a single person and might lead to abuse of power.

Thirdly, probation is, in my opinion, a specialized action the application of which cannot be left to judges or to any other individual who does not have the necessary qualifications to do so. We must admit that the appointment of some judges leaves the population thoughtful and that indirectly, a number of them are often severely criticized, because they are compelled to reach conclusions or make decisions in fields with which they are not sufficiently familiar.

Fourthly, I believe that giving such a power to judges will lead to the layoff of several probation officers who would have different conceptions of the services to be rendered to young offenders. I maintain the probation personnel is now a very important professional body whose value and maturity Bill C-192 could not deny.

Mr. Speaker, the wording of subclauses 17 (1) and (2) on page 12 of the bill tends to indicate that the probation officer is somewhat a peace officer. I quote:

(1) A summons issued under section 8 or a notice given under section 15 may be served by any peace officer or probation officer or by any person designated by the person who issues or gives it, or may be sent by mail.

Here is subclause (2):

(2) If a young person or a parent, to whom a summons or notice is mailed, does not appear in court at the time and place named therein as thereby required, a second summons or notice may be issued or given, which summons or notice shall be served by a peace officer or probation officer or by a person designated by the person who issues or gives it, by delivering it personally to the person to whom it is directed, or if that person cannot conveniently be found, by leaving it for him at his latest known address with some inmate thereof who appears to be at least seventeen years of age.

I therefore consider that there is a contradiction in the terms which should be cleared up. To my mind, this is a serious weakness; it could provoke the anger of probation officers who are certainly, as I see it, not peace officers but rather counsellors.

Clause 30 (1) (f) at page 25 of the bill, has this to say about the judge, and I quote:

he may place the young person on probation for a maximum period not exceeding two years;

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the judge may recommend a probation period for the delinquent, but that the probation officer is in a much better position to know precisely how long the period of detention or surveillance should be in each case. Furthermore, I believe the probation officer may also allow the delinquent to resume his proper place in society after a period which he alone, in my opinion, can determine. Actually probation should apply to a special group and not be the direct and automatic consequence of the delinquent's behaviour.

I feel that the expression "foster home or group home" appearing in Clause 30 (1)g) should be defined within the bill. It should be better defined in order that it may not become a catch-all.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to call the House's attention to a document received on January 20 last, from the Director general of Boscoville in Montreal. In his letter, Mr. Gendreau referring to clause 30(4) of the bill, on page 27, writes as follows:

The Rehabilitation Process

Boscoville considers it unthinkable in connection with a rehabilitation process to demand that a young person who has benefitted from rehabilitation measures should face a second trial at the end of his period of probation in a school where he went through a process of change. Such a procedure is similar to advocating euthanasia for patients with a sickness considered extremely serious at the start and that could have been treated successfully. That clause must be fought with all the power of those who have understood what the rehabilitation of a young offender was all about. The Boscoville experience shows that it is possible to save such young persons while protecting society without for all that starting over again court procedures which would for all practical purposes result in an extremely serious regression of the personality of the young person who would under such circumstances have to go through a new trial. We even think that such a measure amounts to eliminating the real rehabilitation opportunities for these youths. Therefore, we deny the validity of this clause.

Mr. Speaker, I think that Mr. Gendreau's statement proves his experience in this field as well as the advisability of rejecting this clause of the bill.

Clause 35, subclause (2) of Bill C-192 reads as follows:

Where no probation officer is available to conduct an investigation and submit a pre-disposition report, the judge shall himself make the investigation referred to in subsection (1) and complete a written report thereof, but he shall not do so until after he has made a finding that the young person appearing before him committed an offence.

I believe that under this subclause the judge is given powers beyond his jurisdiction. Is it logical for the judge to be investigator, policeman, psychiatrist or court clerk in the same case. I do not really think that the reason brought forward—unavailability of probation officers—could justify such a procedure. It would be granting a judge too much power and too much judicial and administrative freedom. A judge is a judge, but only a judge. Therefore, he must not try to perform the duties mentioned a few moments ago. The definition of a judge would then be completely falsified. He must remain neutral in his field, namely that of applying the law to the best of his ability, the reason why he was appointed and sworn in.

Thus in the following pages where the duties of the probation officer are defined, everything is ambiguous and complex and in my opinion this will result in dry and useless discussions.

I should like to draw once again the attention of the House to the document received from the Director General of Boscoville. Three short paragraphs from this document are, in my opinion, very constructive. I quote:

Judge and "Superintendent"

We should avoid giving the superintendent the responsibility of transferring a young person from one training school to another, in contrast with the provision of Clause 47 (1). The judge should be the person to assume the efficiency of rehabilitation measures that society, which he is representing in the last resort, takes for this young person. This should be respected if we want the judge to play the part that experience has proved to be essential to successful rehabilitation.

I agree with these remarks and I believe the government should seriously consider this particualr aspect of the bill. The second comment reads as follows with regard to Clause 59, subclause (2) paragraph (b) on page 53 of the bill, and I quote:

A judge may by warrant commit a young person to detention. It seems to us that such a measure should not be applied towards a young person when there are detention facilities for adolescents within the judicial area where the proceedings are taking place. Being in contact with adult prisoners during imprisonment previous to a rehabilitation measure is inappropriate and a young person who is put in such a situation may well be stigmatized. Past experience has shown that such measures must be avoided if possible.

Once again, I strongly recommend that the government should consider this aspect in order to prevent the young offenders from falling prey to the nefarious influence of hard-core criminals. We are dealing with unlucky youngsters and not with the scum of society. Let us remember that.

I am now coming up to a point which appears to be vital and to which we never pay enough attention. I am speaking of clause 60(4) on page 55 of the bill, which reads as follows:

No person shall, except with leave of a judge, publish by any means any report

(a) of an offence committed or alleged to have been committed by a young person

Mr. Speaker, the mere phrase "except with leave of a judge", in my opinion, destroys the legal scope of this paragraph. Does the law provide for some preference? Is it a good thing, whatever the significance or the sensational aspect of a case from a journalistic point of view, that a youngster should all of a sudden become the subject of a kind of publicity which will sully his reputation for ever? Is there one judge in Canada who does not understand this prime aspect of the young person's rehabilitation? In my view the government in this specific case, with the six words that I dispute thoroughly, is permitting abuses contrary to the most elementary freedom of the accused. I should like to quote the remarks of Mr. Gendreau of Boscoville in this regard:

It is said that it is possible for a judge to give permission to publish certain accounts of the trial of a young person.

For rehabilitation purposes, we fell that we must ban all publicity concerning the delinquent action of a young person when he appears before a children's judge. No permission to disclose to the public any aspect of the family or personal problem should be granted. The risks involved are too great for such a thing to be allowed.

This is clearly viewed from the rehabilitation standpoint which definitely implies that an individual should not have to bear social stigmas which are not conducive to social reinstatement. This is unavoidable in the case of adults and under no circumstances must it be permitted in the case of young people, for it would be a backward step.

This quotation is self-explanatory and if anyone should know something about rehabilitation in Quebec, it surely is Boscoville's director general because he is right in the middle of it.

In my view, the bill is positive in its principles. We are endeavouring to defend the young delinquent by helping him through the enactement of positive, not punitive laws.

This for example is truly a backward step as compared with the law of 1929 respecting probation. Already that act recognized the administrative role of probation officers. As I suggested briefly a few minutes ago, Bill C-192 authorizes the judge to designate whom he wants as probation officer and it even grants him the right to act as one and I am against that.

I believe the bill should be amended to take the present situation in consideration. Today, almost all provinces have probation services established under provincial statutes. Through experience it has been possible to rationalize the social role of probation services. At the same time, professional and scientific elements were gradually integrated into the practice. This measure is applied within officially constituted services. Of course, the work of probation services is always connected to the implementation of the act.

However, to submit its activities to the control and goodwill of the judge is nonsensical and anachronic. In that bill, I note a clear interference by the federal government in an exclusively provincial jurisdiction and in a field already held by the province. In my opinion, the federal government must not in any way define the role, functions, rights and duties of probation officers. This responsibility comes under the provincial government and as far as I know, that government wishes to continue to assume its responsibilities in that field.

Mr. Speaker, it is therefore obvious to me that this bill, as drafted, cannot be passed. There are meaningless words in it, some complicated sentences make numerous paragraphs, and risks of interference by the federal government in provincial jurisdiction and by judges in the field of probation officers are obvious in it.

I feel that the future of these young people is important and should clearly orient this legislation, so that this bill does not become the cause of a conflict of judicial interests between the provinces and the federal government.

Although changes should be made to it, it would be desirable that the bill be avant-garde, constructive and positive, and not punitive and adamant.

Mr. Speaker, I would sincerely wish that the present government take my remarks into consideration.

[English]

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Welland): Mr. Speaker, one of the most important bills now before Parliament is the young offenders bill. It has been the subject of very much controversy. I think all hon. members agree that the Juvenile Delinquents Act, dating back to 1929, should be changed. The problem is that many people expert in the field of delinquent behaviour cannot agree as to the nature of the changes.

The reason that this bill is so important is that its provisions will affect the lives of thousands of young Canadians for years to come. These young Canadians could be my son or your son. If we pass a bill containing the right ingredients of protection of society, safeguarding the civil liberties of the young, with deterring effect and rehabilitation procedure, we will not only be doing a service to the young people involved but in the years ahead we will be saving this country literally millions of dollars now being spent on penal institutions. That is why this bill is so important.

When one inspects the costly penal and reform institutions now in existence, it is easy to see what a tremendous financial saving could be achieved. By reducing the number of inmates, we could materially reduce the number of institutions. Therefore, it is of the utmost importance to prevent as many young people as possible graduating from youthful offenders to hardened adult inmates. An enlightened progressive juvenile law will go a long way toward achieving this objective.

When the young offenders bill was introduced for first reading, it met with considerable opposition from various organizations and individuals experienced in dealing with young offenders. Naturally, we must give a lot of weight to these opinions, but certainly not to the point where a reasonable discussion of this bill cannot ensue. Before anyone categorically renounces the philosophy of and procedure under this proposed legislation, it should be remembered that this was not the hurried product of the Solicitor General's department. It had been the subject of extensive deliberations and hearings dating back to 1961. Those on the Department of Justice Committee sought out the opinions of persons knowledgeable in a number of fields and activities. They met with officials of provincial government departments, juvenile and family court judges, training school personnel, probation officers, university professors and private agencies. Many of the recommendations of this committee are now embodied in a new young offenders bill.

We cannot lightly set this bill aside unless, after further hearings, the preponderance of opinion seem to dictate substantial amendments. For those who uphold the present proposals and those who attack them, there is a common objective, to protect society and at the same time treat the young offender with a happy blend of enlightened severity and humane understanding with one avowed purpose, to restore him to society as soon as possible.

May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe)—Finance—Abolition of sales tax on sale of construction material; the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland)—Canadian National Railways—Reduction of passenger service in Northern Ontario—Suggested holding of public hearings by transport committee; the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—Mid-Canada program on "Weekend"—Action to rectify alleged dishonest presentation.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

TABLING OF REPORT ON INTELLECTUAL AND INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate): Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I may have the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions for the purpose of tabling a document.

Mr. MacLean: This is agreeable to us, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to table two copies, in each of the official languages of Canada, of a report of the Economic Council of Canada entitled, A Report of Intellectual and Industrial Property.

[Later:]

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I believe my hon. friend from Edmonton West has a question of privilege to raise. I stood up in order to give him a chance to get back to his place.

Economic Council of Canada

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry I was moving while Your Honour was putting the motion to which the House has just agreed; I was getting back to my seat in a hurry. I had been trying to ascertain the exact title of the document which was tabled before five o'clock, because it is in connection with that document that I wish to raise my question of privilege. It is unfortunate that the minister who tabled the document is not here, but I think the House would be interested to learn that this report of the Economic Council of Canada under the very impressive title "A Report on Industrial and Intellectual Property" was disclosed to the public at a press conference at eleven o'clock this morning.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The Economic Council has no obligation to table this document in the House at any particular time but I would point out, in connection with the question of privilege, that after this document had been released to members of the press under signature at eleven o'clock, hon. friends of ours were called up by newspapers and asked to comment on it. When they learned that the document had been released, they went to the distribution office of the House and were told they could not have the document until it had been tabled in the House. This is the point to which I wish to address my comments. I think it is absolute nonsense for any ministry or agency of government to issue any of these documents before they are tabled in the House if there are to be any restrictions on the issue of that document to hon. members until it has been tabled. That is the point I wish to make—if there is no obligation on the ministry or on the agency to table a document and there is a restriction placed thereon. I have no complaint if the department or agency issues it to the press beforehand; we may recognize that the minister is seeking publicity beforehand, but that might only be a grievance.

The question of privilege arises when members of this House are told they cannot get a document before it has been tabled, although members of the press are running around with it in their hands. They have reported to their newspapers, stories are on the wire and editors are calling local members to learn their views about it. And the members have to ask: What document? I am fed to the core with this sort of thing. We have had too much of it and the more we protest this unequal and inconsiderate treatment the more, perhaps, it will be realized that this chamber is the focal point of the operation on this Hill, not some minister's office. I do not know whether members become statesmen when they become ministers or whether they become arrogant or whether they become solid ivory between the ears but they forget, when it comes to treating members of this House, that they themselves are members of Parliament and that they are collectively responsible to this House. We shall continue to complain until they realize that they, too, are members of the House and responsible accordingly. This is my grievance and I raise it as a question of privilege on behalf of all hon. members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. McCleave.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to multiply words but I fully support the protest which the hon. member for Edmonton West has made. He is absolutely right.

Mr. Bell: I, too, wish to support this protest but I should like to find out whether any hon. member on the government benches is prepared to stand up and defend the ministry on this issue.

Mr. Albert Béchard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): The hon. member should address the House or yourself, from his seat, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The House has heard the protest made by the hon. member for Edmonton West and others. The position has been made very clear and I think we should proceed now with the business of the Private Members' Hour.

Mr. Cullen: I am informed, Mr. Speaker, having telephoned the minister's office, that this information was given to the press for release at five o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I do not believe we should enter upon further discussion or debate on a question of this kind. The point has been made; although the minister was not here. I think it is clear from the statements presented that this was in the nature of a protest. The views of the hon. members who spoke have been made known and they will be on record in Hansard.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's Order Paper, namely public bills.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

CANADIAN NATIONAL ENVIRONMENT WEEK

MEASURE TO MAKE PEOPLE AWARE OF ENVIRONMENTAL POLLUTION

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill C-25, respecting Canadian National Environment Week.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, could we be told what idea Their Honours came up with?

Mr. Goode: Certainly, Bill C-25 received second reading in the other place on March 16. The bill was sponsored there by the Hon. Alan Macnaughton, a distinguished former Speaker of this House. To him and the other hon. senators who gave sympathetic consideration to this bill I express my sincere thanks.

During the course of debate in the other House it became clear that there was a certain concern about the name "Canadian National Environment Week". The general feeling, expressed by Senator Martin, was that the name was too cumbersome and thus would not lend itself to efforts to have it well remembered in the minds of citizens across this country. The suggested change was the deletion of the word "National" throughout the bill with the result that the week would be known simply as Canadian Environment Week. The bill was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science for consideration of such an amendment. In committee it was unanimously agreed that such a change was desirable and thus the bill was reported, as amended, by deleting the word "National", and given third reading in the other chamber last Wednesday.

I feel that the change of title to "Canadian Environment Week" makes Bill C-25 a better and potentially more effective piece of legislation. I therefore ask the concurrence of the House in this amendment.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): It occurs to me that a word of comment about the various metamorphoses through which this bill has passed might be appropriate at this point.

As you may recall, Mr. Speaker, it was originally introduced by the hon. member under the name of Canadian National Pollution Awareness Week. I believe it does say something for the value of careful consideration in committee that the House of Commons committee made one proposal for a change of name; several were actually considered. Then again, the committee complied with the suggestion which it received that the timing of this particular week be changed to allow of its observance in the fall rather than in the spring. Now, Their Honours have made a proposal, through their amendment, which I would agree improves the bill, by making the title less cumbersome. I am sure we would all concur in this amendment and express a hope that this particular week, which will become the second week to be officially observed by Act of Parliament, will be used by citizens of coming generations to improve the environment. I am happy to support the proposal by an hon. member who comes from another constituency in the Province of British Columbia that this amendment be concurred in.

Motion agreed to, amendment read the second time and concurred in.

AMENDMENT RESPECTING IMPAIRED DRIVERS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford) moved that Bill C-33, to amend the Criminal Code (control of motor vehicle), be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member's bill seeks to amend the Criminal Code by adding a new section 223A. The explanatory note refers to sections 222 and 223. The bill gives the wording of sections 222 and 223 of the Criminal Code that existed before the amendments that were adopted by the House in 1969, I believe, in the Criminal Law Amendment Act which we referred to as the omnibus bill.

I submit that, as presented, the bill could not be referred to the justice committee without amendment because it refers to sections of the Code that are no longer in existence. Sections 222 to 224 were amended by the omnibus bill. I raise this point because I expect many hon. members will be interested in the bill. Although debate will go until six o'clock and the bill will not be referred, I would point out that in its present form the bill is irregular and would have to be amended.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): I suggest to hon. members that we proceed with the debate on the basis that the sections of the Criminal Code referred to are the amended sections, unless the hon. member for Oxford has some other suggestion.

Mr. Nesbitt: I thank my hon. friend for bringing this matter to the attention of the House. I think there is a patent error here that has escaped the law officers of the House. However, it is the substance of the bill that is of importance and perhaps the clause of the bill could be amended accordingly. As I say, the hon. member is quite correct; there is a patent error here which may be due to a misprint or an oversight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Then, we will proceed on that understanding.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, the substance of the matter is clearly explained in the explanatory note to the bill. The purpose of the bill is to amend the Criminal Code so as not to penalize drivers of cars who, realizing that they are intoxicated or that their ability to drive is impaired, are wise enough to stop their car immediately and refrain from continuing their journey for as long as their state lasts. In other words, the purpose of the bill is to get drunken and impaired drivers off the road and to encourage them to stay off it.

I think most people in this country, even the government, would agree that this is desirable. Only last year, I think it was, the government brought in some good legislation in this regard when amending the Code by providing a breathalyzer test for drivers who were considered to be intoxicated or impaired. This legislation has had a good effect and proved to be a deterrent to driving while intoxicated.

This bill is carrying that step a little further in that it seeks to keep off the road drunken drivers, who as everybody knows are a menace not only to themselves but to other drivers on the road. As Your Honour knows, under the present law a person who, realizing he is intoxicated, drives his car on to a side road off the main highway, takes the keys out of the ignition and places them in his pocket, and perhaps even sits in the rear seat of the car, according to judicial interpretations is nevertheless considered to have the vehicle under his care and control. He can be punished by an automatic sentence of 30 days and/or fine, with suspension of driving privileges. In other words, such a driver is punished for having the good sense to drive his car off the road and to stay off the road. In my opinion, that makes no sense.

The provisions of the Code are clear. I feel that the phrase "care and control of a motor vehicle" has been interpreted by the courts very unreasonably. Under the illustration I have just given, whether or not the car is in motion, the driver is guilty of an indictable offence. Originally the judicial interpretation, as I recall it, was that if a person were sitting behind the wheel of a car and had even stopped the motor running he was still considered to have care and control of the vehicle. Then, the courts went one step further and decided that even though the keys were not in the ignition, he could still be charged. Eventually, the point was reached where even a person asleep in the back seat of the car was considered to have care and control of the vehicle, which I suggest makes no sense.

The fact is that instead of helping to keep drivers off the road, judicial interpretations of this kind have hindered this objective. Under these conditions, most people in an intoxicated state would keep on driving and take a chance on the cops not picking them up rather than pull over to the side of the road and stop the vehicle, because if the police look inside the car to see what is wrong they will be picked up anyway. I submit the existing law encourages drunks to keep driving, and I can think of nothing more foolish than that.

What is the situation in Great Britain? That country usually has forward looking laws in this regard. The British parliament changed its law, and the wording of my bill is much the same as that of the bill presented to the British parliament some years ago. I believe in 1965 the British parliament saw the anomaly existing in their law which encouraged drunk drivers to keep on driving, and I understand that the change they made has been of considerable assistance in improving the situation.

I have presented this bill on a number of occasions and the press has been very favourable to it. In fact, I have seen no unfavourable comment. The Toronto Star, which is considered a paper that supports the government, printed a very favourable article in 1966, and I have seen others since. I understand that a number of members of the House in all parties feel that this would be a useful amendment to make to the Code. In fact, I have yet to hear any arguments raised in opposition to it. This is why I shall be very interested to hear what government members who oppose the bill—and I understand it is to be opposed—have to say.

I am curious about one aspect, Mr. Speaker. Even if there are reasons, which I am anxious to hear, for opposing the bill, I cannot understand the government's refusal to let the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The reason, of course, may be due to the usual attitude taken by members on that side of the House. I refer to the attitude that has been taken by the Liberal party since the days of the late C. D. Howe. Although they have good attributes in other ways, one thing all hon. members opposite have in common—some people might refer to it as arrogance—is the attitude that only the members of the Liberal party have sound ideas; no one else is capable of voicing sound ideas, even people from other countries. The repository of all brains is in members on the government side of the House.

Perhaps that is the reason the bill is being opposed. Another may be that the senior officials, of the Department of Justice, and the minister himself, have decided that this amendment is not a very good idea because it does not fit into the doctrinaire approach to the Criminal Code. In the view of these people we must be made to fit the doctrine, the doctrine must never be altered to fit the people. We must not keep to the doctrinaire approach. There is a type of armchair debate among lawyers about which we often hear. Being a lawyer myself, I have heard of it. A number of lawyers gather around in comfortable armchairs and debate some of the fine principles of law which often are not very relevant. Sometimes they say that to be consistent the law should be one thing or another. That is fine perhaps so far as civil law is concerned. Certainly, I would be the first to admit that the law officers of the Crown and the public servants in the Department of Justice are experts at drafting laws and in constitutional matters, but I doubt if any of them has had much experience in enforcing the criminal law. I am sure the minister himself is in that category. One member of this House, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) has had some practical experience as a Crown attorney. In days gone by, I have such experience myself.

I would remind the government that the purpose of the law is not that people should fit into some precise niche in respect of the criminal code. We are dealing with people, and I believe a more practical approach is required. In this amendment the burden of proof is entirely on the accused, and he must prove a number of things which are not easy to prove. This is made clear. A number of quite difficult things must be proven. It is up to the judge or magistrate to decide whether or not he accepts the evidence presented by the accused on his own behalf. The way I read this amendment, and according to the advice I have received, there would not be much opportunity to fool the courts or to misuse the law by reason of the particular wording of the amendment. I believe those persons who have tried to exercise good sense in taking their cars off the road when they feel they are impaired or intoxicated should at least be given credit for this. This would not be easy to prove and I have deliberately phrased the amendment in this manner. I believe, however, that those persons who try to keep off the road in these circumstances should be given appropriate consideration and should not be punished for exercising a little sense.

As I mentioned, this view has been held in other countries. Public opinion would seem to favour this type of amendment. I would hope hon. members who do not see fit to support the legislation at the present time might be persuaded to change their minds.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I certainly cannot support the hon. member's bill, even though I agree that in some extreme and exceptional cases presumption could create embarrassment. But the bill in its present form could certainly not be sent to the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee for study because it would have to be amended. In fact, as I mentioned before, it refers to Criminal Code sections 222 and 223 as they were before the amendment of section 222, which covered the crime of driving while intoxicated or under the influence of drugs, and section 223 which involved driving a vehicle while impaired by alcohol or drugs. It is therefore a slightly less serious crime than under section 222.

Well since the bill was amended section 222 was deleted and moreover the minimum imprisonment of seven days on summary conviction was cancelled. The new section 222 pertains to driving a motor vehicle while the driver's ability is impaired owing to intoxication or the influence of a narcotic and retains the word "imprisonment" but only for the second or subsequent offences.

A new section 223 was added which covers the refusal without legitimate reason to give breath samples when a police officer requests them for valid and logical reasons.

Then a new offence was created under section 224, that of driving with a blood alcohol content of over .08.

I find it difficult to understand the wording of the bill as it contains a new clause, clause 223A, which states as follows:

"Sections 222 and 223 shall not apply where the motor vehicle is not in motion and the driver, having realized that he was intoxicated or that his ability to drive was impaired, has, for that reason alone, refrained from putting his motor vehicle in motion or stopped the same, and is also in a position to establish that he had no intention of driving or continuing to drive, while intoxicated or while his ability to drive was impaired."

The accused still has to prove that he did not intend to drive or to continue driving.

So, there is not much difference with the old section 224 (2) which contained the following assumption: where a person occupies the seat ordinarily occupied by the driver of a motor vehicle he shall be deemed to have the care or control of the vehicle unless he establishes that he did not enter or mount the vehicle for the purpose of setting it in motion.

Now, the clause proposed by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) does not amend much the present provision, since the former provisions of the act allowed for this presumption. And if I am not mistaken, this presumption was introduced into the Criminal Code in 1947. This was certainly logical because previously a driver could easily establish that he did not intend to drive his vehicle.

Obviously, when Parliament passed that legislation, it was thinking of all the dangers involved when a driver, willfully or nor, drives a vehicle while under the influence of drugs. Usually the person himself knows what was his intention when he decided to drive his car.

In the explanatory notes it is said that the purpose of this bill is to amend the Criminal Code so as not to penalize drivers who are wise enough not to drive or to stop their car immediately.

Perhaps it was mentioned that some drivers are smart enough to stop their car in certain cases and say they did not intend to drive it. So it might be too easy perhaps to establish their non-responsibility.

I agree with the hon. member that, in some cases, it is not easy to prove it, as far as care and control of the vehicle is concerned and, in the past, various decisions have been rendered as shown by our jurisprudence. Even in certain cases when it was utterly impossible to drive a vehicle because it had come to a dead stop due to outside circumstances, the accused was found guilty. Let me say to the hon. member that there are many extreme cases.

I remember one from days of private practice. An individual walking out of a hotel and who felt intoxicated asked one of his friends to drive his car. He had asked his friend to drive him home and while driving through a narrow street a slight accident happened. Of course, the car stopped and the owner was later asked by the police to take his car out of the way, then he was given a ticket for driving while his ability to drive was impaired. Although these facts had been recognized, the judge decided that this was the law and even though the car had been driven only about 100 feet the driver was responsible and the charge stood.

I admit that there are extreme cases where it is difficult to establish the presumption provided for in the law. But are we going to ignore this presumption, considering that in all the other cases where the drivers have stopped their car or are asleep at the wheel they have the care or control of it and have little chance of driving their car?

We all admit that with the number of car accidents and the daily parade before the courts of people charged with driving while their ability to drive was impaired, there is no need to restrict the prescriptions of the act; I think that they are not too severe to cover general cases. All those acquainted with the courts and those who read newspapers see that every day a growing number of people, notwithstanding increasingly stern penalties, are charged with driving a motor vehicle while drunk or while their ability was impaired by alcohol.

There is even less need to amend the legislation since section 224 was enacted and use of breathalyzer established positively determine the proportion of alcohol in the blood of a motorist. The rate of .08 per cent recognized by all experts, as was outlined in the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs during the study of this matter, had been suggested and was approved, I believe, by the Canadian Bar Association and several other bodies whose opinion was that a higher rate would make driving a motor vehicle extremely dangerous. I could quote statistics before the House in that respect. Everybody knows that such cases occur in large numbers.

It has been established by experts that alcohol is an important factor in most fatal accidents. Now is not the time to restrict the application of the act in such cases.

Even if one does not take into account the changes that were made, this would not change much in the act as the presumption remains. As to the general principle of suppressing the presumption in some cases, I do not think, in view of the danger caused by the presence of intoxicated drivers on the roads, that the time is appropriate for suppressing or reducing the effect of the presumption created by the act.

For these reasons, I cannot support the bill introduced by the hon. member and I hope that we shall have an opportunity to hear other members concerning the changes proposed by Bill C-33.

• (5:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My friend who has just spoken made some technical objections to the bill; he said that Bill C-33 is not relevant to the old sections 222 and 223 of the Criminal Code and therefore the amendment could not be passed. In the last few moments I have had the opportunity to check this matter, and may I say as a point of clarification that I find that the bill is quite relevant to the new sections 222 and 223, although there is slightly different wording. I thought I would bring that point to my hon. friend's attention.

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of taking part in this debate because the subject is one which interests me greatly. I have listened to the hon. member who is proposing the bill and I must say that I am impressed with his reasoning. Personally, I would have no objection to the bill being referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, where all the lawyers in the House, including the hon. member who has spoken and myself, would have an opportunity to consider it further. However, I have some reservations and this is why I am making some remarks on the bill that we have before us.

The bill proposes an addition to the Criminal Code in the form of a section 223A which purports to prevent the penalization of drivers of motor vehicles who are wise enough to stop driving when they realize that their ability to drive is impaired or that they are intoxicated. Although the Criminal Code was amended by the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1968-69, and the relevant provisions with regard to drinking and driving were proclaimed in force as of December 1, 1969, reference is made in the explanatory note and the suggested amendment to the sections of the Criminal Code prior to the amendment.

> 224A (1) In any proceedings under section 222 or 224,
> (a) where it is proved that the accused occupied the seat ordinarily occupied by the driver of a motor vehicle, he shall be deemed to have had the care or control of the vehicle unless he establishes that he did not enter or mount the vehicle for the purpose of setting it in motion;

In other words, the onus is on the accused. A provision to this effect was first enacted as part of the criminal law of Canada in 1947, and the reference to this enactment in Snow's Criminal Code expresses the reasoning behind the enactment. Snow writes the following:

> This amendment is made following recent court decisions to the effect that a driver may be too drunk to have the care or control of a motor vehicle. The purpose of subsection 4 of section 285 is to protect people on the highway. When the driver of a motor vehicle is in such a state of intoxication that his driving is a menace to the public safety he must be considered as "intoxicated within subsection 4 of section 285 of the Criminal Code: see Rex v. Cox, 7 C.R. 39"—

It is to be noted that the care or control provisions of the Code are to be found in both present sections, that is, section 222 which relates to impairment and section 224 which relates to persons whose blood alcohol level exceeds .08 per cent. Care or control of a motor vehicle is possible without one being the driver. One might be acting under the direct supervision and instruction of another, so that the care or control would be in that other person. There are any number of decided cases dealing with the question of when a person has care or control, but in each case it is a question of fact which must be decided on the evidence adduced at the trial.

I think it is clear that in enacting the legislation Parliament had in mind the potential dangers of an intoxicated or impaired person who might at any moment voluntarily or otherwise put a motor vehicle in motion. Because of this real danger, and because the accused would be a person who would be best able to give evidence as to what he was doing in the car, provision was made for the presumption section. This section raises the presumption of the care or control, which the accused may rebut by evidence of his intention. The proposed amendment would not change this provision because it recognizes the obligation on an accused "to establish that he had no intention of driving or continuing to drive while intoxicated or while his ability to drive was impaired". I merely point out to the hon. member that it seems to me he is not accomplishing what he wants to accomplish by the bill that he is proposing.

In order to appreciate the extent of the onus on the accused and the effect of the care or control sections, reference could be made to the cases which are referred to in Tremeear's or Martin's Criminal Code. As has been pointed out by many lawyers and bar associations across the country, the law is clear about care or control. If drivers, in the words of the explanatory note, "are wise enough not to drive or to stop their cars immediately and refrain from continuing their journey in their present state" they should also be wise enough to remove the key from the ignition, step out of the car and re-enter it either on the passenger side or in the back seat. These steps would be clear evidence from which the court could properly infer that the accused "did not enter or mount the vehicle for the purpose of setting it in motion."

With respect, I do not think the proposed amendment accomplishes what the proposer seems to have in mind. On the other hand, I would not think that an amendment of this kind would be appropriate in light of the statistics on drinking and driving, the injuries and damages resulting therefrom and in light of the recent amendments to the Code with respect to the breathalyzer. I have the most recent statistics with respect to the number of drinking and driving convictions registered in each province under sections 222, 223 and 224 of the Criminal Code.

In Ontario the number of convictions for driving while impaired, under section 223, and driving while intoxicated, under section 222, during the period January 1 to September 30, 1969, was 12,738. The number of convictions has increased substantially since that time. For the period January 1, 1970, to September 30, 1970, under section 222, driving while intoxicated; section 223, failure to provide a breath sample, and section 224, driving with a blood alcohol content of more than 8 milligrams, the number of convictions increased to 15,669. From the statistics I have quoted for my province of Ontario it would appear that there has been an increase in convictions having to do with driving and alcohol consumption of 19 per cent.

I would also point out the statistics with regard to the number of motor vehicles registered in Ontario. In Ontario, during the period January 1 to September 30, 1969, 2,855,361 motor vehicles were registered, and from January 1, 1970, to September 30, 1970, the number of motor vehicles registered in Ontario was 2,956,043. This is an increase of 3½ per cent. From the statistics I have quoted, Mr. Speaker, you will notice there has been an increase in convictions for driving offences associated with alcohol, of 19 per cent whereas the number of motor vehicles registered has increased by only 3½ per cent. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if it might be of interest to hon. members to have these tables printed in Hansard, in view of the fact that they refer to all provinces of Canada and would be of great interest to members generally.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Has the hon. member leave of the House to include these statistics at this point in his speech?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Robinson: To sum up, Mr. Speaker, in my view there is unquestionably a relationship between traffic accidents and the consumption of alcohol. I feel the present law is good law and places the onus rightfully where it belongs. Although I sympathize with the hon. member who has presented this bill, I cannot support him at this time.

Mr. C. Terrence Murphy (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, at the outset I would like to return to the point of order raised by the hon. member who moved this bill. As I read the bill, it purports to amend sections 222 and 223 of the Criminal Code. As I read those sections, section 222 does deal with impaired driving, or care and control of a vehicle, and section 223 provides as follows:

> Where a peace officer on reasonable and probable grounds believes that a person is committing, or at any time within the preceding two hours has committed, an offence under section 222, he may, by demand made to that person forthwith or as soon as practicable, require him to provide then or as soon thereafter as is practicable a sample of his breath suitable to enable an analysis to be made in order to determine the proportion if any of alcohol in his blood, and to accompany the peace officer for the purpose of enabling such a sample to be taken.

Then subsection 2 provides a penalty for anyone who refuses to take the test. So I submit that the proposed bill in purporting to deal with section 223 is wrong and does not make sense. There are other observations which I would like to make. The law as it now is under section 224A(1) of the Criminal Code provides as follows:

> —where it is proved that the accused occupied the seat ordinarily occupied by the driver of a motor vehicle, he shall be deemed to have had the care or control of the vehicle unless he establishes that he did not enter or mount the vehicle for the purpose of setting it in motion;

This section, while it raises a presumption, raises nothing more than a rebuttable presumption, a presumption which the accused can rebut by adducing evidence to indicate that he did not in fact intend to set his motor vehicle in motion. This is evidence which is peculiarly within the knowledge of the accused himself. There is nothing to prevent him taking the stand in this type of prosecution and giving evidence or adducing evidence which would satisfy a magistrate that he did not in fact intend to put the motor vehicle in motion, no matter where he was sitting in the car. There is a presumption that if he is sitting in the driver's seat with the key in the ignition or with the motor running that he is in care and control of the vehicle. But it is open to him, as the law now stands, to show that he did not intend to put the motor vehicle in motion, and if his evidence is accepted this is a complete defence to the charge.

I submit that under the proposed bill the accused will have in one way to go much further than that. If we read the bill closely we see he has to establish three things. First, he has to establish, strangely enough, that he was intoxicated or impaired. It seems strange to me that in a situation like this an accused should be placed in the position of establishing to the satisfaction of a court that he was intoxicated or impaired. When he has established this fact in court—and I do not know how he can go on to the next step if he has established that he was intoxicated—he must establish that he realized he was intoxicated or impaired and for that reason alone he refrained from putting his car in motion, or brought it to a stop. Then he has to establish that he had no intention of driving or of continuing to drive.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard).]

I do not know in what way a man who establishes to the satisfaction of a court that he was drunk can then establish to the satisfaction of the same court that he was wise enough to carefully park his car and that he intended to stay there. Surely, no man who is drunk will be able to satisfy anybody on this score. I submit that he would not have the mental capacity to make those decisions.

Mr. Nesbitt: That is stretching it pretty far, isn't it?

Mr. Murphy: I hope to practise law again some day and I can see where this clause could be used in some rather doubtful defences. Let us say an impaired or drunken driver is weaving down the road when suddenly a police car comes along with lights flashing and siren sounding; when the driver sees this he realizes he is drunk or impaired and so pulls his car over to the side of the road, parks it and turns off the ignition. There is no doubt that he does not intend to drive again, possibly because the policeman is by the door of the car.

Under the wording of this clause it is open to ingenious defence counsel to argue this type of defence, and it may satisfy the requirements. The man realized that he was intoxicated or impaired; there was no other reason for his stopping the car. If he had been sober he would not have stopped. He refrained from putting the car in motion again and so could satisfy the court that he did not intend to drive, particularly if he had asked the policeman to drive him home. I submit that this could be a defence under the provisions of this bill as it is presented to us. In that respect, and for purely selfish reasons, it might be wise to amend the Criminal Code in such a way so that defence counsel could have fun in arguing the matter.

I have illustrated one way in which this bill might be used to thwart the provisions of the Criminal Code which pertain to driving and drinking, but there must be many others. I do not think we should change the Criminal Code in a way which would lessen the effectiveness of the present law as it pertains to drinking and driving.

There are some interesting statistics pertaining to the increase in accidents between 1958 and 1967. One set of figures issued by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics shows that in those nine years the number of persons killed on our highways rose by over 66 per cent and the number of persons injured rose by more than 100 per cent. The statistics read into the record by the hon. member for Toronto-Lakeshore (Mr. Robinson) show that there are many more cars on the road now than there were in those nine years. I submit that we should only consider lessening the criminal law pertaining to drinking and driving when we have statistics which show that the recent amendments to the Criminal Code concerning the breathalyzer and breath test are reducing the accident rate and the death rate.

In a speech in this House dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) said:

> The experience in the United Kingdom gives ground to expect that if this legislation passes there will be several hundred Canadians alive next year who would not be alive if there were no compulsory breathalyzer test. There will be several thousand more persons uninjured and several thousand more hospital beds free for people with other illnesses which would otherwise be occupied by patients broken in bone and spirit in traffic accidents.

Once we get driving and drinking under control to a greater degree than now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that only then can we consider bills such as that proposed by the hon. member. Even at that time I would suggest that a bill to accomplish the same end should be framed in a way that would prohibit defence counsel getting around the law and being able to trot their clients out of court because of weak wording.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, could I put a question to the hon. member?

Mr. Murphy: Yes.

Mr. Nesbitt: The hon. member mentioned the British experience to which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) referred when amendments were being made to the Criminal Code. In view of the fact that the government of the United Kingdom in 1965 passed an amendment identical to the one I am suggesting and apparently found it very satisfactory, would the hon. member not agree that it might be worth discussing in the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee?

Mr. Murphy: I am not aware of the British legislation, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member now says that his bill is identical to the British legislation. Earlier I thought he said it was close to it. I do not know what the British legislation is, but I think it is worth discussing.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. As the hour set aside for private members' business has expired, I do now leave the chair.

[English]

Having listened to many comments on the Criminal Code today, I am reminded of a little poem which it might be interesting to put on record for thoughtful reception by hon. members.

> When some fellow yields to temptation
> And breaks a conventional law,
> We look for no good in his makeup,
> But Lord, how we look for the flaw.
> No one asks, "Who did the tempting?"
> Nor allows for the battles he's fought.
> His name becomes food for the jackals,
> The saints who have never been caught.
> I'm a sinner, O Lord, and I know it.
> I am weak, and I blunder and fail.
> I am tossed on life's stormy ocean
> Like a ship that is caught in a gale.
> I am willing to trust in thy mercy,
> To keep the commandments thou'st taught,
> But deliver me, Lord, from the judgment
> Of the saints who have never been caught.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

PROVISION REGARDING CHILDREN AND YOUNG PERSONS

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Goyer that Bill C-192, respecting young offenders and to repeal the Juvenile Delinquents Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs; and the amendment thereto of Mr. Woolliams (page 2381).

Mr. D. R. Tolmie (Welland): Mr. Speaker, the difference between those who uphold the principle of this bill and those who oppose it is in the approach to achieving these goals. So far as I am concerned, this is a non-partisan bill and my only question is, how do we achieve the goals that we wish to achieve? Those who support the bill—it is a government bill—apparently believe that young people who break the laws of Canada should be charged with a specific infraction and after due process of law should receive a sentence as a deterrent. The sentence, when carried out, would strongly emphasize the rehabilitation of the individual.

Those who oppose the philosophy of the bill seem to believe—I hope I am right in this assumption—that young offenders should be treated as a behavioural problem and the young person got into his or her predicament by reason of environment, family problems or mental instability. There is a real, honest and definite philosophical cleavage between these two groups. I think it is of extreme importance that before a law which will affect the future of thousands of Canadians is enacted, much more study be carried out. I strongly feel that the bill should be sent to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs or other appropriate committee and that briefs and witnesses from all parts of Canada, and all reputable and thoughtful organizations, should be made available to the committee. Furthermore, I would suggest that evidence of comparative laws of the United Kingdom, certain American states and Sweden be placed before the committee. After exhaustive hearings by this all-party committee—I emphasize the word all-party—I would hope that a non-partisan report would issue to assist the government in its selection of changes to the present bill.

I do not want to go into the specific provisions of the bill; we can do that at a later date. One point which intrigues me concerns the name of the act. Should it be changed from Young Offenders Act to Young Persons Act? I think that question should be examined. I strongly suggest that for juvenile court judges there should be a specialized training program. These are not judges of a general nature; they require a specific knowledge. They should receive specialized training covering such matters as the principles of child psychology and personality development, the prevention and treatment of delinquent behaviour, juvenile court law and the rules of evidence. In other words, they should know something about this particular subject. Juvenile court judges should continue to be appointed by the provincial authorities but selected only from names recommended by an advisory group of representatives from such fields as education, law, medicine, religion and social work.

There has been criticism that the provinces will be saddled with additional costs if this bill is enacted. This is quite possible, but that is not the point. If the net result—and this is what we wish to attain—is prevention of juvenile delinquency and permanent rehabilitation of our young offenders, any additional funds spent by the provincial authorities will be well spent.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-192 which we are debating replaces the Juvenile Delinquents Act with the Young Offenders Act. I say at the outset that I am not a lawyer and do not profess to be an expert on the legal interpretation of this bill. I leave that to members such as my colleague the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). I have a purely human interest in this bill and I am speaking tonight as what is commonly called "Joe citizen". I have an interest in what this bill will do to those young people affected by it. I have a human interest in the type of society we have produced and the type of society this bill will help evolve in the future.

The title of the bill, the Young Offenders Act, is both inappropriate and misleading. In the bill a child is defined as a person under the age of 17 years. The bill continually refers to a young person as being a child over the age of 10 years. Most of the provisions in the bill are applicable to children 10, 11 or 12 years of age. As many members have already pointed out, the title of the bill is misleading. Many hon. members, including the member for Broadview and the hon. member who just spoke, have suggested that the title should be changed to the Young Persons Act.

Many hon. members have received dozens of representations from ordinary citizens, various groups and people who have experience in criminal law. Most of these people are concerned that if this bill is passed it will be in essence a criminal code for children. The bill is very distasteful in its terminology. Throughout the bill there are references to offenders. The title of the bill, the Young Offenders Act, is very negative. It implies that someone is condemned before he is tried. It refers to inmates, training schools and uses language of that sort.

This is very distasteful in a bill that affects children of 10, 11, 12 or 13 years of age.

The bill is very legalistic in approach. It deals in cold legalisms. It lacks some of the human elements that are necessary when dealing with an area such as this. It deals with young people and the problems in which they become involved. It is more concerned about technicalities than with the social conditions that motivate or provoke young people to do those things which our society does not deem to be regular or law abiding. When dealing with children of this age, the courts should have the maximum amount of flexibility in order to help rehabilitate young people rather than just punish them. There is a wrong emphasis in the bill. As I already pointed out, the title condemns rather than doing something more positive. The bill is punitive in nature, and harsh. It segregates the child who breaks the law from the mainstream of society, limits the discretion of the judge and does not give him as much flexibility as is necessary in dealing with young people.

The bill lacks the human element of compassion and understanding. Many hon. members, including the minister, have been asked who participated in the drafting of this bill. Were the young people, organizations, groups and welfare workers consulted? It appears they were not. I think the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) will have to admit that the bureaucrats in his office drafted the bill. Perhaps this is why the bill is so cold and legalistic in approach and lacks the compassion and human understanding that is necessary.

This bill is reactionary in approach. Some hon. members have described it as a Spiro Agnew type of approach to law. We do not need a strong, iron hand, ultra-conservative type of approach in this country. The bill is reactionary instead of progressive. A punitive approach to the law is not the direction that society should be following. When I look at bills such as this I wonder where the great Liberalism is that was talked about a few years ago. Where was participatory democracy when this bill was drafted? Were the young people, social workers and those experienced in this field consulted? This is nothing but a reactionary piece of legislation. In my opinion it reinforces the type of society from which people are becoming more and more alienated, the type of society against which young people are rebelling.

With regard to the content of the bill, the government has displayed nothing more than a "swinging" image. Instead of reaching into the future with progressive legislation, this bill reaches back to the age of the dinosaur. It is all talk and no substance. For this reason I suggest that hon. members should vote on the bill according to their consciences. They should be free to vote in the way they feel, not as directed by the people who drafted the legislation.

The amendment before us is good. In essence it suggests that the bill should be withdrawn and a task force appointed to redraft new legislation. This is a good idea. In addition to consulting professional people and experts, the task force should consult lay persons, the people directly affected by legislation such as this. If we cannot convince the minister and the powers that be to withdraw the bill and introduce a new one, we should move as many amendments as possible in order to put a more human element in the legislation. Young people between the ages of 10 and 14 should not be treated as criminals. This is one of the most undesirable parts of the legislation. If the bill is not withdrawn and a new one drafted, amendments should be made that will at least change this aspect of it. Amendments should be passed which will make the bill more flexible. Legal technicalities should not be emphasized when dealing with young people. If amendments to this effect were made, then at least the bill would be less offensive and more progressive than it is now in dealing with young people who for one reason or another do not fit into our society.

The most offensive thing about the bill is its general attitude, the thread which seems to run right through it. It is a reactionary measure instead of being a progressive, forward-looking document. The most ludicrous aspect is that it applies to 10 year olds. Under the equivalent act in Britain, no child under the age of 14 may be charged with an offence; but in Canada, under this legislation we are taking a directly opposite approach. Surely, a child of tender age has special psychological and physical needs. People change tremendously between the ages of 10 and 18. A child may have changed almost beyond recognition by the time he is 21 and is sentenced under this proposal. This fact has been pointed out by a number of organizations, among them the Canadian Mental Health Association which on December 7 sent a letter to all members of the Senate and of the House of Commons on this issue. I should like to read one section of this letter which I believe to be relevant.

> A Criminal Code based on the notion that specific offences merit a specified range of punitive procedures may be appropriate for adults but definitely not for children. A particular offence may be committed by two children of the same age. In one case the total social, emotional and intellectual needs of one child may require only a suspended sentence; while with the other child an indefinite and probably prolonged period of re-education, treatment and retraining may be required.
> Basically it is the position of this association that there should be a separation between the judicial process and the process of determining appropriate treatment, training, supervision and after-care. The former should be considered to be a matter of due process while the latter deals with decisions concerning the particular needs of the child with a special emphasis on his rehabilitation.

The Canadian Mental Health Association draws attention to an omission about which we should all be concerned. They say there is a lack of emphasis on the area of rehabilitation and human need. Priority should be placed on strengthening the bill in these areas, rather than on legalistic questions involving judicial processes. Emphasis must be placed on the growth and development of a healthy personality when dealing with a child or young person who is found to have committed an offence. Instead, this bill leads to the segregation of a child who has broken the law. It tends to deal with his behaviour instead of his total personality, his total background.

The federal government should be talking in terms of helping the provinces through the provision of finances, staff and so on to build rehabilitation centres where young people who have broken the laws of society can be helped and rehabilitated. The bill before us seems to show no concern about this aspect. The Solicitor General ought to be willing to look to the United Kingdom, Sweden, Holland and other European countries as examples, because a great deal of useful work has been done there in connection with the treatment of young offenders. Rather than thinking in terms of the punishment of a child who is involved under any of the provisions of this act, he should be trying to help him readjust to society.

We should educate these children. This does not mean requiring them to develop skills or academic proficiency, but educating them socially and culturally so that they feel they are part of the society which has rejected them. Something must be wrong if they have committed delinquent acts. We should always keep this in the back of our minds and try to help them as much as possible. If we do not, all we shall produce is a still greater degree of alienation on the part of young persons and increasing segregation within a society from which they have broken away.

It has often been said that jails and penal institutions are the greatest schools for crime, and I believe this is true. We must do our best to see that it is true no longer. We should not look at these individuals in terms of the offences they are said to have committed but in terms of their background and their need. Again I appeal to all hon. members, regardless of party, to consider seriously the need for making fundamental amendments to the bill before us. If the Solicitor General will agree to withdraw it, better still; many people both inside and outside the House would be happy. Let him support the amendment, withdraw the bill and start all over again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nystrom: But if this does not happen, certain fundamental changes will have to be made, changes which will put these proposals on a more human basis and place greater emphasis on rehabilitation instead of strict legalities and jurisdictional interpretations. The bill should be made more flexible. Judges and others concerned should be given more freedom to decide what is best to be done when young persons are involved in offences. This would be moving in the right direction. If we fail, we shall get ourselves into more trouble and more and more people, especially the young, will be angry at us for passing legislation which is reactionary, nineteenth century in its philosophy, reaching back into the past instead of looking forward to the future.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join those who have expressed concern about this bill, its lack of general application and the narrowness of its philosophy. I should like to relate my remarks to some of the principles and, specifically, to some of the recommendations contained in the Celdic report. This is a report on one million children in Canada. It was completed in 1970 and was sponsored by such associations as the Canadian Association for the Mentally Retarded, the Canadian Council on Children and Youth, the Canadian Education Association, the Canadian Mental Health Association—which has been mentioned many times in the last day or so—the Canadian Rehabilitation Council and the Canadian Welfare Council, as well as other bodies interested in the disorders of children, some of which deficiencies lead to a confrontation between them and our courts and legal system.

The main difficulty from the standpoint of existing programs having to do with children is the very serious lack of co-ordination resulting in overlapping or major gaps in service. The Celdic committee summed it up in a way that I find very appealing, one that I hope will commend itself to the House. If I may quote directly from the report, the committee says:

> No one sees or is concerned with the whole child as he interacts with his environment. We diagnose and treat and sometimes label for life, on the basis of a small segment, the problem part of the total child.

Preferable to this chaotic state of affairs which was so well stated by the Celdic report would be the provision of a wide range of alternatives to the teacher, public health nurse, doctor, social worker, policeman, or parent who has become concerned with a child with emotional and learning disorders or other handicaps. So we are talking about children with emotional disorders.

It is interesting to note the extent to which the committee stressed certain points. For example, the committee stressed an approach toward the understanding and treatment of these disorders and handicaps which would keep the child as a whole within the view of the Canadian public and the view of those who must deal with him. The committee felt that a child with an emotional or learning disorder should be regarded as having a typically persistent imbalance in the interaction between the child and his environment and between his capacities and the demands, both internal and external, that are made upon him.

This can be evidenced in a number of complexly interrelated ways involving both physical and psychological factors. When someone close to the child becomes aware that he is having difficulties, he may be referred to a specialist of one type or another who tries to unravel and to describe the symptoms to those responsible for him, his parents, an institution or whatever it be. An attempt is then made to determine the cause and what the result may be if the behaviour persists. An attempt may then be made by the child, by the group around him and by the teacher, nurse, doctor, social worker or judge—and in the context of our discussion this evening, by the court—to work out a better resolution of his imbalance. This can be applied, I suggest, both biologically, in the sense of better nutrition for example or, more to the point, as an improved response to external environmental conditions which in many cases are in the background of those children who find themselves coming before our courts.

While every child may be regarded as a student and as a patient—which I suppose is desirable—it is not desirable that he become a ward, an offender, or require institutional or residential care. This attitude may unfortunately influence some neglect or reluctance in the provision of welfare or correctional services. Historically, it has been part of the philosophy of the work ethic that people be as self-supporting as possible. However, with the greatly expanded role of government today, a persistent distortion of this philosophy has resulted in a considerable imbalance in services provided by the state which most adversely affects poor people. Most often it is the poor who appear before the courts. Provincial child-care legislation, for example, is inordinately sensitive to budget cutbacks and other forms of political and institutional neglect. Very often, to return to the Celdic report, the committee found this lack of funds resulted in more serious undesirable behaviour by a disturbed child, eventually resulting in more drastic measures such as removal from the home. The committee states:

> For the low income family, the only choice is usually between the programs of child welfare agencies and those options open to the juvenile court, such as probation or training schools for delinquent children.

Or, of course, incarceration. The committee points out very strongly—I must agree with the committee here, and I think most Canadians who have evidenced concern for children will also agree—that most of the children who become involved with the law are not really representative of a complicated social problem. The committee points out:

> Society is threatened by the aggressive acting-out child and we are liable to respond promptly with measures designed to provide social controls. Yet it is the hostile, provoking child who is still striving for achievement who may respond rapidly to immediate and relevant help.

I think that is a very important point. The committee stressed the need to implement the recommendations for preventive services as welfare measures in order to divert a potentially delinquent child into the appropriate treatment procedure. It is also especially important, the committee feels, that provision be made for the many seriously disturbed children from whom at present there is a no place to go other than into the correctional system, into the courts. We must be concerned with the considerable lack of these services at the adolescent level, as well as the great difference between the way that the offences of boys, for example, are determined as compared with the way in which our courts and society treat offences of young girls. Again the Celdic committee points out:

> We believe that the process of labelling a juvenile as delinquent, and the associated names—incorrigible, truant, sexually immoral, vagrant—is insupportable because the effect is to increase the alienation of the child from society by defining him in a derogatory way and isolating him from his normal social environment.

I agree with that. The enlightened society of 1971 should have no need for courts that deal with young people. This is especially critical because the committee was under the impression that very often children were committed to training schools, not so much because they were offenders but because it was impractical to provide for the child elsewhere, perhaps largely as a result of the paucity of community services.

We have also discovered in our studies the very considerable differences in the treatment of so-called delinquents between the various ethnic and religious groups, as well as on the basis of socio-economic considerations. The most likely result, in the view of the Celdic committee, would be to generate or accelerate the process of alienation from society and its prevailing values. As far as procedure is concerned, a way must be found for dealing with the child. I think that if we approach Bill C-192 with an open mind and with concern for the child, we will find that there is a very great difference in the way that children can be treated and must be treated by society, and particularly by police departments.

The minor may not give a guarantee himself, because of his age and status in life, in respect of appearance in court, pre-trial custody, and so on. There must be something that reinforces the impression that our youth have of our courts and institutional procedures. They must not be left with the impression that our courts and institutions are compulsive and arbitrary, which would seem to be the case today. In most cases, whenever the court uses a clinical examination it is usually very unsatisfactory because of the conditions of interview and testing, as well as the fact that many recommendations cannot be implemented in any case. There are few institutions outside the regular corrections system which accept delinquents into a treatment program. Quebec is an exception, and I believe Ontario is coming along in this regard. The rest of Canada, unfortunately, does not have the type of institutions that we require. I do not blame the correctional institutions for the steps they seem to be taking, because they have no other choice.

I think that usually when a child has his proceeding adjourned he is returned to his family. In the most serious cases he is sent to a training school. Many of these schools have little or no treatment facilities. Their staffs learn mostly on the job and their programs are minimal, although several in recent years have made considerable attempts at improvement. There is in Quebec a special training program for the re-education of delinquents. The over-all rate of progress in Canada is still very slow; in my opinion appallingly slow. The Celdic committee noted that some provinces now deal with delinquency as a welfare problem in order to qualify for assistance under the Canada Assistance Plan. The committee points out that this is useful only if there is real improvement in the services offered to children and adolescents. I doubt very much if this in fact is the case.

The committee emphasizes that there must be continuity in the treatment of the offender, in that there must be integration as between the training school and further treatment for the child so that effective, long-term relief of the cause of delinquency can be achieved. To this end I am firmly convinced that much greater training and continuous implementation of programs must be made available to courts and training school personnel as well as people who deal with the child before and after the disposition of the court.

Mr. Speaker, one of the most thorough studies undertaken in Canada with respect to children with disorders presented 144 recommendations for those who are interested in this problem. A number of these recommendations deal directly and indirectly with the courts and correctional procedures. I commend the recommendations to the minister and shall place them on the record in the few moments remaining to me. I do so because I support the amendment. I should like to see the bill viewed in a parallel way with the Celdic report and the conclusions of that learned group of gentlemen. These recommendations, beginning at recommendation 56, are as follows:

That a provincial cabinet minister be clearly responsible and accountable for the development and enforcement of standards for child protection programs and for the care provided for children who are wards.

That the civil rights of children and their families in child protection proceedings be adequately safeguarded through the provision of legal representation before the courts including the right of review and appeal of wardship decisions.

That provincial governments provide funding and set standards for the establishment in local communities of a range of placement choices including group homes to improve continuity of care to children growing up as wards.

That child welfare agencies develop procedures and maintain liaison with the staff of other community services and provide consultation to improve the identification and management of situations where there is danger of child neglect or abuse.

That the juvenile courts or tribunals for minors be restricted to the 14 to 18-year age group.

That children under the age of 14 be brought before the courts only under child protection legislation.

That only violations of the Criminal Code or provincial or municipal statutes be classed as delinquent behaviour requiring appearance in juvenile court.

That legal counsel be easily and freely available to the offender appearing before the juvenile court and to the parents accused of neglect of a child who is alleged to be in need of protection.

That statute laws governing juvenile courts be amended to include provisions for rights of appeal for written court proceedings and for written documented records of evidence and that abusive preventive detention and indiscriminate and indeterminate commitment to institutions be made impossible by safeguards embodied in the statute laws.

That professional schools training personnel for work with children and adolescents or for the administration of justice include juvenile delinquency in their curriculum.

That juvenile courts and training schools encourage the participation of individuals and community groups in the planning and operation of existing programs to increase the community understanding and support for the needs of the juvenile deliquent.

That the personnel working with the young offender have access to a variety of community education, health and welfare services.

That all juvenile courts use specialists in child and adolescent behaviour to assist in the diagnosis of the problems and needs of the young offender and to formulate rehabilitation programs.

That after-care services for delinquents be given budget priority to increase the number of staff involved in this function and to improve their training.

That admission to a special school, hospital unit or child-care institution take place only following the development by community services of a treatment plan based upon a medical and psychological examination and, as appropriate, an educational assessment.

It is because I am not convinced Bill C-192 has been framed against the background of recommendations such as these, which I wholeheartedly endorse, that I urge members of this House to support the amendment, not for the purpose of killing the bill but for the purpose of taking another look at it. The child is a full child and we must remember that. When we deal with a segment of his life that is deemed to be undesirable by the community, we must remember it is only a part of his life and, in some instances, a very few brief moments out of his entire life. I suggest to the minister that we as legislators have no right to colour that individual's entire life by our reaction to his activities covering just a few moments, no matter how grievous those activities may seem to us, because the child who is delinquent does have mental difficulty. He is in need of our help and is in need of rehabilitation. The last thing he is in need of is a criminal code under which young persons find themselves outside the law for activities of a few brief moments.

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I was discussing this bill a few days ago with a Saskatchewan cabinet minister and he indicated to me that the provincial government was quite concerned about the cost that would be put on the provinces in connection with the corrective services which would be expected of them under this bill. If the minister does not expect to provide some relief to the provinces in this connection, I think he should consider this matter because it is a legitimate worry to the provinces.

In my view this bill is too harsh and its punitive aspects are overemphasized as against the corrective aspects. I have had a number of representations lately concerning the question of abortion which concerns the public at present. I told these people that there is no bill on this matter before the House at the moment but that it was an important issue. One lady said to me that if parents would accept their responsibility and look after their children properly, they would not be such a problem. I must confess I agree with her. I think that many of the problems which we have with children stem from parents who have neglected their responsibilities. It is too bad that we cannot have a bill to punish parents who do not look after their children in the way they should. That is the way I feel about it.

I regret that the action we will take under this bill is directed at the wrong people. Not long ago I read a little item about hippie children. This article suggested that most of the hippie children came from homes where there is no effective father. When I hear some of the suggestions from the women's liberation movement, particularly from some individuals who act as if being a mother is a disgrace to the female sex, I get a little upset—anybody would get upset—and I think there is something wrong with such a father or mother. They should have pride in the fact that they have children, and they should try to raise them in society in the best way they can. Some are better at this than others. Some may not be as well qualified as others. But I really get upset at those who do not try.

I think there should be a bill of rights for children, in the sense that they have a right to good parents. A few days ago when I was in Weyburn I was talking to a lady who takes an active part in the community in Girl Guides activities. I am not saying that Girl Guides is the only community activity in which people can engage to help children, but I suggest it is one of them for parents trying to do the best they can at home. Sometimes the best they can do when a child begins to move out of the home is to help in the community in which they live to ensure that the children take part in good, clean activities.

I was talking to a member of the press gallery who told me about taking his youngster to a ball game. That is probably the best time that this man could invest in his children. It cannot be measured in dollars and cents, but when he looks on his boy when he becomes a young man who is able to solve his problems he will be proud of having invested this time in the child. When I was at a hockey game in Lloydminister I saw there a mounted policeman who was acting as coach to the Lloydminister team. What better way is there to solve police problems with the young people in Lloydminister than for a policeman to be directly involved in an activity of this nature? If you are going to keep young folk out of trouble, that is the best way to do it and thus avoid spending so much time chasing after them. I commend this mountie and others like him who have done similar things.

Despite the best efforts of some parents, one might almost think that some children are born part bronco, as I heard one fellow describe it. They have a streak in them that has to be worked out. Some of them invariably get into trouble. I can think of many whom I have known in the past who have been this type of individual. With a little help from an understanding judge, an understanding policeman or what have you, they have been able to work out their problems and are now good citizens. This is the way it should be.

What makes some young people like this, I am not sure—I am not a psychiatrist or psychologist—but I am aware that many of them are now good citizens. Some times it seems to me that young people who are born with a great deal of energy and nerve are more apt to get into trouble because they have more energy to burn. Perhaps they need more guidance, and occasionally when they get into trouble they need more consideration because they have a special problem. You might ask, why are we concerned? The answer is that if we are not concerned and if we do not solve the problem of these teenagers, the problem will become greater when these young people become adults. I suggest that some of them only grow physically and not emotionally. The figures I have heard quoted in connection with teenage troublemakers who become adult troublemakers and law breakers show that 20 per cent began this way.

One thing that astounded me when I visited a penitentiary was the number of young men there. It disturbs me to see all the energy and hope in these young men locked away from society because they had a problem and obviously could not be let loose. When I talked to some of the officials in the penitentiary I discovered that most of the young men there had a special problem. It might be alcohol, which in itself indicates a problem, or they could not hold a job, they could not get along with their families or friends, or they were separated from their wives. In effect, all these people had emotional problems. These are the kind of people who get into trouble, and these are the kind of young people with whom the act will be dealing.

I have a magistrate friend who has dealt with a great many young people, among others. He described to me some of the cases with which he has dealt. It would wring your heart if you heard about some of the problems these people have and the homes from which some of them come. The law is the only answer to their problem. I do not think that sometimes the law is good enough. These people require understanding and compassion. If we were to interpret this bill in a strictly legalistic sense, in another age the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) would be galloping on his horse through the pages of history, chasing a couple of teenagers, waving his broad axe and shouting "Off with their heads". I do not think the Solicitor General wants to use that type of approach to a problem like this. It seems to me that he is a man of compassion and understanding. If he is going to deal with problems of teenagers, he must be a man of understanding. My hope is that he will withdraw this bill or accept amendments that will give it greater compassion.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I think it is good that this bill has been subjected to what I might call searing criticism and that the minister has seen fit to delay its consideration slightly, obviously as a result of acceptance of the validity of some of the comments that have been made. We have been interested recipients of comments about the bill by the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Mental Health Association, faculties of law, faculties of medicine and interested citizens. I have had an opportunity to look at the Canadian Bar Association brief and to examine a very thoughtful paper which I will share with the minister—perhaps he has already seen it—written by Professor John A. MacDonald of the faculty of law, University of British Columbia.

I wish to make a couple of points in this debate but first I would like to be assured that in committee the bill will receive flexibility of treatment by the government members of the committee, and that the minister and his department will be more receptive to amendments than other ministers have been with respect to other bills. If Parliament had the assurance that the minister genuinely believes there could be a useful amount of input, as the current cliché has it, from members of Parliament at committee stage, I think second reading stage of the bill would move at a faster pace.

There are fundamental problems related to the bill, to its concept, to its drafting and to its language. I think the House would expect that type of assurance from the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer), and I hope I read his mind aright. He has indicated some flexibility by holding up the bill so that interested groups in Canada could comment upon it. But the committee stage is coming, and having been here for some years I am not too optimistic about the receptiveness of the minister and government members of the committee. I hope to be proved wrong and if so I will gladly stand in my place on third reading and say I was wrong.

At the second reading stage of bills all sorts of pleasant statements are made to the effect, "Oh, let the bill get to committee and everything will be all right." My experience is that everything is all wrong when bills go to committee. Government supporters seem to think that government legislation is literally drafted on stone and that it would be a defeat of some sort if a nuance or meaning were changed in any way. I plead with the minister to be flexible with respect to this important piece of legislation and to be ready to accept amendments.

The Canadian Bar Association, Mr. Speaker, has approved the bill in principle. I do not know whether I will be shot down for saying this, but that makes me very nervous. I have been a member of that association for 22 years, all my practising life, and I believe that this of all bills should not be hamstrung by legalistic drafting. Under the provisions of the 1929 bill which, if I am correct, was based on earlier legislation of 1908, juvenile court judges and others dealing with young offenders were enjoined to interpret the bill in a very liberal way. That was a very prominent section of the act, and I think that by and large over the years juvenile court judges, despite all the restrictions they were under—mainly restrictions of money and of support staff for their courts—did their best in the light of their time and day to interpret the statute liberally.

Unfortunately, in many instances and places in Canada there were very few resources and people upon whom juvenile court judges could call. I regret to say that this was the case in my own province when I was Attorney General of New Brunswick. I had to fight the municipal people in the constituency I represented because they did not want to establish a juvenile court district under the terms of the old legislation. But I may say that once they were persuaded, a marked improvement took place in the handling of offences in which young people were involved.

I apologize, Mr. Speaker, for the rambling way in which I am discussing some of the issues. I hope the minister will meet a problem that can become a serious one unless, so to speak, we get a national majority. I would think that 18 years would be an excellent age for the upper limit under the terms of the bill, because many of our provinces are reducing the civil age of majority to 18. There would be a nice meshing and melding, if that term is right, if we adopted that age in this instance, particulary when on one hand we are talking about the civil obligations of a citizen. I can foresee serious difficulties if one province fixes the age at 17 years and another at 18 years. I hope we can overcome that difficulty.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I was attending a committee hearing and did not hear the minister or any government spokesman refer to one important matter. It seems to me there is a curious omission in the bill in that it has nothing whatsoever to do with bail. Presumably this is an oversight that will be rectified at committee stage. One point made in the Canadian Bar Association brief was that there should be a ban on juvenile proceedings' evidence to be used should there be other proceedings involved. The brief makes that point very clearly. There should also be a formula for periodic review of sentences and for periodic review regarding people in respect of whom an insanity finding is made.

I think that this is a very serious gap, if I may put it this way, in the senior law, the Criminal Code, under the provisions of which people are held at the pleasure of the Lieutenant Governor. I must say that at one stage I was in a position to see the operation of this curious provision for a couple of years but did not understand it any more at the end than at the beginning. This may disclose a serious gap in my mental capability. I accept that, but I defy anybody to give me a succinct version of the provisions concerning insane people and the pleasure of the Lieutenant Governor, and so on. Surely this matter could be tidied up in a new bill concerning children.

I know one should not use anecdotes in speeches in the House of Commons, but I once acted for an 11-year old boy who was in a county jail in New Brunswick. He was found there, after four or five days, by a visiting clergyman. Some aspects of this case are not relevant to the debate, but we discovered that the child's family had moved 15 times in his 11 years. It should go without saying that no statute dealing with children and offences committed by children can be a good one if it isolates a child from his parents, if he has them, from his environment and from all aspects of his life literally from birth. This aspect of the bill will interest me greatly as this debate develops and the matter comes before committee.

Another aspect that will interest me is the provision made by the government to ensure that people charged with the responsibility of adjudicating on cases dealt with under the Young Offenders Act will have adequate staff. I am thinking of the whole ambit of people available—experts in the fields of psychiatry, psychology, social work, and so on. If we mean business, if we are not just drafters of a piece of paper, the act has to be given flesh and blood through support staff of the juvenile courts. Unless the government of Canada has made provision for this and the ministers of justice of the provinces have thought it through, I do not think we have done a thorough job.

I should like to make a few comments about the present Juvenile Delinquents Act and its major shortcomings, and make some recommendations. The Juvenile Delinquents Act originated in 1929 and, if my memory is correct, the first act came into force in the early part of this century. It removed children from the jurisdiction of the criminal courts and the adult criminal law and placed them within the jurisdiction of specialized juvenile courts. It made provision for the private trial of juveniles, free of publicity and separate from adult trials. It provided a wide range of reformative sentencing and dispositions focused on the welfare of the individual offender.

Section 38 of the act provides:

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that its purpose may be carried out, namely, that the care and custody and discipline of a juvenile delinquent shall approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by its parents—

We have come a long way in the science of dealing with young people since 1929 and a good deal more information is available. The minister's major concern and the thread which should be running through this act and this debate is that the act should be based upon rehabilitation. If it is not, it will be a hollow debate and a very useless amendment to the law. Professor MacDonald reminds us of some of the shortcomings in the Juvenile Delinquents Act. It was still possible to prosecute children as young as seven years. People were concerned about the all-encompassing definition of "delinquency." One could be caught in that wide web if one were guilty of the most minor offence under a municipal bylaw. Closely related to this point was concern that the Juvenile Delinquents Act placed only minimal restriction on committal of children to training schools, thus opening the door to punitive sentencing practices.

I once appeared before a magistrate on behalf of a young person who had stolen a jacknife from the five and ten store. The youngster had been in jail for the night and finally his parents called for help. When I saw the magistrate he said, "I am not going to let the boy out because he has not cried yet." I asked him what section that came under, and of course he had no answer. This is only one of many examples of what has more eloquently been called "opening the door to punitive sentencing practices."

I have noted that many juvenile courts lack community resources. I have made this point earlier. Unless the resources of the community are part of the whole thrust, we are really not doing anything very useful. Another concern is that the original intention of the Juvenile Delinquents Act was to avoid stigmatizing young people as criminals. But the word "delinquency" in itself became a stigma. I am sure the minister recognizes these and other problems relating to the present act.

Mr. Speaker, I could make other comments but presumably there are other speakers. What I have said this evening has been of a very general nature, but I should like to repeat two or three points. First, I hope we can have an assurance from the minister that he will accept amendments and be receptive to them no matter from which party they should come. Second, I hope it is the minister's intention to provide sufficient qualified people. Third, I think it should be possible to fix a set age, perhaps 18 as has been adopted by many of the provinces.

One point which I am sure has been noted by many lawyers on the government side of the House is the provision for delay of sentence until the person charged is 21 years of age. Presumably if the act were changed an accused would be sentenced at 18. I cannot imagine where that concept came from. I hope we shall have an explanation of it and, more importantly, that we shall have it quickly and that this provision will be removed as soon as possible.

The minister has heard in this debate that the Parliament of Canada is genuinely interested in reforming the law concerning children. I am one of those who share the general view that it is high time we were considering this topic. I am glad that a place has been found in the parliamentary timetable for us to deal with the bill. I conclude by saying that after the bill has gone to committee I hope it will be unrecognizable as a result of useful changes which will have been made by members of this House and many others who are interested in this reform.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the members of our party have moved the amendment that the bill be not now read a second time but that it be referred back to a task force for further study. Since the bill first came before the House almost four months have passed. I think the fact that we have had such a vigorous response from various sections of the public is an indication that our wisest course at this juncture of our proceedings would be to support the amendment so that some of the obvious difficulties of the bill as it now reads may be eliminated.

It is not only members of the House who have carefully analyzed and diagnosed the chief defects of the bill. As has been indicated by many speakers during the course of the debate, we have heard from responsible groups such as the Canadian Mental Health Association, which because of its experience in the field of human behaviour is especially competent in these matters. We have heard also from lawyers, both as individuals and as an association. I am entering the debate, Mr. Speaker, because I have heard from a group which, I submit, should be listened to with particular care, the magistrates who will have responsibility for administering this new Young Offenders Act.

Some of these magistrates have had long experience in the area of juvenile offences. I am about to quote a comment by a juvenile court judge which I think ought to command considerable weight as we move to remove the obvious defects of the bill and bring about a situation, in terms of legislative reform, which I am sure the majority of members of this House most devoutly wish to achieve. Listen to these words, Mr. Speaker: "This whole proposed act is a ghastly piece of legislation, retrograde in its concept and will render unworkable my court as to handling of cases of young offenders". Those are strong words from someone who has considerable experience in these matters.

I have followed the subject of penal reform generally for many years both in the adult area and in the juvenile area. As a matter of fact, one of my first opportunities after graduating from college was working in the police courts and prisons in the city of Toronto and the city of Montreal. This was at a time when the attitude toward adult criminals and juvenile delinquents, to use a term used in the Juvenile Deliquents Act of 1929, was one of punishment rather than that of seeking remedial measures.

I think hon. members will be aware that concern over the primitive approach in penology in Canada became an issue around the mid-1930s. As a result, the government of Canada of the day instituted the Archambault commission which brought down a progressive report on the state of penology around 1938. The Archambault report because a sort of guideline for all those—and they appeared in increasing numbers—who began to express concern over the lack of reform in our penal system. Mr. Alex Edmison was one of the pioneers in the field. He still is one of the leading authorities. As hon. members know, he is head of the department of penology and criminology at Ottawa University today. In those earlier days he was working for the John Howard Society in Toronto.

Not until the early 1960s did real action begin to take shape in dealing with the long delayed reform in the treatment of offenders in Canada. If I may deal specifically with the special problem of juveniles, in 1961 the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs was set up to make a thorough examination of the treatment of juvenile offenders, or juvenile delinquents as was the acceptable term then. That committee sat for about four years before reporting. It produced a progressive report based on the gradual accumulation of knowledge on the subject that had emerged during the 1940s, the 1950s and the 1960s. Outstanding leadership was provided by the minister of justice of the day, Hon. Davie Fulton, in getting these initiatives under way.

It must be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that there have been revolutionary developments in the social sciences during this period. The social sciences, be they psychology or sociology or any of their respective branches, had moved forward at a rapid rate, particularly in the thirties, forties and the sixties. As a result of breakthroughs in the social sciences there was a whole new body of knowledge, an entirely new approach to the problem of treating juvenile offenders.

It was encouraging to one who had a long and continuing interest in these matters to find that the spirit of reform had been captured by the justice committee that was called into being to deal with this matter. There was also a hopeful and progressive note in the discussions that followed the tabling of the report in 1965. It appeared that the legislation that would inevitably be brought in would overcome the deficiencies of the then Juvenile Delinquents Act which had become increasingly glaring since it was first enacted in 1929. I think all members of Parliament optimistically looked forward to a real breakthrough.

During this debate hon. members have referred to the deficiencies of the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1929. For the purpose of my argument I will review some of the major points. I freely admit, and I think others with some knowledge in the field will agree, that the act of 1929 was a breakthrough, at least from the standpoint of knowledge that was then available on the subject. For the first time it made a distinct point of separating adult offenders from youthful offenders. It removed the juvenile delinquent from the Criminal Code. It established special court procedures more suitable to meeting special problems of the youth of Canada who found themselves in difficulty with the law. There were deficiencies that became increasingly obvious as time went by. The main deficiency was the fact that the Juvenile Delinquents Act extended down to the tender age of seven. Some of the treatment that was meted out in the juvenile courts to children of that tender age was hardly in line with the knowledge we have with respect to child psychology.

I do not know why the age of seven was established in the original act. There is an old saying that as the limb in bent, so is the tree inclined. Perhaps that was the basis for it. There is another saying, give me a child until he is seven years of age and I will establish the pattern of personality for the rest of his days. These tales purported to be an understanding of child psychology at that time. It became obvious that this was hardly adequate to meet with the current situation. We became aware that the term "delinquency" was too embracing. There had to be more flexibility in dealing with the various behaviour categories and misdemeanours of young people. One of the greatest weaknesses was the emphasis on reform schools or, as they are called in the act, training schools. Herein lies the chief weakness of our whole system of penal reform in Canada.

This is still shockingly true with regard to the adult level. Our present institutions, jails, penal institutions or whatever you wish to call them are more attuned to the practice of penology that existed in the nineteenth century than the requirements of the twentieth century. I am sure hon. members will agree that our present jails might better be described as black holes of Calcutta or institutions very much like the black hole of Calcutta. I know this applies in my own city of Brandon. They are not meeting the demands for reform and opportunities to acquire skills and education that will make it possible for adult offenders to return to the community as useful citizens. In the final analysis, this is the purpose of incarceration in penal institutions. Everyone agrees that something should be done but we do not have the facilities available in the form of buildings and trained staff.

Those who have the responsibility of being jailers, as they are still called, do their best under the circumstances, but we are still far from achieving the ideal situation where the people in charge of our penal institutions have thorough and adequate preparation in the social sciences to place them in the position of being able to adequately deal with the problem. This situation exists in the adult penal institution and it also exists in our training or reform schools. We are aware that throughout this country there are reform and training schools that were resorted to with far too much frequency under the Juvenile Delinquents Act. They are quite inadequate to deal with the more flexible approach to the treatment of young offenders that is required if we are to implement the spirit of penal reform as it was presented in the report of the justice committee, and as it has been emphasized by an increasing number of citizens across this country.

I wish to deal with another point with respect to the changed circumstances. I think hon. members will agree that our juvenile court judges have a much more sympathetic approach to the remedial and therapeutic aspect of dealing with offenders than was the case hitherto. The fact that I have received strong protestations from juvenile court judges with respect to certain clauses in the bill is an indication that our judges are now trained and skilled in the social sciences. They demand an act that will be in the spirit of modern penology rather than, as was expressed in the very strong statement of the Canadian Mental Health Association, in the form of a criminal law for children.

I believe the minister is now aware—he has certainly been made aware of it since this bill was first presented to the House—that the measure as it stands fails to introduce the reforms we hoped would be realized. A statement which has come from a juvenile court judge supports the view which has been put forward by members of the opposition. He said: "This bill must be drastically amended or defeated." I am sure hon. members favour the more positive of these actions. We would like to see the bill amended in such a way that it would do what has been desired for so long, that is, accomplish reform and overcome the deficiencies of the present act. This can only come about if substantial amendments are brought before the House and approved.

If the House supports the motion that the bill be not now read a second time but that it be referred back to the committee for the necessary amendments to be made, our difficulty will be overcome. I am sure that members from all sides of the House, working together, will be able to bring about the changes necessary to deal with some of the more obvious weaknesses of the legislation.

The minister himself, when he introduced the bill, told us it was not perfect. That was an understatement. Responsible people all across Canada have pointed out that it is not only imperfect but that it is unsatisfactory, that in fact it moves away from reform rather than in the direction desired. To support this argument I would outline some of the major defects in the bill before us. In the first place, the very recommendations of the committee set up in 1961 by the then Minister of Justice Hon. Davie Fulton, are denied by some of the major provisions in this bill. It fails to remove completely the possibility of using convictions against juveniles for future reference. This is a fundamental weakness, particularly when one realizes that a child 10 years of age is placed in exactly the same category as a juvenile of 17 years.

It is obvious there should be more flexibility in dealing with offences by a child of the tender age of 10 who, under the terms of this bill can be treated in the same way as a juvenile between the ages of 14 and 17. This is another obvious weakness of the legislation. The bill is too rigid, and this opinion has been expressed by magistrates who have the responsibility of administering the law. Moreover, the bill relies too extensively upon the philosophy of referring offenders to retraining schools for reform so that they may be brought back into the mainstream of community life. It is hardly necessary to repeat the argument that there are not adequate facilities in Canada to enable this to be done effectively. In any case, the whole idea of separation from family and community goes contrary to the emphasis which has been placed recently on probation and suspended sentences when dealing with young offenders.

It is just a year ago that the former Solicitor General led a group of members to my city of Brandon to inaugurate a significant extension of the parole service in western Manitoba. I can still hear the ringing words of the speech he made at that time. This was to be the new approach to dealing with young offenders—not to incarcerate them in jails and training schools but to provide for their rehabilitation within the bosom of their homes and communities. Yet for some unexpected reason Bill C-192 harks right back to the form of treatment which was criticized in the old Juvenile Delinquents Act.

Perhaps the greatest weakness of the bill is that it still places its greatest emphasis on punishment rather than on reform. Under one of its clauses it would be possible to incarcerate a child of 10 years of age, if he were found guilty of a serious offence, until he was 21 and then bring him before a court of law to be dealt with under the provisions of the Criminal Code. Obviously, this is a reversion to nineteenth century penology. Anyone who has worked in this field knows that training schools, reform schools, jails, penitentiaries, are training schools for crime. Time and time again those who are exposed to the atmosphere of such institutions become recidivists for life.

These are some of the major criticisms to be directed against the bill before us. For these reasons, and others, it should be referred back to the committee in order that we may bring in amendments which would restore the spirit of reform inherent in the recommendations of the justice committee. If the House would vote accordingly, we should be able to work together in the interest of a more positive and humane penal system.

Mr. McCleave: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I think there is general agreement among all parties that the speech we have just heard will close the debate on the amendment of my hon. friend from Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and that the vote will take place immediately after the question period tomorrow.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it would be agreeable to defer the division until tomorrow when orders are called.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is understood, however, that the question will now be put and a determination made as to whether we should like a vote so that this will not have to be done tomorrow. After that has been decided, Mr. Speaker, I have a question to raise about what we do during the remaining minutes before ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair understands that the question will be put now and that if the House determines that there shall be a division, the division will be the first item under Orders of the Day tomorrow when those orders are called. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In accordance with the special order made a moment or two ago, the recorded division will be taken as the first item of business when Orders of the Day are called tomorrow.

YUKON MINERALS ACT

ADMINISTRATION, ACQUISITION AND RECORDING OF CLAIMS, ETC.

On the order: Government orders:

March 5, 1971—Resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development that Bill C-187, an act respecting minerals in the Yukon Territory, be now read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development:

And on the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Nielsen, seconded by Mr. Aiken—That all the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"this bill be not now read a second time, but that it be read a second time this day six months hence."

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Earlier this evening the Government House Leader did indicate to me that if the previous debate ended we would move to this item. What we did not discuss was the time of night at which this might happen. It is now five minutes to ten. If one goes back to Hansard for March 5 when the debate was last before the House, one finds that the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) had the floor. He had spoken for 30 minutes and his speech was interrupted by the clock. If we call the debate now, the hon. member gets only five minutes and another five minutes tomorrow. Therefore, I wonder whether we should not now call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed to call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—ABOLITION OF SALES TAX ON SALE OF CONSTRUCTION MATERIALS

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, during the oral question period, I asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if the government was considering rescinding the sales tax on building materials, as requested by the Canadian Construction Association.

According to the spokesmen of this Association, this tax is unfair and, in their opinion, the same arguments are valid today. Indeed, not only does it add to the cost of badly needed construction, but it also depresses a vital industry.

Mr. Speaker, this tax was imposed in 1965 or 1966, I think, and has been in force ever since. According to the then Minister of Finance, the tax was necessary to fight inflation. To this end, we had to slow down housing starts and then impose a tax of 11 per cent on building materials. This tax therefore contributed to increase construction costs and in general the cost of living. In increasing the cost of living, housing costs went up to the extent that Canadians were barely able to find accommodation.

In reason of this hike in prices and the interest rate of the CMHC, the government of that day, like this government, voted huge amounts to boost housing starts, but through building sky high barriers. Ridiculous interest rates of 10 to 12 per cent were established by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation and by banks or other financial institutions which lend money for residential construction.

Such high interest rates, added to the increase in the cost of building materials and services, have forced municipalities to increase taxes for those who would have been able to build houses for themselves.

The government, however, has stated on many occasions that agencies had to be created to help low income people to become home-owners. But the only thing that has been done to this end was to extend the repayment period to 50 years, from 25 years as it was previously. Thus homeowners are paying five or six times the price of their houses.

The only concern of this present administration is to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. In doing this, Mr. Speaker, we help the large financing institutions become still more powerful and the big financiers fleece the poor. Indeed, it has become just about impossible to build a house today without assuming a 40 to 50-year indebtedness and paying five or six times its price.

Any man is entitled to own his home, his furnishings, his personal belongings, his car, the tools of his trade and also the required consumer goods.

Personal ownership of such property allows man to plunge his roots into some piece of land and there to organize his own universe and that of his family. That ownership is his form of communion with the physical universe.

Mr. Speaker, if life is a journey, man must be able to put into port as often as his activity permits. That port must be his own and must not belong to someone else. There he rests, there he renews his physical and moral strength and prepares for the next day's progress.

He can carry out his responsibilities only by taking root in a soil which is his and of which he can dispose as he sees fit. If property in itself is a good thing, if the need to own something is a human one and if, moreover, ownership is a guarantee of freedom and independence, property should not be taken from those who own it, and transferred to a state which will make improper use of it.

Mr. Speaker, personal interest is and remains the most powerful driving force of human activity. From the very moment when it is reserved to a small number, when a vast majority of citizens are condemned to work without interest, the government is negating its principles, is consecrating a society of masters and slaves and not a society of human beings.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker—

• (10:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in posing his question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) during the oral question period today, regarding the sales tax on building materials, the hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) reiterated a representation which has been made on numerous occasions, both within and without the House, by many hon. members and by persons, firms and corporations engaged in the construction industry, not the least of which has been that very effective body, the Canadian Construction Association.

I should like to point out that, strictly speaking, allusions to the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials are misleading. There is not a particular tax on building materials; rather, there is a general sales tax in Canada on manufactured and processed goods. What is really being suggested is that building materials be exempted from that general sales tax. From the revenue standpoint, the sales tax applicable to building materials means $300 million to $350 million annually. Possible options to make up this amount would be a 1½ per cent increase in the sales tax on other goods or a 6½ per cent increase in personal income tax.

Many who have commented on this subject have limited themselves to the tax on building materials for residential construction. That exemption would result in a revenue reduction of $130 million to $150 million. Since the tax does not apply to such residential construction costs as land, labour, overhead and profit, its actual impact on housing costs is in the 4 per cent to 5 per cent range. I can assure the hon. member and others that their representations have been heard. However, any change in taxation must, in the practice of this Parliament, be disclosed in a budget bill or in a budget speech and cannot be indicated in response to a question even by one sufficiently interested to wait until this late hour.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—REDUCTION OF PASSENGER SERVICE IN NORTHERN ONTARIO—SUGGESTED HOLDING OF PUBLIC HEARINGS BY TRANSPORT COMMITTEE

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, on February 12, as recorded at page 3329 of Hansard, I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) whether it was his intention to make representations to Canadian National Railways in order to have them change their decision to cancel the service provided by trains Nos. 7 and 8. The minister's reply—which I must say in all fairness was uncharacteristic—was a non-reply. I am not prepared to let the issue die in that fashion.

The cancellation of trains 7 and 8 by the CNR demonstrates that the publicly-owned company, without having made a policy statement to the same effect, intends to follow the same path as the CPR. That policy is to abandon on a piecemeal basis every unprofitable service without regard to the public interest. Moreover, it is apparent under the present regulations governing rail line and service abandonment that no one can win an argument with the railroads in respect of the profitability or lack of profitability of a service, because the railroads are permitted to isolate that service for consideration whereas the only real way one can calculate profitability is in relation to the entire system, the entire network.

The obvious next step in this process of abandonment of passenger service by the CNR is the downgrading of trains 1 and 2, making them make more stops in order to service communities which would otherwise be cut off due to the abandonment of trains 7 and 8, thereby increasing the running time of trains 1 and 2, thereby making the service less attractive for long distance passengers, thereby decreasing the number of passengers, thereby decreasing the profitability of the service and thereby making an application for its abandonment inevitable.

The minister's silence on this question is, I believe, eloquent, especially in light of the fact that he is not often so, as I mentioned earlier. His silence signifies his willingness to acquiesce in the decision of the CNR to abandon its service, his willingness to see rail passenger service in Canada become a thing of the past. If this is not the case, I wish he or his representative would tell us so in plain language, and at the same time tell us what specific actions the department intends to take in order to stop the process.

At this point in any argument it is customary for a minister to retire behind the screen of the independence of the CNR and the CTC. This stand is completely unacceptable to me and it is entirely indefensible. If the government is not satisfied with the actions of a board or a Crown corporation, it has the power to replace the people running it. Therefore, inaction by the government in the final analysis indicates acceptance. Moreover, such boards, commissions and corporations, their methods of operation, their terms of reference are established by acts of Parliament and can be changed by similar acts if they are found to be unacceptable. I am not saying that doing this would be easy; I am saying it is possible if the government is really in disagreement with the policies.

Finally, I find the whole process of placing the power to make decisions—and it is being done increasingly—in key areas of public policy into the hands of quasi-independent boards and commissions highly distasteful. The fact that this government and others have pursued such a process is one of the major reasons why the institution of Parliament has fallen into public disrepute. The proliferation of boards and commissions is one of the reasons why this House so infrequently deals with questions of moment, questions directly relating to the concern of the people. All such questions have been placed in the hands of boards and commissions by politicians afraid to exercise the powers and to assume the responsibilities they have been elected to exercise and to assume.

The boards and commissions, as the current mess in transportation serves well to indicate, add nothing to our governmental process. Indeed, they detract by making our elected institutions less relevant, our elected officials less responsive and our public policies less coherent. Indeed, public policies are no longer worthy of the name; they are rather a pot-pourri of ad hockery. Nowhere is this more true than in the realm of public transportation. Nowhere is the situation in more urgent need of remedy.

I call upon the government to meet its responsibilities squarely, to stop hiding behind the CTC and the CNR and to give this country the national transportation policy for which it is crying. So doing will involve making, from time to time, unpopular and difficult decisions—but that is what we were elected to do. We certainly were not elected to appoint people to make those decisions for us. We were not elected to remove important decisions from the political arena, but to make those decisions ourselves as best we can and then to stand before the electorate and be judged.

It is within that context that I again ask through you, Mr. Speaker, the minister or the person designated to respond for him what he intends to do about the cancellation of trains 7 and 8 and the policy of the railroads to abandon passenger service. Does he intend to protest, to use his authority, or does he agree? If he agrees with such a policy, why? Those are the questions we all want answered. At least we want to be told that the government will no longer permit the railroads to continue their policy of retrenchment. At least tell us that the government is insisting that the railroads engage in research, in co-operation with the government, into ways of improving public transportation in an effort to combat the congestion and the pollution which has resulted from overdependence upon the automobile. I hope that in the reply to be given there will be an answer to some of my questions.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond to the question raised by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Rowland). The manner in which subsidies are considered for rail service in various parts of the country is of concern to a goodly number of hon. members. The hon. member raised his question initially on February 12. It was at a time when considerable interest was being voiced by northern Ontario members concerning the operation of CN trains 7 and 8. In fact, I recall very well appearing on the "late show" on January 18, 1971, to respond to the very forceful and sincere appeal made by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner).

There was expressed that evening a very real sense of frustration, which I tried with all seriousness to allay. While not everyone was satisfied with the outcome of that adjournment proceeding, it did give the hon. member a chance to express his views and an excellent opportunity to myself to emphasize and clarify the guidelines to which the Canadian Transport Commission must adhere under the Railway Act. Subsequent to these representations the Canadian Transport Commission directed the CNR to set up a new rail-liner passenger service in northern Ontario and I understand that this new service has received fairly favourable response from the people living between Capreol and Nakina.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Selkirk on February 12 asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) if he would make direct representation to the CNR in an effort to persuade it to reverse that decision. The decision in question was one that the Canadian Transport Commission had made, and it was required to do so under the act. If the hon. member has received any complaints, I can assure him that the CTC stands ready to consider any instance where people have not been accommodated on CN trains Nos. 1 and 2 since the retirement on February 1 of trains 7 and 8.

Also, the hon. member may wish to take advantage later this month of the presence of CNR officials before the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. The president of the Canadian Transport Commission has already given evidence on its operations to that committee, and I do not know why the hon. member did not appear to make his comments there. The hon. member has raised some further points in his presentation this evening which I will be only too pleased to refer to the Minister of Transport for consideration.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—MID-CANADA PROGRAM ON "WEEKEND"—ACTION TO RECTIFY ALLEGED DISHONEST PRESENTATION

Mr. Jean-R. Roy (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, March 14, the CBC "Weekend" television show aired a program called "Mid-Canada Documentary." Such a public affairs program could be expected to be objective, factual and reflecting a true situation. But oh no, not with the CBC! It was another of those periodic attempts by the "Weekend" producers to increase viewer ratings by creating impact.

The distortion, the negative approach, the dishonesty of the presentation, the imbalance of reason and judgment were just unbelievable—interviews with half-sloshed participants, with a welfare case who would rather receive welfare than go on a course at $110 a week, researchers who spent a large portion of their time in local bars, researchers who were looking specifically for poor people and finding some as they would anywhere, looking specifically for drunks and finding some as they would anywhere, for old houses—not the new ones, which they avoided—for failing businesses, not finding any and forgetting the prosperous ones. These were the ingredients that went into the program.

Was the researcher paid for his barroom time? Was he indeed paid overtime? I am told that many knowledgeable and interested citizens were interviewed and completely discarded as being too positive. What about the newspaper editor? What about the trust company officer? What about the Chamber of Commerce manager? What about the businessmen? They were all interviewed, but not two seconds of those interviews were shown on the program. Is it recognized as bad policy for the CBC to get an objective picture in these circumstances? Is this typical CBC policy? And what is the motive and the purpose of these distortions? Why was the local CBC affiliate not interviewed? Why not the local politicians? Why not the local member of Parliament? Do we know too many facts, and are we too objective to fit into the CBC plans for controversy, or the plans of their young researcher who arrived in Canada just a short time but full of wisdom about northern Ontario and, of course, with a large capacity for booze consumption.

Mr. Speaker, the people who live in our area do so, not because they were unfortunate enough to be born there, as was stupidly indicated, but by free choice. We want the quality of life that is ours, the bounties of nature that are there, the ease of family life which we enjoy, the human values which have been destroyed in the large cities but strongly persist in our areas, in addition to the less important adequate physical facilities that are available.

I immediately sent a telegram to Mr. Pierre Juneau, chairman of the CRTC, as I am sure did many other viewers. It read as follows:

> Weekend program Mid-Canada terrible distortion of actual situation Timmins Kapuskasing. Please prevent showing on Radio Canada Tuesday and investigate motives, methods and sources of information.

The answer I received was as follows:

> Thank you for your telegram re Mid-Canada program. The commission is most concerned by suggestion that it should intervene to censor a public affairs program. The commission is of the view that blocking presentation of individual programs by the CRTC represents very extreme measure. The normal procedure of the CRTC in case of bona fide specific complaints re possible unfair and dishonest biases in broadcasting programs is to request the tapes and after judicial consideration take necessary steps to maintain principles of the Broadcasting Act re balanced opportunity for expression of differing views. Recommend you contact the station concerned to express your views and if program in fact in your view is biased, you may wish to consider requesting from the station an opportunity to express your views in reply.
> Pierre Juneau, chairman, Canadian Radio Television Commission.

Mr. Speaker, the program in question was an absurd distortion of the situation and needs very extreme measures to rectify the wrong that has been done. I would strongly suggest and urge that the CRTC review the tapes and ascertain the facts and that after their judicial consideration they take the necessary steps to maintain the principles of the Broadcasting Act. The local TV station would gladly express the views of myself or others regarding the facts, but there is no need; the people in our area know what the facts are and are aware of the distortions. The viewers outside our area, in the rest of Canada, are the ones who must be given the facts. We therefore request with all sincerity that the CBC network allow a group of our responsible citizens to be participants on a network program that would clearly establish the true facts, the proper perspective and rectify the damage as much as can now be done.

A very grave injustice has been perpetrated, Mr. Speaker, and with all the citizens in our area I have every reason to expect that both the CRTC and the CBC will see to it that it is corrected at the earliest opportunity. I have already received numerous very bitter representations regarding this incident. They are available for all interested parties to see. I am hopeful that justice will be done.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Timmins (Mr. Roy) has already read into the record his telegram to the chairman of the CRTC and the reply dated March 16, so I shall not elaborate on that. I think it in large measure reflects the response of the CRTC. I may add that the CRTC has not yet had an opportunity to evaluate the particular program, but the tape is being requested. I should also like to report to the House and the hon. member that CBC officials have advised me as follows:

> The corporation appreciates the fact that all who watch its programs such as the Mid-Canada documentary presented on CBC "Weekend", Sunday, March 14, will not agree with everything that is said. However, the CBC is satisfied that this presentation was made honestly and was neither distorted nor derogatory. The program was carefully planned and took nearly two years to research and indeed it dealt in a very sympathetic way with the problems of mid-Canada.
> It might be useful to repeat the closing statement of the program which was as follows: "Helping the people of mid-Canada means helping local businessmen get the money they need to take advantage of the opportunities they perceived. It means helping Indians and whites get the education they need to take over the good jobs that do exist in mid-Canada."

• (10:20 p.m.)

Beyond that, Mr. Speaker, may I remind the hon. member that a number of the questions he raised in the course of his remarks can be, and no doubt will be, put to the CBC when they appear before the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts.

Mr. Roy (Timmins): It will be too late.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 24, 1971

The House met at 2 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HORNER—REGULARITY OF ALL-NIGHT SITTING BY COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise at this time and raise a question of privilege affecting all members of the House. Last evening, unknown to other members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, when the meeting was called at 8 p.m. there was a firm intention by the government members on that committee to sit until the committee was exhausted.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Horner: I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski):

That the question of the validity and regularity of the sittings of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, which began at 8 p.m. in the afternoon of Tuesday, the 23rd of March, 1971, and continued thereafter until 7.30 a.m. o'clock in the forenoon—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

An hon. Member: It was an idiotic thing to do.

Mr. Horner:

—of the 24th day of March, 1971, and of the proceedings at such sittings be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I might explain that there was no prior consultation with the other parties.

Whether you like it or not, Mr. Speaker, you are directly affected because Standing Order 88 reads:

The hours of attendance of the respective officers of this House, and the extra clerks employed during the session, shall be fixed from time to time by Mr. Speaker.

Prior to eight o'clock the clerks employed in the Standing Committee on Agriculture were all notified that there was going to be an all-night sitting. Having been duly notified, they arranged among themselves to work in two shifts, some to work up to midnight and some to carry on until the committee adjourned.

With regard to when a committee shall adjourn, Beauchesne's Fourth Edition, citation 303, section 3, reads:

• (2:10 p.m.)

Committees should be regularly adjourned from day to day—

The Standing Committee on Agriculture has not been regularly adjourned for a long time. The citation continues:

—though the Chairman is frequently allowed to arrange the day and hour of sitting, but this can be done only with the general consent of the committee.

There was no general consent. I wish to draw particular attention to the words, "the Chairman is frequently allowed to arrange". To me they suggest that there should be prior arrangement or prior consultation. That is the whole purpose of steering committees, they are set up to advise on the arranging of committee sittings and what witnesses ought to appear. No steering committee arranged the all-night sitting of the agricultural committee. It was done by a secret method.

Mr. Greene: The hon. member can't stand the heat.

Some hon. Members: The same old bunch.

Mr. Horner: May I refer to Standing Order 65(10), found at page 72 of the Standing Orders, which clearly states:

In a standing or special committee, the Standing Orders of the House shall be observed so far as may be applicable, except the Standing Orders as to the seconding of motions, limiting the number of times of speaking and the length of speeches.

In that connection may I also quickly refer to Standing Order 2 which relates to hours of sittings of the House. I do not think that the question of the hours that a committee can sit and when it shall adjourn is specifically spelled out, either in Beauchesne or in the Standing Orders. But surely, Mr. Speaker, in employing staff and in guarding the privileges of each and all members of the House, one of the basic principles and duties under our parliamentary system is to protect the rights of minorities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Under our parliamentary system we must protect minority rights so that minorities may be heard and listened to in a frame of mind that is conducive to good legislation.

I contend that last evening a number of major amendments were suggested and moved in the committee and that on two particular occasions the Chairman ruled out amendments without even hearing argument as to why they should be accepted as being in order. He automatically ruled them out of order.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Horner: He ruled rather authoritatively and in a manner unbecoming of a chairman who is, in essence, a replica of the Speaker of the House.

An hon. Member: Impeach him.

Mr. Horner: I contend that the words, "general consent" in citation 303 (3) of Beauchesne's Fourth Edition means, in essence, unanimous consent, and that the words, "the Chairman is frequently allowed to arrange the day and hour of sitting", means that the day and hours of sitting should be prearranged by a steering committee. In the present case this was not done and was not even attempted to be done.

May I refer to one other section of the Standing Orders which provides that it is the duty of the Speaker of the House and the chairman of a committee at all times to keep proper decorum within the House and within the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Early this morning, unknown to me or to other members of the committee, food was sent in and at four o'clock food was consumed while the committee proceedings were going on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, this may be all right for the type of sitting that went on last night but I am sure it has never been allowed in the House and I do not believe it should be allowed in committees.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I suggest that the whole question of the adjournment of committee sittings and the disgraceful and unprecedented proceedings that took place last night should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for examination.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member gave the Chair notice of his intention to raise a question of privilege. The House has heard the hon. member for Crowfoot and the Chair has listened attentively to the submissions he has made.

As hon. members know, it has not been the practice to allow a general debate on the matter until such time as a ruling has been made on whether there is a prima facie case. The exception, of course, is when an hon. member is personally involved and his conduct is questioned by a proposed motion submitted to the House by an hon. member who raises a question of privilege.

I have some doubts whether the Minister of Agriculture is in any way involved in this matter. It is my understanding that he is not a member of that committee. At the same time, the Chair is not aware who sits on committees from day to day because there are frequent changes. I am simply assuming that the minister is not a member. Perhaps the minister might speak briefly and indicate how he is involved in the question of privilege, because there really should not be a debate until the matter has been intensively and seriously considered by the Chair.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might apologize for one comment I made.

An hon. Member: You didn't say anything at all.

Mr. Horner: I will be very brief. I referred to the chairman of the committee. The chairman recommended to the committee that we adjourn some time between ten thirty and eleven o'clock; he then left the committee and it was taken over by the vice-chairman. I may have implied that the Chairman had ruled authoritatively. I must say that the Chairman was very considerate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): At the outset, Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to Your Honour's inquiry as to how this question of privilege may affect me. In his opening comments the hon. member for Crowfoot suggested that the question of privilege he was raising affected all members of the House. If that is so, then whether I am a member of the committee or not seems to me to be irrelevant.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister should find a better reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that it would not be conducive to a proper proceeding of the House if every member of the House considered himself to be involved and wanted to participate in the debate on this question of privilege. I do not think that is a sufficient reason. I certainly do not want to be negative in this regard. If the minister can quickly and briefly indicate what his personal involvement is in the question of privilege, he may proceed.

Some hon. Members: Tell us.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, in addition to the reason I have just given, I am sure Your Honour will agree that, on a matter affecting a bill that I have sponsored in the House and its progress through the Standing Committee on Agriculture, before which I have been called as a witness, it is obvious why I should have a great and deep interest in the proceedings of that committee. I do not wish to particularly argue that point, Mr. Speaker. I want to assist Your Honour, as briefly as I can, in considering the alleged prima facie case of privilege that has been placed before you.

Some opinions have been expressed in the course of raising the question of privilege which are not facts. I am not suggesting that opinions and facts are necessarily synonymous. For example, the hon. member has said that under Standing Order 88 it is your responsibility, Mr. Speaker, to notify the staff and other officials concerned, and he questioned whether or not this had been done. I do not know whether you or your officers informed the staff who were serving that committee, but I do say that that question has no relevance whatever.

The other point mentioned by the hon. member for Crowfoot was that some secret manoeuvring took place, which was doing damage to the business of this House—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Olson: —with respect to the motions to adjourn which were moved in the committee. There were at least eight or ten or perhaps more motions to adjourn the committee between 8 p.m. last night and 7.30 a.m. this morning, and there was nothing secret about any one of them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It is a simple one. Is this question now being debated? May we all get into it?

Mr. Speaker: That is precisely the point the Chair made a moment ago, and I have made this point before. Certainly, if the minister were allowed to debate the matter, every other member of the House should be allowed to participate. I am suggesting very simply and very humbly to the minister and to other hon. members that we have established a practice which appears to be working fairly well by allowing a member to state his position. If a member is personally involved, or if his conduct is impugned, I have always thought it would be the desire of other members of the House that the member concerned be given an opportunity to explain his position, but that the matter should rest there, and that the Speaker should then be given an opportunity to look at the matter objectively in order to determine whether there is a prima facie case of privilege. Should the Chair decide that there is, members could debate the matter if they wish to do so.

It seems to me that if I hear argument from the minister I must certainly hear from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and from any other hon. member who wishes to participate.

Mr. Olson: I was attempting to be helpful by setting before Your Honour for your consideration some opinions which might not correspond with the opinions that were expressed by the hon. member for Crowfoot. However, I can see the difficulty you are having and I will certainly be very brief.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the minister and to all hon. members that the practice we have followed has been helpful to all of us in the conduct of our business and I should think that the argument which the minister is making now will not be helpful. I think the House has to trust the Chair to look at all aspects of the matter. The hon. member for Crowfoot is prepared to do this; he has left the matter in the hands of the Speaker. If the minister pursues the procedural argument he is making I see no reason why other members should not be given an opportunity to do so. The hon. member for Crowfoot has submitted the matter to the attention of the Chair and he has indicated what his motion would be if it were ruled by the Chair that there is a prima facie case of privilege. I recognize that this is a serious matter and one which deserves the full attention of the Chair. My thought is that the question should be allowed to rest for the moment until I have consulted with the Clerk of the committee and with the officials of the House and advisers of the Chair. In due course I shall indicate to the hon. member whether I feel this is the kind of question which should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. It seems to me this is a much more reasonable way in which to handle the matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I have been under the impression that it is usual when a prima facie case of privilege is being alleged to hear some comment, perhaps very brief comment—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that is not the practice and it has not been the practice for some time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be allowed on motions to raise a question of order. There has been some discussion, though not as complete as I would have liked, with House Leaders of the other parties and I think there might be agreement to the House making an order to transfer from this supply period to the next supply period the remaining motion of non-confidence that would have been moved on tomorrow's opposition day. If it is agreeable I would ask that this motion be transferred to opposition day in the next supply period.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions and I think we all agree to this request.

Questions

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the proposal is that instead of having a vote tomorrow night on the motion that will be put forward, we expect, by the official opposition, an additional motion in the next period will be a voting motion, and that the number of motions in the session will not be increased. If that is the understanding, then this is certainly agreeable to the government.

Mr. MacLean: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. My reason for raising this point at this time, of course, is that a notice has to be put in within the next few hours.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ROCHDALE COLLEGE

Question No. 27—Mr. Paproski:

1. Has Rochdale College received federal funds in any shape or form and, if so (a) from what sources (b) for what purpose?

2. What has been the total amount of federal expenditure authorized on behalf of Rochdale College?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State and the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation advise as follows: 1. (a) The Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State has provided grants for projects undertaken at Rochdale College. (b) June, 1967, $5,000. During its early stages, Rochdale was of interest to the Citizenship Branch as a Canadian experiment in social organization and youth participation and its development was thus assisted.

May, 1968, $110 to assist a spin-off project of Rochdale, the Indian Institute, in its attempt to develop a better understanding of Canadian-Indian culture. For the first Cross-Cultural Workshop, the Citizenship Branch provided $110.

December, 1968, $1,500 to Rochdale College, in support of its experiments to develop new, participatory approaches to learning. On this occasion Rochdale experimented with a project to involve the community in the appreciation of dance and art forms.

December, 1969, $200 to Rochdale College, for a task force of the College engaged in the production of a handbook on legal rights.

2. In so far as the Citizenship Branch of the Department of the Secretary of State is concerned, four grants totalling $6,810 have been made to Rochdale College, and projects within the College since 1967.

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation made a loan of $5,004,360 under Part VIA of the National Housing Act, in 1967, to Co-operative College Residences, Inc., for the purpose of constructing a student housing project at 341 Bloor Street West, Toronto. Co-operative College Residences, Inc., by declaration of trust, has declared Rochdale College to be the beneficial owner of these premises.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

GRANTS TO FRONTIER COLLEGE

Question No. 348—Mr. Robinson:

1. Have any grants been made to Frontier College in 1969 and also 1970 and, if not, are any to be made?

2. Has any application for a grant been received from Frontier College in either 1969 or 1970?

3. Does the work of Frontier College in any way overlap with the work of the Company of Young Canadians and, if so, in what regard?

4. Will the government consider the advisability of providing funds for volunteers in Frontier College on the same basis as there is an allotment of funds provided for workers with the Company of Young Canadians?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Departments of Labour, Manpower and Immigration, Secretary of State and the Company of Young Canadians advise as follows: 1. Yes. (i) The Department of Labour, $5,000 in 1969 and $5,000 in 1970. (ii) The Department of Manpower and Immigration, $20,000 in the fiscal year 1970-71.

2. Yes. (i) The Department of Labour: Letters requesting payment of grants were sent to the Department of Labour by the College in June, 1969, and June, 1970. (ii) The Department of Manpower and Immigration: In December, 1969, an application for a grant for the fiscal year 1970-71 was received. (iii) The Department of the Secretary of State, Citizenship Branch: A request for a grant of $47,000 for the fiscal year 1970-71 was received in September 1970.

3. The work of the two organizations is quite different in that the role of the person in Frontier College is that of a worker teacher in a community, while in the Company of Young Canadians the volunteer is engaged in community development work in a community. The two roles can complement each other in a community where both are required.

4. No.

NATIONAL SECURITY—COST OF MEASURES TAKEN IN LAPORTE AND CROSS KIDNAPPINGS

Question No. 361—Mr. Fortin:

1. What was the cost of measures taken when Messrs. Laporte and Cross were kidnapped?

2. Has there been an analysis of the economic effects of those events and, if so, what are they?

3. What measures is the government considering to avoid a repetition of events of this nature?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Government advises as follows: 1. and 2. Information is not available to provide an accurate answer to this question, nor is there available for this purpose the expert staff required to undertake the large amount of work necessary to collect and analyze the information involved.

3. All levels of government are giving continuing consideration to all appropriate measures to ensure the reasonable safety of public officials.

NATIONAL SECURITY—COST OF EMPLOYMENT OF ARMED FORCES AND RCMP DURING QUEBEC CRISIS

Question No. 372—Mr. Coates:

How many members of the Armed Forces and of the RCMP were employed by the federal government in provinces other than the Province of Quebec as a result of the "apprehended insurrection" in the Province of Quebec, and (a) what is the break-down by province (b) what has been the cost to date to the federal government (c) on what basis will these costs be met (d) will the provincial governments be requested to make a contribution toward these costs and, if so, what will be the proposed cost-sharing arrangement?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence, the Department of the Solicitor General, and the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices as follows: In so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, it is not considered to be in the best interests of national security to release at this time the exact numbers of Canadian forces personnel employed outside the Province of Quebec as a direct result of the "apprehended insurrection" in that province. Although Canadian Forces' bases across Canada tightened security and increased guards, the only significant area of Canadian Forces' involvement outside Quebec was in Ottawa. No additional members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were employed on a full time basis. Numerous members worked overtime in various capacities. (a) Nil. Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, since I have on the order paper starred question 1178 I should like to make it clear that it refers only to flood relief and not to any other kind of relief.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Unfortunately, it is not a new question of privilege; it is one I have raised before on this particular occasion with regard to question No. 12 which stands in my name and has stood on the order paper since October 8 in this session. On the previous occasion when I rose I brought to your attention the great problem that I face as a result of not receiving a reply to this question before now. I pointed out to Your Honour that this question was on the order paper in the last session of Parliament. I have with me today the order paper for October 5, 1970, from the last session of Parliament, and I point out to you that starred question No. 1203 is exactly the same as starred question No. 12. A point I must raise, which gives me great difficulty, is that, for instance, my question No. 43 is a similar question dealing with the same subject matter but for a later period of time.

The question relates to the Jetstar which is used by the Prime Minister, and it asks specific questions about its use. The Jetstar was purchased by the government of Canada with the taxpayers' money. It is used by the Prime Minister for specific purposes. There is no argument with that. But I do believe that the information I am asking for is legitimate information. It is information which should be made available to the people of this country in view of the fact that their tax dollars are involved in both the purchase of the aircraft and its use. I see no reason why I have had to wait since February 13, 1970, to get this information. If this question is not answered, I will have to reach the conclusion that the Prime Minister and the government have decided that this information will not be made available to the public. It is the taxpayers' money that is being spent but, to hell with the taxpayers, they are not going to find out what he is doing. I think it is about time that my questions in this regard were answered.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there is no intention on the part of the government to withhold information here. I have seen a draft of the answer some weeks ago, and it must be in the process of preparation now for tabling in the House. The fact is that this kind of information does require a great number of man-hours to procure it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: I hope you will permit me, Mr. Speaker, when I table the answer, to indicate how many thousands of dollars of taxpayers' money have been needed to answer it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made his point. He rose on a question of privilege and the Chair has heard him. The right hon. Prime Minister has replied, and I doubt whether there is any point in pursuing a debate on the matter. The Chair will attempt to take a personal interest in the question and in the provision of a reply. Hon. members know that it is beyond the purview of the Speaker's responsibility to get the Chair involved in the filing of returns or the supplying of answers to written questions except when this might be helpful to hon. members. I will be glad to have a look at the matter a little more closely on behalf of the hon. member.

Mr. Coates: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. Is the hon. member rising on another question of privilege? It should not be on the first one, because if the hon. member does that again, where do we go from there? A reply was given by the Prime Minister who is personally involved. It was quite in order for the Prime Minister to make that reply. If the hon. member now rises on another question of privilege, I wonder how long this will go on.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Speaker, what upsets me is that the Prime Minister has implied that I am costing the taxpayers money—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: —by exercising my right as a Member of Parliament to ask for information which should be made available to the taxpayers. I will not take that from him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Béchard: Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notices of motions Nos. 66, 67 and 68?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

1965 CONSULTANT REPORT, EFFECTIVE MANAGEMENT SYSTEM FOR EQUIPMENT ACQUISITION PRODUCTS

Motion No. 66—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Peat, Marwick, Livingstone and Company, Boston, USA, undertaken for the Department of Defence Production in 1965 on the development of an effective management system for equipment acquisition products, mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st Session of this Parliament.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the report referred to in this motion was originally commissioned by the former Department of Defence Production. It was a working document for internal use and as such it is considered confidential and not in the public interest to table. In the circumstances I hope that the hon. member will be willing to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Skoberg: It appears to me that Members of Parliament should be aware of this type of privileged material, and I call for the vote.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

Motion No. 67—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Peat, Marwick, Livingstone and Company, Boston, USA, undertaken for the Department of Defence Production on the development of an effective management system for equipment acquisition products, mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st session of this Parliament.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, the answer is the same as the one just given in reply to motion for production of papers No. 66, and I therefore again ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Skoberg: My response is the same, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate.

CONSULTANT REPORT ON THE DEVELOPMENT OF DEPARTMENTAL PLANNING, PROGRAMMING AND BUDGETING SYSTEM

Motion No. 68—Mr. Skoberg:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the consultant report by Peat, Marwick, Livingstone and Company, Boston, USA, undertaken for the Department of Defence Production on the development of departmental planning, programming and budgeting system, as mentioned in answer to Question Number 1,323 of the 1st session of this Parliament.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): The answer is the same and the same request is made.

Mr. Skoberg: Surely we should know what the departmental planning is all about, and I would like to call for the vote.

Mr. MacEachen: Transfer for debate.

Mr. Speaker: Transferred for debate. Shall the remaining notices of motions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

NATIONAL SECURITY

VIEWS EXPRESSED ON QUEBEC CRISIS IN BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether the views expressed by the Secretary of State in a book concerning the crisis in Quebec last October represent the views of the government?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that on the first page of the book the Secretary of State makes it clear that the views expressed are his own and not those of the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: When did he resign?

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister specifically whether the view expressed in the book that the government of Canada was not worried about a popular insurrection in Quebec at that time represents the view of the government?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know what the hon. member is quoting from. I have no knowledge that that is in the book, not having read the book, but I will look at any reference that the hon. member gives me and then I will be able to tell him whether or not it is the government policy.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the fact that ministers seem to be quite free within the government to give their own views I should like to ask the minister whether he intends to publish his views on the crisis?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I always believe in going to the horse's mouth.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister better not take that too far or I will refer to him in another sense. I ask the Secretary of State whether or not the view he expresses in this booklet or book, as the case may be, that the government had no fear of insurrection last October was the view he held then or is it the result of thought since the occasion?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister may wish to reply but certainly I think this question is not in order. The right hon. gentleman refers to a book published by a member of the cabinet and asks whether views expressed in the book were held by the minister some months ago. I do not think a question asked in those terms is quite acceptable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. While the matter is before you for consideration—and in no way do I anticipate your decision—may I say that we have seen Parliament tramped on again by this government and its basic rights destroyed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Ministers sit over there and refuse to answer questions. When questions are asked concerning their public statements—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —answers are denied.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where is this House of Commons going?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that in this instance at least it is not the minister who refuses to reply. He seemed to be very anxious to reply but I did not think the question was the type of question to which the minister should be allowed to reply. This is not the minister's responsibility but the Chair's responsibility, and I am prepared to accept it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

Does he intend to read the book the Secretary of State is releasing today, and will he tell us whether or not the writings of his colleague fit in with the minister's policy concerning the October crisis.

VIEWS EXPRESSED ON QUEBEC CRISIS IN BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE—EFFECT ON CABINET SECRECY

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Would he tell us how he can, in a book, separate his views as a minister of the Crown from his personal views when he could endanger and discredit the oath of office by all cabinet members?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Exactly in the same way, Mr. Speaker, as any minister and even any member of the House does, when making a speech.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to hon. members that not much purpose would be served in continuing this line of questioning. It seems to me there are very important matters to be considered and serious questions to be asked. All this I am sure is welcome publicity for the minister's book, but I think we should really proceed to another subject.

Inquiries of the Ministry

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DEVELOPMENT OF MORE EFFECTIVE INCENTIVE PROGRAMS IN LIGHT OF CRITICISMS

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the many concerns expressed recently about the ineffectiveness of the regional development incentive program, including the view expressed by Dr. Solandt, Chairman of the Science Council of Canada, that "the record of regional industrial development in Canada was one of disaster after disaster" and that "they're not economically sound," I should like to ask the minister whether the government is conducting a special study and review of its regional development program in order to develop programs which will be more effective?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. member implies that the application which is being made by a pulp mill in Regina should not be accepted because the program is not efficient.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Speaker, I shall repeat my question. In view of the criticisms, including that of Dr. Solandt, Chairman of the Science Council of Canada, is the government reviewing its programs in order to develop better alternatives and is it holding any consultations with people such as Dr. Solandt, Chairman of the Science Council, in order to develop a sound program which will be co-ordinated with science policy?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I have read a great many opinions on the department, and on regional development, expressed by members of all political parties, and by scientists, several of them contradictory. I am not in a position to give an opinion on the view brought up this afternoon in the House.

[English]

INCENTIVE GRANTS TO FOREIGN-CONTROLLED FIRMS—POSSIBLE POLICY CHANGE

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, with regard to a specific aspect of policy, I should like to ask whether the minister is reconsidering his policy of making incentive grants to foreign-controlled firms on the same basis as to Canadian-controlled concerns and does he anticipate that there will be any policy changes in this regard for his department when the government announces its policy on foreign ownership?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): No, Mr. Speaker. When an American company, such as Boeing, seeks to settle in Manitoba, we grant authorization and give the same subsidy in Winnipeg as in Gaspé or in the Maritimes.

Inquiries of the Ministry

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE AIRPORT—ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL AREA

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

As regards the Ste. Scholastique airport construction project, would the minister be in a position today to state when he is going to announce the establishment of a special zone which is needed for the implementation of this project?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there will be a special zone north of Montreal, and this will be announced in the very near future.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me we are moving away from the original question, but the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Waterloo on a supplementary.

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES TO PREVENT MOVEMENT OF FIRMS FROM ONE PROVINCE TO ANOTHER

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has his attention been drawn to the grant made by the Ontario Development Corporation to a Quebec-based company to get that company to move from Quebec? My question to the minister is whether he is consulting with the provinces to make sure that when there is competition between provinces they do not obviate whatever work is being done and that one province does not work against another, with perhaps both of them working against federal policy?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are taking all the precautions that are humanly possible to prevent these incentives, which are public money, from being used by industries for moving from one province to another. Before granting an incentive, we make sure that there exists an adequate market for the additional production and for instance we do not accept that a new industry use this money obtained from the government to ruin or weaken another industry.

[English]

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. First I suggest to hon. members that we are leapfrogging from supplementary to supplementary over different subjects. I will recognize the hon. member for Waterloo on a supplementary and then the hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Saltsman: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. He may not have understood that portion of the question I directed to him when I asked him whether he is holding consultations with the provinces to make sure that this kind of working against each other does not take place?

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, there may be consultations with the provinces in some instances, but usually these things are discussed directly with the officials of the industries concerned in the light of the information we have on hand about the area involved.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

CONVERSION OF COQUALEETZA HOSPITAL INTO COMMUNITY CENTRE—FAMILY AND SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

In view of protests received from the Indians, is the minister ready to assure us that the Coqualeetza Indian hospital and the land adjoining it in British Columbia will be used to meet the needs and care of the Indian people in the area in accordance with their best interest and requests?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we are studying this proposal. Until now the Indians have made three different proposals; we are studying the consequences and if, as we have told them, it is in their best interest we will give them the building in question. We must however take into account the financial means of the government and if it proves impossible to finance this proposal, we will have to look for an alternative.

Mr. Fortin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to ask the minister whether there has been an advance discussion or agreement between his department and the Department of National Health and Welfare with regard to this decision of taking away this hospital for Indians?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this hospital belongs to the Canadian government and not to the Indians. We gave the Indians certains sums of money to enable them to conduct studies on the matter. We are considering their suggestions and as I said we will accept only those which are sensible. We are not however in a position to give an answer at this time.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Can the hon. minister assure the House that the government will implement the program that was submitted to him by the Indians in this area, especially those programs concerning family and social services as well as the development of Indian arts?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, there are programs of this nature in British Columbia as elsewhere. As to whether they should be located in Chilliwack, this is another aspect of the problem, which as a matter of fact we are examining. These programs need not be located in this community, but they might be.

[English]

FINANCE

REDUCTION BY INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK OF INTEREST RATE ON LOANS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance who is supposed to be in the House today, but as he is not here I will address it to the acting minister and ask him to pass it on to the minister. As the interest rates that are being charged on Industrial Development Bank loans are considerably higher than on comparable commercial loans, will the minister strongly urge the Governor of the Bank of Canada, which has jurisdiction over the operations of the IDB, to have that body lower its interest rates by the same amount commercial rates have been lowered recently, so that the IDB can continue to do the good job that it was established to do for industry?

Hon. Herb Gray (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to draw the hon. member's question to the attention of my colleague who, I am sure, will want to reply in his usual effective and responsive manner.

SASKATCHEWAN RIVER SYSTEM—MERCURY CONTAMINATION—COMPENSATION TO FISHERMEN

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In light of the fact that the Minister of Natural Resources of the province of Saskatchewan has indicated that fishing in the Saskatchewan River system will not be allowed this year because of mercury contamination—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Except in Diefenbaker Lake.

Mr. Korchinski: —will there be a program of compensation for fishermen in effect this year?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): No, Mr. Speaker, but a retraining program will be.

Mr. Korchinski: May I ask the minister whether an agreement is already in effect for a retraining program?

Mr. Davis: No, but it is under active consideration.

CITIZENSHIP

INQUIRY AS TO DISMISSAL OF JUDGES OF COURTS AND INTRODUCTION OF NEW ARRANGEMENT

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister without Portfolio responsible for citizenship. Has information been sent out from the minister's department telling the judges of the citizenship courts that they are to be dismissed shortly and that a whole new arrangement in that regard will be brought into effect?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): No, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL PARKS

POSTPONEMENT OF LAND RENTAL INCREASES

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Next week increased land rentals in national parks will become due with respect to many leases. In view of the fact that the reports of the appraisal appeal boards in each park have not yet been made public, can the minister advise whether a decision has been made to postpone these increases?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am in a position to inform the hon. member that those increases will not come into effect before April 1, but I cannot assure him that they will not come into effect later this year. However, I will inform the hon. member in case they should be put into effect before the end of this year.

OIL

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—NEGOTIATIONS WITH UNITED STATES IN 1970

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising from a report from Washington to the effect that in February, 1970, President Nixon instructed the Department of State of the United States government to enter into negotiations with the government of Canada regarding the construction of a pipeline from Alaska through Canada to the United States. May I ask the minister if any such negotiations were entered into by the United States and Canadian governments, either through himself or through any other minister of the Canadian government?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources if any such negotiations were carried on in 1970?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker, although inferentially in the oil discussions which we had with them in that period a pipeline was talked about from time to time, but no specific discussion vis-à-vis the pipeline itself were entered into.

REGULATIONS TO BRING CANADIAN OIL ENTERING PIPELINES UNDER NATIONAL ENERGY BOARD

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): In view of the fact that the pipeline in question, according to the minister's own statement, will be handling Canadian oil, I want to ask him a question about Part VI, section 87 of the National Energy Board Act. Since this was proclaimed last May 7 last but the regulations deal only with gasoline, is it the minister's intention to pass regulations dealing with oil entering pipelines to bring this operation under the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): At the present time there is no such intention. The authority is there if required. The declaration in regard to gasoline was made in order to render the national oil policy effective, which policy was commencing to break down by reason of the flow of products across the Ottawa valley line. In respect of oil, in the opinion of the government that authority has not been needed to date to make the national oil policy work.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—ECOLOGICAL STUDIES—PUBLICATION OF RESULTS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Is he now in a position to table the results of research pertaining to environmental problems arising from any pipeline project down the Mackenzie Valley?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I think I informed the House the other day, both in the debate and in answer to questions from hon. gentlemen opposite, research is going on in many areas—in the private sector, the universities and within government. Whether or not we could effectively table the results of all these researches I am not sure, but we will certainly consider the situation. Certainly a broad spectrum of knowledge on the part of the public is required on this entire issue.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—CONSULTATIONS WITH NATIVE PEOPLE

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Have any consultations between the officials of his department and the native Indian peoples in the north been carried on with respect to the construction of a pipeline through Canada, and are any further such consultations planned?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we try to keep the Indian and Eskimo people in the North informed of what takes place within certain study committees. Over the past year, representatives of these citizens of the North have participated, with government officials, in some research projects, particularly in the Old Crow and Banks Island regions.

We have asked officials of the industry to include in their teams Eskimo or Indian advisers, and they will carry on with this practice in the future.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I repeat the last half of my supplementary question. Are any further such consultations being planned with respect to the construction of this pipeline?

[Mr. Douglas.]

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we are trying every day to keep them up to date and I can assure the hon. member that they will be kept informed in the weeks and months to come.

[English]

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—ECONOMIC COMPETITIVENESS WITH TAPS—POSITION OF ALASKA PRODUCERS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the discussions the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has had with the representatives of the companies interested in Alaska oil, is he in a position to tell the House whether a pipeline through Canada, down the Mackenzie valley, is regarded by the Alaska oil producers as being as economically competitive in delivering oil to the Pacific northwest and the mid-western United States as the Alaska pipeline and water route, and if they are not yet convinced that it would be competitive, does the minister consider that he is in a position to convince them that it is economically competitive?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and myself and subsequently other ministers had a very useful meeting today with the presidents of five of the companies who have holdings in the Prudhoe Bay area. We discussed the economics of the various lines. It would appear that the economics of delivery to the west coast are preferably by the Valdez line, but the economics of delivery to the Chicago area may well be preferable by way of an all-Canadian line. According to information I have from our own officials, there would be an advantage of 30 cents a barrel in the latter case.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I shall, of course, recognize the Leader of the Opposition on a supplementary but I will take this opportunity to deliver my usual admonition perhaps a little earlier. I invite hon. members to ask short questions and ministers to give brief answers, with as few supplementaries as possible, in order to give more hon. members the opportunity to ask questions.

Mr. Stanfield: I put a supplementary question to the minister. As a result of his discussions, is the minister in a position to tell us how long the representatives of the Alaska oil companies are prepared to wait before they feel it necessary to make a choice with regard to the route?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, as I understand it the position is that a decision was very clearly made by the oil companies to go by the Valdez line and then by the marine route along the west coast markets, but by reason of the delays caused by various governmental agencies in the United States, by environmental groups and others, that decision has not been implemented. All we are doing is exploring the possibilities of a review of that decision and assuring that Canada proceeds as rapidly as possible to make its scientific, ecological and economic surveys so that we are prepared in this regard.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Battleford-Kindersley.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—TYPE OF ORGANIZATION

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In his studies regarding a possible Mackenzie Valley pipeline, is the minister considering a Panarctic type of business vehicle for its installation and operation?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet taken any such decision, since the matter is still under consideration.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

QUEBEC—INQUIRY RESPECTING INSPIRATION AND SUCCESS COMPANY

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Since hundreds of Quebecers have complained that they have lost money in the operations of the Inspiration et Succès company and since the Quebec government has advised the public not to invest in that chain system, can the minister tell the House whether he is investigating the matter?

[English]

Is the minister in a position to tell the House and the public whether his officials have any definite ideas on the chain system, from the consumer point of view?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not familiar with this particular company and will determine the facts from the Minister of Justice of Quebec in order to decide whether it would be appropriate to take action under some federal statute or authority. A number of pyramid-type schemes have been promoted lately, and better business bureaux and federal and provincial departments concerned with consumer affairs have warned those inexperienced in business not to invest money in them without first obtaining advice on what they are getting involved in because some of them do not show any return on an investment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

PROPOSED AMCHITKA UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TESTS—REPRESENTATIONS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the proposed nuclear tests at Amchitka which the House was told the government had protested last February. Can the minister advise whether the United States government has replied to that protest and, if so, can he indicate the nature of the reply?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the House has been informed, we did send a note to the United States government and a reply has been received. I should like to consult the United States government, however, to determine whether they would be prepared to have their answer tabled. We have told the United States that we are prepared to table our note. If the hon. member could wait for a day or so, I shall consult the United States government and determine whether their reply can also be tabled.

INDUSTRY

AIRCRAFT—PROVISION OF ORDERS FOR SHORT TAKE-OFF AND LANDING PLANES AS STIMULANT

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Supply and Services. What is government policy with regard to support for a short take-off and landing aircraft program in order to stimulate the Canadian aircraft industry and provide worldwide business for it?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, that policy does not come under the Department of Supply and Services.

Mr. MacLean: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the government to give orders for this particular type of aircraft on behalf of any department of government in the near future?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, the Department of Supply and Services makes purchases when requested by other government departments. We have no orders for aircraft for such a program at the present time.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

POSSIBLE EXPROPRIATION OF CERTAIN BUILDINGS FACING PARLIAMENT HILL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister concerns reports to the effect that the government of Canada is giving consideration to the expropriation of blocks in uptown Ottawa with a view to assuring the maintenance of the majesty and grandeur of the Parliament buildings and Parliament Hill. Is the Prime Minister in a position to state whether this matter is under consideration and whether commendable forward steps in this direction are being considered?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not yet under consideration at cabinet level, but instruction has been given to the minister responsible to come forth with a plan for the future location of members of Parliament and parliamentary offices in premises which are not now the property of the government of Canada.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is consideration being given to doing something by arrangement with the city of Ottawa so that large buildings about to be erected adjacent to Parliament Hill will be controlled in some way? If not, Parliament Hill will lose something of the greatness which nature has provided for it. Is consideration being given along that line as well as to the premises to which the right hon. gentleman referred?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe that this is a matter of concern for the National Capital Commission, Mr. Speaker. I must confess that I am not aware of any recent representations along these lines to the authorities of the Ottawa district. I shall gladly convey the representations of the right hon. gentleman, however, to the minister responsible for the National Capital Commission.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

PROTESTS RESPECTING NEW PLAN

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour.

Could he tell the House whether representations were made to him in protest against the fact that under the new unemployment insurance program, a person who works 12 months of the year will earn less than one who works only 9 months, yet the latter will cost more to the government?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED BANNING OF FUTURE SEAL HUNTS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the fact that a bill has been introduced in the United States Congress to ban the killing of sea mammals, including baby seals, and to ban the importation of sealskins into the United States, will the minister, on this last day of the annual seal hunt, consider banning all future slaughter of seals?

[Later:]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to an earlier question concerning seals. It is not prompted by any anti-American feeling. Would the minister consider making an official Canadian response to United States Senator Harris of Oklahoma who is actively campaigning against a bona-fide Canadian industry, and inform him to keep his elongated, American proboscis south of the border and apply his energies to the resolution of their foreign and domestic problems?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is in the form a recommendation or suggestion which he has to assume will be taken into account.

VIEWS EXPRESSED ON QUEBEC CRISIS IN BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE—EFFECT ON CABINET SECRECY

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

I refer again to the question I put a while ago to the Secretary of State. Since the latter was a member of the cabinet during the October crisis and as such was aware of certain facts and that, as a result of the War Measures Act trials are now in process, some people have been judged, and others are awaiting their trials, how can the Prime Minister allow a minister to publish a book on such important events without first having read the book to see whether it contains facts that are only known to the cabinet?

Should the Prime Minister not read the book first, to criticize it objectively—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has put his question. I think that the House could allow the Prime Minister to answer, but I am under the impression that the question is more in the nature of an argument. At any rate, the Chair does not object to the Prime Minister answering the question.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is an argument based on an assumption, Mr. Speaker, and if hypothetically the minister had indeed violated his oath of office and revealed cabinet secrets, it would obviously constitute an irregularity which should be dealt with.

But as far as I know the assumption is neither verified nor verifiable.

Mr. Asselin: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are several hon. members who wish to ask supplementaries on this question, the hon. member for Fundy-Royal, the hon. member from Cape Breton and the hon. member for Charlevoix. There are only five minutes left in the question period. It may be unfair to hon. members, but perhaps this matter might be pursued at another time.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, I have been rising constantly to ask a very serious supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

BRITISH NEWFOUNDLAND CORPORATION PROPOSAL TO DEVELOP URANIUM ENRICHMENT PLANT—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND MANITOBA PREMIER

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. It refers to the reply he gave yesterday to an inquiry by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley on the apparent interest of Brinco into developing an uranium enrichment plant. The Prime Minister replied that there had been some correspondence on this matter and he had referred it to the appropriate minister. Could the Prime Minister or the appropriate minister say whether they have received correspondence from the province of Manitoba indicating that province's interest in providing certain facilities for the development of such a plant?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been an exchange of letters between the Premier of Manitoba and myself along these lines.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING BILL—SUGGESTED MEETING WITH GROUP FROM WESTERN CANADA

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the reply he gave on March 17 when he said he was prepared to meet a small, non-political, representative group of the agricultural industry concerned about Bill C-176, and in view of the difficulty the committee is now experiencing in dealing with that bill, is he still prepared to meet a group that is concerned about the bill?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the reply I made has been quoted completely in context, but I would prefer to hear Your Honour's decision on the question of privilege raised earlier by the hon. member before indicating whether anything further should be done on this side of the House.

MANPOWER

AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS TO EXTEND RETRAINING PERIOD

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Since under the present rigid regulations governing manpower retraining programs the disappointment and despair of trainees is reaching crisis proportions, would the minister inform the House when he will amend the regulations so that students may take more than 52 weeks to complete their academic training, which under this program has to be completed in less than 52 weeks, in order that trainees may receive training which best suits their needs?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would not accept the extreme words of the hon. member. It is possible, of course, for a person to be offered 52 weeks of training and 52 weeks of skill training thereafter. Our emphasis has been on attempting to improve courses within that basic guideline. We are looking at the over-all question of whether we need additional flexibility to deal with special cases, but the emphasis certainly is on improving courses within that time limit.

Mr. Rynard: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

CRITICISMS AND RECOMMENDATIONS BY NATIONAL COUNCIL CONCERNING PRACTICES—INQUIRY AS TO STATEMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of certain criticisms and recommendations made by the National Council on Welfare with respect to welfare practices, both federal and provincial, will the minister be making a statement on this matter at an early date so that we can be assured that the recommendations of this body are being taken into consideration?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I examined the observations of the National Council on Welfare. Many of their recommendations are in process of being acted upon in one way or another through consultations which we will be having with the provinces concerning improvements in the Canada Assistance Plan.

INQUIRY AS TO REORGANIZATION OF COURTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the minister responsible for citizenship. Does the government intend to propose a substantial reorganization of the citizenship courts and, if so, will the minister assure the House that at the first opportunity a statement will be made as to the changes proposed?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, if any such changes are proposed they will be announced in the House.

BELL CANADA DEPOSIT REQUIREMENT PRIOR TO PROVISION OF SERVICE—SUGGESTED LEGISLATION TO PROHIBIT PROCEDURE

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Toronto-Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer

In view of the fact that the Bell Telephone Company appears to have a policy for its customers that unless they give credit information or pay a deposit of $50 in advance of service, no service will be provided regardless of how long they have been a customer of Bell, will the minister consider bringing in legislation to stop this procedure?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I presume that this matter is covered by the Canadian Transport Commission which regulates Bell Canada. However, I will check into it and determine what the facts are.

STE. SCHOLASTIQUE AIRPORT—CONFLICT BETWEEN UNIONS AS TO JURISDICTION

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Taking into account the present work stoppage at the Ste. Scholastique airport, and the dispute between labour unions to determine whether this work should be performed under federal or provincial jurisdiction, has the minister met the workers involved and is he able to tell us if this matter comes under the Quebec Department of Labour?

[English]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, industrial unrest or dispute in any province is subject to the provincial labour laws of the country, and the dispute in relation to the Ste. Scholastique project is no exception. Our role in the Ste. Scholastique development is simply, when calling for tenders, to include certain basic, fundamental standards as a minimum. We have no role in the dispute that may be going on between the province of Quebec and the contractors.

The minister said that he would take the question as notice and make inquiries. Has he a reply?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I understand that a reply will be forthcoming. The administrative section responsible for that matter has moved from my department. I recently had word from them that they are obtaining an answer. However, they are not under my immediate jurisdiction at present. I will see if I can expedite their answer.

Now that the political situation in Quebec has apparently stabilized to the extent that ministers can write confessions on the subject of the alleged insurrection, will the minister arrange to have the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act repealed before its expiry date of April 30?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to comment on the preamble to that question.

Newfoundland where unemployment is at its highest, will the minister ensure that quotas are put aside for those provinces so affected because of receiving the information late?

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON REASONS FOR INVOKING WAR MEASURES ACT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact it is alleged that the Secretary of State is now questioning the credibility of the government in dealing with the Quebec situation, and also the invocation of the War Measures Act, will the Prime Minister now take this matter into consideration and report to the House tomorrow in order that we can understand and be apprised of the attitude of the government in this whole matter?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The hon. member's question is based on an earlier question of his leader, which was apparently based on a press report that was false. Therefore the whole premise of this question falls to the ground. I suggest that some members read the book.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has expired. I have taken note of hon. members who have exercised patience. I did the same yesterday. I think I have been true to my word and have given preference to hon. members who did not have an opportunity to ask their questions yesterday. The Chair will follow the same practice tomorrow.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, during the question period, the Prime Minister indicated that he had not seen the book written by the Secretary of State on the October crisis, and that according to his information, this book made no reference to the secret of the cabinet.

Can the right hon. gentleman assure the House—and this is the gist of my question of privilege—that he will ask the Secretary of State not to publish this book until he can look at it himself, to see—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I invite the hon. member to resume his seat. There is obviously no question of privilege. The hon. member's question has nothing to do with parliamentary privilege, and I must make a decision accordingly.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, on November 16, 1970, Bill C-192 was introduced for the first time, and now after waiting for five months the hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen) has finally found an organization supporting this bill, namely, the Canadian Bar Association. Five months is a long time to wait, and the Canadian Bar Association is the only body, as far as I know, which has approved this bill. They approved the bill in general and its philosophy in particular. Then they indicated to the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) that it is the responsibility of the federal government to build training schools.

[Mr. Speaker.]

They made 14 recommendations with regard to changes to the bill. Among those 14 suggestions they referred to the title, uniformity of age, the right to legal counsel, bail, no obligation to admit the substance of the offence by the accused, review of a finding of insanity by the judge, from time to time, and recommended that fingerprinting be deleted. Those are only seven of the 14 recommendations that they made. Even though they supported the bill, they underlined the reasons why organizations across the country and many persons in various professional fields have opposed the legislation.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that when I spoke on the amendment to this measure I said that the bill in substance was punitive and retrogressive and that it was not in tune with the concept of a just society or the principles of the modern treatment of young people with anti-social behaviour problems. This afternoon I should like to take a historical and comparative approach to the problem of the young people in Canada. It sets itself into four stages. First, we have the Juvenile Delinquents Act of 1929. We have the report of the Department of Justice Committee on Juvenile Delinquency of 1961, which reported in 1966. We have the third stage, the federal-provincial conference in September of 1967 where officials of the Department of the Solicitor General and of different departments, both in the federal and provincial field, met. Then we have the fourth and final stage, the Young Offenders Act which was introduced in November of 1970.

First, I should like to deal with the Juvenile Delinquents Act as it first came into force in 1929. It sets forth a philosophy according to which an attempt is made to protect juvenile offenders from the stigma and the punitive approach of the criminal law and to provide them with mature understanding, guidance, discipline and support. The legislation directs itself in three basic ways. It attempts to remove young people from the jurisdiction of the adult courts and place them under the jurisdiction of specialized juvenile courts. Second, it establishes that trials of juveniles should be held free of publicity and in a manner which is informal yet consistent with the proper administration of justice. Third, it provides for reformative sentencing and is focused primarily on the welfare of the individual offender. Section 38 of the Juvenile Delinquents Act sets forth the philosophy clearly and boldly by stating as follows:

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that its purpose may be carried out, namely, that the care and custody and discipline of a juvenile delinquent shall approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by its parents, and that as far as practicable every juvenile delinquent shall be treated, not as a criminal, but as a misdirected and misguided child, and one needing aid, encouragement, help and assistance.

Section 3 (2) of the act refers to how a child should be dealt with. It states:

> Where a child is adjudged to have committed a delinquency he shall be dealt with not as an offender, but as one in a condition of delinquency and therefore requiring help and guidance and proper supervision.

Section 20 deals with the treatment of a child. It states that if the youngster is adjudged to be a juvenile delinquent, the case should be disposed of in one of many ways. First, he should be given a suspended sentence. Second, the hearing should be adjourned or there should be a disposition of the case from time to time for any definite or indefinite period. Third, a fine should be imposed not exceeding $25, which may be paid in periodical amounts or otherwise. Fourth, the child should be committed to the care or custody of a probation officer or of any other suitable person. Fifth, the child should be allowed to remain in its home, subject to the visitation of a probation officer, such child to report to the court or to the probation officer as often as may be required. Sixth, the child should be placed in a suitable family home as a foster home, subject to the friendly supervision of a probation officer and the further order of the court. Seventh, such further or other conditions should be imposed upon the delinquent as may be deemed advisable. Eighth, the child should be committed to the charge of any Children's Aid Society and, ninth, the child should be committed to an industrial school.

It is rather striking that the final disposition is with regard to an industrial school and that it is listed last. In section 20(5) with regard to the treatment and disposition of juvenile delinquents it is stated that the child's own good is paramount. It provides:

> The action taken shall, in every case, be that which the court is of opinion the child's own good and the best interests of the community require.

We have had that act since 1929, and it had its shortcomings. One of the shortcomings was that it was possible to prosecute a youngster seven years of age and in some cases to commit him to a training school. Probably the definition of delinquency was too wide because it included breaches of municipal, provincial or federal statutes. Some of the sentences were punitive. Also, there appeared to be a lack of community resources to implement the treatment of anti-social youngsters.

The greatest deficiency was probably with regard to Indian and Eskimo children and children living in rural areas. The final shortcoming was that it tended to stigmatize a juvenile delinquent as a junior criminal. They tagged him and then awaited his elevation to an adult criminal. It is very striking that many studies show that there is a close relationship between a youngster who has been adjudged a juvenile delinquent and later becomes an adult criminal. That is the first stage with regard to this particular problem.

In 1961, as a result of some of the shortcomings of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, the Justice Committee on Juvenile Delinquency was appointed. It had five members representing four divisions of the Department of Justice. I should like to set them forth: the first was the criminal law section, second the RCMP, third the penitentiaries branch and, forth, the parole division. They commenced hearings in 1961 and tabled their report in February of 1966.

The way in which the committee prefaced its remarks is striking when we see they say that the inquiry took much longer to conclude than was anticipated at the beginning, since none of the committee members had worked in the juvenile field. They say they were not entirely aware of the complexity of the problem. There were no juvenile court judges, no psychiatrists, no psychologists, no sociologists, no probation officers, no representatives from training schools, no social workers and no representatives from the Children's Aid Society or from foster homes. It was really a select committee of the Department of Justice representing four areas in respect of treatment.

Regardless of that, the committee set forth 100 recommendations many of which are excellent and were well received by various institutions across the country. First of all, they drew up a draft bill entitled the Children and Young Persons Act. Second, and this is important, they included a clause which set forth the philosophy that should be embraced in this bill. I will read the philosophy set forth in the draft bill. It is as follows:

> Where a child or young person has been adjudged a violator, a child offender, or a young offender, as the case may be, he shall be dealt with not in a punitive manner, but as a child or young person requiring help and guidance and proper supervision.

The next clause states:

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that its purpose may be carried out, namely, that the care and custody and discipline of a child or young person adjudged to be a violator, a child offender or a young offender shall approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by its parents, and that, as far as practicable, every such child or young person shall be treated not as a criminal, but as a misdirected and misguided child, and one needing aid, encouragement, help and assistance.

It is obvious that the clauses in the draft bill were an adaptation of the particular sections in the Juvenile Delinquents Act as set forth in sections 38 and 3(2). In the notes included in the draft bill we find these words:

> We agree with the philosophy expressed in section 38 of the act. The difficulty has not been in the basic philosophy of the act but in the failure of society to give to the juvenile court adequate resources with which to fulfil the aims of that philosophy.

Mr. Speaker, it is very important to keep that in mind as we study this bill. The draft bill incorporates many of the recommendations, in fact most of the recommendations, and even though it was in legalistic language it met with the approval of many people, at least in respect of the recommendations made. The next step was the federal-provincial conference of officials of the Department of the Solicitor General as well as representatives of the departments of the provincial Attorneys General and of correction departments. This was held in December 1967. Differences must have arisen. The Solicitor

General admitted this in his speech when in opening the debate, as recorded at page 2370 of Hansard, he said:

> —unanimity could not be achieved on all the proposed reforms, and some compromise solutions had to be adopted in order to win approval by a majority of the delegates. Consequently ... the bill which I am submitting ... for second reading is certainly not perfect.

The words "Consequently the bill I am submitting for second reading is certainly not perfect" are absolutely true. This has been shown by the opposition which has been forthcoming from organizations and experienced persons across the country. I cast no reflection on the Solicitor General but serious reflection on the senior officials of his department. They watered down and restricted many of the recommendations; they failed to adhere to the philosophy set forth in the bill drafted by the justice committee and introduced a bill which is retrogressive and punitive.

If the Canadian Bar Association can set forth 14 areas of disagreement, I respectfully suggest that there are at least 10 areas in which we can demonstrate the inadequacy of this bill. Clause 4 of Bill C-192, the young offenders bill, provides:

> This act shall be liberally construed to the end that where a young person is found under section 29 to have committed an offence, he will be dealt with as a misdirected and misguided young person requiring help, guidance, encouragement, treatment and supervision and to the end that the care, custody and discipline of that young person will approximate as nearly as may be that which should be given by such a young person's parents.

It is obvious that these words again have been taken from section 38 and section 3(2) of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, with two major exceptions. Those two major exceptions as set forth in the Juvenile Delinquents Act are, first, that the young person shall not be treated as a criminal and, second, that he shall not be treated as an offender. The Justice Committee in its report states that the young person shall not be treated in a punitive manner and shall not be treated as a criminal.

That philosophy or attitude of not treating a young person as a criminal, as an offender or in a punitive manner is totally absent from clause 4 of this bill. This is where there is a sharp conflict in respect of the philosophy, because it seems to me the Solicitor General is not stressing the philosophy and attitude which should be taken toward young people and is placing the major emphasis on the arbitrariness which he and his officials feel young people may have objected to under the previous act. That is the first point in respect of the philosophy.

The second point has to do with the title. It is now called the Young Offenders Act. It is striking to note that in the French version it is "Loi sur les jeunes délinquants". In other words, there is almost a direct reference to juvenile delinquents in the French version. The justice committee recommended the title of Children and Young Persons Act. In other words, they did not want to stigmatize a young person as an offender in the same way young people were stigmatized as juvenile delinquents. That is very important.

The third area is that the justice committee in its report dealt with the informal disposition of cases without the necessity of formal trial where the police clearly indicate the commission of the offence, where the substance of the charge is admitted by the child and where the express consent of the parent is obtained. Bill C-192 restricts these cases to those not involving infliction or risk of serious bodily harm and allows the Attorney General to exercise a veto over such procedures within a period of time. This is totally absent from the report of the justice committee. In the past, juvenile courts have had the power to dispose of cases without the laying of a formal charge. Therefore, by restricting this type of disposition to cases that do not involve infliction of serious bodily harm there is a further restriction, rather than an expansion, under the terms of this bill.

The fourth area deals with convictions. The draft bill drawn up by the justice committee not only said that a criminal conviction should not be used or considered with regard to a second criminal offence, but that it should not apply to other subjects and disciplines. In other words, it said not only was it necessary to prevent the use of criminal conviction in a subsequent hearing, but it was necessary to prevent its use whenever a young person applied for employment. Clause 71 of Bill C-192 confines this restriction to prohibition on a conviction being used in subsequent criminal proceedings, but says nothing about the other disabilities which may be imposed on a young person. In other words, there is no attempt to protect young people against discrimination as a result of past convictions, when they seek employment.

In the fifth area, Mr. Speaker, the justice committee recommended that the law guardian system in operation in New York should be applied. In other words, a public defender could be obtained by a young man charged under the terms of the bill. But the bill itself has made no provision for legal counsel as a right of the accused. His right to counsel is placed within the discretion of the juvenile court judge. In a bill that is so complex and technical, compared with the succinct, clear wording of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, I am amazed that the guarantee of legal counsel, recommended by the justice committee, has not been spelled out in clear terms.

With regard to commitment to training schools, the justice committee recommended that commitment to a training school should only be a last resort and only for a period not longer than three years. It said no commitment should be made unless the judge first considered a pre-sentence report and, secondly, after every effort had been made to train the child in his own home, in a foster home or other shelter. In this bill the requirement that commitment be made only after all efforts are made to train the youngster in his own home, a foster home or group home is missing.

Is it not striking, Mr. Speaker, that in the Juvenile Delinquents Act passed in 1929, section 25 stipulated that a condition precedent to commitment should be that all efforts were first made to reform the child in his own home or foster home, etc? It is obvious that with respect to commitment, the provision in this bill is a retrogressive step. It is not in keeping with the Juvenile Delinquents Act or with the report of the justice committee.

The seventh ground is that clause 30(1)(h) sets forth that where one is liable to the death sentence or life imprisonment as the result of conviction, a young person shall be directed to a training school for a period of three years, after which it is within the discretion of the judge to return the child to an adult court for sentencing. This has been rightly called double jeopardy with regard to sentencing. Mr. Speaker, I ask you, or the Solicitor General to point out any criminal code in the western world that contains a provision with regard to double jeopardy in sentencing. That is not worthy of a country like Canada which is attempting, in its shabby way, to bring forth a just society.

It is not worthy that the report of the justice committee did not contain any recommendation with regard to double sentencing. Members of the committee were aware of the risks that might result from releasing a young person after three years' treatment in a training school but, if I read their report correctly, they were prepared to take the risk of reforming and rehabilitating a young man within three years, rather than accept the possible detrimental effects of long-term confinement. They were prepared to accept the risk of a young man returning to society after three years, despite the possibility of recidivism, rather than the result of long-term confinement.

An eighth area is that involving fingerprinting. Clause 74(1) of the bill provides that a young person may be fingerprinted if a juvenile court judge orders it to be done. Again, it is rather striking that the justice committee made no recommendation with regard to fingerprinting. Therefore, it is reasonable to infer that they saw no merit in it.

A ninth area covers the transfer of young offenders to adult institutions. Clause 47 permits a judge, on application by the superintendent of a training school, to transfer a child to an adult institution if he deems this to be in the best interests of the young person or of the other inmates of the training school. What a contrast this is to the Juvenile Delinquents Act! Section 26 of that act, passed away back in 1929, said that no transfer whatever should be permitted, under any circumstances, of a juvenile delinquent to an adult institution. People in those days realized that sending young offenders to adult institutions was only giving them an opportunity to meet adult criminals and to adopt their ways and thinking. In that respect this bill is a step backward.

My tenth and final ground is that this bill has set the minimum age as ten years at which a child can come under the jurisdiction of a juvenile court. This is a slight improvement over the Juvenile Delinquents Act which set the age at seven years. Yet the government has opted to continue the use of quasi-judicial procedures and sanctions to control the anti-social behaviour of young children. This is done at a time when the approach is toward the integration of delinquency and child welfare services, fostered and partly financed by the Canada Assistance Plan.

It is done at a time when England, Scotland and the Scandinavian countries have restricted or abolished the adversary system in juvenile court prosecutions. May I give an example. The Children and Young Persons Act passed in England in 1969 stipulated that with the exception of homicide there are to be no criminal prosecutions of young people under the age of 14 years. Compare that with the age of ten years stipulated in this bill. They state that young people shall be treated informally through agencies or formally in juvenile courts when children are apparently beyond control or in need of protection. For young people from 14 to 17 years of age, prosecutions are only allowed for serious offences laid by qualified informants, and they are prohibited where the case can be dealt with by caution or counselling or by means of child protection proceedings.

That is in England, Mr. Speaker. In Scotland they have gone much further. In the Social Work (Scotland) Act of 1968 they say that there shall be no prosecution of children under 16 years of age except on instruction of the Lord Advocate. They set up a panel system of three persons trained in social work. They deal with their young people by having them appear before the panel, which disposes of each case with rehabilitation and reformation as the foremost considerations.

It is obvious that in England, Scotland and the Scandinavian countries there has been a shift from the quasi-criminal process and adversary system to one which ensures provision of adequate social control. I ask the Solicitor General, why can we not have the same approach in Canada? Surely the provinces could take care of young people up to 16 years of age, with the financial assistance of the federal government for building training schools and providing resources to help and guide them. No young person should be stigmatized either as a young offender or a criminal when he is under 16.

The federal government should take the initiative with regard to young people between the ages of 16 and 21, because that is the crucial age. We should do all we can to prevent this stigma and the imposition of a criminal record on those between the ages of 16 and 21. This would be an enlightened approach and I think we should give it our full attention. It is not enough to protect a young person from the arbitrariness of a court. We have to develop a social philosophy with adequate resources and people to meet this problem. That is why I am moving the following amendment, Mr. Speaker:

> That this bill be not now read a second time but that this House affirms that young persons should not be treated as criminals and that the principle of flexibility of treatment of young persons should be emphasized rather than the legal technicalities of the criminal law.

If we are to make any progress with regard to having our young people become Canadians of whom we can be proud, we have to develop institutions which will implement social policies for reform and rehabilitation rather than institutions which are retrogressive and punitive with regard to treatment. I hope the Solicitor General will take this amendment into consideration and withdraw the bill. I hope he will appoint a group of serious men to study this problem, men from all walks of life rather than those from a limited area. The problem should be studied in all its aspects, and consultations held with organizations and institutions across the country. Perhaps the group could go to England, Scotland and Scandinavia to study their schemes and then bring in a bill of which all Canadians could be proud.

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether hon. members are satisfied with the form of the amendment. At first glance, from the point of view of the Chair it appears that this is a regular, reasoned amendment. Unless objections are taken to it from a procedural standpoint, the amendment will be considered as having been put to the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Carried.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, under this legislation, Bill C-192, it is proposed to discontinue the use of the terms "delinquency" and "delinquent" and substitute a somewhat more complex classification by the use of the terms "violation", "offence", "violators" and "offenders". I feel that legislation dealing with young persons should not be unduly complex and should be readily understood by parent and child alike. To discontinue use of the term "delinquency" would indicate a desire motivated in part to get rid of the existing stigma associated with it. It is my belief that a change in terminology will not resolve the problem; it is basically a matter of better education. I intend to use the term "delinquency" throughout my remarks as being the closest description of the subject matter of the bill.

It has been said that delinquency, whether juvenile or adult, is nothing more than a by-product or an expression of the system of values maintained by society as a whole. In this connection we should remember that the children who appear before juvenile courts constitute but a small fraction of the total juvenile population who are delinquent in one way or another. Who or what is to blame for juvenile delinquency? I do not know the answer but I can point out some opinions that have received varying degrees of support. It has been said that children become delinquent because they model their behaviour after delinquent adults.

Mr. Dinsdale: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: This does not mean that there is an imitation of any particular person or individual but, rather, the growing child draws fragments of his model from various sources, that is, through imitation of individuals or groups who serve as models for his behaviour. Another aspect of this approach points up the prevalence in our society of values that tend to promote delinquency. It is said that as adults we are strongly individualistic, fiercely competitive, that we are childishly imitative and, above all, materialistic and that these aspects of our society all stress, in their achievement, some disregard for the welfare and the rights of other persons.

We tend to become more and more a nation of transients, and the continual movement of families from place to place can be especially difficult for growing children who must face a series of adjustments and readjustments. We are becoming more and more city dwellers rather than rural dwellers. We become more and more industrialized. As a result it is said that the large family, with the mutual dependence of its members upon each other, is passing from the scene. The thought is, I suppose, that the greater the sense of independence on the part of a young person, the more readily will he exercise that independence by flying in the face of accepted standards of conduct.

The mass communication media, television, radio, the press and motion pictures, are often seized upon as the primary culprits in promoting juvenile delinquency. Some people think that television, for example, may have some effect upon the way in which a young person commits an offence but that it has no effect in bringing about the state of mind in which he decides to commit it. Certain studies which have been conducted in the United States have purported to show that scientific investigation has failed to find any scientific proof of any major or general influence of crime, violence and horror shows on delinquent behaviour. At the same time, however, there is equally no proof that such programs do not have any connection or influence.

We all know how highly prized the television medium is by the advertiser—and by the politician, for that matter—to promote the sale of his product, and by many teachers as an aid to the education of children. If television is effective for advertising and teaching purposes in relation to young people, it must seem indeed to be a paradox that its horror, crime and violence content should not influence the mind of the child.

Some observers believe that a prominent cause of delinquency in the young stems from the emancipation of women. Of course, we all know that men are inclined to attribute most of the world's ills to this sociological development. These particular commentators are gallant enough to say that when the mother goes out to work in a planned and properly organized way, no harm is done; but when her working schedule is thoughtless and unplanned, the result may well lead to a substantial degree of insecurity and neglect in relation to her children.

Finally, in relation to the causes of juvenile delinquency there are some who take the fatalistic point of view that since the beginning of human existence on this planet the older generation has been critical of the behaviour of the younger generation. It is said that this chasm between the adult world and the youthful world is perennial and persisting and that although today, in essence, it is no different than it has been in the past, nevertheless at the present time the chasm is much more sharply defined and much more in evidence than ever before. I am not overly familiar with conditions that exist in jurisdictions in the southern provinces, but I can say that in the Yukon the incidence of juvenile offences has increased dramatically. Nowhere is the gap more evident between law enforcement agencies and young people in our society at the moment than in the jurisdiction I represent.

How great a problem do we have with juvenile delinquency in Canada? It is curious that notwithstanding the tremendous interest and, indeed, even concern on the part of the public over delinquency, most people when questioned about the extent of the local problem hasten to assure the questioner that they do not really have a problem in their community. Generally they will point to the nearest large industrial city and indicate that the delinquency problem may exist there, but "not in our town". Our experience in Canada seems to correspond with that of an American observer who commented on the fact that a peculiar characteristic of the half million youngsters who are reported annually in the courts of the United States is their anonymity in the eyes of the general public. He said that they seem never to have names, faces or local addresses.

We have some information on the nature of the problem. We know that nine out of ten juveniles who are found guilty by the juvenile courts are students, and that two out of three are in grade 6, 7, 8 or 9. A high proportion of them are one year or more behind the average grade for their age. Eight out of 10 are between 12 and 15 years of age. That fact puts me in mind of the provision in the bill respecting the arrest, apprehension and detention of young persons. It also puts me in mind of a case current in my jurisdiction involving a 15-year old who has been charged with murder. For three months that 15-year old was kept in a correctional institution utilized for the detention of adult convicts.

There are no facilities in my jurisdiction for the detention of young persons. Perhaps the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) will take that into consideration, because I think that this lack has a chain-like ramification, right down the line, with respect to the treatment of young offenders. For instance, there were no facilities for the detention of this youngster who was charged with murder, and as a result he had to be kept in an institution for the detention of adult convicts. Because of that the Crown had to apply to have his case transferred to the adult courts. It was not until the territorial administration relented and undertook to provide for the custody and detention of this youngster that he was placed where he is now, in the detention home for young offenders recently established in my jurisdiction.

We know, Sir, that the rate of juvenile delinquency is increasing at a faster pace than is the general population. The increase—these statistics I have simply selected for the purpose of random comparison—between 1957 and 1961 should cause us to reflect. Between those years covering a five-year span the number of juvenile convictions for breaking and entering increased by 70 per cent. The number of convictions for theft and similar offences also increased by 70 per cent. Two out of three of the offences for which juveniles are convicted in Canada in juvenile court involve breaking and entering, theft or possession of stolen property.

If there is one thing we can say with assurance about juvenile delinquency, it is that it is not a new problem. The Greek scholars were concerned about it in their time, just as we are in ours. But I think we must be careful not to fall prey to the idea that juvenile delinquency has always been with us and that we are bound to have more of it as our population grows. That, again, is too much like a purely statistical approach. It can lead too easily to an attitude bordering on fatalism. If we accept the proposition that we are bound to have more juvenile delinquency, and sit back and wait for it to come, I suggest that the only result will be that we will have a lot more of it than we expect.

It is, of course, a difficult problem. It requires co-ordination and constant effort. But something can be done about it. The introduction of a procedure and the erection of a technical structure for dealing with youthful offenders as set out in Bill C-192 will not be sufficient. While constitutional responsibility in fields like this is divided among the various levels of government, the federal government can at least use its resources as the national government to assist in solving the problem on a nation wide basis. Bill C-192 certainly will not solve the problem because it fails to strike at its roots.

Another aspect of the over-all problem is the co-ordination of efforts of municipal and provincial police forces with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in an effort to prevent syndicated, organized crime from moving into Canada. The gambling, narcotics and prostitution rackets engaged in by those organizations can provide a fertile breeding ground for delinquency, as indeed has been happening. One of the suggestions that has been made, for instance, is that a program for teachers be instituted in the provinces in order to enable teachers to detect signs of delinquency and to equip them to deal with it.

Nowhere is information more woefully inadequate with respect to the implementation of this kind of program than in the field of narcotics. If the true statistics were known in this connection, they would stagger the imaginations of even the most lassitudinous and complacent members of the adult world. In my jurisdiction the situation has now reached the stage where a young person only has to decide whether he or she will use narcotics and they will be available if the decision is made to use them. This does not apply only to the older generation; it applies both to high schools and elementary schools, right down to children who are 12 years old.

I have had personal experience with a young girl aged 12 who was not using mild drugs but hard drugs. Of course, the habit costs money. It breeds the crimes of breaking and entering and theft to support the habit. This is the kind of program, similar to the one announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) a short while ago, that requires to be implemented in conjunction with legislation like Bill C-192. The program announced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare with respect to the setting up and support of organizations which will deal effectively with the roots of the problem that makes Bill C-192 necessary is indeed welcome in my own constituency. Included in the problem is the abuse of non-medical drugs and narcotics.

It is also felt that the still high percentage of early dropouts from school is one of the contributing factors of juvenile delinquency. This, of course, raises a problem. It is one which the provinces have been grappling with and, I believe, making some progress on for many years, namely, of ensuring that in addition to opportunities for academic training, youngsters should also have an opportunity to develop other abilities and skills if they are more suited for them. The federal government, under the technical and vocational training assistance legislation, has now under way 160 to 170 vocational and technical schools in Canada. It may well be that this program, in addition to its value from the economic point of view, can also be used as an instrument in the fight against juvenile delinquency. Before that becomes possible a teacher and educational training program must be implemented.

I would mention at this point that there is a necessity for professionally trained people in our communities, to deal with young people. I know that the shortage of probation officers is one factor that has been mentioned in hearings before the committee. In my jurisdiction, the lack of probation services and professionally trained persons to deal with young people is unbelievably and woefully inadequate. The state of New York, with a population of 18 million, has some 1,600 probation officers, while Canada has less than 300 people engaged full time in this work. The proper case load is considered to be 35 boys or 25 girls per case worker. It has been estimated that here the load is 180 or more per case worker.

Juvenile delinquency has been blamed on the lack of parental control, lack of schooling, poverty, our environment, our society, our lack of faith and our materialism. The truth, of course, is that the fault can be laid on any or none of these things. If we could find the answer, the complete answer, then we could perhaps effect the complete cure. There is no simple answer. It is a complex problem brought about by numerous causes both psychological and sociological. Just as there is no one simple and uncomplicated child, there is no one simple, uncomplicated solution. This is why in this particular field the more knowledge, understanding, humanity and money that can be brought to bear on the entire field of the activities of youth, the better will be our society. This is one field where the community must work as a whole.

Because the Minister of National Health and Welfare is in the House I wish to mention that there is one such organization wherein the community is working as a whole. The adult establishment is working hand in hand with the younger element in that community, some of whom have been on the narcotic scene and some of whom have not yet been on the narcotic scene. We all welcome the announced program of several million dollars to be used for the purpose of fighting the evil perpetuation of the younger elements of our society falling into a pattern of regular use of narcotics. It is a field which cannot be swept clean by the cleansing fury of any one individual. There are many Canadians who are not only aware of the problem and the steps which must be taken to combat it but who are taking these steps. Here I refer to the splendid work being done by organizations such as the scouts, guides, the YMCA, YWCA, the many boys clubs and the religious youth groups which are all playing their part.

I would like to emphasize that the fight against juvenile delinquency lies with every part of society. I believe it is vitally important in this field that every action be governed by unity. The federal government can play a leading role in providing the leadership that is necessary if there is to be united action by the provinces and territories of this country. There are other fields in which one specialist profession can do great work. Organizations dedicated to the elimination of a disease or an affliction have clearly recognizable objects and aims. No matter how arduous their task, they are at least fully conscious of their enemy and can bend the whole energy of their organization toward its destruction.

In juvenile delinquency we have a problem as recurring and shifting as any which has ever faced society. There seems to be no permanent cure and no ultimate solution. Where there is youth, there will always be found the problems of youth. In tackling these problems, the only effective approach is the unified one in which every member of society realizes the problem and, more important, takes part in combating it. It is not a battle which can be won by a series of sanctimonious lectures nor by harsh, primitive methods in the courts. Nor will it be won by pampering and weakness. It can only be won if first of all the extent and nature of the complaint is fully exposed and then tackled by comprehensive and co-ordinated measures.

Before concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words about the woeful lack of services available to the poorer sections of our populations, particularly to Indian people. The greatest majority of youthful offenders who appear before the courts in my jurisdiction are full-blooded Indian or Métis young people.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is the same in other parts of the country.

Mr. Nielsen: As the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) has pointed out, it is the same in other parts of the country; yet legal aid facilities are not available to these young people or their parents. They often appear in court alone because their parents are out of the country or for other reasons cannot be found; and there, in a strange atmosphere, a foreign milieu, they are confronted with accusations of crime, not knowing what to do, what to say or in which direction to turn.

• (4:50 p.m.)

The same deficiency appears in the bill before us as appeared in the previous legislation. Too often, police officers apprehending young offenders embark upon a series of questions and inquiries in the absence of either the parents or other responsible adults. I am not disparaging the fine work of police forces such as the RCMP; nevertheless, I deplore the investigative techniques employed by law enforcement officers who, having apprehended a young person defined as a juvenile under the act, embark upon a course of investigation in the absence of a parent.

Sometimes investigating officers will wait until after such an interrogation has taken place before notifying the parent or guardian of the young person's apprehension. Again, particularly in the case of a first offender, the young person is confronted with a foreign atmosphere in the police station. He is under a cloud of fear, perhaps under a misconception that he is required by law to answer questions. He is not informed whether or not at this stage he is entitled to counsel. He is not told his parents are being notified.

I am not suggesting this is done in every instance, but these abuses have occurred on too many occasions. I have even had experience of one case where four young people were apprehended on a narcotics charge. Among them were persons who could be defined as juveniles under this proposed legislation and under existing legislation. They were stripped to the skin and searched bodily, and their clothing was also seached, before their parents were notified. The Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) could help to avoid this kind of thing happening in the future by issuing specific instructions. I remind hon. members in this connection that the Solicitor General is specifically responsible for the RCMP and that the Minister of Justice is the Attorney General for both the northern territories. A specific instruction is all that would be required to prevent this kind of abuse in the future.

My last observation on the bill at this stage concerns the choice of judicial officers to deal with youthful offences. We all know that the federal government appoints judges by and large on the basis of whether the potential appointee has been a faithful adherent of the political party which finds itself in power and makes the appointment. This is deplorable enough in relation to the appointment of superior court judges, but I certainly do not believe this course should be followed in the appointment of judiciary officials charged with responsibility for dealing with youthful offenders. He or she must bring something more to their work than legal training.

What is required above everything is an understanding of youth and the problems of youth. There is enough of a chasm between the adult establishment and the youth of our country without widening it still further by placing political appointees, who might otherwise not be well-qualified for this particular task, on the judicial bench to deal with young offenders, often without the slightest idea of the problems of youth and young persons generally. This system must cease if any headway is to be made even with respect to the technical administration of Bill C-192.

I urge the Solicitor General to take up with his officials the observations I have made concerning my constituency, in the hope that the difficulties which now exist in the Yukon may be alleviated. One word, before I take my seat, with respect to the operation of the detention home for young offenders in the Yukon. I must toss a bouquet out, because here is a young institution which in the course of its operation has accomplished a great deal in reducing the incidence of crime by youthful offenders in my constituency. Its stated objective, and one I believe it follows, is that the sooner young offenders can be sent out of the institution and back into their homes, the better. The institution has a staff of very fine persons employed at Wolf Creek and they are doing excellent work.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, those who are in the best position to express objective remarks on a bill such as the one before us, are obviously those who are daily directly involved in the specific problems of young people.

Therefore, I think that the brief sent to us by the authorities of Boscoville makes clear, in a very satisfactory manner, what should be changed in this legislation in order to make it acceptable.

• (5:00 p.m.)

In his letter dated January 20, 1971, the director of Boscoville, Mr. Gilles Gendreau, emphasized, among other things the following, and I quote:

Boscoville considers that twenty years of rehabilitation work with young offenders allows it, when this legislation is being considered, to make some comments so that the law-makers may be still better informed before the adoption and the implementation of the Young Offenders Act.

We hope that this information will throw more light on the matter and we wish to assure you that our main concern is to help as much as possible the young misfits.

Of course, there is not one member in this House who would suggest that there is any partisanship there. Therefore, I think it is my duty to bring up, as faithfully as possible the amendments proposed and the objective criticism advanced by Boscoville and, to do so, Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to quote large extracts from the brief itself.

On the whole, Boscoville recognizes that this bill is showing real progress in its more constructive approach towards young offenders.

I said about the same thing during the speech I delivered on the first amendment to this bill.

The spirit of our remarks would like to express, however, extremely serious concern with regard to the rehabilitation philosophy and the practical measures in general relating to such a policy.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the problem which became obvious to those who are daily and directly involved in juvenile delinquency.

The brief deals with the following matters:

1. Remarks concerning rehabilitation per se.
2. Age.
3. Education and training.
4. Accurate use of terms.

Remarks related to a concept of rehabilitation considered as a logical whole.

On page 27, section 30(4): Trial after rehabilitation process:

Boscoville considers it incompatible with a rehabilitation process to demand that a juvenile who has gone through a rehabilitation process be faced with a second trial at the end of his stay in a training school where he has undergone a transformation. Such a procedure amounts to advocating euthanasia for sick people suffering from a very serious but curable disease.

All those who realize what the rehabilitation of a young offender really means must vigorously oppose this clause. Boscoville's experience shows us that it is possible to save such youths and protect society at the same time without starting new proceedings which would only prove a set-back in the rehabilitation of a young person who would have to undergo a new trial. It even seems to us that such a measure amounts to prevent any real possibility of rehabilitation for these young offenders. Therefore we oppose this clause.

A second point is underlined on page 55, section 60(4), in connection with publicity and this is what those who have been dealing with this type of problem for the past 20 years have to say about it:

It is said that a judge could grant permission to publish reports on some of the proceedings in the case of a young offender.

For purposes of rehabilitation, we submit that no publicity whatsoever should be allowed on the subject of the actual act committed by a young offender whenever the latter appears before a juvenile court.

No permission to disclose to the public any aspect of the family or personal problem should be granted. The risks involved are too great for such a thing to be allowed. This is clearly viewed from the rehabilitation standpoint which definitely implies that an individual should not have to bear social stigmas which are not conducive to social reinstatement.

This is unavoidable in the case of adults and under no circumstances must it be permitted in the case of young people, for it would be a backward step.

Then the following point is emphasized on page 53 of the brief, with regard to clause 59(2) (b):

Incarceration with adults.

A judge may by warrant commit a young person to detention. It seems to us that such a measure should not be applied towards a young person when there are detention facilities for adolescents within the judicial area where the proceedings are taking place. Contacts with adult inmates, during the incarceration prior to rehabilitation are to be avoided since they might well stigmatize a young person. Past experiences prove that such things are to be eliminated whenever possible.

About the judge's role, here is what they say:

The judge is the final representative of society. We should like to point out that as a rule, the judge must be the final representative of society for the young person and it is important that he be in a position to play that role.

The judge's personalization. The judge must as much as possible be a personalized judge, that is a judge who is responsible for a youth throughout his criminal life. If possible, a young offender should not appear before a new judge each time he is charged with a new offence. The judge who started with him should continue to hear the cases involving the young man unless it is clearly unadvisable.

And about the judge and the superintendent:

We must avoid giving to the superintendent, as pointed out in clause 47, paragraph 1, the responsibility to transfer from one institution to another. The judge must be the one who appraises the value of the rehabilitation measures that society, of which he is the final representative, takes for this youth. This must be respected if we want the judge to play the role that experience has proved essential to a successful rehabilitation.

And the brief goes on about the age of the children:

A child between 10 and 14 should not, under any circumstances, be kept in a place where there are persons other than children of his age. Such a juvenile should never be allowed to come into contact with adults or older youths. Experience in the matter proves the absolute necessity of avoiding such contacts.

And further on, the preparation and training of people is mentioned:

All through the act, no mention is made of the quality of the preparation and training of persons who must deal with young people, at any level.

As to institutions, the brief says, and I quote:

Furthermore, nothing is said about the quality of the institutions (in a broad sense) which must receive, greet and take care of the juveniles entrusted to them by the judge.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, we must consider that a law may appear, at first glance, to be efficient, but if the essential elements are missing which would prevent its application and, especially, dent its spirit, it is useless. It is the same as putting the cart before the horse, and how can we really succeed in solving the problem of juvenile delinquents only through rules and laws, if we have not completely solved the problem of the persons who will be trained to do it, and of the institutions which will be established to provide the rehabilitation?

In conclusion, this brief from Boscoville states:

We are aware that these remarks might appear very limited in scope since they deal mainly with rehabilitation aspects. However, in the long run, it must be kept in mind that legislation dealing with young offenders must pave the way to rehabilitation and if this is not the case, we shall have gone against the spirit of the law. It must be understood that Boscoville felt duty bound to point this out to the legislator, and it hopes that the later will take its views into consideration. The Boscoville Executive Committee would be very happy to give further information if required.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, may I say that I hope the minister and his officials have consulted these people who are directly concerned with juvenile delinquency, and that the minister will agree to the amendments that are needed in order to improve this bill which, in principle, is a good one, as I said in my first speech on the subject.

But, Mr. Speaker, this is the proper time for the minister to show the necessary objectivity. Indeed, if we must change the law, let us change it in such a way that it may help settle this extraordinary problem of juvenile delinquency, a problem which becomes that much more complicated today because adults, as such and by their legislation, do nothing to set a very stimulating example to young people.

In the end, if all the problems were thoroughly analyzed, we would realize that often it is the adults' fault if delinquency fares well and flourishes so easily in our country in these particularly difficult times.

Then, Mr. Speaker, hoping that the minister may note and apply all the objective suggestions which may be put to him, I hope that this reform of the Juvenile Delinquents Act may benefit all the young people of Canada.

• (5:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, it would seem that this type of legislation frequently produces the best sort of debate in this House. I speak not in terms of the sparks struck but in terms of the content of the speeches and the information presented to the House by hon. members. In that regard I think I can point to the speech of my colleague, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert), and that of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) this afternoon.

It is therefore with some reluctance that I rise to speak on the measure, because I do not consider myself to be in any way well versed in the subject matter encompassed by the young offenders bill. However, I have been impressed by the number of representations which I have received on the subject. I have been impressed by the quality of the presentations and by the qualifications of the people making them. Opposition to the bill has come from the Canadian Mental Health Association, from officials associated with juvenile courts, from social workers, from children's aid societies, from sociologists, psychologists, psychiatrists and persons associated with foster parent plans.

After looking at the attack on the bill and the bill itself, on one side of the question—the social agencies concerned with rehabilitation—and on the other side the law officers of the Crown who are concerned with protecting society and the legal and procedural rights of young persons who have come into conflict with the established rules of society, it occurred to me that this might be an appropriate place for the intervention of an amateur whose views have not been shaped by professional involvement with one side of the problem or the other.

It would seem to me—here again I speak with some trepidation, not possessing any great degree of expert knowledge—that there are three major considerations to take into account in examining this bill, and that the public concern which has manifested itself results from the fact that the bill deals, as a result of jurisdictional problems, I suspect, with only one of the three major areas of concern. Because the bill deals with only one of the three areas, people are justifiably concerned about the effects it will have if implemented. They justifiably argue that it should not be implemented until there is further clarification of its potential effects.

The three factors which must be weighed in the consideration of this bill are, I submit, the following. First, what is to be our over-all philosophy of dealing with young persons who have run afoul of the law? Are we to consider them to be, in effect, young criminals requiring punishment? Are we to consider them to be persons not responsible for their actions, who need assistance in understanding the strictures imposed by life in a community? Or are we to consider them to have understood that they were acting wrongly and that they did so because of some social or psychological maladjustment? Obviously, there are many other philosophical approaches which should be considered; but the philosophy which governs this act must be well defined.

The second consideration is, how are we as a society to determine if a young person has offended against society? What are the procedures we wish to employ in so determining, and what safeguards for the civil liberties of persons involved in such procedures is it necessary for us as a society to offer? The third consideration is, once guilt—if I may so term it—or culpability has been determined, what facilities are available to us as a society to effectively carry out the actions implied by the established philosophy for dealing with young persons who have acted in a manner unacceptable to society?

Those are the three considerations that are encompassed by this bill. It would appear to me that those who drafted the bill have concentrated almost entirely upon the second of the three factors, the determination of guilt and the protection of the legal rights of individuals involved in such procedures. Here let me say in all fairness that in this regard the bill does make some progress. In this respect I should like to quote from a document presented to some members of the House, entitled "A critique of Bill C-192, the Young Offenders Act" which was prepared by John A. MacDonald, assistant professor in the school of social work at the University of British Columbia. In his critique of the bill he notes the following:

> Bill C-192 also contains a number of positive features. Thus the bill has a number of welcome provisions designed to limit the arrest and pre-trial detention of juveniles. It also, for the first time, provides juveniles with appeal provisions similar to those available to adult offenders. The bill also contains an excellent section designed to restrict the dissemination of information from the records of the juvenile court. The bill also abolishes the much-criticized offence of "contributing to juvenile delinquency" while at the same time making formal provision for trial in juvenile court of criminal offences primarily affecting family members.

In all fairness, those provisions of the bill are of value. Those who prepared it should be congratulated for including those provisions. In preparing it and in making this progress they were obviously involved to some extent in deciding, perhaps in an unstated fashion, the major philosophical premise which must govern our treatment of young persons who have run afoul of the law. But the bill does not in any way involve the third factor which I have mentioned, namely, the treatment facilities which are necessary for the administration of this law. I suspect, as I have already said, that this factor is not encompassed in the bill for jurisdictional reasons, but I suggest it is within the treatment facilities that the crux of the problem lies.

Moreover, I suggest that since the bill does not deal with treatment facilities, since in addition neither members of this House nor the Canadian public have any knowledge or information about the sort of facilities the provinces intend to make available to administer the act, and since, further, there is no clear understanding of the philosophy which will govern our dealings with young offenders, as the bill terms them, it would be entirely wrong for us to proceed with this legislation. It leaves too much to chance in an area where society cannot afford to take chances. I speak of society's treatment of its young.

I am extremely sorry, for these reasons, that the amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) was not acceptable to the government. For the same reasons I hope that the government will accept the suggestion made last evening by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Tolmie) that it be in no particular rush to get the legislation through the committee stage, that ample time be granted for concerned individuals and organizations to present their views, that ample time be permitted for an attempt to reconcile or to choose between the two major philosophical approaches to this question, that of the deterrent school and that of the behavioural problem school, if I may be permitted to oversimplify. I hope the committee study will result in an understanding of the intentions of the provincial governments with respect to the administration of the act, should this bill become law, and that the committee will have an opportunity to review related legislation in foreign jurisdictions.

In brief, I hope the government will grant the committee a completely free hand to alter, amend and vary this legislation after the fullest possible study of its subject matter. Beyond that, I would urge the government to treat this legislation as a matter of conscience rather than as a matter of government policy. I should like to take a moment to suggest the kind of legislation I would like to see emerge from such committee study. I hope the philosophy which emerges will not emphasize punishment but, rather, will emphasize the reformation and rehabilitation of the individual.

I hope a clear understanding of the kind of facilities and procedures necessary to provide for reform and rehabilitation will emerge, and that there will be a clear understanding of how they are to be provided and where the money will come from. I hope that such a study will result in a system of articulated rehabilitation agencies being established. I hope that such a study will result in the avoidance of the child being treated, as is the case in respect of the present act, as a little adult with no reference to the key importance of the family unit. Further, I hope that the double jeopardy aspects of the law will be removed during the course of the study. I hope the study will result in raising still further the age at which a young person is liable to criminal prosecution. Finally, I hope this type of philosophy will be reflected in a new title for the bill which would avoid the term young offender.

I made no apology for not having gone into these areas of concern and many other related matters in more detail. This has already been done, and ably, by other spokesmen for this party, notably the hon. member for Broadview. I would simply again urge the minister to give sympathetic consideration to the points I have made in the course of my brief remarks and which other members made this afternoon, yesterday and on earlier days when the bill was debated. Failing his undertaking to consider these matters, and failing his giving a firm undertaking to this House to the effect that they will be embraced within amendments to the bill, I cannot see how we have any alternative to supporting the amendment which has been presented to the House by the hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, on second reading of the bill presently before us, that is, the act respecting young offenders, I should like again to call the attention of the minister to certain remarks that I made on January 13 and 14, when we were considering a motion by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), that consideration of this bill be entrusted to a group of experts.

At that time, Mr. Speaker, I was calling the attention of the minister to clauses 2, 4, 19, 26, 28, 30, 39 and 74. I had limited my study of the bill to these clauses, and after considering the whole thereof, the aspect which impressed me was that these clauses were all inspired by the same philosophy regarding criminality.

Mr. Speaker, I said then that Bill C-192 was prompted by an impulse to jail individuals rather than to rehabilitate them.

I also stated in that connection that courts were duly set up, that the taking of pictures and fingerprints as well as the emprisonment of young people with adults were allowed, and that under some provisions of the law those young people will be submitted to a cross-examination. In short, those provisions, based on the same philosophy of criminality, do not make any distinction between young and adult offenders found guilty of the same offences.

Mr. Speaker, Maurice Patin, a former President of the Criminal section of the Supreme Court of Appeal, said the following:

> If we want to eradicate crime, there is something else to do than to punish the wrongdoers.

That means that from now on, we shall have to get inspiration from a philosophy of recuperation of the individual who, for one reason or another, suffered prejudice or was unlucky and one day found himself before the welfare court, in Montreal or elsewhere, after having been caught in the very act of breaking and entering, rape, receiving stolen goods and any other offence. If he is shown understanding, and if dialogue is possible, we are on the right track. If, furthermore, the judge who hears the case of the young boy or girl is provided with the necessary resources to ensure their rehabilitation, we could say that Bill C-192 is a step forward.

I have no doubt that this act must be brought up to date, since the last one was passed, I believe, in 1929. It is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that in that field and many others, we must keep up with the times. But the fact remains that, under our present system, this bill does not change the situation in any way. It gives more discretion to the judge with regard to the criminal aspect, but less with regard to rehabilitation.

Mr. Speaker, we wish precisely the contrary and that is the point on which I want to draw the attention of the minister. Here is a real case: a young person, found guilty of burglary appears before the welfare court judge. The judge must study in his office close to 3,000 cases a year. That is nonsense. That shows how the judge cannot discharge conscientiously his duties, even if he wanted to. Whether he be the best judge available, if he is to hear 25, 50 or 60 cases of delinquency per day, he has to do only half of his work. So much so that the young person will not find either justice or protection in that court. And finally, the young person who will have been submitted to this over-accelerated process— because, in this field as in others, production comes first—will be entrusted to education centres.

Now, nothing proves that it will be possible to re-educate this young person in such rehabilitation centres as Saint-Vallier for instance.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Champlain (Mr. Matte) quoted earlier long extracts from a very well drafted brief by the Boscoville authorities, and it is to be noted that in this brief, the emphasis is on rehabilitation. I read with great interest the speech that the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) made when this bill was introduced. I think that he is quite sincere there and I trust that the representations made today will give results, because he is young, and because he is as much interested in this problem as the rest of us.

As I said in my speech of January 13 last, if hon. members would forget their political opinions to really consider the problems facing these young people who are called criminals but who, in fact, are not in most cases, we would then draw our inspiration from another philosophy.

I should like to make it clear to the minister. This bill is not actually bad in itself because several of its clauses are quite acceptable and have long been hoped for. I commend the minister for it. However, some provisions do not provide the necessary tools to reach the objective.

What is this objective? Is it to find criminals in order to pass judgement on them, or else is it not to retrace juveniles and give them opportunities they did not have in their youth?

What is our goal? Are we seeking to increase the number of criminals, somewhat in the way we are now increasing the number of unemployed, or are we really seeking to help young people?

Mr. Speaker, if really we want to help them, before presenting such a bill—I do not say it is bad, but I say it is putting the cart before the horse—we must first finance new rehabilitation centres and foster homes, appoint more judges so that justice may be speeded up and gone into more deeply, so that individual justice may truly be meted out. We want, not quantity justice, but quality justice, in other words justice which respects the rights of all and gives to all the required opportunities. Last Thursday I called on Justice Marcel Trahan, in Montreal, and on Chief Justice J.-P. Lavallée who sit in the same court. I went there on my own. I wanted to talk to young offenders. Above all I wanted to become acquainted with the problems of the judge and to try to put myself in his place, not that I credit myself with his talents, but as a member of Parliament, if one wants the laws to reflect reality, one must not be afraid to get involved and find out what is going on.

Therefore I met Judge Trahan and Judge Lavallée. I attended hearings. I understood the problem. I saw countless people place their trust in the judge, and they were very pleased to get help because, on the whole, 99.9 per cent of those people cannot financially, morally, physically or otherwise, help themselves.

Mr. Speaker, our society's first responsibility is to help those who cannot help themselves. That is why I was shocked, flabbergasted at the sight of the judges' problem.

In the speech I delivered on January 13 and 14, I said that many of the present judges were appointed either through political influence or because of their many years of service for the cause of justice. It is very well if they were selected on account of their vast experience, but I was inclined to believe that many of them did their work so as to get rid of it.

I was able to realize that although we have excellent judges, although in the province of Quebec, for instance, courts had many excellent judges, the problem would not be solved. As a matter of fact, in the welfare court at 410 Bellechasse Street East in Montreal—for the information of the Solicitor General—there are 18 of them, each of whom hears more than 3,000 cases per year. One can imagine the results.

Let us pass the bill we want, let us make the partisan policy we want in connection with this bill, let us judge as many young people as we want, let us appoint the best judges we want, if we do not meet these two basic conditions, we will still be left with a system of poultices on wooden legs and nothing will be settled. On the contrary, the crime rate will increase as well as the number of repeaters.

Mr. Speaker, we must not only appoint a greater number of judges to grant better justice to those young people but we must—and this is most urgent—set up the required rehabilitation centres to put them back into a climate that will help them develop their personality.

If you put a rotten apple inside a barrel of good apples the rotten apple will not be changed by the barrel of good apples. It is more likely that the whole barrel will go bad because of that single rotten apple. The only way to deal with this problem, in the barrel of apples, is to take the rotten apple and put it elsewhere or make marmelade with it. We must prevent this rotten apple from infecting the rest of the barrel. This depends on our priorities. I hope I will be forgiven this example taken from nature but things have gone that far today with criminality in Canada.

If we genuinely want to help the young—and I do not mean they should be put in an ivory tower—the should be given an opportunity to truly live their lives thanks to personal rehabilitation, and psychologists, psychoanalists, social workers, probation officers, and so forth, could help them achieve it.

Mr. Speaker, when attending hearings before the Welfare Court, when examining the cases before a judge, when witnessing the speed with which the work must be done, because there are too few judges, and this, even though the technical means are enormous, one cannot but doubt that the administration of the bill now before the House will bring effective results.

This is why I urge the minister, even if this may not seem in order, even if the matter does not come under federal jurisdiction, to do something.

Mr. Speaker, if we keep hiding behind jurisdictions, if the constitution and financial reasons keep us from settling this problem, if Ottawa says: "This is a problem pertaining to Quebec", and if Quebec says: "We have no money, let Ottawa provide us with some", the young will continue to rot, to fill unhealthy rehabilitation centres, and the problem will remain unsolved.

I think that the Solicitor General who does understand the nature of the problem will do everything in his power to hustle Quebec—in case Quebec is unable to assume its responsibilities in this area—and make them appoint a larger number of capable judges from among people who are interested in helping our youngsters, and thus solve the problem.

To further support my claim, let me give you some official figures. I will only tell you the number of cases heard during the month of December, 1970 by Mr. Justice Léandre Prévost of the welfare court.

On December 1, Justice Prévost disposed of 24 cases. A judge's day, like that of a member of Parliament, has only 24 hours. Accordingly, the conclusion is that not much time was devoted to each case. It is not his fault, it is the system! One cannot solve the problem simply by blaming the Constitution for it.

On December 2, the judge heard 21 cases. On December 4, 13 cases. On December 7, 20 cases. On December 9, 28 appearances, 28 cases, and so forth. On December 28, 36 cases. On some days, he heard more than 55 cases, so that for the month of December, he heard a total of 258 cases.

I shall say more about this. From January 1 to December 31 inclusive, 1970, Justice Léandre Prévost, who does his possible best, heard 2,467 cases about young people who need personalized understanding, who need a helping hand.

One probation officer may have to deal with very many young people. The judge can only read the file quickly and try to assess each case to the best of his knowledge. Under these conditions, you cannot expect a man to work more than 24 hours a day.

A judge told me last Thursday: "Give us the tools, we will do the job". Who indeed should provide these tool, Mr. Speaker, if not federal and provincial members? We must make up our minds once and for all.

Before resuming my seat, I urge again the minister to give the tools to people dealing with this problem so that they can do their job in a truly human fashion with a view to rehabilitating individuals.

I would hate to hear the minister say that he cannot act because this is beyond his jurisdiction. If the Solicitor General is really sincere, and I do not doubt it, and wishes to help young delinquents, he will do everything in his power to wake Quebec up so that this province will assume its responsibilities, so that we will really be able to give proper tools to the people who work in this field to solve the problem, especially by showing more concern for rehabilitation than for criminality.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Speaker, welfare courts as well as training centres should smell less of criminals, of charges, of legal technicalities and more of understanding, humanization, personal service given to an individual who maybe only waits for this chance to survive.

I have here some very interesting statistics taken from the magazine Le jeune délinquant homicide which was printed after a seminar held at Boscoville, in Montreal, on June 10, 1970. Thirteen cases are shown, without names, of young people guilty of murder and manslaughter.

At first sight, they seem guilty, dangerous and they must be sent to prison. Analyzing the picture and studying the chapter entitled "Understanding between parents", one finds that most cases relate to disputes, poor understanding, misunderstanding between common law partners, separated couples and so on.

Can the youngster who has been brought up in such surroundings be blamed? No. It will then be necessary in social welfare courts and rehabilitation centres to take into account that he has suffered from lack of understanding. Let us give him that understanding. He has been lacking fatherly and motherly love. Let us give him that love. He has asked for a break, the possibility of a dialogue. Let us give him that break, that possibility of a dialogue and then the frequency of juvenile delinquency or relapse will surely decrease.

Mr. Justice Trahan told me something that cut me to the heart but which was true. Incidentally, he is a really remarkable man. He told me: "André, I heard the cases of some fathers, then I judged their sons and today, I judge their grandsons".

Mr. Speaker, this proves that our system is topsy-turvy and if we do not set it right, we shall have to recognize that it is administered by the most mixed-up people that ever existed.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Solicitor General is aware of the problem and that he is prepared to do his utmost to solve it. I would like him to agree with me that the bill is not enough, and that neither the administrative, legal or constitutional barriers, nor the financial limitations should prevent us from taking the necessary steps. No price is too high to guarantee the sound and normal development of a human being, particularly if that person is defenceless and resourceless.

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I spoke on Bill C-192 which is now under consideration, I drew the attention of the Solicitor General (Mr. Goyer) on the advisability of amending some provisions of that bill. I referred to clause 2(o), clause 17 (1)(2), clause 30(1)(4)(5), clause 59(2)(a)(b) and clause 60(4).

I think the government is taking a forward step in introducing this bill. I should like, however, to point out a specific aspect of the bill, namely the cause of delinquency in our country. Some reasons prompted the government to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act and it is surely not because that legislation had become useless.

On the contrary, the number of juvenile delinquents is increasing daily, especially in our urban centres.

I hope the government is aware that a certain responsibility must be assumed in this particular case and, by the way, every time members from our party have moved non-confidence motions,—the question of the vital minimum required for parents kept coming back. If a married couple with one, two, three or four children, has to live in a decent but very small tenement, and pay a rent that is very high, the mother has to go to work.

In fact, because of the rising cost of living in the last three, four or five years, parents have changed their plans in order to be able to support their brood. If the mother has to stay away from the house six, seven, eight, nine or ten hours a day, and this, five days a week, she must entrust the care of her children to the eldest girl, aged six, seven, or eight, who goes to school two, three or four days a week.

If something wrong happens in that home, the police investigates and then, the trouble starts. When the child sees a policeman barging in his home, because a neighbour complained that the children were trying to start a fire or had guests and were making an awful noise, the child develops an instinctive fear of the police. Therefore, at the start, this child is visited by an individual who is a complete stranger to his family, which causes an emotional disturbance that often brings the child before a judge before he is 18 or 20. In fact it has often been realized in juvenile courts that serious problems had developed from very minor causes which had developed into problems almost impossible to solve.

Why? Because of the absence of the parents.

I would also like to point out to the House that, as soon as a mother begins to work outside the home, especially in the cities, she begins, in most cases, to lose interest in her children and her husband. When, in the evening, the husband finds his wife tired and uninterested in her housekeeping, as was not the case previously, he goes to the tavern and takes a drink to forget his dissatisfaction. A few months or a few years later, this family finds itself facing very serious problems.

I believe that juvenile courts do their best, but the system appears to be organized in such a way as to promote an increase in juvenile delinquency each year, as my good friend the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) was saying a short while ago, and when the judge has passed judgment on the great-grandmother, the grandmother, the mother, and the young girl of 7, 8 10 or 12, everything is still the way it was before.

We should take active steps to change the laws whose purpose it is to settle most problems, juvenile delinquency in particular.

I am not against improving of the situation along the present lines, but I suggest that we should solve the real problems.

The way the government rules this country now, by introducing only stop-gap legislation, reminds me of the farmer, whose land is flooded every spring but who does not think of building a dam, which would eliminate the problem, once and for all.

I do not believe there will come a time when juvenile delinquency no longer exists, but I believe we should do something to reduce the number of victims of the government policy, especially children and young people from large families.

We are living in a chain system. The government decides that it wants to fight the alleged inflation created by the previous government. Therefore, plants cut down their production and lay off employees, who turn to unemployment benefits, thus increasing the tax burden of other taxpayers. Often, unemployment insurance benefits do not allow a family to live decently. Then, parents get discouraged and cease to take their responsibilities. Children, left to themselves, with parents socially fallen, set out on new adventures to make up for the shortcomings of the family environment. And this results in more and more juvenile delinquents.

This bill purports to solve the problem of young offenders, but should we not discuss also the problem of the parents of these young offenders who are offenders themselves?

Recently I had the opportunity to visit a secondary school with 810 students aged between 12 and 15. The parents of these children must have been 1,500 to 1,600 in number. Now then, there were only 22 of us parents. Where were the others? Nobody knows. Those parents who do not look after their children should be taken care of by some of the provisions of this act which would once and for all make it an obligation for them to look after their youngsters. Those parents should be fined or jailed at least in cases of outright negligence.

Is it not somewhat ridiculous that we should introduce a piece of legislation which tends to solve the problems of young offenders without concern for the responsibilities of the parents? I am positive that there are very many people who wonder what responsibility the government has in this field. And each and every Canadian should be wondering about that. Then they might decide to tackle the situation starting with the ones that are truly responsible.

The ones who are really to be blamed in 1970 are the parents who borrow money irresponsibly, who think only about themselves and forget those for whom they assumed some obligations, namely their children.

For the benefit of all members of this House, I should like to state a few principles. Let me report the thoughts expressed by senator Edward Kennedy when he discussed the basic obligation for parents to look after their children. This vital obligation is not only of a financial nature. Let me quote:

> No human need is more basic than the need for personal security. No desire is more instinctive than the desire for freedom from fear. Unless we can feel secure at home and in the streets, if we are threatened—be it by the officer of a police state or by a common criminal—then we are not free.

The provision of this protection which is the cornerstone of freedom and safety is the prime responsibility of a government and it is discharged by the judicial power. An economist would add: "To be free, you must have a little money".

As far as I am concerned, I am saying that one must at least have the basic necessities.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the government should seriously consider the whole system respecting juvenile delinquency. They must completely overhaul the current aspects of children's behaviour, including the attitude of parents towards their children. They must amend the Criminal Code or pass a law requiring parents to assume their responsibilities.

In my opinion, we must not either do what we are doing, that is be concerned about children without bothering with parents, if we want the number of juvenile delinquents to decline.

NATIONAL SECURITY

PUBLICATION OF BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON QUEBEC CRISIS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration.

This matter concerns the printing and publishing of a book by the Secretary of State, one of Her Majesty's Privy Councillors, who is sworn of the Privy Council and charged under section 11 of the British North America Act with the duty of aiding and advising Her Majesty in the government of Canada. Last October, Her Majesty, acting on the advice of Her Privy Council, proclaimed the War Measures Act. Under that act and its successor act, the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, Her Majesty has laid criminal charges against a number of citizens and these charges are now before the courts. The book purports to state certain facts upon which the Secretary of State based the advice he gave the Crown to invoke the War Measures Act. The proclamation of that act directly involved this House by way of a resolution of this House and a successor act. It has led to criminal charges which are now pending and therefore involves the courts.

Whether the comments of the Secretary of State are accurate is irrelevant, Mr. Speaker. The point is they should not be published as representing the views of the hon. gentleman as distinct from those of the Privy Council, of which he was and is a member.

This matter so concerns our constitutional system, regarding both Parliament and the courts, that it must be urgently considered.

• (2:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. Leader of the Opposition has given the Chair the notice required under Standing Order 26. May I point out to the hon. Leader of the Opposition that to a certain extent the form of the statement submitted to the Chair and the presentation of his motion to the House are out of order. If he will refer to Standing Order 26, he will read the following, and I quote:

> A member wishing to move, "That this House do now adjourn",— —shall give—

> —to Mr. Speaker...prior to the opening of a sitting, a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed.

Furthermore, section (3) of the same Standing Order, specifies, and I quote:

> When requesting leave to propose such a motion, the member shall rise in his place and present without argument the statement referred to in section (2) of this order.

I see that the practice generally followed by hon. members has been to keep to a general statement of the matter to be discussed under Standing Order 26, and this without substantial argument.

To that extent, it is possible for me to think that the motion is perhaps defective. I mention this aspect of the matter only to invite hon. members to follow as well as possible the general practice pursuant to Standing Order 26.

[English]

The point made by the Leader of the Opposition is that the views of the Secretary of State should not be published—and here I quote the hon. member's statement—

"as representing the views of the hon. gentleman as distinct from those of the Privy Council, of which he was and is a member."

I doubt very much that the hon. member's motion, in the terms he has proposed, would meet the requirements of Standing Order 26(1). In my view, the motion relates to the conduct of a minister and to that extent it is excluded from the operation of Standing Order 26.

I refer the House particularly to Standing Order 26, sections 16 (e) and 16 (f), and I respectfully suggest that the motion raises a substantive matter which can only be debated on a distinct motion under notice. I must therefore rule that the proposed motion of the Leader of the Opposition, being essentially of the nature of a censure motion and as a substantive motion, it cannot be put and considered under the provisions of Standing Order 26.

I might add that a similar notice has been filed with the Chair by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands which is perhaps different in some respects. I invite the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands to indicate the terms of his motion.

PUBLICATION OF BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON QUEBEC CRISIS—PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the publication of a book by a member of the government which has called into question the grounds on which Parliament was asked to enact the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, and the need for this House to discuss the desirability of asking that this act be rescinded forthwith.

Mr. Speaker: As I said a moment ago, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands has given due notice of his intention to request leave to move the adjournment of the House in order to debate the matter stated. I have also indicated to the House that the substance of the proposed motion arises from the same circumstances which were referred to by the Leader of the Opposition, although there is a distinction between the two proposals.

I remind hon. members at this point that the business of the House for today is a supply motion. After we have dealt with the routine proceedings of the House, we are to consider a matter which has been brought forward for consideration and debate by the House. This might make it even more difficult than in ordinary circumstances to grant the motion proposed by the Leader of the Opposition and that which is proposed by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

In this instance, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands seeks a debate to consider—and I quote his statement—"the grounds on which Parliament was asked to enact the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act and the need for this House to discuss the desirability of asking that this act be rescinded forthwith." The question raised by the hon. member is obviously of great importance, as was demonstrated by the lengthy debate which took place earlier this session on the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act. In arriving at a decision whether or not to accept a motion under Standing Order 26, in addition to the factors to which I referred when considering the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition, the Chair must take into account opportunities within a reasonable time for debate. It seems to me that such opportunities will occur within the reasonably near future, and for this reason I must decline to accept the motion put forward by the hon. member.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

PUBLICATION OF BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON QUEBEC CRISIS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he knew the Secretary of State was preparing a book on the Quebec crisis for publication and whether he indicated approval or disapproval of the publication of such a book?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I knew that the book had been prepared before it was effectively produced and I ensured that someone in my office checked the book to ensure that no erroneous facts were stated as far as we could see. I did nothing to prevent the publication of the book.

Mr. Stanfield: Are we therefore to assume that it is quite in order within the right hon. gentleman's government for members of the cabinet to publish, while remaining members of the government, their personal views with regard to important decisions taken and recommendations made to Parliament, as well as the facts justifying these decisions or recommendations?

Mr. Trudeau: It would depend, really, upon the contents of whatever book was published and whether or not it infringed some of the rules of cabinet solidarity or the oath of office, and so on. But surely there is no objection to a minister expressing his views on public events upon which everyone in the country has been expressing views in the past months. Surely it should not be left only to those—surely it should not be left only to those—

An hon. Member: You have said that a couple of times.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, but I repeat it as long as I cannot get attention for what I am saying. We think it is normal for those who want to support public order in Canada to express their views as well as those who want to disturb it.

An hon. Member: Touché.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanfield: It is all very well for the Prime Minister to try to skate around the question. I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether we are to assume from what he has said that the opinions expressed in the book are really the opinions of the government although set forth as the personal opinions of the Secretary of State? If this is not the case, is it permissible within this government for ministers to express their personal opinions about important decisions even though those opinions may differ from those of the government?

Mr. Trudeau: The final words, of course, condition the whole question. If the opinions differ, if they are fundamentally opposed to government policy, the minister is, of course, not free to express such opinions. But that is really begging the question. I do not see there is much difference between the written and the spoken word in this regard. Ministers have made speeches on various subjects. It is my practice to try to ensure, before they are delivered, that someone checks them for content.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Oh, oh?

PUBLICATION OF BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON QUEBEC CRISIS—SUGGESTED ROYAL COMMISSION TO EXAMINE FACTS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Since there appear to be serious discrepancies between statements made by the Secretary of State regarding the events of last October and the statements made by some of the ministers of the Crown at that time, and since there will continue to be controversy as to the actual facts leading up to the invoking of the War Measures Act, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he would be prepared to appoint a royal commission—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bell: More suspense.

Mr. Douglas: —to look into all the facts and the relevant data leading up to the invocation of the War Measures Act and the passing of the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, surely this is a frivolous suggestion. If there are passages in the book which are repugnant to the principles of cabinet solidarity or the principle of the oath of office, I would be happy for anyone to point them out and it would then be the duty of the government to take action. I cannot understand the concern of the opposition that this particular minister has expressed himself in writing, whereas all the time ministers are expressing themselves verbally. I might add that there is abundant precedent for ministers in office in the United Kingdom publishing books on crises of the day while they are in office, and I cannot particularly get excited about this instance.

Mr. Douglas: The Prime Minister appears to be answering the question of the Leader of the Opposition and not the question that I asked him. Since there are serious discrepancies in the facts as alleged by the Secretary of State and other ministers of the government, would the Prime Minister be prepared to set up a royal commission so as to give the Canadian people the actual facts as to the events leading up to the invocation of the War Measures Act?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not in any way concede the premise that there are serious discrepancies in fact, but even if there were I would also concede that it happens from time to time that ministers take different positions on different matters. The fundamental question is whether a minister has dissociated himself from government policy on a fundamental matter or has not. My belief is that this minister has not, and this is why I suggest that the proposal for a royal commission is a frivolous one.

RESCINDING OF PUBLIC ORDER (TEMPORARY MEASURES) ACT—OPPORTUNITY FOR DEBATE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary. In view of the fact that the statements made by the minister seem to call into question the grounds upon which the government asked Parliament to enact the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, is the government now prepared either to rescind this act or to provide for a day's debate in Parliament when the views of the members of the House may be canvassed with respect to such action?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, both the Minister of Justice and myself have answered this question at different times. The House knows that the act expires of its own accord by the end of April unless the House wants to prolong its operation. I believe it is not the desire of the leader of the New Democratic Party to prolong its operation. Therefore there is no intention on the part of the government to provide a day's debate to discuss this question. We have said that if the act is withdrawn by proclamation the House will be seized of the fact. We have also committed ourselves to placing before parliament the whole subject of public order in cases analogous to the one which occurred last fall, and this subject matter will be brought before parliament in the near future. At that time, of course, the opposition will have an opportunity to state its policy, and the policy it would follow in cases when people are trying to destroy our democracy. We will have ample debate at that time.

PUBLICATION OF BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON QUEBEC CRISIS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister challenged the Leader of the Opposition to produce anything in the nature of a complete contradiction of cabinet solidarity.

Some hon. Members: Which leader?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, is there anything that can be done to silence these prospective parliamentary secretaries?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have the book here and I ask the Prime Minister this question. In view of the fact that the Prime Minister says that what is written has received the imprimatur of his approval, I ask him whether these quotations that I shall place before him, giving him the pages, do not in fact represent a complete contradiction of cabinet solidarity? The first is from page 127; and my translation reads;

Personally I am not convinced that serious troubles would have occurred automatically if exceptional measures had not been taken.

That is quotation No. 1. Number 2 comes from page 93:

For the reasons I have expressed in the preceding chapter surely it was not a popular insurrection that the federal and provincial governments were afraid of?

Then a little later —

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the right hon. gentleman, but I was hoping that he would not read too much of the book. The right hon. gentleman has given two quotations. As we all know, even that is somewhat irregular, but in any event the right hon. gentleman has indicated the basis of his argument.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not yet.

Mr. Speaker: I hope the right hon. gentleman will not quote too much of the book.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister issued a challenge, and I, as a member of this House—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker:—am entitled to answer him—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker:—by asking him whether or not he approves of what is written.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I appreciate the point made by the right hon. gentleman. I am just suggesting that there has to be a limitation somewhere. However, for the moment the hon. member for Ontario is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Cafik: Mr. Speaker, perhaps this commercial for the sale of the minister's book has proceeded far enough and it is time we got back to the main feature of the hour, the questioning of the government on matters of national interest.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. That is perhaps not a point of order. I think we might allow the right hon. gentleman to ask his question. He was placing the foundation of his question before the Chair and the House. I assume this has now been done and that we will hear the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would not begin to give all the quotations I have because the book contains one of the biggest messes that I have ever read. I quote one more excerpt because the Prime Minister said he approved of the book. At page 59, I find this:

In the first place, it seems to me important to recognize that the FLQ never tried to seize power in Quebec on the occasion of the October crisis.

I doubt that its members, even the most visionary, have ever had this intention in the course of the eight years of existence of their movement.

Does the Prime Minister accept those views as representing the type of views that he placed before the country on behalf of the government last October, that insurrection was here and they had to act?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course that is not a position the government ever placed before the House—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Cabinet solidarity has been broken.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. Prime Minister has the floor.

Mr. Trudeau: Let them write books, Mr. Speaker. Had I been allowed to finish my phrase I would have corrected the hon. member and said that it was never the position of this government that there was an insurrection and we had to act. If the hon. member would refer to the law and our text he would see that it was apprehended insurrection which was the basis of our action.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members say "oh, oh", but surely there is a difference between insurrection and apprehended insurrection.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As regards the quotations which were brought before the House by the right hon. member, perhaps he would allow me in reply to quote another well known author, Mr. Voltaire, who said—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is he a member of this House too?

Mr. Trudeau: No.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is easy to see that biculturalism has a long road to march if the hon. member does not know who Mr. Voltaire is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: He said, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Never mind what Mr. Voltaire said. Answer the question. We are interested in what the Secretary of State said.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder if we might return to the rule book. I believe the hon. member for Charlevoix has a supplementary question.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Charlevoix wishes to ask a supplementary question.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question—

[English]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I had not finished. I think I should be allowed to finish my answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the Prime Minister might complete his reply when we have heard the supplementary of the hon. member for Charlevoix.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Justice—

[English]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I thought that the hon. member for Charlevoix was going to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. I do not want to interrupt the latter, but I think that while quoting Voltaire, we may be straying somewhat from the question asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert.

I would invite the right hon. Prime Minister to answer as briefly as possible the question of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, and then I will recognize the hon. member for Charlevoix.

[English]

Mr. Trudeau: The quote is very short, Mr. Speaker: "Give me five lines of an author that I can quote out of context and I will guarantee that I can have him hanged."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

PUBLICATION OF BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON QUEBEC CRISIS—REPERCUSSIONS ON PERSONS CHARGED UNDER WAR MEASURES ACT

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice.

Considering that, under the War Measures Act, several people are before the courts in Montreal, has the Minister of Justice considered the possibility that the book published by the Secretary of State may cause them irreparable wrong? If not, would he consult his legal advisers as soon as possible and make a statement to the House about this?

[English]

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not had an opportunity to read the book and have no comment to make until I do.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question.

Could he tell us whether the Secretary of State has a right to sell his book and pocket the profits or whether this is simply a routine task which becomes government property?

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Secretary of State a question.

So that he may abide by certain recommendations of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism and enable opposition members to express constructive and logical comments, does the minister intend to translate his book into the language of Shakespeare?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Having come from Voltaire to Shakespeare, we will now recognize the hon. member for Timiskaming.

[English]

I believe the hon. member for Timiskaming has a point of order.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this seems to be an adjunct to the debates we had previously in the House and in view of the growing interest in this document, I wonder whether the Secretary of State would be willing to table it so that it could be made an appendix to Hansard and hon. members could have an opportunity to study it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The translation might not be prepared for tomorrow.

[Translation]

MOTIVATION OF SECRETARY OF STATE IN WRITING BOOK ON QUEBEC CRISIS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the hon. Secretary of State.

Since the Prime Minister has said a moment ago that every minister was free to inform the people and ought to do so, I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State what were the main reasons which moved him to write a book on the October crisis rather than giving every day information which the public obviously required on this matter?

Mr. Speaker: I venture to break in at this moment. The hon. member is asking the hon. Secretary of State to indicate his reasons for writing a book. I do not think that the question, in those terms, is acceptable.

[English]

The hon. member for Egmont.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member for Egmont—

[Translation]

Is the hon. member for Joliette rising on a point of order?

Mr. La Salle: I asked that question, Mr. Speaker, because the crisis ended six months ago and Canadians are entitled to know—and we realize according to a book recently published that the minister knew much more about it than we thought—why he wrote that book instead of releasing this information from day to day to the public?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is putting an argument forward in order to justify his question, but I do not think that under the standing orders the question as asked is acceptable.

[English]

I think I have to bring to the attention of hon. members that we will have to make a decision very soon on whether we want to devote the whole question period on this important matter. We have used some 20 minutes already. I have no intention to limit the questioning but we should give some thought to whether we might reserve some of our questions on this subject for tomorrow.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow.

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PERMANENT LAW AND QUEBEC CRISIS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the book published recently by the Secretary of State and the recent speech by the Minister of Justice, both indicating continuing concern for those who have either failed to understand the events of last fall or have not appreciated all the circumstances, in view of the Prime Minister's suggestion that there will shortly be some reference placed before a committee of the House with regard to possible permanent measures which might be taken in place of the temporary public order law, and because of the conflict over the exact events of last fall, is the government giving consideration to making the reference to a parliamentary committee such that it will cover not only an examination of the kinds of laws necessary to deal with apprehended insurrection or other forms of possible civil disorder but also the specific events of last fall in view of their importance not only to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is perhaps more in the nature of a speech. I wonder if we can now assume there is a question mark after the last word.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker; I take it the speech was in the form of a representation and we will consider all possible ways of bringing this subject before Parliament and the hon. member will find out how it is done when the move is made.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for York South rising on a supplementary?

WAR MEASURES ACT—PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION TO THOSE ARRESTED AND RELEASED WITHOUT CHARGE—DESTRUCTION OF RECORDS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a related question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might accept a related question.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question related to this subject to find out whether he has been in consultation with the Attorney General of Quebec concerning the criteria on which compensation is to be paid to certain of those persons who were arrested and released without any charge! If so, could he table the criteria which are to guide the Quebec government in paying compensation?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): The only communication I have had related to the statement that the Attorney General of Quebec made before the National Assembly, and I will be glad to have that statement tabled, with the consent of the House, when I bring it to the House.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the Minister of Justice whether the federal government is working with the Quebec government in this field of compensation in view of the fact that it was this government that invoked the War Measures Act and the regulations under it as well as this parliament that passed the Public Order (Temporary Measures) Act, and also whether anything has been done to destroy the fingerprints and other alleged criminal records of those innocent Canadians who were arrested and later released without charge?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I can read a paragraph from the letter of the Attorney General of Quebec to me dated March 16 when he referred to the declaration that he made before the National Assembly. It reads as follows:

[Translation]

You will note that this statement points out that the police forces will soon be instructed to return to the people concerned, their pictures and fingerprints, when they have not been prosecuted or found guilty.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: There are a number of supplementary questions. I suggest to hon. members that I might return to them in a moment, but first we might give an opportunity to the hon. member for Temiscamingue to ask his question.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, a moment ago I put a specific question to the Prime Minister by way of a supplementary on a specific point related to the subject matter under discussion. You, Mr. Speaker, went on to recognize other hon. members. I think it is important that a supplementary question be placed next to the original question.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate the point made by the hon. member is valid, but to some extent the Chair has to take other matters into consideration. The hon. member for Temiscamingue who represents a minority group in the House should be given an opportunity to ask his question. I want to recognize him at this time, having in mind the suggestion made to the Chair from time to time that minority groups should be taken into account. Then I will return to the hon. members for Egmont, Saint John-Lancaster, Cape Breton-East Richmond and others who seem anxious to ask supplementary questions on this matter, and then other matters might be considered tomorrow.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

QUEBEC—ALLEGED PRESENCE OF SEPARATISTS IN ARMED FORCES

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, after having called upon Voltaire and Shakespeare, I think you are right in finding it proper to call upon the member for Témiscamingue.

In view of the statement that Mr. René Lévesque made yesterday in Regina, to the effect that some Canadian armed forces units based in Quebec are teeming with separatists, is the Minister of National Defence aware of the existence of separatist elements in the armed forces units based in Quebec and is his department inquiring to see whether Mr. René Lévesque's allegations are true?

Hon. Donald Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago I had the opportunity to say that we had complete trust in the Canadian armed forces, particularly the French-speaking units. But in Ottawa a few days ago, Mr. Lévesque talked about a straitjacket and to me his comments tend to indicate that his friends are the ones who should use a straitjacket on him.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence.

With regard to the question of the hon. member for Témiscamingue, I should like to ask the minister whether, even if he were to admit that there are separatists in the army, he feels that on those grounds they are not entitled to be members of the Canadian armed forces?

[English]

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I wonder if I may direct a further question to the Minister of National Defence. Would he erase from the minds of all Canadians in a definitive way the implication or import of Mr. Lévesque's statement? Rather than treating it lightly, would he give us a definite indication whether or not there are indications from studies that have been made of the presence of separatists in the armed forces?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As the hon. member knows, the question of security in the forces is kept under review at all times, and I repeat what I said a moment ago to the Leader of the Créditiste party, that we have no reason to believe that the statements made are accurate or indeed that there is any penetration whatsoever of the Canadian Armed Forces.

[Later:]

[Translation]

In reply to the hon. member for Joliette, I should like to say that, to my mind, it is not possible to be a member of the Canadian armed forces and a separatist at the same time.

[English]

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): I would like the Minister of National Defence to assure us that he is taking legal steps to safeguard the good name of all French-speaking people in our armed forces, who serve loyally and do a wonderful job for us, against the slanderous statements of this chuckler from east of here who poses as a political leader.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I can only reaffirm what I have just said, that we have no reason whatsoever to believe that there is the slightest support for the accuracy of the allegations which Mr. Lévesque has made now on several occasions.

[Translation]

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Minister of National Defence.

In view of the statement made in the House by the Minister of Labour during the debate on the War Measures Act to the effect that members of the FLQ should not be mistaken for members of the Parti Québécois, could the minister reaffirm that those who would be acknowledged as members of the Parti Québécois would not be accepted in the Armed Forces?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for a separatist to take the oath of the Armed Forces and at the same time be a separatist.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Ontario as the last member to ask a supplementary question on this subject. We are still on supplementary questions to the first question. We are not proceeding very expeditiously.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Norman Cafik (Ontario): Would the Minister of National Defence take steps to provide to Mr. Lévesque an opportunity to supply the names of such alleged separatists in our forces, in other words, ask him to put up or shut up?

An hon. Member: Take your own advice.

OIL

STATEMENT BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY TO MINISTER OF FINANCE ON SHIPMENT FROM ALASKA DOWN BRITISH COLUMBIA COAST

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, may I point out first on the same subject that I think the book of the Secretary of State must now be in the second printing of the paperback edition in view of all the publicity it has been given here so far.

My question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Can he say whether his parliamentary secretary was indicating government policy or perhaps the lack of it when, according to a press report, he said that despite all the talk Alaskan oil will be moved by ship down the British Columbia coast?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will appreciate that it is not in order to ask the minister whether his parliamentary secretary is expressing government policy when he makes a statement either inside or outside the House. The hon. member for Egmont has a supplementary question, I believe.

NATIONAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER PERMANENT LAW AND QUEBEC CRISIS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is to the Prime Minister and it is a supplementary to my earlier question about a general reference to a parliamentary committee with regard to events last fall. Will the government give consideration also to allowing various members of the cabinet to appear before the committee both as private persons and as cabinet ministers?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We generally find a way of making our position known to the House and to the country, and I would think that the purpose of this committee, whatever terms of reference it has, would be to elucidate opinions from the opposition on the position they would take to improve the laws of our country to meet any threat to our democracy.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That was a nonsense answer.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice in respect of this matter in the knowledge of his great appreciation of his over-all responsibilities. Was he consulted fully on these events, did he approve of such action, and is he happy to remain a member of a cabinet that does such things?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond with a last supplementary on this subject. In fairness to other hon. members I suggest we might go on to another subject.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): My supplementary is directed to the Minister of Labour. Considering the lack of jobs in the country, the lack of attendance in the House because of the roster system and the length of time it takes to write a book, has the Minister of Labour objected to the Secretary of State moonlighting as a cabinet minister and will he recommend his dismissal from the cabinet?

INDUSTRY

AIRCRAFT—PROMOTION OF MANUFACTURE AND SALE OF SHORT TAKE-OFF AND LANDING PLANES

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the recent problems of Rolls Royce of Great Britain, the apparent limitation on the development of the SST in the United States, and the consequent repercussions on the entire Canadian aircraft industry especially in employment, can the minister indicate if the government is now taking the advice of the Science Council of Canada and actively encouraging and promoting the manufacture and sale of STOL aircraft where we still have an international lead in development?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government did not wait for the recommendation of the Science Council before giving support to STOL aircraft industry in Canada. When my estimates come before the committee I shall be very keen to report on what has been done in terms of research and development and support for international marketing for different companies in the STOL aircraft sector. Short of that, I can repeat what I have already said, that we are looking at this matter further and we will see if we can help it further. Again we are giving a lot of support, and I shall be delighted to report on that in due course.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, on the basis of what the minister has just said I wonder if he can indicate whether the government is actively involved in a program of development of export markets for STOL aircraft?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Very deeply, Mr. Speaker. I had a letter two days ago from the president of de Havilland thanking the government profusely for that support.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—NUMBER OF APPLICATIONS RECEIVED, CRITERIA APPLIED

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): My question is directed to the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that applications for the Opportunities for Youth program are now being received, can the minister inform the House how many have been received and what criteria are used in approving or rejecting them?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, we have received a good many applications. I could not quote any number for the member's information. As far as the requirements are concerned, these are described in pamphlets distributed to hon. members. In my opinion, to give the details in answer to a simple question would take up much time.

[English]

Mr. Nystrom: In view of the statement issued by the Canadian Student Liberals that the government's summer job program is ill-planned and does not solve long term needs, can the minister state whether the government is formulating long-term plans for student employment next year?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest to the hon. member that as asked the question is argumentative. The hon. Leader of the Opposition.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ALLEGED CONFUSION IN PROVISION OF INFORMATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question on the same subject for the Minister without Portfolio who I do not think has been distracted by attempting to write a book. I should like to ask if he has any explanation, in light of the statement he made in the House last Friday that clear instructions had been given to Manpower offices in regard to the Opportunities for Youth program, for the confusion which seems to exist even in the minds of student Liberals in regard to this program?

Mr. Marshall: On the Opportunities for Youth program—

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member. I believe the Leader of the Opposition is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Stanfield: On a point of order and with all due respect, Mr. Speaker, this is a very important question. There is great confusion and I want to give the minister and the students a chance for enlightenment.

Mr. Speaker: If there is confusion, as I gather from the hon. gentleman's question, in the minds of the young people of a specific party, I wonder whether a question asked in those terms is in order.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Stanfield: I ask the minister whether he proposes to take any specific steps to clear up the confusion that seems to exist in the Manpower offices and that students say they have run into in seeking information about this program and how they apply to participate in it?

Hon. Robert Stanbury (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I believe I did say that material was going out to Manpower offices on that day. Since then I found that some of it went out on Saturday to Manpower offices, but material did go out to all by the end of last week.

An hon. Member: Where is it now?

Mr. Stanbury: Of course, it is not delivered at the same time everywhere in Canada.

Mr. Bell: We all know that.

Mr. Stanbury: As far as students are concerned, Mr. Speaker, the student Liberals, like many other students in the country, have responded very positively and favourably to the Opportunities Youth program.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—PROVINCIAL QUOTAS FOR MILITIA TRAINING—PROVISION FOR INSTRUCTIONAL STAFF

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence regarding the Opportunities for Youth program. In view of the extension of student militia training to include armouries which are mainly administered by militia units, will the minister announce as soon as possible the quotas for provinces to ensure that district headquarters will be able to request logistic support and instructional staff from regular army reserves to maintain the training program?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I shall keep that representation in mind.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

ALLEGED INABILITY TO MEET REQUESTS FOR FILMS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Has his attention been drawn to a letter being sent out by the National Film Board of Canada indicating that requests for films cannot be met because of the great demand and limited staff of that department? Will the minister look into this to make sure that those who are waiting for films are not kept waiting and will not receive this kind of reply?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY RESPECTING INTEREST-FREE LOANS TO FAR EAST COUNTRIES

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Concerning the Canadian delegation headed by Mr. Gérin-Lajoie, could the minister tell the House if the $25 million subscribed to the Asian Bank plus the $200,000 for a special assistance fund and the help given to India, Singapore, Viet Nam, Malaysia, Thailand and French-speaking Africa, which amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars, will be the last loans granted without interest?

Mr. Speaker: The Secretary of State for External Affairs seems to want to take the question as notice. For the moment, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Edmonton West.

OIL

TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE—CONSULTATIONS WITH UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the statement made yesterday by his colleague the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources following discussions by cabinet ministers with representatives of the United States oil industry on the subject of the Alaska pipeline, can the minister tell us whether the government is considering or has considered a formal approach to the United States government in order to get this question settled once and for all so that we can get some credibility with regard to the whole question?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I announced in the House some weeks ago, plans are being made for consultations with the United States government about the problems of the west coast pipeline. I assume that in that connection there will be quite adequate opportunity for discussion of all phases of the situation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I can if the minister tell us if these discussions are to take place within the next few weeks or is it several months or next spring?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be very soon indeed. The officials concerned are establishing the place and the machinery for discussions right now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has just about expired. Perhaps the Chair might be allowed to recognize the hon. member for St. John's West and then pursue further questions tomorrow.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

FINANCE

AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES ON FULL EMPLOYMENT AND GROWTH TARGETS FOR 1971 BUDGETING—FURTHER EXPANSIONARY POLICIES

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): My question is for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Is it the government's intention to try to reach agreement with the provinces on full employment and growth targets for their 1971 budgeting?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we have periodic meetings with the provincial treasurers and ministers of finance to discuss the economic situation and the general outlook that governments should take toward the forthcoming year.

Mr. Carter: Can the Minister of Finance tell the House if the Bank of Canada has asked the government not to pursue any further expansionary policies for 1971, for instance, a tax cut and, if so, what is the position of the government on that question?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the Bank of Canada does not usually tell the Minister of Finance what he should do with regard to fiscal policy and therefore such representations have not been made.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, perhaps I might be permitted to ask a question of the President of the Privy Council. Will he indicate what business the government proposes to put before Parliament in the next few days, and possibly for the next week?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose to call the government organization bill and following that probably the unemployment insurance bill first and then the Canada Labour (Standards) Code bill. After consultation, I might try to work in third reading of the textiles bill and the report stages of the weights and measures and the investment companies bills, but that would be done only after consultation with other House leaders.

TIME LIMIT ON SPEECHES ON BUSINESS OF SUPPLY MOTION

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, on a further point of order, I think there is agreement with regard to today's debate along these lines: that the first spokesman for each of the parties shall limit his speech to 20 minutes and that all other speeches shall be limited to 15 minutes. If there is agreement, perhaps that could be made an order.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, that is our understanding.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: If there is agreement, it will be so ordered.

INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF BILL CONCERNING CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before we leave the question of the business for the ensuing week, may I put a question to the government House leader. As he knows, we reached agreement concerning time limits on the proposed bill having to do with cigarette advertising. Can he tell us whether the bill will be before the House at an early date?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give an assurance that it will be before the House at an early date. Very likely it will not be before the Easter recess, and I cannot give a definite date after that.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members will have noted that we are on an alleged point of order. Really, this is a continuation of the question period and these questions can be asked only with the consent of the House.

[Translation]

The hon. member for Joliette seems to want to raise a new point of order or ask a supplementary question. The question has been put, I believe, by the hon. member for Malpèque, with regard to the sequence of business which will be considered by the House in the next few days. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked a supplementary question on this subject. It is only with the consent of the House that such questions will be allowed again.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Joliette rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. La Salle: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I simply wish to inform the government House leader that in view of the importance of cigarette tobacco in the constituency of Joliette, our people are not in any great hurry to see a bill to restrict the use of tobacco come back to the House.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE OF GOVERNMENT'S ECONOMIC POLICIES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

That this House condemns the government's economic policies which have failed to curb inflation, have brought severe unemployment to at least 675,000 Canadians, have accentuated regional disparity and have failed to promote regional development.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I could barely discuss adequately the motion before the House this afternoon in one hour and 20 minutes, let alone in 20 minutes. I will do my best to bring before the House what I feel is one of the major problems facing this country at present. We condemn the government because it has deliberately, through the instrumentality of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) thrown up a very thinly disguised smokescreen. It has attempted to say that it is going to fight unemployment and that it has succeeded in mastering inflation. Mr. Speaker, that, I say, is one of the slickest "con games" that could be thought of at the present time, because there is no such thing as this government having mastered inflation.

Mr. Dinsdale: Or anything else, for that matter.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I put it to Your Honour that this is a grave issue. The gravest issue this country can face is that there is no sign the government has met with any degree of success in dealing with the close to 700,000 unemployed, in dealing with the projections made for the next three quarters of the year and in dealing with what may happen with regard to inflation.

We have had opportunities of discussing this question with the Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission in committee, on the study of the estimates of the commission. I must say that, although that gentleman tried valiantly, he had to admit that there are indications, and these are easy to see, that by the third quarter of this year we shall have started on another run up the ladder of inflation. The problems of the country, therefore, will have merely escalated upward another degree. It is on that point that I want to condemn the government today.

First of all the Prime Minister last December, I believe in some interview or other, boasted that "we have now licked inflation" and that the government would turn to the No. 1 priority, dealing with unemployment. Well, they have not dealt at all with unemployment, because it has kept on going up. Let us look at the claims that were made by the Minister of Finance in his budget speech of December 3. Let us look at claims made by the Prime Minister, other ministers inside and outside the House, and by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who boasted that the increase in the consumer price index in Canada was the lowest experienced by any industrialized country in the western world. You know,

Alleged Failure to Improve Economy

Mr. Speaker, if you have a big fence post sticking into your eye it is no consolation to have somebody point to the telephone pole that is sticking into the other fellow's eye and say that you are the better off. That is precisely the position Canadians are in today.

Let us look at the question of inflation and let us look at the cost of living index. If we look at the February issue of the Bank of Canada Statistical Summary, on page 163 we shall see that at the end of January the cost of living index had gone up to 130.3, from 128.2. In February the index, generally on average, went up another half point. True, there has been a downturn, or shall we say, a slow-down in the rate of increase in the consumer price index. Let us look at the components, food, clothing, housing and "all other". If one looks at the charts, one will see that they all, except for the food index, have pursued that same, steady relentless climb. In the immediate past, the food index has not risen because of the supermarket price war in Ontario and Quebec which now shows signs of ending, so prices are beginning to go up again.

Let us look at the clothing index. In January, 1970, it stood at 125.5; in January of this year, at 127. Housing stood at 138.1 in January, 1970; at 146.6 in January, 1971. The household operation index was 114.7 in January, 1970, and 117.4 in January, 1971. In all other items, 127.8 in January 1970, 131.4 in January 1971. I could go through the more recent lists of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics for February. I could deal with cities such as St. John's, Halifax, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto. Health, personal care, recreation, reading, transportation, tobacco and alcohol all show substantial and steady increases from February 1970 through to February 1971.

With regard to consumer price indices, the only change that has been apparent is a four-month change in the cost of food, and that is an aberration. It is on that aberration that the government rests its case. That is the only strength in its case of stating that it has mastered inflation, because the degree of increase has been slowed down. Food represents 27 points in the total index of 100. If you can obtain a down turn in over a quarter of the items in the computation of the consumer price index, of course there will be a change. What is that change going to be in March and April when the price of food again goes up? We will then see whether inflation has been mastered. I say that merely with regard to that one particular point.

The next point is whether inflation has been contained. I wish to deal with the level of wage settlements. We know that wage settlements are being made at the same percentages and in some cases higher than one year ago. There have been some notable exceptions where the question of whether or not to close an establishment was involved. There has been some outside force that I explained and lower than average increases. In addition to the new settlements being negotiated, there are the effects on the economy of wage settlements made a year or 18 months ago on two and three year contracts. They all have major escalator clauses, most of which will come into effect this spring. At that time, we will see an escalation in wages.

I now wish to deal with increases in wages and other returns. Executive salaries increased by 10 per cent last year. With regard to average weekly wages and salaries, there is a table which was prepared by the Prices and Incomes Commission based on information from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. This was tabled this morning at the hearings of the Prices and Incomes Commission. I am quite prepared to put this whole schedule on the record, but if hon. members will permit, I will select certain items. If anyone would like to have the complete table printed, I can ask for the permission of the House to have this done.

In 1970, the average weekly wages and salaries increased 7.6 per cent in industrial composite, 8 per cent in manufacturing and 11 per cent in construction. The average earnings of wage earners versus salaried employees in manufacturing, based on October 1969, showed an increase of 8.3 per cent for average hourly earnings of wage earners over 1968, an increase of 7.3 per cent for average weekly earnings of wage earners and an increase of 9.9 per cent for average weekly earnings of salaried employees for the same period.

Surveys of teachers in 19 selected Canadian universities indicate that in 1969-70 salaries for all ranks increased 7.7 per cent; deans, 8.5 per cent; associate professors, 6.2 per cent; lecturers and instructors, 8.4 per cent. Average salaries for faculty of all Ontario universities increased in 1970-71 as follows: professors, 7.1 per cent; associate professors, 6.1 per cent; assistant professors, 6.2 per cent.

Executive salaries also come into the picture. The figures for the calendar year 1969 are: all executives, 10.1 per cent; general managers, 8.8 per cent; sales managers, 9 per cent; plant managers, 7.6 per cent; accounting managers, 10.2 per cent; chief engineers, 7.6 per cent; industrial relations managers, 11.3 per cent.

The figures which I have for the professions are for the year 1968. They are a little behind the time, but they give an indication. The figures are: physicians and surgeons, 6.7 per cent; engineers and architects, 3.7 per cent; lawyers and notaries, 7.2 per cent; dentists, 10.3 per cent; accountants, 17.1 per cent. These may seem to be terribly dry statistics but they are a real indication of the effects of inflationary pressures on salaries and earnings.

Mr. Faulkner: Are you opposed to all of them?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am opposed to many of the increases.

Mr. Faulkner: Which ones?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I am opposed to increases to the degree that they exceed the increase in productivity. If that is the case, they are inflationary.

Mr. Faulkner: How do you measure that?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): This is a very difficult thing to do, Mr. Speaker. However, because it is difficult, are we going to deny the effect? It is difficult to measure the productivity in the service industries, but this is one of the tasks the Economic Council of Canada is undertaking. Because it is difficult, is that still a denial there has been an inflationary effect in Canada? I do not care whether one is a wage earner, salary earner, teacher, professor or bus conductor, if he receives an increase in salary beyond the increase in productivity, there has to be a corresponding increase in inflationary pressure. Inflation can be due to other causes as well, but this is one of the basic causes. This is a step which the government has not in any way mastered. In fact, they have not touched it at all.

The Prices and Incomes Commission was suppose to maintain some form of control, not mandatory, and to furnish information to the government with regard to prices and incomes. This commission is being wound up. Its terms of reference cease on December 31, 1971. In a statement filed by the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission on Tuesday last, he said in part:

> In 1971, the commission is maintaining its surveillance of important changes in prices, costs and profits in the economy, will continue to conduct investigations and issue reports of particular price and income increases and inform the public and governments of the relevant facts. With the termination of the price restreint criteria and the associated wage and salary guideline on Dec. 31, 1970, these reviews will not, however, be conducted within the context of specific price and pay criteria as in 1970.

That is the point, the job is being wound up. The government has given up on the Prices and Incomes Commission. Although the Prices and Incomes Commission was to serve as a tool to control inflation, the government has given up on it. It has given no indication of what it intends to use in its stead, but it cannot deny that inflation is still with us.

Look at interest rates. I suppose the minister, or someone on behalf of the government, will say the decline in interest rates is an indication that inflation has been mastered. That is pure, unadulterated poppycock. Sure, there has been a downturn, but this has not been generated actively by the government; the government has not been the master of the turndown in interest rates. It has been obliged to follow the flow of interest rates in the United States and the trend of interest rates arising out of balance of payments problems. This is one of the difficulties of being involved in the international monetary fund on a narrow margin regardless of whether there is a floating dollar or not. The interest rate in Canada which had been imposed as a monetary restraint on the government was causing balance of payments problems. We have been obliged to unpeg the dollar as a result. But we have also had to allow our interest rates to follow changes made in the United States. So I say it is not after deliberate leadership action on the part of the government that there has been a decline in interest rates to which the government can point as an indication that they have mastered in any way the problem of inflation.

Alleged Failure to Improve Economy

We can see, too, from the latest Bank of Canada statistics, that the average interest rates on government obligations, be they 90-day bills, 180-day bills, short-term or long term, bottomed out at about the end of January and the beginning of February and were at that point starting back. My main point in this afternoon's motion is to warn that the government has been complacent; the government is deluding the people if it continues this practice of saying that inflation has been mastered as a defence of its policies with regard to unemployment. They cannot have it both ways.

The last point I wish to make is that as a result of the unpegging of the Canadian dollar there has been a continually increas ng flow of imports to this country. In January, 1971, as against January 1970, there was a net decline of 3 per cent in our export of commodities. To the degree that we are relying increasingly on imports from the United States, Britain, West Germany and Japan, all countries facing varying degrees of high inflat on. We are importing their inflation. Every time we bring in goods from another country at an inflated price we are bringing the inflation to our own country. The only reason this has been mitigated to a degree, a degree which will not be available to the government in the coming months, is the fact that the dollar being unpegged its increasing value on the international market vis-à-vis the United States dollar has hidden the effect of this important inflation. So I condemn the government with regard to its financial policies for having failed to master inflation and having contributed to other consequences indicated in my motion.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): We have just listened to a most interesting speech by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) acknowledging that we have been more successful than any other western country in controlling inflation, that the rise in our cost of living has been smaller than theirs. He cannot criticize the overall picture, so he had to pick out details which he could criticize. The hon. member also supported the thesis to which government spokesmen have been calling attention for some time, namely, that we still have to worry about inflation in the future. This seems directly contrary to the policy of his own party which has been urging me to reduce taxes by some billions of dollars immediately in order to stimulate the economy and place more inflationary pressure upon it as it is moving out of a period of slow growth.

Just over a month and a half ago, the three opposition parties in this House took the rather curious course of issuing a joint statement condemning the economic policies adopted by the government to bring inflation under control and then return the economy to the path of strong and stable growth. The question which was left begging an answer was what alternative action these parties contend should have been taken to resolve the serious economic problems which confronted us. It is, after all, very easy to condemn; it is quite another thing to develop practical and effective solutions.

Early last week, members of the Ralliement des Creditistes provided their own answer to the question left hanging in the air by the joint statement of the opposition. Canada's economic problems would disappear, they argued, if only the government would adopt social credit monetary policies. From their silence, it can only be concluded that members of the other two opposition parties did not share the conviction of the Creditistes that social credit doctrine offers a cure to all our ills.

Later in the week, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) put forward the alternative course proposed by the New Democratic party to meet our economic problems. The way to ensure the continued maintenance of economic growth, full employment and price stability, he said, is through the institution of economic planning by the federal government. It was quite evident, however, that the kind of state economic planning proposed by the leader of the New Democratic party also commands no support from the other two opposition parties, the Conservatives and the Creditistes.

To complete the circle set in motion by the opposition parties last month, the House today has before it a motion by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) which provides an opportunity for the Conservative party to outline the remedy which it advocates to make all our economic problems magically disappear. I am sorry he did not present this remedy. It should be no surprise to find that the panaceas prescribed by the Conservatives may also be rejected by the other two opposition parties.

As I noted earlier, the leader of the New Democratic party contended last week that we can obtain strong economic growth, full employment and price stability simply by the adoption of government economic planning. By itself, economic planning is a concept so vague as to be virtually meaningless, since it has assumed so many radically different forms both in theory and in practice. Certainly the leader of the NDP shed little light in his speech last Friday on the kind of economic planning he proposes to adopt in Canada. He spoke in the vaguest of terms about imposing some form of capital investment controls to see that investment went into job-creating projects and undertakings with a high social priority.

In addressing himself to the problem of inflation in the context of economic planning, he only served to underline the total ambivalence of himself and his party on this important question. His party, he said, had advocated establishment of a prices review board to see, as he put it, "whether price increases were being artificially stimulated or were the result of genuine economic pressures". If this board, which apparently would lack any enforcement power, failed to do the job, then the NDP was prepared to support imposition of mandatory price and income controls, he said.

Last winter and spring, however, both the leader and the deputy leader of the NDP were demanding that the government immediately establish mandatory price and income controls. Speaking in the House on April 28 last year, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands declared:

> Unless the government is prepared to adopt a mandatory prices and incomes policy, we shall completely fail to deal with the question of rising prices.

If the member still believes that, what possible purpose does he consider could be served by establishment of a powerless prices review board?

Vague as they are, it still cannot be assumed the proposals for economic planning advanced by the leader of the NDP actually represent the current views of his party, since this is a question which is at present the subject of strong controversy within the ranks of the NDP itself. One wing of the party is arguing for establishment in Canada of a totally socialistic state, while others favour something in between—if only on the grounds of political realism. I strongly doubt whether there is any consensus, even among members of the New Democratic Party, about whether and how far we should move down the road charted by the NDP leader. Certainly, there seems to be little disposition on the part of the NDP's allies in organized labour to follow this route, particularly if it would involve government intervention in collective bargaining.

In Canada we have long had an economy made up of a mixture of private and public sectors whose course is essentially determined by the forces of the market. Governments in virtually all of the western nations have developed a far-reaching series of policies and programs aimed at harnessing these market forces so that they will work together to produce strong and steady growth. There is no question that over a period of a number of years we have made considerable progress in increasing our ability to harness the forces of the market to serve our ends. There is equally no question that we still have some distance to go before we resolve the basic dilemma confronting the economy of every nation in the world.

As the Economic Council declared in its most recent review, "the most notable shortfall in economic performance on a world-wide basis in the 1960's, and a major unresolved problem for policy, has been the inability to bring about an acceptable reconciliation between high employment and relative price stability." Our economy is constantly being affected by the diverse response of business management, investors, unions, farmers, fishermen and many other groups in the private sector by an ever changing variety of circumstances both at home and abroad. In a free and dynamic economy of this nature, it is no easy task to anticipate the future, nor to judge with great precision exactly when and to what degree any particular fiscal or monetary measure will prove effective in guiding the market forces on to the desired course. This has been particularly the case in recent years, when past experience has proved a poor guide to both the present and the future.

In speaking on the NDP motion last Friday, the Conservative leader said the policies advocated by his party had, in his words, "not been proved correct or incorrect, because they have not yet been tried in Canada." I take it from the statement of the Conservative leader, Mr. Speaker, that his party is proposing the adoption of economic policies quite different from those followed by the former Conservative government, which brought about the longest period of slow growth in Canada's postwar history. Unfortunately, the Conservative leader has been just as vague as the leader of the NDP in outlining the policies his party actually does advocate. He has, for example, repeatedly suggested that a Conservative government under his leadership would have continued to allow the economy to run at full throttle even though it was very obviously becoming dangerously overheated by the strain of steadily accelerating inflation, quite a different argument from the one put forward this afternoon by the financial critic of the Conservative party.

Such a policy, of course, is directly contrary to the approach urged in recent months by both the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development and the International Monetary Fund, which have both stressed the prime necessity of moderating economic growth in order to bring the pressures of inflation under control. The Conservative leader himself has repeatedly acknowledges the serious threat to the economy posed by rapidly rising costs and prices, but has contended time and again that this problem could be made to disappear simply by appealing to all sectors of the economy to exercise voluntary restraint.

There is no question that the exercise of such restraint would make an important contribution to the maintenance of reasonable price and cost stability and over a period of many months, the government has urged all sectors of the economy to follow this course. Perhaps in some distant day we will have developed a sufficient sense of enlightened self-interest among the various sectors of our economy to achieve by voluntary action alone the balanced operation of the economy necessary to maintain stable growth in perpetuity.

But, Mr. Speaker, you would have to dwell in some kind of Alice in Wonderland world to come to the conclusion that it is possible today to cure inflation simply by appeals for voluntary restraint. As the Conservative leader is aware, the leaders of the business community did agree last year to comply with the voluntary restraint guidelines proposed by the Prices and Incomes Commission, but declined to extend the agreement into 1971 as the commission urged.

The Conservative leader is equally aware that representatives of organized labour adamantly refused to take any part in the national restraint program urged by the Prices and Incomes Commission. In the past he has suggested that the co-operation of organized labour could be readily secured, although how he has never explained. In his speech last week, the Conservative leader reminded the House of his own meeting with the leaders of organized labour earlier this month. He advised us that he had suggested to them that it is, as he said, "most important to labour that we achieve voluntary restraint based upon consultation and co-operation." Unfortunately, the Conservative leader did not report to us on the reaction to his suggestion of those representatives of organized labour with whom he spoke, but I think it may be fairly concluded from his silence on this point that he was not overwhelmed by an enthusiastic response on their part.

I have noted that the basic approach advocated by the Conservative leader on behalf of his party involved running the economy constantly at full throttle, while relying solely on voluntary restraint to eliminate the buildup of any inflationary pressures. As the leader of the official opposition has acknowledged, such a policy has never been tested in Canada. For that matter, I know of no other country in the world where such a policy has been tested, or even advocated by any responsible authority.

But does that approach really represent the policy of the Conservative party? Just over a year ago the mover of the present motion, who is also his party's financial critic, condemned the government for proposing a $900 million increase in federal spending in the current fiscal year to provide the fiscal stimulus required to begin moving the economy back to the path of strong but stable growth. Today, with all the authority and confidence of Monday morning quarterbacks, the Conservatives criticize us for failing to take action early enough or in sufficient strength to promote a resurgence of sound economic growth.

What were they saying a year ago? They were complaining that we were allowing expenditures to run out of control, and proposing a tax increase. "If there were to be control," declared the Conservative financial critic, "if there were to be a real fight against inflation by fiscal measures, we would be taxing to defeat inflation, not merely to catch up with the bills that are coming into the government." In his motion today, the Conservative financial critic charges that the government's economic policies have failed to curb inflation, have accentuated regional disparity and have failed to promote regional development. In a make believe world in which white is black and black is white, that criticism might be understandable, but in the real world in which we live it is quite nonsensical.

If it is not obvious to hon. members opposite, it is at least evident to the great majority of the Canadian people that we in Canada have made substantially more progress than virtually any other western nation in bringing inflation under control, and certainly a great deal more than our neighbour to the south. This government has launched the most far-reaching and concerted effort to promote regional development and reduce regional disparities ever undertaken in Canada. Moreover, the whole thrust of the expansionary fiscal policies we have adopted progressively since early last spring has been aimed directly at assisting those individuals and regions most adversely affected by slow growth, which in turn provide a stimulus to the accelerated growth of the economy as a whole.

Those policies have been opposed by the Leader of the Opposition, despite the fact that for some years he was the premier of a province in one of the slow growths areas of Canada. Quite contrary to the terms of the motion before the House, he has not only failed to support the selective measures we have proposed to promote regional development and reduce regional disparities, but he has gone further and proposed the very opposite approach. He has contended that we should make a massive cut in taxes, which would provide the most direct and immediate stimulus to those more wealthy areas of the country least affected by slow growth, and only indirect and retarded stimulus to other regions.

As a result of this series of debates on economic policy stretching over the past month and a half, it should now be crystal clear that the three opposition parties are united only in their opposition to the government elected by the people of Canada. In every other respect they are sharply divided, resembling nothing so much as the scene at the Tower of Babel. Each party advocates policies for resolving our economic problems that are strongly opposed by the other two, and which command little or no support from the Canadian public.

It is becoming increasingly apparent that we have undergone the adjustment process essential to bring inflation under control, relatively quickly and relatively effectively. Now, our major concern must be to find ways of maintaining the resurgence of economic growth presently underway without incurring renewed dangers of inflation.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) spent some time satisfying himself that the opposition parties do not agree with each other. That must be a discovery he made last night. Every other intelligent person in the country, and I want you to notice, Mr. Speaker, I said every other intelligent person, has known that to be the case for a long time. Let me say to the Minister of Finance one very simple thing.

Our criticism of the government and I speak only for my colleagues and myself, is that it has refused to undertake the only kind of policy objective that is humane, decent and just in any democratic society, and that is the objective of full employment. That is our first criticism.

Our criticism of the government's economic policy is that it is all tied up with inflationary theories and has deliberately created unemployment. Our criticism of the government is that even now its attempt to steam up the economy is held back by advice which it gets from the Governor of the Bank of Canada, from the Deputy Minister in the minister's own department, and from other people, all traditional, orthodox out-dated economic thinkers, who hold that the unemployment does not matter. They believe that any speed-up of the economy has to be undertaken slowly, and that you must always have a pool of unemployment in order to avoid the disasters of inflation.

Let me say another thing frankly, Mr. Speaker, that no one in my party is unaware of the fact that a full employment policy puts pressure on prices. Indeed, anyone who knows anything at all about economic history knows that the price curve has gone upwards steadily for two or more centuries as a result of the expanding economies of the world. There is no way, and I grant it immediately, in which you can have a full employment policy and not have some pressure on prices. It has never happened.

Mr. Sharp: Why not?

Mr. Lewis: The Secretary of State for External Affairs says "why not". It is not likely to happen because the way in which you expand the economy and have full employment creates certain pressures on prices within the economy. The fact that you are living in a world of exports and imports which affect your economy brings about some pressures on that economy, and the choice society has to make is either the evil, hurtful, harmful choice of massive unemployment and massive loss of production as a result of that unemployment, or the humane choice of a full employment policy and finding means of compensating those who are hurt by an extensive degree of pressure on prices.

Mr. Sharp: Just like a little pregnancy.

Mr. Lewis: No, it is not like a little pregnancy. The minister's mind is in the bedroom. I ask him to bring it back to this Chamber. And I say to him, Mr. Speaker, and to the government that there are ways of compensating those who are hurt by inflation. It is much more sensible to get the extra production, from which the government gets extra revenue which it could use to compensate the old age pensioners, the welfare recipients and the people on low incomes, who are the only people hurt by the rising prices. The government would probably have something left over from the revenue it gets from the added production that full employment produces. This would be the preferable course, rather than destroy the lives of people, which is what unemployment does, and increase the poverty culture in this country, which is what unemployment does, and harrass whole families which is what unemployment does.

My condemnation of the government, therefore, is that it deliberately chose the cruel and inhumane policy instead of a policy that deals with people, that is concerned with the welfare of the 20 per cent or 25 per cent now living below the poverty line, in addition to compensating those who are hurt most by rising prices. I say to the Minister of Finance that there are ways of curbing price increases, and I make no apology of suggesting that direct price controls may in some cases be necessary. The government ought to have the courage to impose them, although I recognize some of the administrative difficulties. I know that will immediately lead the Minister of Finance to say that organized labour ought to agree to a freeze or a lowering of its demand for increased wages.

I reject that as a general proposition because it assumes that the level of wages of all workers is adequate at any given point, that it is just at any given point, and that workers obtaining $1.50 $1.75, or $2. an hour must be kept within the 6 per cent level which Dr. Young suggested. I reject that as further inhumane exploitation of the lowest paid workers in this country. Let me remind the Minister of Finance that it is still a very small minority of working people who get the kind of wages which could be considered just, and that might be held in line. I agree that there are some in that category.

I am not saying that all organized labour is in all cases reasonable. There are sections of the organized labour movement that have squeezed wage increases out of the economy that one could legitimately criticize. But by and large, the organized and unorganized workers in this country are not receiving the kind of wages that any decent person would say ought to be kept at their present level, or increased only by a small amount.

For a long time we have said that you cannot do anything by voluntary restraint. The Minister of Finance continues to trot out the alleged agreement to hold the line by the business community of this province. Mr. Speaker, I said at the time and I say to the minister now, that I have never in my life seen a phonier document than that which John Young produced. It is a phony as all the other policies John Young and his commissioners have pursued.

I remember the great philanthropic chartered banks of this country agreeing not to increase their charges any more, nor interest rates any more, except within certain limits. Well, by gad by the time that agreement had been signed they had so squeezed bank charges and interest rates out of the Canadian people that there really was no more room for increases. The situation reminds me of the thief who has stolen everything in your house and then stands outside saying, "Don't worry; I am not going to steal anything more." That is about the level of the agreement that was made by the so-called business world on holding prices. That is also true of the retail trade and of the professional people, such as lawyers. They agreed that they would hold their fees at a certain level. They no more held them than did the organized workers of this country.

If there had been a case for holding the wage line, and if inflation had reached a point where that was absolutely essential, then my leader, other members of this party on numerous occasions and the Canadian Labour Congress itself on one or two occasions, have said that if there were an incomes policy which covered all income, wages, salaries, dividends, interest, rent and capital gains, then this should be considered by organized labour as well as by the rest of the community. The essential fact is there simply is no planning in respect of this government's economic policy. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), I believe around Christmas last year, said we had licked inflation and would go on to lick unemployment. It would be a roundabout affair each year. That is, they would fight inflation one year and fight unemployment the next year. This year he says he is fighting unemployment. Just as sure as blazes, inflation will continue to increase.

Inflation has already gone up one half of one point or of 1 per cent—I do not recall which—in the first months of this year. If it goes on at this rate, we will have an inflation rate of 4 per cent or 5 per cent in 1971. I suppose when we reach that point, the Prime Minister and the government will decide to slow down the economy because they have to fight inflation again. One of the unforgiveable effects of the kind of economic policy the government has followed has been the extent to which it has slowed down the economy thus increasing the number of unemployed to the official figure of 675,000. I venture to suggest that unofficially it is probably between three-quarters of a million and 800,000, because there are many tens of thousands who do not get into the statistics. The kind of misery that has been produced by this policy for two million or three million people has caused a problem so deep that it will not be solved in a year or in two years.

The economists of the Economic Council of Canada say that it will likely take until 1973 or 1974 before we are at a level of even four per cent of unemployment, let alone the three per cent temporary unemployment figure which is considered to be the maximum we should have in this country. The Minister of Finance says it is easy to condemn, and he asks us to tell him exactly what we would do. If one had more than 20 minutes one would, but I do not believe I have many minutes left. I am told I have almost 10 minutes.

Let me say we propose, first, that the government should have full employment as the objective for society in Canada. Under no conditions can Parliament tolerate a policy which deliberately creates unemployment, which deliberately throws men and women out of work and which deliberately throws their families into degradation, misery and loss of self-respect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Secondly, we say that a regional development policy such as is being followed by this government should not be continued. This policy is being carried on without a plan and without an objective. It is a passive policy. What happens in respect of the incentives of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion? The bureaucracy sits in the office. It makes no plans. It does not attempt to relate industrial development in one province to another or in one plant to another. It sits in the office and waits for applications from someone for a capital grant or a grant related to the incentive program. It just sits there and waits for, in most cases, the large foreign controlled corporations, such poverty stricken corporations as Proctor-Gamble, or example, or destitute corporations like IBM, really poverty stricken multinational corporations. These corporations, of course, have no capital at all, and without the millions from the public treasury these poor people would fall flat on their faces. The bureaucrats in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion sit at their desks and wait for these poverty stricken philanthropic corporations to make a request for a grant.

There is no planning in respect of the kind of industry the Atlantic provinces should have. There is no relationship in the grants given to the actual local needs of the community or the indigenous possibilities. There is no attempt to see, if a plant is set up in location "A", that harm is not being caused to a plant in location "B". There is no attempt to integrate a plan of economic development in disadvantaged areas. There is simply a pork barrel from which large sums of public money are paid out, 67 per cent of which is paid to large multi-national corporations. The remaining 33 per cent is paid to other corporations which need it just as badly. If this money were used to fight inflation by compensating the poor who are hurt by it, a great deal more would be done for the economy of Canada than by these colossal, meaningless and harmful handouts to the corporations which pay funds into the Liberal party's election coffers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Third, I say to the government that even though the housing program has been improved a great deal, the housing needs of this country are almost limitless. A large infusion of capital to build homes, particularly for the low-income groups, to construct public housing, to renew urban settlements and so on, would create jobs and wealth in this country which would really be worthwhile. We have not done nearly enough. We have not done 10 per cent of what needs to be done, even with the increased capital of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Fourth, I say we have in this country immense needs at this time in addition to housing. We have pollution problems which require a massive infusion of capital, particularly for the municipalities which do not have any funds and which have inadequate sewage treatment plants. Until such time as we do something in this area, much of our pollution difficulty will remain and the speeches by ministers of the crown and Members of Parliament generally will be merely expressions of a pious hope. That is another area where jobs could be created, and where the quality of life of the Canadian people could be immediately improved, if the federal government had any imagination or concern for the welfare of the ordinary people.

Finally, I say—and there are many other points I could cite—that our whole tie-up in the American economic straitjacket, our dependence on the multi-national corporations for research and development and the fact that our natural resources are owned mainly by these corporations, not only American but British and Japanese, has meant we have exported jobs. We have failed in respect of what we ought to do in society which is build viable communities in northern Ontario, northern Saskatchewan, northern Quebec, northern Manitoba and parts of the Atlantic provinces. We should be building viable communities around the natural resources by placing at these locations the refining, smelting and processing plants as well as manufacturing plants that would enable the development of those communities. These are some suggestions I make to the Minister of Finance and to the government, but I have no hope that they will be accepted.

I have no hope that the government will change its policy because, as I have said on many occasions and I mean it profoundly, I do not think this country has ever had a more conservative government, tied to the principles of the corporate control of the economy, than the government headed by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). I do not believe that this country has ever had a government more given to looking at curves, diagrams, tables, constructions and technocratic details to the detriment of the welfare of the Canadian people than this government. I am quite certain that the governor of the Bank of Canada, the chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission and all the other out of date economic advisers, will have much more influence with the Minister of Finance than we in this corner of the House can have.

History will record the immense harm which has been done, not only to the economy generally but to the life of so many millions of people in this country. Tonight, we intend to show our displeasure, at least at the workings of John Young and his little band of economic gravediggers, by voting against the supplementary estimate for Dr. Young's little band. I hope that others who see the situation in Canada, and have the courage to declare themselves, will join us in denying this wasteful amount of money to a wasteful, unnecessary, useless and harmful so-called commission.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, more than ever it can truly be said that we live in a mad world and that we are being governed by the most remarkable of these madmen.

We have now been engaged for several weeks in debates on the economic situation in Canada, increasing unemployment, problems of product marketing and so on. Furthermore we see flagrant contradictions between the utterances of government members and those of official opposition members, we have heard proposals which have been tried, without result leading the opposition to put forward the motion now before the House.

Officially, there were 675,000 idle Canadians in February; 1,800,000 students will soon be looking for summer jobs. According to unofficial statistics on other unemployed; they number 200,000 or 250,000, which gives a total of nearly 2.5 million people who will be looking for work within a few weeks.

In view of this situation and for a year and a half we have often heard the government say: We have to fight inflation, therefore we will restrict credit. We shall ask the Canadian people to tighten their belts. The result has been a greater number of unemployed. A few months later, on December 24 last, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said and I quote:

[English]

We've Licked Inflation: PM

Prime Minister Trudeau said flatly Wednesday: "Inflation no longer exists in Canada".

[Translation]

He also said the economic recovery would take place in a few weeks.

Mr. Speaker, on March 24, that is three months later, the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel) made the following statement before the Board of Trade:

Inflation is about to be brought down.

Three months ago, the Prime Minister said: "Inflation no longer exists in Canada." One of his colleagues said this last night in Montreal: We are about to control inflation.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada said, a few days ago: Inflation will be worse in a few months than last year. Besides, Mr. John Young declared: I am not responsible for the high unemployment rate in this country. But who is responsible? He condemns the government for the high unemployment rate in Canada. So, this government is responsible. I agree with him, but let the government take measures to fight unemployment efficiently.

A short while ago, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said: It is easy to condemn, but quite another thing to suggest.

But we have just a suggestion from the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) concerning full employment. Where can we employ 675,000 unemployed and 1,800,000 students, this coming summer? Let them make shoes, clothing, food items.

A bill was introduced recently concerning the marketing of farm products under the pretext that farmers could be convinced that marketing provided by an agency of the government, or a governmental commission, would facilitate the disposal of their products.

We are in favour of marketing, but even if we overstocked stores with all sorts of products, if the Canadian consumers have not enough purchasing power to buy all that has been marketed, these products will not be sold and consumers will find no satisfaction. That is because we do not approach their problem from the right side. We try to solve what has already been solved. There is no production problem in Canada. That is obvious. The problem is simply one of consumption.

That is the whole problem. Instead of endeavouring to finance consumption, legislative proposals are made for the financing of production, and that is done at a time when consumption is inferior to production, because there is not enough purchasing power.

Mr. Speaker, we have for a long time been asking the government to pass legislation to compel the Bank of Canada, Mr. Rasminsky and his helpers, to be at the service of each of the provinces, so that they may form a strong family. That would ensure the disappearance of the conflicts between Ontario and Quebec with regard to chickens, between Manitoba and Quebec in connection with eggs, and between the West and the East with regard to the assistance given to agriculture.

Mr. Speaker, if the Bank of Canada were compelled to finance the provinces, municipalities and school boards through interest free loans, many problems would be solved. However, when the Ralliement créditiste advocates such interest free loans, it is ridiculed.

Alleged Failure to Improve Economy

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) has just returned from Africa. I heard him on television the other night, reply to a reporter that he had granted over there, on behalf of the Canadian government, interest free loans amounting to more than 20 million dollars for periods of 50 years plus 10 years of grace, 60 years all told, and that it would render service to India, the Congo and all European countries.

Mr. Speaker, the minister stated to the reporters: "You understand that the loans which we are granting enable them to buy Canadian products and create jobs for Canadians." What a sensible way for a minister to answer! I understand that the fact of buying in Canada will create jobs here, but we are not against helping those countries. However, with the same funds, would not our provinces use Canadian products and manpower? Would not our municipalities help create jobs, by implementing the projects they have in mind? But no! Their activity is paralyzed for the simple reason that there is no money. It goes as far as forcing a provincial premier, as the premier of Quebec did last week in New York, to beg the Americans to please come and invest their funds in Quebec!

But American money will not be brought into Canada. It is a matter of figures. We are not bright enough to make up our own figures, through the Bank of Canada, in order to finance Quebec, Alberta, Ontario and Manitoba. Why? Why are American figures so much more powerful than those of our Canadian leaders those based on the work of Canadians?

Then, there will be talk of trade. What are the Americans interested in? In knowing how Canadian money is made? Whose picture appears on one dollar, twenty-or one hundred-dollar bills? In some of the states in the Southern United States, Canadian money is not even accepted. They think it is Mexican money. They do not know what it is. Even cigarette vending machines would not accept the Canadian quarters of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand). They throw them back at the face of people.

I submit, and we of the Ralliement créditiste have kept repeating it for a long time, that we should try the experiment. Instead of being dominated by Mr. Rasminsky, let us spell out to him the financial policy we want. There are a lot of things to be accomplished in Canada. We would experience a shortage of manpower if the provinces could administer themselves as they wish. We would not hear from one province to the other: we pay taxes in British Columbia in order to give equalization payments to the province of Quebec. The English population is roused against the French population, the western businessmen against their eastern counterparts. We would not hear western farmers say: if we do not get enough money for our wheat, it is because to much money goes to the east. In Eastern Canada, we hear exactly the same thing.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that with a policy of interest-free loans just like the ones which we are granting to African countries, to India, and to other countries, we are not being stingy. We have now loaned somewhere around

$1 billion to India, and we are not charging any interest. I agree that we have to help these people. But why not start by helping our own cities and towns, provinces, school boards? They all have problems of their own which are just as serious as those that do exist in Europe, in Africa, in Latin America, or in any other country.

Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that the government does not take our suggestions more seriously. They have tried everything to fight inflation. Did they succeed? No! In fact, prices have not come down in Canada. What about creating new jobs for manufacturing new shoes or clothes? There is already too much of all that. Trade agreements covering textile products are at this moment being negotiated with Communist China, for instance.

We go and get textile products there, while we cannot even use those which we produce. We meet with the same difficulties in every area. Why? Not because people have too many goods at home, but because they lack purchasing power. If these people had an opportunity to buy products, there would be no farm machinery surplus at Massey-Ferguson's, in Toronto, for instance, where they are laying off 2,700 workers who were employed by this company for 20 to 25 years, on the grounds that their inventories are too high and they have too many machines in stock.

It is true that Massey-Fergusson has too many farm machines in its yards or in its warehouses. But let us visit the farmers of Canada, to see whether they have too many machines. They cannot afford to buy any. So they just exist, they just live sparsely year in, year out, week after week, month after month, by resorting to small expedients.

Farmers do not have the machines they need and Massey-Fergusson has too many. Then the government suggests its solution: perhaps we could help you out in giving you so many dollars per job created to produce more machines, to increase inventories and to step up production. It has been announced that this year the Canadian national production will be $90 billion and that the national revenue will be $65 billion.

However, when will we be able to buy $90 billion with $65 billion? This is where the problem lies and the government does not want to solve it. They are trying to fool us with bills respecting marketing and industrial promotion. They overlook or forget to help the consumer who will make the industry viable through his purchases. When consumers buy products, it is clear that stores will look to industries for supplies, and this will create jobs. This will be a better deal for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion because products will sell.

Mr. Speaker, we suggest that the financing of the public sector of the national economy should be done through interest free loans from the Bank of Canada. Mr. Rasminsky should stop twiddling his thumbs and singing us the same songs: This is inflation, this is unemployment; this is inflation, this is unemployment, tighten your belt; things will be tough, tighten your belt!

While he is telling us: Tighten your belt the Minister of Finance tells us in a book entitled officially: "How Your Tax Dollar is Spent"—yours and mine, Mr. Speaker—and I quote:

> The federal government will give approximately nine cents of your dollar in cash payments to the provincial governments.
> Canada's public debt amounted to $38 billion on October, 1970, and the Minister of Finance has forecast new government borrowings of $1.9 billion.

A total of $1.9 billion will be borrowed during the 1971-72 fiscal year.

I finish the quotation:

> These borrowings will cover an anticipated $600 million deficit in the fiscal year, and a $1.3 billion net cash requirement for non-budgetary investments such as housing, transportation, and loans to developing countries.

Interest free loans, it says so in the book. I mean the $1.3 billion that do not appear in the budget but that will be spent in order to assist underdeveloped countries.

• (4:20 p.m.)

I read further:

> Paying the interest and other charges on this debt is going to cost $1,995 million—

That means $2 billion paid in interest on the national debt.

The Minister of Finance adds:

> This interest payment is almost wholly a return on investments in Canada by Canadians.

Where are the Canadians who will get a part of that interest payment? That is a question I ask at public meetings: Those who get interest from the government, please stand up. Out of 1,000 or 2,000 people, not even one stands up.

I could even ask that here in the House of Commons: Where are the members who get interest from government bonds? The minister will agree with me that not 10 per cent of them do. Where do those loans come from?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): From all those who have purchased Canada Savings Bonds.

Mr. Caouette: The minister mentioned the Canada bonds which have been deposited as collateral with a chartered bank which is cashing in the interests solely to the benefit of Canadian capitalists. The two million unemployed in Canada—10 per cent of the population—what do they get from these interests? It is everywhere the same thing. But once again the chartered banks are not involved. When we borrow from the United States, the interests are paid to American businessmen, a fact the minister knows as well as I do. Most of the interests are paid by the Canadian government and this has been lasting for a long time.

In any case my time has expired, Mr. Speaker, and I am more convinced that the Créditiste proposals should not be laughed at for they deserve serious consideration on the part of the ministers and if someone has something to say against them let him speak out, instead of speaking of "dollar machines". Let us speak of security and freedom for all Canadians who have guts and are responsible, who have muscles on their arms to develop their country and make Canada the best country in the world.

[English]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, here we are, on March 25, 1971, still talking about inflation, unemployment, taxation uncertainty and regional development. At least we are hearing ourselves talk and one year from now some of us will stick out our chests and say, "We told you so" when we refer to what we said. I wonder to what extent we can make recommendations? I wonder if it is all meaningful when we make our positions and recommendations known to the government, which seems to be on a supreme political ego trip and which is so "stoned" with political self-righteousness that it will perhaps take another election to bring them back to some kind of reality. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is still convinced that flower power or flitting around the countryside and indulging in various other escapades can cure the economic ills of the country. We heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) this afternoon say that we have turned the corner, that all the economic indicators show we are in for a very good year in 1971; we are over the hump so "hold on boys, because help is on the way". He again accused all opposition members of exaggerating the extent of the recession in Canada and the seriousness of our economic problem.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Lundrigan: Right now, I understand he is meeting with representatives of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, who are to recommend to the minister selective corporate and personal tax cuts, which we have recommended for several months. I just wonder if he is going to shrug his shoulders, chew his pipe and give the same kind of inconsiderate response to those people, to the economists and to the business community, as the Prime Minister and his merry men have given to the representations the opposition has made day after day in the House of Commons. If he is to react that way, I guess we are all out on a limb. An hon. member preceding me said that in Canada we are at present experiencing the lowest rate of capital expansion and the lowest rate of investment by individuals that we have seen in the past 20 years. We have another first, Mr. Speaker. We have the highest rate of business failures in the history of Canada.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Lundrigan: Twenty two hundred businesses went under in Canada in 1970, compared with the 340 fewer businesses which failed in the previous year. That is the situation in the Canadian business community, and that shows how desperate it is. Businesses are failing that otherwise would have hung on; businesses are cutting back that otherwise would have held their own; businesses are holding their own that otherwise would have expanded, and many businesses that might have been begun have not opened their doors because of the tremendous uncertainty existing in this country at this time.

One big company did not spend $160 million for expansion in Wabush, near Labrador City, Newfoundland, an area of Labrador that is one of the great mineral and resource areas of this country and one of the great hinterlands of potential development. We saw this $160 million chopped out of an expansionary program by the company concerned. It did not spend the money that would have created hundreds and hundreds of jobs. Unemployment in this country, I submit, is running even higher than Dominion Bureau of Statistics' figures indicate. To be quite honest, Mr. Speaker, I question those figures. I question the kinds of procedures being used to reflect the actual unemployment figure. Even with that diluted picture of the extent of unemployment, we see that the figure has climbed to 675,000. There are 92,000 people in ugrading courses. People who are experts in manpower development say that much of the money to these 92,000 people could just as well have gone into welfare programs, because the upgrading is just a makeshift affair.

As I say, 92,000 people are taking upgrading courses at the moment. God knows how many people are actually unemployed in this country. Some people mention the figure of three quarters of a million. Others say that the actual total number of people looking for work is close to the 1 million mark.

Mr. Paproski: Shame.

Mr. Lundrigan: There has been some talk in the House about the consumer price index. In the months of January and February, the rate of inflation was .9 of 1 per cent. During the same period last year, the rate of inflation was 1.5 per cent. I will not argue that we should use some sort of average and say that we shall experience a 6 per cent rate of inflation during the coming year. I think the spokesman for the New Democratic Party indicated that he expects mass national unemployment to reach levels higher even than those experienced in the 1930's.

In this country there is a program of regional development. Despite the glorified promises of the Prime Minister during the past three years that major action will be taken to eliminate regional disparities, unemployment in one province in Atlantic Canada increased in February by 3 per cent over and above what it had been in January. The percentage of unemployment in Prince Edward Island climbed from 8 per cent to 11.2 per cent; in Nova Scotia as well, it increased substantially. In Newfoundland—well, I hardly dare even talk about it. There unemployment reached a level of 15.2 per cent; that is approximately the level it reached during the depression in the 1930's in Canada.

At the same time, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), who is presently in the House today, has been working on the problem of regional disparities. He has bragged about the creation of 60,000 jobs. While he has been doing this, the unemployment rate in Atlantic Canada has climbed, and in Newfoundland it has reached 15.2 per cent. How can you brag about the creation of job opportunities to the people in my part of Canada, where there is so much disparity, so much unemployment and where the outlook for 1971 remains so bleak? I do not know whether the minister is making such statements to them; frankly, I do not think it makes much difference to the people in that part of Canada what the people in this House say. I do not suppose they care what the official opposition says, because they know that the Prime Minister of the country is going on his merry way, full speed ahead, or astern or sideways and to hell with the consequences. That is the attitude of the Prime Minister and his merry men who serve him.

Today the estimates committee passed, on division and with great resentment, the $2 million expenditure for the continuation of the Prices and Incomes Commission. I introduced the motion to reduce the figure to $1. We asked the commission to tell us what its terms of reference are for 1971. What is it to do? What are its goals for 1971, and what is it setting out to do? We cannot get a word on that. We do not know from the commission what it will be doing in 1971. There is absolutely no reason for the commission's existence. It is nothing more than a public relations effort by the Government of Canada. The commission claims it will undertake basic research. Now, Mr. Speaker, a man of the calibre and intelligence of Dr. John Young knows that no intelligent Canadian can accept that story. Surely, we are not to spend $2 million on undertaking basic research when the period for which the commission was set up runs out, I believe, in December. How can any intelligent individual accept the story that research in economics will be undertaken by the commission to assess the relationship between prices, costs and incomes and the Phillips curve, if that is what economists call it, or the interrelationships of all these factors over the past 50 years, when the period for which the commission has been set up is to expire in December, 1971.

Why does the government not listen to the Economic Council of Canada, which has undertaken 30 or 40 such studies I believe, studies which have been largely ignored. The commission seems to concentrate on one of the five major goals outlined by the Economic Council. I am not going to say that this government has introduced bad policies. I do not think we have had bad policies. I do not think we have had policies of any kind, good or bad. We have had government by experimentation in this country.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: Last year the Prime Minister decided to impose some kind of restraint or stagnation to slow down growth factors, demand factors or whatever they call them. I am always confused when they get involved in economic theory because I am an ordinary citizen. I am always confused when I listen to John Young and the Prime Minister, both of whom are competent at disguising arguments and presenting situations so that they sound logical.

Last year the government decided to experiment by killing inflation. This policy was not related to our export markets. Our basic aim should have been to keep inflation at least in line with that of the United States, our major export market. The inflation rate in the United States was 4.7 per cent last year, while in Canada it was 1.5 per cent. This was mainly because of the price cuts on food. No one knew what the goals of the government were. The government did not try to solve the problem of a trade balance, nor did they try to achieve the best possible balance between the level of unemployment and inflation. Since they did not know, they experimented. The government went ahead with an ad hoc program, and the result is that we have a tremendous economic mess.

The government is trying to pull a Dunkirk. They do not know whether they should back away or how much they should stimulate the economy. The result is that in 1971 the government is again gambling that things will work out all right. If things do work out all right, the government will be returned to power. If not, we hope the government will be out on its so and so in a hurry. I will not continue with this line of argument because I only have 20 minutes.

Mr. Perrault: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lundrigan: The hon. member for B.S. is at it again. Air pollution in Canada will become greater when he speaks in a few minutes. I expect the minister responsible for the control of air pollution will have to rule him out of order.

Mr. Perrault: This is a profound contribution to the dialogue.

Mr. Lundrigan: At least it is dialogue, and not monologue.

Mr. Perrault: The big man—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lundrigan: I accept the statement that it is dialogue. I am honoured.

Mr. Perrault: Back room dialogue.

An hon. Member: You are the expert.

Mr. Lundrigan: If Your Honour can bring the hon. member to order for just five minutes, I will get on with my suggestions. The minister has asked for suggestions. Although these are my own suggestions, they have the support of my party and other people in Canada.

The first priority is that the minister should clear up immediately the uncertainty with regard to taxation in this country. The business community is not aware of what the government intends to do about taxation. Instead of expanding, people are cutting back. I have talked to a lot of small businessmen, especially in the lumber business. They are not ordering lumber. They do not want to expand because they do not know how much tax they will have to pay. It is simple economics, but the fact is that they are not sure. The whole matter of taxation must be cleared up by this government.

The Minister of Finance should seriously consider our suggestions and recommendations for selective tax cuts. The Canadian Chamber of Commerce will be making the same recommendations this afternoon. Other parties have made these recommendations. We are not suggesting that the government should do away with $1 billion or $2 billion in tax revenue tomorrow. However, they should seriously consider reducing taxes, at least on certain levels of income and in certain areas of the corporate community. Perhaps the tax could also be removed from building materials.

The government should set out its goals for 1971. What are the government's ambitions, aspirations and goals? What rate of unemployment will the government tolerate? What does the government consider as full employment? What is the government's ambition with regard to inflation and how much inflation is it prepared to tolerate? How much trade-off is it prepared to give? What are the government's major economic policies for 1971? When we ask the Prime Minister these questions, he throws them right back at us by asking for our suggestions. He refuses to state the circumstances we face and the goals of the government for 1971. Even though the president of the United States has much more power than the Prime Minister, he is not prepared to take that kind of gamble. He tells the nation what he expects and sets out the goals for the American people. What about our Prime Minister?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lundrigan: I will be finished after one more sentence, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Lundrigan: I suggest there should be a federal-provincial conference, and a review of the economic expansion policies which are causing serious difficulties in the country. They are not doing the job they have been designed to do.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, for some months I have been observing with increasing concern the unfortunate consequences of the government's economic policies. I have now come to the conclusion that, notwithstanding the obvious difficulties of a government supporter speaking critically of its policies, I feel that I must.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: Many of the people I represent have been adversely affected, some of them tragically so. In consequence, Mr. Speaker, I have no alternative but to speak on their behalf.

Alleged Failure to Improve Economy

Technically and financially, the government's policy has been a near total disaster. Morally, it has been a total disaster.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: More Canadians are unemployed now than at any time since the great depression of the 1930's.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Hellyer: As a percentage of the total labour force, our unemployment is the highest of any industrialized nation.

An hon. Member: That is our forward government.

Mr. Hellyer: This is clearly unacceptable.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hellyer: There is terrible degradation attached to involuntary unemployment.

An hon. Member: Those are regrettable side effects.

Mr. Hellyer: Of all the problems that I have had to face as a Member of Parliament for over 20 years, this has been the worst. It has family consequences that are difficult to describe. In the last few months I have received letters from constituents who have lost their homes because, when their employment ended, they were not able to maintain their payments. I have received letters from others who have lost their total life savings. I hve received communications from others who have lost their appliances and some who have lost their dignity as human beings. They describe it as a hopeless situation.

In a sense, the present situation is worse than the great depression. At that time, almost everyone was in trouble. There was a kinship and a bond between people who were similarly affected, fellow sufferers. There was no sense of personal failure because the situation was almost universal. It was clearly beyond the ability of any individual's influence. However, today the strongest members of the strong labour unions are better off than they have ever been before. The strongest working members of the middle class are better off than ever before. It is no credit to many of the middle class that the present situation is accepted with such complacency. In my opinion, as a nation we should be ashamed.

But why should we subject ourselves to the situation? Is it all in the name of fighting inflation? If so, and if that is what we believe, we ought to examine the success achieved in that field. On the basis of 1961 equalling 100, the changes in consumer price indices have been recently as follows: 1967-68, 4.1 per cent; 1968-69, 4.6 per cent; 1969-70, 1.5 per cent. On the surface this appears to be a substantial reduction from the standpoint of fighting inflation alone a considerable success. Further analysis, however, indicates that much of the decline can be attributed to unusual reductions in food prices which are almost certainly temporary in nature. Food accounts for almost 27 per cent of the weighted price index. If food costs had risen in 1969-70 at the same rate as in 1968-69, the total increase in the consumer price index last year would have been 3.5 per cent. Or, if food prices in 1969-70 had risen at exactly the same rate as the average of the other components of the price index, the year to year increase would have been 3.1 per cent. If it is far to assume that the government's economic policy was irrelevant to the decision of the supermarkets to commence a price war which was involved, in the shortrun, selling food at less than cost, then the real reduction in the inflation rate resulting from the government's policy lies somewhere between 1 and 1½ per cent.

Who has benefitted from the more modest rate of price increases? The people with money have benefitted, the people with money in the bank. The people who have purchasing power have benefitted from this reduction in the rate of inflation. The strongest trade unions have benefitted. The working middle class has benefitted and to a certain extent people living on fixed incomes have benefitted.

Who has suffered? The unemployed have suffered. They are out of luck altogether. Little advantage for them to benefit by a reduction in the rate of inflation to 1.5 per cent if their income is down by 30 per cent—in the case of some of my constituents who are unemployed their incomes are down by a good deal more than that. The young people of Canada have also been disadvantaged. There are not enough jobs to go round. The capital flow for new investment has not been sufficient to provide meaningful opportunities for the large numbers of young people now entering the labour market.

In considering the question of inadequate capital, we must take into account lost production due to the economy operating at less than capacity. Based on the Economic Council of Canada Report "Performance and Potential, mid-1950's to mid-1970's" the following figures are significant. Expressed as a percentage, the gap between actual and potential performance in 1969 in terms of 1967 dollars, was 1.8. In 1970, the gap actually doubled and in terms of 1967 dollars was 3.5 per cent. Still more significant, and of even greater concern, is the fourth quarter performance in 1970. In that quarter, in terms of 1970 dollars, the actual performance was 3.9 per cent below the potential of $90 billion. This means that if the fourth quarter gap were projected for a whole year the loss in terms of 1970 dollars would amount to $3½ billion. Expressed one way, this means the loss of 50,000 new houses at a cost of $20,000 each. If the balance of that lost production had been used for capital goods 100,000 jobs could have been provided, based on an average capital requirement for new plant and facilities of $25,000 each.

Of course, the extra production could be used in other ways. It could be used for slum clearance or pollution control or rehabilitation of run-down areas, or urban transportation. It could be used to meet any one of the priorities which have been established governmentally and collectively in our country. It could have been used for anything. The tragedy is that the potential was all lost. It is like water flowing over a falls. It is gone, and it is gone forever.

In addition, as a result of our own failure to produce more and save more, we have become more rather than less dependent on foreign capital to regain our momentum. There is something humiliating about seeing premiers going hat in hand begging for foreign investment to get the economy moving again.

An hon. Member: Right.

Mr. Hellyer: Get it going again we must, because the present situation is quite unsatisfactory both in the short and the long run. There is no reason why there should not be enough jobs to go around. The only reason in my opinion, and this applies equally in Canada and the United States, is poor economic management. The right to work is a fundamental right. We can and we must operate our society in such a way as to enable any able-bodied person who wants to do so to find meaningful employment. It is not just a question of the economic input. It is a question of human dignity, it is a question of the right of an individual human being to make a contribution, it is a question of the right of an individual human being to be needed. The right to work is a fundamental freedom.

Government policies designed to change the direction which began about a year ago have been slow and somewhat ineffective. Many government expenditures have the result of encouraging people not to work. You do not solve economic problems that way, neither do policies designed to subsidize industry which is otherwise uneconomic to locate in out-of-the-way places. It is a palliative, expensive and highly questionable to boot. But these things can be discussed at greater length on another occasion.

Today, in the time remaining, I should like to make some positive suggestions; I believe it is not fair just to criticize without offering alternative solutions, and I intend to be constructive. First, I tend to agree with those who suggest there should be immediate substantial tax cuts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: I believe that these benefits should apply to people who need tax relief most. This would create an immediate demand in the marketplace; it would help get the wheels turning because it would put money into the hands of people who spend it and, in the process, soon produce jobs.

Second, I would suggest a further reduction in interest rates. This would encourage expansion and help make funds available to Canadian industry to build new facilities. It would provide capital for investment in industry. Third, and this is related to the previous suggestion, I believe we should ensure that virtually unlimited funds are available for the rehabilitation of housing which is in disrepair and for the construction of new housing. I believe there should be no limit in this direction until the industry is operating at capacity. This would have a powerful multiplier effect. If properly done and not exaggerated, this would help bring down prices since the increased supply would tend to put a downward pressure on prices of existing housing as well as rents.

These suggestions, taken as a package, would accelerate the economic growth of this country and would help provide jobs soon for those desperately in need. I fully realize the Conservative economic school will say: "All right, so you put people back to work; you will have rampant inflation again". That is quite right, Mr. Speaker; in the absence of other policies that is exactly what will happen. Of course, it would not be all that different from what is going to happen anyway, even with the slow rate of economic recovery. The seeds of new inflation have already been sown by the wage and salary settlements of 1970 which, in the more powerful industries with 500 employees or more, averaged 8.8 per cent. This means that with the return to a full employment policy in Canada the inflation rate would go back to a level not too different from what it was in the first place. Indeed, if all the people in Canada received wage and salary settlements comparable to those who have already managed to demand and obtain for themselves 8.8 per cent, we would have a higher rate of inflation than we have had at any time in the past 20 years since the Korean war. There is only one way that this can be avoided and that is immediate mandatory price and wage guidelines. There is no other way I know of to pursue the dual policies of full employment and stable prices.

I must explain here what I mean by mandatory wage and price guidelines. I do not mean the government setting individual wage and price levels, because I know from my own experience that they are not competent to do that. I mean that they would limit capital return on industry investment to that which has taken place over the long term, and this must be sufficient to ensure the attraction of the new capital which is required for further investment. Wage increases would be limited to the average increase in physical output per person in the labour force, and this too could be averaged over a period.

Like Galbraith, I believe that this policy is necessary only in that part of our economy that is semi-rigid; that is to say, the huge oligarchies and their powerful unions. The small businessman and the marketplace would then follow suit. It was too much to expect a voluntary wage and price agreement, one that would work. Labour had no confidence in the ability of business to hold down prices in the long run; business was skeptical about labour's co-operation and neither had confidence in government being prudent in holding its expenditures in line. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I believe that mandatory guidelines are a must. They must be reasonable, they must be comprehensible, and they must be consistently applied.

However, confidence in government must be restored, both in the free system that has been the basis of our strength and in Canada at large. Therefore, I urge the government to abandon its archconservative approach to economics, and I urge it to adopt 20th century solutions to 20th century problems. I urge it to give ordinary citizens a break, those little people for whom the Liberal party should be fighting. Because that is the traditional liberalism. I can assure the government that if it does that, and takes the action required to meet the needs both of my constituents and millions of others like them across the country, it will receive the direct gratitude of the hundreds of thousands affected as well as the respect of all of us.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, we have heard a strong and courageous speech from the one man in the Liberal cabinet who had enough courage to quit when his views were contrary to those of the majority and to the direction the cabinet was taking. Having listened to the speech of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer), I reflect upon the reason given at the time he left the cabinet over a dispute as to the manner in which the government was pursuing its housing policy in this country. If one pays careful attention to what he said, the differences ran far deeper, and I will have something to say about those differences in a moment.

I have said that it was a courageous speech. He is the one member in that mess over there, and in the rump on this side, who has had the courage and the guts to say the things his constituents want him to say. In my view, having regard to the direction that the Liberal party and this Liberal government are taking today in leading this country into a socialistic morass, this is the one man who can lead the Liberal party back to Liberalism.

The hon. member calls for a restoration of confidence in the free system. So do we. He calls for this government to redirect itself to the protection of the little people who once used to be the main concern not only of the Liberal party but of all political parties in Canada. It is these people for whom the Liberal party, the Liberal government, should indeed be fighting.

Instead of that we find ourselves being led down the socialistic path to state control and absolute power over the rights of the individual and freedom of enterprise in this country. He is the first Liberal on that side of the House that I have heard stand in his place and say it like it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gilbert: About time, too.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, it is about time. This government has been in office now under its present leader for almost three years and great changes have taken place, changes that are almost subliminal and have not been emphasized by the media of this country or brought to the attention of the people of Canada in the manner in which, in my view, they should have been brought to their attention. I shall be taking an inventory of those changes in terms of what they have cost the Canadian people, not only in dollars but in the loss of their freedoms, freedoms that are being siphoned off slowly but surely.

Let me deal for a moment with the growth of the Prime Minister's office itself. All of these things that contribute to the cost of government contribute just as directly to the inflationary situation in which we are in today. The Prime Minister has 29 cabinet ministers. He has a huge Privy Council office, plus a personal office, with program planners, regional desks, legislative assistants, public relations and tour co-ordinators, and a plethora of other specialists. Extensive planning of cabinet agendas and preparation papers are now mandatory. There is a great sea of cabinet committees, parliamentary committees, Senate committees, caucus committees, interdepartmental committees, intradepartmental committees, federal-provincial task forces, commissions, boards and a blizzard of study groups, as a former executive assistant to the hon. member who has just finished his speech put it in a recent speech to the Canadian Club in Toronto. Yet despite all of this octopus-like growth in the Prime Minister's office, despite the great gobs of public funds being used to support this growth, the quality and the quantity of the legislation and policy proposals have declined.

Let us look at some of the opinion that has been expressed with respect to this growth. On April 9, 1970 it was disclosed in a newspaper article that when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was Prime Minister he had an office staff of about 15, and by Mr. Pearson's time that staff had increased, but not alarmingly so. But in 1970, under the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), his office staff had grown to 75. The salaries involved are even more impressive. Marc Lalonde, the Prime Minister's principal secretary, accepts a mere $35,000 a year. Ivan Head, legislative assistant, is in the $25,000 to $30,000 bracket. Mr. Romeo LeBlanc, head of the Prime Minister's press corps, is in the $20,000 to $25,000 bracket. Three members of the press corps are paid between $15,000 and $17,000; a fourth is in the $12,000 to $15,000 range.

Then there is special assistant James Davey—$20,000 to $25,000—and four other assistants who are paid between $15,000-$17,000. Naturally, there is an administrative secretary—Mary E. MacDonald, $17,500 to $20,000. There is even a "desk officer", whatever that is, at a salary said to be between $17,500 and $20,000.

The article went on to say that the numerical strength of the Prime Minister's office has been the subject of not inconsiderable comment by a number of hon. members, including the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield).

As for the ordinary citizen, he will be perhaps forgiven if he sometimes wonders why it is necessary to have such plain people as Members of Parliament or Cabinet Ministers to assist the prime minister in running the country when he has in his own office, such a formidable legion of highly paid mercenaries.

A few short months later, in September of that year, another newspaper article pointed out that the cost of 117 special advisers employed by the Cabinet amounts to $1,451,849. What is happening to Parliament while we see this kind of growth proliferate, not just in the Prime Minister's office but in the offices of all the ministers? the usefulness of this institution is reduced.

This institution has always been responsible for the safeguarding of our freedoms and liberties. It is in Parliament that the free exchange of ideas and the clash of opposing views in unfettered debate have assured the right of the citizen to be heard. But in a short span of two and a half, almost three years the government has transformed Parliament into an ineffective flaccid forum where government decisions are announced with supreme arrogance and finality, all because of the shift of power at the expense of the taxpayer, by the offices of the Prime Minister and of his cabinet colleagues.

As the hon. member for Trinity pointed out, if one listened between the lines to his speech, when Parliament ceases to be the effective guardian of our freedoms and liberties then those freedoms and liberties die. Mr. Speaker, the process of erosion is well under way. If you have some doubt about it let us have a look at what I call an inventory of the socialistic policies brought in by the government within the last two and a half years. I will not say anything at the moment about the attempts by the government to emasculate the Auditor General, because while I am sure it did not see the errors of its ways, the public outcry was such as to place it with no other alternative but to desist. But one must ask oneself the question why?

Let me deal for a moment with the Department of the Secretary of State. The minister is one of what has often been called the Holy Three. His departmental estimates this year have been increased by $88 million. Here is a gentleman who does not work under the aegis of any department when he is performing the functions of being the guardian of our languages and our culture, and some $80 million of the increase in the estimates of his department are expendable by him in the role of being the guardian of our languages and of our culture.

Let us have a look at this agency the government calls Information Canada. Here is a minister who is not accountable to anyone else but the Prime Minister, and who takes his instructions and formulates his policies at the direction of the Prime Minister. He is responsible for an increasing amount of expenditure and an increasing number of civil servants. Information Canada was set up as an agency of the government, supposedly to inform Canadians about the activities of their government. How can we expect this so-called information agency to say anything critical about the activities of the government that set it up? How can we expect it to say anything critical about the economic situation in which we find ourselves today? If Information Canada had been performing the function it was supposed to, it would have been saying exactly what the hon. member for Trinity has just said.

Who was appointed head of Information Canada? Reading back through the debates to April 19 of last year, we find that the Prime Minister, at the time of tabling the report of the Royal Commission on Security, gave an undertaking to the House to have that report debated and to have a day set aside for that purpose. Despite repeated requests by opposition members, he has not yet set aside a day for debate on that report, which is now almost a year old. That report contains some very interesting recommendations. When one reads the reports of the questioning in this House with respect to the head of Information Canada, Mr. Gagnon, and when one reads the reports of the committee which examined the minister and Mr. Gagnon, surely there must be some questions asked. I have been asking those questions. I have been asking why the gentleman who heads one of the most sensitive agencies in the government, at a salary of $40,000 a year, should be a gentleman with a very interesting background closely associated with communist activities.

I hear dissent from the other side, expressed somewhat unusually, but if the hon. member who is listening has examined the information that I have examined, and will make available to him in my office if he cares to come up, he will find that this gentleman has appeared on the same platform as Fred Rose, who was very famous during the days of the Gouzenko inquiry, and was a famous contributor to La Victoire, the communist organ in Quebec.

And he will find that his wife was a representative to Hungary at a meeting of the International Journalists, which is a recognized international communist organization. I ask him to compare those and other facts, which I can disclose to him and to all hon. members, with the recommendations contained in the report of the Royal Commission on Security. He would find that under no circumstances would this man be given a clearance to hold any office in the Government of Canada. That is the position that should be adopted by the government today. Here is a man with this background who has been injected into the government service in one of the most sensitive areas into which he could possibly be injected.

When we on this side of the House ask the Prime Minister whether he has given this gentleman a security clearance, the Prime Minister dodges and weaves and never gives a direct answer. He would like members to believe it is the Royal Canadian Mounted Police which gives such a security clearance. This is not the case. The RCMP only prepares reports on which the decisions of the government are made, and in this case only one man had the responsibility for giving a security clearance to the head of Information Canada and that was the Prime Minister. He has yet to say he has given it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I wish to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address myself to what I consider to be a shamefully misleading part of the motion presented to the House this afternoon. I refer to the misleading portion which states that regional disparities have been accentuated and that there has been a failure in regional development. I should like to make some comments in this area. I think that sits very badly in the resolution before us. When the Department of Regional Economic Expansion was created about two years ago, it was recognized in the department, in this Parliament and, I believe, by the people of Canada that it was undertaking a very difficult task indeed and that nowhere in Canada would the task be more difficult than in the Atlantic region.

Alleged Failure to Improve Economy

Disparities have existed in the Atlantic region for decades and in spite of previous programs such as fiscal transfers, tax incentives and various industrial grants under previous programs those disparities between the Atlantic region and the remainder of Canada have persisted. I think most of us are aware of the dimensions of these disparities. In the area of unemployment, the figure for the Maritimes is approximately three-quarters higher than the national average, 75 per cent higher or thereabouts, and per capita incomes persist at something like 30 per cent below the national average. These disparities have existed for perhaps a century. Just six months ago the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council published a 10 year review of the Atlantic economy. This appeared in a booklet called the Atlantic Economy. This review states that among the basic reasons for these persisting disparities is the seasonality of that economy—too much seasonal activity—and that this in turn is related to a far too great dependence on primary and resource activity and construction.

The review pointed to the need to facilitate basic structural changes in the Atlantic economy. Many members who have spoken today have totally ignored that point. They have spoken of more and more of the same in an orthodox approach while what is required is not more of the same but structural change which would bring a broadened base with more viable manufacturing industry and modern technology to that region so that it would have a more dynamic economic mix.

I should like to refer members of the House, who would care to read it, to this report of the Atlantic Provinces Economic Council. What has the department been doing with respect to that need to alter the basic structure of the Atlantic economy? I will come to that in a few moments, but first I wish to say a few words and quote a few statistics to prove that those who made these accusations concerning regional disparities did not do their homework. The fact is that the Atlantic region, if we choose it as an example, has been sheltered somewhat, through the operation of this department and its regional development programs from the impact of national unemployment and from the impact of national policies which are necessary for the good of the economy at this time.

Let us take the two months of January and February, since many members have quoted actual unemployment figures in their provinces in these months, and let us forget about seasonal adjustments. In those two months of 1971 the average unemployment in Canada has been 8.1 per cent. In the Atlantic region it has been 10.6 per cent. Everyone admits this is a serious disparity, but the mandate of this department is to try to reduce these disparities and, therefore, we should ask ourselves, instead of making irresponsible charges, whether these persisting disparities have been reduced through the program. Although this program is still only in its early stages, I think I can point to figures which suggest that these disparities have in fact been diminished. If we wish to make a comparison with a previous period of similar high national unemployment we might go back to January and February 1963, some seven years ago, when the national figure in respect of average unemployment was 8.4 per cent while, in the Atlantic region in those two months, it ws 15.1 per cent compared to 10.6 per cent today. Thus, in the early months of 1963 unemployment in the Atlantic region exceeded the figure for Canada as a whole by some 80 per cent.

This compares with a disparity today of about 31 per cent. I have not used the worst years for the comparison from the point of view of Atlantic unemployment. To do this I would have to go back to 1957 when the national figure was 9.4 per cent and the Atlantic provinces figure was 16.7 per cent. So, in spite of the seriously high unemployment in Canada today, I think I can say the figures for the Atlantic region are about as good as they have ever been in respect of the question of disparities. They are high. No one accepts them as adequate. However, we have high hopes of reducing that disparity further. If one looks at the DBS figures one will see that the unemployment on the average in those two months—and we are using them as an example—this year has been held to the figure it has been for the previous two years. It has not flared out with the mounting unemployment in Canada. As I say, I do not want to exaggerate the achievement, but I believe some of the improved experience should be attributed to this department. Thus, in a resolution of the kind before us I think the opposition does no good to tell the people of Canada that this program is accentuating disparities and is failing in the task of bringing regional development to Canada's slow-growth regions.

Let me refer now to some of the ways in which this department is going about the task of trying to reduce disparities. One of the two principal methods—and I want to say that there are far more than two principal methods being employed—is the Regional Development Incentives Act. Under this act and program the department responds to applicants who have feasible projects in designated regions across Canada. What have been some of the results in the less than two years that the Regional Development Incentives Act has been in use? Something in the order of 450 offers have been made and accepted by companies in slow growth regions. The total capital investment associated with these offers is in the order of $580 million, and this significant investment is in regions which otherwise would not have had this investment without this program. The expected job creation is in the order of 21,000 persons directly employed in these assisted industries when in fact they come into full production. This is only the beginning of the program period. The incentive offers that have been made are in the order of $126 million.

Where has that effort been lodged? Roughly one quarter of the total activity has taken place in the Atlantic region. I think that is a significant fact. Approximately one quarter of the total new capital investment is in the Atlantic region, about 21 per cent of the new employment is expected to be there, and about 29 per cent of the incentives have been offered in that region and accepted. In the Atlantic region, where those persisting disparities have existed for so long, the weight of aid on a per capita basis is at least two times heavier—the extent of per capita aid is at least twice as great as it is in any other region in Canada. In several regions it is many times greater than that. So there is a specific, massive and directed effort to help reduce those disparities, and when we look at the unemployment statistics, I think they demonstrate that some success is already coming in response to this program.

When the program began, all of us recognized that it would take at least a decade to reverse trends that have been entrenched for a century. I come back to my point that to state in a resolution challenging the government's economic policies that disparities have been accentuated is at great variance with the facts. In the province of Quebec where unemployment is high and where disparities have persisted, approximately 40 per cent of the activity of the industrial incentives program has taken place. On a per capita basis this is well below the activity generated in the Atlantic region. In the three Prairie provinces, about 25 per cent of the activity under these incentive grants has taken place; 25 per cent of the offers, 24.8 per cent of the total capital investment, about 20 per cent of the new employment, and 21 per cent of the incentive grants. The remaining 10 per cent has gone to Ontario and British Columbia. I suggest that the program, although only in its beginning stages, is making solid progress.

The spokesman for the New Democratic Party said that this is unplanned, that grants go to big companies and to those who do not need them. That also is misleading. The grants go to companies that apply. Hundreds of those companies have been small companies, and the grant is given to them all not because they are big or small but rather to induce them to settle in the slow growth regions. This conforms to the mandate of the department, to induce and help them to overcome regional disadvantages. The grant is calculated as finely as we can, using the best judgment we can. This grant is no greater nor any less than would be necessary to overcome the disadvantage of settling in Halifax as compared with, say, Toronto or any other location.

I think the results here show that there has been a very excellent response. There is much more to come. In connection with size, let me point out the following: Is it a failure of regional development to have assisted at Vauxhall, Alberta a granulated potato plant, thus increasing jobs by 75, in the very province of the hon. member who moved the resolution? Is it a failure of regional development to have encouraged the Boeing Company of Canada to create 130 jobs in Winnipeg, or for a photo chemical products plant to establish in Steinbach, Manitoba, thus creating 100 jobs? Those are technically based industries that might not have gone there otherwise. Is it a failure of the program that in Granby, B.C., there is a small company manufacturing wigs with 12 jobs; or an electrolytic zinc plant in Ontario with 360 jobs, or a clay brick plant in Villeneuve, Quebec, with 65 jobs, a sheet glass plant in Becancour with 260 jobs, a clothing factory in Saskatchewan with 40 jobs, a fish processing plant in Valleyfield with 26 jobs, lumbering in New Brunswick with 50 jobs? Many of these are small companies spread across the slow growth regions. In P.E.I. we have a herring reduction plant where 19 new jobs were created.

I do not want to go on in that vein because I want to go on to another aspect of the program where the whole concept centres on planning. This program, known as the Special Area program, is where the two governments, the provincial and the federal, look at the slow growth region, try to identify what would be called growth points within the region where, in addition to industrial incentives, there are also aids for growth point communities to expand their community facilities and to do all this within, say, a five year plan of development. That is what we are doing as another major thrust in this department. This refutes the suggestion of the spokesman for the NDP that this is an unplanned process. It is based on longer term planning in the special areas. In these special areas the federal government is able to do more than make industrial incentive grants; it is able also to fund basic community infrastructures. The total plan now is just under $300 million in those special growth areas with high promise of development of regional impact. This is a second massive program and it, too, is only in its initial stages. Of that amount of $300 million 61 per cent goes to the Atlantic provinces. This also will reduce disparities. The new jobs which I mentioned as being treated under the industrial grants program do not take account of the new jobs created in building community utilities, roads, schools and new housing in these special growth-point areas that are expected to have a regional impact in fostering self-generating future development.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. O'Connell: I have not touched upon ARDA or many other programs of economic expansion and social adjustment that I could have mentioned had there been time.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I feel that nothing could illustrate the timeliness of the motion before us today better than the intervention of the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) this afternoon. I feel that the hon. member should be congratulated for the courage of his stand and for the attempt he made to persuade his colleagues to mend their ways and to adopt a different set of economic policies for Canada. I think he demonstrated the same sort of courage which he had when he initially took the step of leaving the cabinet.

While I might have some reservations or further questions on some of the points that were suggested by the hon. member for Trinity, I think that his basic thesis was very clear. He suggested that the basic course of economic policy in Canada is wreaking untold hardship and suffering on many thousands of people in Canada, and that the government desperately needs to adopt a new set of policies. Certainly, when he talks about reducing interest rates, about price and wage guidelines, his suggestions fall within the scope of what we have suggested for some time, namely, a comprehensive income policy which relates to all forms of income.

From time to time we have also proposed measures to bring about tax cuts and to increase housing programs. I suggest that the hon. member made a very useful contribution this afternoon. It will be interesting to hear what his colleagues on the government benches have to say as a result of his intervention. The hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) spoke in this debate and related his remarks to the department with which he is most concerned, but he carefully avoided any reference to the contribution made by the hon. member for Trinity. It will be interesting to hear what other government members have to say before this debate is concluded.

An hon. Member: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Burton: The motion takes aim at a broad range of government economic policies. It refers to the failure of government policies with with respect to inflation. The fact is that inflationary trends are still with us, as was correctly noted by the hon. member for Trinity. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has been trumpeting loudly that the inflation problem is solved. If that is so, I see very little purpose in retaining the services of Dr. John Young, chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission. What is the purpose of having the Prices and Incomes Commission and Dr. Young's circus effort, if the problem of inflation has been solved? This is why some of my colleagues in this party have taken objection to the supplementary estimates which will be voted on later tonight, including the vote concerning the Prices and Incomes Commission. We feel that the sooner Dr. Young's services are dispensed with, the better for Canada.

We also should note that we can no longer depend on a market approach to the economy in order to solve economic problems. Some interesting remarks were made by Professor Rotstein of the University of Toronto regarding developments in the Canadian economy. He noted the influence of United States multinational corporations, the particular problems with respect to the application of United States law concerning trading with the enemy, in United States terms, and the question of that country's anti-trust laws. These have a definite impact on Canadian economic activity.

Professor Rotstein also noted that we no longer have a market situation in our economy. The growth of the multinational corporation means that many economic transactions are not of the arm's length type in which a true market price is set; rather, they are simply transfers of products or wealth within an existing corporate structure. No real transfer takes place in terms of an arm's length economic transaction. We are dealing with a completely new type of economic situation and will have to find new solutions and policies to come to terms with its problems and developments.

The motion refers to the unemployment problem, which is a very real one for the 675,000 and more people out of work. Government policies which are responsible for and have contributed to the situation are morally wrong and have demonstrated callousness and insensitivity on the part of the government which have never before been witnessed. The government must take responsibility for this situation.

Reference was also made to the question of regional disparity. I do not quarrel with the assertion of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. O'Connell), that the motion submitted by the official opposition can be questioned on the grounds of their use of the phrase "have accentuated regional disparity", but to use that argument to say that the government's policy has been a success is totally wrong in my view. The parliamentary secretary correctly noted that solutions to the problems of regional disparity involve long-run policies and will not be found overnight. I agree with this assertion. The basic approach must be long-term. This reinforces the argument which was presented by members of my party when legislation of that department was before the House prior to the Christmas recess. At that time we suggested that the program of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion should not be used as a vehicle or tool for dealing with short-run economic problems. I maintain that we were correct in our assertion at that time, and I think this has been borne out by the statements of the parliamentary secretary this afternoon.

We must look at our regional development programs, because it is difficult to determine whether we are getting value for our money. The government has spent a great deal on these programs and has made many announcements regarding grants and jobs created—but in reality surely jobs will only be created if projects are proceeded with and concluded. How many jobs have been created as a result of programs for regional development? Before Christmas only a small number had been created as a result of the incentive programs of the department.

In referring to the comments of the deputy leader of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), the parliamentary secretary suggested the hon. member said that essentially regional economic expansion programs were unplanned because big companies are receiving grants. I suggest he was confused, because essentially the hon. member for York South made two points: first, that the regional incentives program was unplanned because the government has not established a basic framework within which to provide grants; second, that the government sits back waiting for industry to come up with ideas, proposals and plans and then passes judgment on them. This is what we were referring to regarding the unplanned aspect of the program.

The minister cannot deny that a number of grants have been made to large companies such as Falconbridge Nickel and Procter and Gamble. These companies certainly do not need this money in order to carry on their projects. The government presented its regional development program as the keystone of its programs during the present term of office. Most of them involve a massive giveaway and have also involved their faulty use of short-run economic objectives. This is in sharp contrast with the loans fund announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) last December which we felt was a step in the right direction and should have been preceeded with because it has some merit. The Minister of Finance made a contribution to dealing with short-run economic problems when he presented that proposal.

I suggest that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) has abdicated leadership in his department. Basically, he has adopted the attitude "I'm all right, Jack" whenever problems are put to him. The deputy minister, who is an able enough person in his own right and a well known Liberal, is really the boss of the department. I suggest that the minister is not really in charge of the department. I fail to see how there can be any other explanation for the minister's inability adequately to describe certain matters and answer in a rational way questions which have been raised from time to time with respect to the department's programs. Increasingly, cogent criticisms of the department's program have been made by many people. I refer to the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Harries) who is quoted in the Edmonton Journal of February 19, 1971, as saying:

> The federal government should stop immediately its industrial incentive grant program except in very special areas—

Further, the article reports him as saying:

> The current incentive program is turning out to be the same as the last federal incentive program which, when completed, was 'roundly criticized.'

He pointed out that incentive grants represented a windfall profit to the shareholders of Imperial Oil, to cite one case, and that was the only substantial result of some of the grants which has been made. Other criticisms were levelled recently by the chairman of the Science Council of Canada. As recently as Saturday, March 20, the Ottawa Citizen carried this report on the matter. Dr. Solandt said:

> —the record of regional industrial development in Canada was one of disaster after disaster.

He went on to say:

> We shouldn't kid ourselves that these regional industrial developments are being done for any other reason than to create jobs; they're not economically sound . . . they're welfare projects for industry—

Certainly we want jobs to be created. The chairman of the Science Council has pointed out some of the problems connected with the government's programs. When I asked the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion yesterday afternoon whether he had taken into account these submissions and whether studies or consultations were going on, all I could obtain from the minister was a smart aleck answer which completely avoided the subject.

I also refer to the comments of the governor of the Bank of Canada who in his annual report again emphasized that regional development programs cannot and should not be used to deal with short-run economic problems. But what has been the minister's response? When I first raised the question yesterday he said that I might be opposing a pulp mill in Regina. I suggest that the minister must know very well that Regina is on the wide, open plains and is certainly not in the woods, as the minister is.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I shall be rather parochial and local in my remarks this afternoon. I make no excuse for this because I feel that the province which I have the honour to represent in this House is in a very serious situation financially. I only regret that the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) is not in his seat to hear the particulars of the serious situation in which we find ourselves. The wording of the motion partly influenced me to speak in this debate. The motion in part reads:

> That this House condemns the government's economic policies which have . . . accentuated regional disparity and have failed to promote regional development.

If there is one province in Canada to which those words apply particularly, that province is Prince Edward Island. A couple of weeks ago our provincial treasurer brought down his budget for the 1971-72 fiscal year. He budgeted for an over-all deficit of $2,868,825. I know that in many provinces of Canada that would not sound like a lot of money, but in a province the size of mine, which suffers from grave economic disabilities, it is a large amount of money. Our direct debt at present is $108,306,000, which represents a debt of $1,000 for every man, woman and child living in my province. Just to give Your Honour an idea of how seriously the financial situation has deteriorated, may I point out that in 1961—just nine years ago—our debt was $32,200,000, or approximately $300 per capita. During the intervening nine-year period our direct debt has increased by $76 million.

In addition to having to shoulder that direct debt, the government of my province finds itself in the unfortunate position of having to shoulder indirect liabilities in the amount of $15,439,000. So our direct debt plus our indirect debt amounts to $124 million. The interest alone on this debt is $10 million per year. Our population is approximately 110,000 and our income per capita is one of the lowest of any province of Canada. The average per capita income in my province last year was $1,818.

An hon. Member: This government doesn't care.

Mr. McQuaid: Our per capita income, as I say, was $1,818, compared with the Canadian average of $2,913.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Shame.

Mr. McQuaid: We had, as of February, 1971, 8,959 people receiving social assistance. In my province there are 8,959 people who must try to live on the small amount the government is able to provide for them. I presume that the government is doing the best it can with the money it has. Those people are trying to exist on the small amount that the government sees fit to provide. Yet this province in which almost 9,000 people are drawing social assistance must pay an interest charge of $10 million on its debt before it can undertake any other programs.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Shame.

Mr. McQuaid: I say that this situation just cannot continue. I say this, too: the people of Prince Edward Island do not want to be on welfare. We want to support ourselves, but we cannot support ourselves unless the federal government does something to help us improve our economy. We would have had a chance—I say this without fear of contradiction—because if the Conservative government had remained in power, Prince Edward Island today would be connected to the mainland by a causeway.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: The Liberal government scuttled that plan. That was our only hope of salvation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McQuaid: If the Conservative government had remained in power, we would have the causeway today, we would be self-supporting and no member representing a constituency in my province would have to stand up in the House and ask for the assistance of the federal government. We would not want that assistance if we could get along without it. We want the government to help us improve our economy.

Two or three years ago—I am, again, sorry that the minister is not present to hear me—the government introduced its famous economic development plan. I call it an infamous economic development plan because so far it has done absolutely nothing to improve the economy of my province. All that has been done under the plan so far is to bring highly paid officials from other parts of Canada to try and tell us how to run our province. It is estimated that over the next 15 years it will cost $728 million. There must be no mistake about this—the $728 million will not be provided by the federal government. The contribution by the federal government will be only $225 million; the province will be expected to put up the remaining $503 million. The plan was supposed to do wonderful things. I quote from the preliminary agreement between the government of Canada and the government of Prince Edward Island:

> Whereas the territory of the province, hereinafter referred to as "the area" has experienced widespread low income—

Nothing could be more true than that.

> And whereas Canada and the provinces have jointly agreed that it is desirable that the area have a comprehensive and co-ordinated development plan designed to promote its economic development, to increase income and employment opportunities and to raise standards of living—

These are worth-while objectives. What has the government done so far to carry out these objectives? It has done nothing expect to bring in highly paid officials from other parts of Canada and put them on the payroll. They are accomplishing very, very little. I quote from the joint statement issued by the Premier and the minister when the plan was announced:

> The development plan for Prince Edward Island will concentrate on the realization of the full potential of the province's basic industries in linking the provincial economy closer to the national economy.

How close have they come to accomplishing that objective? Prince Edward Island is primarily a farming area; farming is the basis of our economy. At the present time—there are 400,000 acres of crops in Prince Edward Island, 152,000 acres in improved pastures. There are 9,585 occupied farms and 53,000 acres of cultivated land with potato crops. The farmers of Prince Edward Island are receiving 65 cents a bag for their potatoes, if they can sell them. However, they just are not able to sell them. The government has brought experts from as far west as Alberta to show us how to grow potatoes. We do not need these experts. We need experts who will show us where we can sell our potatoes. If the government did this, it would be doing something worth while.

There are 53,000 acres of idle land which could be devoted to potato crops. This represents 17 per cent of the Canadian total. Both governments, federal and provincial, are doing absolutely nothing to provide markets for our farmers. The record shows the serious financial position that the farmers of Prince Edward Island are in today. The latest figures released by the Farm Credit Corporation show that 251 farmers in Prince Edward Island are in arrears with regard to principal and interest, totalling $174,500. All the farmers do not have loans with the Farm Credit Corporation. Our farmers do not want to owe money to the Farm Credit Corporation. They would like to be out of debt, but they will not be able to do so if potatoes remain at 65 cents a bag. Even at that, they cannot sell them. The packaging and processing plants are being closed. Just the other day, Seabrook, a very famous company, went into backruptcy. Why? Because they just could not finance their operation. They could not sell their product. As a result, the farmers are not receiving the price they should.

The farm population of Prince Edward Island has dropped by almost 50 per cent in the last 30 years. I wish to illustrate how serious this situation is for the benefit of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). In February, 1971, 3,107 carloads of potatoes for domestic consumption were shipped from Prince Edward Island. This is more than 1,000 carloads less than were shipped at the same time last year. What is the reason for this? No attempt is being made by the minister or the government to find markets for Prince Edward Island potatoes, although they realize this is our basic industry. The minister realizes that the greatest majority of our farmers depend on this product for a living.

I say without fear of successful contradiction that the minister and the government are doing very little to improve the economy of the farmers of Prince Edward Island. The farmers do not want welfare or financial assistance. All they want is an opportunity to earn a living. They do not want to be dependent on the Farm Credit Corporation, the federal government and the banks. They want to be absolutely independent. They should be given an opportunity to earn an income. If markets can be found for the products of these farmers, they will show that our province does not depend on any government. We are self-sufficient and happy to depend on ourselves.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening. At noon I strolled outside. The sky was blue, the sun was warm and the air was crisp and clear. For all these things let us be thankful, O Lord.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the deputy leader of the New Democratic Party today made a very interesting speech, one which I think has something new in it. I am afraid that is more than I can say for the offering his leader made in a similar debate on Friday afternoon when it seemed to me that he, like the rest of us, was somewhat tired of shuffling the paragraphs of his old speeches. However, just about a year ago in the House, on February 12, 1970, as appears in Hansard at page 3520 the deputy leader of the NDP had this to say:

> The only way to deal with the situation in an economy such as ours is to impose a comprehensive prices and incomes policy, with teeth, if necessary, selective price controls and selective controls on all the other sources of income in this country—profits, interest, dividends, wages, salaries and the rest.

In his speech today, while showing no less vigour and enthusiasm in favour of price controls the same hon. member displayed a somewhat circumspect attitude toward wage controls. One might almost be constrained to believe that the nearness of the leadership race in his party, the dependency of the successful candidate on the support of organized labour and the attitude of organized labour generally toward wage control, might have had some influence on his thinking. But being a more noble and generous individual—

An hon. Member: And modest!

Mr. Mahoney: —I might be persuaded to believe that the change in his attitude has come about as the result of an honest appraisal of the improvement in the country's economy because of the government's policies.

We have heard various suggestions from both sides of the House. We have heard it suggested that there is, or should be, a right to work in Canada. We have heard talk of full employment. It is hard to say this without sounding callous, but such phrases are really nothing but rhetoric. What is this full employment? What is the figure which hon. members who propose full employment have in mind? Obviously, it is not 100 per cent. There are facts: there is a climate in Canada which affects opportunities to work. Fortunately, with improvement in technology these opportunities have now been increased; nevertheless, the climate is a very real factor in Canada.

What is this figure of full employment that we are to strive for at the cost of all other considerations? We gather from the deputy leader of the New Democratic Party that his view is that the regional economic expansion programs are ineffective and that the government should aim for full employment at any price of inflation; that the moneys presently being spent in the less advantaged regions of Canada should be used to supplement welfare payments for the people in those regions where the benefits of an all-out inflationary policy of full employment would not directly flow; that we put these people on welfare and forget them. I find that very hard to accept.

It has also been suggested that immediate tax cuts be made. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has indicated that this year the government will be in the market to borrow $2.2 billion. How much more would hon. members opposite have the government borrow? How much more inflationary pressure would they have the government put on the economy? Let us have some real, solid suggestions. If hon. members subscribe to a 6 per cent reduction in income taxes, as some hon. members opposite have suggested, this will add another 50 per cent to government borrowings and will run the government close to $3.5 billion for the year, which should have a fairly significant impact on the money market in Canada and on the ability of corporations to obtain financing. It certainly should have a fairly significant impact on interest rates.

The government stands by the economic measures it has taken in its December budget which have been aimed at alleviating in a selective manner the economic problems of Canada in areas where those problems are most serious. I am not going to catalogue all the things this government has done since its initial decision last March to implement expansionary measures in our economy, but they have been significant. Among these measures are the Lift program for the Prairie farmers, additional loans through CMHC for low-cost housing, extra-mortgage funds for the Farm Credit Corporation, extra loans for the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, the accelerated transfer of tax revenue to the provincial governments, the summer employment program for students both last year and this year, extra money to finance housing units in August last year to the tune of another quarter of a billion dollars—money directed into the housing market about which some people have expressed concern today—new capital and operations program, plus increased manpower training allocations last October. Then in the December budget the government introduced many selective measures aimed at alleviating economic problems in areas where those problems were greatest.

Hon. members have suggested today that the government should immediately seek a further significant reduction in interest rates. Interest rates today are the lowest they have been for a long time. For example, today's rate for 91-day treasury bills is 3.02 per cent, and for 182-day treasury bills, 3.08 per cent. Long-term borrowing today is at an average of 6.7 per cent, which is down from 8 per cent last fall. These are very significant reductions and are indeed the lowest rates Canada has experienced for a long time.

It has also been suggested there should be a massive injection of funds into housing, both new housing and for rehabilitation. Speaking in this Chamber on February 10, the Minister Without Portfolio responsible for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation (Mr. Andras) indicated a number of facts concerning the government's housing program for this year. It is evident that some members need to be reminded of those facts. The government has, of course, been pursuing a policy that has set a target of at least one million new homes for the five-year period 1970-74 inclusive. This year's total budget to be spent through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is $942 million, compared with the 1970 budget of $854 million. We are anticipating approximately 220,000 housing starts this year. By comparison, in 1970 there were 190,000 unit starts, which was the third best year in Canada's history—and this despite the economic conditions that prevailed.

In direct terms of employment, it is anticipated that this year's housing program will mean a minimum increase of 60,000 man-years of employment geared directly to housing construction. Of course, there are also many indirect benefits as well as many jobs created indirectly. With respect specifically to the question of rehabilitation, the Minister without Portfolio indicated in his speech that section 40 loans through CMHC would amount to $172 million. That money, of course, is available not only for rehabilitation but for the purchase of old housing stock.

It has been suggested that immediate mandatory price and wage guidelines be implemented. Two suggestions were made in this regard. The first was that a limit on profits be instituted related to long-term experience. It is a well known fact that business profits at the present time are well down over the long-range average. This is a regrettable situation for the Canadian business community, but it is true. The suggestion that a limitation on profits related to long-term experience be implemented by way of curbing profits is, of course, manifestly an absurdity. Any such limitation imposed today would mean a guideline for profits considerably above those that are currently being earned. This is no control in the sense that was proposed.

It has also been suggested that wage increases should be limited to increases in productivity. This, of course, is an axiomatic suggestion when put in over-all economic terms, because any aggregate of wage increases that exceeds the total increase in productivity in a given economy is obviously inflationary. That is what inflation is all about. However, to suggest that such policy could be made to work on a selective basis is totally to ignore the fact that in the service industries increases in productivity are terribly hard to ascertain, and in any case are not at all commensurate with the increase in activity or in the increase in value to the economy.

Such a policy would result in a continuation of what has happened today in regard to wage increases in the manufacturing industries. Labour has been able to demonstrate that productivity in the manufacturing industries has increased substantially, due largely to technology, and they should be rewarded to a greater degree than people engaged in other sectors of the economy. Such a policy would perpetuate the distortion that exists between workers engaged in the manufacturing industries and those engaged in other activities.

In speaking in a very similar debate last Friday I enumerated the positive factors in the Canadian economy as well as the negative factors we are confronting today. I still feel that while the legitimate function of hon. members opposite is to talk about the economy and to denigrate the efforts of the government in managing the economy, the fact is that the "doers" in the economy—the government and the business community—in the decisions they take every day are expressing their confidence both in the long and short-range prospects of the economy. It will not be long before hon. members opposite will have to find some other topic to discuss on opposition days.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard some great, flowing words from the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney). He said that the government has to go out and borrow in the neighbourhood of $2.2 billion this year. He then listed the reasons why it had to do this. I suggest that if the Liberal government had been more concerned over the past few years about the viability of our economy, rather than going all-out to introduce social measures which the country could not afford, we would be in better financial condition today. The hon. member said that the government had to find $100 million for the Lift program, millions of dollars for the summer employment program for students and for the manpower retraining program. None of that money would have been needed had the government tended to its business and created a sound economic situation. Now it finds itself in the position where it has to borrow money.

This afternoon we heard the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) recommend to his government the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials and the 3 per cent personal and corporate surtax. He said that money should be put into circulation so that Canadian citizens could control and spend it. Believe me, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be better to have that money in the hands of Canadian citizens than in the hands of this government. If I had sufficient time I could list many ways in which this government has not spent money wisely. I need only mention a few to make my point. I need go no further than mention the purchase and refit of the Bonaventure, costing some $31 million, and then the ship was sold for scrap for less than $1 million. It was sold for less money than the government spent to paint it. That is one reason why the government has to borrow money.

In 1965 the Post Office Department issued a Christmas postage stamp with the year "1965" printed on it. It overestimated the quantity needed and as a result $16,000 worth of Christmas stamps were left over and had to be scrapped. People just don't want to buy 1965 Christmas stamps for 1966 Christmas cards. That was $16,000 down the drain. In 1970, even after being reprimanded by the Public Accounts Committee, the Post Office last year issued a Christmas stamp with "1970" printed on it. I understand a lot of those stamps are left over. I do not know how many, but today I received a letter bearing a Christmas stamp and the sender wrote "Happy Easter" on it and drew an arrow pointing to the Christmas stamp. Possibly there will be another $5,000, $10,000 or $15,000 down the drain there. It is no wonder the government has to borrow money when things like this happen.

If the Canadian taxpayer does not spend money wisely, he ends up having to borrow money. But that can go on only for a little while until the source is shut off. The government thinks it can go on like this forever. To scrutinize government expenditures we have the Auditor General, whose staff has been frozen at a limit of 246 persons. His staff should be increased. Here is an interesting comparison: in Canada, which has a population of 22 million, the Auditor General has a staff of 246 persons; in Australia, which has a population of 11 million, the auditor general has a staff of 520 persons.

The hon. member for Trinity made a great plea for the poor voter, the person most affected by inflation. He had great sympathy for the less fortunate. It used to be Liberal Party philosophy to think about these people. However, that hon. member seems to be the only one in the Liberal Party who thinks that way today. It makes one wonder just what is taking place. That hon. member resigned from the cabinet and remained silent for a long time. Today he made a very stirring speech. I do not know whether he is preaching for a call, or what is in the background, but it is quite evident there is something developing.

The hon. member for Calgary South said it was all right for us to condemn the government, but asked what we would do. I remind him that when the Conservatives came into office in 1957-58 we were confronted with millions of bushels of unsold wheat and with unemployment that was running at almost ten per cent of the labour force. The first thing we did was to go out and sell the wheat. Then we pumped millions of dollars into house construction, creating many jobs in that industry and in allied industries. We also introduced the winter works program to provide employment. The present government has cut out the winter works program. That program was very successful in keeping people employed during the winter when normally unemployment is at its peak.

We instituted an enlarged technical vocational school program, up to the point where at one stage we were opening one school a day for a year or more. That was a very successful program in helping educate our young people in various trades. We certainly did not impose an 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. That is an iniquitous tax. It is adding to the cost of much needed housing; it is depressing the construction industry. Canadians have to pay 11 per cent more for such goods than their neighbours to the south.

There is not a businessman, small or large, who is not sitting pat, afraid to move into any venture aimed at increasing or stimulating his business, because today he does not know what the proposals in the white paper on taxation will do to him if they are implemented. That white paper has been hanging over Canadian business like a very heavy, low-lying cumulus cloud. On top of that, the government increased taxes. It introduced the 3 per cent surtax. That tax was supposed to remain in force only for a year. It has been put into force for three years. Four-wheeled brakes have been applied to the economy of the country. If the government had realized the impact that the white paper on taxation would have on the economy it would not have bothered to apply the other brakes because the white paper alone was sufficient to slow down the economy and to curtail inflation.

The Prices and Incomes Commission was set up by this government to do what it could about curtailing inflation. The commission has been guilty of overkill on the job. In respect of consumer prices we find that the percentage increase in Canada was 1.7, in Japan it was 8.6 and in Germany it was 4.1. Both Japan and Germany have full employment. Both these countries import labour. They call the people they bring in "guest workers". They find this necessary because there are not sufficient workers in these countries. So I would say that we have been guilty of overkill in our attempt to hold down inflation. In so doing we have created a great deal of unemployment. Dr. Young, who appeared before the committee just this week when the estimates were before it, said:

> —they are unable to keep productive activity and employment going strong without encountering price inflation that gets out of hand.

It would appear we would have been better off had we let inflation go up a little more, like they did in Japan and Germany—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Hales: —but have greater employment. That is what we need. When people are employed they receive wages which are taxable and those taxes go into government coffers. In any event, the Prices and Incomes Commission has been told to disband at the end of December this year. When the members of this commission appeared before the committee with their estimates in the amount of $1,976,000—practically $2 million—with which to carry on from now till the end of January, I didn't think these were a realistic set of estimates and a motion was moved in committee by a Newfoundland member, the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan), to the effect that the vote be reduced to $1. The vote was a tie and it was necessary for the chairman, a Liberal member, to cast the deciding vote. He voted that the estimates pass, to cover the period until the end of the year, at which time the commission will pack it up and call it quits.

Now I should like to say a few words about agriculture and the situation in Ontario. We hear a great deal about agriculture in the other parts of this great dominion. In the province of Ontario—and much of this is applicable to all of Canada—hogs today, for instance, are $2 per cwt. lower than they were 10 years ago; yet the farmer has had to buy machinery, fertilizer and all the other equipment he requires in order to farm, at much higher prices than ever before. What has this government done about the price of farm machinery? It spent $1,053,000 on the Barber commission on farm machinery, but never followed up the report of that committee. It has been pigeonholed. Incidentally, the cost of that commission is practically the same as the cost of the pilotage commission and the commission on the status of women. These are three examples of commissions the cost of which has been in the million dollar plus bracket, and at least in respect of the commission on farm machinery no action has been taken.

I could go down the list in respect of farm products. We find that eggs are selling at three dozen for $1. Lamb is 10 cents a pound lower this year than last year. Tobacco, a very important industry in Ontario, is at is its lowest price in 10 years. Turkeys are about as cheap as they have ever been. Broiler chickens are away down. The farming situation today is a very sorry one and requires more attention than it is being given by this government. When we talk about farm machinery, we find that in the Brantford riding the Massey-Ferguson plant is laying off thousands of people. With the free trade in respect of agricultural implements between Canada and the United States, it would appear that this industry may move to the United States. There is a great danger that this may happen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that his time has expired.

An hon. Member: Continue.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there such unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take advantage of the rules by exceeding the 15 minutes allotted to each member and therefore I shall try to wind up my remarks very quickly. With these tremendous lay-offs in Brantford, or in any other city in Ontario, the welfare costs become so high that the municipalities are unable to absorb them. They do not receive any additional or direct help from Ottawa. Representatives from Toronto were in Ottawa recently asking for help in respect of these very heavy welfare costs. They were sent home empty-handed. This is a very serious problem.

Alleged Failure to Improve Economy

I do not wish to dwell at length on the regional development situation, but would simply say that in Ontario we send approximately $1 billion to the provinces east of us and yet because we are not a designated area we are caught in two ways. We put up the money but do not receive any assistance under the regional development plan for new industries, with the exception of areas such as north and west of North Bay, a little area around Cornwall and the Renfrew area where there is a very alarming situation.

The federal government has invested $1.1 billion for projects in depressed areas over the past two years, but has succeeded in creating less than 37,000 new jobs. Quebec alone requires 100,000 new jobs. On this basis, the cost to provide each job is about $30,000. We talk about Canadian capital versus United States capital, but the need for capital is both great and growing. I do not know how it can be argued that a Canadian worker in a job provided by an outside investor would somehow be better off if he remained unemployed until such time as domestic capital filled the investment gap. So far as I am concerned, the creation of jobs for Canadians should have the greatest priority. Let us try to do it with Canadian money, but if we find we do not have sufficient Canadian money we must do it with money from other countries which see fit to invest in Canada. If we had that investment we would not need to spend as much money under the regional development plan which up to now has not shown signs of being successful.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, a motion put forward by the Conservative Progressive party is now before the House, reading as follows:

That this House condemns the government's economic policies which have failed to curb inflation, have brought severe unemployment to at least 675,000 Canadians, have accentuated regional disparity and have failed to promote regional development.

Mr. Speaker, I for one fully endorse this motion of censure, for specific reasons which I would like to review quickly in order not to take up too much of the House's time.

Mr. Speaker, for 1971-72, the Canadian government's budget totals more than $14 billion 352 million; that is the amount of its tax revenues. That is the budget the government now has to manage. How will this budget be used? Of course, priorities must be established.

On the threshold of the seventies, the federal authorities are facing new challenges. First of all, according to a consensus, it is hoped, with reason, that a better quality of life can be given to every Canadian.

Also, it is hoped that security of family income will be assured, especially for those on a fixed income, in other words those who are directly dependent on the country's economic situation.

Finally, and here again there appears to be a consensus, it is hoped that every Canadian may have the opportunity to participate in the Canadian economy, including those whose resources are limited, because they are mentally, physically or financially handicapped. Some Canadians, too many unfortunately, cannot participate in the economic activity of the country because of the following handicap. There will be 300,000 more young Canadians in their twenties in 1972.

That is thus to say that in 1972, 300,000 more young Canadians will be seeking employment in Canada. One can therefore see the problem which will confront us. If a monetary and fiscal policy consistent with modern times is not adopted, not only will it be impossible to find employment for those presently unemployed, either young or old, but it will be impossible to create jobs at a rate which will coincide with that of the increase in unemployment, thus resulting in the handicap which will face many Canadians, who will find themselves unable to contribute to the economic life of the country.

In view of that situation, the Liberal government resorted in its preceding budgets to two kinds of policy: First, the fight against inflation, because in its opinion, that was the crucial problem in Canada. It was necessary, he said, to prevent inflation from running away. So the government based its various measures on that priority forgetting all those others which I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks. Those measures, such as the restriction of credit and the increase in interest rates, have reduced the economic development in Canada so that Canadians are less in a position to play a role in our economy. We are suddenly experiencing an unemployment crisis which the government finds hard to bear because it is responsible for it. Unemployment has not appeared all at once, quite the contrary, it was anticipated.

The fiscal and monetary policies of the government have led to the state of affairs for which it is blamed today. This could have been foreseen since the government had given the priority to credit restrictions, higher interest rates, maintenance of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. The inevitable result is economic stagnation which leads to less individual participation or progress; we now wake up—and this is truer than ever—in an inordinately rich country, where destitution prevails.

Mr. Speaker, the government of Canada can influence the economic activity of the country through fiscal and monetary policies. Even the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that his main weapon against inflation was credit restrictions.

We, of the Ralliement créditiste, claim that such a policy of credit restrictions does not check inflation but increases the economic unbalance.

Mr. Speaker, in view of those facts, the government must find more money. That is its problem today. If an hon. member or one of the people in the galleries went to the minister and asked him to approve any economic development project, he would be told: "Too bad, my friend, the government has no money." The answer is always the same. We have no money.

According to the government, taxes are in practice the only sources of financing. This year, more than $14 billion will be collected from taxpayers. That is a lot of money! The purchasing power of each taxpayer will be reduced by that much; so each Canadian will be deprived of that much that could be used to dispose of our production in Canada.

Another way for the government to apply its monetary or tax policy so as to finance itself is by borrowing, not on the Canadian market or from the Bank of Canada, but from other countries.

Mr. Speaker, in the booklet entitled How your tax dollar is spent put out recently by the Treasury Board it is stated, and I quote:

Canada's public debt amounted to $38 billion in October, 1970,—

Here is what is said about the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) on page 23, and I quote:

—and the Minister of Finance has forecast new government borrowings of $1.9 billion in 1971-72—

Let us not forget either what is written further on, same page:

Paying the interest and other charges on this debt is going to cost $1,995 million in 1971-72, or 14 cents of your dollar.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, the government claims that its only sources of financing are taxes, which reduce the buying power of Canadians, the system of everlasting debt by resorting to foreign capital. It means that, in both cases, the indebtedness of Canadians is increased and that, consequently, taxpayers lose the buying power which would allow them to purchase consumer goods.

We of the Ralliement créditiste, say to the government that the first thing it must do to finance itself is to resort to the Bank of Canada and order it to put the necessary money in circulation, by issuing new lines of credit according to the balance between aggregate production and aggregate consumption in Canada. Let this balance be transformed into credit to the consumer under the form of national dividends and compensated discounts which would allow the taxpayer to buy the accumulated production.

Mr. Speaker, the other serious mistake of this government—and this is why I support the censure motion under study—is that in its economic policies it is seeking to increase production but fails to introduce bills likely to improve the lot of consumers.

Mr. Speaker, any and every Canadian is at the same time a producer—mass-manufactured machine producer, service producer, entertainment producer—and a consumer. But he is a producer owing to equipment or to his own labour, whether he holds a degree or not. He is a producer and must be paid accordingly. We agree on that.

But this same citizen is also a consumer. In order to ensure continued economic growth and a progressive economic policy, the government must therefore take into account these two features of the Canadian citizen.

To put it another way, Mr. Speaker, the government must—and this is extremely urgent—propose fiscal and monetary measures to increase the purchasing power of the Canadian taxpayers.

A tax policy to increase purchasing power, such as a reduction of certain taxes, the withdrawal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, would result in an immediate increase in the rate of development of the construction sector in Canada. This would be a practical policy to speed up economic development. But the government keeps saying, tighten your belts.

Mr. Speaker, some day this government, which has sold out to the high finance community, will have to say to chartered banks and financiers what it tells Canadians, and particularly unskilled labourers.

The right hon. Prime Minister (M. Trudeau) said recently, as reported by the newspaper Montréal-Matin in February:

Trudeau blames the labour sector for refusing to tighten its belt.

Not only must workers tighten their belts but they also lack the essentials of life. Meanwhile, the government allows the chartered banks to increase their profits by over 28 per cent in a single year.

Mr. Speaker, this is truly illogical and shows that the government cares only to serve high finance, since its members are slaves to it, instead of trying to serve the people of Canada. If, the government was really willing to serve the interests of the people of Canada, it would right now adopt a fiscal policy aimed at reducing taxes, a monetary policy likely to increase the purchasing power of each Canadian citizen, and thus create a balance between the production forces and the consumption forces.

Mr. Speaker, the government said that inflation had to be fought. Its irresponsibility shows through the fact that on December 24, the Prime Minister said, all of a sudden, after two years of running to catch up with inflation: We are through with inflation; at last, we have licked it.

Mr. Speaker, I am now quoting an article from the Ottawa Citizen:

We have licked inflation—Prime Minister Trudeau.

Mr. Speaker, according to the Prime Minister, this was the result of his policy. Now, yesterday, the hon. member for Montréal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel) said before the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, as reported in the newspaper La Presse of March 24:

Inflation will soon be overcome.

Mr. Speaker, one would like to know which of the two is telling the truth. Has inflation stopped galloping, or is it still running? We must know in order to be able to check it. The government should make up its mind.

Mr. Speaker, this is not all. The Chairman of the Prices and Incomes Commission, Mr. John Young, had this to say: It is not my fault if unemployment has increased, I am not the one responsible for it. Nobody ever said he was, but it was said that absolutely nothing had changed in the economic system.

As we say, white papers and studies will not help solve that problem. Indeed, we saw the result of the B and B

Commission. Fifteen million dollars were spent and 556 persons were employed full time. Yet, that inquiry was given recently a first class funeral. Absolutely nothing has changed, in spite of the study that was made. It did not give one more cent to the taxpayers, but it has changed the policy.

Mr. Speaker, such a state of things is ridiculous and revolting. As a young man, I want to tell the government about my concern as to that multitude of young people who are told to get on education and then find themselves with all kinds of diplomas but unable to participate in the economic activity of this country.

Mr. Speaker, while they were studying they were told that they could, at the end of their studies, live in a happy and safe society. These young people are prepared to fight and to work for their country. They are quite ready to do their share. The only thing they are offered is a social security card, an unemployment insurance card. They are told: "Wait for your turn at the Canada Manpower centres."

The parents of those young people are told: "Wait for your turn at the Canada Manpower centre, you will be given retraining courses." Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that everybody sees, as I do, how we are mired in this illogical system, and how silly it all is.

It is high time that we put some order into this system. We do not say that those people are poor administrators but we say it is time for the government to adopt the same policy of credit or power restriction with regard to high finance and chartered banks.

We say that the government should order the Bank of Canada to be at the service of all Canadians. The Bank of Canada belongs to all Canadians. Why should it not become the prime tool of the Canadian government to finance the public sector, namely the provinces and the municipalities, instead of borrowing from a foreign country to finance our own country?

[English]

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, this evening we have heard some interesting speeches from the other side of the House. We heard the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Hales) reiterate the "stand pat" argument that by being too tough in our efforts to conquer inflation we deliberately created unemployment.

Mr. McGrath: You sure did.

Mr. Gibson: It occurs to me on the basis of what I have seen, heard and read in this House that if we had not taken such steps to tackle inflation we would have run our whole price and wage structure up like a balloon and created massive unemployment from coast to coast. This is not rebutted by anyone on the other side, yet they tritely condemn us for tackling the problem. Not one of the speakers opposite explained how we were going to keep people employed by allowing prices to skyrocket to the moon and thus price ourselves out of the market.

Mr. Hales: How about Japan and Germany?

[Mr. Fortin.]

Mr. Gibson: Those countries have not the same environment of employment as we have. They have not the same structure. They have a different set-up, and Japan at least is smaller geographically. They have more modern techniques in different senses than we have. I submit that Japan would be happy to own our untouched resources. But we are going to grapple with these problems and create an economic climate which will be greater than any we have had in the past.

I do not say this with empty sophistry or undue optimism. If we had not planned our economy on a sound basis and kept prices under reasonable control, we would not have the enormous trade balance that we have today. The figures indicate that our economy is on a sound basis. The price of the dollar has gone up and our bank accounts are high.

The fact that bank interest rates are dropping is an optimistic sign that we are well on our way to pulling out of the winter of this bleak period in our economic history.

Admittedly, unemployment figures are high, but we are grappling with them. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) will be bringing forward the most modern and up to date amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act that have ever been presented to any Parliament anywhere. The opposition has not criticized that. I hope it will support the bill when it comes forward. With the help of all parties, I trust that we will speed that legislation through. It will help our economy to progress. Men, instead of waiting in bread lines will be looking for new training opportunities as a result of the bill. Men who have been affected by automation, one of the difficulties of the modern day, will be given, as a result of the legislation, job retraining opportunities. Under our training schemes men will be able to take pride in learning another occupation instead of sitting at home idle and out of work.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gibson: In a sense, these men will be working because they will be retraining themselves. With our mobility programs there is no reason why, especially when we consider that young people like to move around the country, we cannot make this new manpower retraining scheme the most modern and up to date of its kind in the world. I believe we are on the right track. I admit that some of our problems in the welfare field must be tackled. We cannot just hand cash to people and put them in a better position if they stay home than they would be in if they took even a job paying low wages.

The measures taken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) in the welfare field, though glibly condemned by the press as useless efforts are beginning to show signs that encourage one to become optimistic. Officials involved in the field of welfare are pointing out certain inequities in the position of people on welfare. For instance, they have shown us that those who control welfare expenditures generally have not taken into account the problems of those receiving it. They have pointed to methods of improving the entire system. In future I hope that when a man who has been on welfare is offered a job paying less than his welfare benefits, he will obtain a supplement to make up the difference if he can prove that he was getting more on welfare. By adopting such measures I think we will avoid the waste created in the field of welfare.

Unemployment and its evils will be cured by the economic policies of this government. Tonight I do not want to make a trite speech. I wish to make a constructive contribution and suggest how we can conquer inflation and unemployment. I submit that in certain areas the Prices and Incomes Commission did not go far enough last year. I submit that the steps taken were fine, considering that we were dealing with new techniques. I am proud of the results. In some respects the economy of this country has performed better than the economy of any country in the world.

I wonder whether we could not now devise a procedure whereby if Dr. Young and the commission made inquiries into an industry in which costs or prices were mounting, the commission could declare that in its opinion an economic emergency existed with respect to that industry. Step No. 2 would be that either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance might act. I am not sure just how the plan would work; I realize there are imperfections in it. However, I believe that a general plan of this type would be good and the commission ought to be empowered to make such a decision. I submit that it should be able to say that an economic emergency existed with respect to a certain industry. Once an economic emergency had been declared, I submit that the federal government should invoke its constitutional powers in order to deal with the emergency. First a declaration of emergency ought to be made. Once it had been made, that the Department of Finance should have the power to impose what might be known as an anti-inflation tax on the offending party. It could be applied with respect to wages or prices.

I do not think that the workings of such a plan have been spelled out in Canada. A similar plan worked well during the war when we imposed an excess profits tax. That was one of the best administered tax measures of the Second World War and it was effective. If such a measure was effective during the Second World War, why could we not impose a similar measure now? Part of our difficulty stems from the fact that we have been reluctant to act owing to uncertainties in respect of the Constitution. We ought to be unanimous on this point. I submit that the question whether the government of Canada has the power to do this should be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada, if there is any doubt about it at all.

I think we should do that now. Let us not wait another six months. Let us refer the question to the Supreme Court of Canada and learn whether the federal government under the peace, order and good government decisions which have been handed down by the Privy Council, has the constitutional authority to take these steps. If there is that authority, I submit that the federal government could control any economic sector that is in jeopardy at any given time. This would not mean that we would be introducing powers to control prices and incomes. Surely the federal government could impose controls, say for one year or for a temporary period.

If such a measure were enacted, I submit that many such cases would never arise: It would not be worth while for unions or management to seek increases. Therefore, the use of the legislation would probably be minimal. There would be much criticism from the press and certain pressure groups if the government attempted to take this kind of step. Nevertheless, I think the majority of the Canadian people want this type of control. We need something on the shelf which can be used constructively and fairly to control inflation.

I do not think these are impractical suggestions. What I fear is that we will delay referring the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. I hope soon we do so, and I urge the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to consider the matter. I urge the Minister of Labour, who is in the House tonight, to advocate this step being taken. Let us do it now. Every time we refer a matter to the Supreme Court of Canada the air is cleared in many constitutional areas. We have made good progress by taking this step in the past. Conversely, by being reluctant to refer certain matters to the Supreme Court of Canada, especially those involving constitutional problems, we have created defences against reform measures. I think we could avoid that by referring the question to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The steps which the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) announced will be taken this summer with regard to opportunities for youth are a small but important part of the reorganization of our economy. We have faced the fact that young people in Canada possess initiative. Their ideas are sound. If we give them the opportunity to demonstrate that they can do work that is useful and creative, I am sure we shall not be disappointed. I am sure that the youth retraining measures will be popular throughout the country. They will enable young people to help themselves. Many young people like the idea of travelling. I know that many people in the work force say, "I couldn't do that when I was young; I wish I could do it today." Young people will move around no matter what we say. Canadians apparently want to see their country, and I am very proud that they do. They are explorers, they have initiative and they are inquisitive. Surely if about 10 per cent of the money made available under the youth programs helped our young people to get around their own country and see it, they would learn more about the country and prospects for the future of this nation would be improved.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): As always, Mr. Speaker, I listened with considerable interest to the intervention of the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Mahoney). I could not help noting his concluding remark and the inference that could be drawn from it. The hon. member seems to believe that the only reason we have unemployment in Canada is in order that the opposition will have an issue to debate. He also seems to believe that the opposition in some way has created unemployment because we need something to debate. It displays a cynicism that is characteristic of members opposite who say that is why we are debating unemployment.

An hon. Member: Come on!

Mr. Saltsman: The three quarters of a million people who are out of work were not put out of work because of the actions of the opposition. They were put out of work by the deliberate policy of this government. The hon. member feels there will not be any issues to handle once the Liberal Party solves the problem of unemployment. After all, the Lord giveth and the Lord can take away: the government created unemployment and they think they can solve the problem. The government is not going to do that. I do not see any evidence that they will. I suggest that if they do solve the problem, with their ability to do stupid things they will create enough issues so that the opposition will not have to worry about subjects to debate in this House.

I do not know what members opposite expect of members of the opposition. Do they want us to go around patting their little heads, telling them what good boys they are and that the unemployment they have created is a very satisfactory way of running this country? Do they want us to congratulate them on the human misery they have intentionally created in our society?

Mr. Hogarth: If you say we are good, we must be bad.

Mr. Saltsman: Socialists do not believe in generic evil. We like to think that because of the environment and association which members opposite have and the way they are huddled together, by reinforcing each other they come to the same sad conclusions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: If members opposite will contain themselves, perhaps we can help them. We believe they should improve their environment. If they are open-minded, they may be able to learn something. We even have hope for them.

An hon. Member: They cannot learn anything.

Mr. Saltsman: Don't be too hard on them. They are not all bad—just most of them. Perhaps they want us to congratulate them on having created the slowest rate of growth of any industrial society in the world.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Saltsman: The hon. member says, "Oh, oh". It happens to be a fact. It is true. This country has the lowest per capita growth of any industrialized society in the world. When we look at the endowments of nature and the potential riches of our society, we wonder how even a Liberal government could have destroyed this country as effectively as they have. This country has some of the world's richest resources, finest farms and an educated population. The government has tried hard to wreck the economy. The government should be given "A" for effort, because they have tried hard. Their efforts have met with considerable success: we have the highest level of unemployment in the western world.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): You sound happy about it.

Mr. Saltsman: I am not happy about it, and I am not happy to see you sitting there. In the course of the debate, the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) interjected "What about Sweden, when talking about inflation? After all, Sweden has the highest rate of inflation." The hon. member is correct but, like everything else he does, he only looks at the big print and not at the explanation below. The fact is that the rate of unemployment in that country has never exceeded 1 per cent. Sweden has a harsher climate than our own, and less resources. The rate of unemployment may be somewhat higher this year, but this has not been the case throughout history. They have not paid the price that we have had to pay for unemployment.

Mr. Gibson: You pay $5 for breakfast over there.

Mr. Saltsman: Members opposite seem to be very anxious to take part in the debate as long as they do not have to stand and be recognized. They slumped in their seats after the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Hellyer) finished dragging them over the coals for their policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

M. Saltsman: I will be very interested to hear their brilliant points and magnificent repartee when their turn comes to speak. I would like to hear them speak on their feet rather than from their seat. Perhaps they do not think as well on their feet; they need communication through their seat. I will try to understand the situation. Members opposite are always terribly pained when criticized. The lovely angels over there get a hurt expression on their faces and ask, "How can opposition members say such things about nice people like us?"

I suspect that members opposite think they should be congratulated for the loss of dignity the working men of this country are encountering and the frustration they feel when standing in line at Manpower offices which have no jobs available. As a result, they have to go on welfare. The municipalities are in a desperate situation, yet government members think they have done a good thing. They pride themselves on introducing a training program for students.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: Why are you congratulating yourselves? You put them out of work in the first place. You threw them out of work and you have no jobs for them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member might give some thought to addressing the Chair.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The temptation is very great but I will try to resist it. I appreciate the direction from the Chair in this matter, although Your Honour must admit there was extreme provocation from the other side. We are a very charitable group. We find it very difficult to understand why the government has created unemployment as a matter of policy. We think about this once in a while. We like to think they must have had some reason for making Canada the laughing stock of the world.

When you speak to a worker from Germany or any other country about the level of unemployment that exists in Canada, he finds it impossible to comprehend; he just does not understand it. When you tell him that the government which the people of this country elected did it deliberately because they thought it was a good thing, it becomes more impossible to comprehend. And not only workers in countries which do not have our level of unemployment find it difficult to understand. When I tell someone in my riding who is unemployed and suffering the effects of unemployment that the government of Canada did this, he does not believe me. Canadians are very prone to praise their governments. They have a great deal of faith in their governments and want to believe in them. They do not want to believe that the federal government would do such a terrible thing to them. In fact, their government has broken faith with them. The government which they thought they could trust, cannot be trusted. The evidence is before their eyes.

We must go further and ask why the government believes that unemployment has to be created and that inflation is such a terrible problem, particularly when every country in the world is undergoing inflation. All the evidence has been placed before this government by committees of the House of Commons and independent economists. Virtually all the people who have examined this problem have told the government that there is a limit to what can be done about inflation.

It is almost impossible for a country to have a better record of inflation that its trading partners. It is obviously not impossible to have a better record if you are prepared to pay the price, and the price is horrendous in its effect upon individuals and their lives. This government has been ready to pay that price. It has ignored all the advice which has been given to it. It has ignored the conclusions of committees of the House of Commons which have examined the subject of inflation, and it has pursued its own ideology.

An hon. Member: Idiocy.

Mr. Saltsman: Perhaps that is a good term for it. There is a myth in this country which the government has accepted because it is one favoured by friends, by those who keep it in office and support it at the top level: it is that because we are an exporting nation there has to be a certain amount of unemployment. After all, unemployment is the whip, the discipline of the labour force and without unemployment the labour force would become totally unruly and we would be unable to export goods, and in the absence of such control we would price ourselves out of world markets!

Alleged Failure to Improve Economy

Mr. Mahoney: Is that your policy or somebody else's?

Mr. Saltsman: It is the kind of policy you have been pursuing.

Mr. Mahoney: I don't recognize it.

Mr. Saltsman: The exporters of raw material want unemployment in Canada. It is good for them. After all, they do not depend on the prosperity of this country for their survival; they want prosperity in somebody else's country. They want employment in somebody else's country but they want unemployment at home. This is not true of all businesses. There are many businesses which depend on the purchasing power of the workingman. If the workingman is out of employment, these businesses would be unable to sell their products or services to him.

There is a group of exporters which I believe has tended to dominate the opinions of government and press its views on government. This group has tended to equate the prosperity of this country with the export of raw materials, and I believe its view has prevailed. This is one of the attitudes which must be countered. Even the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) expressed concern in a speech he made the other night, as reported in this morning's paper, that by exporting our raw materials we might be inhibiting our manufacturing industries. He is concerned that our manufacturing industry is not developing as it should. The reason is obvious. It is because of the favouritism which has been shown to the resource industries. Let the government deny this if it can.

When the Carter commission suggested that the mining, oil and gas industries should be treated less leniently, the government backed off in its white paper. Before the committee which was examining the white paper had an opportunity to report, the government backed away still further and as a result the resource industries retained the benefits they had always enjoyed. It is not possible to stimulate one section of the economy without in some way disadvantaging another. Nevertheless, the government has continued its policy of favouring the resource-based industries and giving them everything. Had these policies resulted in the extraction industries remaining in Canadian hands or making a substantial contribution to the economy, they might have been excused or understood; but this has not been the case.

These industries have not paid their full share of taxes, as has been well documented by a former Minister of Finance, Hon. Walter Gordon, in his book "Choice for Canada." The Carter commission report showed they had not paid their way in terms of social costs, as evidence by abandoned townsites and badly treated employees, and that they had not paid their way in terms of providing adequate job opportunities for the growing labour force.

A great deal has been said today about unemployment. Several of my hon. friends have made suggestions as to what we should be doing, so this has not been an entirely negative debate. I sincerely hope that somehow or other something will get through the skulls on the other side of the House, that some since of humanity will permit them to realize that the great evil our society should not bear is unemployment, and that we cannot solve our problems in a climate where people are thrown out of work in the name of fighting inflation.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I have been interested to note that the comments in the debate today have not all been negative. As the hon. member who preceded me said, some valuable suggestions have been made. Nevertheless, it will be difficult for speakers to avoid making comments of a negative kind since the actions of the goverment have been such as to provoke them.

A few minutes ago the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Mahoney) referred to the LIFT program and certain other programs the goverment has designed for the agricultural community. I say to the parliamentary secretary that if he were to calculate the reduction in cost which the government would experience by eliminating the temporary wheat reserves legislation and the costs over the years which have been incurred through PFAA payments, that is, the contribution of the government, he would find that the plans which it is implementing will result in a net saving in the long run.

It has been suggested today that there ought to be tax cuts. On the other hand, government supporters have argued that tax cuts would mean resorting to further borrowing. They sometimes laugh wen we put it to them that economies could be effected. It is difficult to understand why economies cannot be made when one considers that governements in Canada are now taking 35 per cent of the tax dollar, whereas in the United States burdened by the enormous cost of the Viet Nam war, they are taking only 28 cents of the tax dollar. Australia, which has had a social reform program for some time, is taking 21 per cent of the tax dollar; and Japan, with its go-ahead economy, is taking only 16 cents. So Canada is levying the highest portion of the tax dollar, and I believe there must be something wrong when this is the case.

We have recently seen a burgeoning of government departments that is without precedent, and the government re-organization bill, if implemented, will further expand this process. I was interested to note that on March 23, in reply to a question about bringing in West Indians to work on farms, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made this comment, as reported at page 4508 of Hansard:

● (9:30 p.m.)

—this is a perennial problem and it must be recognized that this is a type of work that very often students or unemployed will not do. This is why the Department of Manpower and Immigration is admitting foreign workers—

In answer to a supplementary question the Prime Minister stated:

The purpose of the Manpower centres is to send the unemployed or the students to take part in this work. But, once again, facts reveal that there are in Canada some types of work which the unemployed and the students refuse to do; this proves, by the way, that the rate of unemployment is at times somewhat artificial.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

With the vastly improved unemployment insurance schemes that are forthcoming, I believe we should turn our attention to looking after workers who are genuinely unable to find work. A system that allows foreign workers to be brought in while the unemployed of this country are paid to do nothing is in need of overhaul. This is something that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey), and only the Minister of Labour, can remedy. This situation is creating in this country the attitude on the part of people that they should be paid whether or not they work. The government is suggesting putting $50 million into a fund so students can take trips across the country this summer. At the same time it is allowing workers to enter Canada to take up jobs that these students do not wish to do. I say this is one economy that the government could well make.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has been berated on many occasions and, I think most of us will agree, justifiably. I was going to say that he has been acting something like a bull in a china shop in his position as Minister of Finance, but I think it would be more accurate to say that he has been acting more like a bulldog because he has hung on to his white paper in face of opposition from one end of the country to the other. He has hung on to the concept that he can screw up taxes to the point where he destroys initiative.

I suggest that one of the major causes of unemployment stems from the fact that the people have lost confidence in the government's ability to create a climate for business investment. It is this psychological depression in regard to the future of business in general that contributes to 90 per cent of the unemployment from which we are now suffering and to 90 per cent of our business failures. The Minister of Finance is asked questions every day in this chamber about these matters, but reacts as though he continually has a chip on his shoulder which of late has grown into a woodpile. I should like to see his parliamentary secretary or another member of the government—if we must continue to have this kind of government—take on the minister's job, because I think the minister has done all the damage to this country that he should be allowed to do. We can at least give some of the members on the other side the benefit of the doubt.

Another matter requiring attention and which should be mentioned a little more in the House concerns the money being spent on looking after the province of Quebec. Although they are fine people, we must start to regard the province of Quebec as equal with the other provinces in Canada.

Mr. Ricard: That is what we want, nothing else.

Mr. Downey: During the last provincial election the government now in power calculated that about $1 billion accrued to the province from the federal treasury. I do not think we can continue to bear this burden. If they are going to stay in confederation, they must be treated as equals and receive an equal portion of the moneys flowing from the federal treasury. I suggest that this government is bribing that province because it has continued to be its power base throughout the years. Because of this bribery, an administration as ineffectual and as inept at governing as this one has continued to stay in power.

In addition, a disproportionate amount of equalization grants and regional development payments are being made to this province to the tune of almost half of the total amount for the rest of Canada. I noticed that out of $18 million worth of capital projects, $16 million went to this one province. I also noticed in the miscellaneous estimates committee the other day, under an item concerning manpower mobility, that something like 19 fewer workers were moved in the province of Quebec than in the province of Ontario under the program, yet the cost of moving this fewer number of workers was well over $1 million more. I suggest this sort of thing goes on all the way down the line.

Only a few of these cases are brought to the attention of the public. Many members of the House are reluctant to speak of these matters because these people are friends and personalities. We want them to be with us as much as we want anybody in this country to be with us, but I say that things will have to be far more equally managed in the future if we are to maintain the relationship we have had in the past.

A great deal is said in this kind of debate about employment. I am wondering whether full employment is possible in this day and age of technological advance. Certainly it is no comfort to read the sort of articles that are written today in this regard. I have two publications here, one from last week's Globe and Mail which says:

By the end of this century Canada will be a nation of apartment dwellers, most adult women will have jobs outside the home . . .

The average work week will fall from the present 40 hours to 28 or 29 hours . . .

This vision of Canada in the year 2000 is projected by Systems Research Group, a Toronto-based analytical group which describes itself as a Canadian think tank.

In a study commissioned by the federal government, Systems Research calculates that gross national product at the end of the century will amount to $288 billion in constant 1967 dollars, compared with $75 billion in 1970 . . .

The population probably will reach 33.8 million, up 70 per cent from the 20 million record in the 1966 census.

They also suggest that employment will vastly increase. In another newspaper published two or three days after that I read an article headed, "Can women really be replaced by machines?" It says that people are already working on machines—

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) seeks the floor for the purpose of asking a question, but I gather the hon. member who has the floor is not prepared to allow the question. In that case he should be allowed to continue his speech.

Mr. Perrault: I was just going to ask for the name of the publication, the date and the page.

Alleged Failure to Improve Economy

Mr. Downey: The hon. member from B.S. could just as well ask me after the sitting tonight. This quotation is from the Ottawa Citizen within the last two weeks, if that helps.

However, in future, says my technological informant, the correspondent will pick up his telephone (called a communicator by then) and dictate his message. It will be passed electronically into the recipient's machine. When the recipient chooses to inspect his mail, he will merely push a button and listen.

Having listened to his mail, he will answer it. The messages will be transmitted to his correspondents in the same electronic way.

Then the whole exchange—incoming and outgoing—will be filed away in a memory bank.

It goes on to say—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I have to interrupt the hon. member. It being 9.45 p.m. it is my duty, pursuant to section 10 of Standing Order 58, to interrupt proceedings on the motion now before the House in order to put every question necessary on Supplementary Estimates (C), interim supply, and any bill or bills based thereon.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 25c, DEPARTMENT OF CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That vote 25c, program expenditures for the Prices and Incomes Commission, Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1971, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, when the Chair puts this motion to the House should there not also be included in it the amount of the vote which, as listed in 25c of the supplementary estimates, is $1,250,000?

Mr. Speaker: There is no objection. If there is agreement, the motion will be amended as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Because that is what we are voting against.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is the following one:

That vote 25c, program expenditures for the Prices and Incomes Commission, Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in the sum of $1,250,000 for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1971, be concurred in.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion? All those in favour of the said motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Division

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) EXCEPT FOR VOTES 10c AND 35c OF DEPARTMENT OF VETERANS AFFAIRS

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the supplementary estimates (C) of sums required for the service of Canada for the year ending March 31, 1971, except for votes 10c and 35c relating to the Department of Veterans Affairs, and any vote concurred in this day, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Drury thereupon moved that Bill C-235, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1971, be read the first time and printed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Drury thereupon moved that Bill C-235, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1971, be read a second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, considered in committee and reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: By leave, now.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Drury moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

INTERIM SUPPLY. APRIL TO JUNE 30. 1971

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That this House do concur in interim supply, as follows:

That a sum not exceeding $2,183,638,929.41 being the aggregate of:

(a) Three-twelfths of the total of all the Items, except for Urban Affairs and Housing Item 1, set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st of March 1972, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament $2,061,893,012.75.

(b) An adidtional six-twelfths of the total amount of Department of Insurance Item 25 (Schedule A) of the said estimates $314,250.00.

(c) An additional three-twelfths of the total amount of Atomic Energy Control Board Item 30, Transport Items 40 and 50, and Northern Transportation Company Limited Item L90 (Schedule B) of the said estimates $13,799,000.00.

(d) An additional two-twelfths of the total amount of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited Item L45, Manpower and Immigration Item 10 and Treasury Board Item 5 (Schedule C) of the said estimates $71,483,333.33.

(e) An additional one-twelfth of the total amount of Canadian International Development Agency Item 20, Dominion Bureau of Statistics Item 35, National Health and Welfare Item 30, Medical Research Council Item 50, Secretary of State Item 15, National Arts Centre Corporation Item 75, Supply and Services Item 10, National Research Council of Canada Item 25 (Schedule D) of the said estimates $36,149,333.33.

be granted to Her Majesty on account of the fiscal year ending 31st of March 1972, providing that, in accordance with the recommendation of His Excellency the Governor General, any bill introduced as a result of the adoption of this motion shall provide that any reference to the expression "environment" in the said Estimates shall be read and construed as a reference to the expression "fisheries and forestry".

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Drury thereupon moved that Bill C-236, for granting Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1972, be read the first time and printed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Drury thereupon moved that Bill C-236, for granting Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1972, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order. The bill is being handed out for the first time for the consideration of this House. I think that this shows just a little too much crust on the part of the government. In large characters on the front page we see "As passed by the House". I think that this is a bit much.

Mr. Monteith: The government is being arrogant, as usual.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I rise on—

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I might mention to the hon. member that the Standing Orders do not provide for debate at this point. If the hon. member is rising on a point of order, I can hear him. I cannot hear him if he is rising for the purpose of debate.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a further point of order to object to the manner of the printing of these bills, which comes under the authority of the Chair. I object on the part of those I am associated with and, I am sure, on the part of all opposition members—and I point out that there is no saving here—particularly because some date has been put on the bill. Frankly, I do not know of any date reading "zero, zero, March, 1971". Why on earth are the words "As passed" printed on the bill? This may be a tiny matter, but I draw it to the attention of the Chair. I think the Chair ought to take very careful note of this representation because the responsibility for the services of the House comes under the Chair.

Mr. Monteith: Further arrogance.

Mr. Bell: The same old bunch.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin) on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The bill now before us takes the House's intentions for granted, since it includes "As passed by the House of Commons on March 00, 1971", to which I object.

Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, there is no such date and in this regard I support the views expressed by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert).

Another remark I want to make is that we do not know who is sponsoring the bill since no sponsors' name is indicated. I would therefore ask you to take that into consideration before reading the motion.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the point of order. I understand that this is a pro forma bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Honey in the chair.

Clauses 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 6—

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I apologize because I do not possess a thorough knowledge of the Standing Orders of the House. If we are not entitled to debate the matter, why is it submitted to us?

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. I would mention to the hon. member that there is no provision for debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I apologize for renewing my attempt but, considering your vast experience and your extensive knowledge of the procedure, I would like you to explain to me, at this point, what are my rights as an elected member of the House. As a matter of fact, how can I know what these votes mean if I am not allowed to discuss them? I would like to know my rights in order to use them constructively.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. I might mention, in reply to the question of the hon. member, that the Standing Order is very long. I do not think hon. members would want me to read it at this point. I would refer the hon. member and the House to Standing Order 58(10) which provides for no debate at this stage of the proceedings.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I wish to protest strongly against this type of democracy which prevents us from discussing votes that the government is asking us to pass.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. As the Chair has indicated to the hon. member, it is not a question of discretion of the Chair or discretion of hon. members: it is a Standing Order adopted by this House. At this stage of the proceedings there is no provision for debate. I again refer the hon. member to Standing Order 58(10). I do not want to burden hon. members by reading it at this time There is no provision for debate, under this Standing Order. With respect, the Chair has no discretion to hear the hon. member.

An hon. Member: What is the Standing Order?

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair has previously indicated that there is no discretion in the Chair to hear the hon. member. The Standing Order to which I have referred provides that the question be put without debate. Standing Order 58(10) reads:

—he shall put forthwith successively, without debate or amendment—

If the hon. member has a question of privilege or point of order to raise, it cannot be done at this point. There may be another opportunity when the hon. member may be able to do this, but not at this point of the proceedings.

Clause 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 agreed to.

Schedules A to D inclusive agreed to.

On clause 1—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I recognize that Your Honour has correctly interpreted the Standing Order with respect to our proceedings at this point, but there is one point that should be observed. For many years when we were asked to vote interim supply, we were always given an assurance by the minister proposing the bill that the bill was in proper form and, furthermore, that the passing of interim supply would not prejudice our rights to discuss in the proper place any of the items, portions of which are granted in advance. I think that assurance should continue to be given to us.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to give the assurance that the bill is in the usual form and indeed is in proper order. Further, the passing of this bill will not prejudice the rights and privileges of members to criticize any items in the estimates when they come up for consideration in committee. The usual undertaking is given that such rights and privileges will be respected and will not be curtailed or restricted in any way as a result of the passing of this measure.

Mr. Peters: On a point of order, before we pass clause 1 I ask whether hon. members who have not been handed a copy of the bill, and who thus have had no opportunity of seeing its contents, should be asked to pass it. I am aware that this has been the practice for the past two or three years.

Mr. Drury: Centuries.

Mr. Peters: No, not for centuries. We have discussed the business of supply ad nauseam since I have been here.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: If I said anything in a foreign language which is not correct, I apologize. It seems to me we should refer this question to the Standing Committee on Procedure, because this is a really idiotic manner of handling the operation.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member may have a very good argument, but I respectfully suggest that this is not the point at which it can be advanced. The Chair does not have the discretion to hear argument or debate on the matter at this time. I will hear the hon. member further on the point of order if he has anything to say with regard to it, but I must tell him this is not the time at which the Chair can make a determination of the point he has raised.

Mr. Peters: I am not in a position to raise this matter with Mr. Speaker at this time, but I am raising it with you, Mr. Chairman, and I expect you to report to Mr. Speaker the representation I have made. This situation is a left-over from the changes made in the rules. It is a stupid, silly kind of process to go through when members do not have the opportunity of discussing the matter.

The Chairman: The Chair has noted the hon. member's point of order and it will be conveyed to Mr. Speaker as requested. It is within the competence of hon. members to change the procedure under our Standing Orders if they, in their wisdom, think this ought to be done. But they cannot be changed at this point. I must follow the Standing Orders and continue the proceedings in committee of the whole.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

We have just received copies of the bill and a while ago I respectfully asked you a question. I would like to know whether it is true that I can rise on a question of privilege or raise a point of order. I would like you to tell me now what are my rights.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I would like you to help me continue my remarks by calling members opposite to order.

[English]

The Chairman: I have indicated to the hon. member that there is no opportunity for debate at this point in the proceedings. Like the hon. member who preceded him, the hon. member has raised a point of order and registered what is, in effect, a grievance against the Standing Orders. It has been noted. I repeat, it is not within my competence or, indeed, within the competence of hon. members to deal at the stage of committee of the whole with this point of order. But it has been noted and, with respect, that is really all the Chair can do at this point.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to raise a further point of order? I do not want to hinder the Chairman in carrying out his responsibilities, but I should like to point out that all members of the House are being asked to vote on each item submitted to them. Since only a few members have a copy of the bill, how can we be expected to vote when we do not know the items? Furthermore, before we pass these items I should like to ask whether the government will ensure that each member does have a copy.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member has in essence raised the same point of order raised by the hon. member for Lotbinière and by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I can only repeat that I have heard their representations. There may well be a great deal of sympathy for them. But this is not the proper time to make them, though the representations have been noted. With respect, as Chairman of the committee I have no jurisdiction to change the procedure established by the Standing Orders.

Mr. Nielsen: Where is the bill we are voting on?

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Let us not have talk about Standing Orders—

The Chairman: Order, please. If hon. members want me to read the Standing Order—

Some hon. Members: Read the bill.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Chairman, I will be heard.

The Chairman: Order. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Edmonton West.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): With the greatest respect, Mr. Chairman, I suggest there is not one word in the Standing Orders about the distribution or non-distribution of bills before their acceptance. My colleague for Sainte-Marie merely raised the point that it is impossible to have intelligent consideration of a request to pass a bill without copies of the bill being distributed. I put it to you again that since the procedure of the House is under the control of the Chair, the time to make representations regarding the distribution of a bill is now, so that the Chair becomes aware of them. There is no other time for an individual member to raise such a point of order. The point is germane at this time and I suggest my colleague for Sainte-Marie was perfectly right in making the suggestion he did.

The Chairman: Order, please. I understand the point made by the hon. member for Eddmonton West and I have a great deal of sympathy for this point of order. The hon. Member supports the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, and the same point of order was made by the hon. member for Lotbinière and the hon. member for Timiskaming. As I perceive it, the points of order are essentially the same, and personally I have a great deal of sympathy with them. My position as Chairman is that hon. members may raise, if they wish, points of order ad infinitum. But I have no jurisdiction at this point to correct or rectify the matters about which they complain. They may be very valid matters. I think it is very important that they be put on the record, but I have no jurisdiction to change the Standing Orders at this point of the proceedings.

• (10:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I have heard your remarks with a great deal of interest, and I recognize that you do not have the required authority to change our Standing Orders at this very moment. Since hon. members have only received a copy of the bill seconds before this stage of the proceedings, and since we do not have the right to discuss it, to put questions, so as to know what it is all about, why not then adjourn until tomorrow, to enable the House leaders of all parties to get together, and also to enable each member to get a copy of the bill under consideration?

Mr. Speaker, I still claim that there is discrimination toward the hon. members, and that each one of them is entitled to have on hand a copy of the Appropriation Act, so that the House will give it more than rubber stamp approval.

[English]

Mr. Bell: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, and in an effort to be helpful, I point out that we have gone through this procedure for two or three years. I do not think anybody in the House likes it. But what is making us extra nervous and suspicious this time is that the members on the treasury benches are all here for the first time in years, with the exception of the Secretary of State, glued to their seats and glaring at us. If they would all go home to bed, the rest of us could deal satisfactorily with this matter.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order for one purpose and one purpose only. It is apparent that members on this side of the House who have raised points of order have been immediately supplied with copies of the bill. I would like to have my copy now. I would also like you, Mr. Chairman, to read the rule of which you spoke.

The Chairman: Order, please. I think it might be helpful if the Chair were to read the standing order. Standing Order 58 (10) reads:

> On the last allotted day in each period, but, in any case, not later than the last sitting day in each period, at fifteen minutes before the ordinary time of daily adjournment, the Speaker shall interrupt the proceedings then in progress and, if those proceedings are not in relation to a no-confidence motion, he shall put forthwith successively, without debate or amendment, every question necessary to dispose of any item of business relating to interim supply, main estimates, and supplementary or final estimates, the restoration or reinstatement of any item in the estimates or any opposed item in the estimates, and for the passage at all stages of any bill or bills based thereon—

Hon. members have now heard the Standing Order. I can only repeat that the Standing Order must bind me. I have listened and am sympathetic to the points of orders of hon. members. If they wish to continue raising points of order, I will listen to them; but I would appeal to them not to raise the same point of order because it has been carefully noted.

[The Chairman.]

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, for the information of hon. members, I would ask you to read the Standing Order which allows the government to deprive hon. members of their copy of a supply bill.

[English]

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, in relation to the points of order that have been raised it might be helpful if I were to explain that our custom is to deal with this matter in the form of a resolution, which is on the Order Paper today and of which each member has a copy. That resolution is the one we voted on tonight. This is followed by the consideration of a bill which is based explicitly and precisely on the terms of the resolution, which indicates in detail the provisions being voted on and granted. There is the further assurance, the customary assurance given by the government, that the bill is in accordance —precisely in accordance—with the terms of the resolution. I suggest, therefore, that if hon. members wish to know exactly what is contained in the bill they need merely refer to the resolution.

The Chairman: Order, please. Will hon. members resume their seats. I shall recognize them in a moment. Again I admonish hon. members not to reiterate the same point of order, because it has been well noted.

• (10:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, as the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) has just said, hon. members can read the main motion. Why not then take a ten-minute recess so I could let my colleagues read the only copy we have had so far in order to let everyone know what is going on?

Mr. Chairman, that is one of our most fundamental rights and if the government does not know enough to provide each member with a copy of the bill, thus forcing us to give it blind approval, the situation is utterly ridiculous and we will have to recognize that this is the type of democracy the Liberal administration imposes upon us.

[English]

Clause 1 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the preamble carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Shall I rise and report the bill?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Bill reported.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, as you are now reporting to the House on the proceedings of the committee, I feel I have the right to ask you, with all due respect, to report also on the objections we have raised, in order to respect the rights of hon. members.

If you make a report, make a complete one including the objections that were raised.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Again I repeat I am very conscious of the objections contained in the point of order raised by the hon. member and other hon. members. I have indicated before, and will say again, that I have taken note of it. I know hon. members are concerned, and I also am concerned about the procedure. However, I again say I am bound by the Standing Orders of this House and must forthwith proceed to put all motions and all questions.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): What about copies of the bill? That is not in the rules.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, none of the Standing Orders forbid you to make a complete report to the House about proceedings in committee of the whole. This is why I ask you to include in your report to the House the objections of hon. members, with regard to the amendment of this Standing Order.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time?

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Concern has been registered by members on this side of the House, and I believe by hon. members on the government side, about the inappropriateness of passing in a few moments a bill which most members have not seen. There is nothing in the rules regarding the availability of bills. It is understood they should be available.

It is not my intention to hold up proceedings. We are familiar with the rules which require the passage of supply at this point in the debate. However, I respectfully and strongly recommend, sir, that in future on every occasion such as this provision be made that bills which are to be passed be made available to all hon. members even if this is rather difficult and awkward to do under our present rules.

• (10:40 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: I rise on another point of order, Mr. Speaker. I suggest that the Chair does not do itself any good, or the members of the House, when Your Honour asks the consent of the House for third reading. The Standing Orders are very clear; they provide for the passage of all stages of any bill or bills based on these estimates. The Standing Order also refers to the ten o'clock adjournment. I suggest that we change our format, as I suggested during discussion of the interim supply bill. If there is no likelihood of objection to third reading, the Chair should not ask for consent to third reading because it makes everybody look foolish.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I heard the representations of the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean) and the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). The only way in which the Chair could not ask for third reading and not put the question, as I understand it, would be by unanimous consent of the House. I point out that nothing could impress me more than the arguments advanced by hon. members and the points of order raised by them. I would think that changes could be made through the proper processes. However, I am a captive of the Standing Orders.

If the hon. member wants me to ask for the unanimous consent of the House not to put the question on third reading, I will do so, but I must caution him that there would have to be unanimous consent. I reiterate that I am impressed with the points of order raised tonight and I hope that before we deal again with these questions in such circumstances, changes will be made which will make the procedure satisfactory to all hon. members.

Mr. Drury moved the third reading of the bill.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being after ten o'clock. this House stands adjourned until tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order.

At 10.45 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 26, 1971

The House met at 11 a.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HORNER—REGULARITY OF ALL-NIGHT SITTING BY COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. At the opening of Wednesday's sitting the hon. member for Crowfoot rose on a question of privilege in relation to an all-night sitting of the Standing Committee on Agriculture. In the course of his remarks the hon. member suggested that he was prepared to propose a motion in the following words:

That the question of the validity and regularity of the sittings of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, which began at 8 p.m. in the afternoon of Tuesday, the 23rd of March, 1971, and continued thereafter until 7.30 a.m. o'clock in the forenoon of the 24th of March, 1971, and of the proceedings at such sittings be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

At the opening of his comments the hon. member asserted that when the Standing Committee on Agriculture was called at 8 p.m. "there was a firm intention by the government members on that committee to sit until the committee was exhausted." It might be that the hon. gentleman in the main rests his submission on that assertion, but I suggest to him that prolonged sittings of the House and of committees are not unknown in our parliamentary history.

It seems to me that the length of the sitting is a matter for determination by a majority of the members then present when we are dealing with a committee meeting. The situation is, of course, different in the House where the Standing Orders provide for specific hours of sitting and these cannot be extended or changed except under the Standing Orders or by unanimous consent. The hon. member recognizes that a meeting of a committee may be terminated at any time by the adoption of a motion to adjourn.

The hon. member then touched upon the responsibility of the Chair in relation to the hours of attendance of the respective officers and clerks of the House, and I may say that it is a responsibility of which the Chair is very conscious. It must be said, however, that prolonged hours are an ever-present and a built-in condition of service in the House. As hon. members know, the hours of the House may be, and are, altered at a moment's notice under the provisions of Standing Order 6(5)(a). A different procedure is used for such a purpose in a standing committee, but the principle remains the same.

The hon. gentleman also stated that, prior to eight o'clock the clerks employed in the Standing Committee on Agriculture were all notified that there was to be an all-night sitting and, having been duly notified, arranged among themselves to work in two shifts, some to work up to midnight and others to carry on until the committee adjourned. That may be so, but again I suggest that notwithstanding any notification which may have been given to the committee staff, a majority of the members present in a committee at any given time are in a position to decide when the committee shall terminate its sittings.

The hon. member then suggested that a committee should be regularly adjourned from day to day and went on to say that the committee has not been regularly adjourned for a long time. It seems to me that, because of the informality in most cases in committees, the pure form of adjournment may not be observed in every case, but again I suggest that no committee meeting can be adjourned unless a consensus, or the general consent of a majority of the members then present, is obtained.

There remains the reference of the hon. member to proper decorum in the committee and, in specific terms, the hon. member's observation that food was sent in to the committee room while the proceedings were under way. I am in full agreement with the hon. member that standards of decorum should be observed in committees just as they are in the House. On the other hand, it should be pointed out that committee proceedings are by their very nature conducted in a much less formal fashion. For example, smoking is allowed in committees. I suspect that on hot days there have been occasions when hon. members have removed their coats, and I suspect also that coffee and other liquids are consumed from time to time. I feel it is essential that there should be standards, but again I observe that proceedings in committees are more relaxed in nature and that the same requirements which we feel must be observed in the chamber are not so strictly enforced when hon. members sit as committees of the House of Commons. Having said all this, I would add that the observations of the hon. member are generally applicable to proceedings in all committees.

The one grievance which stands out is that relating to the length of the sitting in question. I have to reiterate in this regard that, although it may be most unusual, this in itself does not affect the regularity of the proceedings of the committee. The committee was authorized by the Standing Orders to make a decision to continue in session; this decision could be made and obviously was made by a majority of members of the committee.

I might add that I have often expressed serious reservations about the regularity or advisability of having the proceedings of one committee investigated by another standing committee of the House, be it the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I have serious doubts as to the effectiveness of such a procedure.

Tribute to Members

I want to assure the House that I have not treated this matter lightly and that I have given serious consideration to all aspects of the hon. member's submissions. My conclusion is that if the complaints raised by the hon. member are to be remedied, this should be effected by amendments to our Standing Orders as they relate to committee proceedings rather than by a reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. For these reasons, I do not think that I am at liberty to put the hon. member's motion to the House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

THIRTY-FIRST ANNIVERSARY OF CONTINUOUS SERVICE BY MEMBERS FOR PRINCE ALBERT AND OTTAWA CENTRE

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might have the indulgence of the House for a moment to call attention to a happier occasion than the one to which Your Honour has just referred. I believe today is the thirty-first anniversary of the entry into the House of two of our most distinguished members, my right hon. friend from Prince Albert and the hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacLean: The contribution of these hon. members to the public life of Canada is remarkable not only for its quality, one having served as prime minister and the other as minister in numerous portfolios, but also for the length of their survival in the very perilous occupation of Member of Parliament. They have longer continuous service than any other member of the House at the present time, and I thought it would be inappropriate for this anniversary to pass unmarked.

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I seek leave to move a motion concerning the provision of transportation facilities between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, a matter in the jurisdiction and responsibility of the government and Parliament of Canada. Seconded by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), I move:

That this House refer to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications the question of the removal of the newest and largest icebreaking ferry from the Borden-Tormentine service and the consequent reduction of the service to one icebreaker.

That the committee be asked also to study the general question of transportation between Prince Edward Island and the mainland and the degree to which the Dominion of Canada is carrying out its confederation commitment to Prince Edward Island to provide continuous and efficient communication with the rest of the dominion.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Hillsborough. This motion requires the unanimous consent of the House.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent and I regret to advise the hon. member that the motion, under the terms of Standing Order 43, cannot be put at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

OIL

TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE—CONSULTATION WITH UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs but I shall direct it to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the fact that the oil route is still a great national issue, has the Canadian government suggested a specific date for talks with the United States government and has the United States government refused to meet for formal talks on the TAPS route?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): To the best of my knowledge we have suggested no specific date, nor has any refusal been made, Mr. Speaker. I have indicated, as has the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, that there is still much to be done on the Canadian side by way of research into the ecological and sociological as well as the economic problems before we can have a clear, final and definitive Canadian position.

Mr. Comeau: In view of the time factor and the fact that the Canadian people as a whole, including the member for Esquimalt-Saanich, have expressed their position, will the government make its formal position known very shortly?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, the government made its first position known last August when we issued guidelines based on the scientific and technological information available after some two years of work. We will refine and define more explicitly the government's position as the science, technology and research become available.

PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE—POSITION FOLLOWING DISCUSSIONS WITH COMPANY PRESIDENTS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Following the meeting with the oil company executives last Wednesday pertaining to this matter, can the minister indicate whether or not there is still room for a good deal of optimism that the pipeline will come down the Mackenzie Valley route?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Just a few moments ago I think most of us were under the impression that the first line would definitely be the Valdez line and thence by tanker down the coast. At the present time, and this was confirmed by our meeting the other day, because of the delay in respect of that line I think there is certainly a much better chance that the first choice for a line would be the Mackenzie Valley line if this should be acceptable to Canada, and certainly every chance that a gas line, if this should be acceptable to Canada, will in the not too distant future be built to transport gas.

TRANS-ALASKA PIPELINE SYSTEM—POSSIBLE CANADIAN RESTRICTIONS ON TANKER TRANSPORT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I understood from the Minister's statement the other day that in the discussions he and his colleague the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development had with the representatives of the group of United States companies operating in Alaska the Valdez route now looked much more likely than the route through mid-Canada. Were the representatives of the oil companies made clearly aware of any restrictive measures the Canadian government would impose should they attempt to bring oil by tanker from Valdez to the United States down the coast of British Columbia?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can put track odds on the likelihood of one route versus the other. Certainly the companies had very clearly made a decision, which was a very public decision, I think, as evidenced by the fact that pipe is piled up on the Valdez route, to go that way. The delay by reason of United States decision and United States department has certainly made the Mackenzie Valley line worth looking at by them. With regard to indicating what we would do if they should go via Valdez and then by tanker, provided they keep beyond the 12-mile limit in transporting the oil I do not know of anything we can legally do under international law.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that government members turned down our proposal for a 100-mile pollution control zone on the Pacific coast, has the Canadian government any proposals at all that would protect the coastline of British Columbia in the event the United States should decide to ship oil from Valdez down the Pacific coast?

Mr. Greene: I do not think Canada unilaterally can change international law, much as we would like to. I feel sure, in the event there is a decision that the ships will go in this direction, that the Department of Transport and other affected departments undoubtedly would have contingency plans to try to meet the problems in respect of any accident.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he drew to the attention of the representatives of the United States oil companies the fact that this Parliament has already unilaterally claimed the power to control ships carrying pollutants in a 100-mile area in the Arctic and if he made it clear that this Parliament could, if it so desired, exercise the same power in respect of the Pacific coast?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I think those men were very conscious of the fact of our Arctic decision in which the Prime Minister, when he announced it, very clearly enunciated the principles under international law whereby this is a valid decision. In respect of whether those principles would apply, as my hon. friend suggests, to Pacific transportation, I think there may be some doubt in international law.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister yesterday told us that members of his staff censor the utterings of certain of his ministers, will he in the case of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources either change censors or look at what he says himself so we will understand what is going on?

POSSIBLE PIPELINE FROM PUGET SOUND AREA TO CALIFORNIA—DISCUSSION WITH COMPANY PRESIDENTS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I would like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In the discussions with the representatives of the oil companies and in the consideration of a possible routing of Alaskan oil through British Columbia to the Puget Sound area, was there any discussion whether, in the event that took place, oil would be transported from there to the California area by pipeline rather than by tanker route from the Puget Sound area to California? I ask this question in light of some of the studies that have been made public by the Department of the Interior of the United States about the ecological dangers.

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): I do not think that that specific topic was a subject matter in our discussions.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MEASURES TO PROTECT PUBLIC AGAINST HIGH-PRESSURE CREDIT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Considering that individual indebtedness is on the increase and that, according to the most recent figures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, it totals $11.5 billion, and considering also that insidious and dishonest means are used to bring people to buy on credit, does the Prime Minister or the government intend to take concrete steps, considering the size of the amounts involved, to give greater protection to Canadians who are high-pressured in this way?

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I am taking note of the question which I shall forward to the minister concerned.

TRANSPORT

BORDEN-TORMENTINE FERRY SERVICE—RESTORATION OF ICEBREAKING AND RAILWAY TRAFFIC CAPACITY

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to direct a question to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport in the absence of the minister. What action is the government taking to restore the icebreaking and rail carrying capacity of the Borden-Tormentine ferry service?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): I should like to take notice of this question and bring back an answer early next week.

Mr. MacLean: I should also like to know what reply the Minister of Transport has given to the suggestion of the Prince Edward Island government that the John Hamilton Gray, which was built to replace the original ferry, the Prince Edward Island, should be retained on the Borden-Tormentine service and the other older ferry, the Abegweit, lent to the Newfoundland service. Perhaps the minister could also table the letter which he sent to the government of that province and which I understand was tabled in the legislature there.

Mr. Duquet: I will refer this question to the minister, but I think I can say that the negotiations with regard to the ferry service are proceeding very well and there should be very good news within the next two days.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF RULES AFFECTING OPERATION OF COMMITTEES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the President of the Privy Council. I shall wait until the conversation between him and the Prime Minister is over. I did not want to intrude on that conversation.

Having regard to the decision rendered today by His Honour the Speaker, with which I am not in disagreement I wish to ask the House leader whether, under the circumstances disclosed by the hon. member for Crowfoot, he does not agree that unless changes are made in the rules respecting committees a squalid caricature of Parliament will be the result and the disrepute of Parliament will be in further evidence across the country? Would he be willing to discuss with the party house leaders the convening of the rules committee in order to meet such situations as disclosed by the hon. member for Crowfoot, which can only have the effect, if it remains unchanged, of making members of the opposition serfs of the government?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will make a deal with the right hon. gentleman. If he will attempt to change the attitude of the hon. member for Crowfoot I will attempt to change the Standing Orders.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Crowfoot is absent, that statement was scarcely what I would have expected from a good parliamentarian.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question. May I say that I do not think the comment by the government House leader should be applied to any member of that committee. Will immediate consideration be given by the government House leader and other house leaders to doing something about the situation that has developed in the committee whereby the majority makes the decisions as they go along, which I think is not parliamentary—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: —and not advantageous to the work of the committee.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: Possession of the ball seems to be the criterion, but it seems to me that all members on that committee are equal and that the rules should not be changed in the middle of its work. I would hope that consideration will be given to this question by the house leaders very shortly.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I have been concerned about the situation that has prevailed in that committee for some time. The bill, and it is an important one, has been before the committee and the House for more than a year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: I believe that more than 140 meetings of the standing committee have been held, about 300 witnesses have been heard, and more than 3,000 printed pages of evidence have been taken. If we are interested in enhancing the reputation of Parliament it seems to me we ought to do something about a situation that has been caused by the attitude of one or two members of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: May I ask the government House leader if he considers committee by exhaustion to be a solution to this problem?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Battle River has a supplementary and after that I suggest that we move on to another subject. It seems to me we are spending most of our question period on two or three subjects, and we will soon be running short of time.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the government House leader if it has not come to his mind, and to the minds of other members of the government, that possibly the legislation which the agricultural committee is studying is the reason for all the trouble, that basically it is at fault and should be withdrawn?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, if I may make one comment, and I shall attempt to be brief, I do not believe that exhaustion or the process of exhaustion is an ideal solution to the deliberations of the House or of a committee, but I believe that hon. members will agree that when one extreme position is taken in the House it inevitably leads to another, and that is the situation that we have in the committee. I would say that after a year of intensive debate and discussion the committee and the House should be allowed to take a decision by a majority even though a minority is opposed to the bill. That is the principle upon which this Parliament is based, on the opportunity of the majority to make a decision.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR RELATIONS

LAKEHEAD GRAIN HANDLERS DISPUTE—INQUIRY AS TO SETTLEMENT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Acting Minister of Labour or his parliamentary secretary. In view of the lengthy and worrisome negotiations between the management and the workers in the grain handlers union at the Lakehead, can any report be made on that dispute, has a settlement been reached and, if so, what are the terms of the settlement?

Mr. Ray Perrault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this is not the minister's roster day. However, I would be pleased to suggest that the question be redirected to the government House leader who may wish to answer on behalf of the minister today.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government House leader if he can report whether any settlement has been reached in the negotiations between management and the employees who are members of the grain handlers union at the Lakehead and whether the report of the conciliation board has been made public and agreed to by both sides?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am wondering about the direction of the question. As hon. members know, a question can be directed to a minister only to the extent that he has responsibility for the administration of a department. However, it may be that the President of the Privy Council is the acting minister today and in that capacity might be allowed to reply to the hon. member's question.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I cannot locate the note that I brought into the House but I can tell the hon. member that a settlement has been reached in this important dispute involving about 1,600 handlers at the Lakehead. Settlement has been reached at the conciliation stage, and I believe the House would want me to congratulate all those involved on reaching a sollution at that stage of the dispute.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I direct a supplementary question to the government House leader in that the original question was relayed to him because the Minister of Labour was not on the roster today. It is obvious from the most recent release concerning the roster system that the President of the Privy Council, who is the government House leader, is also not supposed to be here today. Is this the first break in the roster system that has been introduced and which is destroying Parliament?

VANCOUVER TRAINMEN'S WORK SLOWDOWN—ACTION TO SETTLE DISPUTE AND ASSURE GRAIN MOVEMENT

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government House leader or the Prime Minister. In view of the urgent necessity of moving grain to export positions, can we have an early report from the Minister of Labour on the serious wildcat strikes and slowdowns that have been developing on both CP and CN rail lines? Is the Minister of Labour taking immediate action to intervene, to mediate and to achieve a contract settlement between the labour unions and the railroads?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to direct the question and the request for a report to the attention of the Minister of Labour so that he may give the necessary information. Based on the previous performance of the Minister of Labour I can assure the hon. member that every possible step will be taken in this situation.

FARM PRODUCTS MARKETING BILL—REPRESENTATIONS FROM WESTERN CANADA HOG PRODUCERS REQUESTING EXCLUSION

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Has he received representations from the various hog producers associations in western Canada requesting exclusion from the provisions of Bill C-176, and can he indicate the nature of his reply?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no notice that I have received such correspondence but I will look into the matter.

TRANSPORT

SPECIAL FREIGHT RATE ASSISTANCE TO MARITIMES SHIPPERS TO REPLACE STATUTORY SUBSIDIES

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport but in his absence possibly I may direct it to his parliamentary secretary. As there has been growing concern among Atlantic shippers, most recently expressed by the Maritime Co-Op Services in a letter to the minister, that subsidies under the Maritime Freight Rates Act are being phased out without any announcement of other special assistance, as promised by the government, will the parliamentary secretary advise what action is being taken on the recommendation of the federal-provincial committee that the government immediately draft regulations to provide such special assistance?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, officers of the department are looking into that matter very closely and preparing a prompt answer for the minister. That is all I can say at the moment.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): Would the parliamentary secretary indicate when we may expect special legislation in the House?

[Mr. Gleave.]

Mr. Duquet: Mr. Speaker, probably it will be soon, but I would rather the minister answered that question.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): The report is two years old, Mr. Speaker.

OIL

STUDIES OF POSSIBLE EFFECTS OF PIPELINES ON NORTHERN ECOLOGY

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Are any ecological studies under way in the minister's department or any other department to determine the possible effects of oil pipelines on the ecology of the north?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as I think I indicated in the debate on this subject matter the other day, comprehensive surveys have been under way for more than two years, not only by the department, but by the National Energy Board, universities and the private sector, which cover all aspects of research required. I think the hon. member for Athabasca asked me specifically about the ecology, and I do not think I was able to answer him at that time. But certainly ecological studies are among those being very actively pursued.

Mr. Harding: Where are these ecological projects being carried out and who is conducting them?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, this is a very lengthy question to answer on orders of the day. They are being carried out in many areas and by many entities of both the private and public sectors. I can try to give the hon. member a more comprehensive reply, possibly in a debate or on estimates when they are considered.

AIR TRANSPORT

OVERCHARGING OF CANADIANS ON INTERNATIONAL AIR FARES—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for either the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, both of whom are on the roster to be present today and both of whom are absent. Perhaps I can get around the dilemma by addressing the question to the Acting Minister of Transport or the parliamentary secretary. In view of the statement of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs passing the responsibility for protecting the interests of Canadian consumers who were overcharged on international air fares to the Minister of Transport, will the Minister of Transport make a definite statement on this matter as soon as possible?

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that whatever has been said on this matter is not quite right.

The United States government shall refund to the airlines without interest all royalties paid under the agreements if the United States terminates the program to develop the supersonic aircraft prior to United States state-type certifications.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, that is not quite an answer to the question I asked.

An hon. Member: It is the wrong answer.

Mr. Dinsdale: My question is: Since the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has passed the responsibility of protecting Canadian consumers against being overcharged on international air fares to the Minister of Transport, will the Minister of Transport make a definite statement on this matter as soon as possible?

FINANCE

REVISION OF POLICY RESPECTING FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENTS

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to put a question to the Minister of Finance, but in his absence I shall address it to the Prime Minister, who is responsible for the application of government policy.

Since the budget presented yesterday in the National Assembly of Quebec forecast a deficit of $466 million, and since the Quebec Minister of Finance has laid the blame for it on the federal government, because of its tax sharing policy, could the Prime Minister say whether the government will review tax sharing agreements when the next budget is brought down?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the words quoted by the hon. member are accurate, but, nevertheless, he should know that the tax sharing system now prevailing is due to expire next year and that, in the course of this year, there will be discussions between the federal and provincial governments to see under what form, if any, the sharing will be renewed.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question. In order to elucidate the Prime Minister's answer, does the federal government intend to review during the current fiscal year the tax sharing arrangements between the federal and provincial governments?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that an increasing number of agreements with the provinces have been existing under one form or another since 1942 and it is normal to review the formula every five years.

It is for that purpose that discussions will effectively be held with all the provinces during the year, including Quebec.

FISHERIES

ATLANTIC SALMON—NEGOTIATIONS WITH DENMARK ON CONSERVATION OF SPECIES

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In view of the new regulations he has promulgated regarding the catching of Atlantic salmon, have any new negotiations taken place or are any new initiatives contemplated with respect to the overexploitation of this species by Denmark, which in fact poses the most serious threat to the survival of the species?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I expect to have discussions with the Danish authorities in late May.

ATLANTIC SALMON—INCREASE IN NUMBER OF RIVER GUARDIANS AND LENGTH OF SERVICE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. Would the minister advise if agreement has been reached by the government to provide funds for increased numbers of river guardians and to lengthen the time of service of these guardians, as proposed by conservation officials, in order to better protect our rivers?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, more money has been made available. One of our problems, however, is that these gentlemen enjoy a higher rate of pay and shorter work week and we are not getting as many man-hours out of the same expenditure of dollars as before. We are doing our best to expand the service, but it is costing a great deal more money.

INDUSTRY

AUTOMOBILES—REASONS FOR HIGHER CANADIAN PRICES

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It is some time since I directed a question to him concerning the United States-Canada car pact. Since parity in wages has been brought about between Canada and the United States in this industry and since the Canadian dollar is practically at a par with the U.S. dollar, can he give the House any reason why Canadian citizens should not be able to buy made in Canada cars for the same price that prevails in the United States?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have doubts about the form of the question. It seems to me that the hon. member is inviting the minister to make a rather general statement. If the minister can find it within himself to give a brief and concise answer to the hon. member's question, perhaps he should be allowed to do so.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if I understand the question well, I think I can. This subject is one that has been debated from the beginning, from 1965, and involves what is referred to as the manufacturer's privilege in importing and exporting. To determine what would happen if this privilege were to disappear, I suggest that my hon. friend check with the manufacturers and the labour unions concerned before coming to a conclusion himself on this matter; mine is that the privilege should not be eliminated at this time.

PULP—REPORTED FEAR ON PART OF COMPANY OFFICERS ABOUT GOING TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. My question is in connection with a report that in the past 18 months Canadian businessmen have been afraid to go to the United States for fear of being brought before a United States grand jury. These people are in the Canadian pulp industry and are acting in accordance with Canadian laws regarding exports. Has the minister any information on this subject? If he has information showing that this is actually occurring in the United States, what action does he intend to take?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I do not have any information, but I will look into the matter and report either privately or in the House next week.

CATALINA EXPLORATION COMPANY—ACTION RESPECTING OPERATION OF FOREIGN VESSELS ENGAGED IN SEISMIC WORK WITHIN THREE-MILE LIMIT

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue. It has to do with the Catalina Exploration Company. Yesterday, as the minister and other members of cabinet are perhaps aware, that company met its creditors as a direct result of the government's failure to enforce certain laws and measures on our statute books. Can the minister indicate what steps he has taken with respect to the incursion into Canadian waters inside the three-mile limit by foreign registered vessels for the purpose of undertaking seismic work while Canadian vessels equipped and ready to do this type of work remain idle? What steps is the government taking with respect to extracting penalties or protecting Canadian enterprise?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the hon. member's question, but I can inform him that the present law provides that ships coming temporarily within the three-mile limit must pay full duty and tax due, unless it is established on the advice of the Canadian Transport Commission that for the purpose in question ships were not available, in which case there is a possibility of a partial remission of the duty and taxes involved. I have instructed officials of the department to ensure that the provisions of the law in this regard are being followed in so far as the law comes under the jurisdiction of the customs and excise division.

[Mr. Pepin.]

Mr. Forrestall: Am I to understand from the minister's reply that he does not intend to take any action with regard to the two vessels which did work within our three-mile limit while a Canadian owned and crewed vessel lay at the dockside at Halifax, which caused bankruptcy and the loss of 200 or 300 jobs?

Mr. Gray: I am having the two cases referred to by the hon. member looked into. Such action will be taken that seems appropriate after a report has been made to me on this matter.

FINANCE

ASSURANCE RESPECTING FORTHCOMING TAX CHANGES TO ASSIST OIL PRODUCERS IN AVOIDING EXPLORATION STAFF LAY-OFFS

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): In the absence of the Minister of Finance I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the expression of opinion within the last few days by officials of a western Canada oil producer that they may be laying off up to 40 per cent of the staff of their western Canada explorations division, can the minister provide some assurance that the forthcoming budgetary and tax changes will not make this step a matter of immediate necessity for these resource companies?

Mr. P. M. Mahoney (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The hon. member might like to direct his question on a day when the Department of Finance is answering questions in the House.

REPORTED DISCOVERY BY PANARCTIC ON KING CHRISTIAN ISLAND

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I wish to direct a related question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the rumour that is circulating to the effect that the Panarctic Oil Company has discovered oil on King Christian Island, is the minister in a position to confirm or deny this rumour?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): No, I am not, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Revenue. When is the minister going to table the long-awaited report on foreign ownership? If he is not going to do so immediately, what is the cause for the delay?

Hon. Herb Gray (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated to the House that the work in question in this important area of policy was being done within the government for use of the cabinet. I think what this House will be looking forward to is the making of a statement by the government on its decisions in this regard. However, I can assure the House that this matter continues to be one of high priority for the government.

Mr. Gilbert: Are we going to be totally Americanized before the report is tabled?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

HONORARY LIFE MEMBERSHIPS IN RCAF MESSES—RECOGNITION BY CANADIAN ARMED FORCES MESSES

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): In the absence of the Minister of National Defence, perhaps the acting minister can at least take my question as notice. Is it a fact, as alleged, that honorary life membership in RCAF messes, which was granted to RCAF officers on their retirement from the service, are no longer honoured by Canadian Armed Forces messes, although they are honoured by messes of the Royal Air Force, United States Air Force and Royal Australian Air Force? Will the minister take this question as notice, look into this matter and assure the House that these honorary memberships which were given to retiring officers as a commitment by the chief of the air staff will not be downgraded in any way?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to bring the representations of the hon. member to the attention of the Minister of National Defence.

INQUIRY AS TO INVITATION TO PRESIDENT TITO OF YUGOSLAVIA TO VISIT CANADA

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale): I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether the federal government has invited the president of Yugoslavia to come to Canada on an official visit later this year and, if so, whether any reply has been received?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I know of no such invitation having been issued. I believe the government has no knowledge of President Tito's intention of travelling to North America. Until such intention is known, there will be no question of an invitation.

ATOMIC ENERGY

POSSIBLE URANIUM ENRICHMENT PLANT—REPRESENTATIONS FROM COMPANIES AND PROVINCES

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the possible building of an uranium enrichment plant in Canada, is the minister inviting representations from all companies or provinces which have the potential to build such a plant?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think such an invitation would be premature, although we have heard from more than one province, inasmuch as the technology is not yet available to Canada for uranium enrichment.

Mr. Thomson: In view of the problems we have had before in building heavy water or atomic energy plants, will the minister assure the House that any such plant will have the supervision of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited?

Mr. Greene: I am not able to do that since there is no clear policy which in turn is because of the fact there is no immediate potential for enrichment. I can assure the hon. member that the adequate government agency, be it AECL or Eldorado Nuclear Limited, would have a very important role of surveillance.

OIL

RESEARCH ON PIPELINE CONSTRUCTION IN HIGH ARCTIC

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the intensive exploratory activity in the high Arctic islands and the suggestion of the hon. member for Vegreville, can the minister indicate whether specific studies or research are being done with regard to pipeline construction from the high Arctic in view of the fact there are special circumstances there, such as ice floes, which do not exist with regard to the Mackenzie valley pipeline?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to take the question as notice. I have been so preoccupied with the Mackenzie valley route that I am not current with respect to research on pipelines from the high Arctic. If the hon. member will permit, I will take the question as notice.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 17, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Wednesday, February 17, clause 2 of the bill with the amendment of the hon. member for St. John's East was under consideration. Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. MacLean: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I believe there is agreement that Part I of the bill be stood at this point and that we go on to consider Part II.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I think there has been agreement that Part I will be stood. It is hoped that we will proceed to Part II, Energy, Mines, Resources and Technical Surveys. These are consequential amendments. Then, subsequently, we would pass over part III, which has been approved, pass over, or let stand, part IV, let stand part V, deal with part VI and following that, with part VII, Public Service Superannuation. It is thought that in this way we shall be able to make more rapid progress than we have done up to now.

Mr. MacLean: That is correct, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Chairman, the statement made by the President of the Treasury Board represents an agreement which has been reached. I think you will find the committee ready to proceed with clause eight.

The Chairman: I shall not repeat the agreement. It has been stated for the record by the President of the Treasury Board. Is this course agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Then, the committee will proceed to the consideration of clause eight.

On clause 8—Energy, Mines and Resources

Mr. Yewchuk: In dealing with clause 8, Mr. Chairman, I wish to concentrate on development in northern Canada, particularly as it relates to energy in the form of oil and gas and the transportation of this form of energy to southern parts of Canada, keeping in mind the need to proceed in such a way as to ensure that the environment does not suffer irreparable damage.

Though we are aware that some research is being done in Arctic regions into the effects of pipelines, hot and cold, on the ecology and on the permafrost, we also know that a good deal of this research is still only in the planning stages or has not progressed to the point at which convincing reports can be drawn up and presented to the government. Much attention has been focussed on the transportation of oil in particular from the northern slopes of Alaska in the past year or more, but ecological research has not kept pace with the desire to transport oil to the south. Since the discovery of oil in this region of Alaska, exploratory activity throughout the Arctic and the Arctic islands has been intensified.

Particularly since the Americans announced their intention to build a trans-Alaska pipeline system from northern Alaska to the port of Valdez, the government has begun to make a fevered pitch for the construction of a pipeline down the Mackenzie Valley as a superior alternative. I am concerned about this because it is possible that as a result of its desire to obtain commitments to use the Mackenzie Valley route, the Canadian government may be inclined to proceed more quickly than its knowledge of environmental problems should permit it to do. A few days ago, in the course of a debate on this subject, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as well as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources indicated that much research was being done in this field, and both implied we were almost ready to begin pipeline construction down the Mackenzie Valley. I wish to take issue with some of the remarks these ministers made since I believe there was a good deal of exaggeration as to the amount of research which is actually in progress and the amount of information which has been accumulated with respect to effects of pipelines on the ecology.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development suggested that the Arctic land use research program had resulted in the effects of pipelines upon the permafrost, for example, being actively studied. I am informed, however, that this particular study had in fact been concerned primarily with the effects of exploratory seismic and drilling work and that in fact it had very little to do with the effects of pipelines on permafrost. I hope that minister will clarify this situation for the benefit of hon. members. He also made reference to the experimental pipeline at Inuvik, where the oil industry is working in collaboration with the government to discover the effect of a hot oil pipeline on the permafrost. I think this is a very worthwhile study, but it would appear from an answer given a couple of days ago by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources that no ecologist was attached to this study group. If this is not the case, I should like to know why the minister declined to give a more positive answer. I am concerned lest in the rush to develop these energy resources ecological studies should be overlooked, in which case Canada could wind up with another Peace—Athabasca Delta fiasco.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources gave the House the impression that a committee on environmental matters, chaired by an official of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, had been sufficiently successful in its research program to be in a position to draft guidelines pertaining to pipeline construction and operation in the north in relation to the ecology. I wonder whether the minister could make these findings available to hon. members so that we could be assured that the studies have, in fact, been as extensive as might appear. I take it the minister was referring to the Arctic land use studies and to the Arctic land use regulations which are nearly ready to be published, according to the hon. gentleman. If you would recall, Mr. Chairman, a few months ago the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources delivered his famous nationalism speech in Denver. He thought, I suppose, he would bring the Americans to their knees with regard to further investments in this country. It is interesting to recall, though, that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development made a follow-up trip to Texas, this time, cap-in-hand, to ask: Please come and build our pipeline—Mr. Greene was only joking; don't take it too seriously.

Today, as a result of the division created by the two ministers, I read in the press a headline over a news story from a usually reliable source, The Canadian Press, "Canadian Hopes Dimmed for Northern Pipeline". I was surprised at the minister's answer earlier today. He was asked during the question period whether there was reason to believe there was still a good deal of optimism that the pipeline would come down the Mackenzie Valley route. His answer was directly opposite to what is reported in the press under the headline I have just quoted. The first couple of paragraphs in the Canadian Press report read as follows:

> A multi-billion-dollar pipeline to carry Alaska oil to market through Canada has been all but ruled out by time, costs and the choice of companies that own the oil.
> The Canadian line has an outside chance, but only if opposition in the United States manages to kill the first-choice project of a delivery system by trans-Alaska pipeline and ocean tanker.

I hope the results of this Wednesday's meeting with the oil executives, which has been reported in the press, will make the ministers involved a little better aware of the fact that ministerial posts are supposed to be filled by responsible people who give a great deal of thought to what they say before they say it. I make this comment because it appears to me the ministers have been putting out contradictory statements and thus created a good deal of uncertainty among people from foreign countries who are investing in Canada.

Another important matter in this connection is the effect of recent developments in the north on the people who live there. I have always taken the position that such developments should be carried out keeping in mind their effect on the local residents as a consideration of the utmost importance. In reply to questions from this side of the House, on several occasions in the recent past we have heard reassuring comments that adequate consultation is being carried on.

Communications with private individuals living in the area do not convince me that we can feel as reassured as the minister would like us to be. In the debate on March 12, the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development indicated that research officers of the Wildlife and Fisheries Services are studying the effect of northern development on fish and wildlife. On checking into this it appears to me that only a survey, a sort of inventory, has been carried out. Apparently research into the effects of northern development on fish and wildlife is only in the planning stages. I do not question the minister's sincerity, but I wonder if he is really informed on what is going on up there. I would appreciate it if he would clarify his statement.

With respect to the effects on the lives of people who live in the area, we have been given reassurances that adequate consultations have been or will be held and that developments will not be detrimental to the native population. I have had a communication from a citizen who has visited many of the settlements along the Mackenzie Valley within the past three of four months and he indicates that virtually no consultations have been held with the natives so far. The letter reads:

> "I read with interest on page 3,940 of Hansard of March 4, 1971 that you asked about consultations with native people re the pipeline in the Mackenzie Valley. As far as I know none of the local people in the Mackenzie Valley have been adequately consulted on any aspects of the pipeline. I have lived in Fort Franklin, Norman Wells" area and goes on to say that in and prior to December, 1970 "I spent one week in each settlement of Aklavik, Fort Arctic, Red River, Fort Good Hope, Norman Wells, Fort Norman and Fort Franklin."

I do not need to stress the importance of such consultations to the native people, Mr. Chairman. Their livelihood and customary way of life are being threatened and could even be wiped out forever. The Prime Minister stated recently that development of the north should be to the benefit of all Canadians: I do not argue with that in general terms, but I would insist that the maximum benefit should come to the people who spend their entire lives in the north. We should not try to fool these people by providing them with temporary jobs during the boom years of development without due regard being paid to their long term future when the boom is over and they are left only with a huge pipeline running through their hunting and trapping grounds and there are no jobs to compensate for the loss of the traditional way of living.

To get back for a moment to the TAPS tanker system for bringing Alaskan oil to the west coast of the United States from Alaska, when Atlantic Richfield announced its large oil find on Alaska's north slope near Prudhoe Bay, the oil world quickly realized the importance of the discovery. Total reserves have been estimated at between 35 billion and 45 billion barrels. Once sufficiently large reserves had been outlined, it became apparent that transportation to existing markets in the United States could present a major problem. The voyage of the S.S. Manhattan was the first attempt at finding an economic means to bring this oil to U.S. mid-western markets; and although it would still be economically cheaper to use this direct means, other factors such as pollution problems, Arctic sovereignty and technical difficulties overruled the immediate use of this method.

Subsequent studies have suggested that a 789-mile pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to the all-weather port of Valdez could still make oil competitive enough for the Pacific west if it were taken from this port by large 250,000 ton tankers to the refinery at Bellingham, Washington. Since the proposal of the TAPS system, various groups and individuals in Canada and the United States have presented serious objections to the pipeline. These objections are mainly on ecological pollution and social grounds. Some of these pollution dangers have recently been considered in a series of meetings on both Washington and Anchorage. The validity of the TAPS system is not challenged as an economic method of transporting oil. However, some of the reasons for re-evaluation of the TAPS system include a suggestion by a study that two to four tanker collisions could occur in this area within the next ten years. The extent of the damage which could be done by even one collision is such that could turn the entire west coast area into a dead sea.

Ecological harm to the Alaskan countryside caused by melting permafrost is a problem similar to that faced by the Mackenzie Valley route. The frequency of earthquakes in Alaska brings up the possibility of breakages in the pipeline which could result in extensive spills and pollution. Earthquake activity is such that it may prohibit construction of port facilities at Valdez. The alternative, which I have already briefly discussed, is the Mackenzie Valley pipeline which is considered to be both ecologically safer and probably as economic or even more economic than the TAPS system.

Because of the controversy surrounding the Mackenzie route, the government has laid down a few guidelines: the pipeline should stay in a specific corridor; it should be a common carrier; allowance should be made for participation by Canadians in engineering, construction and finance; the northern ecology must be preserved and natives should be employed during construction. I think there should be one other guide-line—provision should be made for Canadians to invest in the pipeline, by way of buying shares.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, a consideration of the TAPS tanker project and the apparent effects of this system suggests that Canada should seriously oppose it on the grounds that severe ecological harm could result on the west coast as a result of the collision of supertankers bringing oil from Valdez through Puget Sound to Washington. A recent meeting with American oil executives suggest that Canada is probably too late with its objections.

We are also aware, given the increasing consumption annually, that the United States will need Prudhoe Bay oil in the foreseeable future. If agreement could be made with the Americans, the Mackenzie Valley pipeline could go ahead but there are several other considerations that must also be taken into account. How useful will this route be as a common carrier, in view of the problems that are likely to be encountered in building additional pipelines from Inuvik to Prudhoe Bay and from the Arctic Islands to Inuvik if oil is found higher up in the Arctic?

To my knowledge no research is being done with regard to the transportation of oil from the high Arctic to the northern tip of the Mackenzie Valley route. There are a host of new problems. Where will the pipeline go, over the ice or on the bottom of the sea? What are the dangers to the pipeline in this area? How great is the pollution threat with this type of pipeline? A proposal to build a pipeline from Prudhoe Bay to Inuvik, a distance of about 600 miles, could very well meet with similar objections from conservationists as has the Valdez line.

That particular piece of pipeline could be a great threat to our ecology as well, since Inuvik is in the same earthquake zone as Valdez.

What information do we have as to how to deal with a ruptured pipeline in that particular area and what is our knowledge of mopping up procedures under Arctic conditions should such a rupture and such pollution occur? It is virtually nil. Other considerations that we must look at from the non-ecological point of view are the possible expansion of existing facilities from Edmonton to Chicago to meet the anticipated increased oil flow through these facilities. If Alaska oil goes to Chicago via the Mackenzie pipeline, what guarantee is there that the oil will not infringe upon existing markets for western Canadian oil in the U.S. midwest?

• (12:20 p.m.)

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would like to reiterate that decisions made now pertaining to the transport of energy from the north will have far reaching effects in the future. Canada must not be panicked into development which is not based on thorough and complete research in the field of Arctic ecology, pollution and pollution prevention. At the same time, I want to say I disagree with the government in its stance concerning who should benefit the most from development in the north. I do not feel Canadians are so greedy as to consider that developments in the north should not be primarily for the benefit of native northerners directly. The greatest benefit to all Canadians in general, however, still remains in the area of prevention of the destruction of the environment of the north.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, we are now dealing with Part II of Bill C-207, which deals with Energy, Mines, Resources and Technical Surveys and which adds to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources additional powers, including, first, energy development from water and, secondly, responsibility for non-renewable resources. It seems to me when we discuss these new powers which are being given to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) and his department, it is encumbent on the minister to make a statement to the House concerning what the government's policy is in respect of energy resources. I think we should remember we are dealing with non-renewable resources. We are dealing with such things as uranium, oil, gas and certain ores. Such resources are not unlimited. These are resources which, once they have been dissipated, will no longer be available to the people of Canada. We should like to have a statement from the minister setting forth the government's policy with regard to how these resources will be husbanded, on what basis they will be expended and what provision is being made for their long-term use.

What we should remember is, that in this generation we are merely the trustees of these resources, and that we have the responsibility to see they are not dissipated. I think it is our duty to make sure Canada does not become a mere hinterland supplying energy resources to the more technically advanced nations which need our energy resources but which, if they are allowed to completely dissipate them, will leave this country a veritable wilderness. The problem we face in this regard, of course, is the whole attitude of the government in respect of making policy statements. The government is always preparing white papers. No one objects to white papers; as a matter of fact there is a good deal to be said for the preparation of policy statements with regard to various departments. But, in the main, these white papers have been so long in preparation that events pass them by. The government does not seem to be aware of the fact that time will not stand still while several years are spent in the preparation of a policy position.

I read in one report that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources is preparing a white paper and I read in another report that his department is preparing two white papers, one on energy resources and the other on minerals. Possibly the minister could tell us what it is that is actually being prepared. I submit to the minister that we have been waiting now nearly three years for a white paper, and the difficulty about waiting so long is that events occur in respect of which the government has no position and problems arise for which the government has no solution. Consequently, we get a series of ad hoc arrangements and temporary policies which are contradictory, non-productive and in some cases counterproductive. What I am hoping today is that in the course of our discussion of Bill C-207 we will get a statement from the minister concerning the energy policies of this government I shall touch briefly on this because I wish to ask some questions in the hope that later we will receive some answers from the minister.

First of all, I raise the question of what the government policy is in respect of uranium. Last May the government took a decision in respect of Denison Mines in order to prevent that company passing into the hands of a foreign company. When the government did this the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made clear that the purpose was to prevent Canadian ownership of the uranium industry dropping below the 40 per cent which then obtained. Since that time, however, the regulations issued by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources excluded companies which were already engaged in exploration work. The result is that a discovery in Saskatchewan by the Gulf Mineral Resources Company, a wholly owned subsidiary of Gulf Oil Corporation of Pittsburgh, will not be covered by the policy laid down in May of 1970. I should like to know if Gulf Mineral Resources, a foreign-owned corporation, is to be allowed to share in the development of the uranium industry, how much this will reduce the percentage of the uranium industry which will be Canadian owned and how many more companies which were engaged in exploration work in May 1970 will be allowed to enter into production. I am wondering whether this means that bit by bit the Canadian control of the uranium industry will continue to decline. We should know that. Then, I should like to know whether the government has any cutoff point or any policy for retrieving control of some of these uranium operations which are in the hands of foreign corporations.

The second matter on which I hope the minister will make some statement is in respect of the production, sale and export of natural gas. Last fall, because members of this party took very strenuous exception to the government's decision to approve the recommendation of the National Energy Board of Canada in respect of the export of 6.3 trillion cubic feet of natural gas to the United States, we had a debate in this House. We were assured at that time that this was surplus to our needs. We were assured by the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company, whose officials appeared before the National Energy Board, that there would be no difficulty about meeting the needs of Canadian gas consumers in eastern Canada and for that reason the government should allow the export of 6.3 trillion cubic feet of gas over the next 20 years. Our worst fears are being realized. Just recently the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company officials have appeared before the National Energy Board and have said they are not going to be able to meet all the demands of their eastern customers. They have notified some of their eastern customers that they should not take on any additional commitments and that they should not enlarge their areas of operation because they will not be able to meet the increased demand. Mr. V. L. Horty, the president of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines, said at the hearing before the National Energy Board that his company did not anticipate the Canadian market would expand so rapidly. He said that the consumption had gone up by a surprising 122 billion cubic feet to the astronomical figure of 660 billion cubic feet. This increase did not happen over a long period of years. We are talking about a period from last October to this spring, and Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and the government, who were saying last fall that there would be no problem about meeting the demands of the gas customers in eastern Canada, are now faced with the prospect of the curtailment of gas to eastern Canada unless the National Energy Board or the government are prepared to allow Trans-Canada Pipe Lines to be relieved of the 1966 requirement which calls upon them to supply 50 per cent of their gas from Canadian sources. In other words, we have made so large a commitment of gas to the United States that we may not be able to meet the requirements of our own people here in central Canada.

What we need from the minister is a clear statement as to what are the realistic gas needs for Canada. How much gas are we going to require over the next period of years? The National Energy Board in its projections suggests that the per capita consumption of gas in Canada by 1990 will be the same as the per capita consumption of gas in the United States in 1975. Does anyone think that this 15 year time lag is realistic in a country like Canada where, first of all, we have a very cold climate and where, second, we are only beginning to understand the utilization of natural gas and, third, where more and more of the power utilities are turning to natural gas as one of the few non-polluting energy resources?

My conviction, backed up by many of the experts whom I have read, is that the estimates of the National Energy Board of our gas needs for the next 25 years are not realistic. We want to know, what does the government estimate we will need in terms of natural gas, and what protection will there be in price for domestic users? I know that the government's stock reply is, "well, if we are hard pressed for gas in Canada, we always push out and develop new sources of gas". That is quite possible, particularly with gas being discovered in the Arctic, but I wonder if the public realize what the government is doing. What the government is doing is selling the gas in Canada which is readily accessible and relatively cheap, and as the Canadian market expands we will have to develop the less accessible and consequently much more expensive gas for our own use. Surely, we ought to have a clear-cut policy with respect to the whole question of gas. When I look at the projections made by the National Energy Board, which estimates that about half our gas production is going to the United States and that in 1990 two thirds of our natural gas will be going to the U.S.; that we are now meeting some 3 per cent of the U.S. requirements but by 1990 we will be meeting 15 per cent of the U.S. requirements, I begin to wonder what we are holding in reserve for the use of Canadians of readily accessible and reasonably cheap gas.

I notice a report from Washington which says that the United States will face a possible gas shortage by 1976. I do not blame the Americans if they try to make all the agreements they can to purchase gas in Canada. As a matter of fact, they will be prepared to pay us a better price than we are now getting from our own domestic consumers, and the effect of that will be to push up the price to our domestic consumers because if the gas companies can get a better price in the U.S. than they are now receiving in Canada, they are going to raise the price to domestic consumers.

So what we want to know is, what is the government's policy with respect to natural gas. It is not enough for the minister to say that we are going to sell only that which is surplus to our needs. That is a lovely stock phrase that means nothing. What do we mean by "surplus to our needs", surplus to our needs for today or next year or ten years from now? These supplies of gas will not replenish themselves. They are here once and when they have been utilized, they are gone. To suggest that we can sell anything more than we require ourselves from day to day is to embark upon a policy that will allow two thirds of our natural gas to be siphoned off to be used elsewhere. The result will be that future generations of Canadians will not be able to get the necessary gas and the necessary energy to convert our raw materials into manufactured goods or to produce electric power and provide other services to the Canadian people.

I hope the minister will also make a clear-cut statement during the course of the passage of this clause of the bill with respect to the government's oil policy. What is the government's oil policy? The national oil policy has been completely overtaken by events. The idea of using Canadian crude up to the Ottawa Valley, and allowing the area east of that to be served by off-shore supplies of oil, is becoming increasingly untenable. Venezuela has just increased the price of oil. The oil countries of the Middle East have done the same, and so has Libya and some of the other African countries. Within the last two weeks several oil companies have announced that they expect to raise the price of oil and the price of gasoline because of the increased costs of imported oil.

Another factor has entered the picture. The President of the United States has been questioning the security of oil supplies for eastern Canada. Under the U.S. mandatory oil import program, the U.S. was concerned that in the event of war and submarine havoc on the Atlantic coast, we would have to depend upon the United States to supply the area east of the Ottawa Valley. This was one of the reasons which the President gave in the statement which he made with respect to quotas on Canadian crude oil from western Canada.

It is becoming increasingly apparent that we have to scrap the old national oil policy and think in terms of the feasibility of building a pipe line to Montreal to serve the eastern market. We have not been able to get any of the economic feasibility studies from the minister; studies carried out by the government. I have seen some of the economic feasibility studies done by the—

The Chairman: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: I thank the committee. This saves me from breaking up what I have to say into two parts. I will try to bring my remarks to a conclusion quickly.

There is now a need for a serious investigation as to the economic feasibility, and the desirability from a national standpoint, of extending an oil pipe line to Montreal. The minister always meets this proposal by first saying that the feasibility studies do not indicate it would be economically desirable. Mr. Chairman, we have not seen those studies. I have seen some of the studies prepared by some of the independent producers, and I would welcome a chance to see some of the government studies and make a comparison. There are those in the oil industry who believe it would be economically feasible, provided such a pipeline were protected against undue dumping. They believe it could meet the normal competition of off-shore oil. That may be arguable, but I would like to see more data than has been given to us to date to determine that a pipeline to Montreal is not feasible.

The minister's chief argument for not doing something about this is to the effect that if it were a feasible proposition the private companies would see that such a pipeline was built. That statement is much more naïve than the minister really is. I think he is a pretty shrewd cookie and I do not think he swallows that argument himself. Interprovincial Pipe line is owned by Imperial Oil, which in turn is a subsidiary of Standard Oil, and Standard Oil is the company bringing crude up from Venezuela to Montreal. Thus, it is not keen on having one of its subsidiaries bringing western oil into Montreal in competition with Standard Oil brought from Venezuela.

It makes sense that Standard Oil Company would like to have a national oil policy that will keep western crude west of the Ottawa River, and leave it the eastern market for Venezuelan oil. I do not blame it for following that policy, but I blame the government if it is prepared to accept a policy which is advantageous to Standard Oil but is disadvantageous to the welfare and well being of the Canadian people. That is why I want to see this matter discussed further, and to have more information from the minister.

The minister has to give us something more specific about the government's policy with respect to Home Oil. I am not going to deal with that at any length, but when the question of Home Oil being sold to Ashland of Kentucky came up, the government said there was nothing it could do. Then it relented, and said some of the Canadian private companies might want to buy out Home Oil. When that did not materialize, the minister announced that the Canadian government was willing to buy it. Now, the minister tells us that Mr. Brown, president of Home Oil, and the government have not been able to make any deal, and that the company is back in the market place.

This underlines the point I made when I started. The reason the government is not able to grapple with the danger of losing Home Oil to American companies is that the government hasn't any policy. For three years and more, we have been waiting for a policy on foreign onwership and control of the Canadian economy. The longer the government delays formulating a policy the more the problems pile up, and the more we get ad hoc deals that have no meaning and no direction. I hope the minister is going to tell us what the government intends to do about Home Oil, and whether it will be bringing in legislation designed to give the government the necessary power to deal with Home Oil before this company, the last of the large Canadian-owned companies, passes out of the control of Canadians.

I hope the minister will also make a statement regarding the oil pipelines. According to reports from Washington, the President of the United States instructed the State Department in February, 1970, to approach the Canadian government about the possibility of building a pipeline from Alaska to the United States through Canada. The report says that the Canadian government rejected that proposal. Whether that is correct or not, we do know that the oil companies which were active in Alaska then began to advocate what has come to be known as the TAPS program, the Trans-Alaska pipeline system, which would bring oil from Prudhoe Bay to Valdez, and by tanker from Valdez to Cherry Point, Washington, as well as to other points on the American coastline.

The Canadian government became alarmed at this prospect, and very understandably so, because one has only to look at the coastline of British Columbia to see what will happen if oil tankers of 100,000 tons, 200,000 tons—and now they are even talking about 300,000 ton oil tankers—were to come down the west coast of Vancouver Island and through the Straits of Juan de Fuca. The wreckage of one of those tankers would pollute the coastline of British Columbia and would ruin the finest salmon fishing area in the world. It was only at this point that the Canadian government began to make noises through the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. It asked the United States government to look at the possibility of a pipeline through the Canadian Arctic and down through Edmonton, to the United States. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in a speech, the report of which I have before me, said that it would be 30 cents a barrel cheaper to take this gas down to Chicago instead of taking it by sea from Valdez.

I think we ought to make two points clear. First, we, in this party, are vigorously opposed to any program that will bring oil tankers down the west coast of Canada. We believe that the results of such a program could be disastrous for the people of British Columbia and for the industries of British Columbia. That is why we introduced an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act, which was rejected by the government, asking that Canada establish a pollution control area up to 100 miles from the west coast, just as we have done in the Arctic. The government has rejected this proposal, although it introduced the concept of a pollution control zone for the Arctic. It has never been able to explain to the House why it makes sense to protect the Arctic and why it does not make sense to protect the Pacific coast.

The second thing which ought to be made clear is this: Although we are anxious to avoid the pollution of the Pacific coast by encouraging the TAPS program, we should not be stampeded into building a hot pipeline over the Canadian Arctic. This should not be done unless all the ecological studies have been completed and the government can assure us, so far as scientific know-how and technology can assure us, that this will not bring disastrous consequences for the Arctic.

If the ecological question is settled, I hope the minister will tell us what the government has in mind about the ownership and control of such a pipeline. Who will own this pipeline? Will it be an American pipeline to take oil from Alaska to the United States? Will there be any Canadian ownership? Will there be a participation by the Canadian government? Who will control the input and the output? Who will control the rates that will be charged for the oil which will be put in the pipeline in the Canadian Arctic and probably taken out in Alberta or some other part of Canada? It is all very well to say that this is a common carrier; but if someone else sets the rates, and sets them at a high level, it no longer in reality would be a common carrier. Those who decide the rates for input and output are the people who will decide whether, in reality, the pipeline will be a common carrier. Therefore, the information we have asked for is vital information which the House of Commons ought to have before we are asked to make decisions.

The real difficulty for members of Parliament stems from the fact that the government makes these decisions and announces them on motions. We are then given a chance to comment for three minutes or five minutes. Surely, as members of Parliament, we ought to have the opportunity to assess all the facts and to discuss them. After we have discussed them and expressed our views, the government must of course make a decision. That is its responsibility. Surely, however, the government ought not to make that decision until all the information has been made available to hon. members and hon. members have had an opportunity to express their views. That is why I make an urgent appeal to the minister that he give us a full and frank statement as to what the government has in mind. We do not need more platitudes. We do not need more statements to the effect that we are only going to sell such of our resources as are surplus to our needs or, to quote that lovely phrase, that the resources of Canada will be developed for the best interests of the Canadian people. What we need are concrete statements from the minister regarding some of the problems which I have raised here today. I hope the minister will make these statements, and I hope that we will have the opportunity to question the minister after he has made them.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair. The committee will resume at two o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The Committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Chairman, the importance of the bill before us this afternoon is not underscored by the attendance that we have. I expect that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will be here in a moment.

An hon. Member: Here he is now.

Mr. Dinsdale: Good. Friday afternoon provides an opportunity for an atmosphere that is conducive to discussing these important issues in a cool, calm and collected way.

Mr. Greene: And a lonely way.

Mr. Dinsdale: At the outset of my remarks, I wish to suggest that this atmosphere provides an excellent opportunity for the minister to make a statement on resource policy. Parliament and the country has been waiting for this for many a long year.

The question before the House this afternoon is the reorganization of the Department of Energy, Mines, Resources and Technical Surveys. It is logical to assume that the reorganization of the department concerned with the most important subject in our economic development is concerned, resources, provides an opportunity and a platform for the minister to clarify some of the confusion that has existed within the cabinet ranks during recent days. The policy of the present government seems to be to move in several directions at the same time. I suppose they feel that a moving target going in different directions is harder to get into focus, but unfortunately it produces a sort of schizophrenic reaction on the part of the country. I am sure the minister realizes from very significant events that have taken place in important areas of influence, not only in Canada but elsewhere on the North American continent, that an unhappy state of economic schizophrenia exists. It is a shocking situation when the leaders of the financial institutions of Canada have to go to New York and, in an important discussion with the American business community, make a bitter attack on the economic policies of the present government.

There was an article in last week's issue of the Financial Post which pointed out the tendency of the government to be schizophrenic in its approach to fundamental problems. The area of communications is basic and vital in order to get across ideas. There has been a situation of schizophrenia in the Department of Communications since it was reorganized. Obviously reorganization does not necessarily mean increased efficiency. It can sometimes lead more in the direction of disorganization than in the direction of reform and efficiency, as a comment by Jeremy Brown published recently in the Toronto Daily Star and quoted in the Financial Post indicates. This points out the situation that I am briefly describing this afternoon. I quote:

> Eric Kierans, minister of communications (which formerly included the Post Office), sent a text of a speech to a Toronto address before the Feb. 11 delivery date. The package arrived 13 days later. The title of the Speech? Canadian communications: outlook and alternatives.

This quiet Friday afternoon does provide the minister an opportunity to give us an outline in the same terms as the minister responsible for communications. It could be called something like this—"Canadian Resource Development—Outlook and Alternatives". It has become increasingly clear in the past two decades that the basis for any great economic development in Canada must be our abundant supply of resources, particularly the growing development in the north. The wise utilization of the rich resources we have there, will be to the benefit of all our people. It is this growing interest in the management and development of our resources which in the latter 'fifties turned the attention of the Government of Canada in the direction of ensuring that these resources were managed as wisely as possible.

An important conference was planned and it took place in Montreal under the appropriate title of Resources for Tomorrow. Out of that conference came any number of suggestions for the development and wise management of the resource potential of Canada for the future welfare of citizens in all parts of this great country.

Unfortunately, not much progress has been made since the early part of the 'sixties. One of the reasons the spokesmen for the government are so confused in their counsels is that they suddenly find themselves in a situation where they have neglected to outline in any comprehensive manner the economic targets which ought to be achieved if we are to realize the great economic potential of our resources at a time when opportunities for their use are suddenly available. Moreover, and this is most important in the light of the growing concern with respect to environmental pollution, neither have they conceived any comprehensive or co-ordinated policy for the long term development of those resources while at the same time controlling any threat to the environment as a result. There has been a flurry of government legislation in the last two years which purports to deal with these fundamental issues, but again it would seem to be that this has been the result of a crash program rather than of careful long-term planning for the future.

I will mention one example. The Canada Water Act, which was passed as recently as last year, outlined the problem very clearly but unfortunately it supplied none of the answers. It described the "why" but it failed to answer the question "how". We have become aware of these problems to an increasing extent during the last decade. In fact, volumes outlining them came out of the Resources for Tomorrow conference of 1962. The difficulty was that we are short on solutions and on policies designed to deal with the long term development of resources in the best interests of Canada as a whole.

I wish to outline briefly at this stage in my remarks some examples of the government's neglect which has resulted in loss of time in this area, a neglect arising from a negative attitude to the management of our resources which has been motivated largely by political reasons. It so happens that the Conservative administration from 1957 to 1963 placed emphasis on national resource development. The Liberals, being in opposition at that time, took a negative attitude and as a result now find themselves hoist by their own petard. I hear comments coming from the other side of the House. If any hon. gentleman over there wants to ask questions—

Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): We were applauding.

The Chairman: Order. I wish hon. members would either be attentive or else not participate in the debate from behind the curtains.

Mr. Dinsdale: I do not know whether they were asking questions or whether it was sound and fury signifying nothing, to quote the great bard.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

An hon. Member: Why not quote Voltaire?

Mr. Dinsdale: Unfortunately, my knowledge of Voltaire does not make it possible for me to quote from that source.

Let us consider the national energy policy. It was laid down in 1959 with the establishment of the National Energy Board, and there has been no fundamental change in policy since that time though the difficulties have grown astronomically. We are now trying to extemporize a national policy to meet the changes which have taken place.

Early in the 'sixties a concerted effort was made by the federal government, in co-operation with the provinces, to establish a national power grid. These comments, it seems to me are quite apropos because one of the new responsibilities of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources under the re-organization proposals in part II will be energy development from water. This is not a new concept by any means. In the conference which took place in 1962, it was optimistically hoped that within a comparatively short time we would see the beginning of a national power grid which would make it possible to use the abundance of hydroelectric energy available in Canada, thereby conserving our fossil fuel and minimizing environmental pollution. A national power grid based on hydroelectric power would obviously be the cleanest and most economical kind of energy development and, as I say, it would conserve our limited fossil fuel supply. After all, fossil fuels are not renewable and once they have been extracted, that is the end of them. Certain agreements were undertaken at that time so that they could become the basis of an expanding national power grid. The development of the tremendous Hydro project in northern Manitoba was the beginning of such agreement. Unfortunately, the ensuing nine years has not seen any further development in the national power grid. When the minister takes part in this debate, I hope he will give us a report on his programs, policies and plans, if any, to bring the program of national resource development up to date and in tune with today's needs. There is a golden opportunity this afternoon for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to explain some of the contradictions that have appeared in government policy as enunciated by important statements made outside this House. There are not too many important statements made in this House of Commons. The ministers have formed the habit of making their policy statements south of the border in cities like Denver or Dallas, or in some of the major centres in Canada. If the minister wants to get part II of the reorganization bill through this afternoon, I think it is incumbent upon him to remove some of the anxiety and concern that has arisen as a result of his contradictory statements.

The minister's Denver speech became famous—or infamous depending on your viewpoint—because it seemed to be a frontal attack on American investment in this country. Then just recently the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, who has some responsibility for resources as well, travelled to Dallas. Whilst there he reversed the position and made an attempt to gain continued interest in investment in the resource development of Canada by American capitalists.

If all goes well the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry will become the minister responsible for the environment. He has made speeches in various parts of Canada which seem to be selective in so far as they choose little bits from the statements of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Let us get our stories straight in the House of Commons on this peaceful Friday afternoon. Here is a golden opportunity for the minister to sort out some of the contradictions and confusion in government policy that is having untold harmful effects upon the economy of Canada.

There are others who have entered the debate. The premier of Quebec made a visit to New York recently in an apparent attempt to offset some of the harmful effects of the speech of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in Denver which had tended to cut off investment in the province of Quebec. A recent editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 24 outlining the difficulties commented, "The troubled Canadian economy has been suffering from an accumulation of uncertainties concerning government policy." Let me re-emphasize that any resource development has for its final objective the development of the economy of Canada. We cannot have a consistent or co-ordinated policy unless the government speaks with one voice. The debate on tax reform has been going on for 16 months and has brought disastrous results to the economy.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the House that the hon. member shall extend his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Dinsdale: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and hon. members. I shall endeavour to bring my remarks to a conclusion as quickly as possible.

I want to make one further fundamental point. We are debating in the abstract if we think that the policy of resource development is linked to any consideration but the economic potential of this country. We have to rationalize, we have to organize, we have to end the confusion that has been rampant as a result of the lack of leadership from the spokesmen for the government of Canada.

Now that you have extended my time, Mr. Chairman, I should like to spend a few moments on the most urgent aspect of resource development. I refer, of course, to the situation that has developed with respect to northern oil and gas in the past two years, particularly since the Americans brought in oil at Prudhoe Bay. Canada has lost the initiative here because we were exploring the high Arctic area as early as 1961, before the Americans. We were on Melville Island drilling what it was hoped was an oil well to a depth of 1,500 feet. This drilling proved that the geology of the high Arctic was favourable to oil development. This is a story of Canadian initiative that has still to be told because the initial exploration met with a lot of resistance and criticism. It was 100 per cent a Canadian operation spearheaded by Dome Petroleum and some of the minor oil interests of Canada.

Three fundamental problems emerged as a result of that pioneer effort in 1961. Had Canada come to grips with them as they emerged, as a government providing vigorous leadership in the resource area should have dealt with them, we would be in a much better position to come up with solutions today. I refer to the three problems of transportation, protection of the ecology and sovereignty. All these matters have had major public attention in the media during the last year as a result of the oil find at Prudhoe Bay on the Alaskan slopes. Research was going on in the early sixties regarding the transportation of resources out of the north. This included such far out ideas as the "big wheel", submarine transportation, tanker transportation and the possibility of a pipeline. Judging from the lack of certainty on the part of the government today, this research into transportation facilities must have died shortly after 1963 because everything that is mentioned now is of a crash, ad hoc nature.

No research material has been brought before this House by which members can judge the wisdom of the current approach of the government to northern development. The minister has been asked time and again to table the results of research so that the situation can be properly evaluated. Because of delay in implementing the findings of the Resources for Tomorrow Conference of 1962, we are now extemporizing solutions to environmental problems of northern resource development rather than operating on the basis of information that should have been available had the policy initiative continued through the decade of the sixties.

The question of sovereignty, of course, is one which arose because of the epic voyage of the Manhattan back in 1969 and some confusing statements which emerged from the government, from the Prime Minister down. I should like to point out that the voyage of the Thord to Melville Island in 1961 was just as epic a voyage as that of the Manhattan, because this was a much smaller vessel which got the drilling crews and their outfits through to Melville Island in time for the winter drilling of 1961-62. That voyage did not arouse any concern at all because at that time the general sentiment in Canada was that it was a bit of a nightmare to ever conceive that there might be an oil potential in the Canadian high Arctic. The only real initiative in dealing with the sovereignty question came from the committee on northern development which travelled to Resolute Bay. That committee, in no uncertain terms, suggested to the government a policy by which Canada declared that this entire area was under Canadian control and jurisdiction.

So, Mr. Chairman, without trespassing any further on the time of the committee, may I say I hope the minister will use this opportunity to clarify the contradictions and to end the schizophrenia that has caused untold damage to the economy of Canada. The problem of chronic unemployment, or under-employment if you like, is directly related to the confused state of our economy. We have a resource potential which could be used for a magnificent economic development if the government had the wisdom, initiative and courage to co-ordinate its policies in this regard. A reorganization of the kind outlined in Part II of Bill C-207 is merely a musical chairs gesture unless it is backed by strong coordinated policy statements on the part of the government. I hope the hon. gentleman, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will use the energy at his disposal this afternoon to place on the record a definitive statement concerning government policy and plans in this regard. We are approaching a weekend, and such a statement would receive good coverage in the press. I am sure it would end the anxiety expressed by people in all walks of life, from bankers and financial leaders down to the hundreds of thousands of unemployed Canadians who are waiting for government leadership to resolve their economic problems.

Mr. Thomson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make some remarks in a somewhat similar vein to those we have heard today in respect of the problems related to energy in Canada, and particularly some of the resources we have. When I look at the answers the government has given to the questions regarding oil or atomic energy in the past few months, I am reminded of a story during the Boer War when things were not going very well for the British. One government member was heard to say, "I suppose we will wander through somehow". That is how it would seem the present government hopes to solve the energy crisis, unless it adopts a better attitude than it has had in the past few months. I suggest it is not worthy of the minister or the government to take such an approach. Surely, they can make some decisions and recommendations in this area, and present something to us which we can discuss.

I think one of the attributes of a good government is the ability to anticipate the problems which might develop in a country, what might be needed in the way of energy or something else, and come forward with some firm recommendations concerning what should be done about them. I feel in this regard the present government has been sadly lacking. I believe it is fairly obvious that the United States has oil in Alaska which they will get to market somehow, and that we have some oil in our Arctic which we will get to market somehow. During the meetings the minister held with the oil company presidents this week, I wonder whether he was able to present a constructive proposal to them. For example, was he able to say on behalf of the government that the research has been done in respect of preservation of the ecology? In connection with the building of any pipeline, was he able to say we have done some research into the practical problem of building and operating a gas or oil pipeline through the permafrost? I wonder if he was able to make these statements.

I would like to know also whether the minister was able to say a comprehensive study had been made of a route for a Canadian pipeline or pipelines through the Mackenzie Valley or at any other location. I would like to know if he was able to talk in an intelligent fashion about this proposal with these people. Was he able to suggest what type of business organization should operate any such pipeline which followed a Canadian route? I wonder whether he had ideas to present to these people or whether he was stumbling in the dark. Certainly, I feel he should have been able to do so because it is some time since the oil was discovered and, therefore, he must have been aware that something would have to be done. If he was not thinking about it, then his officials should have been.

We have been told it is all very well to be critical but that one should have some practical suggestions. I should like to make some practical suggestions to the minister. I believe it is obvious that if such a pipeline were built, the oil which would flow through it in the immediate future would be mostly United States oil. Hopefully, there would be some Canadian oil. Obviously, there would have to be some United States money used in the building of any such pipeline. As Canadians, we have an interest in this pipeline and the type of organization that would construct and operate it. I suggest the most logical type of organization would be a Panarctic type organization through which we would use both Canadian money, expertise and control and United States money. In effect, it would be a joint effort. I suggest to the minister, without going into great detail, it would seem logical that a realistic approach to the problem would involve the resources of the two countries. I think this is a practical suggestion.

I should like to switch for a moment to atomic energy because I feel here we have a problem which is somewhat similar to the problem in respect of oil. Once again the minister seems to have been stumbling from atom to atom or from molecule to molecule. He does not seem to be able to make up his mind and seems to be concerning himself mainly with whether or not we can sell an atomic plant abroad and what we should build in Canada. I certainly believe his officials should be able to give him better advice. I hope some firm recommendations will be forthcoming along this line. I realize we do not have all the answers in respect of atomic energy. I realize also that the technology required in a field of this nature is pretty extensive and has not been developed in all countries. In answer to a question I asked this morning, the minister suggested we did not have all the technology necessary to build an enrichment plant in Canada.

I ask him directly, did he make a request of the United States government to make their technology available if we wanted to build an enrichment plant in Canada. Has he offered to put any money into a Japanese experiment, or make a deal with Germany or Britain, regarding a new method that they are using to produce enriched uranium. I wonder if the government has considered any alternatives of this nature. I realize that there are many problems in the field of energy, but let me suggest that this is a very important matter and Canada may have some energy which we could sell to advantage. If we did so, we might be able to provide jobs for some of those who are unemployed and thus move forward in the technological age.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, Part II of Bill C-207 offers us an opportunity to discuss the problem of energy.

We have heard this afternoon some very eloquent and detailed speeches on the problem of natural gas and oil transportation, which affects mostly the western provinces at the present time owing to the new Prudhoe Bay oil discoveries.

Mr. Speaker, we do not have this problem in eastern Canada; however, I feel that we would invite discussion of similar problems. Recent decisions reached by Venezuela and Asian countries that have been supplying us with oil until now are a cause for grave concern to us and we would prefer to see the province of Quebec get its gas and oil supplies from Canadian oil sources.

Mr. Chairman, why we be always dependent on some other countries, such as those of Asia or South America, since we have in Canada oil deposits and reserves as substantial as theirs? Moreover, we are told a considerable part of our territory has not even been explored yet. Therefore, the government should decide to make the studies that are required, if it has not already done so, and it should get in touch with private enterprise in order to find a way of supplying the eastern part of Canada with oil and natural gas. I think this would benefit the whole of Canada.

Having said this, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the minister to answer a few questions when he takes the floor in a few minutes. I should like him to explain this addition to the act.

For instance, the act passed in 1966 did not deal with hydro-electric power whereas the present one covers energy generated from water under the item "energy". As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, the production and sale of hydro-electric power falls within provincial jurisdiction.

I know, where the province of Quebec is concerned, that there have been considerable developments in the last few years. Even greater developments are now under way in the James Bay basin. This development interests me more particularly, because the basin is located in my riding.

It is expected that this development will take place in the next few years and involve investments of over $2 billion. We already know that Quebec's premier, the hon. Robert Bourassa, has made two trips to the United States to seek funds for the development of hydro-electric power in that part of the province of Quebec. We do not know as of yet whether his representations have been successful and will permit this kind of development.

It goes without saying, for the moment at least, that we do not expect to use all the power which will be generated in this basin. Outlets will therefore have to be found and I think this was another purpose of the premier's visit to the United States. However I fail to understand how in order to develop a portion of our land, we must kowtow before foreign financiers and ask them for permission to do so.

Recently we heard the Quebec budget speech. It was stated that there would be no tax boost, in order to allow the development of the economy, to allow people to enjoy a little more of their income.

On the other hand, this same government tells us that it will have to borrow many millions of dollars to make up the deficit. So, they do not raise taxes, in order to leave a little more money in the hands of the citizens to allow a better development of the economy, but they will try to get the savings which may exist to finance the administration of the province of Quebec. If individuals are left with a little more money, they will try to take it away from them through loans to administer the province of Quebec. So, how much will be left for developing private industry, for developing the natural resources of our province of Quebec?

This whole system of borrowing should be improved and our governments at the federal, provincial and municipal levels as well as all government agencies should not have to turn to private investors to borrow the money required for the administration of public affairs. If the government of Quebec, for instance, which is trying to borrow two billion dollars to develop part of its territory, had access to the Bank of Canada, it could borrow this amount and implement this project which could last for some ten years. Then the government of Quebec would not need to offer or sell a part of the Quebec territory to the Americans.

By borrowing from the Bank of Canada, the government would no longer have to run after foreign capital. Furthermore, these Canadian funds would be available for developing private enterprise, for creating new industries and new businesses.

Would the minister clearly indicate what this addition to the present law is all about? I understand its effect would be to insert in clause 8 of the bill all that concerns electrical energy.

Would the minister tell us also what he intends to do with respect to paragraph (d) concerning explosives?

We are all aware that recently we have had problems in connection with the use of explosives and more especially dynamite. We have too often seen dumps of explosives intended for building highways or digging being diverted to persons who were not too anxious about the proper operation of the administration.

I would therefore like to take this opportunity to ask the minister to see to it that stored explosives will be better watched so that burglars could not get hold of those explosives and divert them from their purpose.

I think that the few questions which I wanted to ask the minister will considerably clarify the bill under consideration and indicate to us what the minister intends to do in the fields of hydro electric energy and the use of explosives.

[English]

Mr. Coates: Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a few remarks concerning the programming board report on the development of tidal power in the Atlantic provinces. This is a matter of the utmost interest to the people of the Maritime provinces, and the minister himself has indicated an interest in it. At the same time, I wish to point out that there are some aspects of the potential associated with Fundy power development with which the minister is not as fully versed as we in the Maritime provinces would like him to be. I hope to bring some of these aspects to his attention, trusting this will result in his developing an ever-increasing interest in the harnessing of the tides, stimulating a dialogue within his department that will result in the updating of the programming report which was prepared and made public in 1969.

I would first like to tell the minister that, I personally, and I believe the people of the Maritime provinces in general, appreciate his indication of willingness to review the findings of the programming board. We hope that a review will be undertaken immediately by officials of his department. There has been some laxity on the part of the provincial government of Nova Scotia in requesting the review which the minister has said he would carry out if he were asked to do so by the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. The Premier of New Brunswick has said he believes such a review would be in the interests of the public, but the Premier of Nova Scotia, for reasons still best known to himself, has said he sees no particular value in such a review. He is carrying on negotiations with private interests with respect to development of power from the tides.

I believe it is in the interests of Canada that the federal government undertake an immediate review of the programming board report, because I think that everything associated with the tidal power that would be generated would involve the federal government. Because of this, it is essential that the federal government become involved in all discussions that transpire or are undertaken, either with private interests or with public interests. There is firm evidence to indicate that the bases on which the programming board made its conclusions no longer exist. Much new technical information is available with respect to lowering the construction costs of the dams necessary to harness the tides, and thus reduce the cost of the power generated.

I wish to put some evidence on the record of Hansard to indicate the degree of the problem that faces the northeastern part of the United States. I do so because it is evident that the amount of power generated from the tides will be far in excess of the requirements of the Atlantic area, and there would be a ready market for that surplus power in the New England states.

An article by the New York Times news service, which appeared in the Chronicle-Herald on December 11, 1970, stated among other things:

> The problem of long-range scarcity of energy in the United States, however, remains unsolved. And even for this winter, fuel reserves are precariously low.

Since December 11 last, we have discovered that article was founded on the basis of real evidence because they have been experiencing sharp shortages of power in the New England states. The article also contains these paragraphs:

> The price of coal in October was more than 50 per cent higher than a year ago according to the Wholesale Price Index prepared by the Bureau of Labour Statistics. The cost of residual oil which is used for fueling steam turbines and other industrial purposes, has risen by about 60 per cent.
> The cost of electric power has not climbed steeply yet, but the price of electricity inevitably will reflect fuel costs. In fact many, if not most, electric utilities have already applied for rate increases, citing fuel costs as their chief reason.
> Gulf Oil, Humble Oil, and a number of other companies have announced an increase in the price of crude oil—
> There is wide agreement that the sharp rise in energy consumption over the last five years has been an important factor in producing the fuel shortage. Energy use has grown by nearly 5 per cent over that period while in the years 1947 through 1964 consumption grew by an average of 2¾ per cent a year.
> A new emphasis on clean fuels that will not pollute the air has created heavy demands on natural gas and low level sulphur oil and coal. Supplies of gas are limited. Demand for residual oil has soared, both here and in Europe.

I might point out that the energy produced from the Fundy tides would be completely pollution free. Recently, the United Nations has shown an interest in tidal power as a form of energy because of its pollution free aspect.

The programming board, in effect, said, exactly what the minister said when replying to questions from me and other Maritime members about Fundy Bay power, that the decision would be made on strictly economic grounds. If I felt it were a fact that cheap power could not be produced from the tides, then I would hold that the Fundy tides should not be harnessed at the present time. But I point out to you, Sir, that most of the experts disagree with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his officials. They say that the Fundy tides should be harnessed at the earliest possible date. They base their case on the ever-increasing cost of competing fuels. They say that everything is increasing in price, and that there is no reason to expect that power will not increase in price. They say that the sooner we undertake to build the dams to harness the tides the better chance we will have of producing power economically.

Mr. F. L. Lawton, the former director of the study group which produced the programming board report, later made certain statements which were referred to in an editorial in the Daily Gleaner, May 26, 1970. I quote from it as follows:

> Mr. F. L. Lawton, former study director of the tidal power programming board, in a speech yesterday kept to the interest rates theme. Interest rates would have to drop to about half their current value, he told the conference, to make power economically attractive in the Bay of Fundy. But, he said, despite the findings of the board, "there are a number of other influences affecting the economic viability of a tidal power scheme, all tending to operate in favour of tidal power. These are changes in fuel costs for alternative power sources, and technological changes influencing capital cost comparisons."

Even the man who produced the report in 1969 which concluded that it was not economically feasible to move forward with the harnessing of the Bay of Fundy tides, in 1970 indicated a change of heart and said it may not be long before power produced from the tides would be economical. In addition, international experts at a conference on tidal power in Halifax have stated there are alternative methods of harnessing the tides that were not considered by the programming board. In this connection, I would like to quote from The Evening Times-Globe of June 2, 1970, as follows:

Dr. T. J. Gray, Director of the Atlantic Industrial Research Institute of Halifax, said Fundy tidal power development would have to be on a bigger scale than envisaged to be economically feasible.

There would have to be "in the area of 4,000 megawatts with a peak of 8,000 to 10,000 megawatts before it can become saleable,' but even though that would mean a higher construction cost 'this shouldn't scare anyone.' He said the cost of power from nuclear and thermal generating stations in the United States has been spiralling and is still rising. Tidal power costs would be considerably less than present conventional costs in the United States if developed on the required scale.

What the experts are saying is that first there is new technology available that would make the construction of the dams cheaper; second, that the project should be larger and allowed to produce a greater amount of power, and if this were done the cost of power would be reduced. I believe this to be correct, Mr. Chairman: there is a great deal of evidence to indicate that it is correct. I think it is imperative that a review of the programming board's report be undertaken at the earliest possible date.

The minister has come a fair distance. Both he and the Prime Minister initially indicated that they were not willing to review the programming board's report. The minister, after consultation and discussion, has now agreed that a review should take place if the two participating partners with the federal government, the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, request such review. The Premier of New Brunswick has indicated such an interest. The Premier of Nova Scotia, for reasons best known to himself, as I said earlier, has not been willing to make that request.

I believe we have now reached the point where it is in the public interest for such a review to be initiated by the minister, whether the Premier of Nova Scotia makes such a request or not—because I believe that the harnessing of these tides will bring tremendous benefits and will be of tremendous future value not just to the maritime provinces but to the whole of Canada. That project would produce great amounts of energy and in addition the federal government could export and sell surplus power that would be produced from the tides. Such a review must be undertaken soon, because the longer we wait before making it, the more it will become obvious that the report, prepared at a cost of $2.25 million two years ago, will be useless. In other words, the investment of $2.25 million is not being protected because we are not going to have the review.

I would now like to approach this matter from a slightly different point of view. I quote from an article by Harold Shea that appeared in the December 11, 1970, edition of the Chronicle-Herald:

Why hasn't Canada taken the plunge into the Bay of Fundy tidal power project?

High capital costs? High interest charges?

That's the reason Ottawa gives for its steadfast refusal to fund the Fundy.

But the argument no longer holds water because:

1—The critical energy in the United States, and the end of that country's era of cheap power and cheap fuels, hand Canada a gold-platter invitation to cash in on a premium price market for much of the energy the project could generate.

2—By selling surplus power to the eastern United States, Canada could realize a return sufficient to underwrite much of the capital cost.

3—And interest rates are declining.

Could it be that there are other reasons for Ottawa's reluctance?

Mr. Shea then points out some of the reasons why he feels that Ottawa is reluctant. I will not quote further from the article. This week I received a reply to a question I directed to the minister about CANDU, the Douglas Point plant which was produced by AECL in arrangement with Ontario Hydro for the production of power by nuclear energy. I have examined the information that was provided. I do not think that I can reach any conclusion other than that for every dollar we are spending we are receiving not more than a 50 cent return. In the explanation that was provided I was informed that we should not expect a dollar back for every dollar invested; this is a prototype plan and because of this fact, other reasons and financial involvement, we cannot expect a 100 per cent return on an investment. I will accept the fact that we should only expect a return of 50 cents on every dollar spent if it can be shown that the investment is of some value to me.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired. The hon. member may continue only with the consent of the committee. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Coates: Mr. Chairman, I will take only a few minutes to finish this argument. I accept the argument that there may be a reason for receiving a 50 per cent return on every dollar invested. However, I cannot imagine any businessman becoming involved in a venture in which he expects to realize only 50 cents on every dollar invested. I can appreciate why Ontario Hydro is involved in this scheme. They cannot lose. They are buying from the Douglas Point plant power at six mills which has cost the Douglas plant at least 12 mills to produce. That is a ridiculous situation if carried to any length.

When in Nova Scotia, the minister pointed the finger of scorn at the leader of this party because he convinced the people of that province that they should become involved in the construction of a heavy water plant. The minister laughs at the people of Nova Scotia. He has the impression that we are a bunch of rubes or hicks because we became involved in something that was new and not technically feasible. Because we got into difficulty, the minister derides the Leader of the Opposition. He says that we acted in a stupid manner. The same minister who made fun of the Leader of the Opposition is responsible for a scheme whereby the people of Canada have invested $90 million in a plant which is producing electricity that is costing the taxpayers of this nation twice as much as it should. If the minister feels he can justify that type of proposition, that is dandy.

The minister has pointed the finger of scorn at the Leader of the Opposition by saying that at the heavy water plant a plaque should be erected which reads "Bob Stanfield slept here". I say that a plaque should be put on the Douglas Point plant which reads "Joe Greene slept here, and every day he sleeps here it costs 50 cents for every dollar's worth of fuel that is produced".

Mr. Greene: That hurts!

Mr. Coates: The point is not whether we run into problems with new technology when trying to produce energy; it is that the tides going in and out of the Bay of Fundy can be used to produce energy. The experts say that it can now be produced at a saleable price and in amounts that are almost unbelievable. There is no source in Canada that can produce the kind of power which the tides in the Bay of Fundy can produce. We have invested $2.25 million to determine whether dams can be built to harness the tides. The engineering and economic experts say they can be built. The President of the Treasury Board agrees that this power can be produced, but says it will cost too much. There are a great many experts who are knowledgeable in the field.

Mr. Greene: Who?

Mr. Coates: Who said "Who?"

An hon. Member: The minister.

Mr. Coates: I can send the minister an article from the Evening Times which quotes the experts. It is a sad situation when the minister does not know who these experts are. It should not be up to me to supply the minister with this information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Coates: If the minister were really concerned about the Atlantic provinces, he would consider undertaking this project which is as big as anything ever imagined in this country. Instead of asking me "Who?" the minister should know the name of every expert. His interjection demonstrates the interest he has in the Atlantic procinces. It is obvious that the minister is saying "My mandarins tell me that it cannot be done".

Mr. Greene: Yours too?

Mr. Coates: Not mine.

Mr. Greene: Nova Scotians.

Mr. Coates: If the Nova Scotia mandarins are saying this to the minister, why are the same mandarins, including the Premier of Nova Scotia, talking to the Rothschilds, the public utilities in the New England states and others? They are doing so because they know there are these markets. They are talking to the Rothschilds because they know that the money can be produced. The federal government has a very real interest in this matter. If the power can be produced, we should produce it. If we produce it, we shall be able to sell it. The longer we delay producing it, the longer it will be before we can sell it, because it will take at least ten years to build the dams to harness the tides.

• (3:20 p.m.)

The President of the Treasury Board is laughing to himself. I can understand his laughing, because this matter concerns the Atlantic provinces. He comes from Montreal and he does not give a damn what happens in the Atlantic provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Coates: If the President of the Treasury Board is really interested in protecting the taxpayers' dollar, I would remind him that he has a $2.25 million investment in the report of the programming board. If he is really interested in protecting that investment, he will see that the report is brought up to date so that it can be utilized and work can go forward as quickly as the economic evidence deems advisable. The report is no good today because it is outdated. It is the minister's duty to see that this deficiency is rectified.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with interest to the debate on part II of the reorganization bill, the part which deals with the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. I listened with particular interest to the preceding speaker's views on the subject of generating power from the tides of the Bay of Fundy.

Earlier we heard a speech by the leader of my party, in the course of which he asked a number of interesting questions about government policy. I am sure we are all anxiously waiting to hear from the minister just what the plans of the government are. If there was ever a mixed-up program it is in the field of energy policy. The minister has time and time again made trips to the United States as well as to various parts of Canada, and on every occasion he has adopted a different approach to the question of how Canada's energy resources are to be used.

An hon. Member: He is flexible.

Mr. Harding: I'll say he is flexible! We might have another word for it. It is high time the Canadian people knew where the government is going as far as the overall development of our energy resources is concerned.

There is one question I should like to deal with in the limited time at my disposal this afternoon, namely, a national energy grid. The subject has already been touched upon by one or two speakers, but it seems to me it is one of the major fields which the government and the minister responsible have been neglecting.

I have in mind a grid which would cover Canada from the east to the west. This makes sense. We have been talking about the development of such a grid for years and we have every right to ask what is holding up this project, what the government is doing or what the minister and his department are doing to ensure that such a grid is set up.

We have just heard an interesting speech about the power which could be produced from the Fundy tides. The best way to use that power would be to tie it in to a national grid. As all hon. members know, across Canada there are a number of different time zones. They also know that when hydroelectric power is produced, there must be sufficient power to meet peak demands. This is why a national grid is a necessity. As peak times differ, loads could be switched from one region to another. We could save ourselves hundreds of millions of dollars in energy costs if we had the foresight to set up a national grid and pass reserve power from area to area as requirements change. Yet here we sit, in 1971, while the department does practically nothing along this line.

What is happening, Mr. Chairman? I will tell you. A north-south flow of power is developing. We are selling it over the line. Take natural gas, for example. Natural gas is one of the best energy sources we have, and it is one of the cleanest. We are fighting pollution. Instead of selling as much natural gas, as we do, south of the line, why should we not use it from one end of Canada to the other to produce clean electricity? This would help solve our pollution problem while at the same time using Canadian resources in our own country. The government's lack of policy in this direction is discouraging to those who have been trying for many years to move its thinking in this direction.

We have solved the technical difficulties attached to transmitting electric power over long distances. Other countries have done so. It can be transmitted from east to west and west to east.

An hon. Member: Really?

Mr. Harding: Yes. It is late because the north-south transmission of energy is taking place. It is late because governments such as the Liberal government which has been with us for years have not realized the immensity of the benefit which would accrue to Canada if more emphasis were placed on use within our own nation, and less on the export of natural resources, including energy resources in particular. I understand studies have been made on the basis of which an east-west grid is feasible. We have all heard stories about a mid-Canada corridor. Then again, hon. members say we ought to do something to arrest the population drift to the cities. They argue that the population should be spread out more evenly. It is predicted that within a few years 80 per cent of the population of Canada will be residing in the urban areas. Here is a chance to distribute industry and population and to develop other sections of this country. To achieve this end, of course, power and an east-west grid are essential. The lack of activity along these lines is detrimental to the nation generally. The previous speaker said that the Fundy power project is feasible. Some time ago it was estimated that if this project were in operation, $100 million would be saved on the importation of coal from the United States. Incidentally, there would be less pollution. These are matters which the minister should take into consideration. It is well known that the most expensive power in the world is peak power, so if the load could be spread the cost would decrease. I sometimes wonder whether this aspect has been sufficiently surveyed. A great deal can be done to cut down pollution caused by energy resources, and to solve the problem of regions of low employment, and so on.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Another problem which I would like to deal with briefly, Mr. Chairman, is the projected pipeline from Alaska through northern Canada. Numerous questions have been asked about the amount of research being carried on in the north. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development have stated in this House that a great deal of research is being carried out. However, details have not been forthcoming. I am aware that some oil companies and some government departments have initiated research, but I doubt if much of it relates to the effect of oil spills upon fish and wildlife. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry made an amazing statement in Victoria the other day at a convention of the Liberal party. He said, "I am 90 per cent sure that the building of a trans-Canada corridor can begin by 1972." From the information we have it is clear that it will take three or four years to gather sufficient knowledge to determine whether such a pipeline would be safe.

I ask the minister, what projects are afoot in the north to deal with the flora and fauna, who is doing them, who is in charge, where are they taking place? Surely the minister could give us this information right now or when he speaks in the debate. I assure him that if we do not get the answers we will keep after him until we do. I am of the opinion that a number of these projects have been agreed upon but that there is practically no research taking place. Yet the stories coming from the minister and the government generally are that we have almost enough information now to make the decision on whether the pipeline shall go forward.

Mr. Pepin: The minister has said the opposite.

Mr. Harding: We must think of all the factors before committing ourselves to any type of pipeline. It would be a disaster to find out that it would destroy the northern ecology. Blunders can be made, so we must endeavour to ensure that we proceed from the firm and sound basis of research. Mr. Chairman, I should like the minister to tell us what research is being done on the movement of caribou in the north. This question affects the entire Indian and Eskimo populations. Who is in charge of this? Who is doing it? How long has it been under way? How many men are in the field? I must speak out, Mr. Chairman, and emphasize that the native peoples in the northern part of Canada have every right to make certain that this Parliament protects their right to earn a livelihood in the part of the country in which they have lived for generations. We must not forget this fact. Has the minister any plans if it is found that there will be caused tremendous disturbance and upset for the people concerned?

We know that economic development is now going on in the north, without any land use regulations. It is hard to imagine a government carrying on economic development that could destroy the ecology, without laying down strict regulations. Land use regulations have not been brought in by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and no one knows the type of land use regulations that will be introduced in respect of gas and oil exploitation in the north. I say that this is a disgraceful situation.

We are told that when the regulations are brought in they will cover only about 5 per cent of the main mining areas, and the remainder will be open. If this is so, I tell the minister that it will be one of the most stupid steps the government could take. Every bit of oil drilling and gas exploration which is going on in the north should be under strict government regulation. It is our duty to protect the whole of Canada. It is our duty to protect the natural environment in which our northern inhabitants live.

We are not saying exploration in the north should be stopped, but we are saying that this government should produce the regulations so we can see where we are going, what the government intends to do and how much freedom exploiters of our natural resources will have when they start to dig for the natural resources which rightfully belong to the Canadian people. Over the years we have experienced enough government delay, delay and delay until it is too late. We have had an example of this in the southern part of Canada, where our lakes are polluted and where in many areas we have made a sewer out of the air until it is not fit to breathe.

We say it is time that the north, which is relatively unpolluted, was protected. It is said that one learns by experience and what has happened in the past. I suggest it is time now, in 1971, that we realized this and made sure that when we move in these new areas pollution does not occur over and over again.

The Chairman: Order, please. I apologize to the hon. member, but I must interrupt to advise him that his time has expired. The hon. member indicates he would like to continue. He may do so only if there is unanimous consent. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Harding: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I shall take only another 30 seconds or so. There is one more question I wish to pose to the minister. Last week the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry suggested that the new Department of the Environment should have the power of veto in respect of environmental problems in the north. I ask the minister whether he agrees with this and whether he would support a move to have this power written into the legislation covering the new Department of the Environment or into another appropriate statute.

Mr. Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Chairman, I rise to say a few words about a great natural resource of Canada which has been touched upon this afternoon but has not been mentioned specifically. When one flies over this great country of ours one is struck by the great potential of our water resources in the form of lakes and rivers, some of which are unpolluted and many of which are polluted. I wish to speak about both.

We must ask ourselves how we can derive the best use of this great natural resource. Today people talk about selling it to the United States. They say we have more water than we can use in the forseeable future, and that therefore we should sell it. In this sense there are many questions one might raise. First, I think we should take a hard look at the present and future needs of Canadians. It would be simple to establish a system of canals and waterways in order to get the water to the United States. In other words, we could turn on the tap—but once the tap has been opened, the question is how to shut it off if we should wish to do so.

From an agricultural point of view, I think we should remember that one of the prime uses to which the water would be put in the United States is in the irrigation of farmland in arid areas of the United States midwest, where crops could then be produced which would be competitive with those of western Canada and, indeed, of all parts of Canada. So let us be very careful before we enter into agreements to sell our water to the great nation to our south.

I shall now come closer to the area I represent, namely, the Great Lakes area. There we have a great water system which bears the commerce of the world into the heartland of North America. Along it has been developed, at ever-increasing speed, a great industrial corridor which many people have referred to as the Ruhr of North America. This resource will continue to be used for that purpose whether or not it is polluted, unless the water becomes so thick that ships cannot pass through it.

This great waterway of central Canada is also an important source of supply to the municipalities which have grown up along it. The purity of the water is most important in this regard. Obviously, if the water is polluted, the municipalities and industrial plants can become involved in very great expense in respect of purification. There are many industrial plants along the shoreline of the Great Lakes. One example is the hydro-generating plant at Nanticoke, which will be one of the largest in Ontario when completed. Water will be taken from Lake Erie for this plant not only for the generation of steam but also to be used as a coolant. The water will be discharged into the lake again at a temperature several degrees higher than that at which it was taken in, and some ecologist who have studied the lake say this will have a detrimental effect on fish and plant life in Lake Erie. So we must be careful that this water is used wisely and well.

The Great Lakes system provides an opportunity for the harvesting of a great many fish. I do not believe anyone is now unaware of the fact that the pollution problem in the Great Lakes system has dealt a severe economic blow to the people who try to derive a livelihood from fishing, particularly in Lake Erie and Lake St. Clair, and in fact in all the Great Lakes. Another point is that the Great Lakes system is being made a carrier of waste. There are those who tell us that some of the rivers flowing into Lake Erie on the south shore are so polluted that the water itself is a fire hazard because of the pollutants from the refineries along the shoreline near Cleveland and Erie. I understand a warning has been issued because of the fire hazard. This seems almost beyond imagination. Therefore, we must make sure we do not make our waterways into merely carriers of waste.

I should like to deal particularly with Lake Erie. It is the shallowest of lakes. It is in danger of becoming the settling basin for the pollution spewed into it from the St. Clair River, chemicals from industries on the Detroit River and the great industrial city of Detroit. From these sources and others there is a great danger of eutrophication in Lake Erie, that is, the enrichment of the lake with nutrients which cause plant growth, the green algae with which we are all so familiar. This is becoming a menace to people who live along the shores of the lake.

Phosphates are major nutrients which contribute to the growth of algae and to the eutrophication of our lakes. The source of phosphates, one of the great culprits, has been detergents which until the last year or two have been largely made from a phosphorus base. Hence, the very wide use of detergents in the discharge of effluents through our sewage systems ultimately causes the pollution of our lakes. This has been cited as one of the great culprits. There are those who will argue with that statement. I think the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his officials through their studies have come to the conclusion that this is the major source of phosphate pollution in our lakes. There are people who have contrary views. I should like to read, for the edification of hon. members, from the scientific paper "Chemistry and Industry," published in London, England, in March of 1970. Part of the article reads as follows:

> Detergent phosphates are only one of the sources of the phosphate content of the effluents causing eutrophication; other sources such as human excreta in sewage, fertilizer and animal manure run off from farmland and natural erosion contribute much larger amounts. Thus it is open to doubt whether a ban on detergent phosphates will in itself lead to a material or indeed to any improvement in the condition of Canada's inland water.

I would ask the minister to pay particular attention to these scientific authorities who have carried out extensive research in this field. Let us not think that our problem is solved just because we ban detergents with a phosphate basis. Human excreta is another major source of pollution. It comes from cities and towns. Many of them spew raw sewage into our rivers and lakes, and many have no treatment facilities whatsoever. We do not have to look very far from here to see a major city which does just that.

Fertilizer from agricultural land runoff has also been charged as one of the culprits in phosphate pollution. Much of the fertilizer contains three major ingredients, nitrogen, phosphorus and potash, but any soil chemist will tell you that phosphate is one of the chemicals which is added to soil as a fertilizer, locks itself into the soil and is least subject to erosion from any of the chemicals applied. So let us not condemn agriculture too strongly when we hunt for the culprit of phosphate pollution.

I have talked about many bad things, but what are some of the remedies? I will suggest three. Let us have a "get tough" policy with industrial polluters. The Ontario government has launched a suit against the Dow Chemical Company for $25 million. Surely it cannot be considered a licence to pollute if they are going to be forced to pay that large amount of money. Let us be tough with our industries. When the Canada Water Act was reviewed, severe penalties were imposed. This was a step in the right direction. Let us not get soft with industry, and let us not be carried away with the economic impact that will result if we make it so tough for industries that they cannot locate in these areas or serve our society.

Another thing the government can do—and this can have many side effects—is direct federal grants to municipalities for the construction of primary and secondary sewage treatment facilities. I remind hon. members that in 1959 the Conservative party in power made a series of such grants to municipalities. I think this is a program worth considering again. As I said, it can have many side effects. The construction industry will have a shot in the arm through such a program, there will be increased employment, and so on.

As I said earlier, the discharge of raw sewage into our lakes and rivers is a major source of pollution. Let us treat it. I would like to see our government take a tougher stand vis-à-vis the United States regarding the sharing of responsibility, on the International Joint Commission. It is all very well to ask, what can a little country like Canada do against the great neighbour to our south? But believe me, we could make enough stink about it, to put it bluntly, that the media would get the message and it would get across to our neighbour. The rank and file of the people in the United States are not happy about this situation either. I think we need a "get tough" policy. Let us not have so many reports from the International Joint Commission, but let us see some action from it.

I would like to conclude on a more optimistic note. I have painted a rather gloomy picture of Lake Erie, which is very close to where I live and which I do not consider to be polluted in any sense. I will close by quoting from a newsletter from the Lake Erie region economic council. They start as follows:

"Lake Erie is so polluted that if anyone falls into it, he doesn't drown, he just decays".

Do you know who said that? Hon. members have heard it before. The Duke of Edinburgh is reported to have said it during an address to the Council of Europe in Strasbourg, France. A high school student said:

I am afraid to swim in Lake Erie because if I swallow some water I might die.

He said this during a conference on our environment. The newsletter goes on to say:

We can perhaps forgive the young enthusiast for the exaggeration. It is more difficult to forgive the inaccurate statement of the Queen's husband and the international attention it provoked.

Believe me, it did provoke international attention and the people on Lake Erie suffered from it in an economic sense, as this quote will illustrate:

Observations such as these, no matter how well meaning, do nothing toward a solution and are harmful in other ways.

Let's consider Lake Erie for a moment.

To say Lake Erie is polluted is just not true.

Sections of it are polluted and the water quality varies with location, time of year, lake levels and weather.

Sweeping generalizations create very detrimental impressions which are hard to overcome.

"Stories and statements about the pollution of Lake Erie are having a very damaging effect upon tourism along the north shore"—

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired. It being four o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the House.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

TRANSPORT

ATLANTIC REGION—REQUEST FOR DECLARATION OF GOVERNMENT POLICY AND ENACTMENT THEREOF

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should immediately declare a transportation policy for the Atlantic region based upon modern solutions to present and future problems and should introduce, in this session, legislation to implement that policy for debate and enactment by Parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I present this motion to the House not just to be repetitious on a subject on which I have made many representations to the government but, rather, in the hope that somehow I may be able to inject some new emphasis into my remarks which would prod this government to action—action to honour its promise of 1966 to bring in legislation which would lead to a comprehensive transportation policy for the Atlantic area.

Why am I so concerned about the transportation problems of the Atlantic provinces? Why have I made so many representations to the minister, in the House, in committee, and in fact anywhere that I could get his ear? Why have I continued to call for action when it seems that all my pleas fall on deaf ears? To understand, one must be aware of the peculiar problems of the Atlantic area; one must be aware of the great important transportation plays in the economic life of Atlantic Canada; one must realize that the development of a region is directly related to its ease of access to resources and to outside markets, that a major impetus for growth comes from the ability of a region to produce goods and services demanded by the national economy and to market them in competition with other regions.

One must also realize that the ability to compete in exports is related to the efficiency with which the region is able to assemble the factors of production. This ability relates not only to adequate physical systems but to a realistic rate structure designed to overcome the handicaps created by geography. This was recognized by the Fathers of Confederation in the discussions that preceded the entrance of the Maritime provinces into the union. It was tangibly expressed by the construction of the Inter-Colonial Railway to enable the people of the Maritime provinces to secure access to the larger markets of the whole Canadian nation. Until 1912 government policy maintained a rate structure below that of the rest of the country, but between 1912 and 1920 steadily increasing freight rates, increases which were greater than those in the rest of Canada, brought on the dissatisfaction that culminated in the appointment of the Duncan commission in 1926.

The Duncan commission recognized that the Inter-Colonial rate structure had to be maintained to enable the area to compete in the markets of the country. But the commission found that successive rate increases had destroyed the historic rate structure and recommended that action be taken to assist shippers and producers in the area. The recommendations of the Duncan commission led to the passage of the Maritime Freight Rates Act in 1927 in a stated attempt to restore the former Inter-Colonial rate structure.

It may appear to some that I have dwelt too long on the background of this problem, but I have done this deliberately because of the tendency of many people to look on assistance granted for transportation in the Maritime area as assistance to the carrier rather than to the movement of products and produce of the region. I again emphasize something that I will refer to later in my remarks: assistance in respect of transportation must not be considered as assistance to the carrier but, rather, as assistance in the movement of products and produce of the region. This is the keystone of my argument. It is a fact which has been too often overlooked by governments and by those who deplore th eamount of money spent on assistance in the region. I also wish to dispel the notion, too commonly put forward, that transportation is not an important factor in economic development.

Although I agree that transportation costs are not the only problem, many businessmen in the area have stated that assistance in their transportation and distribution problems, would mean more to them than the financial incentives which are being provided by various governments or their agencies. The most recent submission has come from Maritime Co-operative Services Limited. This group is very disturbed about the several increases in transportation rates which have caused signicant increases in the costs of manufactured products moved out of the area. They point out that these increased freight rates have great significance for industry in general in the area, because they have eroded and will further erode any possibility of Atlantic industry being either supplied with materials from outside—or shipping manufactured products elsewhere.

Transportation, Mr. Speaker, is indeed an essential element in the economic development of the Atlantic region. I refer to transportation in its broadest sense to include transportation costs as well as the availability of transportation facilities. This principle is recognized in the Maritime Freight Rates Act which established that the Atlantic provinces had special transportation needs, just as the Crowsnest Pass grain rates recognized the special transportation needs of western Canada.

What, then, should be the elements of a rational Atlantic transportation policy? For guidance we can do no better than turn to the report of the four Atlantic Premiers, a report, incidentally, which was endorsed fully by the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications. This report emphasizes that transportation assistance in one form or another has been used throughout Canada as a means of developing the economy of the nation. Special regional transportation assistance has been provided to meet political, social and economic needs of various regions of the country. Such regional assistance has a continuing role to play in the economic development of the Atlantic area. It is admitted that the Maritime Freight Rates Act has not been completely effective because in many cases the assistance provided does not benefit the shippers but is, rather, a subsidy to the railways.

The Maritime Freight Rates Act requires revision. Any revision must be designed not only to assist the economic development of the area but it must also be considered in terms of total economic development. The Atlantic Premiers agreed that modification should be made to the Maritime Freight Rates Act, but on the clear understanding that any such modification would be made only on condition that a federal-provincial agency be set up to administer the operation of the act and to ensure that such assistance would benefit the shipper through special selective assistance to the industry concerned. This assistance would be available for raw materials, semi-finished materials and component parts which industries bring into their plants for further processing. Also, industries could apply for and receive transportation assistance on products shipped to market in the rest of Canada.

The over-all guidelines for such assistance should be the degree to which this assistance would enable a company to expand. The agency would be equipped with a fund to provide assistance, and assurance would be given that any reduction in subsidies would be offset by corresponding assistance to industries and shippers involved. While it was agreed that it would be desirable to phase out the subsidies under the Maritime Freight Rates Act gradually, the amount of assistance so phased out should be replaced by more effective benefits granted to the regional industries involved. Effective competition among the various modes of transportation must be created, and an integral part of the proposals concerned a long-term program for upgrading arterial highways, for improving connections between the island provinces and for lowering the costs of providing rail transportation.

A new air transportation policy should be evolved to permit redistribution of air routes between trunk and regional carriers. Water transportation facilities should be reviewed and improved. In short, the report agreed that a regional transportation policy should encompass all modes of transportation—road, rail, water and air—and should be designed to assist shippers and manufacturers in the area to compete in the Canadian market.

Let us see what has happened since the Atlantic Premiers report was tabled. On June 17, 1969, when introducing the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) referred to the Premiers' report and agreed that it would be desirable immediately to set up an agency of the type requested in the report. This joint committee, as he referred to it, would be asked to consider the recommendations of the Premiers and to make recommendations on these matters to his department. He also pointed out that ARFA was only a temporary measure and that once the joint committee got under way and made recommendations he intended to bring in legislation of a more permanent and extensive nature. That was two years ago. At the same time, the minister gave the following commitment, as recorded at page 10386 of Hansard:

> I am giving the House a commitment that there will be no change in the rates under the MFRA unless the committee so recommends and unless the amount to be spent in some other manner is at least the same as the amount originally provided.

Since that time we have seen the subsidy reduced from 20 per cent to 17½ per cent; and even though the federal-provincial committee recommended that the government should act immediately to draw up special recommendations to provide equivalent assistance, no action has yet been taken. Is it any wonder, then, that the people in the area are afraid that this is the start of a phase-out of subsidies without equivalent assistance being provided? In the two years that have elapsed since the report was tabled we have seen a continuing erosion of the situation as a result of successive freight rate increases which have been imposed by the railways and which have destroyed the position of the Atlantic shipper vis-à-vis the rest of Canada.

The committee has met several times and has made recommendations to the minister. Several times during the present session I, along with other hon. members, have asked the minister about the progress being made on the recommendations of the committee. On December 16, as reported at page 2019 of Hansard, the minister stated that a great many of the recommendations had already been implemented and that others were in the process of being implemented. He went on to say that the committee was still meeting and that as recommendations were made they would be put into effect.

I would point out to the minister that although some of the recommendations have been implemented, for example, the subsidy has been extended to trucks—incidentally, there has not been a decrease in rates that the minister prophesied—the rates on the Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island ferries have been equalized and the subsidy has been reduced to 17.5 per cent, the most vital and basic recommendation has not yet been acted upon. The whole basis of the Premiers' report was that the subsidies should not be altered unless and until equivalent transportation assistance was provided for the shippers.

We on this side of the House are fearful that what we indicated to the minister during the debate on the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act is now beginning to happen; there are indications that subsidies will be reduced and gradually phased out completely without equivalent assistance being provided. I therefore urge the minister to take immediate action to have regulations drawn up to provide special transportation assistance and to carry out what the federal-provincial committee recommended, that additional financing be provided during the first years of the subsidy phase-out.

I suggest that there are several ways in which this could be done. It could be done through supplementary estimates, as in the case of subsidies to the truckers, or the minister could use the balance of the funds which were originally provided to reimburse the railways when the freight rates freeze was imposed. At that time, as the minister knows, approximately $12 million were voted to reimburse the railways for revenue lost because of that freeze. When the freeze was lifted, only about $6 million of this money had been used. So I suggest to the minister that he could use the remaining $6 million as a start to develop some programs of special assistance.

The minister could also call on his colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand), to provide funds and assist shippers to build up the infrastructure he is always talking about; that is to say, he could ask his colleague to assist shippers in their transportation costs as a means of promoting the over-all economic development of the region. I should like the minister to think seriously about those suggestions and to give serious consideration to announcing his program of special assistance as soon as possible.

I had the pleasure, Mr. Speaker, of being with the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications in February, 1969, when it went on its trip to the Atlantic area, and I heard the many fine briefs which were presented at that time. The Maritime Transportation Commission produced figures to show that prohibitive freight rates had destroyed much of our former industry and had discouraged potential industry from setting up in the area. The Maritime Provinces Board of Trade, in their excellent brief emphasized that the kind of special transportation they were asking for was not at all unprecedented in Canada. For example, they pointed out the vast St. Lawrence Seaway which operates at a deficit, the fleet of federal icebreakers being used to keep the St. Lawrence open in winter for shipping, at public expense, and the fact that export rates on western grain had been perpetuated at 1897 levels. We note that this type of assistance has been granted to western Canada, and I submit that the Maritimes are entitled to be treated as well as other areas of Canada.

A key point in this brief was that the Atlantic provinces have as much right under confederation to have economic access to the central Canadian market as French Canada has in its claim for a bilingual and bicultural society. In other words, if the central government is committed to spending many millions, or possibly billions of dollars on language facilities and constitutional changes in an effort to hold Canada together, are not we in the Atlantic provinces entitled to financial assistance to develop our industries and to help us remain in confederation? Does Canada stop at the Quebec-New Brunswick border, or is anyone interested in keeping the Atlantic provinces as part of Canada?

I hope that these remarks will do something to convince the government that we in the Atlantic provinces are not simply seeking federal hand-outs. We seek recognition of the many regional problems which have been created by federal government policies, and we seek action which will correct these problems. In other words, the people of the Atlantic provinces who have the basic rights defined in the Maritime Provinces Board of Trade brief are at long last demanding simple justice.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy LeBlanc (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for this opportunity to express my opinion on the matter now before the House.

May I commend the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) for introducing this motion which is of particular interest to me, as member for Rimouski, inasmuch as the region of the lower St. Lawrence, including the Gaspé peninsula, has much in common with the Atlantic provinces.

• (4:20 p.m.)

The mover is asking the government to declare a transportation policy for the Atlantic region based upon modern solutions to present and future problems. He also states that the government should:

—introduce, in this session, legislation to implement that policy.

Although I agree with what the mover said, I understand that in the Maritimes, the question of the improvement of the transportation system by road, rail, sea and air must receive special attention from both the federal and provincial governments.

We have the same problem at home in the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspé area where we try, by making all the representations possible at all levels, to get the provincial government, with the help of the federal government, through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, to build once and for all a modern road around the Gaspé peninsula which would enable people not only to travel our region, but also to communicate easily with central Canada.

However, I think it would be good to remind hon. members that in the area of concern to the hon. member for Moncton, this government has already done quite a lot so far and we trust it will pursue this activity. I will mention the history of transportation in the Maritime provinces, that is the national transportation policy, and more specifically the Atlantic transportation policy. There is no need to go back very far. One merely has to remember that in 1967 the federal Minister of Transport had asked the premiers of the four Maritime provinces to express their views concerning transportation in their respective provinces and to bring these views to the attention of the federal government.

In my opinion, this, to start with, is at least evidence of the good intentions of the federal government and I appreciate this method since this government is giving not only the premiers but also the taxpayers of the Maritimes provinces through their premiers, the opportunity to state readily and with authority what they actually want.

In 1969, the premiers submitted a joint report and that very same year the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act was passed by Parliament.

The act included several principles brought forward by the Atlantic region's first ministers. That is why a federal-provincial commission to deal exclusively with Atlantic region transportation was implemented.

The commission has since remained active, carrying out the responsibilities conferred upon it and the Maritime Freight Rates Act, based on its recommendations, produced good results by way of rail transportation subsidies, later extended to road transportation.

An over-all look at national transportation policy inevitably brings to mind the 1967 National Transportation Act which, as I understand it, is based on the principle that to the extent possible transportation organizations in Canada should be able to avail themselves of certain rates in order to finance their operations.

This policy is, so to speak, meant to be an incentive for transportation companies to meet public demand, not only for quantity but also for quality of transportation in the areas involved. In this way, it is to be hoped that those organizations will be able to ensure in the long run the best health possible, if I may use the word, to our national transportation system.

As for a transport policy for the Atlantic region, it is obvious that there must be very close links between the national and regional policies.

The latter can only be an extension of the former and must be based on the same principles, but only when and where the national policy is applicable, bearing in mind regional conditions.

In the report they submitted in 1969, the premiers of the Atlantic provinces stated that they supported a general national policy but that, on the other hand—as the hon. member for Moncton said a moment ago, and I agree with him—in the Atlantic provinces, because of a general lack of facilities and material and owing to light traffic and great distances between towns, it was difficult to fully apply the economic principle outlined in the National Transportation Act. The member for Moncton agrees with the premiers when he discusses a transport policy based on modern solutions to present and future problems.

The goal seems to be to modify the national transportation policy for the Atlantic region so that transportation would serve as an instrument for stimulating economic growth in our areas. According to certain statistics that I will not quote, economists may say that the Atlantic provinces, as a region, are not neglected and this is generally true if we consider current federal spending in respect of transportation particularly. The Fifth Annual Review of the Economic Council of Canada indicated that the four Atlantic provinces received more per capita in 1964-65, in respect of federal spending on transportation, than any other economic region of Canada.

It seems that the Atlantic region has somewhat more transportation facilities than would be justified by the importance of the market, if we take into account the general principle spelled out in the National Transportation Act. In spite of that, this region has so far failed to obviate this handicap, when we consider the enormous distances which separate it from central Canada markets. It prevented it from developing its economy as much as it wanted to. Finally, some regional analysts proclaim that it was instrumental in the national economic integration, at the expense of the more industrialized regions of central Canada.

We agree that transportation must play an important part in the development of the Maritimes. But even if it is very important, it is not the only instrument in the necessary infrastructure for the development of these areas. It must be part of an overall program of development. Indeed, for the past few years, the citizens of these areas have prepared development programs.

This system must be fully integrated in a comprehensive plan. But if we conceive the transportation policy as separate from the national policy, this could have disadvantages.

Thus, I think that in considering what the government has done so far, as well as the economic general principle on which the national transportation policy is based, considering what has been done up to now with regard to the transportation policy in the Maritimes, we think that we should continue to ask the federal government and other governments to modernize increasingly the means of transportation in the Maritimes consistently with the development in other fields. However, we must always avoid what we often call "balkanization". It is good to think in regional terms but we must also do so in Canadian terms and draw up plans for the general progress and development of our country.

However, I am pleased to have heard the hon. member for Moncton who is greatly interested in transportation in his area and as for myself, as a member for a neighbouring area adjacent to the Maritime provinces, I congratulate him for having expressed his views and those of the citizens of my area. I remind the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) that the Lower St. Lawrence area and the Gaspé peninsula have approximately the same problems as the Maritime provinces. Those problems should not be left to experts who, despite their high qualifications, live far from us. It would be preferable to listen to our people who have their own way of expressing themselves and who know what they want as far as transportation is concerned.

• (4:30 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I take pleasure in speaking in this debate on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas). I shall be brief. I know the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) wishes to speak, and I thank him for yielding the floor to me because I have to leave soon.

The hon. member's motion is a positive one. He talks about a comprehensive policy for transportation in the Atlantic provinces. He talks about modern solutions to present and future problems, and he proposes that the government should introduce legislation this session to implement an Atlantic transportation policy. It is not very clear to me whether he is suggesting there should be a study of Atlantic transportation separate from any studies of a national transportation policy. Like the hon. member and others in his party, I want transportation policies in this country which will benefit the Maritimes, because I believe that if Canada is to remain a federal state, if it is to remain one country, certain regional considerations must be borne in mind.

For example, the Maritime Freight Rates Act seems to be a constitutional concession to the Maritimes. I think it is evident that Parliament has in the past accorded preferential treatment to the Maritimes in the field of transportation. This had to be the case. While a national transportation policy might be good from a national point of view, and while the philosophy of encouraging competition might be a good way of ensuring an efficient transportation system over a large area, it could be most detrimental to regional effort and to the Atlantic provinces in particular.

The hon. member for Moncton complained that his representations were falling on deaf ears. I do not think they are. Some action has been taken both by this government and by former governments to assist transportation in the Maritimes in different ways. After all, transportation does not consist only of rail freight and passenger services. It involves an infrastructure. In my constituency, in my part of New Brunswick, I would say that priority in transportation centres on the building of roads; I would place this before improvements in passenger services by air or by plane or the lowering of freight rates. Unless we can travel over good, all-weather highways our region cannot compete with other parts of Canada nor, for that matter, with other parts of the Maritimes. We have to consider government action in this light and not only as it affects freight rates.

On the subject of freight rates, I too at times deplore increases in those rates. I would like everything to go down.

An hon. Member: What about indemnities?

Mr. Breau: I did not hear that remark, but since it came from a west coast member I will not listen to it.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Breau: I am thinking only in terms of Atlantic transportation policy. If there are freight rate increases, it does not mean that the government does not wish to help the Maritimes in the transportation field. We have seen actions by this government in the last few years which have been of help to the Maritimes; for example, the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act which provided assistance to truckers within the select territory and leaving this area. While this action may not have reduced freight rates or trucking rates, it is a fact that now some goods may be transmitted more cheaply by truck; trucks are now in a position to compete more favourably, on a selective basis, in the transportation of goods provided a certain volume is available or if other stipulations are met. The fact that trucking rates have not risen leaves me with the impression that increases may have been averted, because it has been a traditional pattern in the Maritimes for trucking rates to increase soon after railway freight rates are increased.

I do not have the figures before me to prove this contention, but I believe the Atlantic provinces have received more assistance per capita from the federal government toward the establishment of transportation infrastructure than any other region of Canada. I would cite the fifth annual report of the Economic Council which indicates that the four Atlantic provinces received a larger per capita share of federal transportation expenditures since 1964-65 than any other region. So there has been some action.

What has happened is that a lot of the investment in infrastructure through the Atlantic Region Freight Assistance Act, and so on has not necessarily helped only the Atlantic provinces. There is a great deal of travel and migration from the Atlantic provinces to Toronto and Montreal. It may be cheaper now to bring products to Montreal, but it has also increased the incentive for Montreal companies to sell products in the Maritimes. Investors from the west coast can now come to the Atlantic provinces and compete at every level. Whilst this helps us, it also has the effect of giving a boost to anyone in central Canada who wants to go to the Maritimes to sell, manufacture or take over businesses there.

We have not been hit as hard by the CNR in the reduction of passenger train services. The Atlantic region receives a $1 million subsidy for air service, although I think this includes Labrador. This subsidy is given to Quebec Air and EPA to help promote their routes. Parliament has taken this action through the CTC to help transportation in the Atlantic provinces. The hon. member for Moncton mentioned the phasing out of subsidies; he says he does not want hand-outs. Nor do I. But I want subsidies to help us obtain business and find new markets, though I do not want them to remain forever.

I am a Canadian and I do not want to see the MFRA and ARFA go on forever. I hope they can be phased out. But we have to be careful not to reduce them at the wrong time. We cannot have it both ways, saying we don't want handouts and we don't want subsidies to be phased out. Let's not fool ourselves, though—we cannot expect the national treasury to subsidize the Maritimes forever. I appreciate the efforts of this and former governments in regional development, be they with respect to infrastructure or job creation, but I hope the Maritimes will not always require this type of assistance. The new premier of Nova Scotia seems to think that in the near future the province will not be receiving equalization grants. I think this is a good sign. I hope to see the day when my province will not need equalization payments, MFRA or ARFA, because we will be self-sustaining and competitive.

I thank the hon. member for Moncton and congratulate him for raising this question. I know the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East wishes to speak on the motion. I think it is a good motion and is consistent with what this government has been trying to do. It is good to use modern approaches, but we must recognize the problems. As I said, we cannot have it both ways. When we look for assistance for the Maritimes, we must make sure that it does not help central Canada to exploit us more. It must be selective and it must help maritime investors develop the area.

I am sure we will have contributions from west coast members from both sides of the House. I think my remark of a short while ago may have been taken the wrong way. It was not intended to give the impression that I do not like to hear their views; I am always ready to listen to their advice.

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, if I had the art of talking with tongue in cheek I would say that I was astonished that the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) felt it necessary to put this notice of motion on the order paper, calling for the establishment of a transportation policy for the Atlantic region. I recall very well how that knight in shining armour from the Atlantic region, the former member for Bonavista-Twillingate—at that time Minister of Transport—with great verve brought into this House a new national transportation act. We were to have a brave new world of transportation in Canada. It was to bring to an end all the problems of transportation that had beset us since confederation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): With him as president!

Mr. Barnett: The strange part is, Mr. Speaker, that since his departure from this chamber we seem to have heard less and less about this brave new world and the millenium. In fact, I find myself wondering whether he wore himself out in his rhetorical efforts when piloting the bill through, with its flowery preamble, so that when he got into the ivory tower of the Canadian Transport Commission he had to spend his time recovering.

Be that as it may, Mr. Speaker, I rise to indicate support and sympathy for the sentiments expressed in the motion and by members from that part of the country who have supported it in this House. However, I think it would have been even more appropriate if the mover of the motion had left out the phrase "for the Atlantic region" and suggested that the government should immediately declare a transportation policy based upon modern solutions. This would put us back where we were when the former Minister of Transport moved second reading of the new transportation act and we could once again engage in a vigorous and, at times, inspiring debate such as we had then.

I am not saying this because I am unaware of the transportation problem. As far as British Columbia is concerned, I sometimes think that the national transportation policy for that province began and ended 100 years ago when we entered confederation on the basis of the railway being built to the Pacific coast. Since then we have been as much on the fringe of things as the Atlantic region. I might say there is in this regard a particular point to be made by a member representing a constituency on Vancouver Island. Unfortunately, we jumped rather prematurely at a proposition which seemed enticing to the people of the area at the time. I understand the same question is now under some consideration in the Atlantic provinces. I refer to the formation of a union. I have often thought what a difference there might have been in federal action in respect of transportation had the Crown colony of Vancouver Island not joined the Crown colony of British Columbia prior to 1871, when we joined the rest of the union that is now called Canada.

When I said the original commitment related to ownership more or less, the fact is that the commitment which was understood at the time to involve the building of a railway line to Esquimalt at the southern end of Vancouver Island is one which has not yet been fulfilled. That, of course, is an area of debate which comes up from time to time in the part of Canada from which I come. It is also one which is illustrative of the fact that to many of us, whether we come from the Atlantic coast or the Pacific coast, much still needs to be done before we will be satisfied that we have what the motion refers to as a transportation policy based on modern solutions. Mr. Speaker, with those few comments I will yield the floor to any hon. member who may wish to comment on the resolution.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall).

Mr. Mahoney: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall) very courteously yielded the floor to the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) who has a local interest in this motion and had to catch a train. Therefore, I wonder whether Your Honour might be induced not to see the clock until after five o'clock in order to give the hon. member a decent opportunity to make his remarks.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I am overwhelmed by the generosity of the House, but I do not think I shall keep hon. gentlemen very long after five o'clock. In discussing the motion of the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas) I should like to touch briefly on the question of Canada's regional air policy. I am tempted at times to refer to it as the "appearance" of a regional air policy, but that is not really true. It is a policy which is constantly under review, but unfortunately is one which has not been presented to us in this chamber or in committee for an extended period of review and examination.

This afternoon we have heard quite a bit about the difficulties of regional transportation. The difficulty in the Maritime provinces, of course, is that we do not have the marketing centre that is required in order for industries to be established and by means of which they may survive. No matter what is done, this will always be a fact until we have within our region a centre comprising 500,000 or 600,000 people. Until that day comes, the proposition put forward by certain hon. members will not be possible of achievement. We all agree that at some point subsidies, and so on, should come to an end. But I suggest this is not something which can be determined by the degree to which we are aware of the need to bring these policies to an end. There are physical matters involved which have to do with our ability to market and sell our produce.

In respect of air transportation there was completed recently in the Maritimes a fairly extensive document entitled "Atlantic Provinces Air Transportation Study." This study has to do with the future of airport facilities, transportation by air, and so on, in our region. In the past 18 months or so there has been a very definite change in the approach to air transportation problems by the national carrier, Air Canada. We have seen an attempt to get on with the job of integrating into their system the principal regional carrier in the Atlantic provinces, Eastern Provincial Airways. We have seen the tendency to reduce Air Canada establishments at some of the smaller airports in Newfoundland, in Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick.

In the Atlantic provinces—I wish I had time to properly develop this theme because it is very important—there is a fear on the part of both personal and commercial users of aircraft that within the next two or three years Air Canada will end up with only two centres in the Atlantic provinces, one at St. John's, Newfoundland, and one in Halifax, with the next point in the national transportation system being where I suppose the system really begins, Montreal. This is the question I would develop if I had a few more minutes. I would have liked to express the fears about the problems created when Air Canada withdrew from centres such as Gander, Stephensville, Moncton, Saint John and Fredericton in the frequency, level of service, and so on.

Mr. Bell: They will run it into the ground first.

Mr. Forrestall: This is partly what I am afraid of. I am afraid that until we have in front of us a concrete proposal from the Department of Transport in respect of the intentions of the government and its guidelines for phasing out the national carriers' responsibilities in respect of what might be called feeder centres, we will face a very serious difficulty in the Atlantic provinces. We need those policies before this elected body so that they might be viewed from the point of view of what I consider to be the true purpose of the national carrier, that is, that it should exist where we want it to exist and not necessarily where it is economically feasible.

In considering the motion before us this afternoon, I hope the minister will demonstrate a sense of urgency in respect of the problem that faces users of the national air carrier, not only in the Atlantic region but in other regions of Canada where there is a very clear indication that the national carrier intends to get out of the shorter routes and into the longer routes. There is the question of whether we will have a modern and efficient system such as we have had from Air Canada, when we are served by the feeder lines which will take their place. If we continue this policy much longer, I am afraid that the confusion, the fear and the downgrading of service will result in an undesirable situation with respect to air traffic in the Atlantic provinces.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your indulgence in letting me continue for a minute or two beyond the time of adjournment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hour provided for private members' business has now expired. It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday next at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

I thank all hon. members who took part in this Friday's debate for their co-operation with the Chair. I wish all hon. members a pleasant weekend. My "thought for today" is that we are fortunate indeed and should thank the Lord that we are alive to share once more nature's transformation. I wish you energy and blessings in the new season.

At 5.05 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

COMMUNICATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN CANADIAN OVERSEAS TELECOMMUNICATION CORPORATION AND BRITISH POST OFFICE ON CONSTRUCTION OF NEW TRANSATLANTIC CABLE

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to announce to the House the conclusion of an agreement between officials of the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation and Post Office authorities in the United Kingdom to build a new high capacity transatlantic cable.

The decision to build a new cable, CANTAT-2, is based on projections of a 20 per cent per annum growth in the market for transatlantic circuits during the next 15 years. This is expected to bring the Canadian demand to a level around 4,600 circuits by 1985. A dynamic element in this pattern of growth has been the increase in direct dialing between countries on both sides of the Atlantic.

This bilateral project in which the Canadian investment will be of the order of $37 million will provide 1,840 new telephone circuits on the North Atlantic route between Canada, Britain and Europe. As an indication of the size of this project it should be noted that CANTAT-2 will have 400 more circuits than all existing transatlantic cables, whether they originate in this country or in the United States. Cost of the project will be shared equally by COTC and the British Post Office.

The new high-capacity cable which will link Canada, through a point in Nova Scotia, to Europe at a point in Cornwall is expected to be ready for service early in 1974. This new facility will be added to existing satellite and cable circuits used by COTC to provide reliable and economical telecommunications between Canada and Europe. This project, which has involved months of negotiations between COTC, officials of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Department of Communications, and their British counterparts, involves several significant advantages for Canada.

Among these numerous advantages are the following. This arrangement provides an alternate commercial route to the transatlantic circuits provided by Intelsat, the international consortium in which COTC is also a shareholder. It provides technological diversity which means greater security for our transatlantic communications links. It provides a system that is compatible with the domestic communications system to be operated by Telesat Canada. It assures that Canadian systems will continue to serve as the main route for transpacific Commonwealth traffic. The new cable, therefore, will provide Canadians with more flexibility and reliability in their telecommunications links with Europe.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I regret the absence of my hon. friend and colleague, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), though it gives me satisfaction to comment upon a statement from the Minister of Communications (Mr. Kierans) which bears some of the imprint and impact of being good news. His statement deals with one of the few areas of his extended domain which generally has been successfully operated, namely, the Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, and to that extent I am very pleased with this new development.

I was interested in a general way to note that the agreement was not made available to us, and obviously this statement is a very general and superficial, and perhaps generous, appraisal of the agreement. One is impressed by the fact that we need more cables, and one is reminded that we have not so completely moved into the era of the satellite as was sometimes predicted in the excitement of a few years ago.

I look forward to receiving further details of this important project. If it allows us to maintain closer contact with other parts of the world in this advancing age of technology, it is something which we welcome. I should like to say that generally I have confidence in the capacity of the COTC to represent Canadian interests in this regard.

I notice that it is intended to integrate, as it must be, this system of cable with the Telesat operation. This is a very important and very costly project which it seems will be much later getting into operation, and at much greater cost, than the minister used to predict. Nevertheless we do feel some satisfaction from the fact that a definite step has been taken in this way to improve our contact with other parts of the world.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, we in the New Democratic Party welcome the minister's statement on the agreement reached between the United Kingdom and Canada to build a new transatlantic telecommunications cable. I can only echo the words of the previous speaker in saying that rapid communications are vital for our country in the modern world if we are to provide for the kind of growth that we anticipate will be essential. From this point of view we are pleased with the announcement.

We are also very pleased to see that this vital link between Canada and Europe is to be handled by public companies largely the COTC in Canada and the Post Office in Britain. We are pleased that the government has not seen fit to shuffle part of the responsibility for this on to the private carriers; this is in contrast to what has happened in the case of Telesat.

I think it is important to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is vital in this modern world for us to have available a variety of modern communications media in order to provide for alternatives and for better security and flexibility. Canada's ability to be in charge of the messages sent from this country is something we should guard very carefully.

I notice that this cable is to be integrated with Telesat as part of the modern communications system outlined by the minister over the past few years. If I may here make an oblique reference to Telesat, it is important for us to be able to communicate around the world and with the northern part of our country. But even more important than the fact that we are able to communicate is what we communicate. Our efforts to bring television to the north I hope will result in something better than the dreary, foreign imported pop culture that we get on television networks to the south. I hope that the agreement just concluded will reach fruition by 1974. That is the statement I wish to present on behalf of this party.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, we hope that the construction of this new cable will bring to Canada the benefits anticipated by the minister.

WAR MEASURES ACT—ARREST OF FORMER MEMBERS OF CYC

Question No. 369—Mr. Coates:

Were any of the individuals arrested under the War Measures Act formerly members of the Company of Young Canadians and, if so (a) what are the names of these individuals (b) for what period of time were they members of the Company of Young Canadians (c) have they been released since their arrest or are they still being held and, if so (i) what are the names of the individuals being held (ii) have any charges been laid against them and, if so, what are the charges in each instance?

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Department of the Solicitor General and the Company of Young Canadians advise as follows: Yes, nine individuals were arrested under the War Measures Act, as of November 5, 1970. (a) It is not in the public interest to release the names of those persons arrested and then released, without being charged under the War Measures Act. (b) It is not in the public interest to divulge such information since it would provide the names of persons arrested and then released (c) Eight were released. (i) Jacques Larue-Langlois. Mr. Larue-Langlois was a member of the Company of Young Canadians from May 22, 1969 to August 22, 1969. (ii) Section 4(a) War Measures Act; Section 62(c) Criminal Code of Canada; Section 231(1) (a) Criminal Code of Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. James Richardson (Minister of Supply and Services): Yes, the Department of Supply and Services has printing done in plants situated in or near Quebec City. (a) Yes. COMPULSORY BILINGUAL LABELLING OF CONSUMER PRODUCTS

Question No. 664—Mr. Fortin:

1. Is there a law or regulation for the better protection of the consumer under which it is compulsory to have bilingual (French and English) labels, and (a) if so, what is the regulation (b) if not, is it the intention of the government to pass such a regulation?

2. Have there been any discussions with Quebec representatives concerning bilingual labels and, if so (a) on what date (b) with what result?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): 1. Labelling regulations issued under the authority of the Hazardous Products Act require that mandatory cautionary labelling be in both the English and the French languages. Provision for mandatory bilingual labelling will be included in regulations to be drawn up under the Consumer Packaging and Labelling Bill now before Parliament.

2. Meetings and discussions have taken place between representatives of the Government of Quebec and federal government representatives concerning bilingual labelling. Many of these discussions have been of an informal nature involving telephone conversations and it is not possible to enumerate all the dates on which discussions have occurred. These discussions have resulted in a better understanding of the intentions of the respective governments with regard to the labelling of prepackaged consumer products. The Quebec authorities have indicated their satisfaction with the federal government's policy statement on bilingual labelling and have urged its early implementation.

*MANPOWER—STUDY OF EMPLOYMENT OF UNIVERSITY STUDENTS

Question No. 1,122—Mr. Nystrom: Supplementary:

1. Was a survey study of employment of university students released by the Department of Manpower and Immigration on February 4, 1971 and, if so, was any consideration given to the inclusion in the study of students who did not return to university because they were unable to find summer employment?

2. Was there any indication that any of the students, who were unsuccessful in seeking employment, stated they had not sought employment?

3. What was the population of students in accredited universities in the academic year 1969-1970?

4. Was the survey based on oral or written questions?

5. What was the response rate?

6. Would the government be prepared to Table the questionnaire and an outline of the method used?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): 1. Preliminary results of a study of the employment of post-secondary students in the summer of 1970 were released by the Department of Manpower and Immigration on February 4, 1971. The survey was carried out at the time students registered for classes in the fall. Because of the method used, the survey did not include students who, for one reason or another, including their inability to find summer employment, did not return or proceed to post-secondary education.

2. The survey established that all but 10 per cent of the students had sought paid work. Of the 90 per cent who sought work, 89 per cent found employment some time during the summer.

3. The population of students in universities in 1969/70 is according to the Dominion Bureau of Statistics as 299,889.

4. The survey was based on written questions.

5. The survey was completed by approximately 17,000 students at 54 universities, community colleges and teachers colleges across Canada. It was based on a scientifically selected sample, within which the response rate averaged 75 per cent.

6. A full report of the survey including an outline of the method used and a copy of the questionnaire, will be ready in a few weeks time.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

LABOUR RELATIONS

DELAY IN NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS AND RAILWAYS—INTERRUPTION OF RAIL SERVICE

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose), to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 26 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the interruption of rail service on the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific caused by unwarranted delays in the negotiations between the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the railways, the four-month delay before a conciliation board was appointed by the Minister of Labour, the six-month delay before the said board made its report, and the failure of the board to make recommendations on all but two of the more than 20 issues referred to it, and the urgent need to seek an immediate settlement of the dispute in view of the serious effects on the economy of a railway strike affecting the movement of grains, perishables, minerals and other products.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Moose Jaw has given the Chair the notice required under Standing Order 26. Without going into the details of the form of the notice given, I think I should indicate to the hon. member for Moose Jaw that both the notice as given to the Chair and the statement as presented by the hon. member to the House might perhaps be considered as going somewhat beyond the very limited terms of reference allowed to the hon. member by the terms of Standing Order 26, which invites an hon. member to merely state what the matter is that he wishes to be considered by the House. In any event, I can assure the hon. member that I have given the matter very serious consideration.

It is obvious to the House, I am sure, that the hon. member has raised a very important matter which conceivably might require further consideration at some time in the future. After carefully perusing the hon. member's motion, I should like to suggest that the events referred to are in the nature of a developing situation in that the two parties are still, as I understand it, discussing the issue. I do not feel that the Chair can assume that these negotiations are in such a state as to require a debate in the House at the present time under the provisions of Standing Order 26. It should also be observed that if leave were granted to allow a debate under Standing Order 26 at this time, under our rules it would be impossible for the hon. member, or any other hon. member, to raise this issue again during the current session under the terms of Standing Order 26.

Bearing all these considerations in mind, I feel that the motion proposed should not be allowed at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF CANADIAN PULP AND PAPER COMPANIES BY UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE—ESTABLISHMENT OF INTERNATIONAL GUIDELINES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I apologize for it being a little complicated. Was the government aware that several Canadian pulp and paper companies were under investigation for 18 months by the anti-trust division of the United States Department of Justice for practices which are perfectly legal in Canada and that during the investigation documents were removed from United States affiliates of the Canadian companies so that the Department of Justice could pursue its investigation?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not as well acquainted with the details which have been put forward by the hon. member as perhaps I might be. But I would point out to him there are in existence arrangements between Canada and the United States for exchanging information with regard to certain aspects of anti-combines and anti-trust activities and pursuant to these there have been limited exchanges between officials on this matter. These discussions did not indicate there had been any infringement of Canadian sovereignty or that the United States courts were exceeding their jurisdiction to the detriment of Canadian nationals.

Mr. Fairweather: Mr. Speaker, in view of the resentment and concern of many Canadians, including Mr. R. M. Fowler, President of the Canadian Pulp and Paper Association, about these activities, does the government intend to convene an international conference which would include, of course, the United States and other governments to establish some working guidelines so that in future there would be established guidelines to deal with any future extra-territorial application of national laws?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, if another occasion does not arise before that, this is the sort of matter that is discussed at the meetings of the joint cabinet committee, but there may be an opportunity or a reason to raise this question again before that time.

FINANCE

ADVERTISEMENT FOR UNITED STATES ECONOMISTS TO FILL DEPARTMENTAL POSITIONS

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Has the minister's department not been able to fill with qualified Canadian personnel positions in the area of budgetary and fiscal planning and five other areas of economic and monetary policy within his department? If so, why is the Canadian government today advertising in The American Economic Review and other United States journals for United States economists with United States backgrounds to come to Canada to provide United States economic models for Canadian economic situations?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of this particular advertisement. In the Department of Finance we are always looking for very qualified people in the fields of economics and finance in Canada. We are continuously looking for them. We have some of the best in the world and hope to keep the standard up to that level.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister would like to put an end to this advertisement. Would he give the Canadians equal status in applying for opportunities in his department and also advertise these positions in Canadian journals?

Mr. Benson: Canadians, of course, have a preferred status in applying for jobs in my department.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FOREIGN OWNERSHIP—DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can he tell us if the Canadian government has received an invitation from the government of the United States to discuss the question of United States investment in Canada from the point of view of the rising feeling of Canadian economic nationalism in our country today?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): We have, of course, been discussing with our counterparts in the United States government the question of foreign ownership. The U.S. government indicated to us some time ago that they hoped that before we made any changes in our policy with respect to foreign ownership which would affect them particularly there would be an opportunity for consultation.

Mr. Yewchuk: Can the minister indicate whether such a meeting has now been set up and whether we can expect to have the results made known to the House?

Mr. Sharp: Since the government itself has not yet determined its policy on foreign ownership, there has been no occasion whatever for any consultations.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—DELAY RESPECTING CONCILIATION BOARD—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): My question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the imminent threat of a complete tie-up in rail operations on both the Canadian National and Canadian Pacific Railways, which can only result in serious effects on the western economy, can the minister indicate why a four-month delay was encountered before the conciliation board was constituted to deal with the contract negotiations between the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the railway companies?

Mr. Speaker: I would like to suggest to the hon. member that this important matter might be considered by asking the question in a different form. The hon. member is asking why there was a delay. I wonder whether that is a point of debate. I would hope the hon. member could ask a supplementary question which might be more immediate than debating what has happened over the last four months.

Mr. Skoberg: I will reword my question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the four-month delay in setting up and constituting the conciliation board, can the minister now say whether any progress has been made in the negotiations?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the negotiating teams are meeting today and will be meeting directly with both the CNR and CPR tomorrow in order to expedite a settlement. The hon. member is quite correct in saying that there has been undue delay. One reason has been the untimely death of the chief negotiator for the unions. Whatever influence the hon. member may have with the unions, it would be appreciated if he would suggest to them that they go back to work and let the negotiating teams in Montreal do the negotiating.

Mr. Skoberg: In view of the fact that there appears to have been a six-month lag between the time the conciliation board was constituted and when it handed down its report, can the minister indicate to the House whether or not any extension of time was granted to the conciliation board for making its report?

Mr. Mackasey: It is traditional and normal to extend the mandate of the conciliation board beyond the normal period if the chairman so requests, particularly when the chairman of the board is a man of such integrity as Mr. Gallagher.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Did the minister imply that the chairman requested the extension of time?

Mr. Mackasey: I implied nothing beyond simply saying that the conciliation board tried to complete its report as soon as possible.

Mr. Rose: Was there such a request for an extension of time before handing down the report and, if so, by whom was such extension requested?

Mr. Mackasey: Any request would be legitimate, and I would have to verify to see whether the extension of time was simply the request of the chairman, which I think is in order, or whether it was a joint request of all the parties involved in the dispute.

Mr. Rose: May I ask the minister why there were no continuous negotiations over the past weekend? As the minister is well aware, there have been tie-ups on both the CN and CP in the west.

Mr. Mackasey: I am aware of the fact that there were not continuous negotiations over the weekend, but I know the hon. gentleman is sincere in his desire to see an end to this dispute, and I do not think it would help in any way if I were to single out one party or the other for their negligence in this regard.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EFFECT OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH OTHER RAILWAY UNIONS ON SETTLEMENT OF ENGINEERS' DISPUTE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): In view of the fact that apparently the engineers are now awaiting a settlement with respect to the 20,000 shopcraft people so far as their agreement is concerned, can the minister advise if any conclusion is being reached with respect to their demands at this time?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as most hon. members know, railway negotiations are complicated. There are no less than seven groups, I think, negotiating almost simultaneously with the Canadian Pacific and Canadian National, and each collective agreement or settlement in some way is intertwined with the others. The hon. gentleman's question is a valid one. There is progress being made not only with regard to the shopcraft people, but also in the negotiations with regard to the non-operating groups, and both have an effect on the dispute involving the engineers.

Mr. Alexander: In view of the fact that there seem to be some 20 issues in the engineers dispute on which there has been no agreement, can the minister advise if he has been approached to bring in an outside mediator with respect to this very serious problem?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, ever since I became Minister of Labour I have never had to bring in an outside mediator because I have ample confidence in the mediators at my disposal within the department.

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—NEGOTIATIONS ON ISSUES NOT DEALT WITH BY CONCILIATION BOARD

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): In view of the length of time it took the conciliation board to bring in its report, and the failure of the board to make recommendations on 21 issues concerning rules and working conditions, can the minister advise if he or his officials have been involved in any way and whether or not progress is being made in the negotiations on these 21 issues?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would hope progress is being made. I would ask the House to be a little patient in this matter because I cannot be as frank as I would like to be with respect to the negotiations going on in Montreal in case I should jeopardize their progress.

APPLICATION OF FEDERAL MINIMUM WAGE LAW TO CANADIAN NATIONAL HOTELS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): In view of the fact that a number of collective agreements are being held up pending a decision by the government with regard to the application of the federal minimum wage laws to the CNR hotels, can the minister tell the House whether a decision has been taken with respect to applying the federal minimum wage laws to the CN hotels?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated some months ago, I had recommended to the Department of Justice that the whole question of minimum wages in CNR hotels be subjected, if necessary, to court action. In the interval there was a test case before the courts in the province of Alberta. I believe the recommendation of the Department of Justice was that we should wait for the results in that particular case, and the Minister of Justice has indicated to me that he would get more concrete information on that case some time later this week.

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—PARTICIPATION OF MINISTER AND DEPARTMENTAL MEDIATORS IN NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the minister about the importance of not interfering with the negotiations at this time, but can he inform the House, in respect of the crucial negotiations that are to start today or tomorrow, whether he or his chief mediators or both intend to take an active part to make sure the negotiations continue until a settlement is reached?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Both the industry specialists, Mr. Kelly and Mr. Gibbons, are on the scene and have already taken an active part over the weekend to see that direct negotiations are resumed tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair will recognize the hon. member for York South and the hon. member for Athabasca on supplementaries and then go on to another subject.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to press the minister unduly but I know a little about this kind of negotiation and so I ask him if he himself would enter the picture at this stage, which is obviously crucial to the settlement of the dispute, not necessarily tomorrow but some time during the negotiations this week?

Mr. Mackasey: If at all necessary I would be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker.

EFFECT OF RAILWAY WORK STOPPAGE ON TRANSPORTATION OF GRAIN

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Can he indicate whether the transportation of grain is being interfered with by this work stoppage, and whether the government is considering alternative methods to transport grain in order to ensure that our wheat markets are not interfered with?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, of course the movement of grain from the Prairies to Vancouver is essentially a railroad operation and so it is interfered with, of course, by anything that interferes with the complete operation of the railroads. No other system of transportation could be considered feasible at this stage.

[Mr. McGrath.]

NATIONAL SECURITY

PUBLICATION OF BOOK BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON QUEBEC CRISIS—PRIOR EXAMINATION BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister to clarify the position that he explained on March 25 in connection with the extraordinary book written by the Secretary of State when the Prime Minister was asked what course was followed in respect of written statements or speeches. Was there any examination of this book made in advance by the Prime Minister himself to ascertain whether or not constitutional practice was being subverted in any way?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what I explained last week was that before ministers made any statements on important policy questions they were to follow a practice which was established well before my time—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not in my time.

Mr. Trudeau: —in the Prime Minister's office, a practice which consisted of letting the Prime Minister's office know what those statements were going to be. In some cases I have looked at them when they were drawn to my attention; in other cases I did not when I was told there was no need to look at a statement in detail before it was made.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I must make a reference to the Prime Minister's allegation about other Prime Ministers. That rule I had not heard of until the Prime Minister enunciated it the other day. Now I ask him this: does he personally check these speeches in advance to examine their content in this regard?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then I have another question. In the blues for the 25th these words appear:

> Ministers have made speeches on all these subjects.
>
> That is, on matters of government policy.
> It is my practice to check them for content.

That was the statement made by the Prime Minister. I ask him why was the change made in Hansard to read as follows:

> It is my practice to try to ensure, before they are delivered, that someone checks them for content.

Why was this change made in what was said in the House by the Prime Minister so as to report in Hansard something that he did not say?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, my memory of what I said is that I said that someone checked them for content. If the blues carry any different statement, I will have the blues looked into and I will also see if there is a tape of this statement. I am rather certain that I said they were checked for content by someone, because at no time have I ever pretended I could read in advance all the speeches that are made by ministers in my cabinet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So the Prime Minister will look into this and find out what happened in the transition from the blues to Hansard, will he?

HEALTH

BAN ON CIGARETTE ADVERTISING ANNOUNCED BY BRITISH COLUMBIA—FEDERAL POSITION CONCERNING LEGISLATION OR VOLUNTARY PHASE-OUT

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wanted to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare but perhaps in his absence someone opposite will take notice of it. Having in mind the very welcome decision by the government of British Columbia over the weekend announcing a ban on all cigarette advertising commencing in September, just what is the situation at the federal level? Are we going to have an early introduction of similar legislation or is the department, in consultation with the industry, seeking a voluntary-phase-out of cigarette advertising by the industry?

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSED FARM ADJUSTMENT PROGRAM—REPRESENTATION FOR ORGANIZATIONS ON COMMITTEE

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Agriculture who, according to the roster, was to have been in the House this afternoon. In his absence I will direct it to the acting minister. My question refers to the meeting that the minister held on the weekend with the provincial Ministers of Agriculture to discuss a proposed nationwide farm adjustment program. In setting up the committee to deal further with the question and report back to a meeting of deputy ministers on April 28, will farm organizations have representatives on this committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would inform the hon. member that the Minister of Agriculture is away from the House because he is meeting today with the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States.

As to the question raised by the hon. member, I will make note of it for the minister's attention.

FINANCE

EFFECT OF APPRECIATION IN CANADIAN DOLLAR ON EXPORT INDUSTRIES—POLICY STATEMENT PRIOR TO BUDGET

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. In light of the current alarming trend and the growing concern about the dampening effect of the appreciation of the Canadian dollar on our export industries, is the minister now planning a statement in the House on government policy on this subject prior to his spring budget?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I really could not indicate that.

Mr. Danforth: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he is considering an early meeting with representatives of these industries to endeavour to reach an early resolution of this problem which has such a direct bearing on Canadian job opportunities?

Mr. Benson: I meet with industries as they request. As a matter of fact, about two weeks ago I met with the pulp and paper industry in this regard.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—EXPEDITING OF APPLICATIONS IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES—PROVINCIAL QUOTAS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the fact that of the first 200 applications received under the Opportunities for Youth program only 14 came from the Atlantic provinces where unemployment is highest and the need greatest, will the minister initiate a stepped-up information program and decentralize staff from Ottawa to the provinces in order to expedite applications?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the information is certainly available in the various regions of the country—

Some hon. Members: No!

Mr. Lang: —and the number of applications indicates that people are aware of it. I think the hon. member might help by stepping up his information about these programs.

Mr. McGrath: That is your job.

Mr. Marshall: To answer the minister, Mr. Speaker, I am sending out more information than is coming from his office. Would the minister consider again a proposal I put to him last week to allocate quotas to those provinces where the need is greatest for student employment?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the general approach of the government has been to attempt to relate programs dealing with unemployment to the areas where unemployment is highest. I am sure this will be taken into consideration with regard to this program as well.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—CRITERIA USED IN CONSIDERING APPLICATIONS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the large number of applications being received, will the minister undertake to make a statement in the House as to what criteria are being used in accepting or rejecting applications? Apparently this is not understood by many people.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I shall bring this suggestion to the attention of my colleague, the Secretary of State.

Mr. Nystrom: Can the minister indicate whether or not the Opportunities for Youth program is part of a long-range policy for young people, part of an ongoing policy that will be continued in future years?

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ORGANIZATIONS THAT QUALIFY FOR GRANTS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Can the minister state whether groups or clubs such as service clubs, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and others who sponsor youth employment programs for the summer will qualify for these grants which are directly available to the students according to the program?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would refer the hon. member to the information put out by the Secretary of State's office in this regard.

An hon. Member: Don't you know?

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): A brief supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister give some assurance to the students who require financial assistance for the coming academic year that financial concerns, not political concerns, will be the criteria?

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—APPLICATION CUT-OFF DATE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that there seems to be some confusion as to the cut-off date for applications—I have heard it is ending tomorrow and I have also heard April 15—is the minister in a position to advise the House and the people of Canada, particularly those interested in the program, just when the cut-off date is? If it is in the very near future, is the minister giving serious consideration to prolonging the time set for applications in order that we can get the benefit of the money supplied by the government?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): There has indeed been some confusion about application date deadlines, Mr. Speaker, apparently because there are a number of programs with different deadlines. The program for employment overseas, for instance, which is a very special program and has existed for a number of years, has a March 31 deadline date. I believe the Secretary of State made it quite clear in the House and outside that April 15 was the date he was suggesting for the Opportunities for Youth program.

Mr. Speaker: The Chair will recognize the hon. member for Hamilton West on a supplementary question.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

However, I wonder if we might not go on to another subject and if there is time, return to this very important matter later during the question period.

Mr. Alexander: Thank you for your indulgence, Mr. Speaker. The minister says that his colleague has suggested that the cut-off date is to be April 15. In order to clarify this matter and in view of the fact that many students are registering complaints about the short notice involved, would the minister take this matter up with his colleague and ascertain if there is any possibility of extending the time so that youth can take advantage of the scheme properly?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I shall bring this representation to the attention of my colleague, but the hon. member should not overlook the importance of these applications coming in early. The Opportunities for Youth program is obviously so popular that those that come in early may be given the greatest amount of consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AMCHITKA UNDERGROUND NUCLEAR TESTS—REPLY TO CANADIAN PROTEST—PROPOSED WEST COAST OIL TANKER ROUTE

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs if he is now in a position to advise the House of the outcome of this government's protest of February, 1970, regarding the Amchitka nuclear test explosion?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when this question was originally asked I said that I would inquire from the United States government whether they would have any objection to my tabling the substance of their reply. The United States government has now agreed. Therefore may I first table the substance of the note we presented to the United States government and then give a short summary of their reply?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the minister that this kind of statement ought normally to be made on motions, unless the minister can make the statement brief so that it will actually take the form of a reply to the question.

Mr. Sharp: I should like to table the substance of the note we submitted to the United States government.

The United States government delivered a reply to our ambassador in Washington on March 17 indicating their appreciation of the Canadian government's concern over any effects of the tests on the environment. They also gave assurances that the environmental and other interests expressed by the Canadian government would be taken into full account and that they would give, in the thorough review of any proposed test on Amchitka, full and careful consideration to the possible impact of such a test on the physical environment.

Mr. Macquarrie: That is something less than a convincing and comforting reply, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister if he has also protested to the United States government about the western tanker route which he told a CTV audience yesterday he believes should be rejected?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I have protested many times in the House of Commons and I understand my protests have been read in Washington. I have asked the Secretary of State to consult with the Canadian government on the subject and I now await the fixing of a definite date for such consultations.

Mr. Macquarrie: Do I take it that the minister on behalf of the government has not presented the Canadian point of view to the government of the United States?

Mr. Sharp: I think the hon. member has heard me many times in the House of Commons and heard me in Washington as well.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate the attitude he might or might not have expressed with respect to the east coast as a possible tanker route? Has he brought the same emphasis to bear with respect to the Atlantic coast?

Mr. Sharp: Perhaps the hon. member would tell me about this proposed new tanker route on the east coast.

Mr. Forrestall: You don't give a damn!

EAST PAKISTAN—REPORTED KILLINGS AND REPRESSIVE MEASURES—CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS TO PAKISTAN GOVERNMENT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs arising out of the disturbing situation in East Pakistan. In view of the fact that democratically elected representatives have been refused the right to take office and have been outlawed and in view of the reported killings on a very large scale along with repressive measures being adopted by the military government of Pakistan, can the minister tell us if the Canadian government has made any representations to the government of Pakistan, particularly with a view to preserving democratic government in that fellow member of the Commonwealth?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker; we seem to be a little less clear about the situation than the hon. member, but we are making inquiries. As soon as we can ascertain the facts we will consider whether any useful purpose would be served by making representations.

Mr. Douglas: The minister's lack of clarity about this subject is normal. In view of the fact that Pakistan is a fellow member of the Commonwealth, will the government of Canada consider making representations urging a cessation of the repressive military measures which are being pursued and an attempt to settle this matter by constitutional means?

Mr. Sharp: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member is oversimplifying the situation. If he were to ask me whether I think East Pakistan should separate, I would hesitate before making a definite reply.

EAST PAKISTAN—ASSISTANCE TO VICTIMS OF REPORTED REPRESSION

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has the government been in touch with interested governments with a view to offering international humanitarian assistance to the victims in East Pakistan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we were in the midst of offering assistance to this country in connection with the recent disasters. We have not, of course, had an opportunity yet of doing anything more. The situation is still not very clear. I am sure the House would expect that before we intervened in such a delicate situation we should ascertain the facts and ascertain whether in fact our intervention would be useful.

EAST PAKISTAN—ACTION TO ENSURE SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): I have a supplementary question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister inform the House what action the government of Canada is taking to ensure the well-being of Canadian nationals in East Pakistan?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As far as we can determine, all Canadians in Dacca are safe and well. We have no information about the situation in Chittagong or other areas. Before the recent outbreak of hostilities, some 40 Canadian dependents and others had already left East Pakistan, acting on advice given by the deputy British high commissioner in Dacca to the effect that those without strong reason for remaining should leave. There are still approximately 150 Canadians in East Pakistan and, in accordance with arrangements entered into beforehand, the deputy British high commissioner will include them in arrangements made for protection and withdrawal to safe haven should this appear necessary.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DENIAL OF CANADIAN TELEVISION PROGRAMS TO WINDSOR STATION

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): In the absence of the Secretary of State I will direct my question to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the government's commitment to Canadian content on television, what action does the minister propose to take with respect to the recent decision by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to deny several Canadian television series to the Canadian television station in Windsor so that they can be sold to the United States networks for showing in Detroit?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): I will take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker, but I would make the observation that it would seem to me that the decision in terms of what might be done will involve the CRTC.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ARGENTINA—TERMS OF JOINT CANADA-UNITED STATES FOREIGN AID SCHEME

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It relates to a question I directed to the President of the Treasury Board in the absence of the minister on March 19. Is Canada acting in concert with the United States to establish a large engineering project in Argentina of which Canada will pay 10 per cent or 15 per cent of the cost, and is one of the terms of that contract that all the machinery and equipment for this large project will be purchased in the United States and none in Canada?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada is not involved with the United States in an aid scheme in Argentina. However, through the good offices of the Inter-American Development Bank we have extended a $756,000 loan to Argentina. This is being used to retain a Canadian firm which is updating and expanding an engineering and economic feasibility study of the Salto Grande hydroelectric power project in Argentina. I can assure the hon. member that this Canadian loan is not being used to purchase equipment and machinery in the United States.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

NORTHERN SASKATCHEWAN—APPLICATION FOR GRANT TO CONSTRUCT PULP MILL

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to ask the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion whether he is now in a position to give an answer to the question I asked the other day as to what decision has been made in connection with the application by the government of Saskatchewan for $12 million in relation to the proposed establishment of a pulp mill at Dore Lake?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think the application is from the company, not the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes, that is right.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): A huge amount is being requested and the application is still being processed by the department. The department is requesting information from the company. I do not think there has been any unjustified delay up to this time, and as soon as we can make a decision we will do so.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am not suggesting that the genial minister ever delays. I wish to ask him whether objections to this grant have been received from NDP members in the province of Saskatchewan and also from Mr. Wilfrid Gardiner, a former member of the cabinet of Mr. Thatcher who has recently become a self-appointed authority on these questions?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am not aware of those objections, Mr. Speaker. I will inquire and report to the House.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): A supplementary question. Has the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion received any representations from the Pulp and Paper Association of Canada opposing such a grant?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, there is a problem with the whole industry. There is no doubt about that. We received representations, not specifically in connection with this mill but in connection with all new mills that are going to be established in Canada. There is a problem in the pulp and paper industry because of the rate of exchange.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are only three or four minutes left in the question period. I suggest that we go on to another subject.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AID TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES—SUGGESTED INTEREST-FREE LOANS TO CANADIAN MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

In view of the fact that the Canadian government, through the Canadian International Development Agency, has granted several interest-free loans for periods of between 50 and 60 years to certain developing countries, can the minister tell the House whether he will suggest changing that agency's name by substituting the word "national" to "international" in order that it may be authorized to grant interest-free loans to Canadian developing municipalities?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right in saying that the Canadian government does grant loans free of interest to some underdeveloped countries. I point out to the hon. member we also make grants that are not repayable. We intend to continue this policy as a means of helping in the development of the underdeveloped countries of the world, a policy which has very strong support in Canada and which is strongly supported by this government. Our help to universities and in overcoming poverty in this country takes many times as much money as the assistance we provide to the underdeveloped countries of the world.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

NAMES OF CANADA PENSION PLAN AUTHORITIES WHO PARTICIPATED IN ESTABLISHING PRERETIREMENT SCHEME

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Will the minister secure from Devco the names of the Canada Pension Plan authorities who acted with the Devco people in setting up their so-called preretirement leave scheme?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the names be obtained. In view of the fact that the Canada Pension Plan is involved, possibly the names would be more easily obtained from the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the minister through whom Devco reports to the House of Commons.

Mr. MacInnis: I rise on a question of privilege. I do not wish to continue to tell the minister what his business is. The Min ster of National Health and Welfare failed to answer this question when it was directed to him. The Canada Pension Plan does not come under the administration of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The Canada Labour (Standards) Code comes under this minister. This is the only law which can be used to require that information. If the minister no longer has authority over the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, what does he do around here?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether this is a question of privilege. We went through this battle last week. I do not think it should be allowed to develop as a question of privilege. I suggest to the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond that it is not a question of privilege, and I am sure the minister will recognize this. To whom the question should be directed is something which might be considered in due course, but I suggest to hon. members that there is not much point in pursuing the matter in view of the fact that there are only two minutes left before the end of the question period.

Mr. Mackasey: Maybe the hon. member is entitled to an apology. I thought he was referring to the Canada Pension Plan, but I now believe he was referring to the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. He is right. That is my responsibility.

Mr. MacInnis: On the same point, if a member of the opposition, or any member of the House requests information from a corporation in this country and cannot secure it, the only way in which he can get it is through the Canada Labour (Standards) Code from the minister. In view of the fact that the other minister has refused—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LABOUR RELATIONS

LAKEHEAD GRAIN HANDLERS DISPUTE—INQUIRY AS TO SETTLEMENT

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Can the hon. gentleman say whether the grain handler's strike at Thunder Bay has been settled?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to say that the dispute at the Lakehead involving the grain handlers has been settled at the conciliation board stage. I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate all the members of the conciliation board for arriving at what I think is a very fair and equitable settlement.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have noticed some hon. members dutifully rising during the whole of the question period, including the hon. member for Churchill, the hon. member for Mackenzie, the hon. member for Simcoe North and a few others. I have made a note and will try to give them preference when we reach the question period tomorrow. Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed from Friday, March 26, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

On clause 8—Energy, Mines and Resources

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Friday, March 26, clause eight of the bill was being considered. Shall clause eight carry?

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the discussion which took place on Friday last and I welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate today, particularly since the subject has to do with the area opened up by my hon. friend from Northumberland-Colchester North, that is to say, the whole question of the realization of the energy potential of the Bay of Fundy in terms of the generation of electricity and other economic advantages.

In a sense, I want to pick up where my hon. friend left off and to bring one or two further points to the attention of the committee. In this connection, I should like to refer first of all to an article by the Associated Press, under a United Nations dateline, dealing with a report recently released for the use of the United Nations. This report strongly suggests that the way in which to give the world sufficient pollution-free power is to take account of the energy offered by tidal systems and tidal rivers, for example, the Bay of Fundy. The report lists a number of tidal power sites in Canada, the United States, Britain, India, Australia, the Soviet Union and Argentina. It refers specifically to the tidal power development at St. Malo, in France, and notes that cheaper construction methods have been developed in recent years—more economic methods and systems of capturing the enormous electric energy potential of such basins as the Bay of Fundy.

By implication, and without referring directly to the tidal program study which was carried out a year or so ago in this country, the report suggests that the engineering and economic models which had then to be used were based on information which was probably eight or ten years old, in some cases considerably older than that.

In short, the report suggests that in very recent years, indeed, in the last 18-24 months, new methods have been developed for the harnessing of tidal systems and tidal rivers which are considerably more economic than in the past. In this connection we are bound, of course, to take the pollution-free aspect of tidal developments into account, as well as the basic cheapness of the energy provided by the rise and fall of the tides. Accordingly, the report calls upon governments at all levels to review the economics of development and harnessing tidal power.

There is in the Maritime provinces an all-party committee which crosses all political lines—it even embraces gentlemen from the other chamber who are interested. The single purpose of this committee is to further the application of the new economics of scale which attach themselves to the harnessing of tidal power so that we may take advantage in Atlantic Canada of the tremendous energy of the tides in the Bay of Fundy. I want to draw the attention of hon. members to the unanimity of opinion on this subject. I want to say that the Village of Gunningsville wholeheartedly supports—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Forrestall: I knew my whip would be interested in that one—I did not single it out, it just happens to be at the top of a list of 50 or 60 towns, cities and villages in the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick which have indicated their support. Their interest is no less than that expressed by the Mayor of the Town of Port Hawkesbury who wishes the undertaking every success, as do Bridgetown, Middleton and Truro. The municipality of the District of West Hants requests the earliest possible development of Fundy power, a sentiment which is shared by Lunenburg, Douglastown, New Brunswick and the Municipality of King's County, Nova Scotia. King's County placed their seal on the resolution they forwarded, making it official. The Town of Digby, situated on the Annapolis Basin, virtually on top of the greatest source of energy in the world, has formally passed a resolution in favour of the development of Fundy power.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Then, I have a resolution from the town of Wolfville, another eminent, very old town situated on the shores of the Bay of Fundy. I have others from the village of Hillsborough, in Albert county, New Brunswick; the town of Pictou, the town of Stewiacke, the town of Bridgewater, the village of Port Elgin and the town of Parrsboro. These communities are all in the area of this energy resource, and all are concerned that this development be proceeded with.

I have other resolutions from the village of Fredericton Junction; from Dalhousie, New Brunswick; from the town of Tracadie, New Brunswick; from Halifax—

Mr. Bell: Where is that?

Mr. Forrestall: This is the city of Halifax which lies across the river from Dartmouth. I have another from the municipality of the county of Halifax and one from Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. All of these towns are in either of the two provinces. If you were to read these resolutions supporting a review of this project, Mr. Chairman, you would find a wide variety of comments. One of these towns, I cannot recall which now, passed a resolution in 1921, 50 years ago, which it forwarded to the then rerpesentative of the community in this chamber with a view to getting someone to show some interest in the tremendous potential of the Minas Basin and the Bay of Fundy tides.

I have another resolution from the municipality of the county of Queens; one from the municipality of East Hants; and another from the village of Nackawic, in the county of York, New Brunswick. There are others from the town of Kentville, the town of Annapolis Royal, the town of Trenton, the village of Lewisville, New Brunswick, from Yarmouth, the village of Dorchester, the town of Windsor, the town of Berwick, the village of North Head on Grand Manan, which is in the middle of the Bay of Fundy, from the town of Sussex, from Fredericton, and from the village of Hampton, New Brunswick. All of these resolutions recognize the importance of an immediate thrust by all levels of government to implement on a properly planned basis a project to harness the tides of the Bay of Fundy.

In the Nova Scotia legislature the other day the premier of the province, the Hon. Gerald Regan, introduced a bill calling for the establishment of a corporation along the lines of the Sydney Steel Corporation—SISCO, as it is commonly known—to be funded with $10 million for the purpose of pursuing means of harnessing and developing the Bay of Fundy tides. I welcome this announcement by the premier of the province because this step is a good one. Unfortunately, there is some uncertainty and confusion as to how this $10 million is going to be spent and how the proposed corporation is going to be established. No answer has been given to such questions as whether or not the elected representatives of the area most directly concerned will have any say in the methods that are to be followed.

In this respect, it is with no hesitation at all that I commend to the minister and members of this committee the private member's bill placed on the Order Paper by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley which sets forth, in terms that are quite acceptable to all hon. members, an initial form of development process. The hon. member's will recognizes the necessity for a permanent secretariat. It recognizes the necessity for a broadly based board of directors. In this regard, it recognizes the validity of political participation in the body that will initially accept responsibility for getting this mammoth project off the ground. It recognizes there should be a continuing, tangible link between the elected body and those who would do the actual development work.

I mention this because it is of consequence. For many years, attempts have been made to develop the tides of the Bay of Fundy and Minas Basin. In addition, attempts were made by the United States corps of army engineers to develop Passamaquoddy basin lying between the United States and the province of New Brunswick, but all of these attempts failed, even though a tremendous amount of engineering work and effort were put into them.

All of us recognize the interest shown over a long period of time by the late George C. Nowlan in the harnessing of the tides of the Minas Basin and the full development of the Bay of Fundy. The Bay of Fundy tidal program review board, following its most recent assessment, concluded that it would not be economical to go ahead with such a project now, and I have dealt with that aspect. Without impugning the integrity of this board at all, its engineering and economic models were based on information that was outdated. Its methods of construction were outdated, and its costing was outdated. The fact is that interest rates today are lower than they were. The fact is that new and more efficient methods have been developed. Indeed, it is now commonly conceded that a sustained source of power could be developed on an economic basis.

I say it is inevitable that the Bay of Fundy tides will be harnessed. It is inevitable if for no other reason than that it is the cheapest source of power we can find. It is a renewable resource which provides power. Most important of all, it is pollution free. I suggest to the minister that we must approach the development of these tides openly and with frankness. We must not do anything that might encourage or tend to promote a credibility gap. We must not in any way deceive ourselves or those who would be interested in investing in the project. In other words, we must not do things behind one another's backs but must be open at all times. There must be full involvement.

The corporation suggested by the premier of Nova Scotia is a worth while step, but it runs the risk of being the root cause of our once again fumbling the ball. And if we do fumble the ball, it will be many, many years before we will be able to pick it up again, because in the interval we will become deeply involved in programs of uranium enrichment and automatic self-breeders. I do not want atomic waste buried in my backyard, not when there is available pure, clean water which prevents no danger or pollution hazard. If we fumble the ball again, then these are the problems with which we will be confronted with respect to developing the Bay of Fundy tides. We must make sure that this concept is not controlled by some crown corporation narrowly controlled by the premier of one province. I think several hon. members have asked in the House whether the premier of Nova Scotia had approached the federal authorities with respect to this type of review which the all-party committee, headed by the hon. member for Cumberland-Colchester North, requested. Frankly, I wonder why that premier has not approached the federal authorities. I am sure that private talks have taken place. I say that because the minister has said publicly he would review the matter if he were asked to do so. I am concerned, because that approach has not been followed up by the premier of Nova Scotia. He has embarked on a course that suggests he wants to do it alone. That is fine, but the fact of the matter is that he cannot do it alone. This undertaking will involve more than $1 billion. If one includes the full potential of the project, namely, economic spin-offs in terms of tourism, and so on, the project will involve, perhaps, funds in excess of $2 billion or $3 billion.

Nova Scotia, Mr. Chairman, cannot afford the luxury of attempting to undertake this project alone. I am afraid of the difficulties that may ensue if the province, in attempting to go ahead with the project, finds it cannot complete this undertaking and if, in that attempt to put all the marbles in its own pocket, it finds that its pockets have holes in them. All the marbles may then be lost. In other words, I think the province would only undertake this project if it "had a hole in its head."

Statements have been made that this course will not be followed. These, actually, have not been statements so much as comments made outside this Chamber. Officials who have not been elected have made such statements. We have heard, for instance, that agreements have been reached between the federal authorities and the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Perhaps there are indications of what may happen, but I submit that these indications are not sufficient to offset the concern that I, along with others, feel. I do not think the provincial authorities ought to attempt to undertake this project by themselves. That is the message I wish to leave with the committee this afternoon in discussing this particular clause of the bill, Mr. Chairman.

I say, first of all, that it is inevitable that the Bay of Fundy tidal power project will be developed some day. That being so, why do we not undertake it now? Let us do it now; let us do it in an orderly way and let us do it with the full participation of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and the federal authorities. While doing that, let us not forget that Prince Edward Island is not very far away. Actually, I do not think that the province is more than 28 miles from the headwaters of the Bay of Fundy. Let us not forget that province. Let us, at the same time, consider the advantages that this ticular clause of the bill, Mr. Chairman.

We heard a great deal in this House, especially last Friday afternoon during private member's hour, about the benefits of this project. Speakers from the Maritime provinces indicated that we do not like to go on accepting subsidies.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, may I continue for a minute?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I think we all agree to the minute the hon. member is requesting.

The Chairman: Does the committee give its unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I conclude by saying that although it would be lovely if the Maritime provinces could undertake this project on their own, I do not think they can do it. Some complain that the Maritime provinces are given too much by way of subsidies and that the rest of the country does not wish to carry the burden. I am afraid that we shall have to continue accepting assistance, even though we may not like it, in the absence of maritime marketing regions sufficiently large to attract and support secondary manufacturing. In the absence of that, we shall need some continuing form of help. We shall need such assistance, for instance until we get on with the job of developing projects like the Minas Basin project and until we realize our investment in the exploration for oil deposits off the coast of Nova Scotia.

Not until we obtain benefits from investments in such projects can we expect to get out from under in the Maritimes. Nova Scotia has no hinterland. By the same token neither has Prince Edward Island, and will not have unless my hon. friend from Hillsborough can convince Joey Smallwood that Newfoundland should unite with Prince Edward Island. That would give the island province a hinterland. The hinterland of Nova Scotia, so to speak, is the ocean and the vast resources of the ocean floor and continental shelf. Of course, not until these areas have been developed will we realize the benefits of these resources. Not until then will we obtain the full benefit of the hinterland that is the sea. Until that happens, the rest of the country will need to help us in transportation and other fields.

I say in closing that the Bay of Fundy development could be the greatest single engineering project ever undertaken in North America. Its size staggers the imagination and fires some people with enthusiasm. That type of project would get Nova Scotia going and get New Brunswick going. The spin-off effects would be felt in Prince Edward Island. Prince Edward Island would look much more attractive from the viewpoint of Newfoundland. In short, the lot of the Atlantic provinces would be improved.

The Chairman: Shall clause 8 carry?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I thought the understanding was that we would have an opportunity, while discussing this clause, to discuss the powers that are to be given to the minister and that the minister would make a statement. We had hoped that he would do so on Friday, but I suppose we took too much time and he was unable to make the statement. I think he should make the statement now, while we are discussing this particular clause. That should be done before we pass this clause.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, that, I thought, was the arrangement. I was not aware that hon. members opposite had finished so promptly, and that is why I did not get up. I will be very pleased to make such a statement, and to answer such questions as have been asked in committee to the best of my ability.

First, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the bill itself, and I think some hon. members were concerned about this, does not give any new powers to the department. I believe the hon. member for Kamouraska, in particular, asked why hydroelectric energy was included in the bill, and whether the words in paragraph (a) of clause 8 "energy, including energy developed from water," had any particular significance. I believe other hon. members also asked why mines and other non-renewable resources were included, and whether that part constituted new powers. I think it might be useful if, at the outset, I tried to clarify that point. May I emphasize that no new powers are envisaged with respect to energy, mines, resources and technical surveys in the bill as it is constituted.

The purpose of clause 8 is to clarify the relative responsibilities of the new department which is acquiring the water expertise that was formerly in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and what is left in the continuing Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The problem is that, although formerly most of the water expertise within the government was included in the department and now most of that expertise is going to the new department, the words "including energy development from water" are included in subclause (a) of clause 8 in order to indicate that while water generally is going to the new department in its aspect vis-à-vis the development of hydroelectric power, that particular expertise will remain within the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. That is the reason those words are included there. When it refers to mines, minerals and other non-renewable resources, again this does not connote a new power to the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources but is merely indicative of the fact that the basic line of demarcation between the new department and the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources will be that distinction between renewable as opposed to non-renewable resources.

The renewable resources generally will be in the new department of the environment, if this House sees fit to pass the bill. The non-renewable resources generally will be continued in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. While I say there will be no new powers, and that that is not the purpose of clause 8, I think it is inherent within the division of powers as envisaged by the demarcation between renewable and non-renewable resources that the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources will be more inclined than it has been in the past to be an economics department. I think hon. members here have indicated some concern that there is not sufficient economic forethought, if you like, given to the planning of the use of our resources and energy resources in particular. That may well be a valid criticism of the past. I think the emphasis in the past with regard to the development of our mineral resources, our energy resources and our non-renewable resources generally, was to develop them and to find markets for them. I believe that until fairly recently that was pretty well what we were concerned with; that is, the economic growth, if you like, as applied to these resources as well as others.

I think it is very clear, not merely from the well understood indications that were shown in the debate here but from the debate generally in the country and in the world, that the importance of resources, and mineral resources in particular as well as non-renewable resources generally in the future, may be much greater than we had appreciated in the past. The equation may be put as simply as this. In a world that will double in population in the next 30 or 35 years, as the prognosticators indicate, in a world in which it took from the beginning of time to put some 3.5 billion people on earth, we will put that many more people on earth in perhaps 30 or 35 years. The population of the world expects what we have deemed to be a high standard of living. Even in the third world, the undeveloped world where the standard of living is so deplorable, the people, I believe probably more than others, want their standard of living to grow and expand. That inevitably means that the finite resources, energy and mineral, will be that much more important and valuable.

Under such circumstances I believe it is quite clear that possibly there needs to be a new emphasis in a country such as Canada, which is so rich in these resources, on the economic planning of the use of these resources, first for domestic purposes because Canadian interests must be paramount, and secondly for use in respect of Canada's position in the world in the years ahead. So, certainly there will be this new emphasis in a department whose main function to date has been the encouragement of development rather than economic planning in respect of the use of the resources. I think probably the old department of mines and technical surveys exemplified the philosophy that lay behind our energy and resource development people when they provided the infrastructure, if you like, scientific and technological, for development. The scientific services were there. The geological surveys were made and that information was available to the world at large. We said, here is the information with which you can look for minerals in the most likely areas. That was probably the main, if not the sole, function of the department.

Certainly, while I say there are no new powers envisaged within the bill, I cannot deny the connotations in the speeches of so many members that a new emphasis is required. I believe this is clearly understood, even though no new specific powers are envisaged in the bill. I think the demarcation in respect of emphasis on environment and renewable resources in one department, as opposed to the emphasis on non-renewable resources in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, clearly indicates that the government appreciates that these two are affected in some way parallel in this country and in the kind of world in which we find ourselves today.

I do not believe I can today answer all the very valid questions asked by many members during the course of the debate so far, but I shall do my best at least to give a general review of what has taken place to date. First, I think the main concern has been in respect of energy policies rather than mineral policies, if I understood the tenor of the debate. At the outset, I may say there is no such thing as a static and continuing or constant energy policy. I do not think I could ever, no matter how effective and complete our research and planning should be, stand up in this House and say that here is the energy policy for Canada. We should then forget about it, because it is there for the next few years and we could turn our attention in this House to something else. Energy policy does not lend itself to that kind of definitive, lasting solution.

I might illustrate this best in this way. Let us say we attempted to have this sort of a complete and comprehensive over-all policy and then next week, as might well be the case, a new situation should arise. Suppose the rumour was proven true that there had been a great find of oil on the east coast, and we announced an over-all energy policy that did not take such a find into consideration. Quite obviously, we would have to rush out and revise our energy policy. That is why I say that the energy policy generally is fluid and changing, and must be so if we are to use our energy resources and meet the demands in the best interests of the total economy. In our thinking on the energy policy and where the policies of the government must go if we are to have the most effective direction in the national interest, I think it is most useful—and this is the way we have taken in the department and with the agencies that report to me—to think rather of policy objectives. What are the objectives of the use of energy in Canada? In this regard, we can classify some of those objectives.

The economic objective is one of them, to make the best economic use of our resources. National security is very clearly one of the objectives of our energy policy, because no modern industrial state such as Canada can be founded on anything but the most secure sources of supply that it can achieve, bearing in mind that these objectives have to be related one to the other. We would not want complete security at the price of economic foolhardiness. If we had complete security at too high a price for energy that the consumers of Canada, both industrial and household, paid, then we would have paid too high a price for security. Again these varying objectives have to be related.

Another objective is resource adequacy. That is certainly one of the great problems. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, assuring the adequacy of our resources has been, until fairly recently, our paramount objective. The quality of the environment is a fairly new objective. Until a very few years ago most of us did not foresee—and I certainly was not among the wise who knew 10, 15 or 20 years ago—that this would be one of the paramount objectives in 1971; yet today it is clearly so.

If there is one criticism I have to make with respect to the debate, it is that there is an inclination to think, perhaps naturally, that the federal Parliament can solve these major problems without considering jurisdictional problems. However, under our constitution, the ownership of the energy resources is very clearly vested in the provinces. While we can say, yes, we have control of exports and hence we have a lever, which is extremely important and powerful, I think, as with many of the delicate balances within our constitution, we must attempt to consider jurisdictional problems which quite often are interlaced with economic problems. Certainly, so far as oil and gas are concerned, at the present time there is an inclination on the part of the province of Alberta to be rather more concerned with achieving the maximum returns from the product since most of these products now are situated in that province. The maximum return to Alberta, can be achieved through royalties resulting from the most rapid exploitation and development of these resources. On the other hand, I feel sure that to foist a completely unrealistic price upon the eastern Canadian consumers in order to achieve a maximum exploitation of resources in the west, particularly in Alberta where the resources are found, would be an untoward balance jurisdictionally in economic terms vis-à-vis the producers as opposed to the consumers.

Undoubtedly, this has been the story of Canada in so many of our economic endeavours. We have tried to achieve a balance jurisdictionally among the interests of the various sectors of Canada, bearing in mind that under our constitution the resources themselves are under the immediate jurisdictional authority of the provinces. Sometimes it is forgotten that the producing provinces of today may not be the major producing provinces of tomorrow. I often think that if we had designed policies for the objective of maximizing the well-being of the producing provinces at the expense of the consumer provinces, they would help one province today. However, the greatest potential for development of oil, gas and petroleum products in general outside federal territories is to be found in the provinces that are not the producers of today.

The Gulf of St. Lawrence is a great potential area, and so is the Atlantic and the offshore areas. Achieving that balance between consumer and producer interests will serve in the long run the very provinces which today feel they are not so well served by the policies because they tend one way or the other.

Public revenue is certainly one of the objectives which we must consider at all times. I do not think it would be acceptable to leave all of the returns from our natural resources, from our energy resources in particular, in the hands of entrepreneurs and developers. On the other hand, if we load too heavily those resources with what is known in the trade as "front-end loadings", either in provincial areas by provincial rules or in federal lands by federal taxes under our own rules and regulations, which would push up the price of the product, we might well put some of that product out of the economic stream. This is particularly opposite in the northern territories where gas and oil would become very expensive. We were finding that out when we discussed in the House and elsewhere the problems of transporting oil and gas from the northern territories. We know how costly that may be.

There is a factor which would be of interest to members of the House, one which I came across the other day. In the Ontario market, 88 per cent of the cost of natural gas is the cost of transportation, and only 12 per cent is the wellhead cost of that gas. So, in the case of northern oil and gas, transportation costs will be an even more important factor. The costs of transportation are so great that if we front-end load the product with too heavy a cost, we will possibly price it out of the market for many years to come.

Our policy, as contrasted with that of the state of Alaska, would be interesting to hon. members in considering the problem. As hon. members know, the problems in the province of Alaska—the state of Alaska, it is not yet a province, I do not think—

Mr. Forrestall: Shortly.

Mr. Greene: If I recall the figures correctly, after the exciting finds in Prudhoe Bay a year or so ago Alaska was able to auction the new oil rights at great prices. If I remember rightly they received something like $1 billion in payment for these potential oil lands. Well, all that means is that it will be that much more costly oil. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that the oil companies do not assume these costs out of their own coffers. These costs are pushed on to the consumers. They push up the price of the product.

• (3:50 p.m.)

The Canadian philosophy with respect to remote areas and offshore has been rather the opposite—don't front-end load the costs. The time to get the money is when markets are found and the resources are flowing. The way to get revenue is from royalties. The decision as to whether the markets will be domestic or foreign is one that will be made by the government, the Parliament of that day. So, I think we can see the diametrically opposed policies of Alaska and Canada, and in our respectful view the Canadian position is superior in that we are not pricing ourselves out of markets ahead of time. We are not putting an undue burden on the domestic economy. We are keeping our options open. We will charge those resources, or rather the then Parliament or government can charge those resources, when they are flowing, as much as it likes in royalties, but that decision has not been made ahead of time. So, we can see some of the conflicting points, and certainly social objectives constitute an important one.

It has been said that the Maritime provinces are among the have-not provinces. That may be so in economic terms, but I have never found that they are among the have-nots in terms of the quality of life that exists in that part of Canada. But certainly from the standpoint of economics, I can think of nothing that would solve the economic problems of the Maritime provinces more than substantial and economic petroleum finds in the off-shore. I think that many of us of my vintage remember when Alberta was a have-not province. Certainly, it was the discovery of the very rich petroleum resources there that converted that province from a have-not into one of the really "have" provinces.

So again, if it is a social objective to give greater economic opportunity in the so-called have-not regions, then policies tending to encourage the exploration of those areas, whereby petroleum reserves may be found, are the kind of policies we must have in order to attain that objective. In the brief time at my disposal I am not really able to go over each of those particular objectives, and how government policies attempt to gear themselves to achieve those objectives, and to achieve a balance between those objectives in the total national interest. I think, however, I could briefly go over the economic objectives and indicate something on this subject to the House, because I believe most of the debate so far has been in respect of economic objectives. I think most of the criticism, or the doubt as to the validity of government policies, was centred in this area of economic objectives.

First, one of our chief economic objectives is to achieve the lowest cost energy mix so far as may be consistent with recovery of social cost and social objectives which involve a price tax penalty on uses of energy. Second, our objective is to realize the maximum over-all benefits to Canada from the domestic energy industries through making available a variety of energy supplies and facilitating the export of surplus energy at optimum prices. In other words, we think one of the fundamentals of Canada's energy policy, which may not have been appreciated, is to give the consumer, be he an industrial consumer or household consumer, the greatest possible mix of competing energy resources, and I mean truly competing.

I think we have seen this. I think it was not too long ago that there were many areas where the household consumer had two choices for heating his home, coal or oil. In most of those communities today he has four choices, coal, oil, hydro electricity, and natural gas. As I say, we have felt the policy should be to give this kind of true competition between energy resources themselves and in this method, by real competition, we would achieve the lowest cost and the greatest maximum choice for the consumer. In this regard, and despite some opinions expressed to the contrary, I do not think we can ever isolate the Canadian consumer from generally rising global energy costs. There is no way I know of that we can say, "Energy costs in the world are going up, but in some way we can keep them down for Canadian consumers despite world economic trends." I do not think this can be done. We do live in the world. We market our products in the world.

If we try to do this, attractive although it might appear, in our view what would happen would be that we would not get the kind of exploration, research and development in Canada's energy industries that would in fact keep costs down, no matter how great our supplies may be, or how great our potential may be. One thing that has been made manifest in the last year or two is that risk capital available for exploration and development in the petroleum game is global capital. There is no such thing as domestic capital for exploration. It moves throughout the world to where the prospects are likeliest, and it is a finite amount.

No matter how powerful are the corporate entities, incidentally some of them owned by governments with all the financial power of governments behind them, and no matter how powerful are the great private corporations, they do not have unlimited amounts of money for exploration, particularly for frontier exploration. They go to where the prospects are best. We have seen this happen. We have seen a great movement into the North Sea where there was very little exploration activity until a few years ago, at which time there was a find. We have seen a great movement to the eastern off-shore in Canada because the geological prospects were good. Incidentally, and with humility, I think the geographical survey of Canada, and those responsible for it deserve a great deal of the credit for having done the spade work which demonstrated the geological interest of the off-shore, both on the east coast and in the north.

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, these corporations go where the geology is good. They go where the political climate is good. Certainly, they will not be so prone to go to a country where, if they find oil, they may be expropriated the next week. And they go where they can market the product at a good return if they are successful in their exploratory activities. If we fix prices inordinately low in Canada, it appears to us all that this would result in the biggest proportion of the exploratory dollar going someplace else. Because if world prices are at a certain level, and Canadian prices are far below that, it must be remembered that it costs just as much to find oil here, and one of the principal costs of oil is that involved in finding it. Once you have the oil flowing, be it at Prudhoe Bay or in the Middle East, and you have 5,000 barrels a day coming out of a well—

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: The minister may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Greene: I thank hon. members for granting me this indulgence.

• (4:00 p.m.)

So, Mr. Chairman, I say our policies are not founded on the premise that because we have this great potential in Canada—I think the best estimates are that as yet only 10 per cent of our petroleum resources have been uncovered—therefore energy resources should be very cheap in this country. They will not be uncovered, even though they exist, if we think we can shelter from world conditions. I do think that we can have advantageous prices as compared with countries with no natural resources, but they must be related. If the price of energy increases throughout the world, so must the Canadian price. Although we must ensure that our prices do not increase as rapidly as others, still we cannot shelter completely or we will not get the development.

An example of this is the problem being faced by the United States at the present time with regard to natural gas. Contrary to opinion which has not researched the facts carefully, there is no innate shortage of natural gas in the United States at the present time. There is, however, a shortage of proven resources of natural gas. The opinions of the best experts that I have been able to read on this subject attribute this to the fact that prices were set too low perhaps because there was considerable political input. If the assessments that appear to be most valid are correct, it would appear that a few years ago the price of natural gas in the United States was so low it did not pay the entrepreneur to go and look for it. He took his money to other places in the world or invested it in bonds or something else, because looking for natural gas did not bring a good return on investment. The proof of the pudding in this regard is that today, when there is a problem of supply in proven resources of natural gas in the United States,—they have a great potential for producing gas from coal—regulatory agencies are revising the prices under contracts for natural gas in order to encourage more development and to ensure a good return to investors. They know that only by this method can they uncover more resources and meet the problems of shortage of supply in the future. Just because we have the potential in Canada, we cannot expect to shelter from the rising energy costs of the world. We can only make sure that we are always in a competitive or preferred position.

The third of the economic objectives of the policy directions for the development of over-all energy policies which will result in optimum economic efficiencies in all sectors of the energy industry, ranging from primary production to ultimate consumption must take into account such factors as the rates at which Canadian energy resources should be developed relative to Canadian energy needs and export possibilities; application of appropriate principles of conservation based upon developing technology, including such factors as increased recovery; minimization of waste; efficiency of energy conversion; utilization of by-products; substitution of more abundant energy sources in places of scarce energy sources; proper utilization of all energy sources, including imports within the consuming sector based upon cost-price relationships; premium quality of certain energy sources; appropriate contribution of each source to public revenue; pollution control aspects; consumer preference and convenience; the appropriate form and extent of government intervention which would range from exhortation through to state ownership within each sector of the energy industry and for each source of energy; the impact of other policies of government on energy matters; the integration of energy policies with other policies in order that energy development may make a major contribution toward national and regional goals. These economic objectives call for the selection of policies relative to the availability and use of an expanding economic supply of energy which are based on analysis of cost-price relationships, energy industry performance under the various market and price circumstances, and the proper role of government.

[Mr. Greene.]

These, Mr. Chairman, are generally the concepts with which the government attempts to approach the very difficult question of energy policies in Canada. To date, most of the production is in one region and most of the consumption is in another. As is so often the case in the Canadian conundrum, over the years decisions have probably been made which are not purely economic decisions—just as the CPR decision might not have been the best economic one at the time of confederation, though it made confederation possible. The decision regarding the original Trans-Canada pipeline was of that nature. Unquestionably, the natural economic market for Alberta gas was the midwest of the United States. As hon. members will recall, some people thought that Alberta gas should be shipped to its natural economic market of the midwest and the eastern markets of eastern Canada should be served with gas from the United States in exchange. That proposal was not accepted. The tradition and the necessity was to have transportation lines going east and west, and this included railway lines as well as natural gas pipelines. We found the typical Canadian solution and said that the major concern must be Canadian markets for Canadian natural gas. The Trans-Canada line was built, but in order to make the exploration and production economically viable, the surplus was set aside for the export market. Had it not been so, the entire exercise might not have been possible.

It is along these lines, Mr. Chairman, that hon. members have raised the very valid and possibly pregnant question of Canada's national oil policy which I think has been in existence since 1961. Whatever may be the current problems or the current need for review, I do not doubt that the time has come for us to take a very careful look at our oil policy. Whatever may be its present needs I think we can be happy with the past results. Whatever the need for the future, the policy has worked very well up to now, and I wish all our economic policies were as successful as the national oil policy and the national energy policy.

One of our great prime ministers, upon returning from a trip abroad and hearing some complaints from the opposition said, "I am surprised when I get back to hear how bad things are in Canada because I can assure you in many other parts of the world that I visited I found they would gladly exchange their problems for ours." I think that view would be a valid one with regard to Canada's oil and energy policies. Many things have contributed to the success of our oil policy. This success was partly, the result of policy, partly good timing in the world at large, partly good management by those responsible for managing, by the people in industry. Whatever the reason, the policies have worked well.

Our reserves of crude oil and natural gas liquids were 5.6 million barrels in 1963 and 10.4 million barrels in 1970. During that period, our reserves have just about doubled. These reserves can be used for whatever purpose we see fit from time to time. If in 1970 the Canadian government decided it was not going to export any more, it could do that. It would then be in the position of having almost double the reserves of seven years ago. Certainly, we would be in a far better position because of the policies which existed up to this point, including the policy of export which has enabled that kind of reserve.

I now wish to deal with the volume of sales during that period. The value of total sales in 1963 was $682 million. In 1970, it was $1,250 million. That not only connotes revenues to the federal government, and very great revenues in the form of royalties to the provincial governments, but a great deal of employment. This employment aspect includes people in the field doing the exploratory work and people in the factories of eastern Canada, including the province of Quebec. All our research indicates that the multiplier effect of the resource industries is very great. Also included are the people who produce the drilling equipment, rigs, steel and so on. These figures do not represent mere cash or profit. The sales figures represent a great deal of employment and economic well-being in Canada.

During the same period, our exports of Canadian oil also increased. The figure for 1963 is 260,000 barrels and for 1970, 750,000 barrels per day. Domestic sales of 520,000 barrels per day in 1963 increased to 700,000 barrels per day in 1970. Canada's net self-sufficiency in oil has increased from about 77 per cent in 1963 to about 100 per cent in 1970. I suggest that is an extremely important statistic.

With regard to our policies of expanding our export markets and maximizing our sales, the government is doing its best to improve the markets for those who have found oil. We are trying to get this oil to the market which pays the best price in the world, namely the United States market which is highly protected by the U.S. government. We could not compete if this market were wide open. The countries of the Far East could sell their oil much more cheaply than Canada. We have achieved a considerable inroad into the United States market. That kind of market place, as well as the Canadian domestic place, has encouraged exploration in Canada. It costs a great deal of money to keep a barrel of oil in inventory, just as it does to keep any item in inventory for an untoward period of time. If the market place is not available, we will not engender the kind of exploration which will give us the maximum development of our petroleum resources.

The fact is that these policies have worked and have engendered a great deal of exploration during the period 1963-70. Canada has gone from a deficit position where it was dependent on offshore oil, a position of some difficulty, to the position of being a self-sufficient nation. Today, Canada is 100 per cent self sufficient in oil, we deem that that is what we want to be.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the minister a question on that point? What percentage of our total oil consumption is met by purchases of offshore oil?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if I have those specific figures. If my memory serves me right, I believe that approximately one half of our oil consumption is from offshore purchases. I want to be fair to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. With regard to the question of security, he feels that we should seriously consider the question of whether we should build a pipeline to Montreal, thereby making us more secure. I agree that this would provide a greater security. A greater percentage of our total country could then be directly served by Canadian oil. The question is whether this would be a good policy at the present time.

When I say that approximately one half of our needs are met by offshore oil, this means that we are conserving or replacing the resources that we use. The hon. member takes the opposite view with regard to natural gas. If I understand his argument correctly, his view is that we should conserve because this natural gas will be needed further downstream. He feels that we should conserve, rather than export. With respect, I do not think he can have his argument both ways. If that is valid vis-à-vis natural gas, then that is exactly what happens with respect to oil. We are now replacing the oil which we use by importing offshore oil at a far cheaper price than that at which we sell. If we can replace non-renewable resources with imports of offshore oil at a lower price, that is a pretty good policy. In fact, it is sometimes too good a policy. Our friends to the south, particularly those in the New England states, would like to be able to do exactly what we are doing. The policy of conservation possibly could not be justified if it stultified the growth of our own natural gas industry, the petroleum industry in particular. Such is not the case. As I indicated, that industry has been particularly healthy during the period when these policies have worked.

Mr. Douglas: Will the minister permit a question on that point? Is it not a fact that we are really not conserving the oil that we are buying offshore? We are shipping an almost equivalent amount, or a very large amount, of oil out of the country. We are simply buying offshore oil in the east and selling our midwest oil to the United States.

Mr. Greene: That is correct, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member knows about this better than I because he was in western Canada at the time of the Borden commission. I am sure that was a very vital topic in western Canada at that time. As I understand it, the Borden commission concluded that a pipeline to the Montreal market would not be sound economics for Canada. We should achieve an admixture, which is the Canadian tradition in many areas, with major movement east and west. The Ontario market would be reserved for western oil. Exports to the south render the whole exercise viable in economic terms.

What we could have done, and I suppose what we could still do, though I suggest the argument for so doing is becoming even less convincing than it was during the time of the Borden commission, notwithstanding that the current price structure might not so indicate, is to have built, or build, a pipeline enabling us to use all our oil resources domestically. This must surely have resulted in one of two things. The cost of the pipeline would have to be underwritten in the cost of the oil; we could have kept wellhead prices low so as to keep prices relatively low in the east market, or we could have asked the eastern consumers to pay a far higher price for their gasoline and petroleum products. With respect, I think this would have amounted to a misuse of our resources. In my view we have had the best of all worlds. We have earned a considerable amount of foreign currency, which is badly needed, and we have been able to keep consumer prices down in the eastern market while at the same time enabling the western producer in a large measure to get optimum prices for his production.

I must admit that the national oil policy, when you look at it as such, is a strange-looking bird—the Ottawa Valley line, and so on, part of Canada being served by offshore oil and another part of Canada by domestic oil. This pol'cy does not possess the completeness, the rational perfection which the academician so admires. But it works. It works well. It has resulted in a healthy oil industry. It has made possible the best possible prices in eastern Canada, taking supplies which are the most competitive on world markets. At the same time, it has enabled us to earn a considerable amount in foreign currency. Maybe this arrangement will not work forever. This is one of the problems regarding opening up the United States market further to our production, if that is deemed to be in our interest, that we do already in fact have the best of all worlds.

Some hon. members have expressed the view that the rise in world oil prices might well be sufficient to motivate the construction of a Montreal pipeline. They argue that as world prices rise, and certainly the OPEC agreement with the oil companies will mean an appreciable rise—

An hon. Member: And Venezuela.

Mr. Greene: Venezuela has a new tax structure and Lybian agreement, although it is not yet resolved, will certainly result in higher world prices. Certainly, all this would indicate a need for review. But if world prices go up, it may be that United States domestic prices will increase that much more. We do not know just yet. It all points to the great difficulty of any Canadian sheltering from a world rise in price.

But the great question mark with respect to eastern markets being made available to Canadian production is the result of the exploration now going on offshore of Nova Scotia and in the north. This exploration, either of Nova Scotia or in the north, will be very expensive. Last summer, I had the pleasure of being on an oil rig something like 100 miles at sea, nautical miles or whatever Nova Scotians refer to in the terms of the trade. This being the case, if oil is found, in order to be economic it will have to be "big" oil and "big" oil in the trade means Prudhoe Bay type of oil. If oil were found in these quantities either in our great north or in our eastern offshore, it would seem to me there would clearly need to be a revision of Canada's national oil policy. I cannot see how we could permit such substantial finds of oil to lie dormant once they had been proved, or how we could commit them to world markets rather than to the Canadian domestic market. Again, I would think that when exploration is at such an advanced stage in those areas, when there is such a great potential in those areas, it would be premature to make a decision which would certainly give greater security at some price, although that price becomes less as world prices increase, by the building of a pipeline to Montreal markets. So, with respect, while the question is an important one, I suggest a decision to change policy at the present time would be premature.

Perhaps I might answer one of hon. members' questions. Some hon. members keep asking me for a specific review, a specific feasibility study. I have checked this carefully and I cannot come up with any feasibility study known as the Jones study or Smith study which finds one way or the other. My best information is that from the time of the Borden report, the National Energy Board, which certainly has considerable expertise in this area, has kept under constant and continuous review world prices, construction costs, cost of right of way and so on. It is the opinion of my officials, including officials of the Board, that while the economics are closer than at the time of the Borden Commission Report, the situation is not such that at the present time it would be a valid enterprise unless wellhead costs were reduced in the west, or consumer prices were increased in the east. While the equation is getting more favourable I suggest with respect it would be premature, until we know one way or another in the next two or three years what is going to happen in connection with the exploration programs in the north and offshore, to embark on the construction of a Montreal pipeline.

I do not know how long hon. members are going to be patient with me. I should like to mention the subject of the northern pipeline which was raised in most of the speeches made so far by hon. members in this portion of the debate. Hon. members were very properly interested in determining exactly what, if anything, had been done by the government in preparation for such a northern pipeline. May I say at the outset that I believe there is a misconception as to the basis of the government's research. We have never approached the research from the standpoint of it being up to the government to determine how, when and under what terms a pipeline should be built.

As I understand our law, and the National Energy Board Act in particular, what we must prepare ourselves to do is to assess properly and effectively any application for construction so that we can make a decision in the interests of the Canadian public generally both present and future. This has an important connotation. It means that a great deal of the research is done not at the expense of the taxpayers of Canada but, very properly, at the expense of those who may gain economic benefits as a legitimate result of their research, as builders of pipelines and entrepreneurs. If the government did all of the research and then decided when and how the pipeline was to be built, this would tremendously increase the cost to the Canadian taxpayers, and I do not think would be in keeping with our present law. It may be that Parliament, sometime later, will decide that it is up to government to build pipelines or to determine how and when pipelines should be built and that all research into the question should be conducted at public expense.

Our approach, and we believe it is sound, has been to prepare ourselves to deal with questions of economics, ecology, pipeline construction, safety of the tundra, the problem of permafrost and so on, so that if an application is made we can enlarge upon the guidelines of last August which resulted from the government's preliminary investigations over a period of two years. I think hon. members are more than familiar with them. What we said, in effect, was that these were the general guidelines to which any entrepreneur can look if he wishes to build a pipeline. As our research becomes more complete, I think undoubtedly we should define them more precisely and make the rules more clear and specific.

With regard to the wellbeing of indigenous peoples, the routing of the pipeline falls under the responsibility of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whose department, as I understand it, acts as a province would jurisdictionally in provincial areas. Undoubtedly, further clarification here is required. But may I emphasize to hon. members that our research has been oriented toward preparing all government agencies to deal effectively and responsibly, in the interests of the Canadian public, with any pipeline application that may be made.

We have not conducted our research as though we were going to go ahead and build the pipeline. We did feel that a considerable proportion of the cost should be borne by the public sector, and it has been; but a very major proportion should be borne by those who are economically interested in the potential of a pipeline, those who may reap reward from its construction. In all fairness their research has been made known to us. We have been kept abreast of everything they have been doing and have been permitted to share in their knowledge. Indeed, we have joined them in their research whenever we have wished.

I think it is of interest to note that from the standpoint of actual construction, it may be that a more comprehensive day to day type of research has been conducted by those entrepreneurs who contemplated building the Valdez line in Alaska. If they turn their attention to the possibility of a Mackenzie valley route, then we will, of course, expect them to make all their knowledge and information available to the Canadian government and its agencies in our determination of whether or not such a Mackenzie Valley route would be in the interest of the public of Canada. So again, in that sense, we are attempting to get the best of both worlds by obtaining information from both private and public sectors.

If I might deal as quickly as I can with some of the other matters it might help to indicate—

Mr. Douglas: Before the minister leaves that, would he prefer questions now or later?

Mr. Greene: Whatever suits hon. members. I will take them at any time.

Mr. Douglas: The minister has had a long spell and may be getting a little tired. While he is on this subject and his mind is fresh, may I ask him a question or two about pipelines.

The minister says that the government's position, in the main, is that it will respond to an application rather than do the preliminary work itself. It seems to me there are really three matters that have to be dealt with when any application to build a pipeline is made. These are, the effect of the line on the ecology, conducting an economic feasibility study, and what I would call the Canadian ownership or control aspect.

With respect to the ecology, I noticed that the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry said the other day in a speech he made in Vancouver that at the present time only the engineering and economic aspects are being discussed. There is relatively very little ecological data available to the National Energy Board. Under those circumstances, on what will the National Energy Board make this decision regarding the ecological effects? Are they going to accept the report of the company? We have all had pretty bad experiences in days gone by of governments accepting the opinions of interested parties as to what will be the result of a certain project.

As members of Parliament, we are going to become acquainted with such a project only after the National Energy Board has recommended it and the government has endorsed the proposal. Therefore, it is of some concern to us to know on what ecological studies will the National Energy Board and government base their decisions. Will a decision be made on the basis of the company's studies? Will studies be made of the effects of such a line on wildlife, on permafrost, on the tundra? It seems to me we need clarification of that point.

With regard to the economic feasibility study, I agree that the National Energy Board is competent to deal with that aspect.

The other matter on which I wish to say a word is what I call the Canadian ownership and control aspect. If a pipeline is to be build from Alaska through Canada to the United States, under the guidelines it has to be a common carrier. But what does that mean? It can be a common carrier only if we have something to say about the input and output. The only advantage to Canada of such a pipeline—apart from what little employment we may receive from the original construction of the line—would be that Canada could put oil into the pipeline. But is this oil that is going mainly to the United States? Is it oil that is going to increase our exports to the United States, or is it going to be piped into Canada for shipment to eastern Canada to meet the increased needs of Canadian consumers?

If this is to be the case then who is going to own and control the pipeline? If the line is going to be entirely U.S. owned, is the United States going to decide the flow?

If Alaskan oil uses all of the capacity of the line, how can Canadian oil enter the line? Before the government embarks upon discussions, does it have in mind reserving a certain part of the capacity of the line for Canadian input and output? Who is going to set the rates? If the rates are set abnormally high, then the fact that it is a common carrier becomes meaningless.

It seems to me we should ask the minister these questions since we shall get very little chance to ask them after the deal is signed, sealed and delivered. I cannot believe that the government is discussing with the oilmen only a land bridge through Canada rather than the TAPS route—which in our opinion would be a disaster. But if it is talking about a land route, surely the government must have given some thought, first to the ecology question, and second to how ownership and control of the line would be exercised, and what protection Canadians would have with respect thereto.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, I will try to answer the hon. member's questions as best I can. I think there are two, if I caught them correctly. The first question was, will we only respond to an application. May I say what we are attempting to do. We realize that this would not be a normal type of application. Normally, the National Energy Board Act governs. We know that the National Energy Board employs engineers, economists and scientists with a great deal of expertise, and we, as a government, do not usually involve ourselves in applications for the building of pipelines, except to ratify a decision or to dissent from a recommendation. But this, obviously, is of such economic and social moment that it is important from the point of view of Canada that the government should involve itself in a way it does not normally in respect of ordinary pipeline applications.

The hon. member has asked whether we will take at face value the ecological studies of the oil companies. We certainly will not take their studies alone at face value. The Minister of Fisheries and Forestry has already said in a speech, I believe, that such studies are not sufficiently ecologically downstream, so to speak, and that may be so. He was speaking of the ecology. He said that he has a particular interest in the wildlife studies. Certainly, those studies are not the responsibility of my department, and we have not done very much about the wildlife situation. I believe that the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, under the ALURA program, supports studies of this sort. I think that perhaps the new minister who will have responsibilities in this field will want to go ahead with such studies.

While talking of ecological studies generally may I say that the interdepartmental task force on northern oil as I indicated in my last review before the House, has appointed four subcommittees. One of those subcommittees was specifically the subcommittee to study ecological problems. My information is that that subcommittee is now sufficiently advanced in its work and will either issue or give to the government—perhaps I should not make them public because I do not know what the government will intend to do here—its guidelines. It seems to me that when we get their report we will look back to our own general, public guidelines and we will see that we said that one of the factors to be considered is the protection of the ecology. We will receive this report and we will be able, therefore, to enlarge upon it and say, "the ecology now means a, b, c, d, and e." I hope this research will go that far and, hence, that the picture will be made clearer in advance of an application being made.

Of course, both the departments as well as other departments, and the National Energy Board will be taking advantage of the research of the industry. I hope that we are able to assist them actively. Nevertheless, and I could not agree more with the hon. member in this, we must not overlook the fact, and I do not think anyone in this House overlooks it, that the oil industry, historically, not in Canada but globally, has not been altruistic and beneficent in its attitude to the public but has been, rather, a highly profit motivated industry. I could not agree more with the hon. member in that assertion. Certainly, we must look at these studies objectively.

For instance, I note that one of the companies is undertaking a study of the migration of caribou, a subject which I think the hon. member for Athabasca raised in one of his questions. We must consider this problem. Will the caribou cross the pipeline, or will the pipeline affect their migration, and, thus, not only the well-being of the wildlife of the area but the ability of the indigenous people who live off the caribou to maintain themselves. I am sure that we will not take the industry's study of the migration of the caribou at face value. The wildlife services will investigate the matter for themselves. I hope, thus, that we can make objective judgments and translate these into guidelines wherever possible or give the pertinent information to the National Energy Board, for it to consider in hearing applications.

The hon. member also asked about the regulatory authority over the line. May I point out to him that one of the guidelines in this area specifically says that the National Energy Board Act will prevail and that this pipeline, wherever it is built, if it cuts across Canada will come under the jurisdiction of the National Energy Board. That fact clearly indicates and connotes that it will be under Canadian regulatory authority.

The government could not agree more with another observation of the hon. member. If our land is used merely as a land bridge to enable American resources to get to American market places I would be the first to say, "go somewhere else." I would hate to see the oil pipeline go into Valdez, and then have the oil taken by tanker. But if that is all we were, a land bridge, I do not think we could consider a pipeline at all across the Mackenzie and I think our guidelines make this very clear. Nevertheless, in this area we cannot be specific or definitive, yet. We cannot say exactly what we mean by "common carrier" with respect to the pipeline. Because of the economics of the pipeline we do not know, yet, just how economic a proposition this is going to be and how much we can transgress on normal rules of economics and still have the line. If it turns out that this line can only be built in such a way that Canadians can only enter this line if there is slack in it, then we can say that we do not want the line under those conditions. However, we do not want to make a pre-judgment until all the economic facts are available.

There are problems connected, of course, with the economic concept. This is to be a very, very long line. If you fill the line completely with oil all the way from Prudhoe Bay to the United States, you will get a 100 per cent use of that line. If three quarters of the way to the market place a Canadian company wishes to introduce Canadian oil into the line and we say, "stop, you must make room for the Canadian oil in the line", then, of course, you will introduce slack in the line all the way back to Prudhoe Bay, or in about three quarters of the line, which might be an uneconomic or unprofitable use of the line or a "non-use" of the line.

As I understand it, under the present rules with respect to lines governed by the National Energy Board, the common carrier concept applies to oil lines presently, and not to gas lines. The board's concept works this way: if a downstream or downline user, in the judgment of the board, has an economic supply—some fellow with a thimble full of oil cannot come along and upset the economics of the line—it is up to the pipeline operators to allow this fellow to transport his oil. That is their responsibility, and that is one of the conditions of the original certificate. Whether this concept would work in this instance, and whether this would be a valid approach to the Mackenzie Valley line, we do not know yet.

May I say this with great respect to the House and to the country generally which is concerned about these problems, and quite properly so. Until a clearer picture of the economics of the line is seen, we really will not be able to tell how many burdens, if you like, which might be very much in the Canadian interest we can place on this line. Some of these decisions must await, therefore, the event of the application.

If, on the application, we see that this line cannot be a common carrier and that there is no way in which we can force Canadian oil into the line, our course is clear. Our guidelines clearly say that under those terms we must say, "we are sorry, but you cannot build the pipeline." Nevertheless, I feel certain from discussions to date, and from conversations I have had, that there will be an accommodation for Canadian oil in that line, and there must be such accommodation. We can determine these matters when an application is made. If the companies say, "if you want any more than that, you boys will be right out of the ball game," we can then decide to say, "it is you who are out of the ball game." Nevertheless, I do not think we should slam the door until, at least, we get a look at the horse. We should not close the barn door before we see the horse, if I may use such an analogy in my present non-agricultural portfolio.

Mr. Douglas: How did a horse get into a ball game?

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Greene: Again, the same problem arises in respect of ownership about which my hon. friend has asked. Although I do not believe he would put it this way because he is too much of a gentleman, he may find the guideline wishy-washy. It does not say the line has to be Canadian-owned. Again, for the same reason, the economics of this are fabulous and are unknown even to the entrepreneurs themselves. I recall that the original estimate in respect of the Valdez line was $1.2 billion but is now said to be in the order of $2 billion. This was a mistake that was made not by politicians but by the giant corporations which have expertise in the various fields and probably all over the world.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a question in order to refresh my memory. Do I recollect correctly that the guidelines stated there must be some provision for a measure of Canadian ownership in any pipeline?

Mr. Greene: I will see if I can find the exact wording. I may be paraphrasing, but I believe the wording is to the effect that there will be "substantial opportunity to Canadians for participating in the financing, engineering, construction, ownership and management of the pipeline." Now again, the wording "substantial opportunity" is not very definitive. Members may find it is not very helpful. From all the economic advice we could obtain at the time, whatever may have been our shortcomings, we knew we did not know very much about the economics. That may not be to our very great credit, but obviously neither did anybody else. I believe it is becoming more and more manifest that this undertaking is of such gigantic proportion that in terms of Canadian experience it is almost beyond anything that has ever happened to us. Although I do not know the exact answer, I have heard figures kicked around running all the way from $4 billion to $8 billion for the two lines, and with all the good will in the world I cannot help the House concerning which figures are accurate. I doubt whether anyone else can.

It is thus quite obvious it would be impossible to raise in Canada a very substantial proportion of the amount of money required. When one takes a look at our total economy and the total amount of Canadian savings in a year, it does not look likely. The ideal, if we could do so, would be to find a Canadian entrepreneur who would ensure that the equity would be in Canada and the debt would be somewhere else. That is the way Trans-Canada was financed. I think we would all be happy with such a situation. This, however, may not be possible. From my discussions with representatives of the companies, as well as the other research entities, I am quite certain that in respect of the engineering, construction and management we will have no problem in having maximum Canadian content. I think this will be so because I believe we are as good as anybody else in the world in this particular field. I am not worried about materials. I think every Canadian pipe manufacturing company and every Canadian steel manufacturing company would be engaged for four or five years if these lines were built. I am informed that with regard to the construction of 48 inch or larger pipe, every entity in the world which manufactures such pipe would be going full tilt.

On the matter of financing, as I said we want the maximum Canadian content and, other things being equal, whoever comes up with the maximum Canadian content will be the winner. However, it is quite possible there will not be more than one application. As I say, it will take all the resources of all the companies put together to even have a hope. So, we have particularly let them know our concern about Canadian content but have not frozen out anything. We will give Canadians all the opportunity they want, but if they do not pick it up there might be an offer which would mean the control would be in non-Canadian hands and we might or might not accept that. It is a matter of having a look before we would move in any direction. The ideal, of course, would be Canadian ownership. I think we are all concerned about the effect of non-ownership of our resources in Canada, particularly our energy resources and our natural resources. There are varying views. I was very impressed by the effective speech by the hon. member, I believe for Don Valley, who feels that we should not worry too much about ownership of resources, that resources are resources are resources, and should concentrate Canadian savings in things like book publishing and such which do make Canada unique. That is one view.

There is a limited amount of Canadian savings. We should not kid ourselves above this. I believe even the most nationalistic of economy nationalists say we need continued foreign investment in greater proportion than before. The question is, how do we get that foreign investment in such a way that it does not involve ownership of our country and does not affect our ability to direct our own destiny. In respect of a pipeline, if we do not own it, is this one of the things which would inhibit our ability to develop this country as we see fit. This is a question to which I believe all hon. members must address themselves. We might ask ourselves whether it would be good to have a great proportion of Canadian savings in the next few years end up in the pipeline and not be available for such things in the public sector as guaranteed incomes, public well-being and so on, or for the book publishing business and other things in the private sector, bearing in mind that this pipeline may be over Canadian territory.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' MOTIONS

WEST INDIES—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT IN TRADE AND CULTURAL RELATIONS

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of taking an initiative in seeking to promote closer and more harmonious relations with the Commonwealth Caribbean through the convening of heads-of-government or ministerial conference, efforts to increase trade between the region and Canada, strengthening cultural ties and generally an upgrading of priority for this region in Canadian foreign policy consideration.

• (5:00 p.m.)

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is not for me a new subject or a new interest. As many of my colleagues know, I have several times before raised this general question, although previously in a different terminology. I think I have reached something of an apogee of excellence in my phraseology this time! My great concern in this general question is simply that we must raise the priority which we give to the Commonwealth Caribbean in our foreign policy. This is the underlying aspect in all my presentations on this very important and interesting subject. The area to which I wish to draw the attention of Your Honour and that of my colleagues is a small area but it is one with large problems. It is an area which has all the difficulties or nearly all the difficulties facing emerging nations across the world. All the economic pains of the developing states are found in the Commonwealth Caribbean. They, too, have these intensive and intense questions of race, color and identity which are such vital questions and often such difficult probing questions in today's sensitive world.

But these communities have something else which should mean a great deal to parliamentarians of our tradition. The political institutions of the Commonwealth Caribbean, in the face of many assaults, have stood well, and are, I believe, a magnificent tribute to the type of political institutions which are of the same general structure as our own. In looking at this area, I think we should never forget that in the area of political institutions we have much in common. We are of the same mould, and our Commonwealth parliamentary relationships with these people are, as they should be, of the closest.

Since I last spoke, there have been developments in the Commonwealth Caribbean; there have been incidents and occurrences which some Canadians have viewed with great anxiety as indications of considerable distress.

There have been riots and protests against Canadian property in Trinidad and Tobago. I must point out that it was not only Canadian property at which the excitement of the people who were at that time moving about the streets was directed. There have been demonstrations with some anti-Canadian undertones or overtones, and there have been some sharp criticisms of Canadian policies on other occasions. Not that I believe or think that Canadians should believe that they are somehow immune from criticism or that throughout the world we should be universally loved and everlastingly adored. We think it is quite normal that there should be such a thing as anti-Americanism, but surely we cannot be immune from criticism and misunderstanding, so I am not disturbed by these incidents. It would however, be a mistake to overemphasize the incidents and to regard them as typifying any deep hatred or continuing hostility toward Canada. To take such a view, to make such a judgment would be, I believe, most unwise. But to pass them off as a mere nothing, to pretend that nothing really had happened, is, in my opinion, equally erroneous. We must not and cannot take these neighbours for granted—neighbours never should. They have grievances, and I am glad that they are expressing themselves with candor and sometimes with feeling.

As I said in the House at the time that the unilateral decision regarding the termination of the 29 cent sugar subsidy was announced, it was a bad thing because it was announced, and it was terrible because it was done unilaterally. It was a boober of major proportions, and I am glad that the government, which deserved censure for doing it, backtracked, changed its mind and left the subsidy at least for a year, and I hope it will be longer than a year, until adequate, thoughtful and sensible arrangements can be made.

There are problems regarding immigration, although I am convinced that our policies in immigration today are far better than they used to be, but there are still some difficulties and misunderstandings. Many people in the Commonwealth Caribbean sometimes suggest that we are willing to accept only those people whose contribution to their own lands would be most valuable. Knowing the dreary and painful story of the migration of the people from the Maritime provinces to other areas in North America, I have much sympathy for these feelings.

When in Barbados a few weeks ago—and as I look outside today I wish I had been able to stay—many people asked me why Canada had no mission in Bridgetown, in view of the fact that Barbados has a very fine high commission office in Ottawa. This is one situation which I greet with incredulity and with embarrassment. Surely, our austerity is not so compelling that we cannot afford to open a mission in the friendly and beautiful country of Barbados where so many Canadians are involved personally, financially and as residents. Indeed, it is an area of most extensive Canadian interest and involvement. Of course we should reciprocate and open a Barbados mission right away. We have fine missions in Trinidad, Tobago and Jamaica. I had the opportunity of visiting these people not long ago, but I think it is unfortunate that it was found necessary to cut down the personnel of these important missions. I recognize that good work has been done, and our country is generally well regarded in the area, not just for that oblique and negative virtue of our not being Englishmen or Americans, a kind of compliment which I never find very satisfying. I hope this is not the case.

The need is great and the opportunities for more service are immense in the area. In an earlier Parliament when presenting this subject I quoted a learned Canadian scholar, Professor Kontak from St. Francis Xavier University, who knows the West Indies and the Commonwealth Caribbean well. Professor Kontak returned from a recent extended visit to the Commonwealth Caribbean and reported that the friendship he found for Canada was almost unbelievable. He said:

> This friendship gives a feeling of both pride and embarrassment; pride because Canada has conducted her affairs in such a way as to produce this feeling, and embarrassment because she has done so little compared to what she is capable of and can afford to do.

I cannot summarize in a better way my own feeling with reference to our stake in the area and our opportunities in the region. Although I come from a part of Canada that has long been neglected—and may I say in candor never more than by the present government—I do not join those who believe that cutting off foreign aid would somehow, some way, miraculously bring us internal prosperity. Such is not the case. We must, even in a selfish way, take an interest and become involved in other parts of what is sometimes called this global village. But having said that, I reiterate a statement that I have often made since I came to the House of Commons, and that is one of doubt that Canada with its resources can mount meaningful programs of aid to 65 to 70 countries across the world. It cannot be done.

In many cases it is a mere drop in the bucket. So, we must select areas where we can hope to be effective. I believe that no part of the world with which we have contact, for which we are concerned, and in which we have an interest deserves a higher priority than the Commonwealth Caribbean. In this important area we can, I believe, not only be effective, but in some parts of the Commonwealth Caribbean our aid, our interest, our assistance and our friendship could indeed be decisive as some of the communities, whose political and economic viability is very precarious, struggle with problems and cope with difficulties which might very easily overwhelm their institutions, assault their stability, and create the kind of conditions which would bring no good to them, no good to Canada, and no good to those people who believe in a peaceful free world.

My motion endeavours to set out some areas in which I think we can do more. I have been very worried for some time that the high water mark of 1966, when the former Prime Minister, Mr. Pearson, assembled in Ottawa a heads of government conference, was much higher than the level we are now performing upon. I believe we should have taken the initiative in assuring that there would be another heads of government meeting in our time, or at least ministerial meetings, to indicate, to underscore and to re-emphasize the concern we have for this area.

I believe we can strengthen our ties through parliamentary delegations. When I was in Port-of-Spain I was impressed to hear the Speaker of the Lower House and the President of the Upper House suggest that we should develop a pattern of exchanges between our legislative bodies and theirs. I hope it will be possible for this kind of initiative to be followed. I believe there are great opportunities for more cultural exchanges. I remember so vividly the magnificent performance of the wonderful calypso group who came up to Canada in 1967. Now, I am expecting to see another group which I believe the governments of Trinidad, and Tobago have indicated they will send, as they have been the winners of the great carnival contest.

Students have done a splendid job. Students from the West Indies, from the Commonwealth Caribbean area, have long been in our universities. I have seen them in my classes years ago. I have the highest regard for them. I think we should be doing more now in trying through our programs to assist students who would remain, for at least a large part of their course, down in institutions in that area.

We can also increase trade. I do not pretend that the opportunities are immense, or that it is a tremendous area of growth. And we do have to take into consideration changing tastes and changing technology. But there is ground for a substantial improvement. I believe, particularly, we should assist in increasing and stimulating the flow of seaborne commerce. Perhaps we are entering a new era where we must look to the riches in the sea, on the sea, and under the sea, and become more conscious of those possibilities. This is why I suppose we from the Atlantic provinces have long known the charm of the West Indies and the value of friendship with them.

Also important in the whole Canadian program with respect to the Commonwealth Caribbean is the work done by the individuals down there, sent by CDA and CUSO, and by the other group, the retired executives, CESO which some nasty person has called the paunch corps. There are many stimulating and interesting experiments being carried out there. In Jamaica, in their capital city, the Casa Monte hotel has been turned into a school for hotel training, run by a former dean of Ryerson Institute. A fine job is being done by that man, and by many Canadians who have outstanding experience in the hotel field here.

Canadian agriculturalists are helping with a program of agricultural development, especially in the raising of cattle. I discovered down there some fine Canadian Holstein cattle, which are being bred in the islands. I only ask one question: why weren't there more from Prince Edward Island, which is very famous for its Holstein cattle?

But to move from agriculture to teaching, I think there we get to the real ambassadors. I can well remember the vice-principal of the Manchester teacher training school, in Manchester, Jamaica, telling us one and all at a meeting that without its Canadian friends the school would have had to close long ago. Every year one meets and hears of bright Canadian people, interested Canadian people, outward looking Canadian young people who are down there doing a fine job.

I suggest again, as I did on motions the other day, that we do make a mistake in one respect. When we send people to various parts of the world they are given a briefing by the Department of External Affairs but when they come back, full of knowledge, and enriched with concern, no one pays any attention to them. The department should find ways to communicate with these people and draw on their knowledge, experience and concern.

We should and must do more. It may be unusual for a member of this House to enter into salutations to the other house, but I am convinced the finest study done on this question for a long, long time was that by the foreign affairs committee of the Senate. I commend their exercise. I support their recommendations. I believe they are giving leadership in a path which we should follow, namely, to do more, to think more on this whole question, and we will all benefit as we strengthen our bonds with the Commonwealth Caribbean.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I fully support the motion put forward by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). It is rather difficult to follow him in the debate because he has covered the subject so well. Those of us who were here in 1966 when there was a conference between the Canadian government and the Caribbean governments had great hopes at that time. We expected a dramatic improvement in relations between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean countries. I must be frank and state that the results to date have not come up to our expectations. It is true that there have been improvements in some areas, but there has been deterioration in others.

As a member from Montreal, I cannot help but be aware of the riots which we had at Sir George Williams University. We have a large number of Caribbean immigrants in Montreal. I have been in touch with them often I have many friends among the Caribbean community, but I repeat that while there have been certain advances, in some areas there has been deterioration.

I endorse the suggestion made by the hon. member for Hillsborough that another conference between Canada and Commonwealth Caribbean countries be held at the heads of government level. Last fall the Hon. Paul Martin, the Leader of the Senate and a member of the cabinet, visited some 13 countries and territories in the Caribbean area. He made an effort to follow up on many of the matters that had been discussed previously, and to bring about improved relations with those governments. The report on his trip can be found in the statement which he made in the Senate on December 8, 1970, and which was recorded in the Senate Hansard of that date at page 293. It was a very extensive report.

In addition, in 1970 we had the report of the Senate Committee on Canadian Caribbean relations. While I also congratulate the Senate and support most of its recommendations, I think we must realize that the evidence which formed the basis of that report was evidence that was taken mainly from a Canadian perspective. If I remember my reading of the report correctly, I think all the witnesses were Canadians or non-Caribbean citizens. The report is valuable but I think more is needed.

• (5:20 p.m.)

In 1970 we also had the publication of the government's policy statements on foreign policy, but no special mention was made of the Commonwealth Caribbean. I agree with the report of the Senate and with the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) when he said that the Commonwealth Caribbean should be given a special place in our foreign policy. I want to emphasize that, Mr. Speaker. The grounds for that special place were put forward when we had a conference in 1966 but were not followed up in the way we expected. The basis for that special place is primarily due to the fact that the Commonwealth Caribbean countries—as a matter of fact all Caribbean countries—are our neighbours and we share many things. We have historical ties in trade; we were both colonies of Great Britain; we share social and political institutions and, above all, we need each other. There are things that they can help us with and vice versa. These increased relations, Mr. Speaker, have to be carried on as neighbour to neighbour and friend to friend, as equals and not in a neo-colonial way nor a paternalistic way.

The areas where increased relations can take place, and these have been referred to in the motion, are areas of trade, aid, foreign investment and tourism. With respect to aid, the goal must be to develop the independence of these people. It should primarily be aid without strings, untied aid. It should be directed to the self-fulfilment of people living in these areas. Following on that, if we are serious in our aid programs, there must be trade. We cannot pretend to assist people, put money into their country so that they can develop, and then refuse to trade with them; trade is extremely important. The mistake we made with the sugar agreement was corrected, but I think it is important that in all trade relations with the Caribbean countries we work as partners and with full consultation.

Some of the most sensitive areas have been in the field of foreign investment. Canada and Canadian private companies are very visible in the Commonwealth Caribbean. You don't have to go very far to see that our banks, the aluminium company, many of the hotels and a lot of the tourist industry are Canadian owned and operated. In the past there has been criticism that Canadian companies operating in the Caribbean have not provided enough participation at the local level; that wages were at the minimum level; that not enough attention was paid to enlightened employer-employee relations nor to the wishes of the people as expressed in their local legislatures and local government. I think this is being corrected. I think Canadian companies operating in the Caribbean are aware of the aspirations of the people and are trying to correct some of the failings of the past.

The Senate Committee made several good recommendations which I think are worth while. In the area of Canadian government machinery, they suggested that the Interdepartmental Committee on Canada-Commonwealth Caribbean Relations should be given a clear and precise mandate to maintain a continuing overview of current and long term issues. They felt it was necessary that there be a co-ordinating agency within the Canadian government which would treat the Caribbean area as a special area. Another important recommendation was that there should be established in Canada a Caribbean marketing agency. This recommendation reads:

> The Canadian government should suggest the establishment of a joint Canada-Caribbean marketing agency to be funded initially as required by Canada. Such an agency could conduct market surveys, establish distribution contracts, advertise and generally promote complementary two-way trade. This could be a relatively low cost assistance project yielding substantial and lasting results for the Caribbean countries. By selecting promising export products, (examples at this time would include bananas, rum, and certain citrus products), the agency could have a highly beneficial impact.

Then, there is tourism, Mr. Speaker, and this is an area which is likely to be sensitive. Very often Canadians take the point of view that all the tourism that is directed to the Caribbean countries by Canadians is valuable. It can be touchy when Canadians live in very luxurious hotels in those countries, often to the benefit of the Canadian hotel owners and the Canadian tourists, without too much benefit going to the countries themselves. I thought the Senate Committee made some worth-while points on this issue as well when they said, at page xxii of their report:

> Evidence given before the committee indicated that tourism has had a number of undesirable social side-effects without necessarily bringing all the expected economic benefits. The committee recognizes that the responsibility for solving these problems rests primarily with the local governments, but has several specific proposals to make.

The committee goes on to suggest that goods and services required by the tourist industry should be purchased in the Caribbean countries, so that the industry will stimulate secondary and tertiary effects in the economy. This is a worth-while recommendation.

In the area of immigration we see a considerable increase from the Caribbean over the last few years, especially in Montreal. Many outstanding citizens have come to us from the Caribbean but there is that touchy problem of "brain drain". Sometimes we are in a dilemma to know whether we should encourage the best trained people to come to Canada when they might be needed in their own countries. On the one hand, we are helping the university of the West Indies to train people but often we find the best ones coming to Canada. This is a touchy problem, but I don't think it is for the Canadian government to put any type of restriction on immigration from the Caribbean. In this area we have to work in close co-operation with the governments of that area: we have to respond to requests with respect to immigration, especially the immigration of their highly-trained people.

There has been some unrest and hostility over the past few years, but there has also been a lot of good will. The worst that Canadians could do would be to react too quickly to some of the social movements that are going on in the Caribbean. We should continue to act in a positive way toward this problem. We should not become too upset when demonstrations are made against our companies and government, because these will pass if we act positively toward these people and improve and strengthen our relations with them.

Although there has been deterioration since 1966, there has also been improvement. Last year a bilateral air agreement was signed with Trinidad, Tobago and Jamaica. Canadian development assistance was effectively utilized with an allocation of $24 million. The Caribbean Development Bank, with Canada as a non-regional member, was formally established. The sugar rebate was extended for 1971, and an agricultural development fund of $5 million was established. These are some of the gains that were made in 1971.

In conclusion, I congratulate the hon. member for Hillsborough for his continuing efforts to improve our relations with Caribbean Commonwealth countries. Many on this side of the House give him full support.

Mr. Doug Rowland (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I will make just a brief intervention. I join the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) in extending congratulations to the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) for presenting this resolution to the House.

I wish to comment on two matters with regard to our special relationship with the Caribbean arising out of a common language and underlying cultural affinity. This is an ideal field for Canada to work closely with area governments concerned to develop policies of a pilot nature which could then be employed in furthering our relationships with other nations of the world. If this argument sounds involved, I will attempt to be more specific.

Any developed nation which attempts to establish relationships with developing nations, and in so doing provides economic assistance through public means and private capital, encounters the difficulty—such as we have seen in the Caribbean—of eventually becoming charged with embarking upon neo-imperialist policies. Because of the special affinities between the Caribbean and Canada, the Caribbean is an ideal area for us to begin working out ways of avoiding this particular problem, which will become greater because over the past years our government has become committed to a policy of increasing the amount of foreign aid to other countries.

Could we not use our special relationship with the Caribbean, in consultation with the area governments, to attempt to develop ways and means of providing the assistance they require which will not carry with it charges of neo-imperialism? Could we not develop ways and means of ensuring that Canadian private investment in the Caribbean area meets with the criteria for economic self-development and the maintenance and control of their own economies which the Caribbean would like to see? In short, could we not put some special effort into the particular problems of this area in the hope that the formulas thus established would have wider application?

The second matter which I wish to draw to the attention of the House is one in which we might have some success in developing a pilot project in conjunction with the Commonwealth Caribbean nations. I refer to immigration. The two previous speakers have indicated the problem with regard to immigration. We tend to skim off the cream of developing countries by bringing their best educated people to our country. In this way we are dealing an economic blow to the country which has spent money to educate these people to the extent that they become acceptable under our immigration laws. At the same time, we are doing very little to assist those countries in dealing with the many problems they have with regard to the vast numbers of lesser skilled people.

In consultation with the Caribbean governments we could develop a pilot project whereby Canada would undertake to bring in certain numbers of people who do not meet our strict immigration requirements. This could be done on the clear understanding that the government of Canada would undertake to provide them with the necessary training and education to live within our boundaries. I am not speaking of a program of bringing in vast numbers of people; I am simply suggesting a pilot program which could be worked out in the Caribbean area where there is so much in the nature of cultural and linguistic affinities, the results of which could eventually be applied in other areas of the world.

While I have not stated these suggestions in a detailed form, they are in keeping with the suggestions in the resolution of the hon. member for Hillsborough. I hope that some member of the government will find time to examine these suggestions to see if acceptable programs of the type I have suggested could be worked out in detail.

Mr. James Hugh Faulkner (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will be very brief. I think there are at least three other members who want to speak. There have been three very thoughtful speeches on this important resolution. I concur with a great many of the points raised by the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). The hon. member raised three specific points in his speech which was filled with important points, which is typical of the hon. member.

One suggestion, which was reinforced by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) was basically sound. We should not be diverted from maintaining close relations with the Commonwealth Caribbean countries because of unpleasant instances, such as occurred in Montreal, or difficulties which Canadians or Canadian institutions encounter in the Commonwealth Caribbean countries. These are often short-term difficulties which are associated with problems of development and relations between developing and developed countries. This is an important point.

The hon. member for Hillsborough stated that we should not yield to the misguided pressure that comes from some quarters—that charity begins at home. He stated that aid should not be viewed as a charitable operation. Relations between developing and developed countries are mutually advantageous, even self-serving.

Where aid is involved, this is part of a process which helps the developed countries as well as the developing countries, particularly through developing new markets. When the claim is made that we have problems in our own country which should be attended to, we should not be diverted from the main thrust and purpose of foreign aid programs, albeit that some of our problems are compelling and must receive attention. However, one cannot be solved at the expense of the other. It is up to the members of this House to maintain the balance in public argument on this question.

Another interesting point which the hon. member raised was that our institutions are similar and our problems as legislators are in some ways common. He stated that we should have more contact with each other, not simply during the winter months. I would certainly welcome a month's sojourn in the Barbados. He stated that at times convenient to both sides we should meet and discuss mutual problems. He stated that when parliamentary delegations visit these countries, there should be some form of follow-up approach with the Department of External Affairs. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg) is in the chamber. On at least one occasion we have travelled together on an important mission. We were very gratified by the fact that following a mission a real interest was shown by the Department of External Affairs. There could be an important input from parliamentary delegations who have visited abroad.

I disagree with the hon. member for Hillsborough and the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce that our relations with the Commonwealth Caribbean countries are not developing. I found his argument difficult to accept. Furthermore, it is not clear to me what both hon. members mean when they talk about a special case in our foreign policy. Listening to their speeches, I did not detect supporting arguments for this contention. The only way in which the degree of priority attached to the Commonwealth Caribbean can be judged is by the facts—and it seems to me the facts are impressive. I will return to this point.

In his resolution, the hon. member for Hillsborough made an issue of one point. To quote from the motion before us, he argues that close and more harmonious relations should be brought about with the Caribbean through convening conferences between heads of state or ministers. Personally, I do not feel strongly either for or against meetings of ministers or heads of state. I have an idea that this type of arrangement is no more effective than the kind of close bilateral contacts we presently have with the Caribbean. I do not think it can be argued that because we have not convened successive conferences between heads of state or ministers our ties with the Caribbean are not rated as of first-rank importance by the Canadian government. I happen to support bilateral relations of the kind being pursued at the present time; I believe they are more effective.

I should like to put on record an indication of the extent and complexity of our present ties, because this is the only way in which we are able to judge the importance the government attaches to the relations between Canada and the Caribbean at the present time. I think we ought to review the extent and complexity of Canadian interests in the area, both governmental and private. At present it is estimated that there is $450 million to $550 million in Canadian investment in the region. During 1970 Canadian exports reached $134.1 million as compared with $113 million in 1969, and imports totalled $77.9 million as compared with $108.7 million in 1969. In the past five years over $100 million has been allocated to the Commonwealth Caribbean under the Canadian development assistance program, including $24 million in 1970-71.

At present there are over 3,000 Canadians living as permanent residents in the region, and over 125,000 Canadians visit the islands annually. During 1970 nearly 14,000 West Indians emigrated to Canada. Here is the best kind of cultural exchange—an exchange of people. There are Canadian High Commissions in Jamaica, Trinidad, Tobago and Guyana, and these three countries, plus Barbados, maintain High Commissions in Ottawa. The Leeward and Windward Islands have a commissioner in Montreal.

Consider our development assistance program. I am reciting this because I believe it is a basic fact upon which hon. members can judge whether or not priority is given to our relationship with the Commonwealth West Indies. In the 1970-71 fiscal year, $24 million were allocated to the Commonwealth Caribbean, with a major concentration in the sectors of education, transportation, water and sewage systems, and civil aviation, including airports and infrastructure. In addition to specific projects in individual countries, assistance within the aid allocation I have outlined is being provided to the multinational University of the West Indies and to the University of Guyana.

On a per capita basis, the Commonwealth Caribbean is the largest recipient of any region receiving Canadian development assistance. This is the point I am making. If we are to assess whether relations are developing or deteriorating, one can best do so in terms of facts such as I have put on record. This brings me to a point which was raised by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

The relationship between a developing country and a developed country poses extremely difficult problems for both. If we go beyond the pious sentiments we express from time to time about the need for assisting developing countries, we are bound to think intelligently about what we mean by trade. We cannot simply provide assistance to help build up a domestic industry, and then exclude from our markets the exports of the country concerned. I suggest that hon. members look closely at the results of the UNCTAD conference, or take a look at the Algerian resolution setting out the demands of the developing countries in terms of their trade relationship with the developed countries.

As I say, the difficulties attached to these relationships are great. All of us have industries in our constituencies which would be affected by any meaningful easing of import restrictions. All of us have constituents employed in Canadian industry who would be affected if we were to admit more freely exports from developing countries which would compete directly with domestic manufacturers. Decisions in this area are hard to make—but I hope we have gone beyond the stage of rhetoric, the stage at which we are prepared only to talk piously about assistance, and have reached the point at which we ask ourselves what precisely we are prepared to do to allow developing countries to sell their products to us. We have some tough decisions to take, but that is the point we are now at.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Darthmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my hon. friend from Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and others in saying a few words about this proposal. I congratulate my hon. friend, not only because his motion is in front of us today but because this distinguished member of the House has spent a great part of his life voicing concern about the relationship between Canada and those delightful islands not too far south of us.

With respect to the delightfulness of the islands, I have yet to be made aware of any government aid having anything to do with my desire to be in the Caribbean during the wintertime. It is just that on occasion it is a hell of a lot more delightful down there than it is here. I had intended to make other comments to reinforce the arguments of my colleague who brought this matter to our attention, particularly with respect to the absence of representation in Bridgetown, but I think trade is a useful way to measure the reality of our relationships and the concern we have for them.

A previous speaker asked us not to get carried away by our own rhetoric, but I cannot resist answering him by saying that although he left us with the impression that there has been an increase in trade—true, there has—the relative impact of trade in general and the relative position of our fish and flour exports to the Caribbean in terms of their imports are the true measure of our concern. Our trade with the Caribbean has been going down. Our flour exports to the Caribbean are away down, even though consumption of flour on the islands has not gone down. I am not saying whose fault it is. In many instances it may be the fault of our own entrepreneurs. Perhaps we should have encouraged Canadians to build flour mills in the Caribbean; but we backed away from this, and I should like to know why.

I do not want to isolate flour from other commodities. Let me take fish. Traditionally, Canada has supplied much of the fish eaten in the Caribbean area, but in recent years, while in absolute terms trade has gone up, in relative terms our share of the market has gone down. Perhaps this is because we have not catered to the increasing sophistication of taste and well-being on the part of the residents of the islands. Perhaps we have taken them for granted. Perhaps we are continuing to take them too much for granted and this is why our relative trade picture has worsened. Perhaps we have not done enough to encourage imports of certain fruits and other traditional north-south trade commodities for hundreds of years. It is to this point that I wish to address myself.

[Mr. Faulkner.]

Throughout my life in Halifax—and, I suspect, the lives of my great, great grandparents too—our Maritimes relations with this part of the world have been warm and continuous. But it is here, at the level of the central government, that the emphasis must be placed? The degree of our interest in the Caribbean must find its source of authority here, not in the Maritimes. I said a moment ago that our declining trade picture is not our fault. I could have mentioned meats. Why cannot we compete with Australia and New Zealand in meat exports to Caribbean countries? Why have we not done those things that encourage, at the senior minister level, an ever closer and growing relationship between Canada and the Commonwealth Caribbean? Why have we been satisfied to rest on the success of bilateral relationships? I suggest this is no way to measure the degree of concern that we should have for our friends in the Caribbean. I have spent a number of years in that part of the world, very delightful years. I have also spent some time in South America. But never have I sensed, in and around the islands, anything but good will toward Canada. Nevertheless, from my own personal experience in the area, not to mention the evidence we have had in recent years, the fact is we are not paying the attention to the Caribbean that we should and could without any cost to ourselves.

As the hon. member for Hillsborough said, there should be more consultation and meetings at a higher level, to the mutual benefit of us both. We would not be the benefactors, as was the impression left by the speaker who has just resumed his seat. We are two separate entities who enjoy very much in common. But we are in a position to do much more. We are in a position to take advantage of our ability to do more, to do that which we have failed to do. In the narrow area of trade, the fact that while our trade has increased, its relative position in the Commonwealth Caribbean has diminished must be the measure of our sincerity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. It being six o'clock the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business has expired. The House will now resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISION RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-207, an act respecting the organization of the government of Canada. Spring seems reluctant to appear, but hon. members have moved very quickly from the rigours of the north to the sunny comfort of the Caribbean in less than one hour. However, the committee will now adjourn and will return to the north at 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto. When the committee rose at five o'clock it was considering clause 8.

On clause 8—Department of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, I thank hon. members for being so patient with my rather lengthy review of the matters raised in questions posed by hon. members. I have tried to the best of my ability to answer at least the major questions asked by hon. gentlemen opposite. May I finish the point I was making at five o'clock respecting foreign ownership. Although we have stressed that Canadian ownership would be one of the ingredients which would receive preference under the guidelines, we have purposely not made any complete, final and definitive resolution as to the quantum or nature of the ownership because we did not known the complete economics of such pipeline or pipelines. We wanted that decision to be made when applicants came forward with active propositions.

Very likely, this will be a single applicant because of the magnitude of the enterprise. We can determine at that time whether the degree of Canadian ownership is sufficient. If it is clear from the economics of the project that we might either have to take a certain degree of Canadian ownership or postpone the project, or not go ahead with it for the time being, if it were not feasible in any other way, the decision would have to be made at that time. To make the decision in advance, before knowing what the economic connotations of the pipeline are, we thought would be prejudging the issue before we had the facts with which to judge it.

As I was saying at five o'clock, we must determine our priorities for Canadian ownership or, if you like, the gradual improvement of Canadian ownership in our resources and in our Canadian industrial complex generally. We can then determine whether we want this quantum, be it at $5 billion, $4 billion or $8 billion, to be made up of Canadian savings in pipelines, or whether we prefer to have that amount of money put into other areas of Canadian ownership. I was pointing out that the line will be on Canadian territory, subject to Canadian law, subject to Canadian regulatory agencies and, no doubt, the subject matter of some pre-existing agreements either with the companies or with the United States government which will determine in large measure the responsibilities of the line for the carrying of Canadian products. It may be that this will be one area in which we will not require the quantum or percentage of Canadian ownership that we feel is essential in other Canadian resources or industrial entities.

Again I say that we have in some measure left that question open, but with a clear indication that the matter of Canadian content in all forms, including that of financial ownership, will be very much in our minds. An application with the provision of maximum Canadian ownership would quite clearly receive priority over an application with provision for a lesser content of Canadian ownership.

May I briefly deal with one other point which was raised by hon. members, the question of gas reserves. This is a very important question, and I would not want to leave in the air any question or suggestion that the government had any doubts as to the capabilities of the National Energy Board in determining gas reserves before making its decision to permit gas exports. I think the record of the National Energy Board is an extremely good one; it has been extremely good in the period that the board has served the Canadian public. I think the board has been right in a large percentage of times although, as in any other human institutions, it may be wrong from time to time. But it has been more often right than wrong. With regard to the question of gas reserves which the board determines to be available for Canadian use, present and future, before declaring a surplus for export, I think it is extremely important for the record to be kept clear. The estimates of the National Energy Board, of the requirements of Canada as indicated in their decision of August, 1970, in the matter of export applications, make substantial allowances for an increasing share in the Canadian market for natural gas.

Specifically, the estimates provided for, (a) the expansion of services to Vancouver Island, (b) a generous allowance for thermal electric use in British Columbia, which is not used at the present time, (c) a total allowance for Alberta, almost identical to the estimates made by the Alberta Oil and gas conservation board, (d) an allowance for Saskatchewan to support a much higher level of potash production than foreseen by some of the applicants for export licences, and (e) an allowance for the use of natural gas in the Hearne plant of Ontario and two possible other hydro plants.

The National Energy Board, in declaring the quantum of gas which could be declared surplus to Canadian requirements, and thus available for export, sought to establish an amount equal to approximately 30 years of Canadian need at the current level of demand. It may be argued that this amount is not enough or is too much, but I would point out that in the producing areas some people feel that this is far too conservative an estimate. They have argued that this would inhibit exploration and thus, in the long run, diminish the reserves that would be available for Canada.

So we can have the argument both ways. It may be argued that this amount is not enough, or is too much.

However, in the board's judgment it was the correct amount to set aside for future Canadian requirements and the government relied on the board's judgment. I am prepared to back the board against any so-called experts upon whom others feel they can rely. In this regard, I might say the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands indicated he relied on other experts. His view of the board's judgment was the opposite to that of those in Alberta who contend the board was too cautious and, hence, inhibited growth. The hon. member's experts apparently are of the opinion that the board was too optimistic and should have kept much more gas for Canadian use in inventory.

If there is such a group of experts, I am sure the government and the board would be glad to hear from them and compare their expert judgment to that of the very great expertise which exists on the board. But until we hear from experts whose credentials are more notable and whose record is established as being superior to that of the board, or whose argument is so profound as to indicate the board was wrong in its judgment, I think we can and should rely on the judgment of the National Energy Board in this regard.

My hon. friend frowns on exporting that which is surplus to Canadian needs. Perhaps I might examine the economics in respect of no further exports of surplus. As I indicated, in respect of the non-export of oil there will be a substantial cost of holding the surplus in inventory. The Canadian Petroleum Association has estimated that it would cost $3 million to carry one trillion cubic feet in inventory for one year. That, of course, is a cost that would be borne by the consumers of gas be they Canadian or others, and most of the gas—I believe some 60 per cent or more—is consumed by Canadian consumers. These consumers would, of course, bear the cost of holding the gas. The price of holding these resources in Canada in the long run, as I say, would have to be borne by Canadian consumers through much higher prices and a decrease in additions to reserves because of reduced cash flow to producers and explorers.

My hon. friend also asked what proportion of the readily accessible gas is being held in reserve for the use of Canadians. I would point out that some 36 trillion cubic feet, or two-thirds of the established reserves of 54 trillion cubic feet, are dedicated to the Canadian market. The Canadian Petroleum Association estimates the potential reserves of gas in Canada are 725 trillion cubic feet. Reserves found to date represent only about 9 per cent of Canada's potential reserves and, as I say, two-thirds of those are held for the Canadian domestic market.

I might also briefly refer to the hon. gentleman's concern in respect of the recent hearings of the board at which the president of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines indicated there was insufficient gas to satisfy the needs of current application. I would point out that as a result of hearings and subsequent investigation, the board has found—and the decision of the board is now public record—that Trans-Canada has sufficient gas to meet the requirements of application and could deliver the gas to satisfy those particular contracts.

Mr. Benjamin: Do you still believe the president?

Mr. Greene: Well, Mr. Speaker, the applicants before the board of course are there to make a particular case and to seek approval of the board for a particular application. They are partisans in the particular application, and, of course, make—as I believe would any applicants in such a proceeding—as forcible a case as they can. But I am merely citing the decision of the board in that particular case.

One further matter I might briefly touch upon, which I believe hon. members would be interested in having an answer to, concerns the allusion to the report of the National Energy Board on the subject of energy supply and demand in Canada from 1968 to 1990 which was published in December, 1969. First, I would point out that this is the report of the staff of the National Energy Board and is not binding on the board itself sitting as a judicial or quasi-judicial body. The board, of course, is not bound by the findings. Its staff is presenting this report, so that the Canadian public generally, the parliament of Canada and potential consumers might be advised of the prognostications in respect of supply and demand. The board in each case, however, must be satisfied by any evidence current at the particular hearing as to what reserves are available on that particular day.

I think this should resolve any qualms hon. members might have that this report of the board's staff is in any way binding on the board in any future hearings. It is merely an information document which is available to the people of Canada and to parliament concerning the prognostication for energy supply and demand.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands had some concern that in the 1990 prognostication the board indicated that the demand for natural gas in Canada would be, on a per capita basis, the same as that which existed in the United States in 1975. He found, by reason of our climate, that there was something inordinate in this conclusion. Might I point out that, again, these are the prognostications of the staff and are not binding upon the board. That conclusion was based upon the premise that some 42 per cent of Canada's energy needs in 1990 would be met by electricity generated in Canada, whereas in the same period in 1990 the prognostications are that only some 9 per cent or 10 per cent, if memory serves me correctly, of the United States demands for energy will be met by electricity. This possibly is the reason, in making its conclusions, that the board's staff determined that a far higher percentage of the needs would have to be met by natural gas in the United States.

I think, Mr. Chairman, to the best of my ability I have tried to answer most of the questions. I apologize to members for having taken so long, but this is a subject matter of great importance and one, needless to say, in which I am very much involved and exercised about. I thank hon. members for bearing with me.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I know there is some agreement, and I give the minister his due because I think much of what he said in the last hour and a half has been most useful and will bear re-reading. But I am a little disappointed that he did not have anything to say about tidal power. I wonder, before we move on, whether he could indicate whether or not meetings are contemplated between agencies responsible for the generation of power in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and officials here in Ottawa in respect of power generally, and the Minas Basin tidal power in particular. If he would tell us when meetings might be contemplated and give some indication of what they would be talking about, I would be happy to move on.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the point raised by the hon. member and, I think, the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants who spoke on the same subject, I apologize that I did not go to the question of the Minas Basin power. I did not do so, advisedly. I hope I am not betraying a confidence—I do not think I am—when I say that at the request of the provinces there are to be meetings tomorrow between my officials and the officials of the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia power authorities in respect of the Minas Basin study and the possibilities of review. So I did not think I could add anything useful by discussing the matter at this time.

Whether or not as a result of those discussions I will be able to make any public announcement, I really do not know; but this is a tripartite study embarked on by the federal government, the government of Nova Scotia and the government of New Brunswick. I have felt all along that as the government we should not embark unilaterally upon any changes or upon any frolic of our own with regard to the Minas Basin, but that we should move, as we have before, in any study procedures, at least, in conjunction with the provinces if they so wished. I am informed that the provinces have requested this review at the official level, on a technical level, which is to take place tomorrow morning.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands is not here at the moment, but I am sure that if he were he would agree with me that whether or not the minister has answered all the questions which he raised when he was speaking on Friday, at least the minister has tried to deal with the subject matter of those questions. In fact, I must say that in listening to the minister I had a feeling that if the late Hon. Jimmy Gardiner had been here today to hear him, he would have been willing to admit that at last he had met his match in the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

I do not rise to prolong or to renew the debate that has taken place between the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and the minister on this question of the energy policy, the export of gas, and so on. My only comment would be that as I listened to the minister relating his remarks to those of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands it became abundantly clear, to me at least, that whereas the minister kept referring to gas resources as if they were property of a few individual corporations, my leader was thinking in terms of the fact that they really are the heritage of the Canadian people and, as the minister indicated—and on this he agrees with the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands—are in the classification of non-renewable resources.

I would like to ask one or two questions related to another passage of the minister's statement today, namely, the question with which he dealt at some length pertaining to the possible construction of an oil and gas pipeline down the Mackenzie River valley. He himself indicated that much of what is involved, because of the very size, nature and complexity of the project, lies outside the ambit of the ordinary considerations of the National Energy Board. Some of us, as we listened to the pronouncements of the minister in response to questions and in an earlier debate on this subject, felt as if here in Parliament we were being asked to consider positions being taken by the government almost in a vacuum.

I would like to ask the minister one or two questions in this context. It seems to me that very germane to the question of what can or should be done in connection with the construction of an oil or gas pipeline, or both, down the Mackenzie River valley is the legislative action which we took in the last session in respect of the Territorial Lands Act and, in particular, with reference to the land use regulation. When we discussed this bill in committee, some of us in the committee and in the House thought we had a pretty clear undertaking that some time during the earlier part of this session the House or the standing committee would be seized of the draft regulations that were proposed, because it was not disputed in committee that the meat and substance of the legislative changes that we were being asked to approve lay in what would in fact be the land use regulations.

So far we have not had a chance to see what those land regulations are, and this is what I mean when I suggest to the minister that in effect we are being asked to consider and discuss the pros and cons of the proposed pipeline construction in a vacuum. We have no point of reference that has any real meaning or solidity to it.

I recognize that the administration of the Territorial Lands Act is the responsibility of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and that he is absent on a trip in connection with another aspect of his duties. But it does seem to me that it would be very useful, in considering the questions that have been raised in this debate on the proposed changes to the operation and function of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, to have some definitive information on what in fact is in those land use regulations. We would then be in a much better position to discuss and assess the kind of questions that come to our mind with regard to whether or not this development would be ecologically sound.

We do not know what areas will be encompassed in those land use regulations. We do not know, except in a very general way, whether they will be drafted in relation to the varying degrees of sensitivity of the ecology in the northern areas. The House of Commons is being asked to come to grips with what the minister himself has described as some of the most momentous and far-reaching decisions in which Parliament will be involved in our lifetime, decisions of magnitude that vitally affect the whole future course of events for the Canadian nation. Such a simple thing as honouring a commitment to place before Parliament these land use regulations should be fulfilled before we get further into the decision-making process, further in our attempts to assess the pros and cons of the statements that various ministers have been making.

I hope that the minister, who I know has been closely involved with his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in the formulation of what he referred to as guidelines and in discussions that they have had with the oil interests, will be able to shed some light on when, in fact, we can expect to be given the kind of information that might flow from a chance to examine and study the land use regulations for the territories.

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. member quite properly says, the land use regulations under the Territorial Lands Act do not come within the purview of my responsibilities. Quite apart from any possibility of a pipeline, I think that if an undertaking were given it would be fulfilled as soon as possible by the government or the responsible minister. I want to assure the hon. member, whose concern in these matters is not of recent vintage and who has shown a great interest particularly in the ecological problems affecting these questions, that prior to any hearing taking place before the National Energy Board the government's ground rules and the basis for them will be made very clear.

I might point out that this has been a very different situation from 1956 when, as I understand it, the debate in respect of the construction of the pipeline was probably the first opportunity Parliament had to get its teeth into the problem. I would point out that since then we have had the National Energy Board Act. Many hon. members have evidenced their concern that there should be a hearing. I do not know whether there will be other hearings. There may be other hearings; for instance, to determine problems peculiar to the administration of the Northwest Territories. But certainly there will be hearings before the National Energy Board, something which was not the order of the day in 1956.

The application of any applicant before the National Energy Board will be a matter of public record, a public document, a public application which can be studied by any interested members or by the public. Any government decision affecting the hearing will be made public well ahead of any hearing, and certainly any member of the public or any public organization will have full right to appear at such hearing. There may never be a hearing about an oil pipeline in our lifetime, as I think we have made clear in our discussions with the industry. We have no assurance whatsoever that any application will be made with respect to an oil pipeline; so it may be that all our debate here will have turned out to be in vain, although it has been a very useful debate.

If such an application does ever come, I think it is extremely important that the House has considered all aspects of the possibilities well ahead of the event. And I believe, in my humble judgment, that there will be an application about a gas line. I think the economics of a gas line are very much a probability. I can only assure the hon. member that before such a hearing takes place we will make public any government determinations, including the land use regulations, if they are applicable, or such rulings apart from the regulations as may be made by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development with regard to the location of the pipeline. We will consider the corridor, etc., so that all members will have the maximum knowledge and information available to them prior to the hearing. Therefore, this public hearing, which will be available to the people of Canada prior to such an important decision, will in fact be a useful public hearing wherein there is maximum information and, hence, maximum capability not only to hon. members but to Canadians generally to make their views known to that tribunal.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall clause 8 carry?

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, last Friday I posed several questions to the minister which he partially answered today. I would like to get a little more information from him tonight on matters which I think are of general interest to members of the House. I listened with a great deal of interest to the minister this afternoon. I think we all appreciate the information he gave us on the various matters with which he dealt. Everyone realizes the tremendous scope we have in the field of energy resources and how important these resources are to the well-being of Canada.

The other day I asked the minister this question—and I repeat it now: Are ecological studies under way in the minister's department or any other department to determine the possible effects of oil pipelines on the ecology of the north?

Mr. Hogarth: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. We have spent almost 20 days in debate on this bill. I understand that we are in committee of the whole considering clause 8 which deals with the differentiation between the duties of the minister who has just spoken and those of the new minister of the environment. I ask, what is the relevance of the question asked by the hon. member to this particular clause? It seems to me we must get ahead with the bill. We are getting absolutely nowhere by ranging over the whole field of natural resources when considering clause 8.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The hon. member for Kootenay West will appreciate that he must relate his remarks and questions to the subject matter of clause 8. The explanatory notes to the clause are clear enough. They read:

The amendments proposed by this clause would distinguish between the duties of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and those assigned to the Minister of the Environment—

On the other hand, during the good speech which we listened to previously we heard a great deal about the ecology and studies on ecology, even though I must admit that I still know very little about the ecology after listening to a lot of what has been said about it. I hope the hon. member for Kootenay West will relate his question and statements to the clause under consideration.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I am amazed that any hon. member would try to stop others from asking questions about problems connected with a pipeline in the north, when the minister himself has spent two hours this afternoon and this evening dealing with one—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The Chair has been trying to co-operate with hon. members on both sides. I ask the hon. member to proceed with his questions and statements on clause 8.

Mr. Harding: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I am quite certain that the points I am going to raise are along the lines which the minister has been discussing this afternoon. He has given the House a complete outline. We are trying to get a little more information from him on the various points which he raised this afternoon.

Mr. Hogarth: Let us get on with clause 8.

Mr. Harding: That is exactly what I am doing. I would like the minister to indicate what research programs are being undertaken by his department on the effect of pipelines on the ecology of the north.

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Hogarth: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise the same point of order. With the greatest respect, that question has absolutely nothing to do with clause 8.

An hon. Member: Where were you this afternoon?

Mr. Hogarth: It appears to me that when the hon. member suggests—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. The Chair does not need to be reminded of what has already happened. I ask the hon. member for Kootenay West to speak to the clause and avoid any reference to the point of order, whether it was a legitimate point of order or not.

Mr. Harding: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. However, I should like to raise this point of order: Why have you permitted a wide ranging debate on the very topic that I am trying to discuss now?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harding: The minister has ranged over the whole field.

An hon. Member: From 3.30 to six o'clock!

Mr. Harding: All I am asking is the same privilege that you extended to the minister and other members in this matter.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I think the hon. member should realize that I have been asking him to proceed. The hon. member has been given the floor repeatedly to speak to clause 8.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I have already asked the minister a question and I was waiting for his reply. I asked what studies are going on in the minister's department in connection with surveys on the ecology in relation to this pipeline.

An hon. Member: That will take a full day's debate.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, I did the best I could this afternoon in more than the time allotted to me to answer the very wide range of questions posed by hon. members of the opposition, including the leader of the hon. gentleman's party. I think this is what hon. members would want, that I should try to answer as best I could in the time available to me.

With respect to the various studies on ecology and other subjects that are going on, if the hon. member for Kootenay West will take the time, he will find that when this question was raised on a previous opposition day, I think a week from last Friday, I tried to give as comprehensive an answer as I could regarding the various studies going on in my department, in the National Energy Board and in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. My colleague, the Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development, spoke in the debate as well.

I felt we gave a very comprehensive review of the studies being made both in the private and public sector and in the universities in regard to the ecology safeguards in the north. If the hon. member does not find this answer satisfactory, I regret that in the ten days or so which have elapsed since, nothing new has been added.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I have gone over the debate for several days and have found no reference to any specific program. That is what we are interested in.

An hon. Member: That is not true.

Mr. Harding: I am not asking the minister what is going on in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—his own department, I still have not received that information. In fact, on Friday the minister said that when the estimates were up—he was referring to these estimates—he would expand on the projects that were under his department, but apparently he is not going to do that.

There are a couple of other questions, Mr. Chairman. The minister was speaking about natural gas supplies and indicated that apparently Trans-Canada Pipe Lines have recently been before the National Energy Board. I ask the minister now how recent was this hearing between Trans-Canada Pipe Lines and the National Energy Board, on natural gas supplies to eastern Canada?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member's leader referred to the hearings. As I recall it, these hearings were within the last month or so. I cannot put my finger on the document but I believe that is so. I referred the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands to the board's decision, and I think that answered his query.

Mr. Harding: A further question, Mr. Chairman. There was some indication that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines had an opportunity to vastly increase sales to their customers in eastern Canada. Some weeks ago, before the final hearing took place, there was an indication that they had been told by the pipeline company that the supplies just were not there; there were not sufficient supplies to increase sales. Do I understand that this problem has been solved, and that an unlimited amount of natural gas is available to customers in eastern Canada?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Speaker, I think that was the point raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. In its report of February, 1971, the board found that Trans-Canada Pipe Lines has in fact contracts to meet the gas requirements of the particular application. The board does not make findings in vacuo; they have not found they have sufficient gas to meet all possible demands from now on. What they found in the August decision was that there is 54 trillion cubic feet of proven reserves in Canada. In the February decision they found that Trans-Canada had sufficient gas under contract to meet the particular application in question, and that the February decision adverted to—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. With all due respect, I think there has been sufficient discussion outside of clause 8 at the present time. Further discussion should be limited to the subject matter of the clause.

Mr. Harding: I am going to go back to the question of a national grid which I raised the other day. This deals with hydro power, energy derived from power, if that is what my friends on the other side want. I am going to ask the minister—

Mr. Borrie: A point of order—

An hon. Member: Filibuster!

An hon. Member: This is the first time he has got to his feet since Christmas.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, it is quite obvious from the explanatory note that this clause will distinguish between the duties of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and those assigned to the minister of the environment.

Mr. Borrie: It certainly does not appear to me or to other members of this House, Mr. Chairman, that the member is being relevant to the discussion.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. I again ask the hon. member for Kootenay West to limit his remarks to clause 8 and not to introduce subjects which are foreign or may belong to another debate.

Mr. Harding: Mr. Chairman, I am dealing with energy, including energy developed from water. That is clause 8, and that is the very thing I am dealing with. I want to know how this is going to fit into the national grid. This question was raised the other day in the debate. Nothing could tie in more closely than hydro power. We are not talking about the establishment of a new department; we are talking about clause 8, which reads in part:

(a) energy, including energy developed from water;
(b) mines and minerals and other non-renewable resources;

• (8:50 p.m.)

And so on down the line. I ask hon. members to read the section. My question to the minister is: What rules are being made to establish this national grid, and just where does the department stand with respect to it at this time?

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, I will bow to Your Honour's decision. I certainly do not want to transgress Your Honour's ruling as to whether I should answer this question. I am prepared to bow to your decision.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): If the minister will confine his answer to the question within the limits of the bill, I would appreciate it very much.

Mr. Borrie: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I was under the impression that Your Honour had ruled in my favour by disposing of the question that had been put by the member.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, we are all anxious to move on with the bill. I know that hon. members opposite are as anxious as we are to get this bill through. It is the furthest thought from their mind to in any way delay or obstruct the passage of this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Greene: It may well be that I can expedite the passage of this bill by answering the hon. member's questions, relevant or not. As the hon. member stated Mr. Chairman, some years back the then Minister of Trade and Commerce enunciated government policy to have a national energy grid. I am instructed that while this grid is most useful in areas of high-population density, it has been progressing at a considerable pace. The Trans-Canada grid studies were conducted in the period 1964-67. Since their conclusion, the Trans-Canada grid has been steadily evolving on sound economic grounds. This is evidenced by the New Brunswick-Nova Scotia strong connection, the Quebec-New Brunswick strong connection, the Ontario-Manitoba strong connection, the Saskatchewan-Manitoba connection announced and one in place based on the Nelson River program; and the Ontario-Quebec connection, one existing and one planned.

Thus, a strong, economic power grid is evolving through these interprovincial connections which will in due course lead to a full grid from coast to coast. It may be that the hon. member's information on this score is the one case where he was not properly informed with regard to energy policy.

Clause 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 26—Department established.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The committee will now consider part VI of the bill, Post Office, found on page 8 of the bill. Shall clause 26 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall clause 27 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some confusion. One of my colleagues wishes to speak on the Post Office section. Did Your Honour call it, or not?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. The Chair called part VI, and also the page number. If the hon. member wants to speak on clause 26—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, the sound system is not working. That is the reason the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock did not hear Your Honour call clause 26. I ask Your Honour to call clause 26 again.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall clause 26 carry?

Mr. Mather: Mr. Chairman, I did not hear Your Honour when this clause was called. I think the sound system was cut off at that moment.

Mr. Greene: Your colleagues can neither hear, nor comprehend.

Mr. Mather: The proposal before us under this clause states that there shall be a Post Office and there shall be a Postmaster General. The point is that the Postmaster General shall be a full member of the cabinet. As far as Postmaster Generals go, Mr. Chairman, they go very rapidly. In the past 14 years we have had nine or 10 Postmasters General; I have lost count. The turnover of Postmasters General takes place at an almost indecent rate. This is one of the few things that is weakening the generally good record of our Post Office.

It might be worth while spending a few moments to discuss this great public enterprise which we operate, the Post Office of Canada. The Post Office Department handles close to five billion pieces of mail every year. It serves five million doors across the country. It employs 47,000 people and operates some 9,000 branch post offices. Financially, the last figures I have indicate that the Post Office takes in approximately $444 million a year. Out of that it is losing almost $52 million a year, $1 million a week. This sounds like a great deal of money to lose. In a way it is. But if we consider that we have between 20 million and 22 million Canadians which the Post Office serves, the loss per capita is not very great.

If we divide $1 million per week by 21 million or 22 million Canadians, the Post office is operating at a loss of between four cents and five cents per capita each week. More than half of that four or five cents per week per capita is generated by the loss on second-class mail; that is, mail put out for commercial reasons in the hope of profit.

Over the years the Post Office has consistently done well with regard to carrying the ordinary first-class letters which it was basically set up to deliver. It has operated in this category either at a small profit or at a small loss. At the present time I estimate that the loss on first-class mail amounts to less than one cent per capita. But the Post Office has consistently lost on second-class mail, and this has long been a subject of criticism by the Auditor General and the Public Accounts Committee which have recommended that steps be taken to deal with this situation. Lest anyone assume I am suggesting that the postal loss with regard to second-class mail results from carrying small weekly newspapers, I wish to add that this loss amounts to but $2.3 million a year out of a total of $27 million in connection with profit-motivated mail.

These are some of the broad outlines of the postal business we are operating. It is a vast business, and we should consider that its purpose and use to our country goes beyond exact calculation in terms of dollars and cents. It would not be wrong to say that our postal system is contributing something to our national identity in the same way as the CBC is doing in another field. Dollars and cents are important matters to take into consideration, but one ought not to measure what the Post Office is doing strictly on that basis.

In some respects there is something very odd about the way in which the Post Office operates. For example, the public pays, through the Department of Public Works, for the accommodation of post offices across Canada. This charge is borne by the public in addition to what it pays in the course of buying postage stamps. The postal buildings are free to the Post Office. On the other hand, the Post Office performs services for a variety of departments and also to members of Parliament, for example, who enjoy free mailing facilities during the session. My view is that this is a quaint and curious situation which should be changed. In this respect we should be able to place the postal service on a strictly business basis, on a dollar and cents level.

I have drawn attention to the fact that the great loss to the Post Office is incurred in the area of second-class mail. This loss amounts to about 2 to 2½ cents per capita per week. If it desired to reduce this cost we should consider whether the second-class mail rate should be further increased, taking into consideration the social services which the Post Office provides through the circulation of all types of mail. I do not think we can sum it all up with a few references to dollar losses or gains; the postal service is much greater than that, in my opinion.

The second area in which the Post Office is losing money relates to the imbalance of what it must carry free of charge, largely emanating from the United States. As hon. members know, the universal postal agreement is basically a simple understanding between countries that they will carry the mail of another free of charge. This is an excellent basis for co-operation around the world and 132 countries are now involved on this basis. But Canada finds herself in a unique position with respect to the United States, a country with ten times its population. Canada is naturally required in these circumstances to carry a much greater volume of mail from the United States free of charge than is the United States with respect to Canadian mail. The imbalance of foreign mail, largely from the United States, leads to a loss in the order of $5 million every year. Efforts should be continued—and I know that some are being made—to rectify this situation.

A third area in which we need to improve the situation of the Post Office involves our quaint procedure of giving free accommodation to post offices and then requiring the Post Office to service departments of government free. This is an outmoded way of doing business and we should change it. We heard from the Post Office last week some good news for a change. Instead of being told about impending increases in postal rates or reductions in the service or disputes with employees, we were told about a new and more efficient method of handling mail, a new zip code procedure, probably the best type in the world, which would speed mail deliveries. This is a good step forward.

It seems to me sometimes that in the postal service, as in other spheres of endeavour, we suffer from the fact that while we are actually living in conditions of the future, we are still mired in the old ideas of the past. Electronics, which no doubt will play an increasingly important role in the postal services, will in future make it unnecessary, for example, to mail millions of old age pension cheques or family allowance cheques, largely to the same recipients, every few weeks or so. It will be possible to have this money deposited regularly in the accounts of recipients across Canada by electronic impulses, thus eliminating the need to mail and deliver millions of these bits of paper.

In conclusion, I wish to make these recommendations. We have heard that the Post Office is contemplating an increase in first and second-class mail rates. My recommendation is that there should be no increase in the first-class mail rate. It is not very long since we increased the charge on local mail by 50 per cent and by 20 per cent in the case of on-going mail. First-class mail over the years has come very close to paying its own way and it is still in that area: out of the five cents per capita per week which I mentioned as being the cost to Canadians of the postal deficit, the loss on first-class mail amounts to between half a cent and one cent a week.

Then again, the largest part of the first-class mail no longer consists of letters written by individuals to other individuals. The great bulk of it is sent out by business firms in the form of bills—hydro bills, telephone bills, oil and gas bills, and so on—to consumers. My contention is that if the first-class mail rate is again increased, these corporations will find that their costs have been increased and will soon pass the increase back to the people who receive the bills. In effect, we may find that the ordinary letter-writers of Canada are paying twice—they will pay more when they buy stamps because the price will have gone up, and they will be charged more for their telephone or hydro bills because those bills will cost more to deliver. I say, please leave the first-class mail rate as it is.

[Mr. Mather.]

In the second place, I think it would be wise if we were to take a hard look at the profit-oriented mail in Canada. This is the area in which we are losing about half of this five cent per capita loss per week. If we have to increase this rate further, let us do so, although we must keep in mind the services in employment, the creation of business and extent of the communications which come within the realm of second-class mail. It is not a matter of saying that we are losing "X" dollars on second-class mail and have to increase the rate. We have to think beyond that and take a comprehensive look at it. I think the loss on second-class mail is about 2½ cents, at the most three cents, per capita per week.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Thirdly, let us press on to gain an adjustment of the imbalance of what it costs Canada to carry foreign mail under the international postal agreement. I think we can hope to reduce the approximately $5 million which that imbalance presently costs Canadians. Finally, I think we should realize that with all its difficulties and troubles, our postal service is a very excellent one and has set a very good example to private organizations in Canada. When you consider the millions of people it serves without error, the little cost to the community involved and the fact that it is part of a world wide organization—132 countries participate in the international postal service—I feel that our Post Office is a worthy one and that we should consider how best to improve it in regard both to its efficiency and the reduction of its costs.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I am not philosophically a devotee of the doctrine of reincarnation but tonight I have some sympathy for those who believe in that doctrine, in that my distinguished colleague the hon. member for Brandon-Souris being absent, it is my lot, happy or unhappy, to discuss before this Parliament and on behalf of my party the important part of this very controversial measure now before the committee.

It is not for me an unmixed blessing to be cast across the aisle from the Minister of Communications who is still legally and technically the Postmaster General of this country.

An hon. Member: We are going to miss him.

Mr. Macquarrie: Yes, in some ways I might miss him. I am somewhat surprised to see this particular clause of the bill come so soon before us, because not too many minutes before the adjournment I heard the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in full flight and it was my studied judgment that it would be many, many hours before he and those who questioned him would be finished with their interrogation and deliberation upon that particular aspect of this measure.

I should like to say that it should be borne in mind that in these last few months the government of this country has chosen to have in charge of the very important administrative functions of the Post Office a man who is not a full-fledged minister, honourable man though he be. The government has allowed to continue week upon week a situation wherein another minister, who conveniently or otherwise divorced himself from the operations of this very important department, has carried on as Postmaster General of Canada. This has been noted. One also notes in this legislation that in this new category of ministers, and something less than ministers, the man who has responsibility for a large group of diligent public servants—the employees of the Post Office—is cast in an inferior role, whereas the other minister of this some time quodam merit department, the Minister of Communications, has but a handful of personnel under his jurisdiction yet has the senior status of a fully-fledged minister. I may be quietly disturbed by this but if I were minister of state in charge of the Post Office I would be unquietly disturbed at this sort of judgment. But it is not for me to make comments upon the value judgments of ministers of the cabinet and ministers of state.

I should like to say that I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken with reference to first-class mail. I think that for too many months the people of Canada have had to pay through the nose—or through the stamp—for the outrageous maladministration of the office of the man who is now the Minister of Communications of this country. I think that to suggest that you pile Pelion on Ossa and ask for even more, and that you follow the dismal, dreary recommendations of Peat, Marwick in one of his committees so that we would end up paying 26 cents for a first-class stamp, is a little more than even the most tolerant and insomnolent Canadians can bear.

I should like to say right now that I oppose the suggestion—as I opposed it two years ago—that, whether because of maladministration, of which we have had, God knows, plenty, whether because of increasing technological costs or whether because of unfortunate comparisons with other departments, the people of Canada who still use the mails should be soaked in order to overcome the iniquities and stupidities of those who have been running the Post Office. I do not view with equanimity the suggestion emanating, I believe, from the minister who, when this bill passes, is to be in charge of the Post Office—a man whose judgment, moderation and cordiality I admire greatly—that the only answer to maladministration in the Post Office is soaking, soaking, and soaking still further the people of Canada who still use the mails.

I have said in this House many times that while it was all very glamorous and delightful for the Minister of Communications to speak, as he often did when he was in great trouble—and the Post Office was nearly always in trouble when he was in charge—of wired cities and futuristic communications, there were still Canadians who, although I do not want to sound antique or quaint, like to have their mail delivered to them. This may sound preposterous, and Canadians may be old-fashioned or square, but they believe that a letter mailed with postage paid to the full should eventually be delivered—and this is what has not been happening in the Post Office.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, it happens eventually.

Mr. Macquarrie: My hon. friend says it happens eventually. I have known of letters that have taken six months to travel 60 miles, and 12 months to travel 90 miles. I am not sufficient of a mathematician to work out the fascinating equations involved, but while the former minister talked about advancing technology we all know that the fundamental aspect of rapidity of delivery has diminished, and diminished in direct proportion to the minister's talk about the increasing cost of technological advances.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I have said before, and I say again, that I hope his successor, who has been through the ropes, who is a man of compassion and a man of understanding, will show and continue to show compassion for the problems of the users of the Canadian Post Office. We used to call them patrons. We have been cautioned against that, because a patron receives services, and that is not what you are to expect now of the Post Office. Perhaps I ought to call them users of the Post Office. In any event, I think the upcoming minister who will be in charge of the Post Office cares; and to that extent, and I am sure that in this regard I speak on behalf of my party, I would not wish to oppose his taking over the responsibilities of the Post Office.

I think he cares. I think he has been convinced that the wholesale, automatic, cold calculation whereby rural post office after rural post office has been closed has not been particularly good, especially when it has been found that under the alternative arrangements substituted therefor the treasury of this country has charged the citizens of this country who have supported this government more for service which is less satisfying and far less efficient than that which they had before.

I know that the minister who is to be in charge of the Post Office is a man of modern ideas and good will. I know that he would be the last man to accept certain suggestions and would not willingly be forced into a position in which he would need to repudiate the futuristic and 99 per cent nonsensical suggestions of his predecessor. I do not want to delve into or touch upon that particularly sensitive area.

I have spent some time in this House discussing the kind of extravaganzas the Minister of Communications has embarked upon. At times he seemed to believe that the transportation and communication of the written word was totally passé and that we should be thinking of the futuristic conveyance of ideas. Where the hardware that was to transport these ideas was to come from was something which could be left for future generations to decide I suspect that the Post Office bothered and bored him. As I walked to the House of Commons at two o'clock this afternoon, I saw the Lapalme drivers. These are men who have come down day after day in good weather and bad weather. I thought that perhaps the minister was indulging in a sort of protective colonation. I thought that he was trying not to think too frequently of the Post Office service, which did not operate very well and which, under his inspired leadership, resulted in the diminution, decay or death of many important media of communication—daily, technical and weekly newspapers and many journals of opinion.

I thought perhaps he was adopting a protective colouration and the kind of psychological evacuation that all mortal men are inclined to follow, because I suspect he was not thinking very much of the Post Office. I suspected that he might look the other way when he saw these Lapalme workers, and that he might be thinking of Telesat and other devices for communication which were not so mundane, so dreary or so common as to involve something as simple as the delivering of mail from a remote child to its father or mother. With such devices, he would not be bothered about the delivery of a statement from a business house to one of its customers, or the delivery of a statement from the customer to the business house: he would not be bothered too much about church papers, about academic journals or about those media of thoughtful, intellectual communication which pleaded with the minister and which for months told him about the problems that would be created if he failed to relent. He was told of the strict, stringent, hurtful, unnecessary and improper inhibitions which would be placed upon the communication of ideas in a time and in a country in which the free market and movement of ideas was more important than ever before.

I can remember so well, Mr. Chairman, when the Minister of Communications, an eminent businessman far more successful in that field than I, an impecunious ex-professor could ever be, told us how he was going to assault and assail these iniquitous deficits in the Post Office and how he ranged back over the years, talking of the carelessness of his predecessors—I am afraid that I must include the minister-designate in this category—and how he condemned what he called wastefulness and lack of business capacity. I remember how he said that he was going to bring his magnificent acumen to bear and how we were to have a Post Office which by negation or by deprivation would operate in the black.

I am wondering just what he is thinking now, as he looks at the pertinent statistics. I am wondering whether he regrets the costly and painful fiasco relating to mail delivery in Montreal. I will not trouble him about the human problem; it is there for all to see, because day after day the Lapalme people parade outside this House. I will not bother him by talking of the many, many people in Canada who look upon the government as an organization which, while it takes much from them, gives to them very few things—and one of the few things it gives them is the capacity for communicating with their loved ones and others in other parts of the country. I will not dwell upon the fact that Canadians have been denied, since the Minister of Communications brought in these money-saving reforms, the benefit of mail delivery on Saturday. I am told that as a result of pressure from the Liberal caucus—one cannot give credit to the Conservatives or the NDP for this because, after all, they raised this question every day!—a compromise was reached. If you lived in the country, you could get your mail six days a week; but if you were an urbanite, you got it only five days a week. I wonder how many have suffered from this particular and rather stupid form of discrimination which came about as a result of the activities of an unusual combination of pressure groups.

As I look back over the whole Post Office story and at the man who is to be charged with responsibility in this area—I try to build him up in my mind as a man of compassion, as I have always been, and look on him with an admixture of hope and experience—I wonder what is in store for the people of Canada. Thousands of dollars have been spent and costly examinations and studies have been undertaken. If I were a member of Peat, Marwick or whoever else may be involved why, my goodness, I would not even want to go to the Senate. But when I look at the recommendations—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Don't go soft.

Mr. Macquarrie: I am sorry that the Minister of Communications is leaving. In much more cogent terms I could have expressed myself, but being an eternally amiable person I tried to temper my comments as much as I could. I am just wondering what the future will be. Mr. Chairman, I have often been accused of not being sufficiently partisan and of not being eternally vigilant for political champions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Look behind you.

• (9:30 p.m.)

Mr. Macquarrie: The Minister of Communications should know that as a Presbyterian I am well versed in scripture, and the inscription "Get thee behind me Satan" comes quickly to my mind. But as a continuing Presbyterian I have to say we owe something to the state. We believe that which is owned to Caesar must be given to Caesar. But I am not prepared to say that Caesar should get 26 cents for every piece of first-class mail, whehther it is the old Caesar behind me or the new Caesar with his good will and his good grace in front of me.

The Chairman: Order, please. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue if there is consent. Order, please. It is difficult for the Chair to know whether or not there is consent. I will put the question: Is there consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macquarrie: I may say, Mr. Chairman, that in my 14 years here this is the first time I have exceeded the legitimate time limit. I apologize for it, although I appreciate the good will of members who have allowed me an extension. Someone called me Brutus. All I can say is that as Shakespeare said, Brutus is an honourable man. I will rest content with that designation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, that is a difficult act to follow. The next time I have to conduct a funeral service I will look to it as a model. I suspect the Minister of Communications will probably cut it out of today's Hansard and file it away and say, "When the time comes to bury me, please read this".

Mr. Chairman, we welcome the main purpose of clause 26 which is to reinstate the hon. member for Longueuil as the full-time Postmaster General. I would point out that it was not our idea the last time the government organization bill was before us to downgrade the office of Postmaster General. That was the idea of the present government when it established the Department of Communications and the Minister of Communications as the person in charge of the Post Office. However, it was the government itself, when the Prime Minister wanted to do a bit of reshuffling a while ago and found that he was the prisoner of his own legislation, which asked for a shift to be made so that the Postmaster General would be a full-time member of cabinet. However, there is a question which bothers me which I believe I should put to the President of the Treasury Board since he is the pilot of this legislation.

I do not know of any other full minister in the cabinet who has attached to the legislation which establishes his status a proviso—a Damoclesian sword—under which he can lose that position. For example, in this bill there is to be established a minister of the environment and he is to be the minister of the environment—period. By clause 26 now before us we provide that there shall be a Postmaster General, but we keep alive in subclause 3 the provision that if the Prime Minister does not name anyone as Postmaster General, the Minister of Communications gets the job again. It would be a fate worse than being buried to have him back again. However, as long as he stays on this side of the House we are probably safe. What is the reason for subclause 3 in the new section we are enacting by clause 26? Why do we not just appoint the Postmaster General and give him the job without any strings attached to it? Can the President of the Treasury Board answer my question?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, of course, one of the reasons for proceeding in this manner is to make as little change in the previous statute as possible. This particular provision makes a lesser change than a complete withdrawal of the procedure that would be involved in the re-enactment of the position of Postmaster General by itself. It also provides greater flexibility for the future, without the necessity for statutory amendment should the occasion arise when the dual functions would be performed by the Minister of Communications as head of that particular department and also responsible for direct supervision of the Post Office, as was the case a year ago.

I think hon. members are aware of the studies under way, looking to the possibility of at least the feasibility of setting up the Post Office as a Crown corporation. Whether or not it would be desirable to have a full-time departmental minister in charge of a Crown corporation with no other duties, I believe is a question which probably remains to be answered. However, whether it is desirable or not, the proposed legislation would allow either course to be followed. I do not believe there is any significance in it other than I have outlined.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I confess I had thought there might be some relationship to the studies in respect of a Crown corporation set-up for the Post Office, but it seems to me if that were done it would require legislation to be placed before Parliament and surely in that legislation we would settle the question concerning the direction of that corporation. In other words, I am still left with my question as to why the present Minister without Portfolio who is in charge of the Post Office when he becomes a full minister is to be the only member of the cabinet who has to have a back door open out of which he might be pushed at any time. We like the hon. member for Longueuil and we want him to have the same status as any other member of the cabinet. Does the President of the Treasury Board not want that too?

Mr. Drury: I do not think the continuing in office of the prospective Postmaster General is dependent on statutory security, but like him I share the view that the prospective Postmaster General is so adequately equipped for the job that he does not need statutory protection.

• (9:40 p.m.)

The Chairman: Shall clause 26 carry?

Mr. Bell: No, Mr. Chairman. I have a question in my mind that I would like to bring forward. I am not sure that the President of the Treasury Board is ready to deal with it. We heard a big song and dance a while ago about the assured mail delivery plan, whereby mail is posted in Toronto in the morning and it is guaranteed that within 24 hours it will be delivered in certain cities in Canada. I will not mention which city the minister considers to be the most important in Canada, but Saint John, New Brunswick, is not mentioned in this list.

I would like to ask him—if he cannot give me the answer tonight, he can give it later—whether we did not have for many years a 24-hour delivery in Canada and, if so, what is the idea of all this big story about a new plan? In other words, how many cities in Canada did not have a 24-hour service and are not getting it, or was this just a big smokescreen to try to play up the Post Office Department? Is there something really new in this service?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): I can answer that, Mr. Chairman. While I am on my feet I would answer some other points raised during this short debate. Certainly I consider Saint John to be as important as any other city in Canada, but the difficulty lies in the transportation system between Toronto and Saint John. This is what stops us from providing the guaranteed 24-hour service. This does not mean that Saint John will not get this service, but the guarantee can only be given once the air transportation system is reorganized. Shortly, mail from Saint John to other cities will receive the 24-hour guarantee.

I should like to make a few remarks regarding the point raised by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock. The Post Office deficit is not $52 million. Last year it was $120 million and this year we forecast a deficit of $113 million. He believes that there should be no increases in first-class mail because this might stop some people from using the mail service. Let us not forget that 80 per cent of first-class mail is taken up by industry and commercial letters. It is for the government to decide if we are going to spend $120 million or a large part of it to subsidize industries and commercial concerns, or if we are going to use it in other departments for other purposes. I must say that I found the remarks of the hon. member for Hillsborough to be unfair with regard to my predecessor.

[Translation]

My predecessor, as well as my successor, did the reorganization work that was necessary. This was not an easy task and certainly created some problems. My predecessor continued the work already started and hired very capable personnel. Due to their outside experience, these offices were able to give considerable help to the Post Office Department, and they certainly will contribute to its modernization.

This covers about all hon. members have said, Mr. Chairman, and I am satisfied with these few remarks.

[English]

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Chairman, I have just one question for the minister. I should like to ask him whether the situation has reverted to normal since he took office. For example, he seems to have stopped the closing of post offices in rural ridings. Has this been stopped, and is the situation getting back to normal? Is he planning some improvement of the service, and what improvements is he planning aside from those he announced recently?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): The service has been improved to a certain extent. We have had a lot of trouble, not necessarily because of my predecessor but because there have been many problems with the employees. There have been many strikes during the time he has been in office. It just happened when he was there. Perhaps I was lucky not to have been in office at that time, because it might just as well have happened had I been there. Apart from that, I think that we had to gain the confidence of Post Office employees, because for almost a year there have been many disruptions and unrest. So the service had to be improved, and I think that is what we have been able to achieve in the last few months.

We have decided to stop the closing of small, rural post offices because even if it saved us many thousands of dollars a year it is not worth doing as this may create a lot of unrest in the small communities where post offices would be closed. This is the reason that I decided not to close any more where it was possible. I think that the morale of the employees of post offices has improved greatly. Their productivity has increased, and as a result the public of Canada will obtain a better service.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I listened with interest to the question raised by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and the reply given by the President of the Treasury Board who is not here at the moment. Frankly, I think the President of the Treasury Board was reaching a fair distance for the reasons for which subclause 3 of clause 26 reads. I think this is really a case of sloppy drafting, or an attempt by the government to preserve some kind of pecking order within its own ranks. Either we are to have a separate minister in charge of the Post Office, or we are not.

The Prime Minister may at any time choose to have a person in charge of each ministry, or he may choose to double up ministers and have one person in charge of two or three departments. There does not need to be any legislation. The feasibility of setting up a Crown corporation instead of a Post Office Department is something that is yet to be heard about in a formal manner in the House; and, as my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said, that would require legislation. If at that time the government of the day wanted to set up such a Crown corporation, they would put a provision in the legislation which would do away with a separate minister of the Crown in charge of the Post Office. I think that essentially the clause is sloppily drafted, or it might be due to an oversight on the part of the drafters or the President of the Treasury Board.

Therefore, I would like to move an amendment to clause 26 as follows:

That clause 26 be amended by deleting the words "Subject to subsection 3" from line 16, and by deleting the lines 22 to 29 on page 8.

This would clean up the clause and eliminate what I think is superfluous wording in the bill.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, could we get a copy of this amendment so that we can examine it before we are asked to discuss it?

The Chairman: Order, please. If members of the committee are in agreement—and I understand the concern of the President of the Privy Council—I will read the amendment, without putting it in a formal sense, so that hon. members may consider it. If hon. members wish to make representations to the Chair about its procedural correctness, and want to consider the question, I might see another speaker on the substance of the matter.

Perhaps I should read the amendment without accepting it, subject to what other hon. members have to say. It is moved by Mr. Benjamin:

• (9:50 p.m.)

That clause 26 be amended by deleting the words "Subject to subsection 3" from line 16, and by deleting lines 22 to 29 on page 8.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, because you have the only written copy of the amendment I am not surprised that hon. members opposite want to know precisely what is involved before they are called upon to vote on it. If I may take the two parts of the amendment in the reverse order, what it does is delete subclause 3 entirely. That is the subclause which provides for the Minister of Communications to be the Postmaster General if the Prime Minister does not fill the post itself.

Then having deleted subclause 3, as a consequence it is necessary to delete the words "Subject to subsection 3" at the beginning of subclause 2. If the amendment carries the clause would have only two subclauses, one of which would say that there shall be a department known as the Post Office Department and the second of which would say the Postmaster General shall preside over it. In other words, it would put this minister on the same footing as all other ministers. It takes away the Damoclesian sword, and I believe the President of the Treasury Board would like to accept the amendment.

The Chairman: If there are no other members of the committee who wish to make representations, the Chair is prepared to accept the amendment and put the question.

Amendment (Mr. Benjamin) negatived: Yeas, 17; nays, 41.

The Chairman: Shall clause 26 carry?

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, it had not been my expectation to speak on clause 26, for the simple reason that those hard taskmasters across the way have been keeping us so busy in the Standing Committee on Agriculture for the last week or two that I did not expect to be in the House. But having had an opportunity to be here this evening and listen to the debate, I feel I must make a few remarks.

The hon. member for Hillsborough and the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock gave a pretty good resumé of the situation existing in this important department of government, and the hon. member for South Western Nova touched on a question that concerns me as a member from Saskatchewan; that is, the cut-back in services which the people in the rural areas of western Canada had to accept under the administration of the predecessor to the minister state who is to take over responsibility for the Post Office. The minister designate defended his predecessor against the criticism of the hon. member for Hillsborough, but in all truthfulness those criticisms were justified. Last year in Saskatchewan some 175 or 176 post offices were eliminated, with a consequent diminution of service to people in the affected areas. Naturally, there was a strong backlash of criticism from people who had been accustomed to this government service.

Some of the people most affected are those who live close to the boundaries of the province. For instance, I happen to live about 3½ to 4 miles from Manitoba. Formerly, a citizen of Manitoba could post a letter on Friday afternoon around three o'clock and expect to have it delivered in the next town, or in the two or three neighbouring towns, an hour or so later by the truck which came up from Brandon. Then the government decided, as an economy measure, that it could not afford to have trucks crossing provincial boundaries. It said it could not afford to buy licences for trucks crossing the boundaries. As a result a letter posted in Pierson, Manitoba, on Friday afternoon is taken by truck back to Vinden, then to Brandon, forwarded from there to Regina, Saskatchewan, sent back down to Estevan and then back down to Gainsborough and is delivered about four days later. The pony express, the smoke signals of the Indians, and the use of carrier pigeons, gave better service than that. Can the minister say if he is giving consideration to the restoration of service across provincial boundaries?

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Mr. Chairman, I believe we are rearranging transportation for these postal facilities in the Saskatchewan area so that the service will be much improved in the future.

Mr. Barnett: Mr. Chairman, I have just one question to ask.

The Chairman: Order, please. It is ten o'clock.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. gentleman has only one question it might be of interest to us all to hear it, to receive an answer and perhaps not see the clock right away.

Mr. Barnett: That is what I was going to suggest. It is not very often we have two responsible ministers here at the same time, or should I say two ministers who presumably are responsible in this area? Earlier in his remarks the minister responsible for the Post Office made some reference to the question of salaries of people working in the Post Office Department and to some of the events that have taken place over the last year or so. I would like to ask him, or the President of the Treasury Board, whether consideration is now being given to the salary of people in the category of postmasters.

I am thinking of staff office postmasters. I have not had an opportunity to explore this matter, but it has come to my attention that in some cases the man in charge of a staff post office is receiving less salary than some of the people working under him. I wonder whether this matter is under review and whether early action will be taken in regard to postmasters and other administrative personnel within the department.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Yes, Mr. Chairman, we have had representations about salaries being paid, and we have received demands by some people in charge of post offices because it appears that some of them are making less money than the clerks or letter carriers. We are looking into this question right now.

The Chairman: Shall clause 26 carry?

Clause 26 agreed to.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, could I ask the President of the Privy Council whether it is the intention to proceed with third reading of Bill C-215, the textile bill, tomorrow and, if not, would he indicate the business of the House for tomorrow?

Mr. MacEachen: Tomorrow the business will be consideration of the government organization bill. If there is any disposition to alter that, we could discuss it later tomorrow afternoon.

Mr. MacLean: If we continue with the government organization bill and the section we proceed with is passed, would the minister indicate which of the clauses that have been stood would be reverted to? Shall we return to them in sequence?

Mr. MacEachen: My understanding is that it was put on the record by the President of the Treasury Board that when we passed the part dealing with the Post Office we would proceed to the superannuation clause, then return to the ministries of state and parliamentary secretaries and to the clause in connection with the department of the environment.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION—INCENTIVE GRANTS—ACQUISITION OF PROPORTIONATE EQUITY IN RECIPIENT COMPANIES

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I could not help but notice your impatience with the delay in proceeding with the adjournment debate tonight. I can only take it that you must be anxious to hear the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. For that reason, I should like now to take part in this debate because I think there is something basically wrong and inequitable in the way the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) makes awards of public money under the Industrial incentives act. As I see it, what is basically wrong is that the priorities of industry rather than those of government initiate the series of procedures which culminate in a plant or industry locating in community "X" rather than in community "Y". We in Canada have some serious regional economic problems, and the Industrial incentives act was established to deal with them.

What was in my opinion originally envisioned as a palliative to employment in slow-growth areas should receive commendation from all quarters of this House. My intervention tonight does not deal with the principle of government stimulation to areas in need, but instead with the practicalities of how these grants are administered. As I said, it is a private corporation rather than the government of Canada which through its application of grants to industrialists—which are described by some as social welfare—provides the initiative. Little or no concern has been directed to the planning or recognition of our own national priorities.

What, for instance, does the department do about relating a particular industry to a particular area, its suitability, etc? On the contrary, it is up to the industry to make application initially. It then follows that a particular industry rather than the national government establishes whether or not a plant locates in a particular community. The celebrated economist and former Canadian, John Kenneth Galbraith, has made the point that large multicorporations have little difficulty in raising capital. They do it largely through retained earnings. What, I ask, is the rationale behind the recent awards which I will list: $1.1 million to Boeing of Canada, $6 million to that poor company from the United States called IBM, $1 million to Ashland Chemicals, and $4 million to Control Data of Canada? These are a few examples of recent grants to foreign corporations operated in our country for which, aside from the jobs produced, Canada as a nation may gain relatively little.

This prompted me to direct the following question to the Minister on February 25, as recorded at page 3740 of Hansard.

> In awarding these various incentive grants amounting sometimes to millions of dollars and ranging in value from $3,000 to $5,000 per job, has the government considered acquiring equity in the recipient company proportionately equivalent to the grant made?

Your Honour suggested that this was a representation. I then said:

> It seems to me that there is a basic inequity in the fact that when a recipient company makes a profit its shareholders get the benefit, but if it loses the public picks up the tab.

I asked this question for the following reasons, Mr. Speaker. First, it appears that we have put through incentive grants which total in excess of $100 million and this vast amount of money could have been used to acquire Canadian equity in certain companies, especially the foreign ones, and a greater control of our own economy—a crucial matter presently under study by the cabinet. Second, I was alarmed that grants tended to vary from region to region. This indicated no real planning at the decision-making or ministerial level. For example, Nova Scotia received $15,000 per job, Newfoundland

$1,600 per job, roughly 10 per cent of Nova Scotia's, and Ontario $7,000 per job. The Canadian average is $5,500 per job.

Certain provinces, notably Manitoba and the reactionary Saskatchewan government, have seen fit to tie equity into their incentive grants. For the proposed Meadow Lake pulp mill the government of Saskatchewan has assured 30 per cent equity as its price for its share of assistance. Surely for the $12 million requested, the government of Canada ought to consider eight per cent to 10 per cent equity as a fair proportion if the project is ultimately approved by the minister. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party envisions the Canada Development Corporation as a Crown corporation which with the involvement of the provincial and municipal governments and co-operatives could be a means whereby a substantially larger proportion of Canada's industry and resource development could be retained in Canadian hands.

I know that a substantial portion of the minister's rebuttal will centre around the argument that industries are granted public funds as an incentive to locate away from the comparative cost advantage areas in large metropolitan regions. This argument I repudiate.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Mr. Martin P. O'Connell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, there are many aspects of the hon. member's remarks this evening with which one could take issue. I will confine my remarks to reiterating what has been said previously in reply to similar questions. Under the terms of the Regional Development Incentives Act it would be impossible for the government to acquire equity in projects which it supports. While the government certainly considered this possibility and others when introducing the program, the legislation passed by Parliament provides for a program of grants and loan guarantees only, not one of government investment. In fact, the government would be defeating the purpose of the legislation if it were to take an equity position in these companies in return for the funds it makes available to them under this program.

• (10:10 p.m.)

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. O'Connell: The program is designed to create new jobs in those parts of the country where they are most badly needed. To do this, it must offer a real incentive to industries to locate or expand in areas where they might not otherwise do so. The program therefore works by providing manufacturing industries with grants sufficiently large in relation to their costs—this is why there is a variation—to enable them to undertake viable projects despite the difficulties they may encounter as a result of location in a slow-growth region. If the government were to acquire equity in return for its grants, the present incentive in favour of the slow-growth regions would disappear.

Mr. Rose: Oh, come on!

Mr. O'Connell: Think about it for a moment. The government would simply become another source of equity financing, that is, in return for the grant it would acquire an equity in the company. There would be no incentive left. While there is perhaps a case to be made for the government taking equity in certain circumstances, it would have to be in addition to the assistance available under the existing incentives program rather than a replacement for it. This is a possibility which has been considered within the department although no action has been taken in that direction.

I would refer to the hon. member to the statement made today by the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Marchand) before the Standing Committee on Economic Development. In this statement he referred to at least two new federal-provincial industrial development corporations which will operate in Newfoundland and New Brunswick and which, among other things, may supply equity capital in certain circumstances.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to interrupt the parliamentary secretary, but his time has expired.

AIR TRANSPORT—USE OF AIR SPACE AND AIRPORTS BY SUPERSONIC PLANES—AWARENESS OF OTHER COUNTRIES OF CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, it always happens that when my hon. friend, my seatmate, appears on the late night show he insists that I appear along with him. We have to keep each other company.

On March 23 I directed a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) with regard to the use of Canadian air space by supersonic planes. I asked him whether other countries were aware of the position taken by Canada. The minister replied that he had certainly made our position known to the United States, for example, but he did not know whether this information had been formally conveyed to other countries which might be concerned. He had not done so personally. I then asked the following supplementary question:

> Would the minister say whether he would formally convey that expression of opinion, which I heartily support, to the other countries of the world now engaged in supersonic aircraft programs?

At that point, Mr. Speaker, you suggested that my supplementary was, in fact, a representation.

An hon. Member: He was right.

Mr. Rose: Yes, it was.

Mr. Skoberg: At this point I think it is important we face the question whether or not our stand with regard to supersonic transport is appreciated by the other countries which are involved in this experiment. All of us are aware that the United States Senate and House of Representatives have turned down requests for funds to continue the supersonic aircraft program in that country. This decision has resulted in repercussions not only in the United States but throughout the world.

All the unanswered questions regarding the effects of using supersonic aircraft are now being asked again, and I am sure that those who are concerned with the building of the "Concorde" in France and Britain are questioning whether or not the program should be carried on. Here in Canada we ought also to ask certain questions about these supersonic planes which travel between 1,400 and 1,800 miles an hour, cost between $40 million and $50 million each and create a disastrous sonic boom which could injure people and property lying under their path. Do these planes, flying at great height, produce exhaust gases which by polluting the upper atmosphere could give rise to real danger? At the same time we must realize that those people with the technical know-how to build this sort of plane are not concerned with the environmental pollution they create or whether people's brains will be damaged by resultant sonic booms.

The question that the government must answer is whether SST's are to be allowed to fly over Canadian soil and to use Canadian airports. People and planners say that airports must be built away from urban centres so that sonic booms will not wreck our brains. But how do these supersonic planes reach our airports? I am sure that the people who say we must build airports a long way from large urban centres also appreciate that rural communities are just as concerned about some booms as anybody else. It is clear from two answers that were tabled that Air Canada has on order at the present time ten supersonic jet aircraft. For the "Concorde" SST there are four line positions which call for delivery in approximately 1976. There are six line positions for the Boeing 2707 calling for delivery in the spring of 1980.

I asked the following questions of the minister: Have the Department of Transport or the Canadian Transport Commission approved of supersonic planes flying over and landing in Canada? The answer was no. Then I asked: What specific research has been undertaken by any government agency or department regarding the effects of supersonic flying over Canada? The department replied there was none, that the Department is following the development of this type of aircraft from the viewpoint of applying restrictive measures should this action appear necessary. Another question I asked was: Is the Canadian Transport Commission or the Department of Transport aware of the recent announcement by Air Canada that six Boeing supersonic planes have been ordered to be flying in Canada around 1978? The answer was yes. Then I asked: Has approval been given to the flying of the above planes over Canada? The answer was no.

There is much talk in this House of protecting the environment, of national pollution standards and clean air standards. All these aspects must also involve use of supersonic jets. I am sure we all realize that our nationalized airline has now on order a supersonic aircraft that has not been given permission to fly over our territory or to land at our airports. If the Minister of Transport wants to be a great statesman, all he has to do is introduce legislation to prohibit the landing of these planes at any of our airports and to prohibit SSTs flying over our territory. I am sure in this regard Canada could lead the way for other countries involved in the race for SSTs by introducing this type of legislation.

It is hard to imagine why the Canadian Transport Commission or the Air Transport Board of the commission has not done some research in this area. I am sure that if the people of Canada had their way they would not allow the SSTs, in which billions of dollars have been invested, to fly over our land and to land at our airports when they have no knowledge of the disastrous effects that could result from such flights.

Mr. Gérard Duquet (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in replying this evening to the question raised by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg), I would like to point out that the subject matter is one which in recent months has been very much in the minds of governmental officials and elected legislators in a good many countries.

I do not think anyone would question the need for proper and effective guidelines or regulations to which aircraft capable of supersonic speeds should be limited. I recall an earlier "late show" on this very subject in January at which time the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Harding) spoke of the potential harm to the environment made possible by such flights, and specific mention was made of construction programs being carried out in the United States, Russia, and the "Concorde" program being developed by the British and the French. That evening Mr. Speaker, I stated this country's policy with regard to sonic booms. I also informed the House of the extensive research being carried out by the government and by the aircraft industry. Mention was made of the work of a number of government departments which have membership on a recently established interdepartmental committee on the sonic boom and also the ICAO sonic boom panel. Our government's policy on this matter is well known—

• (10:20 p.m.)

An hon. Member: What is it?

Mr. Duquet: —to the aircraft industry, not only in North America but in every other country which has an interest in marketing such aircraft for export. Without desiring to bore the hon. member, repetition of the air regulation affecting sonic booms might be very useful at this time. Air regulation 515(2) states:

> No aircraft shall be flown in such a manner as to create a shock wave the effect of which is to create or likely to create a hazard to other aircraft or to persons or property on the ground.

I have already said, Mr. Speaker, that our policy is well known to all aircraft manufacturers in whatever country they are situated. The minister made reference to his recent and personal public pronouncements on this subject in Canada and in the United States. I have no doubt that other countries have various means by which they are informed of such matters. As the hon. member knows, the regulations are public information and have been published in a formal way in the Canada Gazette, to which I suspect all foreign countries subscribe faithfully.

I want to assure the hon. member that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson) and his departmental officials are following very closely the present development in supersonic aircraft. I will certainly bring to their attention the specific representations made this evening.

Motion agreed and the House adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

AGRICULTURE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF DAIRY POLICY FOR YEAR COMMENCING APRIL 1, 1971

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have an announcement with respect to dairy policy for the year starting April 1, 1971. The Canadian Dairy Commission has been authorized to pay subsidy on manufacturing milk and cream, under its quota system, at the same rate as in the year just ending. This is $1.25 per 100 pounds of milk testing 3.5 per cent butterfat, or 35.71 cents per pound of butterfat.

The prices at which the commission offers to purchase major dairy products in support of Canadian prices will, for the present, remain at existing levels. It will be recalled that the prices for skim milk powder and cheddar cheese were each advanced four cents per pound on February 8 last, bringing the present rates to 24 cents per pound for powder and 51 cents for cheese. The butter support price continues at 65 cents per pound.

While actual prices received by producers from the market are a matter of provincial jurisdiction, these changes will mean that in the forthcoming dairy year there will be a significant increase in market prices to producers for industrial milk compared with those in effect at the start of this dairy year. There is a holdback from payments to producers toward the cost of disposing of surplus dairy products which have to be exported.

There was a change in this procedure during the past year with the adoption in Ontario and Quebec of a system of market-sharing quotas for all producers supplying milk for manufacturing use. With that change the Commission paid producers in those provinces the full rate of subsidy and a levy was made from the market payment and remitted to the commission.

This arrangement will continue during the coming year. In provinces where producers are now under market-sharing quotas, or at any time during the year when other provinces may come under the system, producers will receive subsidy at the full rate for the quantity of milk or cream for which they are eligible. This, of course, is conditional on a levy being taken from the market payment by the provincial board and remitted to the commission. In provinces not under market-sharing quotas there will continue to be a levy or holdback from the subsidy payments.

The major surplus Canadian dairy product is skim milk powder. The cost of disposing of surpluses, and the rate of levy necessary to finance that cost, is related primarily to the price which can be secured for skim milk powder exports.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Starting a year ago there has been a marked improvement in that price from the levels which prevailed previously. It is difficult for the commission at this time to estimate the price which will prevail for skim milk powder exports during the coming year and, in consequence, its costs of disposing of surpluses and the rate of levy from producer payments necessary to finance them.

It will be at least a month, and probably more, before this situation is clarified.

In the meantime, the rates of levy or holdback from producer payments will, with one exception, continue at present levels. The only change, for the present, is that the levy of 1 cent per pound of butterfat on cream deliveries by a producer up to his quota will be discontinued.

The commission, however, may later adjust these rates when it is better able to estimate its costs of surplus disposal for the coming year.

Mr. H. A. Moore (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the minister for providing me with a copy of this announcement well before the House opened. Those dairy producers who have been holding their collective breath waiting for this announcement may now let their breath out slowly because there will not be much of a change as a result of this announcement. Certainly there will be no help to counteract the increased costs which they are experiencing every year.

It is evident that there has never been as much dissatisfaction among dairy farmers in this country as there is at the present time. A few years back we had overproduction in Canada. Now production in relation to needs is just about holding its own in all provinces outside of Ontario and Quebec, or central Canada. We may soon be depending on imports. Have the powers that be no knowledge of how long it takes to establish a dairy business and the cost involved? The farmers may well end up in a position of deficit production shortly. It is evident that the prime object seems to be to get the government out of paying subsidies, with sufficient production only a secondary aim.

The past year has shown an increase in the disappearance of dairy surpluses in North America and western Europe. This tendency to decline began about the middle of 1969. Prices are therefore strengthening. There has also been a general decline in the number of dairy cows as well as in the number of producers. The average production per cow is up which shows increased efficiency in production. This is something the government is always talking about, especially the Department of Agriculture.

Since the Canadian Dairy Commission began operating in 1967 the number of registered producers has dropped by approximately 50 per cent. This means that the other half is no longer in business. Half of the former producers no longer have an income from the dairy business.

If the government insists on cheap food, subsidies must be paid. In fact, they may have to be increased; yet the government estimates a decrease for sustaining the dairy industry in the future.

In the recent agreement between Quebec and Ontario and the Canadian Dairy Commission fines were imposed—there is no other word for these holdbacks—of $2.40 per hundred on manufacturing milk for overproduction and 50.28 cents per pound of butterfat. The same deal is now proposed for Alberta. I understand that two or more preliminary meetings have been held in Alberta in this regard. Under this agreement the Canadian Dairy Commission can fine even fluid milk shippers for their surplus or overproduction. With this type of agreement there is no way their surplus production can be reached by the Canadian Dairy Commission. These fines can put a producer in a straitjacket. He must hold his production to a certain level at all times. Anyone knows that cows refuse to co-operate, thus making this almost impossible.

[Mr. Olson.]

Dairy farmers must wonder why their industry has been singled out to be the only Canadian industry under complete state control.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, in effect the statement says there will be no change in the direction of dairy policy. That policy is mainly one by which the government is withdrawing support for the industry or reducing it to the minimum. I think this policy will fit in very well with the farm adjustment policy being worked out by the minister and his colleagues which seeks to remove an increasing number of farmers from agriculture. This adjustment program will adjust a number of farmers out of agriculture. I believe the dairy policy will fit into this program very well, to the dissatisfaction of the farmers. It is said that the dairy program will depend on what the export price is for powdered milk, which is an unknown factor.

The last time the minister made an announcement on dairy policy he said that an agreement had been reached between the dairy producers in Quebec and Ontario. Not more than two weeks later we had an urgent plea from the dairy producers in Quebec to appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture to state their case and their dissatisfaction. At that time I asked them how they could expect the committee to do for them what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) had already refused to do.

This is the situation in which we find ourselves. I would not be surprised if we again have the dairy producers asking to appear before the Standing Committee on Agriculture as a result of this statement.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, as it happens, I had planned to put a question related to the dairy policy to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). I would have done so yesterday, but as he was absent and the new dairy year is fast drawing near I had hoped that he would inform us today of the new dairy policy for 1971-72.

Hon. members will remember that on February 17, 1971, the House instructed the Committee on Agriculture to inquire into Vote No. 30 related to the Canadian Dairy Commission and to report in due course to the House. As the Committee on Agriculture has unfortunately not examined this vote so far, I quite understand why today the Minister of Agriculture has announced no major changes in dairy policy for the coming year.

I expected, however, that the increase in production costs for dairy products as well as other products, would have been taken into account, and that some improvements would have been made that would have been more beneficial to those who are really involved in milk production, especially industrial milk, so that they could obtain a higher income and fairer prices.

Obviously, I am aware of the current difficulties of the Canadian government; I realize also that it is not always an easy task to accept the most legitimate requests from farm organizations, such as the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. But one should well understand that it will be necessary at some point to react more favourably if we are to establish a dairy industry that will be in a position to compete with products from elsewhere.

• (2:20 p.m.)

The minister is certainly aware that member countries of the European Common Market voted recently on the adoption of a budget of over $3 billion to subsidize the production of farm products, in order to allow producers to produce more efficiently and at lower cost.

If Canada is to remain on the international market, it will have some day to adopt policies to foster a decrease in production costs while enabling producers to earn a living decently.

Furthermore, a surplus is said to exist. Yes surely, there is a surplus, if the objective is set according to present consumer demand. It is obvious that the people's purchasing power is rapidly decreasing month after month as the rate of unemployment is increasing. There is no doubt then that demand in decreasing gradually. It is clear that the people would need a national market on which to dispose of a greater production, if it had a purchasing power to match its actual needs.

Then, there have been proposals during the past couple of years to the effect that by means of agreements the federal and provincial governments could generate a policy to help dispose of a given volume of dairy products in schools, hospitals, homes for senior citizens, etc.

This policy is presently established in the United States and in quite a forceful manner, as the President of the United States has just authorized doubling this year's budget to supply dairy products in schools, hospitals and homes.

This has promoted the consumption on the national market, and allowed United States milk producers to dispose more easily of their production and to have more profitable farms.

I repeat that the minister, his advisers and the government should further study these suggestions in order to find the means of carrying out this objective of helping the dairy industry of Canada, especially in the provinces with the higher volume, to continue its progress and establish research facilities towards diversification of its production for greater use of milk.

In any event, I offer the minister my co-operation and that of my colleagues so that we may continue to work together in order to find solutions that will ensure the survival of the milk producers because many of them have now gone bankrupt.

During the weekend, I witnessed typical cases which are really touching. As a matter of fact, I met people who had made capital expenditures to remain in the dairy industry and who, due to the increase of quota costs, are today under the obligation of recapitalizing or going bankrupt.

Therefore, I should like to invite the minister not to wait for the next dairy year to announce again an increase in the prices of industrial milk, but to do it, as is mentioned in the statement, within the limit of a month or two, which is what we hope for.

GRAIN

DISRUPTION OF MOVEMENT FROM PRAIRIES TO VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I seek leave to move a motion concerning the real and apprehended disruption of grain movement from the Prairies to the ships now waiting in Vancouver and those due to arrive in Vancouver over the next three weeks. In this crisis, Mr. Speaker, I propose to move, with the unanimous consent of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), the following motion:

That this House, in view of the crisis now existing and impending in grain movement from the Prairies to aboard ship at Vancouver and the resulting anticipated failure of Canada to meet her export grain commitments, urges the government to take immediate and extraordinary measures to get western grain moving and loaded at Vancouver.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member for Mackenzie. Under the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The motion cannot be put.

FISHERIES

TASK FORCE ON SEAL HUNT—REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to move a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It concerns the appointment of a government task force to investigate and study all aspects of the seal industry in Canadian waters, particularly the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Labrador waters, with a view to reducing the annual seal quota. The terms of reference contain no reference to the value of the seal hunt to the citizens of the Maritimes, Newfoundland and the Gaspé as a source of income and employment. The task force includes no member from those areas. The recommendations to be made by the task force are conditioned by the statement by the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) that it may be necessary to launch a campaign to have "the ladies stop buying fur seal coats."

I therefore move, with the consent of the House, seconded by the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Marshall):

That this House instructs the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry to inquire into the necessity for the appointment by the government of a task force to inquire into the seal industry in the Atlantic region and, in particular, to inquire into the rationale of having the task force composed entirely of persons from other than the Atlantic area.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: The motion proposed by the hon. member requires unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimous consent. The hon. member's motion cannot be put.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PUBLICATION OF WHITE PAPER

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister in a position to give us the date for the publication of his white paper? Can the minister also indicate whether he is giving any consideration to the suggestion that it be produced in two stages, one dealing with policy and one dealing with weaponry and weapons systems?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I anticipate that it will be available to the public and the House at approximately the end of May. With regard to the second suggestion, I think he will find that the two aspects of the matter have been melded together.

OIL

STATEMENT BY MINISTER OF COMMUNICATIONS OPPOSING PROPOSED MACKENZIE VALLEY PIPELINE— STUDIES OF ECONOMIC IMPACT

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of a statement made to the press by the Minister of Communications in which he said that he is completely opposed to the building of an oil pipeline through Canada. He said that it would be a disaster which would create severe economic dislocation in the country and lead to a kind of industrial suicide. As this statement completely contradicts statements made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the statement made by the Minister of Communications represents government policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the text of such a statement but I understand it was given in reply to an interview. At this time all I can say is that the various ministers who have commented on this subject have done so from the particular point of view of their department and their knowledge of the Canadian economy and government. All have said that no decision would be made without taking into account all considerations relative to the common good of Canada. I assume that the Minister of Communications was merely pointing out another dimension of this very complex problem.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the fact that the Minister of Communications has raised some very serious questions about the economic impact of a pipeline being built through Canada, may I ask the Prime Minister if the government has had any studies made of the economic impact of the construction of such a pipeline? If so, have such studies been passed on to the two ministers who have been publicly inviting American companies to apply for the construction of a pipeline?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say that studies have been made in the sense that they would have been completed, but certainly this aspect, this dimension, of the problem is one which I drew to the attention of the minister mainly involved in co-ordinating all studies for the Canadian government. The results of all these inquiries and studies will be brought before cabinet before a decision is made on any one particular aspect.

An hon. Member: What did he say?

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Prime Minister if the two ministers who have publicly invited American companies to make application for the construction of a pipeline did so before the cabinet had reached any decision with respect to the economic impact that such a program would have?

Mr. Trudeau: The premise of the question is not correct, Mr. Speaker. No member of this government officially invited any American construction of such a pipeline. When the hon. member quoted some aspects of this matter the other day he himself had to say that any so-called invitation would be conditional upon a decision reached by the Canadian government and that every aspect of interest to the Canadian public would be looked into before any decision was made, let alone an invitation.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—EMERGENCY MEASURES TO MOVE GRAIN

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to address to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of the series of slowdowns in grain movement because of inadequate facilities, the non-availability of certain grades of grain, and labour strikes on the west coast, is the government considering specific emergency measures to move grain at this time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this problem was raised in the House in the past few days. No further decision has been taken by the government since replies were given to the question.

Mr. Korchinski: Has the government charged a special task force to consider making recommendations for emergency action?

Mr. Trudeau: Not the government, Mr. Speaker.

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—POSSIBILITY OF PROLONGED STRIKE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. In light of the economic effects of slowdowns by railway employees on government attempts to combat unemployment, is the minister satisfied that the position of the negotiations has reached such a point at the moment that we will not have a prolonged strike?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I cannot attempt to assess with any accuracy whether or not we are in for a long strike. I know that at this very moment negotiations are taking place in Montreal between the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, the union representing the striking engineers on the west coast, and the CPR and the CNR.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I directed a question to the House Leader on Friday and he indicated he would ask the Minister of Labour to make a statement to the House. Can the Minister of Labour tell the House now if he has indications that those workers who are booking off and are on slowdowns and so on are prepared to go back to work or are going back to work today or tomorrow to relieve the situation?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the workers in Vancouver will be meeting at two o'clock Vancouver time and my parliamentary secretary will be present at that meeting. My discussions by long distance last night were fairly fruitful. I can only hope the meeting this afternoon will indicate a return to work on the part of the members.

ALLEGED LACK OF PROPER GRADES AT WESTERN TERMINALS TO LOAD SHIPS—PAYMENT OF DEMURRAGE CHARGES BY GOVERNMENT

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister Mr. Speaker. LABOUR RELATIONS

SUGGESTED CABINET COMMITTEE TO FIND SOLUTION TO PROBLEM CAUSED BY RAILWAY EMPLOYEES SLOWDOWN

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a supplementary question for the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the gravity of the situation facing our economy with the current railway shutdown, will the Prime Minister move at once to convene an emergency committee meeting made up of the responsible ministers within his cabinet for the purpose of finding an immediate solution to this very serious problem?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the way in which the government organizes its committees to deal with this matter I do not think is important to discuss in the House, but the hon. member may want to know that there is a group of ministers which meets on grain problems.

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—SUGGESTED MEETING BETWEEN MINISTER AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS IN VANCOUVER

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the seriousness of this issue to the west coast and to all of Canada, will the minister, if requested by the engineers, travel to Vancouver to meet with the union?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): In view of the seriousness of the situation, Mr. Speaker, I would request the hon. gentleman to let the negotiating team in Montreal pursue its work without premature and undue interference on my part.

GRAIN

HOLDING OF INCREASED AMOUNT IN EXPORT POSITION TO OFFSET EFFECTS OF STRIKES

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister be prepared to recommend to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board that in future more grain be kept in export position so that strikes will not affect us as adversely and so that grain will be available to be moved when ships come in?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's supplementary appears to be a suggestion which he has to assume will be taken into account in the future.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN FORCES FROM EUROPE—PARTICIPATION IN NORAD

Mr. Henry Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence.

Would he tell the House whether the government will initiate a new withdrawal from Europe and bring to an end the presence of our forces in Europe?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker, there will not be any change.

Mr. Latulippe: I want to put a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Would the hon. minister say also what will turn out of our accession, in 1957, to the North American Air Defence Command Agreement which was renewed in 1967 and is going to expire in a short time?

Mr. Speaker: I must suggest to the hon. member that his question is quite general in nature and it seems to me that, normally, if the hon. minister would wish to answer it, he should do so by means of a statement on motions. I suggest this to the hon. member as well as to the hon. minister concerned.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK SERVICE CHARGES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It has to do with the fact that the chartered banks of Canada will be introducing charges effective on Thursday, which day, significantly, is April 1, which include a 33 per cent increase in charges on current accounts, a 27 per cent increase in the cost of writing personal cheques and an increase of 33 per cent for paying utility bills through bank branches. This matter was brought to the minister's attention some time ago and to the government's attention. What did the minister do in order to prevent this seriously inflationary action on the part of the banks, especially in view of the fact that their profits have been tremendously high during the last couple of years?

[Mr. Downey.]

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this matter, surely, has been quite well canvassed in the question period during the past number of days.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What did the minister do?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I announced at that time that the Prices and Incomes Commission is conducting an investigation into those charges. I also pointed out that the banks are not subject to the Combines Investigation Act, which I am sure the right hon. gentleman knows. In so far as there is any ministerial responsibility for the behaviour of the banks, it rests with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is the old game of alibi that this government plays. I ask the minister, in view of his interest in the subject of inflation, did he get in touch with and communicate with the Minister of Finance and point out this situation to him in order to protect Canadians against what is apparently an inordinate and unjustifiable increase?

An hon. Member: Usurious increase.

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman led the government which revised the Combines Investigation Act. I would have thought that he would have included banking services within the act.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Basford: As I indicated in my previous answer, ministerial responsibility for the conduct of banks and the administration of the Bank Act rests with the Minister of Finance. He made it clear to the House that he would not approach the banks on what was, under the act, a business decision on their part.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is that the attitude of the minister toward inflation today? The government is always blaming labour. Is it not about time that the responsibility was shared?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL SECURITY

CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND WEST GERMANY—AVAILABILITY OF PENSION CHEQUES TO CANADIANS OF GERMAN ORIGIN

Mr. Keith Hymmen (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In light of the important event this forenoon of his signing with officials of the West German government a convention on social security, can the minister advise the House how soon pension cheques might be available to Canadians of German origin?

Mr. MacInnis: Why not? He gave you the question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, may I indicate that pension cheques will not be made available to Canadians of German descent until the convention that was signed today is ratified both by the West German parliament and the parliament of Canada.

With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, I think the House will be more than happy to recognize in the gallery known experts from West Germany including Professor Jantz, Dr. Schwartz and Mr. Strenger, who have been of invaluable assistance in breaking ground on this matter which we consider to be a new first so far as Canada is concerned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Even though the minister cannot say on what date the cheques will start coming, can he indicate what will be the effective date so far as the convention itself is concerned?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I believe the effective date, and I ought to check this, is almost the present day. As I indicated to the House, Mr. Speaker, the whole matter is subject to ratification by both parliaments. We hope that this can be completed some time within the next six or seven months.

FISHERIES

SEAL HUNT—REASON FOR APPOINTING TASK FORCE

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister. In view of the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry, based on evidence heard, that the seal hunt should be continued, and in view of evidence from the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies and other organizations supporting the present government policy on the seal fishery, can the Prime Minister tell the House why it has been found necessary to appoint another task force at public expense?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is clearly not in order. Unless the hon. member rephrases the question, I think the Chair will have to go to the next questioner. The hon. member has asked the government why it was found necessary to appoint a task force. That is certainly not the type of question that can be asked at this time. If the hon. member seeks information, he should ask the question directly and not in the terms in which it has just been put.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SEAL HUNT—APPOINTMENT OF TASK FORCE—ANNOUNCEMENT OUTSIDE HOUSE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister if it is now government policy for ministers to make major statements outside the House announcing the appointment of task forces while Parliament is sitting, thereby depriving the members of the House of the opportunity of reacting?

An hon. Member: The hon. member is reacting.

Mr. McGrath: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry made a major statement in the city of Vancouver announcing the appointment of a task force to study a subject that had already been studied very extensively by the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry of this House. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that that statement ought to have been made in the House. According to the roster, the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry is supposed to be in the House today but he is not here. Thus we are being deprived of the opportunity of directing questions to the minister on this very important statement of government policy.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

ROLE OF CANADIAN CONSUMER COUNCIL—LOW-INCOME GROUP REPRESENTATION

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of opinions expressed today by Professor Jacob Ziegel, lately a member of the Canadian Consumer Council, that that body, costing the taxpayers roughly $100,000 a year, is largely ineffective because it has neither clearly defined guidelines nor structure, does the minister, at the beginning of its third year, plan a reassessment of its role, if any, in the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I announced last week the appointment of a new chairman and the reappointment or appointment of members of the council. I have discussed at length with the new chairman the purpose of the council and the working procedures of the council, and I foresee a very useful period and role for the council in the two years ahead.

Mrs. MacInnis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the recent list of appointments to the Canadian Consumer Council fails to contain the names of any representatives of low-income consumers, does the minister intend to supplement this list with the names of such appointees? If not, why not?

Mr. Basford: Mr. Speaker, I think that the people on the council are a group of people who can fulfil the purpose of the council and are good appointments.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONSULTATION WITH CANADIAN CONSUMER COUNCIL ON PACKAGING AND LABELLING BILL

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of statements that have been published questioning the very usefulness of the Consumer Council, may I ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs whether he or his officials, when drafting the packaging and labelling bill, consulted in any way with the Consumer Council or received any representation from them?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker. We consulted with the Consumers Association of Canada.

Mr. Benjamin: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate.

FISHERIES

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON EXPLOITATION OF CANADIAN MARINE RESOURCES BY SHIPS OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the Canadian government has now seen fit to pay a great deal of attention to the American and European people who are against one aspect of our marine resources, I wonder if the Prime Minister can indicate that a definitive statement will be forthcoming and that a definite stand will be taken by the government on the harvesting, raping and exploitation of our marine resources by foreign nationals which is almost destroying the capability of our fishermen in the Atlantic region at the present time?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will draw the representation and allegation to the attention of the various ministers involved. I wonder if I might be allowed to answer a question asked me yesterday by the right hon. member for Prince Albert?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we might first allow the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate a supplementary. The Chair will recognize the Prime Minister in a moment.

Mr. Lundrigan: The Prime Minister referred to drawing to the attention of the Minister of Fisheries my representation and allegation, which is certainly not a fair comment. Perhaps he could take time off from his sugaring-off contest one of these days—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member kindly resume his seat.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISCREPANCY BETWEEN BLUES AND HANSARD IN ANSWER BY PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the right hon. member for Prince Albert asked me to look into the matter of an alleged discrepancy between what I said in the House and what was actually contained in the official transcript in Hansard. I have looked into this matter following my undertaking and I have been assured that no one in my office—nor, indeed, myself—made or suggested any change in Hansard. I am also told that what I said in the House was actually, as my memory prompted me to say yesterday, what is recorded in Hansard.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I suggest to the Prime Minister that the whole thing could be cleared up by tabling the blues. It would be seen if they were tabled that the Prime Minister has changed it or somebody changed it.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Chair is prepared to take the responsibility in connection with this matter. I might say I have received a preliminary report which substantiates the statement just made by the right hon. Prime Minister. Particular reference was made to the taped proceedings of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Withdraw.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A prospective appointee, Mr. Speaker. Does this mean that from now on the blues are not accepted as to what is said in this House? I saw the blues, and there was a very pronounced change made between the blues and Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I really do not think there is much point in going into the matter very deeply. The right hon. gentleman was, I suggest, justified in raising the matter, and the Prime Minister said he thought, from memory, he had made a certain statement. The right hon. gentleman was right. The blues came out in one way but I am advised by the Hansard staff that they are the ones who made a mistake, that a check was made by our officials of the tape, and that they take full responsibility for the correction which they themselves made to the blues.

So I suggest to both right hon. gentlemen that they are both right. The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert was right. The blues came out in the way he suggested. The Prime Minister was right that what he said he had said is actually what he had said. So everyone is vindicated.

INDUSTRY

PULP—REPORTED FEAR ON PART OF COMPANY OFFICERS ABOUT GOING TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has to do with the question I asked him on March 26 regarding the possible prosecution in the United States of Canadian businessmen who are associated with the Canadian pulp and paper industry and their reluctance to go to the United States for fear of becoming subject to United States anti-combines legislation. The minister undertook to look into the matter and report to the House this week. Has he yet had an opportunity to check the statements made by Mr. Fowler and other people in the pulp and paper industry and is he prepared to report to the House on the matter?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): My colleague the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has kindly consented to answer this question.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I have seen the comments made by Mr. Fowler. We are familiar with the investigation in the United States pursuant to the terms of an agreement entered into by the Attorney General of the United States and myself which was tabled in the House on November 5, 1969. We have no indication that the United States authorities were either endeavouring to apply their laws extraterritorially or that the United States courts were exceeding their jurisdiction. If anyone has information that this is not correct his complaint should be taken up with myself. I have received no such complaints.

Mr. Saltsman: Having regard to the provision in our combines legislation which permits exporters to combine for export purposes, and since the United States anti-combines legislation takes a somewhat different approach, can the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs tell us whether those responsible in the United States for interpreting combines legislation are in agreement and are prepared to honour a provision of the kind which exists in Canadian anti-combines legislation?

Mr. Basford: The whole purpose of the agreement to which I have referred was to prevent any misunderstanding between our two countries as to the extraterritorial application of United States laws. When we are in the process of revising the combines legislation international considerations will apply and we will try to devise a law which will best protect Canadian interests.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AID TO UNDERDEVELOPED COUNTRIES—SUGGESTED INTEREST-FREE LOANS TO CANADIAN MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, following that put yesterday by my colleague the hon. member for Bellechasse.

Does the Prime Minister intend to let some underprivileged areas of Canada make use of the same advantages granted to underdeveloped countries, that is interest-free loans repayable over a long period?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have often answered that question indicating to the hon. member and others that we effectively transfer to provinces and underprivileged areas some much larger amounts than those lent to other countries. For example, we have learned that through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion alone, more than half a billion dollars have been allocated to underprivileged areas of the country and given free, without any interest.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister who has just said that this is in fact being done in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Does it mean that the Prime Minister would not be against interest-free loans to underdeveloped Canadian areas by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, in the December budget, we allocated $160 million for assistance to less favoured areas of the country over a very long period and at a very low interest rate.

We have also, through the equalization system and the Minister of Finance, transferred every year to provinces and underdeveloped areas hundreds of millions of dollars that not only do not bear interest but are free. The hon. member should put his remark in the right context.

Indeed, we often grant foreign countries long term loans, but these are not without interest, since it is the Canadian people who pay the interest, because we obviously exempt foreign countries from the payment of interest. That is the reason why we have established a program of assistance to countries less developed, less fortunate than Canada. I think that on this point, we have the support of all hon. members.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that we really have to try and consider some other matters, because we are not moving very quickly this afternoon. I suggest that we should now get on to another subject.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—PROVISION OF INFORMATION TO SYDNEY MANPOWER OFFICE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): My question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration or for the Secretary of State, but in their absence may I direct it, because of its urgency, to the Acting Minister of Manpower and Immigration? In light of the fact that as of this morning information regarding the Opportunities for Youth program was not available to groups and municipal authorities either at the Sydney manpower office or at two other offices on Cape Breton Island, would the minister expedite the dispatch of information to these offices immediately?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will take notice of the question.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary to the right hon. gentleman. In view of the information given in the House yesterday by the Minister of Manpower that April 15 is the cut-off date for applications, would the right hon. gentleman not agree that Canada Manpower offices should now be in a position to provide information about this hodge-podge of odds and ends wrapped up in a riddle of bureaucratic confusion?

THE CENSUS

INFORMATION ON APPLYING FOR JOBS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It was recently brought to my attention that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce had indicated that the proper place at which to apply for the job of census taker was the local Manpower offices. It has since been revealed that the local Manpower offices are indicating to people that they should get in touch with their Member of Parliament. Would the Prime Minister would look into this matter and see to it that information is sent to the local Manpower office so that if there is such a program advantage can be taken of it?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend refers to Hansard or the sound tape he will see that I did not refer at the time to census takers; I referred to some jobs available to students here in Ottawa after the census is taken, helping to bring all the information collected into shape.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We are hoping that this new reciprocal agreement will serve as a precedent for similar agreements with other countries which will be of tangible assistance to many other Canadians.

PRESENCE OF CANCER-CAUSING SUBSTANCE, DEMETHYL-NITROSAMINE, IN FOOD

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Some time ago I asked the minister a question regarding the seriousness of the use of demethyl-nitrosamine in the curing and preparing of foods. At that time the minister stated that he would have the information within a few days. I should like to know what conclusions have been reached regarding the use of this substance.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question and advise him that the amount of this particular substance that we have found is about 1,000 times less than those amounts known to produce cancer in animals. It does have a useful function. Our analysis is now sophisticated enough that we feel we can study that type of situation and detect any increase in amounts found in foods. We are keeping the matter under constant study at the present time.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs arising out of an answer he gave earlier in which he expressed regret that an earlier government had not included banking services in the anti-combines legislation. Are we to deduce from the minister's expression of regret that he intends to include banking services in the revisions which he has said he will bring before this House some time soon?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think that all that was appropriate to be said on this subject, for the moment at least, was said last week.

Mr. Lewis: Nothing then; double nothing now.

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan-Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. What action has the minister taken to finalize arrangements for payment of the $400,000 special assistance to the Okanagan apple growers?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there was some lack of understanding or agreement between our department and the association as to the terms and conditions under which the disposition of this money could be used to help out in a very difficult situation. Since I had a meeting with the association in the Okanagan Valley about ten days ago, I have sent a senior official from the department to see whether we can find a better basis for these terms and conditions.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a very objective question for the Prime Minister.

In regard to interest-free loans, I feel that the people should know exactly what they are about. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether, when the government makes an interest-free loan to a foreign country, there are conditions attached to the deal which enable Canada to sell its products.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. When we grant such loans to a foreign country, we make sure that a certain percentage of the money will be used for purchasing Canadian materials and services.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the government is giving consideration to making interest-free loans available to Canada's underdeveloped provinces?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he is in a position to answer the question I asked him last Friday, which was taken as notice by the Acting Minister of National Defence, regarding honorary membership in messes?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I am advised that the practice of granting honorary life membership in messes was a custom peculiar to the RCAF and was only applicable to RCAF officers' messes. On unification of the Canadian Armed Forces, the practice was not continued. Anyone who has a lifetime membership card may enjoy the same mess membership privileges as before in any officers' mess that was an RCAF mess prior to February 1, 1968. Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand that there have already been some 250 witnesses, more or less, before this committee and I cannot see the need at this time, since the bill is making such good progress, to interrupt this progress to hear further witnesses.

Mr. Horner: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In light of the Manitoba government's decision to take the Manitoba Court of Appeal case to the Supreme Court of Canada, perhaps in order to save embarrassment to all it would be best for the Prime Minister to listen to some of the concerns being expressed so that he can better judge the whole issue.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any statement along those lines would have to be read in the context of the white paper that the government published on this whole matter not too long ago. That does not mean there will be no participation in any peacekeeping operations.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

• (3:10 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Monday, March 29, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental there—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose last evening, clause 26 had been agreed to.

On clause 27—Public Service Superannuation

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before we begin discussing this clause, Mr. Chairman, I wish to raise a point of order with respect to the way in which it might be handled. Clause 27 is to be found at pages 9, 10, 11 and 12 of Bill C-207. If this clause is examined carefully, it will be noted that there are three subclauses. Subclause (1) appears on pages 9, 10, and part of 11. Subclause (2) runs from the middle of page 11 to the top of page 12. Then, there is subclause (3), which is also on page 12.

I wish to point out that there is quite a difference in the areas covered in subclause (1) and subclause (2). Subclause (1) deals with early retirement generally in the public service. Subclause (2) deals with special arrangements for deputy heads. I wish to suggest, as a point of order, that we divide our discussion and deal with sub-clause (1), then move on to subclause (2) and then subclause (3). I wonder if that would suit the Chair.

The Chairman: I will hear from other hon. members if they wish to speak on this point. As far as the Chair is concerned, I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is reasonable. We will follow it unless there are objections from other hon. members.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, I will confine my remarks at this stage to subclause (1) and leave subclause (2) until later on in the afternoon. Subclause (1) of clause 27 is on pages 9, 10 and the top half of page 11. This subclause provides for early retirement in the public service. It seems to be divided into four main categories. One could easily get lost in the detail, so all I shall do at this point is identify the four main categories as I see them.

First, there is a provision for public servants 55 years of age or over who have 30 or more years of public service. Second, there is a category of public servants 50 years of age or over who have 25 years or more of public service. The third category relates to those 55 years of age or over who have ten years or more of public service and are called upon to retire from the public service involuntarily. The fourth category consists of employees 50 years of age or over who have 20 years or more of public service. It might be said that there is a fifth category, but it is really a variation of one of the others.

There are differing formulas that apply to these various categories and, of course, there is a certain amount of overlapping, but if I may I shall move on to the main reason for my intervention in the debate at this time. Since we are in committee of the whole, it is likely that some of us may speak more than once. The idea of providing for early retirement, particularly when it is on a voluntary basis, is good and is highly welcomed. I hope I am not talking so loud that Your Honour cannot hear those members on the other side of the Chamber.

The Chairman: Order, please. I am sure hon. members have important matters to discuss, but I ask them to do it in a way that will permit us to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was going to add, Mr. Chairman, that I think the proposed formula for those 55 years of age or over who have 30 years or more service is good. Even as an opposition critic who tries to find something wrong with everything the government does, I am afraid I cannot find anything wrong with this.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I knew that would bring a smile to the face of the hon. member for Ottawa West. The provision is that if a person is 55 years of age or over and has 30 years or more of service, he can retire and immediately draw a pension. The pension will be the amount that he has earned for that number of years service. Thirty years service at 2 per cent per year will give him a 60 per cent pension, namely 60 per cent of his average salary for his six best years. He will get that full pension at that time without any reduction. Unless the man is to be put in the Senate there is not much more that can be done for him, and I would not wish that on my best friend in the Public Service.

• (3:20 p.m.)

I would go further, Mr. Chairman, and say that there are good things which can be said for the formulas which apply to the other categories when a public servant, of his own volition, wants to retire. The key element in all the other formulas, of course, is a reduction provision. Thus, if one is 50 years of age and has 25 years of service he can retire but his pension will not be 25 times 2 or in other words a 50 per cent pension; it will be reduced depending on how much he is short of age 55 or how much short he is of 30 years service. So, without going into detail, the same principle applies to the other categories I outlined. In other words, for all these people who do not meet the prime requirement of being 55 years of age and having 30 years service, early retirement has attached to it a provision whereby the pension one would draw would be reduced. If this were merely a voluntary scheme under which a public servant knowing the facts could choose to retire or, if he wished, choose to work to age 55 or 60, it would be hard to make a very strong case against it.

However, when one realizes that people in these categories may be involuntarily retired or, in effect, fired and placed on a pension at a reduced rate, this brings about a situation which prompts me to use a word I used when I spoke on this matter during second reading. I think it is ugly. I plead as strongly as I can with the President of the Treasury Board, who not only is the pilot of this legislation as a whole but also the pilot of this particular part, to reconsider this aspect of the matter. I plead with him not to try to sell us the line about it being a two-way street and that if it is fair one way it is fair the other. It is the type of 50-50 arrangement involving one horse and one rabbit. To say it is all right for one public servant to have the choice of retiring on an early pension does not make it right for the big employer, the Federal Government, to force retirement on another individual when that forced retirement means a reduced pension.

People in the age bracket 50 to 55 are people who are trying to get their private affairs sorted out, get the mortgage as well as a few other things paid off and perhaps trying to get their sons and daughters through university. Their plans are made and they are looking toward retirement at age 60 or age 65. All of a sudden, the whole situation changes and instead of getting the pension they had hoped to get at age 60 or 65 they must take a greatly reduced pension. I plead on all the grounds I can muster that this is an unfair way for the government to treat its public servants. I ask the minister to revise his thinking about it. I know it will be said that the government is a good employer and would not do some of these mean things; it would not fire people; it would not take advantage of this legislation. I am afraid I do not have that confidence, and I do not see how anyone in this House, no matter on which side he sits, could have that confidence.

We can recall a situation a year ago when people were retired when these pensions were not available to them. These were people who did not wish to leave the government service. But the government made some changes, and it will do so again. These changes could involve the desire to accommodate one language group here and another language group there and, perchance, there might be a desire to accommodate women in some positions in which they do not have adequate numbers and accommodate men in other positions in which they do not have sufficient numbers. There are all sorts of possibilities, under the government's policy, for public servants to be retired compulsorily. I suppose the government feels it will be able to say times have changed and that people previously had been retired with no pension, indeed had either to take their money out or receive a deferred pension at age 60. The government might say that now they will receive an immediate pension. However, the pension is subject to formulas which are spelled out in the different parts of new sub-section (1) of clause 27 of this bill.

As I say, early retirement is a good idea. I am glad the government is bringing it forward. I am glad it is provided in some other pieces of legislation. I think the man on the street is right when he says it would contribute to the solving of the unemployment problem, particularly of youth for people to retire earlier. I should like to see the old age pension age dropped from 65 to 60. But in view of the rights of people let us keep the voluntary principle alive. Let us not force people to take these reduced pensions because the government has put itself in the position of saying it is not putting people out on the street since it is giving them a pension.

When I spoke on this matter on second reading I gave an example. I notice the Letter Carriers Union of Canada has issued a press release today in which it highlights just about the same kind of example. Let me repeat it from memory. A person who is 50 years of age and has 20 years of public service can retire or be retired on an immediate pension. But under the formula by which he is retiring at age 50 his 20 years of service is ten years short of the 30 years he must have to retire at this point and, therefore, if you multiply ten by 5 it comes to 50 and his pension is reduced by 50 per cent. I see the President of the Treasury Bord giving me the courtesy of indicating that I am doing my arithmetic correctly, whether or not he agrees with my philosophy. So, let us consider a public servant who has given 20 years of service and who may retire or be forcibly retired. He may think that with 20 years service he has built up a 40 per cent pension, 20 times two; but no, he has a pension which is reduced by 50 per cent and therefore at that age it is only 20 per cent of the average of his salary for the six best years. I hope no one stands up and says this is being nice to public servants and that it is something which they have not had before.

I say this is ugly and is something that will hang like a sword. I shall not say a Damoclesian sword because in the Hansard office last night we had difficulty spelling that word.

Mr. MacLean: You have said it.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We will be able to see how they spell it today. We found four different ways to spell it last night. It hangs like a sword over public servants generally. It is bad enough, now that there is not the security in employment which the public thinks there is, but when we add to this the threat of retirement at a reduce pension I say it becomes quite unfair.

In this connection I wish to move an amendment but before I do so may I mention another subject unless you, Mr. Chairman, tell me my time is running out, in which case I shall return to the amendment quickly.

The Chairman: The hon. member has five minutes according to my calculation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you. I think this is the first time I ever publicly received this kind of service from the Chair. Thank you, Sir.

• (3:30 p.m.)

When we passed Bill C-194 in the last session and provided for the escalation of pensions after retirement—a very good bill except for something that was in it, but I shall not reopen that at this point—we provided that those escalation payments could come into effect only at the age of 60 because that was the normal age for the retirement of public servants. In particular, the bill provided that retired RCMP or retired armed forces personnel who were under 60 could not get the increase right away but would have to wait until age 60. The main argument carried some weight, and the minister can find from the words in Hansard that I accepted his argument.

In committee we had a heated exchange of opinions but the committee was in too big a hurry to get the bill through, for reasons I need not mention. The main argument was that 60 was the minimum age at which public servants retired, except those who went out because of a medical disability, and therefore members of the RCMP or the armed forces who retired at an earlier age would have to wait. I now understand that when you combine the provisions of the bill now before us, specifically clause 27 of Bill C-207, with the provisions of the escalation legislation of a year ago, it turns out that when a public servant retires under this legislation at 55, 56, 52 or 53, he will qualify immediately for this 2 per cent escalation. I am glad of this, for I think it would be most unfortunate if these people being retired early did not get that benefit.

I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether that has not taken away completely his argument that he cannot provide this escalated pension for the retired armed forces and retired RCMP personnel because the normal retirement age is 60 and no one gets it under 60. Incidentally, members of Parliament who are out on pension and are under 60 do not get it either. But I am concerned at this point with the two groups I named. I say that if we are now revising that concept, if we are making it possible for the 2 per cent escalation to come into effect in the case of some public servants—there probably will be thousands of them—there is no justification for continuing that prohibition in the case of retired members of the armed forces and retired members of the RCMP.

There is more that I want to say and more that I shall say, but we are in committee of the whole so one can speak aga'n. But in my view the main evil in this clause is the way in which pensions of people who retire early can be reduced, even when those people are retired against their will. I think that the bill should be amended to take care of that. Therefore, I move:

That clause 27 of Bill C-207 be amended by inserting therein, immediately following line 16 on page 11, as a conclusion to subparagraph (ii) of paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 11 of the Public Service Superannuation Act, the following words:

"provided however that the reductions indicated in this subparagraph shall not be applied in the case of any employee who does not retire voluntarily from the Public Service;"

I have already pointed out to the Chair that subclause (1) of clause 27 runs through pages 9, 10 and a half of page 11, and the place where I suggest these words should be added is in the middle of page 11, at the end of that subclause.

The reason I used the language "who does not retire voluntarily from the Public Service" is that the phrase is already in the clause with respect to one particular group. But I trust the whole point of my argument is clear that in the case of any public servant covered in any of the various parts of clause 27, who is retired against his will, there should be no reduction in the amount of the pension that he would get for the number of years that he has been employed in the public service.

As I said, there is much to be said about this legislation. I repeat without hesitation that in so far as it is voluntary, it is good. I repeat without hesitation that what it does for those 55 years of age and over with 30 years of service is excellent; I make no complaint about it. But surely we in this chamber do not want to put on the statute books a piece of legislation that makes it possible for the government to fire people between the ages of 50 to 55 and force them to take a reduced pension. That is the reason I have presented the amendment which I have the honour to move.

The Chairman: First of all, I should like to apologize to the hon. member for Malpeque. The committee was starting on a new part of the Bill, and to follow proper procedure I should have recognized the spokesman for the official opposition. I apologize for that. It was only inexperience, but I am sure the hon. member for Malpeque will have his opportunity.

The Chair will accept the amendment. I find no objection to it from a procedural standpoint, but if hon. members have any submissions to make from a procedural standpoint, I will be pleased to hear them now.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, you invited comments on the motion from a procedural standpoint. In my own view, there is a serious question as to whether such an amendment is in order. It is a charge on the Crown. The effect of such an amendment is contrary to the established procedures of this House. Only a minister of the Crown is permitted to move a motion which has the effect of making a further charge on the Treasury.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, if I may say so, I think you were right in allowing the motion. May I suggest that pensions to public servants are paid out of the public service superannuation account. The pensions that would be paid without any reduction, if this amendment carries, would come out of that account, not out of the general treasury. I submit that on those grounds we have the right as private members to move this kind of amendment.

Mr. Drury: I rise for the purpose of clarification, Mr. Chairman. While the hon. gentleman is correct that these payments are made out of a particular appropriation, there is no fund as such out of which these moneys are paid. He knows there is no such fund; he has made the point himself. They are paid out of an account which is made up of contributions at fixed rates made by employees, and a balancing or a residue comes from the public treasury or the Consolidated Revenue Fund. All payments into and out of the superannuation account are made from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and consequently any change in these payments is a direct charge on the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, as the President of the Treasury Board will confirm, when I spoke earlier I did not use the word "fund". I used the word "account". I have been through this, around it and over it many times. I think we know what we are talking about. But I submit, Sir, that no additional appropriation, no voting of any money, not even a dollar, now or later, will be required by Parliament if this amendment carries.

The minister says there is no fund. No, there is not a separate bank account somewhere. But the same minister and the same government say the fact that that account is there by legislation means it is as good as gold, if gold is any good. And I submit, Sir, that the test of this is whether or not a subsequent appropriation, a subsequent estimate, a subsequent vote by Parliament would be necessary; and it would not be necessary, not at all. These pensions are paid out of the superannuation account without any specific vote by Parliament at all. I submit, on that test, Parliament is not being asked to vote additional money, and that Your Honour was right the first time.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I must take issue with the hon. member, not with his procedural argument but with his statement of the facts. If, as he suggests, his amendment would have the effect of conferring added security, added benefits on the employee at no cost to the consolidated revenue fund, I would be supporting it wholeheartedly. The fact of the matter is that this represents an additional cost, an increase in the contingent liability and a subsequent increase in the direct liabilities which have to be met out of parliamentary appropriations. The size of these is determined annually or bi-annually as the case may be, and the actuarial deficit made up by budgetary appropriations.

There is no magic free money out of which the additional costs of this could be met. If there were no additional costs I would be glad to support, indeed to move, the amendment. But unfortunately, there is a substantial additional cost, and I think the hon. gentleman must recognize that paying people full pensions in cases where otherwise they would get actuarially less than full pensions, is going to cost somebody some money, unless that somebody runs the printing presses.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, all I can say again is that the people who will have to put up the money are the employer in his capacity as employer, and the employee who puts the money into this separate account. I realize we are going back and forth, and going round in circles—

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, I am doing it too, just as the minister did, but it seems to me that the test the Chair will have to apply is whether or not a vote of this House, an estimate, an appropriation would be required as a consequence of this amendment.

The rule is quite clear. A member cannot move anything that involves the direct expenditure of money. There have also been rulings that a motion that would require a subsequent vote cannot be moved by a private member. This amendment would not require a subsequent vote. The account is there. It runs into billions of dollars. I submit that because no additional vote is required, this proposal by a private member is in order.

The Chairman: As the Chair indicated, I would like to rule on the acceptability of the amendment, and I thank hon. members for assisting me. My first inclination was to accept the amendment and I have not changed my mind, although hon. members have indicated that the matter is not entirely clear. While we would want to be precise in following the procedural precedents and citations, I do not think members of the committee would want the Chairman of the committee of the whole to be unduly technical or precise, following the suggestion made one day by the hon. member for Peace River that the Chairman should not try to find sin where there may not be any. That is the sort of approach I would like to take.

The hon. member for Ottawa West raised a point of order which I am sure is not in dispute, namely, that if the amendment results in a direct charge on the treasury then of course it may not be moved by a private member. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as I understand it, has argued that there may be an additional contribution to the superannuation fund by the employee and the employer, but that this would not involve any vote by Parliament.

While the matter is not free from doubt, it would seem to me that because there is not a direct charge involved, and because there is existing authority for this particular vote, I should rule that the amendment is in order. Perhaps I should put it in a formal sense. It is moved by Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That clause 27 of Bill C-207 be amended by inserting therein, immediately following line 16 on page 11, as a conclusion to sub-paragraph (ii) of paragraph (c) of subsection (1) of section 11 of the Public Service Superannuation Act, the following words:

"provided however that the reductions indicated in this sub-paragraph shall not be applied in the case of any employee who does not retire voluntarily from the Public Service;"

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I have a few observations to make on Part VII, clause 27 of this bill, but I shall limit my remarks to the first part of that clause, as has been agreed. However, I regret that Part VII is included in the bill at all because I see no necessity for including it as a consequence of any other part of the bill being approved by Parliament. I think it would have been much better had the government introduced Part VII of the bill as a separate bill, which could be referred to a standing committee of the House, where witnesses could be called, where people concerned and affected by the provisions of the bill could be heard, such as representatives of the Public Service Alliance, or anyone else concerned.

Even more important than the effect which this part of the bill will have directly on the people concerned is that the amendments proposed in it reflect or are characteristic of certain trends, trends which we as a Parliament have never carefully studied. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has stated that he is in favour of early retirements. That may be his point of view. I may hold that point of view or a different point of view, but I think that as a nation we have not decided what is an appropriate retirement age. There are trends toward younger and younger retirement. For example, the qualifying age for old age pensions has been lowered. The qualifying age for other pension schemes has been lowered.

I am not so sure that this is the best solution to the situation in which we find ourselves, because this is happening at a time when the lifespan of the general population, is lengthening and when generally speaking, statistically at least, people are remaining in better condition, both physically and mentally, to an older age. I think it can be argued that it is not in the national interest, or in the interests of the individuals concerned to put those people on the shelf, as it were, when they are still in good physical and mental condition and are willing and able to contribute to the productivity of the nation for a few more years.

There is also a trend at the present time to require more and more preparation to enter the labour force. A few years ago it was common for people to end their formal education and go to work at age 16, but now this usually happens when they are older because more training is required. Specialist professions such as medicine require many years of preparation, and I do not see why such a career is forcibly truncated by the notion that everyone wants to retire as early as possible. I do not think that follows at all.

Of course, it will be argued that because of technological advances the production of goods and services requires less labour and therefore people must be retired earlier or there will not be enough jobs to go around. I doubt if this is true but if it is I think a better proposition would be shorter work weeks for a longer number of years in order to keep people productive and active as long as possible.

Early retirement means that people contribute to the pension fund for a shorter number of years and then, should they retire five years earlier than was previously considered normal, they will receive the pension for at least five years longer than would otherwise be the case. As a result, the rate of contribution must be higher in order to keep the fund actuarially sound. This makes it difficult to provide an adequate pension because, as we all know, a certain amount of inflation is inevitable. Apart from inflation brought on by artificial means or mismanagement, there is the inevitable rise in the cost of living. As populations increase the per capita quantity of goods and services to be distributed to them is reduced. This means that our material wealth must be obtained from more expensive sources. It is very difficult to provide an adequate pension if it is to be drawn for a great number of years, even with the cost of living increment provided by the legislation. It is almost certain that anyone who is on pension for a long time will die poor no matter how adequate the pension was at the start. If a person started to draw pension at age 55 and lived to be 90, which is quite common, I hate to think what the dollar would be worth then.

There is another important reason why this part of the bill should have been made a separate bill and have gone before committee. I think the civil servants affected by this legislation have a fundamental right to express their views before the committee. I recognize that the Public Service Alliance has made laudatory remarks about the bill. One of their statements reads:

> The Public Service Alliance of Canada has welcomed the introduction of legislation that would permit early retirement without actuarial reduction of pensions for public employees in certain cases.
> The major change is that an employee who has reached age 55 and has at least 30 years of service may retire voluntarily and receive an immediate annuity with no actuarial reduction because of early retirement.

I agree with that measure and approve that aspect of the bill because it has certain things to commend it which bring it somewhat in line with the age of retirement for persons in the military services, the mounted police and other categories who go on pension at age 55 or a little earlier, including members of Parliament in a few cases.

But that is not the whole story, Mr. Chairman. Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I am concerned about the government's motives in the introduction of this bill. I should like to think they felt impelled to introduce it because of their interest in meeting the request of the Public Service Alliance but I am afraid I am sceptical. I am doubtful if that was their only reason for introducing these amendments, especially the one which makes it possible for the government to forcibly retire certain categories of people on pension.

I do not know for what future possibility the government is providing, since they are not likely to reduce the total membership of the civil service. We all know that in the years of this government and its immediate predecessors the civil service has increased rapidly. More and more civil servants are being put into unproductive work which does not permit them to contribute to the national welfare as much as they might, but this is the result of government policy. Does the government intend to create a great number of vacancies in the civil service in order to allow that large group of people now in their early twenties to enter it? I do not know and none of these questions have been answered. I should like a much fuller explanation of the effect of this legislation on all categories of civil servants and of the government's intention on its application when it becomes law. How will it affect typical civil servants and how many will be affected? It is most unfair that people who have made a career of the civil service, who are reaching their most productive years when they can look forward to further rapid advancement from age 55 to 65, should be retired compulsorily. Promotional advances, coming at that age, would affect beneficially the pension of public servants. If for any reason the career of a public servant is terminated, prematurely or, at 55, say, the effect on the pension will be tremendously detrimental, because the six best years on which the pension is based would be years that would lie in the future of that civil servant. I, therefore, hope that the minister will give a fuller explanation of the purposes of this amendment to the Public Service Superannuation Act.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, this bill has been the subject of a good deal of close examination by hon. members and staff associations. Obviously, these clauses are extremely important to many members of the Public Service. I have followed with interest the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and of the hon. member for Malpeque, who have raised some fundamental points.

When first reading this bill I, too, was under somewhat of a misapprehension with respect to what it did. As a result of discussions with my colleagues and with the minister, I now understand it more clearly than I did at the beginning. First, may I say that the bill itself does not confer the authority to hire or fire. It does not give authority to dispense with the services of any individual civil servant. These are amendments to the Superannuation Act. The right or, shall we say, the authority of the government to terminate the services of any particular member of the Public Service does not hinge on the legislation before us today.

An hon. Member: Who said it did?

Mr. Francis: Well, I have listened to comments of hon. members on the other side. I think there has been a little confusion on this point in their minds, and in the minds of many in the Public Service.

An hon. Member: Which members?

Mr. Francis: About a year ago some in the Public Service were laid off. The government reviewed the activities of departments and decided on the levels of staff which were fair and proper to enable the departments to carry out their work. Some members of the Public Service were retired at that time. I would not wish to suggest that there were very many. I think the total came to something over 400. A few of them would certainly have benefited if the provisions which are now before the committee had been enacted and on the statute books at that time.

These measures, in effect, provide more generous options for some public servants. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put it very well. He said if you are 55 and have put in your full number of years of service, you may well welcome these provisions. On the other hand, if you have not reached that age and have not made your full contribution, then a certain number of difficulties arise. I think there is no member of this House who is not sympathetic towards the amendment which has been proposed, or towards the general purpose of the amendment. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says that if you are retired compulsorily there should be no diminution in the pension to which you are entitled. You take the number of years served, multiply by 2 per cent, and arrive at the result. I think all hon. members will need to reflect more on this point. The government is trying to put forward a principle, a principle of encouraging second careers. It wants to make the voluntary option of early retirement possible and to soften the conditions under which a number of people may be, have been or could be, shall we say, separated from their employment.

The problem is a serious one. If you are 55 and have served 35 years, there is no problem, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre put very well. Actually, a number of public servants have called me welcoming these provisions. The number of calls I have received welcoming these provisions is substantially in excess of those in which the caller has raised questions regarding any possible adverse application of these provisions.

If you adopt the principle under which you permit reduced pensions for those who are retired voluntarily, how will you square that with this amendment which says that if you are retired against your will, there is to be no diminution in your pension? If ever there was a provision which would encourage malingering, this would be it. In other words, if you were in the situation in which you could retire voluntarily, your pension would be reduced; but, on the other hand, if you made yourself obnoxious and were lax in the performance of your duty, and were retired, then your pension would not be reduced.

An hon. Member: Come on, now.

Mr. Francis: I point out to hon. members some of the possible consequences of the amendment.

[Mr. Francis.]

Mr. Douglas: The hon. member is straining at the leash.

Mr. Francis: No, Mr. Chairman. Is this not one of the possible effects of adopting this kind of amendment?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You can still fire that public servant.

Mr. Francis: That is right. And according to the amendment, if the government were to dispense with the services of that public servant, there would be no diminution in the pension. It would be substantially to the economic advantage of the employee concerned to have the government fire him, instead of taking the initiative and retiring voluntarily.

Mr. Douglas: Come, come now.

Mr. Francis: Would that not be the effect of the amendment?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Francis: I am asking the hon. member who proposed the amendment if I have not correctly interpreted what the potential effect might be in certain circumstances?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member is asking a rhetorical question, I will answer it. May I say that what he is suggesting is a reflection on the type of people who are in the Public Service, and I do not think it is warranted.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Chairman, in reply may I say that I have put nine years of my life into the Public Service and I have the greatest respect for the members of the Public Service of Canada who serve this country as well as any country in the world is served. We have a Public Service of which we can be infinitely proud. That does not alter the fact that the effect of the amendment will be to create the wrong types of incentives. There may be some people, and no doubt their number will be small, who might look on the matter in the way I have suggested. Our problem is that we must legislate without creating distortions and without bringing into play such motivation. The problem which hon. members of the House must face is, what is good public policy. I come back, Mr. Chairman, to the fundamental point.

The authority of the Government of Canada to retain or dispense with the services of any individual member of the Public Service does not hinge on the legislation which is before us today. This legislation softens the condition under which some employees, who might in any case have been retired, will be or may be retired. I think this will affect very few of them. Under these conditions, some pension benefits would be available to them. I would welcome a statement from the minister on this matter. I see he is in the House. I hope that he will make a statement to the House indicating that the government will maintain its role as a good employer, as it certainly has been, and that it intends to follow policies which will not be disadvantageous to any people in a technical way.

It is difficult to devise an amendment which would legislate equity in all circumstances. A good example of what I mean is the particular amendment before us today. I am sure that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had the very best of intentions, but in all conscience I would have difficulty in subscribing to the amendment. I think that hon. members on both sides of the House may also want to think deeply about it and examine their own consciences before supporting it.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, in speaking to this amendment to clause 27 of the bill, I should like to take this opportunity to present a few ideas on superannuation for civil servants. It is convenient to give certain categories of civil servants the opportunity for early retirement, but in many instances this has to be agreed upon according to the nature of their jobs and special skills, which may diminish, rendering them less effective. There are however many features of this legislation that make it very suspicious. They could be used to serve other purposes.

I should like to point out that for those in the civil service who will be able to retire at 55, at a pension equivalent to 60 per cent of their salary, this provision is quite attractive. It certainly will be attractive to those civil servants who are over the $15,000 or $20,000 a year mark, in view of our very high rates of income tax at these levels. For instance, a $30,000 a year civil servant does not give up too much by taking early retirement, as the income tax branch is the main loser on this taxpayer. In fact, the $30,000 a year civil servant, or any other person for that matter in that bracket is only giving up about $4,000 and not the $10,000 that might be indicated. I should think there would be quite a wastage of the top level civil servants which the civil service can ill-afford to lose. Unless it is made attractive for these top level civil servants to remain in the public service, it would seem that the civil service will remain relatively scarce of expertise and the high training that many of these civil servants in the higher income brackets have.

Of course, we are approaching the time when the work ethic is diminishing in attractiveness to our general population. It certainly is true that many of the civil servants who will take advantage of this formula are in themselves very creative people. And from their point of view it will certainly be a great inducement to go into early retirement and enjoy those years between 55 and 65, when life can be more full for them in other lines of endeavour.

Then, there is provisions for retirement between 50 and 55 years of age as was ably stated in the House on February 2 by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This poses some advantages and also some disadvantages. If a person is 50 or over but below 55 and had 20 years service, he would get approximately 20 per cent of his best six years in pension. This would be a very meagre return for him, particularly as many people in his category would be supporting families not yet away from home and not yet educated. If a $10,000 a year civil servant who is over 50 would only receive $2,000 in pension he would find himself in an almost impossible position. He would have to look for other income and, being over 50 years of age, would find himself very limited in what he could procure in the way of jobs.

It is perhaps a tragedy that, as a result of the widespread inauguration of almost universal pension plans in our work force, older workers are just not wanted because of the pension requirements. Indeed, I am sure that a survey of small businesses would indicate there are many types of people working in these businesses who normally would be in larger companies if it were not for this pension requirement. Indeed, I would say that small businesses often depend on these people for their work force. I realize it is a very good thing for the individual to be able to retire at an early age and receive some benefits for his service and for his contribution. One of the attractions of the civil service has been that although the salaries have been considered relatively low in relation to private industry, perhaps it is not so true now, security of tenure and the prospect of a modest pension at the end of their career appeal to many people. For various reasons many people must change their careers in mid-stream and it is a good thing that people who have to do this could receive a pension.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is another side to this problem in part seven of this bill in that the government may avail itself of this part seven and compulsorily retire people at age 55 on the pension they would get, or even down to age 50 on the reduced pensions provided by this legislation. If this is adhered to certainly there could be a great deal of unhappiness in the civil service. The hon. member who has just spoken said in no way provided for the severance of individuals from the civil service. One of the areas where it seems to me that this bill could be closely looked at is the retirement pension based on the average of his best six years. In the case of workers who have to retire between the ages of 50 and 60, or do retire, the resultant pension could mean a severe loss. The reason for this is that between the ages of 45 to 60 a civil servant, like most citizens, often receives rapid promotion and rapid increases in salary. At no time has this been more evident than at present, with the severe inflationary factor that has been prevalent in this past six to seven years. I think this formula could well be refined so that it would be based perhaps on the best year of his last six years or some such format that would give him a truer pension rate. This would be especially valuable when a civil servant has to retire compulsorily in order to comply with government regulations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the advent and promotion of bilingualism in the civil service has created, is creating and will continue to create major upheavals in a normal career pattern. The advent of bilingualism in the civil service making it preferable that a civil servant be bilingual, and in certain cases mandatory, has added a large dimension and change in the job pattern. It is very obvious that many jobs that might be considered unilingual could be easily declared bilingual and necessitate a change of personnel. Furthermore, many people who are unilingual could never become bilingual, so it may well be that many civil servants will find themselves redundant long before they have reached normal retirement age.

The now celebrated recommendation that $2 million is to be allocated for the introduction of 250 francophones, if we can define what a francophone is, indicates a fundamental change in the direction of the civil service. Although the government states that it is pursuing a policy of bilingualism, it is quite obvious that this must be set aside if the attempt by the government to equalize the number of those speaking French and those speaking English is to follow a mathematical formula. It is difficult to know what level the government would consider reasonable for the participation of French-speaking Canadians in the Public Service, but whatever it is that level should be defined.

There is no doubt about it, this policy will abrogate the merit system. If the government is to give up the merit system in exchange for some method of entry into the civil service other than by merit, we should know what this is. The $2 million program is almost certainly a make-work program because the special recruitment would apply to additional programs rather than complement existing ones and priority would be given to advancement of the 1972 program. None of these programs is in response to a public demand and at the moment even the government does not seem to know how these programs would develop.

The government has indicated that this is only part of a larger program to take into the public civil service some of our unemployed university graduates and presumably keep them from being drop-outs or other socially undesirable people. But government programs, once effected, have a great ability to carry on indefinitely and this is where I feel the Public Service Superannuation Act will come into effect. It will be a simple thing to cut the civil service in more prosperous times by lopping off those who will be in the upper age group and no doubt many of them will be unilingual and be unable to acquire bilingual status. Indeed, bilingual status may well be closed to them by means of administrative channels.

The development by the government of certain French speaking units only, which the President of the Treasury Board described as part of a policy to provide areas in which bilingual anglophones can exercise a proficiency in French, may well indicate that we are moving into an area of a dual language civil service. The mere fact that the Secretary of State is supervising the linguistic programs could well indicate that we are moving in this direction. In my opinion this might not be all that bad an idea, but if it is so, then it is obvious that this superannuation bill will be of paramount importance because it will be necessary to reconstruct the whole of the civil service and there would be much redundancy in many departments.

It is well known that the civil service is in a severe state of flux and the introduction of bilingualism has made it extremely difficult to apply the merit system on which the whole of the civil service has been based. But if we are to have wholesale changes within the civil service, and if a large number of civil servants have to leave the service prematurely, particularly in the age group of 50 to 55, then it is most important that these people when they are compulsorily retired should get a fair deal. Much of the morale and security of the civil servant would be broken if after 20 years of service he were compulsorily retired on a salary less than he would receive as an old age pensioner on a guaranteed income supplement. Therefore, I do believe that it is most important to this House that it consider the retirement formula ought not be based on the average salary for six years, but perhaps on the salary of the best year of the last six.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in support of this amendment. I am prompted to do so as a result of the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa West who raised the question of the government's right to fire or to lay off workers. This right was not brought into question at all, and I submit this is an attempt on the part of the hon. member to square himself. He knows that a number of members of the public service are alarmed about this feature of the bill, yet the hon. member says he intends to vote against the amendment. Therefore, he must find an excuse to justify his vote against it.

The hon. member talked about malingering and, in view of this, I think it is for us to suggest motives on the other side of the coin. Firings can be carried out for a variety of reasons which, although they may not be apparent, are thought or known to exist. At the present time there is too much suspicion, whether justified or not, that a lay-off immediately prior to pension, without provision for call-back, is done deliberately in order to save the government pension money. I think a lot of this suspicion is unjustified, but surely an amendment such as this would help to allay such suspicion.

Let me give the committee an example. If my colleague from Vancouver-Kingsway were to get her way and all of the recommendations made by the status of women commission were implemented, one could visualize a minister or deputy minister of a department saying there were too many men employed there and firing some of them in order to provide equal status in terms of the number of women employed by the department. If the people fired were under the age of 55, they would have no choice but to accept the pension reduction that is proposed in this bill. Similarly with bilingual civil servants, what is to prevent a senior civil servant or deputy minister deciding there were not enough French-speaking or English-speaking people in a department and firing some of the employees to correct the imbalance thus forcing them to take the reduction proposed in the bill?

Frankly, I think the instances that the hon. member for Ottawa West raised or the ones I have raised will be so infinitessimal in number as to make not only the argument he presented ineffectual but the counter argument I put forward equally ineffectual.

An hon. Member: They are red herrings.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, I think they are red herrings; but if the hon. member insists on talking the way he did, I think I should indicate what would happen on the other side of the coin. With the prerogative of management that an employer has, he can fire to save money, or a senior civil servant or minister could fire somebody he did not like. One red herring deserves another. If the hon. member's arguments in opposition to the amendment are logical, then I submit that mine are even more logical than, or at least just as logical as his.

Malingering is a general term, something the hon. member would find difficult to prove. What is alleged to be malingering often is attributable to the incompetence of a minister or deputy minister who cannot run his department, with the result that the employees sit around with nothing to do. They are given no direction. Often this sort of thing is labelled malingering and the employees are blamed for it, rather than the blame being placed where it should be.

I think this amendment would remove once and for all any possibility of improper motive being attributed either to the government generally or to a minister or senior official with authority to hire and fire. If this amendment were adopted, then no one could say at a later date that an employee had been fired because the government wanted to save some money on his pension. Such suspicion would be completely removed. I should think that the President of the Treasury Board and the government—any government—would want to have this kind of provision so that when firings are carried out they are a direct result of government policy or some just cause on the part of the authorities, with no suspicion as to motive.

For the life of me, I cannot understand why the hon. member for Ottawa West or the minister does not agree at second blush, if not at first blush, that this amendment is worth accepting.

Mr. Francis: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Benjamin: Surely.

Mr. Francis: I am trying to understand the hon. member's argument. Is he suggesting that somehow one could say that the government was firing people to save money on their pension? I am having difficulty following him, but is that what he is saying?

Mr. Benjamin: Of course, that is what I am saying. The way the bill stands now, such suspicion is there. People could feel that the government was firing staff under 55 years of age who would then be forced to take this reduction. Surely, that would save the government money.

Mr. Francis: I am trying to understand the hon. member, but perhaps he could explain how this would save the government money.

Mr. Yewchuk: Why don't you listen?

Mr. Francis: I am listening, and I am trying to follow the hon. member's argument. Although there is an actuarial reduction, the pension is payable over a longer period of years. Every attempt is being made to make the actuarial equivalent the same as a normal pension. How, then, is the government saving money?

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I was trying to explain the kind of suspicion that might exist that people who are fired by the government are fired to save money. I suppose this would save money in one way or another, but that is not really the point. The hon. member cannot put me off my point by trying to justify his position, which I submit is unjustified, by bringing in a red herring about malingering. I suggest that if that is his only reason for opposing the amendment, he is on very soft ground.

Many civil servants are concerned and worried about this situation, and this amendment would allay that worry. It seems to me the amendment would be of benefit to the government, too. Since the hon. member talked about malingering, I would ask him about the vindictive senior official or deputy minister with the capacity to fire a person they did not like before that person has reached the age of 55. I would also ask him, what about the changes to be made if the recommendations made by the status of women report are implemented? Adjustments are being made right now in the public service to implement the good bilingual recommendations that have been made. What about those people who cannot or will not learn English or French and are fired before they reach 55? Supposing certain people are completely incapable of learning a second language or are unable to reach sufficient proficiency, and are fired as a result? I submit that this kind of fear is just as justified as the arguments posed by the hon. member in opposition to the amendment.

I hope the hon. member will reconsider his position. I hope the President of the Treasury Board will agree that this kind of amendment is what the government needs to enhance its standing in the eyes of its employees and remove any doubt or suspicion the employees might have if they are fired and not recalled prior to the age of 55, being then required to accept the proposed actuarial reduction in their pension.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words on this particular amendment. First of all, I agree with the arguments that have been put forward. I will not repeat them because I know the government is anxious to proceed with the bill; suffice it to say that I think they are reasonable and responsible arguments. I find it difficult to understand why the government cannot accept the amendment, and for my part I intend to vote for it.

Having said that, may I take this opportunity to bring up a problem which is of special interest to my province and hence very local in nature. It concerns what is a consequence of this particular clause of the bill, an anomaly in the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada. Clause 2 of term 39 of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada reads:

• (4:30 p.m.)

Canada will provide the pensions for such employees so that the employees will not be prejudiced, and the Government of the Province of Newfoundland will reimburse Canada for the pensions for, or at its option make to Canada contributions in respect of, the service of these employees with the Government of Newfoundland prior to the date of Union, but these payments or contributions will be such that the burden on the Government of the Province of Newfoundland in respect of pension rights acquired by reason of service in Newfoundland will not be increased by reason of the transfer.

That is section 2 of clause 39 of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada, whereby Canada assumes the pension responsibility and the pay responsibility of certain public servants in Newfoundland who, pursuant to the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada, come under the federal civil service or under the jurisdiction of the Crown in the right of Canada.

The difficulty is that there are a number of federal public servants in the province of Newfoundland who, at the time of union, came under the jurisdiction of the government of Canada. Prior to union, these people were employed in the postal service, customs and immigration services and the Department of Finance in Newfoundland. Even though they may have reached the required age, they will not have the required amount of service by virtue of the fact Newfoundland has only been a province of Canada for 22 years. Consequently, they stand to be disadvantaged by this legislation. In other words, they will not be in a position to take advantage of this legislation. That is an anomaly. It is something over which they had no control at the time, and over which they have no control at the present time.

I feel that it is incumbent upon the government of Canada, having assumed the responsibility for these people under the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada, to live up to that obligation. More particularly, they should live up to the spirit of that obligation and make provisions whereby these people will not be disadvantaged or prejudiced in any way as a consequence of this bill now before the House. I say the spirit of the law as opposed to the letter of the law, because I am sure the President of the Privy Council and members of the government can argue on the basis of the letter of the law. They can argue on the basis of the precise wording of term 39 of the terms of union between Newfoundland and Canada that this is legally the responsibility of Newfoundland and that the government of Newfoundland has to make up any deficiency to these pensioners.

I say to the minister if he were to apply that argument to the government of Newfoundland, I would point out that at the time of the signing of the terms of union this legislation was not anticipated. The situation was not anticipated whereby federal civil servants would be entitled to take certain retirement benefits at age 55. That is the crux of the problem.

I know that the President of the Treasury Board is very interested in this because I have talked to him about it. At the present time, there are a number of cases before Treasury Board of individuals who are now pensionable and who are trying to acquire their rights. They are trying to establish their position as a consequence of that particular clause. I know that the minister is very interested in the plight of these people.

I put forward their case to the President of the Treasury Board, the government and the committee, with the knowledge that the government will not hide behind the letter of the law, but will want to live up to the spirit of it. There are not many people involved. It would not be difficult to get a count of the number of people involved. There are certain employees of the postal department, the Department of National Revenue, customs officers, immigration officers, the Department of Finance and even certain employees of the minister's department, the Treasury Board.

These people expect to be justly treated by the government, not on the basis of some inadequacy of the terms of union. Rather than hiding behind the letter of the law, these people must be treated on the basis of the fact that they are now Canadians. At the time of union, the government assumed responsibility for these people. They became federal civil servants. They were not supposed to lose their rights of seniority and hence they should not lose their pension rights. I put this case to the minister. I hope that he will shed some light on it and give some words of encouragement so that these people will know what their rights are before the committee passes this particular clause of the bill.

Mr. Drury: I wish to say a few words in response to some of the questions that have been asked. I will deal first with the specific point raised by the hon. member for St. John's East. The government of Canada has every intention of not only living up to the legalistic terms of union, but to the spirit of that covenant.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: Unless an ex-employee of the government of Newfoundland has elected not to count service with Newfoundland toward the service of the Superannuation Act, that service with the government of Newfoundland will count for service for the purpose of these amendments. If this is the problem of which the hon. member is afraid, I assure him that there is no such problem. With the passage of this amendment, ex-employees of the government of Newfoundland and new employees of the government of Canada who come under the Superannuation Act will not suffer any prejudice.

The hon. member for Malpeque suggested that perhaps there are now too many people in the public service, and that perhaps the object of the government in passing this legislation is to make it easier to get rid of some of them. The hon. member for Ottawa West provided a satisfactory answer to that. It is not the intention of the government, as a consequence of these amendments, to in any way alter the approach to the hiring, laying off or firing of public servants. The background will remain exactly the same after the passage of the amendments as it did previously. For those who, in the public interest, are laid off before reaching the current retirement age of 60 years, those who have been laid off in the past and those who will be laid off for some reason in the future, there will be more just and equitable treatment.

While perhaps one cannot help but agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that this is not as generous as his amendment would make the arrangements, or not as generous with the taxpayers' money, I would still insist that since his amendment would tend to increase substantially the charge on the treasury this is the principal reason I must oppose this amendment and the principal reason I would not have been in favour of introducing it. This does represent an additional charge on the exchequer. Because of this, and the fact that the contributory scheme would be out of balance if this kind of thing were done, we will oppose it. I repeat it is the intention of the government under this amending legislation to continue to behave as a good employer and to recognize the talent there is in the Public Service. This talent shall continue to be used in the public good and the number of releases which would be contemplated whether or not this particular clause 27 is passed will not be increased.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I have just one question. I thought I heard the minister say, and he can correct me if I misheard him, that this change will soften the process of leaving for those who have already retired and for those who will retire. If he did say that or if I thought he said that, was it not incorrect with regard to those already retired; is it not true that these provisions will apply only to those who retire or who are retired after this bill is passed?

Mr. Drury: The latter statement, Mr. Chairman, is the correct one.

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Deputy Chairman: The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. All those in favour of the amendment please rise. All those against the amendment please rise.

Amendment (Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre)) negatived: Yeas, 21; nays, 26.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I believe we are still on new sub-section (1) of clause 27 and I should like to raise now with the minister another question to which I alluded when I spoke earlier this afternoon. Am I correct in my understanding that a combination of this legislation and the escalation of pensions after retirement provision of last year's bill, C-194, will produce the result I described. As I described it, a person who retires or is retired at any age under 60 under the provisions of this legislation will be entitled to the escalation of his pension without having to wait until age 60? Did I understand that correctly?

Mr. Drury: I would have to check on that. I should know it, Mr. Chairman. My recollection is that the escalation is applicable to all those who have retired on pension whether it be at age 65, at age 60 or at an earlier age for medical reasons. The escalation operates from the time the pension is payable. The reason we have, up to the present time, age 60 is that this is the earliest age at which, for non-medical reasons, one can start drawing a pension. If this age should be moved down, I assume the escalation then would apply as from the date the pension became payable for whatever reason.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, like the minister I do not have with me all the legislative material there is in this area. Unlike the minister, I do not have an adviser over my shoulder, but I believe he and I are both right in our interpretation. I have looked into the matter rather carefully and others who are interested in it have done so as well. Certainly the people in the Public Service Alliance of Canada understand it this way. As the minister says, up to this point the only public servant on a pension before 60 years of age who is entitled to the annual escalation is the public servant who is on pension at that earlier age for medical reasons. I believe it is correct, however, that when a person goes on pension at an earlier age for this kind of reason that will also be the point at which the escalation will begin. The minister is nodding his head.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I should make clear that the escalation operates not from the date the man goes on pension, but the date when the pension is payable. I, myself, retired from the Public Service some years ago and I will get a pension, I understand, at age 60. I do not like to have the hon. member describe me as now being on pension or indeed at age 60 going on pension. The thing we should look at is the date at which the annuity or pension becomes payable for whatever reason. It may be the date of retirement or it may be later.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister is taking us down another lane which needs to be looked into as well. But I believe the ruling will be to the minister's advantage. I think he will discover that when he gets his pension his escalation will date not from the time his pension payments begin but from the time he was separated from the Public Service. I was hoping I might get some nods somewhere in the gallery but these public servants are as discreet as they can be. Oh, I saw the appropriate official nod to the minister. I am sure the minister is pleased to know that is the case.

I am fairly sure about this because last year when dealing with this matter I had some correspondence from a number of public servants who had left the Public Service and had arranged for deferred pensions to come in at age 60. The question was, would those people at age 60 get the escalation only from that date or, from the date of severance from the Public Service. The answer was the latter. I believe that is clear, unless someone can say I am wrong. The minister has a smile on his face. We are not trying to encourage him to leave, at least not singly. But we would like to see him go and take the whole Cabinet with him.

This supports the position which the minister knows I want to take. We are now moving beyond the question of retirement for medical reasons. We are now making it fairly general that people who are on pension from the public service at ages under 60 will be entitled each year to the escalation due to the cost of living increase, an escalation that is paid for out of that special fund into which we all pay a half of one per cent. What reason has the minister left for not doing the same thing for retired RCMP and retired armed forces personnel? The whole argument that he made last year was that 60 was the age for retirement of public servants. They did not receive the escalation until they were 60, unless there was a medical condition. By the way, the armed forces and the RCMP people get it also if they can establish medical grounds for their retirement, and it can also happen if one of those persons was perfectly healthy when he was retired but two or three years later is medically unable to take work. He can get the escalation.

We are widening this principle. I do not see how we can withhold any longer this right from retired RCMP and retired armed forces personnel. I want to say to my friend, the hon. member for Ottawa West, that I do not think there is any amendment I can move in this respect, so he is not going to be embarrassed by any kind of vote. I hope, therefore, he will support me in this principle. I know that you, Sir, if you were over there in your seat instead of in the chair, would get the same appeal from me, and I think you would agree with me. I know your record.

Mr. Francis: May I ask the hon. member a question? Is the legislation to which he refers, the superannuation programs, covered by the bill before us today? It appears to me, and I defer to the very good knowledge of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in this area, a knowledge which he has demonstrated on many occasions, that the particular programs to which he was referring and the escalation between 60 and 65, are covered by this bill.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I would say they are not under this bill, but I think that that is quite irrelevant. What we are doing in this bill is establishing a certain principle for retired public servants. This principle is achieved not just by this bill but by the interweaving of this bill, with last year's bill dealing with pensions for members of Parliament. It is the interweaving of the two that produces this result for retired public servants. I am simply arguing that, therefore, we should be doing the same thing at the same time for retired armed forces and retired RCMP personnel. Let the President of the Treasury Board not tell me that that goes beyond the realm of this bill. This omnibus bill has everything in it but the kitchen sink, and I suspect the kitchen sink is also in it.

An hon. Member: It is in one of the schedules.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Levity aside, Mr. Chairman, it does seem to me that we have come to grips here with a pretty important piece of discrimination. As I said, I cannot claim that last year I put up one of my decade long fights over the issue because the minister put forth and stood by the argument that 60 was the normal retirement age for public servants. They would not get the increase until they were 60 unless there was illness, and therefore retired RCMP and retired armed forces people should not get it either unless there was illness. But now we have broken that barrier, we have shattered that argument; we have now established that when people retired compulsorily or as of right at any prescribed age they are entitled at that point to get the escalation. If the RCMP and armed forces personnel retire compulsorily or as of right at the ages prescribed by legislation, I do not think it is fair that we continue to deny it to those people, and I am glad to see the hon. member for Ottawa West nodding his head. I hope the President of the Treasury Board will do the same. In fact, I hope he will do better.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Drury: I cannot help but be moved by the eloquent plea of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I think the government recognizes that there should be equity and relativity between the superannuation or pension treatment accorded to the public service on the civilian side and ex-members of the RCMP and of the armed forces. As was pointed out, these particular pension arrangements are administered under different acts, not the superannuation act with which we are dealing now. For some time now, the ministers responsible for these two forces have had under study amendments which would be needed to those particular acts to establish a greater degree of relativity in this respect than now exists. It would be my hope that any imbalance that the passage of these amendments might bring about in the relationship of pensioners in the public service and the two forces could be rectified.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I welcome that statement, Mr. Chairman and I am deafening my ear to my leader's suggestion that it will not take more than five years.

Mr. Lewis: That is being cynical.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But I mention that to make the plea that there not be a loss of time on this. May I point out that, although this portion of the omnibus bill that we have before us deals only with the public service superannuation act, there are amendments in the schedule to this act. There are two or three members in the House—the assistant deputy chairman of committees and one or two other people—who were missed in the pension arrangements in the omnibus bill of last year. These people are taken care of in the schedule of this act. This is what galls some of us. The RCMP and the armed forces personnel were omitted in last year's legislation. They are missed in the main body of this bill. Why can we not amend the schedule to deal with them? Do not tell me it is a complicated thing that takes a lot of study. If the principle is sound, when people have retired at prescribed ages, they are entitled to the annual escalation of 2 per cent. You cannot call it equity, or something to be studied at great length and say that if you are a public servant you can get it at whatever age you retire as prescribed in this legislation but that if you are in the RCMP or the armed forces you cannot get it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being five o'clock, it is my duty to leave the Chair in order that the House may proceed to the consideration of private members business.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis)—Fisheries—Suggested banning of future seal hunts; the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard)—Manpower—Amendment of regulations to extend retraining period; the hon. member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Rose)—Manpower—Summer student employment and activities program—Deadline for applications under international exchange program.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order: there is some agreement that we forgo private members hour and go back in committee on Bill C-207. With this sacrifice we will show our determination to press on with that bill, as controversial and as iniquitous as it may be.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I hope the spokesmen for all parties are in agreement.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the agreement is with the procedure, not with that vituperation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, there is agreement to this, except I understand it is just a half hour that we are giving up. There will be a message from the other place at 5.30.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it agreed that private members hour should be suspended and that the committee shall resume sitting?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISION RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Richard in the Chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The committee was considering clause 27. Shall the clause carry?

On clause 27—Public Service Superannuation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, we were discussing clause 27(1) before we had the five o'clock interruption, and I just want to complete the sentence I was on at that point. I welcome the minister's statement that this matter is being studied, but I am not convinced these changes could not be accomplished by amendments to the schedule of this bill, in the way some oversights have been taken care of, and I hope that this matter will be looked at before we finish.

We may well finish the debate on clause 27 of the bill shortly, but the bill itself is not likely to be passed today. I am willing for this clause to pass when we finish debating it, but bearing in mind there are references in the schedule to some of these matters I hope the government will give serious consideration to the possibility of correcting this discrimination by amendments to the schedule of the bill.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall subclause (1) of clause 27 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall subclause (2) of clause 27 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, earlier it was agreed that we would divide clause 27, like Gaul, into three parts. Now, we come to the one that I think has more gall than the other two. Clause 27(2) sets out what some of us regard as a very special privilege, and I should like to hear from the minister about it. He made an attempt to justify it when we were at second reading of the bill, but I am afraid I was far from convinced.

As I read this part of the clause a special provision is being made for any person in the public service who is or has been a deputy head. I take it this refers specifically to deputy ministers, and then to various other people who hold titles like secretaries, clerks, or what have you of very important commissions where, by statute, they are designated as deputy heads. This provision is that if a person is in that category and has been in the public service for ten years—that is all he has to have, just ten years—he can cease to be employed, either by being fired or by retiring voluntarily, and yet continue to pay into the public service superannuation fund until he is age 60. At that point he can get the full pension to which he is entitled for the number of years he has paid in, including the years he was actually working in the public service and the years when he was out but making payments.

I confess I am not absolutely sure whether such a person, when he is out, pays his contribution and the employer's also, or whether he pays only his own.

Mr. Drury: Both.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He pays both. The legislation does not make that clear, but I accept the minister's word for it. However, I suggest that this still creates a very special privileged situation for a few people.

I know the argument was that the government wants flexibility. It wants people to come and go. The government seems to be heading away from the idea of the public service as a career. I think it has been a good idea and I think you, Mr. Chairman, and others here will agree with me that the public service has served Canada well because it has had in it hundreds of thousands of people who have given their lives to it. There has not been a malingerer in the bunch, says my hon. friend from Regina-Lake Centre.

I am not happy about this notion that we are going to have people come in and out. I know part of the theory is that we must not let the bureaucracy develop, the elected people must control things. Well, when I see the kind of control we get from the benches on the other side, I am not happy about that. But in any event, all of that is by-play. The heart of this provision is a special privilege that is being created for a limited number of people.

I suppose there are very few of us in this House who have not had requests from people to be permitted to pay into certain pension funds. We get requests from people who are past the age for contributing to the Canada Pension Plan, and they ask, "Why can't we put in the full amount for ten years and get the benefit"? We have had people in various kinds of public employment and various kinds of private employment make this kind of request.

In most cases, these requests are turned down. I know there are a few special cases. For example, I know that a person joining the public service from certain other kinds of employment can make contributions to cover past service equal to the employment that person had elsewhere. But this right to work in the public service for only ten years and say at age 45, 50, or even younger, that a person could go out, go off into private industry somewhere, with a larger income and another pension, and yet be able not just to get a pension for the ten years he was in the public service but be able to get a pension for those ten years, and for the ten, 15 or 20 years he was not in the public service at all but for which he was able to pay the money, is a kind of special privilege the justification for which I just do not see. Unless the minister gives a much better explanation of this than he has up to this point then, Mr. Chairman, when you call the question as to whether subclause (2) is to be carried or not, this member will be voting no.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, I should like to pursue the point brought forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. When the minister replies I hope he is able to give us some rationale, some reason why this provision is being granted to this select group. There are literally dozens and dozens of pension plans in this country in which these people could invest their surplus money. For the life of me I can see no reason why they should be permitted this special treatment after ten years of service. It is completely incongruous and out of context with the rest of the bill.

If I may, I should like to refer back to the subclause which we just passed. In the old legislation, the employee was required to have a credit of 20 years or more pensionable service, but the new amendment sets the figure at 25 years. On the one hand, these regulations are being made tougher for the employee by an additional five years and, on the other, we are allowing these men to leave the public service after ten years.

Basically, the reason we have a pension plan is to provide something that will attract and keep good employees. Now, we are going to allow them to go uptown and get a good job while continuing to pay into this pension plan when they should be paying into a plan operated by a private business. This pension plan is for the benefit of our employees—and I use the word "our" advisedly—and not for the benefit of employees who leave us. I hope the minister can explain the rationale of penalizing some and passing out a bonanza like this to others.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to make a few more remarks on this matter. I must say that I agree whole-heartedly with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. This looks like a tremendous privilege and I can see no logical reason why it should be available to a small group of people who happen to have served ten years or more as deptuy ministers. I could understand an arrangement whereby their pension benefits would be portable and might be added to pension benefits in private industry or a pension scheme of a provincial government. It seems to me to be extreme generosity to allow people with ten years service to qualify for two different pension schemes at the same time and, in addition of course, the Canada Pension Plan as well. It is difficult to rationalize this, but if the minister has some logical explanation that is a different matter. I hope he has, but it is difficult to see how he can justify this; more power to him if he can. I can think of nothing he could say now which would persuade me to vote for this section, but he may have some remarks to make.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Malpeque discourages me from wasting his time and my own, because he cannot conceive of anything that I could say which would change his mind.

An hon. Member: Take a run at it.

Mr. Drury: As they say, I might as well "have stood in bed".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: The deputy heads to whom reference is made are in a rather different position with regard to a number of benefits which those appointed by the Public Service Commission enjoy. Upon separation, the ordinary public servant has a number of rights not available to deputy heads—the right to earned vacation leave—

Mr. Benjamin: They get it anyway.

Mr. Drury: The ordinary public servant has a right to earned sick leave; no such right is available to deputy heads.

Mr. Benjamin: They get that anyway, too.

Mr. Drury: An employee appointed by the Public Service Commission has a right to severance pay upon separation; there is no such right for deputy heads.

Finally, and I suppose this may be of some significance, employees appointed by the Public Service Commission have a right of appeal to the Public Service Commission if they are dismissed. No such right of appeal is available to deputy heads, nor is there any body to which such an appeal can be made.

In spite of the hoary tradition that deputy ministers are the survivors of a long grinding process, and that once they get there their future is assured, this has not been quite as true latterly as the mythology would have us believe. I was shown a list which verified that job mortality amongst deputy heads has been quite high in the last few years. Some have retired at the normal age of 65, some transferred to other employment and some have left the public service.

Mr. Benjamin: There was a change of government.

Mr. Drury: There are no special provisions for all those people, none of the benefits which apply to those appointed by the Public Service Commission. It is to some degree to compensate for the lack of these advantages and benefits that this particular provision is being proposed.

While the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicates that this is a special benefit for a particular group, I would suggest that it is in some measure an amplification of the rule that there shall be relativity of benefits between various classes of employees. To some degree this establishes a more balanced treatment on separation between people with the status of deputy head and those appointed by the Public Service Commission.

I should point out that this is not a benefit unique to deputy heads. At the present time a number of employees in the public service are granted leave of absence without pay which means, as this proposed amendment indicates, that they are deemed to be continuing as public service employees although drawing their pay from other sources. This arrangement is made for people seconded from the public service to a number of international organizations. This is the arrangement made in respect of this number of public servants who become full time officers paid for by the various employee representative groups, unions, staff associations, etc. For these people, the arrangement is that they are on leave without pay. They are enabled to continue their participation in the superannuation plan by continuing to pay their own contribution as if they were continuing to be employed by the Public Service and by paying, as well, the government's contribution. Thus they pay the matching percentage and make a double payment. In other words, they pay double the normal percentage. It is this kind of arrangement for deputy heads which is being proposed here. It is the same kind of treatment that we allow for those who have been associated with the Public Service of Canada and have gone either temporarily or permanently to serve with international organizations or with employee representative organizations such as the unions.

No one will deny, I think, that this is a benefit; but I point out that under an ordinary contributory plan the employee through his earnings contributes one half of the cost of his pension and his employer contributes the other half. Those who describe the benefit derived by the employee who makes both halves of the contribution to the plan as a bonanza are overdrawing the picture a bit, I suggest. This is somewhat similar to the provisions of group insurance plans which allow ex-employees who benefited under a group insurance plan to continue to participate in the plan provided that they continue paying both their own premiums and the premiums paid formerly by the employer to the plan. That happens in a number of private plans in existence.

We hope here to make available to deputy heads or those with the status of deputy heads the equivalent of the assorted severance benefits which are available as a matter of right to those appointed by the Public Service Commission and, in so doing, make the government as an employer less heartless. It is hoped to make the government less heartless when, in the public interest, it becomes necessary to separate a man with the rank of deputy head before he has reached the full span of service or before he has reached the years of retirement. I hope, in order to establish some greater measure of fairness than now exists and to compensate to some degree for the lack of security of tenure of deputy heads and for the lack of the right to severance benefits of one sort or another which employees appointed by the Public Service Commission enjoy but which those appointed by other methods may not enjoy, that the House will agree to this particular amendment.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, may I ask one question for clarification. In the past, at least, most deputy heads had been civil servants prior to their appointments. When a civil servant becomes a deputy head, do the benefits of which the minister spoke, benefits such as severance pay and so on, cease? Are they forfeited, or do they continue, so that when a man ceases to be a deputy head he can still enjoy those benefits?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I am not too sure about this. I seem to remember that I did not get any severance rights.

An hon. Member: The minister is too rich.

Mr. Drury: I will try to obtain the information, if I can, and answer that question perhaps in a few minutes.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, since this provision, according to the minister, is so innocent and logical, does the government intend to extend this privilege whereby one may contribute both the employer's and the employee's share after termination of employment to members of Parliament who are defeated?

Mr. Gilbert: I was just thinking of the same thing.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It will be now necessary to suspend the proceedings of the committee of the whole in view of the arrival of the messenger from the other place.

Progress reported.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Richard in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. House again in committee of the whole on Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

On clause 27—Public Service Superannuation.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall subclause 2 of clause 27 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Is it the wish of the committee to call it six o'clock?

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, since I am the one who talked about progress, although we would be willing to co-operate I find on checking that we have some speakers and I do not think we would pass any clause before six o'clock. Therefore, I think the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to call it six o'clock is a good one.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. House again in committee of the whole on bill C-207, respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto. When the committee rose at six o'clock it was considering subclause 2, new section 11A.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, when Black Rod interrupted us at 5.30 I believe I had taken the floor to answer some of the comments made by the President of the Treasury Board. He had given a little homily on the mortality of deputy ministers. He made it clear it was not physical mortality he was talking about, but in his view and from his study of the matter deputy ministers had rather difficult times economically after filling these positions. I would be interested in seeing his list. As a former deputy minister, I look upon him as exhibit "A".

Mr. Haidasz: He hasn't done too badly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As the hon. member for Parkdale has just said, he has not done too badly; mortality has not overtaken him. I know that he is feeling particularly cheered tonight because of the boost he will get in his public service pension, of which I reminded him this afternoon. He is not the only former deputy minister who has subsequently become a cabinet minister. One former deputy minister became the Prime Minister of Canada. Others have gone on to become heads of big companies, some have become tax consultants with very high remuneration, and some have gone into other fields such as the law. What is the name they use when they are attached to law firms in an honorary position?

An hon. Member: Counsel.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They become senior counsel and are very well paid just for having their names on a letterhead. I do not need to mention names; we know who they are. One prominent official, although I do not know whether he was a deputy head in the civil service, became a cabinet minister, and now I believe he is a deputy head because he is head of the Canadian Transport Commission. All told, the minister would have a difficult time to substantiate his claim that economic mortality is one of the hazards of being a deputy minister. The minister listed the various benefits that ordinary public servants enjoy which are not enjoyed by deputy ministers. I thought some were a bit more fictional than real. For example, he stated that deputy ministers do not get sick leave the way ordinary public servants do.

Mr. Drury: They have no right to.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I cannot imagine deputy ministers having to stay on the job no matter how sick they are. I suspect that they get all the sick leave they need. I suspect, too, that they get their holidays. I think this applies to most benefits that the President of the Treasury Board says they do not get during the time they are deputy ministers. The minister did not list all the advantages that accrue when a person is a deputy minister. We do not know how many benefits and advantages they get for being a deputy head. The minister did not mention their expense accounts. I suggest that the standard of living and prestige that goes with the job is worth something. They get first-class travel on airplanes. I do not think the minister's case stands up at all.

The lot of those who fill these positions is not so onerous that we must give them the special privilege which is involved in clause 27 subclause 2 of this bill, whereby they are given the right, having been employed in the public service for ten years, to buy their public service pension at the same time they may be buying another pension in connection with another employment. I have no objection whatsoever to their being given transferability of pension rights. This is something I believe everyone should have. I would have no objection to deputy ministers having to establish only ten years service in the public service to get such transferability. I make the point that ten years in the public service on the part of a deputy minister does not have to be ten years as a deputy minister; he could have spent nine years in some other position and one year as a deputy head and would receive these advantages. So all told, I believe the government has gone a little too far in this area.

When I consider the difficulties we have in getting adjustments in pensions for ordinary Canadians under the Old Age Security Act, when I think of the battles we have on behalf of widows under veterans' legislation, when I think of the whole ambit of the problems in this area and the difficulties in getting certain adjustments to the superannuation act, I think this special privilege is a little too much. I am afraid the eloquent plea of the President of the Treasury Board has not persuaded me to alter the position I took when I spoke at the start of the discussion on subclause 2 of clause 27. When the vote on this clause is called, I think the committee should vote against it.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, the previous speaker referred to many matters which I would like to raise. In relation to the matter the minister raised this afternoon, in his explanation he referred to mortality, not in the actual sense but in the sense of mortality in respect of these jobs. I ask the minister, in the hope that he will reply later, whether mortality with regard to departmental heads is any higher than it is in industry, and whether the remuneration is comparable with the risk involved.

I am sure many of these people receive twice as much as members of this chamber, and therefore my heart bleeds for them in the extremely dangerous work in which they find themselves. The minister's explanation relative to high mortality in this field did not wash so far as I am concerned. It just did not sell me. The hon. member for Malpeque pointed out that he hoped the minister would be able to convince him when he replied, and obviously the minister in his remarks attempted to do so. He may have convinced the hon. member for Malpeque but I regret to say that up until the present time he has not convinced me.

The minister took exception to my reference to this provision as a bonanza. He was probably quite in order in doing so. I should not have referred to it as a bonanza, so I withdraw that word and substitute "windfall". The minister made another comparison this afternoon which escaped me. I could not fathom his reasoning. He brought in a comparison in respect of group insurance. He pointed out that an employee in a company could, in most instances, on leaving that company pay both the company's share and his share and carry on the pension plan. This is entirely different to the situation in respect of the group insurance members of this House carry and, I might point out, which most people in this Dominion of Canada carry. Their group insurance terminates on leaving their employment and they are forced to take out an ordinary contract with an insurance company at ordinary rates. This applies to members of the House. Should they leave here, they have a conversion privilege and can buy the policy themselves.

I would hope the minister would be a little more sure of his ground when he makes comparisons such as he has in this case. Since the minister, I suspect, travels in high society he may have on his mind something about executive insurance, key-man insurance or something of this nature where there is an agreement between the employee and the employer. Such insurance, however, should not be confused in any way, shape or form with the poor man's group insurance such as members of this House carry.

There is one other matter on which I would hope the minister would be able to give an explanation. In my humble opinion we are entering into this field in a helter-skelter manner and rather blindly because this government moves in singleness of purpose. I wonder whether the government has considered the effect this will have on ex-employees. What is the status, so far as these deposits are concerned, in respect of income tax? I see in the paper that there are many plans—the government probably also offers them—such as registered retirement savings plans which have ceilings as opposed to employee deposits toward pensions. I would hope that in his remarks the minister would give us an indication of what the situation will be in this regard.

I would ask one more question to which I am sure the minister has the answer, as I believe I have. This question was posed to me recently. It is very difficult for the rank and file public to understand financial statements of government. I hope I gave the proper answer to the question that was posed to me, and I hope the minister gives the answer I gave. I was asked whether our pension and superannuation funds are self-sufficient or whether money at any time comes from the consolidated revenue fund to, shall we say, sweeten the pot and carry us over a rough spot or something of that nature. If the minister's answer is in the affirmative, then I think this situation in respect of which we are making flesh of one and fowl of another deserves very critical examination.

That is all I have to say at this time. I look forward to the minister giving an answer to some of the questions which may appear to him to be simple but which are a little complex to me.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, it is not always easy to get an adequate reply in Parliament to a matter as important as pensions, but I cannot pass up this opportunity of raising two or three matters which have always bothered me concerning pensions in the public service. There is an anomaly in the service which I believe bears looking into. For instance, I do not suppose it is well known to members of this House that it was possible to serve in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police before the war, break your service in order to go overseas, come back to serve in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and then find that your pension rights were entirely different to those of others in the reverse situation. I refer to those who served in the armed forces, took a job at home during the war and then went back in the armed forces after the fighting was over. There is no uniformity.

• (8:20 p.m.)

I take the opportunity to raise this question because it is a personal matter. It has been cleaned up now. If this happened now and if we had a third world war, I understand that this type of service would be combined. But in most cases it is impossible to make these things retroactive. Fortunately, it only affects a few people. I have hesitated over the last 25 years to raise the subject because it is not liable to affect me, but this might be the last opportunity I have to raise it. Five or six members find themselves in this bind. It is an obvious anomaly that a person who is in the service of the Queen should find himself penalized. Certainly it is not done on purpose, but through neglect in procedure the fine print of the regulations causes a person to suffer a very serious financial loss.

The second point I would like to make is that sometimes members of the armed forces and of the RCMP are asked to sign a contract with the government, giving in effect a blank cheque. In regard to widows' and orphans' benefits, members of these forces were asked to sign in good faith under different sections of the act which cover their service, and in many cases they took a financial beating. One of the reasons they did so was that a smaller amount would be deducted from their pay at a time when their salaries were low, and they found it difficult to live on a small stipend; you could hardly call it a salary. They found it most difficult to get along, so they signed a paper to stop these deductions from their pay cheques. Unfortunately this affects a small but very important section of the population, widows and orphans of people who served in the RCMP and, in some cases, the armed forces. These people, not having read the small print and not realizing they were disenfranchising their widows and orphans, signed agreements which they did not understand.

As recently as this week I have written letters to some of these widows telling them that because their husbands signed away their widows rights some 25 years ago, they now have no recourse but to beg for war veterans allowance or go on welfare. I have begged the minister—I know he is very influential in the Treasury Board in all matters connected with this subject—to give this matter his attention and see whether there is not some way at this late date whereby people who have suffered in this regard can have their cases reconsidered. We find these anomalies in our pension schemes where men who have served exactly the same amount of time, and even hold the same rank, have a difference in their pensions of up to $200 or $300 a month.

While I am on this subject I would suggest that all pensioners in the public service should be entitled to a cost of living allowance. My own father, who rode across the plains on horseback in the old days when a mounted policeman received 50 cents a day, found himself at the age of 93 with a pension of $40 a month. The cost of living has increased considerably since 1893. Surely now we could very well, if we cannot make it retroactive, ensure that any pension schemes put in for the public service, for the armed forces or for the mounted police have a built-in cost of living allowance. I speak from personal experience when I say that one of the reasons we put up with disgracefully low wages in the mounted police and in the army was that we were told we would have security at the end of our service. If the cost of living is not taken into consideration, there is no security whatsoever. The attempts which have been made in recent years to increase pensions have not produced a magnificent effect.

I apologize to the House for having strayed from the wording of this bill but it is closely related to the rights of pensioners, particularly those who serve in the public service, and I wanted to bring the matter to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Lambton-Kent indicated that this is in the nature of a windfall for those holding the rank of deputy head or equivalent. He felt that they should be compared to people in private industry. This, of course, is partly the basis for the amendment proposed, namely, the kind of benefits which are available to those in senior executive positions in the private sector.

The hon. member cannot help but agree that what is provided here is indeed modest. We have found, in endeavours to recruit senior executives to the public service, that the kind of financial or economic advantages which are available to them are vastly more extensive and attractive in monetary terms than the government, acting on behalf of the taxpayers, can offer to attract this kind of talent to the public service. The right to participate or to continue to participate in a pension plan under arrangements which contemplate the employee or the ex-employee paying not only his share but also the employer's share of the pension plan does not seem to me to be going too far, in comparison with what is offered to senior executives in the private sector, nor does it seem to me to be in the nature of a windfall.

I think hon. members will be aware that there has been a desire by the government to achieve a greater degree of interchangeability of senior executives between the private sector and the public service than has been the case in the past. This prevents the public service from becoming too ingrown, too out of touch with what is happening outside the very large area of government activities, and at the same time it provides a bridge in the form of individual experience between the so-called private sector and the government sector. I think this is to be desired.

It is to be hoped that this kind of provision, modest as it is, will serve to enable one more effectively to carry on this kind of interchange that would be possible for public servants with ten or more years of service to move out of the public sector into the private sector. This would enable him, without too great a sacrifice, to carry on his contribution to the country. Correspondingly, individuals who have had experience and who have talents which they have been exercising in the private sector would be able to move, perhaps not on a permanent but on a less than permanent basis, into the public sector, the government service, without, under the present arrangements, the virtual certainty that unless they continue for the rest of their careers in the public service no provision will be made in terms of pension or superannuation unless we have been able to conclude an agreement with prospective future private employers.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has suggested that he would support a measure which provided that public servants who left the public service and went to work in the private sector could enjoy portability of pension. We already have agreements with a number of the provincial governments, but not with all of them yet, and with a number of corporations in the private sector, providing for the kind of portability which the hon. member has suggested and which I think is good and useful. But I am afraid it will be a long time before we are able, in a rather pedestrian fashion, to conclude agreements. The law requires that there be specific agreements—between the private pension funds and the public service superannuation operation covering transferability. I do not think it would be possible to reach this end on a general basis, given the vested rights both of those who enjoy the benefits of this superannuation account and those who are the beneficiaries of and consequently have vested rights and interests in private pension funds. These must be the subject of individual agreements at present and cannot be legislated on a wholesale basis. Therefore I hope that the committee will agree to this clause.

In response to the hon. member for Pembina, I have the greatest sympathy with the lot of those of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who retired early a number of years ago. Under our system of contributory pensions, both the salary and the contributions which led to pensions of some 40 years or more ago were in an entirely different framework from those of today. However, we have operated these schemes on the basis that it is a contributory pension and, as a consequence of being contributory, the contributors have vested rights. These rights are precise; they are delineated, but they are also limited to the extent of the contributions made. While one could argue that, in social equity, those who in years gone by earned small salaries and consequently made relatively small contributions to pension schemes, and as a result drew relatively small pensions, are at a serious disadvantage nowadays and should be taken care of in some way, this is a problem which unfortunately is not unique with the public service but applies to a great many individuals in the private sector.

We have to try and cater to these needs as best we can through a series of, I hope, useful and progressive social measures, such as the guaranteed income supplement to the government's old age security scheme, the Canada Pension Plan and other similar measures.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall subclause 2 of clause 27 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I shall delay the vote for only a minute. The President of the Treasury Board is quite right in saying that I expressed myself in favour of transferability or portability of pension rights. Mr. Chairman, just look at what is coming out of the woodwork in one short minute. Hon. members are streaming into the chamber on the government side. Usually when I get up to speak, they walk out. What a change tonight!

Mr. Boulanger: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I wish to tell the hon. member that when I saw he was speaking, I told my colleagues one of the best speakers in the House was up on his feet, so they all ran in to listen to him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The deputy whip on the government side is a man of great perspicacity. Mr. Chairman, I was pointing out that I favour transferability or portability of pension rights, and the President of the Treasury Board correctly quoted me in that regard. I am glad he did not try to equate portability with duplication of pension rights. That is what this subclause would give to these deputy heads in lieu of the fact that they cannot be guaranteed portability. Instead of that, we are giving them duplication of pension rights, their public service pension and whatever pension they may earn elsewhere, and because we think that is a special privilege that should not be given to a few we oppose this provision in the bill. I expect that because they favour this special privilege, those members who came in to hear my speech will vote in favour of that provision.

The President of the Treasury Board said that portability of pension rights is something that cannot be forced and that we can achieve it only by agreement among those involved. I submit it is not beyond the wit of those who work in this field under the minister to devise amendments to the Pension Benefits Standards Act and to persuade the provinces to devise amendments to their pension benefits standards acts to provide for this kind of portability. If the government put as much vigour into that kind of effort as it does into providing these special privileges for deputy heads, we would get somewhere. Pending our getting that kind of legislation, I do not think it is a proper answer, in equity and in justice, to single out a few and say to them, "We will give you this special concession because we cannot get portability of your pension to another employer." If the government is going to give these special pension rights to a few, then I say let us give them to all public servants. I intend to vote against this provision.

Subclause 2 of clause 27 agreed to: Yeas, 42; nays, 26.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall subclause (3) of clause 27 carry?

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before subclause 3 carries, Mr. Chairman, may I point out that all it does is determine that the provisions of clause 27 have no retroactivity and so apply only in the future. I should like to say that next time hon. members opposite come in out of the woodwork, as they did a few minutes ago, and we want to defeat something that is before the chamber we will vote for it, because obviously they don't know what they are voting on so they will vote against it and our end will be achieved.

Subclause 3 of clause 27 agreed to.

Clause 27 agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): This concludes consideration of part VII. The committee will now proceed to the consideration of part IV which will be found on page 5 of Bill C-207.

On clause 13—Short title.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Shall clause 13 carry?

Some hon. Members: Stand.

Clause 13 stands.

On clause 14—Establishment of ministries of state.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, my observations will be brief. I want to bring to the attention of the Committee my rather strong views on Bill C-207, which I have not voiced in this chamber as yet. I take great exception to the various items that the government wishes to accomplish, being mixed up in one package. We have to deal with pollution of the air and water and such things, and quite properly so, and we have to consider the finding of natural gas and oil in Alaska and the fact that it may have to be transported through our country.

This bill is put forward in the name of the Prime Minister. I should like to know why it is felt necessary to combine all these things in one bill. I submit that nothing is gained by it, Mr. Chairman. If I were a lawyer I would express great opposition to it, because as a lawyer I would much prefer separate bills for separate things. But the government has chosen to do it this way and I should like the minister to tell me why. Up to now this House has not received an explanation that would justify mixing all these things in one package.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: The reason for it seems to be a secret that the government is going to keep. Coming back to clause 14, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that it allows the Governor in Council to continue the practice of glaring disregard of the rights of Parliament that has been so evident in the other clauses of the bill. This could be interpreted as wrapping something up in an attractive parcel because some of the contents will not stand the light of day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: It is quite capable of that interpretation, and I ask the minister to explain it. It has never been done before. I have been in this House for 10 or 11 years, and we never had any packages like this bill until this government came in—well, not very often: perhaps occasionally, but the minister in charge explained why it had to be done. This has not been explained and I submit that all members of this House of Commons have a responsibility to weed out things that are undesirable in our legislation and to include things that are desirable. No matter how clever it may be, if there is something they want to hide—they have never said whether there is or is not—I submit that we as a Parliament should vote against any clause of a bill that we consider not to be in the public interest. It might be said that there is some good in it. I have heard that, and it is nonsense, Mr. Chairman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: If there is something in this bill that is not desirable, it is the duty of everyone within sound of my voice to vote against it. That is their duty. They do not have to pick out something that they think is good in order to vote for it; that is nonsense. Mr. Chairman, clause 14 provides:

> Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters coming within the responsibility of the government of Canada warrant the establishment—

These are the words that I think are significant.

—warrant the establishment for the time being—

This suggests a very temporary period, perhaps just a few months. It does not even say they are going to have a report of one of the ministers, perhaps the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It just says "Where it appears" that a certain thing is in existence. But that is not a good reason for setting up a change, and that is what they are doing. When they change the machinery of government they are interfering with the Constitution of the country, all wrapped up with a lot of other stuff.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Basford: Nonsense.

Mr. Flemming: I am going to go a little further.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Not too far.

Mr. Flemming: The clause continues:

—for the time being of a special portion of the public service of Canada presided over by a minister charged with responsibility for the formulation and development of such policies,—

After the word "policies" there is a comma so I submit that when they say that, they are going to set up these five departments without any reference to this Parliament. That is what it says, Mr. Minister. Read what it says in the clause and never mind shaking your head. That is the written word. They are going to be responsible for the formulation of policies. Since when was a minister responsible for formulating policies? That is the function of the government. That is what they should practise. They should not allow a minister to be appointed who will carry out and determine policies. The trouble is that nobody has bothered reading what the bill says. That is the same kind of careless abandon as is evident in most of the legislation. They put these things on the statute books and force them through this House because of their majority, regardless of the public interest. That is what I charge them with.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: The same old bunch.

Mr. Flemming: The clause ends with the words:

—the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

What do we find here, Mr. Chairman? Apparently the government is to set up a new department without referring to Parliament. They can set it up by order in council and we will have nothing to say about it. Our opinion is not even asked for. That is what the government is seeking in this bill, and that should not be allowed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: There is nothing new in mixing up dissimilar matters in one bill. This government has become famous for that type of legislation. One might ask, "What is new in what has happened?". I am the first to acknowledge that the part dealing with the protection of the environment and the protection of water is a new departure. Those parts of the bill which try to improve and protect the environment are new. As a new provision, it ought to come before the House.

An hon. Member: It is there.

Mr. Flemming: My friends nod their heads. The point is, it should be here by itself; it should not be wrapped up with something else. That is what I object to, and I would object even more if I were a lawyer. The bill deals with pollution of air and pollution of water. I congratulate the new minister who is to take charge of these responsibilities. I have great respect for him.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): He is a pretty good minister.

Mr. Flemming: We can no longer ignore this problem. But when setting up this department, why do we wrap it up with something else? Why could it not be done without wrapping it up with something else? There is nothing wrong with the provisions dealing with energy, oil and gas, but why wrap them up with something else? There are seven or eight provisions in the bill to which I object. The government wants to create new departments and it is giving people authority to spend money.

Let me say something about the spending of money. The government wishes to enlarge an already large public service. In the main, our public servants are capable people. But we are not adding to them; we are merely proliferating the branches of the public service. In my opinion, once a branch or division is established in any department—I do not care which one it is—it is very difficult to do away with the people who have performed that function once they have completed it. Once they have performed a function for a few months and then finished a job, it is very difficult to do away with them. I say that because probably all the people concerned have relatives among Liberal members and they will raise Cain if anything is done. I say to the minister that that can happen.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Say it out loud.

Mr. Flemming: Clause 14 contains the words "for the time being". Surely that means a brief period of time. If hon. members opposite were intelligent enough to ask questions instead of snorting, they might question this provision. I know something about the pressures in setting up new divisions or departments. I hope that hon. members are intelligent enough to listen to my proposals. I think that these matters should be handled by employing consulting services. The ministers concerned should employ consultants who are experts in a certain field. They could be asked to perform certain services and be paid for those services. Then when they have finished, you are through and they are through and you will not have built up and proliferated a huge bureaucracy which is already larger than we can stand. That, in my opinion, is how these things should be done, but it never seems to occur to the government.

An hon. Member: They want to appoint another task force.

Mr. Flemming: No task force would be involved. Until this government came to power, we never heard about task forces. The first thing it did on coming to power was to appoint task forces.

An hon. Member: Try again.

Mr. McGrath: They even appointed a task force on seals.

Mr. Flemming: I think that consulting services would perform a good job, and there would be no need for all this proliferation. Why, may I ask, do they want to set up five more departments by order in council, when they already have ministers without portfolio who cannot sleep at night? What is wrong with them?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: Let us have more task forces!

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, I object to legislation of this nature for setting up more departments. I have already said that in my opinion anything that interferes with, adds to or takes away from the machinery of government is an attack on the Constitution of the country. It should never be done unless passed by Parliament. That is why I say that this bill should never be passed. I realize that the government probably will support its passage; yet some day—I hope in the not too distant future—they will answer to the people of Canada for it, because it is wrong. It is wrong to set up all these departments and to do all these things in violation of the Constitution of the country. It is wrong to add to responsibilities set out in the Constitution without first going through Parliament.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): That is where the bill is now, before Parliament.

Mr. Flemming: May I bring your attention to another matter, Mr. Chairman. I do not think the government should bring in provisions of this kind unless the ministers who are to have responsibility first give Parliament some idea of what they will cost. But that never seems to enter the collective minds of this government. The poor old taxpayer, which is you, me, and everybody else in this country, will pay. The government is taking money out of our pay envelopes every month. The taxpayer has been forgotten. Why does the government not say, "This will cost $1 million a year", or something like that? They never give it a thought. They do not think about the taxpayer. They only think about giving more jobs to more bureaucrats and about keeping themselves in power indefinitely.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Please, no horses on the payroll.

[Mr. Flemming.]

Mr. Flemming: I said I would bring certain things to the attention of the committee. The government does not say how much anything will cost. No minister bringing in any proposal, with the exception of the Minister of Finance, gives the House any idea, as a rule, what the proposal will cost. That never enters the government's mind. How much is taken from people's pay cheques means little to this government.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that these increasing costs are of concern to people who are suffering in this regard. Not only is there inflation, not only is the cost of living increasing, but the amount of money left in the pay packets with which to buy the necessities of life is steadily decreasing.

The government should be setting an example in this regard, but it is not. It is time they woke up. It is an increasing cause of concern to wage earners to find their take-home pay becoming less and less because more taxes are deducted at source. I do not believe everybody prefers that the government should spend their money for them, anyway. I happen to belong to a group of people who feel that as individuals we should have some responsibility to look after ourselves, and that the government should not be taxing everything and giving us little benefits of one kind or another as we go along.

I want to refer to some of the details of clause 14. The government has there the authority, the means to establish, to continue, to change, to initiate and to terminate. So they can start in March and terminate in May if they want to. There is no one to consult, no one to prevent them. This is the kind of power for which they are asking. It should not be sought, and it is wrong. I am surprised that the government should bring down a clause of this kind, although I ought not to be. It gives the administration and the government tremendous power. They could alter the lives of many people if they were so inclined. The representatives of the public, that is us—we are the only voice the people have on these issues, the only ones who can stand up and say anything on their behalf, the only chance they have to be heard—are being deprived of their right to intervene. The government intends to take this protection away. The Prime Minister intends to establish these new departments, and that is only a sample of what they are doing day by day.

The Chairman: Order. I regret very much to interrupt the hon. member, but I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

An hon. Member: He is the best of the bunch over there.

Mr. Basford: He is not making any sense, so he might as well continue.

Mr. Flemming: Mr. Chairman, I could be blamed for many things but I ought not to be blamed for the minister's lack of comprehension. If he is not able to understand anything, I cannot be blamed for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Flemming: The bill provides for the appointment of a secretary. This is probably a glorified name for deputy minister. I find no fault with that particularly, but what do they propose to do with whoever is appointed when they abandon a particular department created under these provisions? After all, it is suggested here that the administration can establish it and terminate its activities at will. What will be done about the staff? Hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches opposite care nothing about that because they are not concerned with the interests of the people. The emphasis is on power. Power corrupts, as they say, and absolute power corrupts absolutely. They are certainly in a position where they are fair targets for the sort of criticism I am making.

Mr. Boulanger: Why didn't you quit while you were ahead?

Mr. Flemming: Why don't you get up and make a speech some time?

Mr. Boulanger: As soon as you are finished.

Mr. Flemming: Moreover, no one on the government side has yet explained the need for these powers. Not one of them has advanced any reason for doing this. In fact, there is no reason. Lots of machinery is available without it, and hon. members over there know it as well as I do. When this bill becomes law there will be no discussion about the formation of new ministries. A simple proclamation will be all that is necessary. You boys on the back benches over there, and us, too, will have nothing whatever to say about it. The goverment will just do it. But provision has been made for a lot of jobs, so maybe some of you will be getting some of the crumbs which fall from the table. If you are satisfied with crumbs, that is all right. I am not satisfied with the legislation, It is not good enough, because the elected representatives of the people, that is us, should be consulted before anything as far-reaching as this in the machinery of government is undertaken by the administration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): Good old John.

Mr. Bell: You haven't got your raise yet.

Mr. Côté (Longueuil): It is coming.

Mr. Bell: It is not through yet.

Mr. Rowland: It being shortly after the supper hour, Mr. Chairman, I very much doubt that I can reproduce the energy or the enthusiasm of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. Nevertheless, I wish to bring it to the attention of the committee that part IV gives birth to an entirely new breed of cat in the form of ministers and ministries of state. A minister of state is not responsible, like most other cabinet ministers, for a "line" department but, rather, for a more narrowly defined area which, it would appear, will be largely associated with policy development or problem solving. A minister of state will have defined areas of responsibility, defined powers, duties and functions. These definitions will be contained in the proclamation establishing a ministry of state. In this respect a minister of state will be unlike a Minister without Portfolio who need have no specific duties assigned to him. In short, the proposal to establish ministries of state represents an innovation, a departure from established practice of an important kind.

I certainly have no objection in principle to departing from well-established practices of this House. Indeed, there are possibly many such departures which I would greet with exceeding great joy, even dancing in the streets. None the less, I think it only wise that such departures be agreed to only after the fullest study and the most complete explanation of the reasons which compel them. It is on this ground that I deplore the absence of the Prime Minister from the committee while we are discussing the portion of the bill before us, the portion of the bill with which he is most directly concerned, the portion of the bill which, if approved, will give him power to appoint at his own discretion up to five additional new ministers at the head of five new semi-departments and assign to each of them duties—an assignment which might well involve the major reorganization of existing government departments.

I repeat, the Prime Minister can do all this at his own discretion. I do not think that in these circumstances it is presumptuous of this House to expect the right hon. gentleman to be here to answer our questions. At least he should be prepared to tell us why he believes such a move to be necessary. At least he should be here to explain the use he intends to make of his new powers. At least he should be here to tell us what ministries of state he would anticipate creating, the sort of powers which would be assigned to them and the anticipated normal duration of such ministries.

Information of this kind is not available through a reading of the bill. The President of the Treasury Board who is here to answer for the Prime Minister cannot provide us with much of this necessary information because, in fact, the creation of ministries of state and ministers of state is, under this legislation, the prerogative of the Prime Minister and I very much doubt that the President of the Treasury Board includes among his numerous attainments the ability to read minds.

Mr. Drury: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would draw to the attention of the hon. member, who seems to be in ignorance, that these appointments are to be made by order in council.

Mr. Rowland: I am quite aware that they are made by Governor in Council.

Mr. Boulanger: Why didn't you say so, then?

Mr. Rowland: Saying that the appointments are made by Governor in Council is tantamount to saying that they are made by the cabinet, which in the case of the appointment of a minister means by a decision of the Prime Minister. This being the case, the inability of the minister to read minds, specifically that of the Prime Minister, severely compromises his ability to satisfy the House as to the utility and acceptability of the concept of ministries and ministers of state. But I suppose we have no alternative but to press on as though he were not so handicapped. I am profoundly disquieted by the implications of this section of the bill. I consider the reasons put forward by the minister on second reading to justify the granting of such powers to the Prime Minister to be so obviously and transparently obfuscations or, if he prefers, maladroit rationalizations, that I cannot accept them.

I am not about to join in the cries that the ministry of state is simply another way to provide jobs for the boys. It has that potential, but whether it will be employed to that effect we can only wait and see. I am willing to have the Canadian people pass judgment on that aspect of the bill. Nor am I unwilling to admit that some ministers have too much to do to do everything that they have to do properly. In fact, that might help explain some of the mistakes that this government has made. I am quite prepared to admit that ministers of state might offer some relief in this regard.

I also wish to be very quick to admit that the traditional structuring of the public service in a number of "line" departments each operating, to all intents and purposes, independently of the other is inadequate to the task of providing appropriate and effective solutions to modern problems. Changes and experimentation are warranted, and perhaps the idea of a ministry of state provides part of the answer.

I expect that these are the kind of beneficial effects to which the minister was referring when he argued on second reading that the ministry of state would make the government more efficient through providing it with an enhanced capacity for flexible response. What I should like to know is how an enhanced measure of parliamentary control over the establishment of ministries of state would militate against the beneficial effects I have mentioned and for which the minister has argued. Why must the creation of ministries of state be by proclamation? Why not by act of Parliament? Why are they not to be created by means of an act of Parliament, thereby giving members some say about the suitability of proposed arrangements for meeting the assigned tasks, giving members some say about the matters in relation to which the minister for the ministry is to formulate and develop policies, and to give members some say about the powers, duties and functions to be assigned to the minister and the ministries of state.

Why must every response of this government to a given problem involve the strengthening of the cabinet, and more particularly the Prime Minister's office, rather than Parliament? The only plausible explanation I can find for this phenomenon is that the Prime Minister himself is unable to understand the potential of this institution of Parliament. Because the government is unwilling to bring parliament into the process of creating ministries of state, I feel that the potential advantages of the idea which I have cited are far outweighed by the disadvantages that I am about to cite.

The minister has argued that the arrangement will give the government more flexibility. It is my contention that because Parliament will not be consulted, it provides the government with far too much flexibility. Under this legislation the Prime Minister will have five new departments to create as he sees fit, and I say five new departments advisedly. Under the legislation the Prime Minister can appoint a minister of state, make him head of a department, provide him with a parliamentary secretary and all the public servants necessary. These ministers of state will have the same rights and privileges as those ministers specifically mentioned in the Salaries Act. They will be members of the cabinet.

I submit that the device of the ministry of state, as defined in this bill, presents the Prime Minister with the means to create and dissolve departments at will without coming to Parliament for sanction or for comment. This is certainly the case if one considers, in conjunction with the powers given the Prime Minister in this bill, his powers under the Public Service Rearrangement and Transfer of Duties Act. That is not efficiency; that is the machine gone mad. Surely efficiency in a democracy means more than simply doing a job. Surely it implies doing the job that the people want done, and doing it with the full knowledge and understanding of the people. This, in turn, implies that the government should, wherever possible, act through Parliament rather than outside it. This section of the bill could have been drafted to ensure that Parliament would be consulted. It has not been so drafted, and accordingly I reject it.

The minister's second major argument in favour of this section of the bill during second reading was that it would provide increased ministerial responsibility to Parliament through extending the interface—whatever that means—between the ministry and the chamber. He argued that the device of ministries of state would allow the roles of ministers to be more precisely defined and hence their accountability would be more easily determined. The equation is: more ministers, therefore more responsibility. If that is a logical argument and a valid one, then why stop at five? Why not 15 or 25? Besides, we do not know whether they will be on the roster for the question period.

In rebuttal of the minister's argument—that is, more ministers means more accountability—some eminent authorities on the government of Canada have already suggested that having 40 or 50 members of the governing party as part of or close to the ministry would severely compromise any remaining degree of independence that this chamber possesses. I might add to this argument that the kind of independence of decision that this bill gives the Prime Minister runs directly counter to the procedures established of recent date by the device of government organization bills which have provided Parliament with some say about the way in which departments are established, their role, their function and their powers. A good example of this is the ministry of the environment that this bill will set up. The bill may well be amended in some salient particulars as a result of having been brought before this House. Moreover, there are all the implications arising from the manner in which the ministries and ministers of state will be created, which I have already drawn to the attention of this House, and which suggest that the accountability argument is mere window-dressing.

Let me go further. If the government really wanted to increase the accountability of the cabinet to Parliament, would it in fact begin by expanding the number of ministers? Its priorities are all backwards. Why not begin, rather, with providing members of this chamber with the facilities necessary to make sure that the ministry is accountable? Why not begin by providing research assistance for members of this chamber as well as adequate office staff, in an attempt to reduce the information gap existing between the treasury benches and the members of this House?

Why not begin by strengthening the committees system of this House? Why not provide adequate staff for committees? Why not provide committees with the power to decide what matters are to be brought before them, rather than leaving that decision to the ministry? Why not insist that committees prepare an epitome of the proposals to be presented to the House to assist it in holding the ministry accountable? I suggest this is the logical way to start if you are really concerned about accountability of the ministry to the House of Commons. You do it by strengthening the individual member of the House and by so equipping him that he can do a job of criticizing the ministries. It had been my intention originally, as a result of this kind of consideration, to offer amendments to each clause in this section, substituting references to "Acts of Parliament" for references to "proclamations". However, on second thought I felt it would be best to defeat each clause in this section of the bill and thereby force the government, if it still sees merit in the idea of the minister of state—which idea I have not discounted—to bring in a mini organization bill each time it wishes to create a ministry of state, thus ensuring the consultation of Parliament.

If I can use as an example what has been said to be a possible department stemming from this bill, namely, a ministry of state for housing, if this bill goes through in its present form the role and function of a ministry of state for housing will be that which is determined by the cabinet. If, on the other hand, the post had to be created by an act of Parliament, the country would at least know what the rest of us in this House thought about it and would be able to weigh the cabinet's conception of that office against that espoused by other members of the House. Surely that is the function of this place. Moreover, there would be a chance at that time to amend the legislation. This is likely to be done with this government organization bill in regard to the ministry of the environment. It will be an important amendment.

I do not see why the government wants to take away from this chamber or, to be more accurate in an academic sense, why it is not willing to give that opportunity to this chamber. It has always been the prerogative of the Governor in Council to appoint ministers. Forcing the government to bring each idea for a ministry of state before this House in order for the House to consider it would mean, in addition, that each piece of such legislation would be subject to sober second thought. It would not be simple proclamation by the cabinet caught up with a problem of the moment. Sober thought could take place in this chamber. This is not possible under the present legislation. For this and the other reasons I have cited, I urge the defeat of clause 14 and each clause thereafter.

Mrs. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, I want to comment briefly on part IV of the bill. I share the disquietude voiced by my colleague, the hon. member for Selkirk. Looking around this chamber and seeing the velocity with which members opposite can emerge from the woodwork, I feel sure that by a head count we are going to be stuck with this part no matter whether we want it. As we are going to be stuck with this part, I am prepared to go on from that point. I realize that too much power is going to be given to the government by this method of creating ministries. It is inevitable that we are going to have this method. I want to know what ministers of state are likely to be created. I would like to see one or two created who will do something useful. I plead tonight that one of these ministers of state will be appointed to deal only with the question of implementing the recommendations of the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: Down girls!

Mrs. MacInnis: Down with the applause until we get an indication that we are going to get more than kite-flying out of this. There has been too much kite-flying in the matter of giving effect to the recommendations in the report on the status of women. Ever since the report was tabled we have been tantalized by half promises and suggestions from the government. As a matter of fact, on several occasions the minister in charge of housing has held forth the idea that perhaps if we let this bill through, a minister of state will be appointed to look after the implementation of the recommendations on the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. In reply to my question on the "late show" the other evening, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister briefly quoted with approval the words of the minister in charge of housing.

During the debate on the status of women we were told that if women were good and bided their time, a minister would be appointed who would be in charge of the implementation of the recommendations in the report on the status of women. I do not think that is good government. One month ago the Prime Minister made a speech which raised the expectations in women's organizations and in the minds and hearts of thousands of women in this country about the priorities of government with regard to these recommendations. Very little has been done since that time. Members opposite smile pleasantly. They feel that women are such suckers that you just have to promise them something and look as though you have some pleasant surprise waiting for them, and they will do anything for you. They think women will eat out of their hands. Women are getting tired of eating out of the hands of the government. Their frame of mind is to bite the hand that is extended to them unless there is something in it besides empty promises.

Women from across the country have for weeks been flooding the offices of members of Parliament with the request that a minister be designated and a ministry created to put these recommendations into effect. They are tired of being told that women's affairs are a high priority, when nothing is being done about them. In his speech of one month ago the Prime Minister said:

> Attitude has been the contributor of most of the obstacles which now confront women in Canada. But more than a change of attitude is required in order to overcome discrimination and to provide opportunity. Some laws will have to be changed to eliminate the anomalies and inconsistencies which have crept into our common law system from days when women were regarded as legal chattels; regarded, virtually, as the property of their husbands.

That is as far as he goes. The Prime Minister then indicated that he is appointing people to work on a departmental committee, and so on. We have heard nothing whatsoever about a minister being put in charge of this important matter. I have seen this happen before. For many years the consumers of this country kept after the government to create a ministry of consumer affairs. For years all they were given were pleasant smiles and expectations that such a ministry would be created. A few years ago there was a boycott by women consumers from coast to coast. The women said that the time had come for a minister and a ministry of consumer affairs to be created. If something is not done by governments, it will not be very long before these women will have a wide-scale repeat of that boycott to demand the implementation of these recommendations.

It is all very well to applaud cheerfully whenever this matter is mentioned. The women are sick and tired of tolerant smiles and a superior look on the faces of government members. The time has come for a minister to be appointed so that these recommendations will be put into law. These laws should be within the federal competence. Something should also be done at the provincial level, and the two levels of government must work together. The women do not intend to play around with this any more. The sooner the government recognizes this, the better it will be. After all, the government only needs to take a head count. Half of the voters of this country are women. They are going to make their will felt in no uncertain manner. They do not want to see all the work that has been done by the royal commission go down the drain or put into some pigeon-hole. The government must be very earnest about designating a ministry for the purpose of looking after the implementation of the recommendations of the report on the status of women. I urge that this be done without further delay.

I am very sorry that the Prime Minister could not find time to be here for this important debate tonight. I think he should spare a little more time from his private life, even at the present time, to be in the House to deal with these matters which are of importance to the people of this country. The matter being debated tonight is an important one. I ask the Acting Prime Minister to assure the House that a minister of state will devote his time to the implementation of the recommendations of the report on the status of women. As a matter of fact, I throw out a challenge to the minister because women in this country would be greatly reassured if they had some hard news from here instead of more bouquets given from empty hands.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, we have before us another omnibus bill. I shall not spend a great deal of time in criticism of it because I hope to make a positive contribution. I am against a great proliferation in government. I think we have drifted too far into a situation where the government runs all our affairs. However, if the government is to run our affairs, I say for goodness sake let us have a little order in it so that we know where we are going.

If there are to be another five ministers and a corresponding number of parliamentary secretaries, they must give us a better performance than has been the case in respect of the present ministers. We want ministers who will be responsible to Parliament and who will answer our questions. We want ministers who on proper occasions will stand up to a government which is not always sensitive to their ideas. Although the wording of this bill might suggest that more ministers would mean more creative ideas, I suggest that unless there is a great change in attitude we will merely have more servants and the same limited number of ideas coming from a very limited source.

I should like to know why there are more and more regional desks. Regional desks are being set up all over the country so that members of Parliament are no longer consulted. It is no secret that when a public building is to be built or when a post office is about to be opened, on a great many occasions the member of Parliament who should be the first to know about it is the last to know about it. When a new building is to be opened, why should the member of Parliament concerned be asked to remain in the back row during the ceremony? Surely this should not be necessary.

If it is intended that these changes are to bring about participatory government, surely the elected representative of the people should be given a great deal more prominence than he is given at the present time. I believe we have earned it. In most cases we have gone through a proper democratic process in order to get here. There are many people in my district and in the surrounding district who want to know why in this Parliament of which their member is a part he is so discreetly ignored on many occasions. This has distressed me over a period of years and I want to bring it to the attention of the government.

I expect gentlemen opposite to grasp the power they still have, to exert the pressure they could exert and make sure that their own ideas are brought forward. If they would do so, they would find it unnecessary to always blame a sleepy opposition or an ineffective leader of the opposition, and so on, as we have heard ad nauseum. I say to them that if they would come forward with progressive ideas, they would find they would get a great deal more support from this side of the House than from their own cabinet.

As the last speaker said, I have no doubt that with their large majority they could pass any number of statutes they desire. I want them to think over very carefully what it is they intend to put through. They must remember that if the number of the ministers and parliamentary secretaries is to be increased, these ministers and parliamentary secretaries should have a job to do and should be prepared to do it. These ministers of state should not be like sheep. I say to members opposite that they are certainly more in the public eye than members on this side and the things they say are quoted more often. I remind them, also, that the leadership they could give is eagerly anticipated all across this country.

Perhaps members of the public are not as frank with members opposite as they are with me. Believe me, I take criticism when it should be directed to the government and I take criticism which should be directed to Parliament. Sometimes we are not in a position to defend ourselves, because we are not given the answers we should be given to the questions we ask. I suggest that members have the opportunity to make their pressure felt by seeing that the questions asked are given the attention they deserve and are properly answered. We still have the power in this House to do anything we wish. We can defeat any government. We can defeat any piece of legislation. The people of Canada expect us to do this. I say, Mr. Chairman, do not believe the people of Canada are fed up with democracy, because they are not. They may be temporarily fed up with us and our performance here. If we listen carefully we will hear a continual murmur which would indicate they feel we do not stand up in our places and do what we should, because the silence sometimes is eloquent. They are waiting to hear that we are honestly striving to improve their lives.

It is passing strange, when our young people are unemployed, to hear statements from members of the government, unless they are misquoted, to the effect that Canada can stand "X" percentage of unemployment. I will not quibble about whether it might be 6 per cent, 8 per cent or 10 per cent. There is no parent in Canada who wants any percentage of unemployment because, unfortunately, the statistic of one might be their favourite son or daughter and they expect us to do all we can to find full employment for these people. If the proliferation of ministers would produce these results, I would be happy. If the proliferation of ministers and parliamentary secretaries would mean only that another five or six Liberals are promoted and are willing to adopt a sheeplike attitude and do exactly what they are told without thinking, then it is my duty to stand up here and say so. This is the way it begins to look to me. If we are to produce more ministries of state, there certainly are jobs which they could do.

I would suggest perhaps one ministry of state might be a ministry of youth. This is not a new idea for me. Some ten years ago I put forward this idea in a complete brief to our government of the day, and perhaps now I can say "I told you so". Ten years later I am sure history has given truth to my position in this regard. It is obvious that we need a ministry of youth, or at least a department of youth to co-ordinate the efforts of the federal government to see that our young people are given every opportunity to use their talents, loyalty, energy and leadership to the fullest extent.

We have made one or two abortive attempts at helping our youth. The efforts we made in the past were half-hearted. We did not give the responsibility of controlling the CYC to a responsible minister. There was a lot of wishful thinking. I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, and through you to this government that they should not give this job to a junior minister. Our young people are our most important natural resource, and therefore the job should be that for our most able, capable, energetic and responsible minister.

Let us not do what we have done very often in past years with the Department of Indian Affairs—put it at the bottom of the list. This department is responsible for a very important section of our population, our first senior citizens, the hosts of this continent, people who on many occasions have given us an example in racial tolerance which we could well practise in less obvious quarters in our country. The Indian and Eskimo peoples have always accepted us as full brothers, and I am ashamed to say that we have not always accepted them.

But we have no excuse whatsoever with our young people. Our responsibility to them is of prime importance. So I think we need a full-fledged department at least, if not a full-fledged ministry, to co-ordinate all the efforts of the federal government on behalf of our young people. These young people have the energy to go and make a proper survey of our northern country in their time off from university, using their special talents in engineering and mathematics, their interest in geology, mineralogy and oil development. The young people are willing to go where they are needed, and they expect more leadership from us.

The physical development of our young people has been sadly neglected. During the last war some 70 per cent of our young people were turned down for the armed forces on physical grounds. In World War I only 20 per cent were rejected on physical grounds. So we lost 50 per cent of the health of our young people in two generations. I suggest that one of the first things that a minister of youth should do is to set up a proper program starting with the young people and, I hope, involving most of us in the end.

There should be a complete new look at the question of physical fitness. From there it is not far to go to consider our extraordinary lack of gold medals in the Olympic games. We are not going to get gold medals in the Olympic games so long as we neglect the health and physical fitness of our young people. So any ministry set up which would be responsible for our youth should put physical fitness high on the list. This year a great many of our young people will be coming out of universities and secondary schools with no prospect of employment. So a ministry of youth should set up a system to ensure that every young person who comes out of school, either permanently or merely for the summer, has available to him a job out in the fresh air which would combine self-improvement, economic improvement and resource improvement for our whole country.

Perhaps, to inject a little humour because I may be getting a little too intense, may I say that I notice that in part III of this bill we are to have astronomical observatories. I hope that they will not merely be set up to keep track of the unemployment figures. To get back to youth management, may I point out that our young people today are extremely interested in social services. A great many of them come from affluent homes and they are not solely interested in making money. Many of them want to give of their time and do the sort of thing that President Kennedy spoke about. They want to go out to the underdeveloped countries of the world and devote their time and energy, gratis in many cases.

What machinery have we set up to enable our youth to do this? We are doing it in dribs and drabs. We expect the churches to do it all. I think that governments in almost any other country in the world are involved in such programs, but we in Canada have little to match it. I suggest that a minister of youth might well take the initiative of the United Nations. I think that our generation has failed miserably to establish peace on earth through the United Nations. I venture to say that our young people, if they were involved in a kind of junior United Nations, might travel around the world in the spirit of brotherhood which they often speak about. They want a vehicle for it. Let us give it to them. Let us give them leadership. As John McCrae said in his "Flanders Field", maybe we will have to throw them the torch. We have failed to hold it very high, but among the young people today there are thousands who want to take up that torch which we have failed so miserably to carry. But this takes organization and encouragement.

If we are to enlarge our government by five ministries, certainly a ministry of youth would be one of the most important ways in which we could show faith in our young people, in their physical fitness, in their mental training and in those spiritual qualities which are probably more important than the first two. We should show them that Canada is a country with no territorial ambitions, with little bad history to live down, a country which a generation ago was held in the very highest esteem by the smaller countries.

We could be a bridge not only between Britain and the United States, as we are supposed to have been historically, but we could go out to all those countries which look to us for leadership. We are always talking about dynamic leadership, but we have to take positive steps so that our young people may regain confidence in us and see that we really mean what we say and that we put first things first. When we are sorting out our 35 ministries, we should show our faith in our young people by putting their own ministry, new though it may be, in its proper place, at the top.

I hope that in setting up these new ministries we will try to be fair. If we are to have a big government, let us at least try to make it as fair as we can. Some good may come out of establishing more ministries, and if we are going to look in the ranks for those who might fill them best, it might be a good idea to appoint many parliamentary secretaries. But I am not sure how much more money they should get. The idea of having professional cabinet men is quite new in the democratic process. When I first came here 13 years ago, I thought I would be well paid just by having the honour of being asked to accept more responsibility. I never thought that my pay should be doubled in order to serve my country in a better capacity. In fact, I have often wondered whether it would not be better if we reversed the process and provided that when a member took cabinet rank he should work for less money.

• (9:50 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I have reached the second last item that I wish to cover. I was speaking about salaries. I sincerely believe there is a danger that if the salaries of cabinet ministers are set at double those of backbenchers, there may well be an unseemly scramble for the higher posts. A man would think twice about accepting a cabinet post if he had to accept a monetary loss when doing so. The Liberal party is well sprinkled with men of affluence. A great many of them take an independent view on the question of paying members of Parliament any money. I would take the same view if I had several millions of dollars in my account in any bank in Canada. Several hon. members have often spoken about the privilege of serving in this chamber. From their point of view, that is very noble, but there is something to be said for the point of view that if we want high-class help we should be willing to pay for it. But I do not take away from the idea that it might be good to have a pool of qualified men, well screened for their talent. In my view, one talent that a good minister should have is the courage to fight the government on a question of principle. If you pay a minister twice as much not to fight on principle, this will perpetuate a very mediocre type of leadership.

Part IX of the bill alarms me, Mr. Chairman. Unless I misunderstand it, this part provides the Governor in Council with the right to move estimates from one department to another and thus evade responsibility to this House. I hope I am wrong, but my interpretation of it is that the ministry of the environment could become a catch-all. When the government wanted to do something, it would be able to transfer funds from any other department to that ministry. We wasted one whole Easter recess discussing that very question. At this point all I can say is that I hope I am wrong in my interpretation.

The Chairman: The hon. member for South Western Nova.

Mr. Comeau: Thank you, Mr. Chairman—

[Translation]

Mr. Boulanger: In French!

Mr. Comeau: I find it interesting, Mr. Chairman, that the "whippet" of the Liberal party seats himself very close to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). He may be trying to get one of the new positions created by the bill under study.

[English]

As far as I can see, this is the most devious piece of legislation the government has ever presented. Its main aim is to increase the number of ministers. Mr. Chairman, I see that the former parliamentary secretary to the minister of fisheries is talking to the President of the Treasury Board. Maybe he, too, would like one of these new positions. It is interesting to see two ministers in the chamber and to see so many hon. members whom we have not seen for quite a while. I do not know what they are looking for, but it is interesting to see them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Comeau: It is interesting to hear them comment from their seats. Those members on the Liberal backbenches come in here just to vote. If they really want to make an impression and become ministers of state, they should speak up once in a while. We would then know if they are qualified for such positions. But I know the hon. member for St. Boniface will not be among that number; he does not speak often enough.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, I would advise the hon. member that if and when I get up, I will make a lot of sense and not indulge just in nonsensical talk.

Mr. McGrath: Explain.

Mr. Comeau: Yes, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member should explain because that remark did not make any sense. What we need is not an increase in the number of ministers but an increase in the number of responsible ministers. We do not need this provision to create new salaries, not knowing what the new departments will be. Once these ministries of state are established, we will have no way of discussing particular legislation dealing with the establishment of particular departments. We need ministers who will be responsible to Parliament. I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Progress reported.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES—SUGGESTED BANNING OF FUTURE SEAL HUNTS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, when I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry (Mr. Davis) the other day if he would consider banning all future slaughter of seals, he sat silent and shrugged. I couldn't believe that he had no answer. I was right. He preferred to give it yesterday in Vancouver. But it is still far from clear what the answer means. The only clear thing seems to be that the minister has as yet no clear policy on this matter. He announced the appointment of a six-man task force to study all aspects of the annual seat hunt in the northwest Atlantic and Arctic oceans. He says the kill-quota of seals will be drastically reduced next year, suggesting that it might be 125,000 compared with this year's 245,000. But in the next breath he says that no figure can be set until the task force makes its recommendations. Then he adds that to help reduce the figure it might be necessary to launch a campaign to "have the ladies stop buying" seal coats, but he gives no indication of any government intention to launch such a campaign.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Obviously the minister needs help. Obviously he is being pushed and pulled in all directions by the conservationists who do not want to see yet another wildlife species wiped out by the politicians of the Atlantic region who are concerned about low-income seal hunters, by animal lovers all across Canada, by profit-making interests who want sealskins for luxury coats and, above all, by world opinion which is mounting fast and which is giving Canada a black eye as a nation of people engaged in the brutal extermination of an inoffensive animal species. The minister is well aware of this unenviable international reputation. He said recently:

> There has been a tremendous outburst of concern. The Brussels embassy has received protesting delegations, one of which delivered a petition containing 400,000 signatures of school children ... In France a protest delegation marched into the chancery ... There was picketing in New York ... Our embassy in Washington has been getting letters at the rate of 600 a day ... I think it would take quite a few million dollars to offset the adverse publicity.

The minister could well have added that for years the members of this House have been flooded with letters, postcards, petitions, etc., from people who want to put an end to the senseless and needless cruelty of the seal hunt. Further pressure has been added by the introduction the other day into the United States Congress of a bill to ban the killing of sea mammals and to ban the importation of sealskins into the United States. The sponsor of the bill is Senator Fred Harris of Oklahoma, a Democrat and a nominee for the vice-presidency.

He indicated that in his opinion the Canadian sealing industry is a dying one because seals are being killed off at such a high rate. His bill would help reduce the dollar incentive for their extermination. One member of this House suggested that the government tell the US Senator "to keep his elongated American probosis south of the border" and apply himself to solving the foreign and domestic problems of his own country. I can understand the deep concern of this member who comes from Newfoundland, but I would suggest that irritation over the problem is no solution to it; and solutions must be found.

One suggestion is that if a seal sanctuary were established in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the tourist benefits to be derived from it would offset, at least in part, the monetary loss to that section of the country. True, there might be difficulties in initiating such a project and the benefits might fall far short of the need. But it is my understanding that the Department of Fisheries and Forestry is considering it as part of the solution. In any event, alternative employment must be found for the seal hunters. Canadians from coast to coast in increasing numbers are becoming sickened by what the minister has called "a very gory happening". Seals aren't killed for food or essential clothing. Domestic animals can be slaughtered under conditions which keep pain and fear to a minimum. This is not true of seals on shifting ice floes.

Suppose alternative employment still falls short and income must still be provided for seal hunters and their families. James Eayrs, in his recent eloquent and humane article on the need to abolish the seal hunt, observes:

> We pay Prairie farmers not to grow wheat. Why can't we pay Maritimers and Newfoundlanders not to kill baby seals?

Why not, indeed? The good name of Canada in the world community is at stake.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, this week we are setting up a special advisory committee on Atlantic seals. It is composed of scientists and executive members of international humane societies, all of whom have visited the seal hunt on a number of occasions. This committee will study not only humane methods of harvesting seals but will also recommend measures to the government to ensure the maintenance of seal herds in the future.

We are making a number of changes and we are also in a better position to manage the hunt than in previous years. One of the reasons for this is that the Gulf of St. Lawrence is now totally under Canadian control in so far as the harvesting of seals is concerned. The promulgation of the closing lines across the Cabot Strait and the Strait of Belle Isle for the first time makes all of the Gulf of the St. Lawrence exclusively Canadian from an administrative point of view.

We are in control of the Gulf of St. Lawrence but we do not control the North Atlantic off Labrador except within the 12-mile limit. Other countries will harvest there and it is therefore necessary to convince them, including Norway, to observe the over-all quotas. This is the first time we have had quotas for seals. In future this will be geared to the findings of this special committee and I suggest that next year at least the quota will be somewhat reduced.

[Mrs. MacInnis.]

I named in a press release today six prominent people from various countries who will serve on this special advisory committee. We hope to get two others from outside Canada to serve on the committee as well. We will pay close attention to their recommendations. They are from international, humane organizations. They are not employees of the government of Canada and certainly not employees of the federal Department of Fisheries. As I say, we are going to listen to them very carefully.

I want to observe again that the seal hunt is not totally within Canadian control or Canadian territory. There are literally millions of seals, and the harp seal is not in any immediate danger of extinction. There are a number of native people and people living in very small, remote communities who still earn a substantial part of their livelihood from the seal fishery. We must also take them into consideration. People who live in highly populated communities and who are accustomed to an affluent way of life cannot possibly understand the primitive conditions under which these people live. We must pay some attention to their livelihood and welfare as well.

MANPOWER—AMENDMENT OF REGULATIONS TO EXTEND RETRAINING PERIOD

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. Lang) about the general dissatisfaction that many trainees feel. They are dissatisfied, not with their instructors or the local personnel of Manpower offices but with the stupidity and rigidity of regulations governing the courses they want to take. I have received many complaints both verbally and by letter. Many trainees have come to see me to discuss their problems. I have heard their complaints. There were reasoned and reasonable complaints. Many were trapped in the rigidity of the courses or blocks of courses they were taking. Why was that, Mr. Speaker? The answer is that the Manpower people too often refuse to treat trainees as individuals.

Everything possible should be done to see that a trainee is given the academic training necessary not only for the private but for the public sector as well. By that I mean that trainees should reach grade 12 levels of education. Many of them do not reach that level which is being demanded. Some reach the grade 12 level and the department boasts that their earnings increase by 20 per cent as compared with previous earnings.

In training trainees, the demands of the market must be assessed. They must be trained to meet the demands of the market, and I do not think this is being done adequately. There are grave doubts on this score. There are indications that the requirements of the labour market ought to be assessed better and that its future requirements ought to be looked at more carefully. It is of paramount importance, with the unemployed lists growing at the rate of 100 per day, as they have been for the past two years, that every effort be made to see that trainees get a position and begin earning, thereby adding to the economy rather than drawing from it.

Manpower training has been described as a disaster because bureaucratic regulations will not allow some who need the training and who are eligible to qualify. Sometimes trainees are not permitted to train for long enough. We must remember that over 40 per cent of our labour force is not educated to grade 8 level. Department of Manpower regulations state that you can only take 52 weeks training at any one time, plus an additional 52 weeks of training in skills.

Here is the catch, Mr. Speaker. Say the trainee starts at the grade 5 level. He takes 12 weeks for each grade and at the end of 48 weeks he has completed his education up to and including the grade 8 level. In no way can he complete grade 9. He has only four weeks left, and he cannot complete grade 10. He cannot go on to take a highly skilled course because he has not the academic background or the knowledge to master that course; and there that trainee is. He therefore has to wait for another term. What an inflexible, bureaucratic, discriminatory rule that is, Mr. Speaker. It is frustrating and cruel for the person involved and is a wanton waste of the taxpayer's money.

The trainee has trained hard for 48 weeks. He has cost the federal taxpayer—and who is not a federal taxpayer—$7 a day for training, or $2,000 for his education alone. He will only have reached the grade 8 level, which is nowhere. If he is single, he will have drawn $43 a week; so that for the total time he has spent training he will have cost the taxpayer around $4,000. If he is married, with four dependants, he will have drawn $88 per week. In a year we spend over $300 million on these courses. I have checked into this and according to figures I was given this year we are to spend around $320 million on these courses.

The way to correct this colossal blunder lies in allowing the trainee to continue until he has finished grade 10, if he is going into a skilled trade, then letting him complete his training in skills before getting him back to work. As it is, he finds himself turned out at grade 8 level without a job. Does he go on welfare, waiting until he can register again and, hopefully, complete grades 9 and 10 so that he can then learn the skills required? This is very likely.

The Canada Manpower centres and the local educational facilities operate in an administrative vacuum. There is little or no constructive consultation as to the real needs of students or the best way of spending the taxpayers' money. This is the way the federal government wants it—bureaucratic control from the top. Instead of using the judgment of the local Manpower centres—in my constituency, and I am sure this applies generally, they are staffed with smart, intelligent people who will strive to help these trainees—the federal government prefers to exercise rigid bureaucratic control. The same applies to the teachers. Give them more elbow room in which to operate, and we would see a real improvement in the results. But Ottawa allows them no power within the rigid framework provided.

No leeway is allowed to the teacher to help the trainee along in the best way for the individual concerned; and if it is best for him, it is probably best for the taxpayer. Ottawa must make even the minor decisions. No provision is made for the student who could complete the course in less than the normal period. All must work at the same rate. No provision is made for the talented academic student who might wish to go on to grade 13, either by Manpower or by the provincial boards of education.

I trust I have drawn attention to some of the flaws in the system as well as ways in which a remedy might be found. Many of the problems and shortcomings attached to the retraining program have been outlined in briefs to the department and others. I have drawn attention to some of them in the short time available to me. I am sure the minister is aware of these serious shortcomings and, hopefully, he realizes they must be overcome in order that the $323 million we are spending on the program may not be spent in vain but will bring satisfaction to both the trainees and the taxpayers.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is a pity that the hon. member should have displayed such colossal ignorance of the social benefits which have accrued by virtue of the Manpower training program. It is true there are occasions when individual cases are handled in a manner which leaves something to be desired, but to draw from those cases such a sweeping conclusion in the terms the hon. member adopted tonight amounts to displaying a very limited knowledge of the entire subject.

The whole question of the education of adults is a difficult one. It requires, of course, flexibility and sensibility, and we certainly welcome suggestions and criticisms from members of this House, advanced—

Mr. Rynard: Don't speak about colossal ignorance, then.

Mr. Caccia: —without attempting to accuse the Manpower retraining effort of being a colossal blunder, as the hon. member did. Of course, the object of the educational upgrading courses is not to provide the equivalent of a primary or high school diploma or to facilitate entry into university. It is to provide the essentials of the mathematics, science and communications required to enable an adult to enter a skill training course or move directly into a job. A great deal of such upgrading can be accomplished in 52 weeks. It is common in most provinces to take an adult from functional illiteracy up to the completion of primary level, or from primary level up to the grade 10 level well within this limit. Moreover, experimental programs now under way may enable an adult to move through the equivalent of grades 1 to 10 within 52 weeks.

Modifications in the limits on the duration of training, with a view to providing flexibility if and when required, have been considered. These possible modifications raise questions such as: What larger proportion of available training resources would be devoted to serving relatively fewer trainees? What effect might the elimination or extension of the limits on training have on the incentive for training institutions to make the qualitative improvements in training which are necessary to speed up the educational process? These are basic problems and are not easy to solve. So in reply to the points raised by the hon. member, may I say that the department, with the co-operation of the provinces, is working on ways and means of providing shorter training courses tailored to the needs of the trainee.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to advise the parliamentary secretary that his time has expired.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.18 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. PEDDLE—TWENTY-SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF NEWFOUNDLAND'S ENTRY INTO CONFEDERATION WITH CANADA

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege concerns an incident which took place at one minute before midnight on March 31, 1949, 22 years ago, a number of some significance to the Prime Minister.

It was on this date, March 31, 1949, at one minute before the witching hour of midnight that nocturnal nuptials, or one might say a midnight marriage, took place between Newfoundland and Canada. The Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, affectionately known as Uncle Louis, bore the ring, and Joey Smallwood, affectionately and otherwise known as Joey Smallwood, the shotgun.

For hon. members who are curious about the strange, eerie hour, here is the official explanation. There was a conflict of interest between one faction which wanted the event to coincide with the very beginning of the new fiscal year and the other faction which at any cost wanted to avoid All Fool's Day. Thus this mysterious but very delicate balance was struck.

Newfoundland was a good deal older than Canada, but despite the age differential 52.34 per cent—here is a significant number again—of Newfoundlanders felt the marriage could be successful while 47.66 per cent felt the marriage could never work. Most of us who supported Confederation felt sure it would survive at least 22 years, but had we known the only living father thereof would survive that long as premier the marriage might never have been solemnized. Anyway, we can take solace in the fact that he has been the best premier Newfoundland has had since Confederation.

Seriously Mr. Speaker—I see you are clutching the edge of your chair so I shall end soon—on this the twenty-second anniversary of Confederation, while I cannot speak nor would I presume to speak for our estranged brother, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Jamieson), who wept bitterly when the banns were announced 22 years ago, I am sure that, generally speaking, we Newfoundlanders on this side of the House supported Confederation and, whether we did or not, we are proud to say today "We are Canadians".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

(a) 355 River Road; (b) (c) and (d) In its real estate transactions, the Company deals with private firms, many of which are competitors, and it has not been the practice of the Airline to disclose details of such transactions as this could prejudicially affect the Airline in any future negotiations. Percentage	10	11	90	89	100	100

Death claims are written off under the legislation. On default claims, collection action continues in cases where the borrower cannot be located (approximately 60 per cent of default claims) or refuses to co-operate with the lender (approximately 30 per cent of default claims). Some default claims arise due to circumstances beyond the borrower's control. If a borrower's difficulties are the result of such temporary problems as sickness, accident, imprisonment or unemployment, no collection action is undertaken provided the borrower has co-operated with the lender in arriving at a stretched-out repayment schedule (approximately 10 per cent of default claims). If a borrower were to become permanently incapacitated, the claim would be written off. No default claims have yet been written off.

4. A professional collection agency was employed in late 1968 to follow default claims. The table below shows collection made by this agency since that date. The fee for this service is that authorized in the Regulations for payment to lenders for collections made by them (i.e. 20 per cent of the amount of principal and interest recovered).

Loan Year	Amount Collected
1968/69	$ 46,500

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

LABOUR RELATIONS

EFFECT OF RAIL TRAFFIC DISRUPTION ON GRAIN MOVEMENT

Mr. Paul Yewchuck (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 26 I ask leave to move a motion for the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the disruption of rail traffic and its present consequences, particularly on the movement of grain to meet Canada's export commitments. This emergency calls for discussion of measures that can be taken immediately to get prairie grain aboard ship at Vancouver to meet these commitments, for discussion of action to ensure that isolated communities get supplies, for discussion of the appointment of an independent conciliator to bring the railways and unions to settlement as quickly as possible in the national interest, and discussion of the appointment of a task force or other body to recommend long-term plans for the settlement of such disputes on the basis of public convenience and necessity. If this proposal is acceptable to you, Mr. Speaker, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Thomas), that this House do adjourn for this purpose.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Athabasca has given the Chair due notice of his intention to move the proposed motion under the terms of Standing Order 26. In dealing with the matter stated, I think I owe it to the Chair, to the hon. member and to the House to refer once again to the form of the motion proposed by the hon. member.

The House well knows that Standing Order 26 requires that notice should be given to the Chair accompanied by a statement of the matter to be considered, and that the statement made by the hon. member in the House under the terms of Standing Order 26 should not go beyond the notice which has been given to the Chair, should be limited entirely to a statement of the matter itself, should not include enumeration of circumstances, and should not include any argument. I suggest respectfully to the hon.

member that again the form is perhaps somewhat defective, and I would hope hon. members would try to bear this in mind. Of course, in such an important matter I would not think I should rule on it entirely from the procedural aspect. I think the situation is so important that it does require substantive and substantial consideration by the Chair.

As the hon. member for Athabasca knows, a similar motion was proposed in the House just the day before yesterday by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. At that time I suggested to the House that the Chair should not overlook the condition and it is a very important one, that there can be only one discussion about a question during the same session under the terms of Standing Order 26. So there is a considerable responsibility on the part of hon. members and on the part of the Chair, when a serious condition is developing, to ensure that the debate, if one is permitted under Standing Order 26, should come at the appropriate time. I am not convinced that the situation has changed so much since Monday that a debate should be allowed today. I am very anxious to follow the matter as closely as possible along with hon. members and perhaps in consultation with them, so that if the point should be reached where it appears that it would be advantageous to the House, to Parliament and to the country that an emergency debate should take place, a motion under Standing Order 26, would be granted.

I reiterate my feeling that this is a matter of extreme importance and of great urgency. The question to determine, if an emergency debate is to be had, is when it should be called. I respectfully suggest to the hon. member that we have not reached that stage today. I shall continue to keep the matter under consideration and, as I said, if hon. members feel it will be of value I shall consult with hon. members representing the different parties as the situation develops from day to day.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call notice of motion No. 133?

DEVELOPMENT OF CITÉ DU HAVRE

Motion No. 133—Mr. Gilbert:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the plan prepared by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation regarding the development of Cité du Havre in Montreal and discussed in May between officials of CMHC, Montreal and the National Harbours Board.

Mr. J. A. Jerome (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation advises that the report is at this point a confidential one, and that consequently it would not be in the public interest to table it at this time. I would therefore ask the hon. member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Gilbert: I will, Mr. Speaker, subject to the reservation that I will put the motion on the order paper again at a later time.

Mr. Speaker: The motion is dropped.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can he bring the House up to date and give us any information regarding the success, if any, in bringing the labour dispute involving our two national railways to a successful conclusion?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I thank the hon. gentleman for the reasonable way in which he posed the question, indicating his experience as a former Minister of Transport. He appreciates, if other members of his party do not, that prejudgment of labour negotiations at a period as delicate as this, particularly in the field of transportation, can only have a detrimental effect. I would hope nobody would presume or want to presume—I know the hon. gentleman does not—that the democratic rights of the workers should be removed from them prior to an emergency. I have often said that when and if public interests supersede those of the private parties, I will be prepared to assume my responsibility, but I would not go as far as some hon. members in presuming when that moment should be.

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—INTERVENTION BY MINISTER OF LABOUR—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour. In view of the very serious dislocation to the economy of western Canada caused by the fact that the strike of locomotive engineers now covers nearly all of western Canada and the fact that a strike vote is being taken which may affect all of the railway systems throughout Canada, I should like to ask the minister if the time has now been reached when he might meet with both of the parties to this dispute to see if his good offices could be used to bring them closer to an immediate settlement?

[Mr. Jerome.]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Once again, Mr. Speaker, I apologize for being rather ambiguous in my reply. I cannot very well divulge the confidences of one side or the other or what role, if any, I have played behind the scenes in this dispute. Let me say that I consider it premature at this moment for the Minister of Labour to participate officially in the negotiations.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to embarrass the minister or in any way obstruct the possibility of an immediate settlement. However, in view of the fact that the House and the people of Canada generally are deeply concerned about this matter, can the minister tell us if negotiations are continuing and if there seems to be some progress, so that people can have some hope that a settlement is likely in the near future?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, negotiations are going on at this moment in Montreal in the shopcrafts and non-operating groups. There was a meeting this morning between the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the CNR, but I am not prepared to divulge the outcome. I understand another meeting is now in progress between the negotiating team of the BLE and the CPR. Unless the hon. gentleman would suggest to me that I take compulsory action against the men who are on strike in the west, perhaps prematurely in the eyes of their national bargaining unit, I can only suggest that things are going on as well as I would anticipate at this very delicate time.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I asked the question in the hope that the minister could divulge whatever information he felt free to give. I say to the minister that at no time did I suggest that he take any compulsory action, and no one has suggested that. We are asking the minister whether he, himself, can use the prestige of his office and his own personal expertise for dealing with a situation like this in an attempt to bring about an early settlement.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I think I indicated to the hon. gentleman who asked a question on behalf of the official opposition that I was prepared to do so at the moment when, in my judgment, it was appropriate. The only reason I alluded to the members of the BLE who are on strike out west is that the hon. gentleman had introduced that in his preamble. I had made no reference to them. I am simply saying that I have divulged all I can without jeopardizing the dispute and the negotiations now going on. If I am forced to divulge more, I think all of us will then have to bear the responsibility if I unintentionally jeopardize what could be a successful conclusion.

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—RETURN TO WORK REQUEST BY MINISTER

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the minister. Since the minister has more or less suggested a cooling-off period and since he asked the engineers, as a personal favour to him, to return to work, I wonder whether the minister could enlighten us on this point at this time? Has he had a response to this request, and does he intend to follow through on this approach?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I spoke personally to the members of the BLE in the general Vancouver area or British Columbia who are on strike and suggested that it would be in the best interests of the BLE and the national unit if they did not anticipate the outcome of the negotiations and returned to work. They refused my request, but I understand they are meeting again at two o'clock this afternoon to reconsider the matter.

Mr. Alexander: Since the minister has a certain amount of charm, and I am not trying to be facetious, can he assure the House and the nation that he will continue to approach the engineers with the request that, as a personal favour to him, they return to work? Can he assure us that he will continue that approach?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, if I thought it would bring a settlement, I would kiss the blarney stone.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour, who has been quite conciliatory in this matter, if he will muzzle the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour who apparently seems to be trying to bring this matter to an unsatisfactory climax?

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—SUBMISSION OF APPLICATIONS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. Secretary of State concerning the Opportunities for Youth program.

Since the government of the province of Quebec has demanded the right of veto regarding projects designed to create jobs for students during the 1971 summer vacation, to be financed entirely by the federal government, could the minister tell us whether students are to submit their project suggestions to Quebec or to Ottawa?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, clearly the hon. member's information is not only incomplete but inaccurate. The agreement between the Quebec and federal governments calls for a Quebec official to be delegated to the secretariat in charge of such projects and for permanent co-ordination in order that priorities and criteria of both governments may be met.

Moreover, a telegram to this effect has been sent to all provincial governments anxious to send one of their officials to this secretariat in order to maintain the best co-ordination possible.

The reply to the hon. member's question is very simple: the project is a federal endeavour and applications should be submitted to the federal government.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Considering the answer just given by the minister, could he tell us if the final decision, with regard to any project, rests with the federal government?

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I believe that I have stated clearly enough that this was a federal program, but I have also stated clearly that the federal and provincial governments had agreed to make joint decisions which do not adversely affect the priorities of the one or the others.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question—

[Later:]

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—ORGANIZATIONS THAT QUALIFY FOR GRANTS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the hon. Secretary of State and ask him whether groups or clubs such as service clubs, Lions or other similar organizations will be financially assisted in the same manner as usually extended to students. Will those clubs which propose certain projects also receive some financial assistance?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a program called Opportunities for Youth, that is a project involving young people, initiatives and achievements by young people. The fact that the projects are sponsored by a committee which includes adults and that these are members of one club or another, is not an obstacle; but the hon. member will realize that the emphasis must be on the responsibility and initiative of young people themselves.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN HUDSON BAY MINING AND SMELTING COMPANY AND EMPLOYEES—PLANS TO EFFECT SETTLEMENT

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. With reference to the strike of tradesmen employed by Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company at Flin Flon, Manitoba, which is well into its third month and is also causing a drastic situation economically in the entire city as well as for many suppliers across Canada, has the minister any further plans to attempt to bring the two parties together in view of the fact that the most recent mediation attempts unfortunately ended in failure?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has pointed out, the strike in Flin Flon has already lasted three months. At the request of both parties, we sent a mediator. Unless the attitude of the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company and the several craft unions involved reflects their responsibility to the community, a reflection that was noticeably absent in the presence of the mediator, that strike could very well last another three months.

Mr. Simpson: I take it the minister is suggesting that no further efforts will be made at the present time, or at least until there is a further cooling-off period?

Mr. Mackasey: I am suggesting that both parties at the present moment could very well bring the strike to an end if they would both assume their moral and legal obligations to the community instead of asking the Department of Labour to do the impossible. Until their attitudes change, there is little point in assigning a mediator to the dispute.

PUBLIC SERVICE

FURTHER REPORT BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON PERSONNEL EXCLUDED FROM COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board concerning the advisory committee on pay and compensation of excluded personnel in the Public Service, sometimes known as the Clyne committee. In view of the fact that the only report made by this committee was in December, 1968, and in view of the fact that many of the public servants who are excluded from collective bargaining are concerned about the situation, is it the intention of the government to ask the committee for another report soon?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): As the hon. member is aware, I believe, the committee has been in fairly frequent session. I hesitate to describe it as continuous, but it has been in fairly frequent session over the years. Periodically they forward advice, not in the nature of a report but merely advice. I expect there will be a rather more formal report, approaching the first one, in the relatively near future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the report in December, 1968, was tabled, can the minister assure the House that the second report will also be tabled?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think that a second formal type of report would be tabled.

[Mr. Simpson.]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE IN AIRLIFTING MAIZE TO ZAMBIA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is this country now assisting in the airlift of Maize to Zambia or is it using its good offices to ask Zambia's neighbours to facilitate the ground transport of this important food?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): When I was in Zambia, Mr. Speaker, I had a full report from the Zambian government on the situation that is being faced as a result of the clampdown on shipments through Portuguese ports. At that time the Zambian government did not ask us to take specific action. I believe they were merely informing us of a developing situation in which we might be asked to help.

HEALTH

CONSULTATIONS ON COMPATIBILITY OF PROPOSED BRITISH COLUMBIA AND FEDERAL CIGARETTE LEGISLATION

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): My question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the government had consultations with the government of British Columbia regarding the compatibility of the British Columbia cigarette legislation with the expected legislation of the federal government in this area?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Rynard: When will the federal legislation be introduced?

Mr. Munro: The matter is now under active consideration, Mr. Speaker. When there is a decision on the matter of policy on this question, I will advise the House.

CONSULTATIONS WITH CIGARETTE MANUFACTURERS ON ABANDONING OF ADVERTISING

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Has the minister had any consultations with the cigarette manufacturers with regard to their willingness to withdraw television and other forms of advertising?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I and officials of my department have been having discussions with the tobacco manufacturers on a more or less continuous basis covering a lot of fronts, including this one, over the past three or four years.

[Translation]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

As this question is of great interest to me, I would like to ask the minister if he has met the representatives of the Tobacco Producers Association of Canada who seem very worried about this policy?

[English]

Mr. Munro: Yes, I have, Mr. Speaker, but not recently. The last time was many months ago.

POLLUTION

SUGGESTED HALTING OF PROPOSED AERIAL FOREST SPRAYING IN KLANAWA RIVER BASIN PENDING ASSESSMENT OF ECOLOGICAL ASPECTS

Mr. Thomas S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry involving wide ecological considerations. In view of the known dangers attached to the use of the defoliants 2-4-D and 2-4-5-T, and the concern being expressed by commercial fishermen and conservation groups, will the minister seek to halt the proposed aerial forest spraying program in the Klanawa River basin on the west coast of Vancouver Island until ecological aspects of the proposal additional to the danger of direct fish kill have been fully assessed? Also, will he direct that research studies be made by the forestry branch of his department aimed at devising better techniques for retarding weed tree growth?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Mr. Speaker, a considerable amount of research has already been done on this subject by our fisheries and wildlife people. No unfavourable ecological effects have been reported as a result of the use of this spray material.

FINANCE

MEASURES TO RELIEVE EFFECT OF FREEING OF CANADIAN DOLLAR ON PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY

Mr. Alexander Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Could he tell the House if his department or a cabinet committee is presently studying the serious situation of the Canadian pulp and paper industry, following the unpegging of the Canadian dollar?

As some of the plants, such as the Gaspesia Pulp and Paper in Chandler, on the Gaspé peninsula, must stop operating, will the minister make a statement in the near future about the measures which will be taken to meet this situation?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the pulp and paper industry have made representations to us with regard to their difficulties which do not only arise from the unpegging of the Canadian dollar. Their representations are under consideration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

GRAIN

SHIPS WAITING TO BE LOADED AT VANCOUVER BECAUSE OF LACK OF PROPER GRADES PRIOR TO LABOUR SLOWDOWNS—DEMURRAGE CHARGES

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I wish to direct my question to the minister who reports for the Canadian Wheat Board. Will the minister inform the House how many ships were waiting in Vancouver harbour for grain cargoes and could not be loaded because of the lack of proper grades of wheat and barley at the grain terminals prior to the recent labour slowdowns?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the labour slowdowns have been going on for a significant period of time. Therefore it is difficult to state the precise point at which this might be said to have started. There were ships waiting in the harbour, but prior to the last difficulty the number of ships at berth or waiting for berths was about equal to the number of berths available.

Mr. McIntosh: I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister on the presumption that he saw the question that I directed to the Prime Minister yesterday. Will the minister make representations to the cabinet that demurrage charges for these ships be paid from the federal treasury rather from receipts of the grain producers?

PROVISION OF ADDITIONAL STORAGE CAPACITY AT VANCOUVER

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the recent statement made by the president of the United Grain Growers, who is also chairman of the Canada Grains Council, that the Canadian grain industry stands in need of an additional five or six million bushels of storage capacity on the Vancouver waterfront, has the minister had any discussions with the co-operatives and the private companies with a view to exploring the possibility of acquiring additional storage?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the whole question of our handling and transportation system is under study. In particular, the facilities at Vancouver have been reviewed fairly constantly. There were a number of changes in the arrangements in Vancouver which seemed to make possible better use of the facilities there. The companies involved have now agreed to take various steps which would allow the facilities to be used to a greater extent. A further examination is being made of whether more facilities are required.

Mr. Gleave: Has the minister considered the possibility of having the National Harbours Board construct additional facilities, or of taking some action under the aegis of the Board of Grain Commissioners, shortly to come under new direction? Has the minister given consideration to taking action along these lines?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, no specific decisions have been taken about the sort of facilities that would be required, and therefore no decision has been taken about who would be the best person or the best company to build the facilities. We are looking at the whole question of our handling and transportation system, and the location of facilities may well depend upon some conclusion yet to be reached regarding the system as a whole.

YOUTH

STUDENT SUMMER EMPLOYMENT EXCHANGE PROGRAM—PAYMENT OF AIR FARE AND ROOM AND BOARD

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Many young people across the country are wondering whether they might be included on his European tour this summer. There are almost as many as the number that went after the Pied Piper in his day and generation. I wonder whether or not the minister can tell the House whether under this international student summer employment exchange program selected applicants are expected to pay their own air fare and in many cases room and board as well?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, when the program was announced it gave a clear indication that the transportation charges for those seeking summer employment opportunities in Europe were the responsibility of the students themselves. The student is offered an opportunity of some employment which will no doubt go some way toward defraying part of the total expenses, but it is not a program that is subsidized by the federal government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am interested in knowing how these students are going to be able to go back to university if they pay their air fare and room and board, unless, of course, the minister is arranging for their employment at a high rate of salary or wages. Is there going to be any endeavour on the part of the government to do this, or is this plan just a sham?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, this plan has been in effect for a number of years and is altogether in the nature of an opportunity for students to further their cultural education. It is obvious that students who require earnings at the highest possible level during the course of the summer months will not find this program attractive. Nevertheless it is a very attractive program for students who do want to make use of the summer for cultural improvement.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the government given consideration to using some of the big 707 jets that the government has at its disposal to take these students over and bring them back?

Mr. Lang: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker. I would have to refer that question to my colleague, but I understand that those planes are very much used in their regular routine.

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—PROVISION OF INFORMATION TO SYDNEY MANPOWER OFFICE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister with reference to the question I posed yesterday which the Prime Minister very kindly took as notice. I refer to the provision of information regarding the Opportunities for Youth program which is not available or was not until yesterday morning at Manpower offices in Cape Breton.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the information was initially mailed out by the Secretary of State's office to the Manpower offices. Subsequently, wherever shortages were reported material has been airmailed to those offices requiring it. This includes the office at Sydney.

NUMBER OF STUDENTS WHO WILL BE WITHOUT SUMMER JOBS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): May I address a supplementary to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the department conducted any studies to determine how many students will still be without summer jobs this year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. This is a very difficult matter to determine in view of the variable factors such as the upturn in the economy, the large number of students who are seeking work, and so on. Therefore it is very difficult to do anything other than look at what has been the case in previous years.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

Has he received representations from certain Quebec farm associations asking him to subsidize not only the transportation costs of feed grain, but also the purchase price in order to achieve parity between the East and the West, and if so, what was or will be his answer?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not recall any specific representations about that particular request, but I think the feed freight assistance program during this past year and for the coming year does in fact equalize to a very large extent the cost of feed in most parts of Canada.

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK SERVICE CHARGES—EARLY INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

Mr. Robert P. Kaplan (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Now that the banks recognize that the Combines Investigation Act amendments to be introduced by the minister will probably terminate their right to unrestricted pricing collusion, and since they are now blatantly exploiting their advantage, will the minister expedite the introduction of this legislation?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of the legislation is not dependent upon what the banks recognize or do not recognize. We are working on it as hard as we can and will introduce it as soon as we can.

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK SERVICE CHARGES—REQUEST FOR REFERENCE TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance and it is partly supplementary to the previous question addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. On a number of occasions the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has been asked about tackling the banks on the question of their increased charges for cheque servicing and the minister has indicated his impotency under the combines legislation. Last week I asked the minister whether he would consider referring this issue to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that we could deal with it in an effective way by calling the presidents of the banks before the committee. Has the minister considered this request, and is he prepared to ask the House to make a reference?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker, not at this time.

Mr. Saltsman: Since the minister is not prepared to ask the House for a reference, will he initiate an inquiry into the matter and report to the House?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I do not think it requires an inquiry; the facts are fairly plain.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would remind hon. members that we are now running short of time. We will definitely run short of time unless we limit supplementaries.

SUGGESTED USE OF DISTINCTIVE CANADIAN SYMBOL ON CANADIAN PRODUCTS

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs supplementary to one which was directed to the Minister of Agriculture in connection with the importation of agricultural products into Canada and the confusion consumers encounter in identifying Canadian products when they want to buy them. In determining the regulations under the new packaging and labelling legislation, would the minister consider devising a truly Canadian symbol which will indicate that products are grown and packed in Canada?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The confusion to which the hon. member refers has been a subject of great concern to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and myself as well as to our officials. We have been endeavouring to eliminate it under existing legislation as far as possible, but I will certainly consider the hon. member's suggestion or representation very carefully because I am aware of the confusion that exists.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Can the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources inform us as to the outcome of the discussions held in Ottawa yesterday between officials of his department and officials of the New Brunswick and Nova Scotia Power Commissions with respect to tidal power?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The general managers of the Nova Scotia and New Brunswick Power Commissions, accompanied by senior staff, met yesterday with power development and marine construction specialists of the federal government. The meeting discussed in considerable detail the basic assumptions underlying the 1969 report of the Atlantic Tidal Power Programming Board and agreed on a program of review of areas where changed conditions since 1969 may have altered the competitive position of tidal power.

The review committee will report to the general managers of the two provincial power commissions and to the assistant deputy minister for energy of my department. Their work will touch on such matters as interest rates, escalation of costs of tidal and conventional power generation, and new developments in generation and construction techniques.

INCOME TAX REDUCTIONS IN UNITED KINGDOM BUDGET—SIMILAR CANADIAN ACTION

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Bearing in mind the cuts which were made in rates of corporate and personal income taxes in the recent United Kingdom budget, is the minister considering following this example in his forthcoming budget?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I understand they intend to reform the British tax system to bring it more into line with the Canadian system.

ASSURANCE RESPECTING FORTHCOMING TAX CHANGES TO ASSIST OIL PRODUCERS IN AVOIDING EXPLORATION STAFF LAY-OFFS

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): I have a further question for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Bearing in mind that Imperial Oil Limited is presently in the process of implementing a general staff reduction of at least 20 per cent with respect to its western Canadian exploration operations, can the minister offer any assurance that his forthcoming budgetary and tax changes will not contribute to a further decrease in employment in this vital sector of our economy?

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I directed this question to the minister on Monday and his parliamentary secretary took it as notice. It has to do with the meeting which was held between the minister and the Ministers of Agriculture for the various provinces last weekend and the directive emanating from that meeting that a committee would be set up to study proposed farm adjustment programs. Can the minister tell us the composition of the committee? Will the farm organizations be represented on it?

AUTOMOBILES—UNITED STATES CUSTOMS COURT DECISION RECLASSIFYING CANADIAN-FORGED PARTS AS DUTIABLE

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of a decision by a United States customs court to reclassify Canadian-forged auto parts exported to the United States as dutiable material, and in view of the fact that Canada exports about $10 million worth of these parts every year, may I ask whether the minister is aware of this change involving the imposition of customs duties and, if so, whether he and members of his staff will take a close look at this most serious interpretation of the United States customs law since the United States-Canada auto pact was agreed upon?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Since this is such a serious matter I should like to take the question as notice.

FISHERIES

REPLACEMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF TASK FORCE ON SEAL HUNT

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): This question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry. In light of a statement made yesterday by Professor Ronald, the newly-appointed chairman of the federal task force set up to investigate the seal hunt, may I ask whether the minister is satisfied that Dr. Ronald is approaching his task with the necessary impartiality, or whether he intends to replace him?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries and Forestry): Dr. Ronald is one of six eminent scientists and international humane society representatives who have been going to the seal hunt for a number of years. His opinion, and that of the other five, will certainly be listened to. He is an objective person and I believe we should listen to his views in this regard.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Bearing in mind the tremendous additional quantities of various species of fish which will be consumed by seals if the herds are allowed greatly to increase, will the minister tell us whether it is the policy of his department to let foreign ships take half of our fish stocks and allow the seals to eat the other half?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Later:]

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): My question is supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for St. John's West. Can the Minister of Fisheries and Forestry now respond to the question I directed to the Prime Minister yesterday? It was taken as notice by the Prime Minister who undertook to direct it to the hon. gentleman's attention.

Mr. Davis: I do not have the question in front of me. Would the hon. member please repeat it?

Mr. Speaker: I hope the question is brief because we are running short of time. I was hoping to have time to recognize two or three other hon. members before calling orders of the day.

Mr. Lundrigan: I suspect the Prime Minister's promise was not made good, so perhaps I will wait until he has directed the question to the minister and ask for a reply tomorrow.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON ALLEGED STRIKE OF PRODUCTION WORKERS

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for recognizing me. I know it is difficult because I am surrounded by six-foot ex-basketball players. My question to the Minister of Labour or the Secretary of State concerns a strike of CBC production workers. Can either minister give us a report on the current situation? Is the CBC ready now to conduct meaningful negotiations?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I could answer the question a little more accurately, perhaps, if the hon. gentleman would inform me what strike is taking place at the present moment within the CBC.

Mr. Rose: A strike of production workers was called for one o'clock today, I understand.

Mr. Mackasey: I repeat, I know of no strike at the present moment within the CBC.

FINANCE

INCREASE IN CHARTERED BANK SERVICE CHARGES

Mr. J. G. Lind (Middlesex): In view of the fact that the chartered banks of Canada seem to practice collusion, I was wondering if we could ask the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Minister of Finance to entertain a little collusion and investigate the recent increase in service charges by the chartered banks, namely, the 50 per cent increase they have imposed on anybody who passes an N.S.F. cheque?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Partly at the instigation of my hon. friend, who has made very firm representations in this regard, the Prices and Incomes Commission is pursuing such an inquiry.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

CANADIAN CONSUMER COUNCIL—CRITERIA USED IN APPOINTING PRESIDENT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs further to a matter raised yesterday about the Canadian Consumer Council. In view of press statements alleging that the original president of the council was blessed with a total lack of knowledge of consumer problems, would the minister advise what criteria he uses in making appointments to the presidency of the council? Can he also say who the new president is and what qualifications, if any, he has for this position?

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubt that the question as asked is in order. If the minister wishes to reply to this question, I think he should do so by way of a statement on motions.

LABOUR RELATIONS

DISPUTE BETWEEN RAILWAYS AND LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—BREAKDOWN OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH CNR—STRIKE DEADLINE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if, in fact, the negotiations with one of the railway companies, the CNR, have broken down and a strike dealine of April 5 has been set?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): It is possible, Mr. Speaker, but I have not been notified officially of that and I am not in a position to reveal what I know from confidential sources. I have no way of verifying that publicly.

GRAIN

PERCENTAGE OF VANCOUVER STORAGE CAPACITY FILLED AT BEGINNING OF RAILWAY WORK STOPPAGE

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. What percentage of the total storage capacity at Vancouver was filled at the beginning of the rail strike last week?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to get exact figures for the hon. member. The amount of grain at Vancouver was at a fairly high level compared with what is considered a desirable operating level.

SOCIAL SECURITY

CONVENTION BETWEEN CANADA AND WEST GERMANY—AVAILABILITY OF PENSION CHEQUES TO CANADIANS OF GERMAN ORIGIN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the fact that an answer given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare yesterday has created some concern, there being some question as to its accuracy, I wonder whether he has checked the matter and would care either to confirm or to correct his answer concerning the effective date of the agreement between Canada and West Germany regarding pensions?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, concerning the effective date for payments, if I left any misunderstanding I meant to say that payments would not be made until the convention was ratified. I do not anticipate the convention being ratified, at least by the West German Parliament, for perhaps six to eight months. I do not know whether or not that clears up the matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So the effective date is not now but six months hence?

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT, 1970

PROVISIONS RESPECTING DEPARTMENTAL REORGANIZATION, MINISTRIES OF STATE, PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES, ETC.

The House resumed, from Tuesday, March 30, consideration in committee of Bill C-207, respecting the organization of the Government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto—Mr. Trudeau—Mr. Honey in the chair.

The Chairman: Order, please. When the committee rose last evening clause 14 of the bill was being considered.

On clause 14—Establishment of Ministries of State.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, if it should be acceptable to the committee, I would suggest that I be permitted to deal not only with ministries of state but also the next clause which deals with parliamentary secretaries so that there will be no repetition. Unless an objection is raised, I shall follow that course.

The Chairman: Members of the committee have heard the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman. I would think there would have to be unanimous consent to permit the right hon. gentleman to deal with both parts in his speech. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sir, as I look over these clauses I can only conclude that the Liberal members will be choosing as their song "Roll Out The Barrel". Over the years there has never been a case that has equalled these particular clauses in respect of the interest they provide for members of the Liberal party. Indeed that is understandable, because if this bill becomes the law of the land and the increases take place in the field of ministries of state and parliamentary secretaries, since these appointments are for a two-year period 110 of 155 Liberal members will have held a position of some kind from cabinet minister to minister of state to parliamentary secretary. In other words, this Parliament will be dominated by those who hold positions within the pay of the country, over and above their indemnity as members. That can only be destructive of the basic principle of the independence of Parliament.

I am very much concerned about this legislation. It is in the Prime Minister's name, but for some reason the Prime Minister does not see fit to be present when discussions are taking place in respect of a matter which is dangerous to the whole concept of parliamentary sovereignty. I shall begin, Sir, by referring to the revelation made the other evening by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister when, in answer to a matter raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants, he said that "the bill gives flexibility and raises a dilemma concerning how much debate we can stand". I have left out some of the additional words. That is the attitude of this government; Parliament is to be subject to flexibility which has become a synonym for political patronage. This action is being taken in order to keep in line back bench members in supporting the government. There can be no other reason for such anxiety to get this legislation through, which is described as being urgent. Parliament is being bamboozled with the introduction of this type of legislation. We want action taken in respect of pollution, but in order to secure that action, in my opinion Parliament is asked to itself to engage in pollution.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In other words, Parliament is being asked to provide jobs for hungry members who are desirous of holding some title or place, not forgetting that various amounts up to $15,000, in the case of ministers of state, will be available. There is every opportunity to appoint ministers without portfolio, but to positions only paying $10,000, and therefore the government decided it would set up another group known as ministers of state.

Then, so far as parliamentary secretaries are concerned, they believe it will not be long before the amount payable to them may be expected to be increased. Last evening the hon. member for Carleton-Charlotte condemned this joining together of legislation that Parliament wants with mercenary provisions like this which must be recognized as being a raid on the public treasury for the benefit of a majority. Why is this course taken? Why is Parliament to be treated in this way? Everything is in this particular bill but the kitchen sink!

But there are two provisions in the bill, in this clause and the following one, that possess an unusual attraction for those who up to the present have not had that preferment that they had hoped to have. When I look at this bill, I can understand full well how the Prime Minister and some of his ministers must have laughed with cynicism when it was before the cabinet—"Watch us; we can get away with it." At a time when there are hundreds of thousands of people out of employment because of the actions of this government, for members of Parliament to join in increasing their opportunities for service at higher rates of pay is something that cannot be justified.

There are so many hon. members opposite just waiting in the wings. I watch them, Mr. Chairman. But the hon. member for East York is not in their number. He is in the dog house, and the numbers occupying that position are increasing with the passing days. Others look with hope and expectation, and I am just wondering whether or not the provisions of Standing Order 11 may have some application. That Standing Order reads:

> No member is entitled to vote upon any question in which he has a direct pecuniary interest, and the vote of any member so interested will be disallowed.

You are fortunate, Mr. Chairman, that you do not have to determine this. If perchance that rule is in effect, this bill will be defeated. You can be absolutely sure of that, because as I look over and watch these hopefuls I conclude that even with the increase in positions which this will provide, where 70 per cent of the government members will hold positions of this kind, unless that 70 per cent were voting for it this bill would not pass the House.

I ask myself why is Parliament being treated in this way? I am disquieted by this type of legislation. It is dangerous to the maintenance of Parliament itself when a government has a majoriy and, being afraid to introduce these two clauses, with provision for ministers of state and an increase in parliamentary secretaries by way of separate amendments to existing legislation, it throws them into a hopper and says Parliament must accept all the bill whether we agree with these provisions or not.

This bill has all the hallmarks of the dictatorship of the majority. I am not going to use the type of language which is now passable in Parliament—I am not used to using words of that type. However, this bill is a fraud and a political swindle on the institution of Parliament, and it cannot be justified in any way. It is designed to place private members supporting the government in a position where they dare not speak out, where they dare not have their own opinions, as four or five of them have had, including the hon. member for East York to whom I have alluded. They dare not speak out because in doing so they will commit suicide. The sword of Damocles is over the head of every member of the Liberal party who dares to take a stand that the government does not like.

This is pushing Parliament around. Sir, I know that skullduggery has been practised for years. This deed of endeavouring to force members of the House to vote for that which they do not want in order to get that which they do, makes a caricature of Parliament. This is legislation that constitutes a squalid subjugation of this institution. I have watched Parliament for a long while. I have a deep regard and affection for this institution. I saw parliament in the darkest days of war but, Sir, in the last two or three years it has been downgraded and degraded for one purpose only, as the hon. member for Pembina said when speaking on this matter, and that is to control the thought of Parliament because the government has a majority. It is placing shackles, bridles and fetters on this House. It is a dangerous bill.

The Prime Minister does not stay in this House when introducing his own bill. Even his parliamentary secretary is not here. On a bill of such importance, to which the Prime Minister placed his own name, it is difficult to understand why he is not here.

The explanation for what is being done is that it will provide flexibility and efficiency. This causes me to quote the words of Voltaire, who was referred to by the Prime Minister the other day, and who said, "There are some men who use thought only to justify their wrong doings, and speak only to conceal their thoughts." That is what is happening here. The Prime Minister recently indicated that the statesman with whom he felt the greatest affinity was Machiavelli. I have in my hand a volume called "Machiavelli The Prince". The Minister of Justice is looking at the picture on it and he will see that it bears a striking physical affinity to his leader's appearance. In fact, if it were not for the identification and the fact that this is a picture of a death mask, frequent mistakes would be made by those who look at it.

• (3:20 p.m.)

When a political philosopher receives the approval of the Prime Minister, it is interesting to read some of the observations. This is a Penguin Classic book, and I am sure all hon. members will want to get it. At page 91 I find this:

> The fact is that a man who wants to act virtuously in every way necessarily comes to grief among so many who are not virtuous. Therefore, if a prince wants to maintain his rule he must learn how not to be virtuous, and to make use of this or not according to need.

Then, I shall read this part:

> —he should not deviate from what is good, if that is possible, but he should know how to do evil, if that is necessary.

Here is another quotation:

> —a prudent ruler cannot, and should not, honour his word when it places him at a disadvantage and when the reasons for which he made his promise no longer exist—a prince will never lack good excuses to colour his bad faith. One could give innumerable modern instances of this, showing how many pacts and promises have been made null and void by the bad faith of princes:—one must know how to colour one's actions—Men are so simple, and so much creatures of circumstances, that the deceiver will always find someone ready to be deceived.

The cabinet deserves to be mentioned and Machiavelli says:

> —a shrewd prince should adopt a middle way, choosing wise men for his government—

Apparently, the Prime Minister did not follow that principle.

> —allowing only those the freedom to speak the truth to him, and then only concerning matters on which he asks their opinion, and nothing else.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: There are many other good statements here which indicate a dangerous philosophy. Here is another:

> How princes should honour their word—praiseworthy it is for a prince to honour his word and to be straightforward rather than crafty in his dealings; nonetheless contemporary experience shows that princes who have achieved great things have been those who have given their word lightly, who have known how to trick men with their cunning, and who, in the end, have overcome those abiding by honest principles.

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret that I must interrupt the right hon. gentleman. I only do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: The right hon. gentleman may continue with the consent of the committee. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: There is no consent.

An hon. Member: Who said no?

The Chairman: I might say to members of the committee that it is very difficult for the Chair to ascertain whether there is consent when I hear negative voices. I am prepared to put the question again. Is there consent—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Order, please. Is there consent for the right hon. gentleman to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: There is no consent.

Mr. MacInnis: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I draw the attention of the Chair to the fact that the "no" from that side of the House came from behind the curtain. No member standing behind the curtain is entitled to voice an opinion.

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Alexander: I was going to bring that matter to your notice, Mr. Chairman. I think it is extremely important at this time to note that the Minister of Justice, in his wisdom, has indicated on behalf of his party that there is general agreement for the right hon. gentleman to continue. I would hope that the Chair has noted that and will appreciate the significance of it.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. When the unanimous consent of the House is involved I have no more right than anybody else in the chamber but I understood, as did the House Leader, that there was general agreement within this chamber for the right hon. gentleman to continue.

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair must follow Standing Orders. I put the question twice, and certainly I have no discretion. The Standing Order says there must be consent, and there was not unanimous consent. On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, the Chair heard the negative opinion from within the chamber.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is right.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame!

An hon. Member: They don't like the truth.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, I think it is unfortunate that some members on the government side were not prepared to give unanimous consent to allow the right hon. member for Prince Albert to complete his remarks. He has long experience in this House and we are discussing a very important matter.

An hon. Member: Same old gang!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I think, instead of trying to cut off the discussion, some members on the other side of the House ought to be seized of the importance of this question and should be trying to get all the information they can on it. I submit to the gentlemen opposite that this section which we are now discussing, part IV of this Bill C-207, is one of the most crucial questions we will discuss in this session of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: I would have hoped that private members on the other side of the House would not only have wanted to listen to the right hon. member for Prince Albert but would have wanted to take a—

Mr. Drury: A point of order, Mr. Chairman. On a number of occasions the hon. gentleman who has just been speaking has made reference to the opposition of gentlemen on this side of the House to allowing the right hon. member for Prince Albert to continue his speech. This is an unsupported and unsubstantiated charge,—

Some hon. Members: No, no!

An hon. Member: You are reflecting on the Chair; apologize.

Mr. Drury: —and I would hope that the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands would limit his observations to the lack of unanimity, without trying in a substantial way to ascribe it either to one side of the House or the other.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, if the President of the Treasury Board thinks there is any doubt as to where the opposition to allowing the right hon. member for Prince Albert to proceed came from, then I suggest that you should poll the committee. There will then be no doubt about the place from which the opposition came.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Douglas: I have the floor and I am still on a point of order. The President of the Treasury Board may run the government, but he is not going to start running this committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (3:30 p.m.)

The Chairman: Order, please. Will the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands kindly resume his seat. I merely want to ask whether he is still speaking on the point of order raised by the President of the Treasury Board?

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, since the right hon. member for Prince Albert may wish to speak, and since I have spoken for several minutes, I am prepared to surrender the floor to him and to take part in the debate later.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that members on this side are fully agreeable to confirming your understanding by polling the chamber.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair, with respect, must say to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands and to the President of the Treasury Board that the Chair takes the position we must follow the Standing Orders. I indicated to hon. members, when a question was raised on the point of order, that I heard a negative voice after I had asked for unanimous consent. I did not indicate from what part of the chamber I heard it, and I am not now prepared to indicate that. I merely indicated that there was not unanimous consent and I am not prepared, because so far as I know there is no provision for this in the Standing Orders, to poll the committee. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, if the right hon. member for Prince Albert does not want to proceed at this time, he will without a doubt, take the opportunity to intervene later in the debate. I want to say that this provision for the establishment of ministries of state is a further erosion of the powers of Parliament.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Absolutely.

Mr. Douglas: Here is a provision which says—

Mr. Osler: That is what they did in Manitoba.

Mr. Douglas: If the hon. member wants to make a speech, he will have the opportunity to do so. I invite him to take part in the debate and to make a speech, but to please keep quiet while I am making my speech.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Douglas: I suggest that the hon. member should remain seated, even though that gives him concussion of the brain. I suggest that he sit where he now is.

Clause 14 reads:

Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters coming within the responsibility of the Government of Canada warrant the establishment for the time being of a special portion of the public service of Canada presided over by a Minister charged with responsibility for the formulation and development of such policies, the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

I underline the words "developing new and comprehensive policies". This clause gives to the cabinet the power to set up what are, to all intents and purposes under this proposed legislation, temporary departments. Clause 15 reads:

A proclamation establishing a Ministry of State shall

(a) state the name of the Ministry;

(b) specify the matter or matters in relation to which the Minister for the Ministry is to formulate and develop policies; and

(c) specify the powers, duties and functions to be assigned to the Minister for the Ministry in relation to the formulation and development of those policies.

I draw the attention of the committee to these words in subclause (c), "specify the powers, duties and functions to be assigned to the Minister". I also draw the committee's attention to clause 21, which reads:

In addition to the powers, duties and functions specified in the proclamation establishing a Ministry of State, the powers, duties and functions of the Minister for that Ministry extend to and include such other matters as are assigned or transferred to the Minister or the Ministry by or pursuant to any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

That clause provides that the cabinet has power to determine the powers, duties and functions of a department which is to be established as a ministry of state. It has the authority to extend those powers and give additional areas of jurisdiction to a minister of state. It has the power to end such a department at any time, without reference to Parliament and without any reference to any statute on the statute books of Canada.

When the Canadian Labour Congress appeared before the government to present its annual brief a few weeks ago, the Minister without Portfolio in charge of housing suggested to the delegation that the whole question of housing could be speeded up if Parliament passed Bill C-207, so that a ministry of state could be established for housing and urban affairs. I am not in a position to know whether the Prime Minister intends to establish a ministry of state for housing and urban affairs although, certainly, the statement of the Minister without Portfolio to the CLC delegation gives one reason to believe that that is the government's intention.

What does that mean, Mr. Chairman? Is a ministry of state dealing with housing and urban affairs within the terms of reference of the words of clause 14 that I shall now quote:

—developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters coming within the responsibility of the Government of Canada—

Does this mean that the government is now asking Parliament for the authority to set up, by order in council and by proclamation, a department of housing and urban affairs, without any reference to Parliament and without giving Parliament the opportunity to discuss the duties to be allocated to the minister, the powers given to the ministry of state and the jurisdiction which the minister of state will have?

A ministry of housing and urban affairs is not a temporary measure dealing with new and comprehensive policies. It is the kind of department that ought to be permanent. It is a department that will probably function as long as there are problems in housing and problems relating to urban affairs. Yet here the government is asking for authority, without referring to Parliament and merely by proclamation, to set up such a department, to extend the powers of that department and, when it deems it advisable, to end that department. Parliament is not to have any opportunity whatsoever to discuss the matter. Mr. Chairman, this is an amazing attitude for the government to take.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is scandalous.

Mr. Douglas: It is nothing short of scandalous that the government should ask for the power to set up departments of government without referring to the Parliament of Canada and to the elected representatives of the people the matter of what areas of jurisdiction should be available to such a department, what powers it should exercise and what duties shall be prescribed for the minister in question. Actually, this government has been consistently endeavouring to erode the powers of parliament. Already the control of the purse strings has largely passed out of the hands of Parliament. Estimates go to committees. There is no opportunity in the House except for a vote. It is true that a member may specify a particular item on which he wants a vote taken, but there is no opportunity for discussion. The control of the purse strings is increasingly slipping out of the hands of the elected representatives.

• (3:40 p.m.)

We are now asked to go one step further and give the cabinet the stupendous power to set up departments of government with sweeping powers. We are asked to give the government that right without any recourse to Parliament whatsoever. The President of the Treasury Board says that this is necessary in order to have a flexible response. I say that this request for a flexible response is merely a subterfuge for asking for extraordinary and unparliamentary powers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: The fact is that technocrats, and I certainly include the President of the Treasury Board in that class, tend to become autocrats. They have little or no appreciation or understanding of the parliamentary process in a democratic society. If giving these sweeping powers to the cabinet is going to make for greater efficiency, it is logical to argue that Parliament be sent home, then, the President of the Treasury Board and the other technocrats could run the whole government of Canada. I say to members opposite that this steady and continuous erosion of the powers of the elected representatives and ignoring the role of Parliament in our democratic system is something they will live to regret.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: Many articles have been written in recent months pointing out that the Prime Minister of Canada is moving more and more toward a presidential system and that increasing powers are being vested in the hands of the Prime Minister. It is no longer a case of prima interpares. It is a case of one man seeking to exercise more and more power at the expense of Parliament.

It is significant that the Prime Minister, who is sponsoring this bill, is not even here. When I asked him a few weeks ago if he would undertake to be present when we were discussing these particular sections, he said he would be here. He is not here. He, alone, is in a position to say to Parliament why he wants these extraordinary powers, the use he intends to make of them, what ministers of state he intends to appoint and what particular functions will be given to these ministries of state. He ought to be able to tell us whether these ministries of state will deal with temporary problems or whether he intends to use the powers in this bill to set up virtually permanent departments, such as a ministry of housing and urban affairs. Housing and urban affairs is not a temporary matter. If the government sets up a ministry of housing and urban affairs, I serve notice that in my opinion it will be a complete violation of clause 14 in Part IV of this bill.

The fact that the Prime Minister completely ignores the committee of the whole, has taken no part in the debate and has not seen fit in any of the preceding stages to outline the reasons for seeking powers which have never been granted to any Prime Minister in the history of Canada, indicates a contempt for Parliament. That contempt has not only been indicated by his absence from this committee, but it has been indicated by a number of actions which he has taken. As a matter of fact, in any democratic country, not even the president has the authority to allocate powers and duties unless such action is based on statutes enacted by the elected representatives.

In the United States, a cabinet minister has to be ratified by congress. The department over which any cabinet minister presides is based on statutes passed by congress. He exercises powers which have been approved and passed by congress.

Mr. Drury: Do you want to move to the presidential system?

Mr. Douglas: No, I am not suggesting that we move to the presidential system. What I am saying to the President of the Treasury Board is that we are in great danger of getting the worst features of both. We are going to get the presidential system without the controls and power to exercise restraint which are available to te United States congress. We will have neither the benefits of the Parliamentary system nor the restricted measures and restraints of the United States Congress.

This legislation is being rammed through the House. Opposition protests are being ignored with respect to the matter of setting up ministries of state. In the main, the government members have remained silent. We have heard no protests from them.

An hon. Member: They want a piece of the action.

Mr. Douglas: I suppose many of them hope to be appointed ministers of state or parliamentary secretaries. This committee would do well to stop and think of the long-term repercussions which will evolve from the step we are now being asked to take. The government wants to have a flexible response. There is certainly a case to be made for being able to deal with certain matters and to have certain ministers allocated to deal with specific problems. The government has the power to appoint ministers without portfolio and to give them specific jobs to do.

We have been asking for a long time that a department of housing and urban affairs be established. The government can bring in legislation to set up such a department. This would enable the members of this House to discuss the role of such a department, the powers that would be given to it and the duties of the minister in charge of the department. That would be the proper way to do it. However, when the government asks for the power to set up a department of housing and urban affairs or any other department on its own initiative on the subterfuge that this is merely a temporary organization, the government is seeking in a round about way to bypass Parliament and to nullify the powers of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Douglas: On this question, members in all parts of the House have a serious responsibility to look into the long-term effects of this measure and to speak out on them. As the powers of Parliament are curtailed and as the voice of the elected representatives is muzzled, so the democratic process suffers.

• (3:50 p.m.)

We might as well face the fact, Mr. Chairman, that there is a growing body of opinion among youth today that parliamentary democracy is irrelevant; that the parliamentary system has had its day. I do not believe that.

I believe that the parliamentary system is one of the best systems that has ever been evolved to enable free men and women to have a voice in governing themselves. But if its elected representatives are to have less and less power, if they are increasingly to become rubber stamps, if they are merely to be brought together to vote for or against non-confidence motions and to ram through estimates on the last prescribed day, then Parliament and its reputation will suffer and a great many of the rising generation will be looking to other methods of governing this country.

This provision is a retrograde step. It is something that the government does not need. If the government wants ministers to deal with specific problems, then it has the authority to appoint ministers without portfolio, if the government needs to set up additional departments, such as a department of housing and urban affairs, then Parliament will support the government. Indeed, I think all parties in the House have at different times urged the government to set up a department of housing and urban affairs. Certainly, the Mayors and Municipalities Association of Canada has been urging this for years.

The government does not have to take this action through the back door, and I should like to ask why it is using this method. Is it because the type of legislation that it has in mind is such that it thinks the House will object to it? Or is it going to be such a piece of window dressing that a ministry of state will be created with virtually no power to be more than a sort of study group to give the Canadian people the impression something is being done when, in fact, the government does not intend such a ministry to do anything at all? I hope that the President of the Treasury Board will tell this committee the reason the government is adopting this method. If the government does want to set up a department of housing and urban affairs, I ask the President of the Treasury Board why it does not bring in a bill to set up such a department.

The Chairman: Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but I do so to advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue with the consent of the committee. Is there such consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Chairman: I do not hear unanimous consent. The hon. member for Lotbinière.

Mr. Drury: That came from behind you, John.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, it did not.

The Chairman: Order, please. The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Lotbinière.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, we are currently studying Part IV of the act respecting the organization of the government of Canada and matters related or incidental thereto.

According to Clause 14, the government proposes to establish ministries of state which would handle various matters.

When perusing the legislation, one starts wondering what these matters are and why should a ministry of state be established. Clause 14 provides that ministries of state will be created. We therefore have to find in the bill in which specific areas the government intends acting in order to justify the creation of a department or a ministry and the appointment of a minister of state.

The answer to this basic question does not appear in the bill, nor is it mentioned in the government's statements, or those of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), because, at any rate, even if he is the sponsor of the bill he does not dare pilot it himself.

It is therefore nearly impossible for the opposition to find out why the government wants to create these new ministries of state. We must be satisfied with what is written, trying to justify honestly the establishment of these ministries.

Therefore, I would like to make a detailed study of some clauses of this bill. The questions I ask myself and that I want to ask my hon. colleagues are as follows: What definite fields will be covered by the ministries of state? Who will create them? And finally, whose authority will these ministries of state come under? Who will they be under? The government or parliament?

Therefore, I would like to study immediately clause 14 which states:

• (4:00 p.m.)

> Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies in relation to any matter or matters coming within the responsibility of the Government of Canada warrant the establishment for the time being of a special portion of the public sevice of Canada presided over by a Minister . . .

This is the reason why the government wants to create a ministry of state. For some reason or other the governor in council will create a ministry of state in order to deal with a problem or to make some study.

Mr. Chairman, this reason means nothing, of course. It is simply a legal jumble which justifies nothing, explains nothing and does not say why a ministry of state will be created.

Mr. Chairman, I doubt then that we are justified in creating ministries of state. We are not opposed in principle and we expect it to be clearly understood. However, we would like to know what the duties of these ministries of state will be, why they will be set up and under what circumstances.

Let us assume for instance that a serious housing crisis exist all across Canada—such as the one now prevailing—and reflects unfavourably on the government in the public opinion. Let us assume that such a crisis is prejudicial to the government; let us assume that there is a very urgent need for a change in housing policy, that the government is in danger of losing ground and of being brought to bay.

A similar situation could also prevail with respect to taxation.

The same could be said, for instance, of unemployment and of summer jobs for students, whom the government is unable to supply with summer jobs. It is merely applying poultices to wooden legs, palliatives which do not solve the real problem but seek to make people forget about it.

The government therefore, in order to mask its inefficiency and put people off, could announce, with a fine fanfare of publicity, of course well nourished by the mass media, the creation of a ministry of state headed by a minister without portfolio, to concentrate exclusively on the problem of summer jobs for students, or on student problems in general, or on housing, or on any other problem.

This does not mean that the problem would thus be solved. As a matter of fact, it simply means that to escape the storm, the government is using the ostrich policy, that is, it is hiding its head in the sand.

The government does not justify the establishment of this ministry of state, but in creating it, it tries to find a way to hide is incompetence, its apathy, its lethargy and its lack of action in a given field.

If hon. members on the treasury benches do not agree, I should like them to show me the provisions of the bill which assure them that such a ministry will not make unwarranted expenditures.

Of course the expenditure of public money is justified to the extent that we really want to face a special problem, and this with appropriate tools.

Mr. Chairman, today the government would have parliament grant a special power to the cabinet, that is appointing at will up to a maximum of five state ministers, and this for purposes and in circumstances which are not defined.

Mr. Chairman, having read the first part of clause 14, I must simply conclude that this is an ostrich policy. Moreover, as those who spoke before me said, this is a policy quite typical of the Trudeau government: the disintegration of the executive and legislative in order to crush the supreme institution likely to ensure the defence of Canadian people, that is parliament. This is a new way to cursh parliament, by granting the cabinet enlarged powers, without applying nor having to report to parliament.

I will go on with my quotation of clause 14 which stipulates that ministries of state will be established, for reasons that are not given, and that they will be headed by a minister of state.

The clause states, and I quote:

—charged with responsibility for the formulation and development of such policies, the Governor in Council may, by proclamation, establish a Ministry of State for that purpose.

Not only will parliament not be able to advise the government to establish a ministry or state nor to ask for its establishment, but the government will not even be required to ask for the consent of parliament for this purpose.

Thefore, an extraordinary power is thus given to the executive, independently of the people's will and of their supreme protective agency, parliament.

Mr. Chairman, this kind of politics cannot be justified in any way unless we understand that we are considering the policies applied by this government over the last two years, which are unilateral policies showing utmost disregard for the wishes and requests of parliament and which, I must unfortunately admit, are initiated against the hon. members' wishes.

This shows how much this government mocks the House of Commons and reviles its power. It shows to what extent under the present government the executive attempts once more—and this time it is once too many—to crush the legislative power.

In Canada there are three separate powers which are all of equal importance: the judiciary, the legislative and the executive power. It is clearly understood that these powers can be exercised on the condition that the executive does not wield legislative and judiciary powers.

Mr. Chairman, all will recognize that from the moment the executive attempts to dictate some rules or guidelines to the judiciary, then justice is not justice anymore because it is directly dependent on the executive power. He who is judged cannot expect from justice that it be equitable; he can only hope to avoid the disfavour of the executive power which is ready to grind him. The judiciary system cannot operate normally if the executive power tries to control it.

The same applies to the relationship that must exist between te legislative and executive powers. If the executive attempts, one way or another, to assume or limit the rights of the legislative authority, or to ignore them, we come to the establishment of a dictatorship. It is a one-sided decision. The people, through their representatives, have no longer a voice in the administration of public affairs.

Those are the ones, Mr. Chairman, who will say to the people at the next election: "My dear friends, give us your opinion; the Liberal government has come up with a new way of asking the advice of the people, that is through white papers. Let us know your views, be really democrats, take part in the economic and political lives of your country at the decision-making level.

Mr. Chairman, this cannot be true. It is only bunkum, if the executive power crushes, as it is actually doing, the legislative power, that is parliament.

We cannot really live in a democratic country as Canada, Mr. Chairman, and thoroughly apply to the system unless the three main Canadian powers respect each other.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the legislative power is ready to respect the executive and judiciary powers and that the judiciary power is willing to respect the executive and legislative powers. But most unfortunately, one cannot honestly say that the executive power respects the legislative power.

Mr. Chairman, not only is the creation of those ministries of state unjustified but to make matters worse, the duties of the ministers to be appointed at the head of those ministries are not clearly outlined. And in that respect I shall quote clause 21:

In addition to the powers, duties and functions specified in the proclamation establishing a Ministry of State, the powers, duties and functions of the Minister for that Ministry—

One should give great attention to this part because the duties of that minister will be defined here, and I quote:

—the powers, duties and functions of the Minister for that Ministry extend to and include such other matters as are assigned or transferred to the Minister or the Ministry by or pursuant to any Act of the Parliament of Canada.

Therefore, this means nothing. It is once more the same legal mess which is found in clause 14 of the same part of the legislation. In fact, the more you study this legislation, the less you can justify the setting up of these ministries of state. But, if you put yourself in the place of the government members, you have two reasons to support this bill: Either you do not believe anymore in the legislative power and you are willing to increase that of the executive or you intend, through this indirect means, to increase your salary.

Mr. Chairman, I am quite shocked that there are not more government members to state their opinions on this subject. These members have the same rights and the same privileges as all opposition members and I cannot quite explain to myself why the latter alone feel they have to take advantage of their privileges to defend the rights of Parliament.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the government members to that point. I should like to ask the minister who is piloting the bill in the absence of the Prime Minister, what is the reason for the establishment of these ministries and ministers of state. I should like him to tell us what he intends to do and to what extent Parliament stands protected under Part IV of the bill.

There are many ways in which Parliament can be protected. First of all, the discretionary power that the Prime Minister is seeking under this legislation, that is authority to appoint ministers of state without consultating Parliament, should be curtailed. Nowhere in this bill can there be found a clause or phrase prescribing that the government shall consult Parliament concerning the establishment of some ministry of state or the appointment of some minister of state. Nowhere is it stated that the execuive shall consult Parliament or that the ministry of state shall have to report to Parliament.

It is rather curious to realize that under the law many Crown corporations and many departments have to make a yearly report to the government on the administration of public funds, and yet those ministries of state would be excluded.

The ministers of state would not even have to be responsible to Parliament. Were we to carry to extremes the implementation of that system, even the ministers of state could refuse to answer questions which members of the opposition could direct to them on certain matters relating to the administration of those ministries of state.

[Mr. Fortin.]

Once one starts to play with those powers, to crush the legislative power, to push it aside for the benefit of the executive power, one realizes that it is no longer possible for democracy to survive and the situation does not make sense any more.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly object to part IV of the legislation which the right hon. Prime Minister did not have the courage to come and defend in the House, although he is the mover. I am strongly against that part of the bill because it is unjustified and no reason is given for the expense of public money. Above all, it will not solve anything. Judging from their accomplishments, there are already too many departments and ministries of state.

What results can we observe? Someone is designated as Postmaster General and one year later he is dismissed. A year after a new Post Office Department is established in a sort of crazy game. In the meantime, people may be amused but the problems are certainly not solved.

If, at least, through part IV of the bill, the problem of existing destitution in the midst of abundance in Canada were solved, if at least the people of Canada were given the assurance that they could live secure and free, the bill would be useful.

Unfortunately, part IV does not deal with the commonwealth, the well-being of the individuals. Nowhere in part IV is the problem of unemployment, of welfare, of the young dealt with. There is only talk of appointing ministers of state. Why? To increase the salaries of government members in a disguised way, without having to answer to the people, in addition to giving the cabinet more power to crush parliament which has become the only institution really capable of protecting the people from this government which tramples them through its policies as well as the methods it uses.

Mr. Chairman, if at least, through part IV dealing with the setting up of ministries and the appointment of ministers of state, the people could be sure that they would be better protected, we could discuss the bill more easily.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. I regret very much to interrupt the hon. member. I do so to advise him and the committee that his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Continue.

The Chairman: The hon. member may continue if there is unanimous consent.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

An hon. Member: No.

The Chairman: There is not consent.

Mr. Boulanger: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I think you misunderstood. I believe we agreed he could continue.

Mr. Ricard: On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wish to draw to your attention that there was a "no" which came from that side of the House.

The Chairman: With respect, the Chair might say to all members of the committee that I hope we do not have repetitions—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The member for York-Simcoe was the one who said no".

The Chairman: Order, please. May the Chair say on the point of order that when there is not consent the Chair can hear a negative expression. The Chair is bound by Standing Orders and I would say impartially that I hope hon. members will not feel they have to point out to the Chair on occasion, from either side of the House, that there is not consent.

The hon. member for Red Deer.

Mr. Thompson: Mr. Chairman, it is not an easy task to participate in this debate. I say that because it is obvious from the refusal of members of the government, as evidenced now by the hon. member for York, to grant the normal courtesy that is given to members of this House to complete their statements. Obviously, even the government backbenchers are not interested in listening to intelligent debate on this bill. They go so far as to bar the right hon. member for Prince Albert and the Leader of the New Democratic Party from that courtesy. One wonders what is the use of participating at all. We seem to be talking to deaf ears. Perhaps the members of the government are not interested. Even if they are interested, it is obvious that they do not want to hear the legitimate views of those who might be opposed to some parts of the bill we are considering at the present time.

I say also, Mr. Chairman, it is difficult to participate in this debate when the Prime Minister, who obviously considered the bill important enough to sponsor it, does not appear in the House at any time when it is being debated. Indeed, we do not even see his parliamentary secretary on this occasion. So as a result we are, so to speak, talking to the wind. There is not very much hope that one could present an argument to which someone would listen, and in respect of which one would receive the type of encouragement which would indicate that perhaps an interesting consideration is taking place in respect of the contents of this bill.

Having said that, I share the concern expressed here this afternoon by those who have preceded me and those who have spoken at other times in this debate. In fact, I must say—and I have thoughtfully considered what might be an appropriate adjective here, so I do not use it lightly—that this is the most deceptive piece of legislation I have ever had to deal with in this House or that this government has ever presented because its real result will be far more sinister—yes, that is the word—so far as the parliamentary process is concerned than most of us in this House even realize or understand.

If the only aim of this legislation were to increase the number of ministers and parliamentary secretaries, that might be one thing; but actually that is only one aspect of what this bill will do. In the few minutes I have at my disposal I shall attempt to show that it also erodes the very fibre of what this institution is. Considering the attitude of so many young people, and others not so young, toward this institution we should be asking ourselves every day what we are doing to strengthen this institution and not to weaken it? This should be the basic purpose, not only of those in Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition but of those who support the government. I am concerned, and this is why I use such adjectives as "deceptive" and "sinister", because I see a further degrading and eroding of the place of Parliament in what I consider to be the most satisfactory way that man has devised to govern himself.

I want to point to just a few of the anomalies in the bill. It is not just a question that the government does not define what an enlarged cabinet will do, with particular reference to ministers of state. It is not just the question that the powers of Parliament are being eroded. There is also the question that the whole bureaucratic administration of government is being strengthened, is becoming more difficult to manage and, so far as the representatives of the people are concerned, is becoming more dangerous. I believe that Canada is the most over-governed country in the world. We have three levels of government, municipal, provincial and federal, and when we talk about government we have to consider all three levels. I know of no better way to emphasize this point than to say that if we were to add the total expenditures of all levels of government together, and then deduct from that total the various transfers that take place between those levels of government and compare those expenditures with the net national income of the Canadian people, that national income being what they earn through salaries, through dividends, through commissions, through the sale of their produce, and whatever other income they may have, we find that it costs Canadians approximately 47 cents out of every dollar they earn to govern themselves. That calculation is relevant here, Mr. Chairman, because this bill will increase the size of the bureaucratic aspect of government at the federal level.

Let us look briefly at the present situation. There are 155 government members in the House. The cabinet is made up of 29 members, including the Prime Minister and three ministers without portfolio. It is the largest cabinet we have ever had in Canada. There are 16 parliamentary secretaries. There is an assistant speaker; there is a whip and an assistant whip. There is a vice-president of the House committees, and there is the chairman of the committees. This makes a total of 62 members from the government side of the House who have specific jobs, other than just being elected members of Parliament.

If one considers the remarks of the Prime Minister when he upset the fruit basket of parliamentary secretaries last fall, at which time he indicated it was his policy to rotate these lesser offices every two years, one finds that Bill C-207 will provide an opportunity for 139 of the 155 members on the government side to have jobs during any one Parliament. How will that come about? We presume there will be 29 cabinet ministers, just as now. Then, there will be ministers of state, and if you count them on the rotating basis that means five for one two-year period and five for another two-year period, making a total of ten. With 28 parliamentary secretaries for each two-year period, there will be a total of 56 over the life of a Parliament. There will be two assistant speakers over the life of a Parliament, two vice-presidents of committees of the House, two whips, two assistant whips, and 36 chairmen of committees. I repeat that during one term of office 139 government members will be able to hold office. This is something that is disturbing. All it can mean is a growth of the bureaucracy and an increase in the cost of government.

Let us look at the situation in a few other democratic countries. Britain, which has a population of 50 million, has 20 members in cabinet, and there are 30 ministers of state who are not in the cabinet. The latter cannot speak on policy. All they can do is answer for the activities of the departments with which they are associated. Then, there are law officers, an attorney general, two solicitors-general and an advocate making a total of four. There are 54 ministers, in and out of cabinet, out of a grand total of 630 Members of Parliament.

Mr. Kaplan: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Thompson: I have only 20 minutes, Mr. Chairman, and I have some material I would like to put on the record. Since there are no provincial governments in Britain, one must assume that the national government looks after much of the administration which is the responsibility of provincial and municipal governments in Canada.

Australia, with a population of less than 14 million and a federal system similar to Canada's, has 12 ministers in the cabinet and 14 ministers who are not in the cabinet, for a total of 26. There are 21 ministers chosen from the Australian House of 125 members, and five from the Senate of 60 members, and that Senate is an elected body.

India, with a population of 500 million, has state legislatures like we have in Canada. It has a cabinet of 50 members. It also has 15 ministers of state who are not members of the cabinet. The lower House consists of 500 members. Then, there is the President of the Republic in addition to the Prime Minister, and he also has an administrative function.

The United States, with a population of 210 million, has 12 cabinet ministers, and they are not chosen from the House or the Senate. There are 50 state governments in that country.

France, with a population somewhat the same in numbers as the United Kingdom, has a cabinet of 19 members. Its National Assembly is composed of 779 members, and it has no provincial or state governments.

Germany, which is not too dissimilar in population from France and the United Kingdom, has a cabinet of 16 members. The federal parliament is composed of 496 members, and there are also provincial governments, the Landers.

Japan, with a population of 100 million or more, has a cabinet of 21 members, and its House of Representatives is made up of 467 members. It has no provincial governments. What I am concerned about is that the growth of bureaucracy, and the size of the government which has been pyramiding during the last three years, will continue.

In addition to the increase in the size of the administration, what concerns me also is the fact that under the terms of this bill the House will not be permitted to debate a proposal to form a new ministry. We all know what happened when Information Canada was set up without any reference to this House at all. I will have something to say about that in a minute or so. If we adopt this bill, we merely strengthen the power of the Prime Minister and the government to increase the bureaucracy without any reference to Parliament. By proclamation, the Governor in Council will be able to set up five ministries of state. In each case the responsible minister will be in charge of policy formulation and development. This is contrary to parliamentary procedure and tradition, since policy formulation has always been the prerogative of the Crown. This bill represents a real danger.

Furthermore, in clause 21 we find that the minister may be "assigned or transferred . . . by or pursuant to any act of the Parliament of Canada". This gives the minister administrative powers besides his policy formulation duties. It is a way for the government to create another department without passing a bill, without the consent of the elected representatives of the people, without estimates and without study by a House committee. You can see what this means, Mr. Chairman.

The same criticism can be applied also to the actions of the Secretary of State who is responsible for bilingualism and biculturalism without any bill having been passed giving him this function. Perhaps we should recall that this was not just an accidental or single occasion. There has been a trend within the government towards such actions, and I believe that is the reason this bill has been worded and formulated as it has. By creating more ministries, the government is giving its ministers a licence to be absent from the House. The roster system governing the attendance of ministers has not worked so far. What will it be like with five more ministers?

The reasons for creating these ministries of state are obscure. The government already has the power to name ministers without portfolio. We have this situation in connection with the Post Office and Information Canada, with housing and urban affairs at the present time. Why create new ministries? For example, let us consider two of the present ministers without portfolio, the minister responsible for housing and the minister responsible for Information Canada. They must be waiting in the wings to be established as ministers of state. I don't know, but if their jobs are so important that separate departments with a single minister in charge are necessary, whether that be a minister without portfolio or minister of state, then why not create full ministries? As has already been mentioned this afternoon, I believe the minister without portfolio in charge of urban affairs and housing holds one of the most vital positions in the government. So, why not make it a full ministry? I believe the majority of members in this House would agree with this. This could be done by statute and I believe there would be very little argument or disagreement about it. Perhaps the reason for not following this course is that ministers without portfolio now receive only $10,000 a year, while under the new statute ministers of state will receive $15,000 a year.

It is a well known fact that many of the Liberal backbenchers believe that they deserve a title. I do not really object to that because I know many of them are frustrated. They find it difficult to justify their presence in the House with the limitations imposed upon them. Indeed, they may be in a more difficult position than we in the opposition in many cases because there is not much opportunity for them to participate in debates as any member of this House should have the right to do. Rather than bringing a more logical approach to problems, the government is attempting to bring legislation in through the back door. It is a very deceptive type of legislation because it is in the form of an omnibus bill. Mr. Chairman, we cannot deal with the issues in the way we should under the omnibus approach to legislation. It is an unpopular method, and is only a tool to get legislation through Parliament without a proper decision on each item in the bill.

It seems to me that these points bring out some of the very real dangers that this bill represents. Another aspect worthy of mention is that there is no provision setting the length of time ministers of state can function. If we look at the various clauses of this bill, we find that clause 17 allows the Governor in Council to establish a ministry of state and a department, while clause 18 gives the Governor in Council power to terminate its existence.

Another deceptive clause is No. 20 which provides that a minister of state will not have a deputy minister but that his senior officer will be called a secretary, and he shall be chief executive officer. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, his function will be exactly the same as that of a deputy minister. If this is so, then why not give him the title? Soon there will be a deputy minister, under-secretaries and secretaries all doing the same jobs. Clause 22 provides that the minister of state will report annually to the House, but since there will be no Act to refer to it will be difficult to assess the report. It will be difficult to deal with estimates of such a ministry because there just will be no established committee to deal with them. Under the new rules, we are supposed to be giving all members a better chance to participate, but we are already nullifying some rules to which we agreed not long ago.

We could talk about the uunlimited number of parliamentary secretaries that can be created. If we allow the government to do this, we are increasing the size of the bureaucracy and weakening the power of this House. At the same time we are increasing the power of the Prime Minister who already has more power than any head of state in any other democratic country in the world.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, my own leader, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, and the hon. member for Red Deer. They expressed in a very competent and serious manner the dangers inherent in this move to appoint ministers of state at the prerogative of the Governor in Council. All who are concerned and anxious about the welfare and good order of the parliamentary system will have enjoyed the remarks of these three hon. gentlemen, but I submit that they forgot something, Mr. Speaker. They forgot the very nature of the Liberal party—what the beast is like. In the history of our country there has never been another political party that has always known that it was the only one fitted to govern. There has never been a political party with a better reputation for lining up at the trough. It would be too much to expect the Liberals to have changed their ways during the life of one Parliament.

There are 155 Liberals and the Prime Minister knows they all want a piece of the action. This is a nice way of working it, Mr. Chairman. Clause 14 of the bill reads:

> Where it appears to the Governor in Council that the requirements for formulating and developing new and comprehensive policies—the Governor in Council may,—establish a ministry of state—

I may be naïve, Mr. Chairman, but I always thought that in Canada we had a party system of government. I thought that a party devised policies and the government tried to implement those policies. This does not say very much for the policies that come from the Liberal party, and it certainly does not indicate the Prime Minister's confidence in them. Maybe he did not like the answers he got to the questionnaires given out at the last meeting of the Liberal Federation of Canada. It seems that we must have ministers of state to devise policies and programs that may be needed from time to time. Without doubt, some legitimate case could be made for some additional, specialized portfolios. It has been mentioned in the debate on this bill that there is a good argument for the appointment of a minister in charge of Information Canada, or urban and housing affairs, or youth affairs, or even women. One could even make out a good case for a minister who would be responsible for all the government's Crown corporations.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: How about a minister for unemployment?

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, we could have a minister for unemployment. There is provision for a minister to be in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. We have only half a minister in that portfolio at present, and I am giving him the benefit of the doubt. Some serious argument could be made for those portfolios. I am sure if the government were to bring in legislation for the establishment of departments of portfolios in these areas, the legislation would find support among members on both sides of the House.

Let us take a look at the makeup of this government. The hon. member for Red Deer compared our Parliament to those of other countries. As I said earlier, he forgot the particular nature of the beast that governs this country at the moment. At present we have 29 cabinet ministers, 16 parliamentary secretaries, one whip, one deputy speaker and one assistant deputy speaker. I am referring to people who get paid for doing their jobs. That is a total of 48. The bill provides for 13 more parliamentary secretaries, to bring their number up to the number of cabinet ministers appointed, which means that the government will have taken care of 61 Liberal members. We have a long way to go. I do not know that I can suggest positions for 155 Liberals, but I will try. As I say, this measure will have taken care of 61. That number will be feeding at the trough. Then, there are to be appointed six ministers of state who, I think, probably could be justified. That brings the total up to 67. We are not even half way there yet.

Well, I have been assessing the experience and capabilities and interests of my hon. friends in the back two rows on the government side, and I have some ideas that I think would be useful to the Prime Minister if he is thinking of appointing more ministers of state. I hope that they will be helpful to him. For example, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton might be appointed as minister of state in charge of the obliteration of the Parliament Hill skyline. Perhaps he could get a few more skyscrapers around the House of Commons. I suggest that the hon. member for Ottawa West be made minister in charge of all malingerers in the Public Service. He could undertake a study on the formulation of policies in this area. Then, how about appointing a minister in charge of kiosks? You know, they would be useful in the summer youth program.

Mr. Baldwin: Did the hon. member say chaos?

Mr. Benjamin: No kiosks. We already have chaos. I suggest this because when the socialist government was in power in Saskatchewan, it brought sewers and water to tens of thousands of farms and hundreds of towns and villages in the province, and now there is a surplus of one holers and two holers. If you spread them out, about one every half mile on the trans-Canada highway, they would reach from Vancouver to Thunder Bay. That is why I suggested a minister in charge of these kiosks. That way we could make good use of surplus equipment which has been going to waste in Saskatchewan and tidy up communities and farming areas. I suggest that the minister in charge of the wheat board be transferred to that position. I think he could do a good and adequate job there.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I think we need a minister of state to undertake studies and develop policies relating to election expenses. I think the hon. member for Don Valley ought to have that position. Then, there is the whole matter of questions which are asked in standing committees. How about appointing the hon. member for Lachine to undertake studies and formulate policies relating to how one should ask questions in standing committees? I can think of another one, too. The hon. member for York Centre could do a good job as a minister of state in charge of developing policies and studies on the question of how to dispose of parliamentary secretaries. How would this appointment suit you? I suggest that the hon. member for York West be appointed as minister of state in charge of studies and the development of policies relating to what we do with mayors or municipal officials once they are elected to Parliament. After all, we have to feed and keep all these people.

Mr. Baldwin: There would be good liaison with the Prime Minister.

Mr. Benjamin: I suggest that the hon. member for York East could be made minister of state in charge of studies and policy developments relating to the formulating of ideas in newsletters from members on the government side of the House.

An hon. Member: Ha, ha, ha.

Mr. Otto: I can see the hon. member is blushing. I do not blame him.

Mr. Benjamin: We badly need more help in agriculture, and I have some sympathy for this suggested appointment. I suggest that we urge the Prime Minister to appoint the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe as minister of state in charge of studies and the development of policies relating to whether you could put the hon. member for Crowfoot in charge of our National Livestock Marketing Board or even in charge of the farm products marketing act.

There are a few more appointments that I can think of, Mr. Chairman. We are trying to get something for all these fellows and make sure that the trough is well lined with Liberals. I think the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona should be minister of state in charge of studies and the development of policies relating to the attendance of hon. members in the House of Commons. Or, how about the hon. member for Essex? He could be made minister of state in charge of a special study on the abolition of the Senate. I think, also, that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich would be delighted to be minister of state in charge of studies and policies relating to the travelling of parliamentary committees.

An hon. Member: Who are you to talk this way?

Mr. Benjamin: I think, altogether, that 79 Liberals have now been taken care of. I have another suggestion for making use of the rest of the Liberals in Parliament.

If the Prime Minister will continue his plan of rotating the parliamentary secretaries every two years, and 29 have been appointed for two years, another 29 will be appointed for another two years. That makes a total of 107 Liberals who have been looked after.

I notice that clause 14, when referring to ministers of state, uses the words, "for the time being". If the ministers of state were appointed for the time being, or on the same principle under which parliamentary secretaries are appointed, namely, for a period of two years, the government could appoint another 18 ministers of state. Mr. Chairman, adding 18 and 107, we arrive at a total of 125 members who would be taken care of in one Parliament. I am short of about 27 positions that I have not been able to suggest for hon. members opposite. But, Mr. Chairman, I have made a pretty good effort. My suggestion would certainly give hon. members opposite some status—all but 27, and I would not want to discriminate against them. I am sure if the Prime Minister put his mind to it, 27 more positions could be found for ministers of state to carry out studies and develop policies.

An hon. Member: Why not pay chairmen of committees?

Mr. Benjamin: That would solve the difficulty. My colleague is suggesting that we should pay chairmen of committees. That would take care of 15 members at least. I think we have solved the problem. We have enabled the government to continue the historical status of the Liberal party. The golden age of the PFAA is no longer necessary. We now have the census and a few other matters which can take care of most good Liberals in the country. But the party never really completed the job of taking care of good Liberals in Parliament, and this method is superbly designed to accomplish that.

I have said all this to indicate exactly what I think about clause 14 of the bill. It is so contemptuous and ridiculous that it must be laughed at and laughed about. It is such an insult to parliamentary institutions that we can only put our anger aside, look at it and simply say how ridiculous it is. I think, if we all work at it, we could dream up positions and suggest them to the Prime Minister. The positions would be for hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who want to get into the act and want to get a piece of the action.

• (4:50 p.m.)

For the past 150 years following elections, the eyeballs of the Liberals have reacted like cash registers with dollar signs showing up.

Mr. Osler: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Benjamin: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre is another one. We could make him minister of state in charge of inane interruptions.

Mr. Osler: I will leave it to the House to decide whether this interruption is inane. I thank the hon. member for allowing me to interrupt. I wonder what percentage he would suggest, because in the one place where the sun shines the brightest in all of North America from his point of view, 16 out of 28 members have executive positions. That is a little better than 50 per cent.

Mr. Benjamin: That is right. It is just because we have a minority government. Following the next general election, it will be approximately 16 out of 40. A proper democratic balance will be restored to the Manitoba legislature. We do not have quite enough NDP members. I assure the hon. member that following a couple of byelections on Monday and the next general election, there will be a better ratio of cabinet ministers to private members in the New Democratic Party in Manitoba.

I am now down to 26. In the next few days, I will continue my efforts to think of 26 more positions that can be filled by hon. members. They can be made ministers of state in charge of studies and developing policies which can then be handed to the caucus. As they are all in the caucus, as well as the ministers of state and parliamentary secretaries it would be an extremely interesting meeting. If we followed this idea through, it would probably develop to the point where they could invite the opposition parties and we would all be in their caucus. One could follow this through to a wonderful conclusion. It boggles the mind to think of all the possibilities there are with this kind of government.

Even though this may have come as a surprise to some hon. members, in the past few weeks the Prime Minister has expressed some regard and respect for Parliament. I hope that when he and the President of the Treasury Board decide to set up another department of government, which they have the prerogative to do, they will come to Parliament and tell us why they need it, what it is for and what it is to do. I am sure that Parliament will deal with their proposals in a proper and prompt manner.

I have been expressing a fond hope. I am falling into the same trap as the one into which the hon. member who spoke ahead of me fell. I sometimes forget that the government members are nice fellows. Every once in a while I have a lapse of memory and forget about the nature of the beast that governs this country. I am sometimes naïve about what we expect in the form of second thoughts from members of the Liberal government. One can always live in hope.

Should this new system develop to the point where all government members have some kind of position of status, a higher position, a higher income and are responsible for laying down policies or formulating ideas, they could report to each other as a caucus and invite the opposition to attend. It would not be necessary for this House to sit very often. Imagine the ball we would have in the question period. The right hon. member for Prince Albert would need a list as long as his arm if he were to make one report per day during the session of Parliament. It would be a little difficult sorting them out. We could publish something like the seating plan. This could be changed every second year when all parliamentary secretaries and ministers of state were shuffled. All we would have to do would be to print another seating plan. Since the government members have been playing musical chairs for the past two years, there would be no problem about who sits where.

Mr. Osler: I rise on a question of privilege. I have not been playing musical chairs nor have several others.

Mr. Benjamin: I am going to correct the idea I had about the position I had for the hon. member. A position of minister of state should be created for holder of the vacant post. Since he has not been moved yet, he must feel left out. If he was appointed holder of the vacant post, he could stay right where he is.

I feel very contemptuous and angry about this sort of measure. I think this bill flies in the face of a democratic process and good governmental action. For my benefit and the benefit of others who spoke on this particular part of the bill, surely the Prime Minister could participate in this debate, if it would not inconvenience him too much. If it would help, we could arrange a picnic in the snowbanks on the front lawn. We could make maple syrup, throw it on the snow and even skate on it. We could pause during this swinging gathering so the Prime Minister could drop into the committee of the whole. We do not want to put him out.

This would give the Prime Minister an opportunity to explain why he needs these ministers of state. If he does not mind, he might even give a hint as to the responsibilities of these ministers of state. I hope it is not asking too much of the Prime Minister to ask him to come into this House at some point to take part in the debate on his bill. If it is asking too much, I apologize. I am sure all opposition members would want me to apologize. We do not want to put the poor fellow out, except at an election.

I hope the people of Canada will let the government know the contempt they feel. I hope their contempt will be echoed in the mails and in the press. Maybe if Parliament and the country are lucky, the President of the Treasury Board and his colleagues will decide that this is not the proper way to accomplish their objective and withdraw this clause. This clause could be amended so that the government would have to tell Parliament why each minister of state was required and what he was to do. This would be more proper and more in keeping with the role the government should be playing.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Chairman, I have heard a most impassioned plea in defence of Parliament by both the right hon. member for Prince Albert and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands. They defended an institution which has been obviously threatened by this bill, an institution that is really a ghost. It does not exist any longer. I did not know how to illustrate the fact that Parliament is no longer what these people think it is, but fortunately the speaker who preceded me illustrated exactly what stage Parliament has reached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Otto: In the nine years I have been in this House, I have never said a derogatory word about any member of Parliament and I do not intend to do so now. However, this brings forth the illustration to these hon. members that it is not the government that destroys Parliament and it is not really the opposition. It is a group of circumstances which has made Parliament that institution which these hon. members think it is. I have only devoted a short time to this institution, but I can see why these hon. members who have devoted a lifetime to it have such great affection for Parliament. It is a parliament of Alice in Wonderland. I know it is difficult to realize—

Mr. Diefenbaker: You will have to excuse me; I have received a message and have to leave.

Mr. Otto: Yes, of course, I will excuse the right hon. member for Prince Albert. It is a Parliament which no longer exists, and indeed the purpose of this bill is to try to make some sense out of what remains of Parliament.

I do not think for one moment that any reasonable person could find this evil—this bill—lurking under a bush ready to destroy Parliament. This bill proposes to create a few or any number of ministers of state. It was the opposition and the people in general who demanded that ministers be put in charge of individual departments. Yesterday the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway demanded a minister to look after the affairs of women. We do not have any women on this side, but we do have a member for York West who is possibly ambitious enough to undergo some sort of sex change operation if that were necessary. Mind you, he may not go that far in order to accomplish this goal.

Just recently when the minister of fisheries was discussing the first part of the bill which deals with the environment, there was a hue and cry about whether we should have a separate minister of the environment and a separate minister of fisheries. I suggest the people of Canada are not demanding that we place all these important arms of government within the control of one or two ministries, and this can be perfectly illustrated by the old problem of housing. Hon. gentlemen opposite will remember that up until very recently housing was cast from one department to another. I do not think there is one department that did not at one time or another have responsibility for CMHC or the National Housing Act. This may be one reason we have such a difficult time with housing in Canada at the present time.

I do not see that this bill is such a great threat. Indeed, the whole tenor of the speech made by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was that if the creation of these ministries was by separate bills in this House, then somehow the House of Commons would have some power. Probably since the day of Pitt the Younger, Parliament has not had any power except the power to delay. No hon. gentleman opposite can say that he really has the power to change anything, and none of us on this side can say it either. We have the institution of Parliament, of so-called responsible government, which sets the policies, and we can but follow. The opposition can oppose and delay. It is the delay that has discredited Parliament in the eyes of the Canadian people.

The parliamentary institution was well suited to a very quiet agricultural country. Canada is not the place for the old type of Parliament; we have to get things moving quickly and cannot be sedentary about policies. Therefore, between the idiosyncrasies of this Parliament which hon. gentlemen opposite so staunchly defend and the real facts of life in this country, we have to devise some new forms.

I think the Prime Minister himself when first elected as leader of the Liberal party said there was too much power in the administration. But it is no wonder when one minister has six or seven different departments to handle. An attempt is being made here to give one minister responsibility for a current issue, and the minister of the environment may not forever be involved with that particular issue. It may be the case that at the present time we do not even need a minister in charge of parks or in charge of lumber. After all, things change with time. I think this bill is an attempt to bring government to a current position. I do not say that it is perfectly right, but at least it is an attempt to recognize that if we make no changes whatsoever we will disappear. Not only will the power which Parliament may or may not have disappear, but our purpose in the minds of the people will disappear.

Unfortunately, democracy itself is put to the fore. When the people of Canada question our position, they also question democracy. The danger is that if we lower ourselves in the eyes of the people, what happens to democracy? I have tried very hard to follow the argument that has been put forward that the possible creation of more ministries will be so detrimental, but with all respect I cannot see it. I think this is a useful bill. It puts forward a set of criteria. It gives power to the government to create ministers of state for a certain specific purpose as the need arises, without going back for another 25 or 30 day debate. What would be the result of such a debate? Would the opposition defeat the government? Does any hon. member opposite think a government member would vote against the government with our party system?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Otto: Does any hon. member opposite ever vote against his party? Of course, not! Although at one time it might have been said that members of Parliament expressed themselves as individuals, recently in the rule changes recognition was given to party, both opposition parties and government party. Hon. members will also recall that power was given to the whip of each party to remove a member on five minutes' notice from any committee.

To say now that this Parliament is something other than what it really is, is putting it over on the people of Canada, in reality joining them with this kind of Alice in Wonderland attitude toward Parliament instead of facing facts and telling ourselves we have got to change. The chances are that Parliament as we know it will disappear. The chances are that we will not adopt the republican system. I think there is a good chance that we will come to some compromise which will serve this country, which will give us the best of the two worlds, and in which the people of Canada will indeed have representatives who speak for them. One way to bring this about is to take the issues which are important from the people of Canada and place them in the charge of the minister of a department. This will demonstrate that we are not completely impervious to this approach.

With all respect, let me repeat that all of the arguments I have heard are very good historical arguments and could be the basis of debate for many days. But when we come to the real meat of this section, surely that has nothing to do with it except that it is an attempt by the government to make some changes from time to time. If hon. gentlemen opposite have any private ideas, then we would welcome them. But let them not say, throw the bill out simply because it does not fit into the old, ghostly concept of Parliament as we know it.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: The hon. member for York East really put his finger on the idea the government has in mind when he said there has to be a compromise. The kind of compromise which he, the Prime Minister and the cabinet have in mind, together with others on that side of the House, is the kind of compromise a boa constrictor has when it swallows a rabbit. That is what hon. members opposite want. As far as this Parliament is concerned the government wants to swallow it. This bill is one of the weapons which will be directed towards that end. Until the hon. member for York East got up, I was about to say that government supporters, instead of rising to defend this measure, had remained in their seats, dumb, docile and listless. When I use the word "dumb" I am using it, now, in the oratorical sense rather than in the intellectual sense. Until the hon. member for York East spoke not one of them got up, or was allowed to get up, to speak in support of this particular measure.

Some hon. Members: Oh.

Mr. Borrie: You know better than that.

Mr. Baldwin: I am sorry if I have touched hon. members opposite on a raw nerve. I respect hon. members who have capability, but with regard to this particular measure, where a great deal is at stake, as has been indicated by my hon. friend from Prince Albert and others, it seems to me there is an issue which ought to be determined by the process of debate back and forth across the floor of the chamber. The bill affects one of the greatest issues of our time—the issue of what will happen to parliamentary government. The hon. member for York East says Parliament is suffering and that the bill before us would reform Parliament. How can a bill which creates more paid posts in support of the executive improve parliament? It is true that as one goes around the world one finds there is growing disillusionment with the whole process of government. But too often people confuse government with the legislative system. It is the legislative system which in the end will be required to infuse new life and a new virtue into the processes of government.

The appointment of five ministers of state, 14 parliamentary secretaries and other ministers who would be in the same position as ministers without portfolio, will in no way improve the parliamentary structure. Hon. members opposite know better in their own hearts than to support this measure. They should support the fight we are carrying on from this side of the House.

An hon. Member: What fight?

Mr. Baldwin: My right hon. friend from Prince Albert at one time held the highest elective office in this country. He is a man who loves Parliament. The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was at one time premier of his province. Time was requested on their behalf for an additional period in which to complete their observations. This was refused. There is no doubt about where the denials came from. At least the hon. member for York-Simcoe identified himself when he challenged the right of one of our members to carry on. I think this was a shameful thing, and I regret it. However, it is not the issue we are debating today.

This is not the first time the government and its immediate predecessor have brought reorganization bills before the House. In 1966-67, Bill C-178 was introduced, a lengthy bill setting up a number of departments. In 1967-68 there was Bill C-161, and in 1969 there was Bill C-173. Each of those bills involved the reorganization of government, each of them reallocated responsibilities, established new departments and changed the functions of ministers. In addition, there exists at the present time an act which provides for the re-allocation of duties. Why is it necessary to proceed with the legislation we are examining today in this committee? What has been the net result of the three reorganization bills to which I have referred? They have resulted in the creation of a large number of new ministers who fall over each other's feet, get in the way, mess things up, and refuse to give hon. members information when they want it. Inflation is still with us, unemployment still rising, huge increases are noted in the cost of government. I should probably be out of order if I were to attempt to go into the details concerning the new departments which were created by the measures to which I have referred, and to the additional cost which has been laid on the shoulders of the taxpayers as a result.

Each time a new department has been created, spokesmen for the party opposite have said: we shall take over staff from an existing department, so it will cost less money; we shall set up these new, shining instruments and they will do the job so much better. What do we find today? The cost of government is abnormally high and is imposing a steadily increasing burden on the unfortunate taxpayer. Take the size of the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council alone. In 1965, 125 people were employed in the offices of the Privy Council and of the Prime Minister. In 1969, there were 232. I believe the number today is around 300 or more. The cost of the Privy Council Office in 1965 was $2 million. In 1970 it was $11,256,175. My hon. friend from Churchill, during the debate on the budget on April 28, 1970, put some figures on record dealing with the establishment of the office of the Prime Minister, and I should like to quote now, from page 6223 of Hansard:

> In 1960 the cost of the staff of former Prime Minister John Diefenbaker was approximately $50,000. The cost was the same when he assumed this office in 1957. One of the first things he did was to ask for the staff establishment of former Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent. The cost of Mr. St. Laurent's staff was $50,000. The cost of Mr. Pearson's staff ran in the neighbourhood of $75,000 until near the end of his regime when there were some sharp increases. However, this is a far cry from the $821,000 annually which is now being paid by the Prime Minister to staff his office.

That was in 1970, and there has been a substantial increase since that day. I understand that in the Prime Minister's office now there are some 80 people and that the cost is more than $400,000. This does not include the Privy Council staff. Maybe these people are needed, I do not know. But looking at the results, and judging from them, sure as Heaven something is radically wrong.

When the Prime Minister made his first speech in this House in this session, he asked that Hansard should record a list of the legislative programs referred to in the Speech from the Throne. There were approximately 70 measures proposed at that time, and since then the government has brought in two or three more. That speech was read three months after the conclusion of the last session. We were told by His Excellency, and the text of his speech was repeated by the Prime Minister in this House, that there were these 70 bills. This was the task facing Parliament. Surely, we had reason to expect that those bills would have been ready and would have been brought in for first reading right away. What did we find?

Mr. Boulanger: Filibusters; that's what we found.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, the record shows that during the month of October, eight bills were brought in for first reading. In other words, at the time the list of bills was placed on the record by the Prime Minister only eight were ready after three months of preparation and Heaven knows how much time before that. This is an example of the bungling and administrative incompetence we find when we have 29 cabinet ministers. One might ask, therefore, what calibre can we look forward to with the addition of five ministers of state as well as unnumbered ministers who are not assigned a special position.

We might follow this list all the way down. In November, I believe 16 bills were brought in for first reading. In December, there were about six; in January there were three; in February two, and so far in March six or seven. So, there are still 30 bills we have not seen which we were promised by the government on the first day of this session. The only way to have an administratively competent and intelligent parliamentary government is to have a government which brings before the House a certain program, a government which states what the bills are and brings them in for first reading. In this way the members and the people in the country may have a look at them. The opposition can then consider them, evaluate their position and decide what position they will take in the course of the session to deal with them competently.

Here, however, we find ourselves in the position that 30 bills have not yet been exhibited. I understand the situation is different in many other parliamentary governments. When I was in the United Kingdom two or three years ago, I was told that the government knows how many bills it will introduce and the bills are prepared, introduced and available at the beginning of a session.

Mr. Drury: There is a time allocation.

Mr. Baldwin: There is a time allocation, but not the time allocation this government thinks there is. This government does not know the difference between time allocation and the kind of parliamentary system we should have here. The right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert referred to the difference between the presidential system and the parliamentary system. At least in the presidential system the president can appoint members of cabinet. This is precisely what the Prime Minister will now be able to do. However, in the United States every one of those appointments must be submitted to the Senate for advice and consent. The Prime Minister has mentioned that he would like to see a countervailing force. He has said it so often that some day I hope he will do something to bring it about.

It is necessary that government be strong. I have never denied the fact that under the circumstances of today, and the kind of society we have today, the government must be powerful and able to act quickly and efficiently. That cannot be down, however, unless this House is given the right to challenge, scrutinize and delay legislation if necessary. It is the parliamentary function of an opposition to delay if necessary and have a proper opportunity to see the legislation and deal intelligently with it. That is not a power which resides in this parliamentary system today. This government is now attempting to even weaken or limit what powers we have. Mr. Chairman, let no one say that the appointment of additional ministers of state or additional parliamentary secretaries will help the parliamentary system. In absolutely no way will this be the result. This is the reason we on this side of the House conceive it to be our duty to challenge the government on this issue.

My right hon. friend from Prince Albert and others have pointed out that this bill should not have been introduced in this fashion. There are aspects of this bill to which we might have given our approval in a minimum of time. But we would be derelict in our duty if we permitted this Prime Minister and this government to have this kind of power they wish to grasp. This is the name of the game for them. They want to have their hands on the levers of power so that they can manipulate things, not for the purposes of the country but for the purposes of the government and the party they represent. We would be derelict in our duty if we did not vigorously oppose this particular measure in this bill. The government must have been aware of this. There was no hesitation so far as this party was concerned in disclosing to the government the fact that we intended to oppose this vigorously and at length. I consider, from the correspondence I have received and from the observations I have read in the media, that the government is on the wrong side on this particular issue.

I think the government would be well advised to review its position and withdraw this particular part of the bill as well as the next part. The government has the power it needs, so I ask why in Heaven's name the government is insisting on proceeding with this particular clause. I have indicated there is administrative incompetence and bungling on the part of the government. There is no question about this. Why do they believe the appointment of five new ministers will help? Perhaps the President of the Treasury Board may have some answer to that, and I would be delighted to hear him. He looks as if he were ready to say something. Therefore, I shall sit down at this stage, and reserve the right to make a few more comments at a later stage, in the hope that the President of the Treasury Board will comment at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Latulippe: Mr. Chairman, I am glad to say a few words about the bill now under study. This bill is really bad when we consider all its wastefulness as well as the control it will give to some members of the administration.

Mr. Chairman, all parliament does is pass laws; it produces nothing. For the administration of taxpayers' property we now have hundreds of bodies which operate as best they can or nearly not at all.

We do not need new administrative tools, but more efficient ones. Should we fail to do that, it is futile to introduce other bills and complicate the situation even more by appointing new administrators with fantastic salaries which would contribute to raise government expenditures. All these new employees will not be able to do much more than today.

We provided ourselves with various tools: the Economic Council was established to give the government the tools required to have the economy operative. Several other commissions made suggestions to the government. They are there to advise the government on policy matters.

There are so many organizations which cost the taxpayers a mint of money, and still some people talk about setting up some more to solve the problem while the ones we now have are unable to ensure a better administration, because they are short of money. If we are to create new organizations and new ministries, more money will be required whereas there is still not enough of it for the ones now existing.

If we intend to increase taxes to enable these organizations to work properly, the Canadian taxpayers will no longer be able to pay because being already overtaxed they will go bankrupt and the majority of those who are now still thriving will eventually tumble down. The government will come clattering down drawing everything in its wake.

Mr. Chairman, the democratic system is the best system in the world but what is democracy? Democracy is an agreement that we commit ourselves to honour. But now the government does not care about it because it wants to take absolute control and do without members of the opposition, who were in fact elected by the people, have made the same commitments and are subject to the same regulations and the same laws as members of the government and agencies of the crown. However we find within these agencies officials who do not work efficiently because the necessary instruments are not available to them.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Some civil servants are efficient, some are so remarkable that their qualities beggar description. They do their job well, but they lack the required tools. It is therefore up to us to give those civil servants, and existing institutions, the tools required for their operations and the running of our economy. Establishing new institutions by way of new expenditures, new taxes and levies will not restore the balance of our economy which is completely out of kilter.

The only economic agency we need, Mr. Speaker, is one which would balance all sectors of our economy, allowing our financial machinery to fulfill its functions thoroughly. We should rather have an agency aimed at planning the financial aspect, so as to enable our economy to work properly.

Our organization is not working, not because there are not enough departments; in fact, there are too many. Every time we appoint new ministers or establish new agencies, we increase the administrative work. I dare say that since this government has been in office, the administration has increased by more than 60 or perhaps 70 per cent. The administration staff has increased and the people are getting fewer and fewer services.

The more we create new agencies, the fewer services will be provided to the people, and the more exasperated they will become. We must therefore react and create agencies capable of truly solving problems.

There is no need to make available to the public new departments or additional civil servants because they will not be able to work in the present economic system. It is impossible to put more things to work.

Before the war, there might have been fewer members of Parliament and departments than today, and yet, when war was declared, in a few days, an organization the like of which had never been seen or known in Canada, was put to work. All parts of Canada were organized and the economy of the country was put into action. Instead of creating new departments, the existing ones were put to use and it was said: This department will be responsible for this and that department will be responsible for that.

All the time the war lasted, Mr. Chairman, the economy of Canada kept going, although we went into debt.

We could do the same thing now, even though we are not at war, because the number of public servants has increased in all departments. The number of civil servants, of commissions that cost millions of dollars to the government and give nothing to the people, would justify action from the government. I think that we must oppose the establishment of these agencies as proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). We must reject the bill before us, because it brings no solution to the problems. We do need solutions, and efficient results for the people. We must know where we are going, and if these new agencies lead nowhere, we do not need them.

The Economic Council of Canada made many recommendations to the government.

It does not need new employees to carry out those recommendations, but more funds. It is therefore necessary to set up some organizations to make money available to Canadians and make financially possible what is materially possible. This is the role of our members. We would thus be doing something for the people.

We must not make the administration more intricate or increase the debts of Canadians which have already reached a maximum level. We cannot run further into debt because they are beginning to exceed our assets.

Under the present system, the more we are creating debts the more we are spreading dissatisfaction, because we have to make up those debts and deficits with all kinds of tax increases.

Mr. Chairman, 25 per cent of the population is on social welfare, 14 per cent of Canadians depend on economic assistance. This means that about 40 per cent of the budget is used only to keep Canadians alive, to pay them not to work, to allow them to exist. When things are that bad, it is not proper to increase the salary of one person or another, but we should rather save. It is time to buckle one's belt and to create new organisms to let people live.

There are plans to invest in order to find jobs for Canadians. The investments should not come from salary increases or the formation of new organizations. In fact, a large part of public money will be used for the administration of those agencies and there will be nothing left to look after the people.

When 75 per cent of the budget must go for administration, only 25 per cent remains to reorganize the economy and the government can no longer function. The government that leads the country today is almost a topsy-turvy government: they base themselves on false principles and refuse to see where the real problem lies instead of grabbing the bull by the horns, as good Canadians will say, to solve the problem.

They are always besides the problem, endeavouring to set up all sorts of organizations we cannot finance. Let us set up an organization capable of financing the administration of the country.

Some members agree with us on that score, and they have all the required competence to do even more. We therefore do not need any new organizations.

Mr. McCutcheon: Mr. Chairman, it is a delight to take part in this debate so late on Wednesday afternoon and to see such a large group in attendance on the government side. I should like to tell them that if they have anything better to do than sit and listen to me they might as well go ahead because I can assure them and their whip there will be no vote this afternoon.

An hon. Member: We will stay.

Mr. Drury: We have to have a quorum and there is no other way of keeping it.

An hon. Member: We would not miss it anyway, Mac.

Mr. McCutcheon: You are very kind and I shall try not to disappoint you. When the hon. member for Peace River spoke this afternoon he mentioned the dearth of legislative items brought forth by the government and suggested that this bill should have been split into four or five bills. Instead, it appears as an omnibus bill containing everything from pollution and government reoganization to the Prime Minister's patronage pork barrel.

There are to be five new cabinet ministers, and the group of followers and hangers on will include executive secretaries here in Ottawa as well as travelling executive secretaries in the constituencies. Imagine the bill for each ministry that will be foisted on the Canadian taxpayer. Will it be $1 million or $2 million? Mention has been made many times this afternoon of the proliferation of bureaucracy. An example of this is the staff around Information Canada, which is growing like a mushroom at the expense of the taxpayer. There must be several hundred people in there, some of them engaged in drawing nude posters.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And that should be done by the minister without portfolio.

Mr. McCutcheon: At the same time every other department of government is increasing its staff in order to disseminate favourable information about their departments and their lovable ministers.

Since 1963, when I first came to the House of Commons, there have been three organization bills. One was for the streamlining of procedures and was intended to cut down on overhead. What a bill of goods that was! Since 1963 the proliferation has been astronomical and now we have this, probably one of the woolliest pieces of legislation ever presented to this House. Those are not my words, Mr. Speaker, but the words of a very prominent law officer.

I have no hesitation in speaking at this time, thereby delaying this bill if that is what it takes to get the government to see the light. If the bill passes, this House of Commons will have lost any chance to scrutinize the cost of these ministries and departments because their operations will be at the discretion of the cabinet. I should like to say there is one part of this bill of which I approve. After all, who in this chamber can oppose a measure to curtail pollution? I also approve the minister who has been earmarked for that job, Mr. Chairman. In my opinion, the Hon. Jack Davis is a dedicated man and will do a good job in that position.

Mr. Baldwin: He is just unfortunate in his choice of colleagues.

Mr. McCutcheon: But, Mr. Chairman, how can I vote in favour of supporting Jack Davis, as I desire to do, when I have to support the rest of the hodge-podge contained in the bill? To go further, I will not oppose the reinstatement of the Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté, Minister without Portfolio in charge of the Post Office. In my humble opinion the government did the country a disservice when he was removed as Postmaster General, especially when Eric the Wrecker was put in charge of that department.

Mr. Bigg: A $100 million loss!

Mr. McCutcheon: We may never know what we lost through that appointment, and I should like to support the reinstatement of Mr. Côté. Having said that, I am not prepared to support such bad legislation as this part of the bill is, merely because there are two or three desirable by-products in it.

• (5:50 p.m.)

I have already voiced my opposition to the preferential treatment, as incorporated in this bill, that is being accorded to certain high ranking civil servants. I know that the government is very well disposed to the elite class and is not so concerned about ordinary folks. I have already pointed out my criticism of the pension arrangements for department heads, and I shall have more to say about that later.

Now, we come to the pork barrel part of the bill. There are to be five new ministers of state and five new parliamentary secretaries. I do not know if I am accurate in saying that. The man in whose name this bill stands does not deign to favour this place with his presence in order that we can ask him questions about how many appointments there will be. Under the old act not more than 16 parliamentary secretaries could be appointed. There are 27 ministers, plus the Prime Minister. Now, we are to add five ministers of state, making a total of 32 ministers, and more parliamentary secretaries. Will there be ten more parliamentary secretaries or will there be 16 more? Are we to double the number of parliamentary secretaries? I do not know and nobody on the government side seems to have the answer.

Mr. Drury: Read the bill.

Mr. McCutcheon: How many more civil servants will there be? How many more people will work in the offices of these ministers? Will this cost us $2 million per year of $200 million? How many more people will be drawn from the press gallery to fill this vacuum and this need?

Since 1968 a large percentage of people have been siphoned off from the press gallery. How does this happen, Mr. Chairman? Well, let us say that a member of the gallery has shown some sympathy for the administration in his reporting. Some of this, I suggest, may have been perfectly legitimate. He has expressed an honest opinion about government action, let us say. There have been rare occasions on which the government could be applauded.

An hon. Member: Name one.

Mr. McCutcheon: If, however, a second article appears that is friendly or biased in favour of the government, something like this takes place probably, and this explains the proliferation of certain types of people in ministers' offices. A former member of the press gallery, who is now a government employee, will approach the member of the press gallery in question and say, "Let's have a coffee, or a coke." Then, the conversation will start something like this: "Say, did you know that Joe Greene is looking for a PR writer; did you know that Bryce Mackasey would like to get one; have you heard that Jean-Luc Pepin needs somebody in his department?"

Mr. Bigg: To explain what the minister means.

Mr. McCutcheon: So, the conversation continues in this vein. Then, the former press gallery member might say, "Would you be interested?" The reply might be, "Well I don't know; I am getting along pretty well." Then, he would be told, "Well now, remember the job pays $5,000 more than you are getting." After all, this is the taxpayers' money and to heck with the expense. This offer would be very tempting, Mr. Chairman, because I can assure you that, by and large, publishers are notorious skinflints.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McCutcheon: What has been the effect of this, Mr. Chairman? Every cloud has a silver lining. The bulk of those in the press gallery who are prepared to prostitute their trade for political or monetary advancement is gone.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But there are none like that.

Mr. McCutcheon: I would draw to your attention the fact that for some time now the quality and fairness of news reports emanating from this place has improved markedly, and the news is not so slanted. I suspect that those who are still left in the gallery are dedicated to their craft. They are still reporters.

Mr. Whelan: You are being reported now, Mac. The man in the gallery is writing down what is being said. He likes it.

Mr. McCutcheon: I suspect that the majority of those in the gallery who would prostitute their craft for monetary and political gain are gone. However, there are probably enough left to fill the opportunities that the enlargement of the executive will no doubt provide. In his remarks, the hon. member for Red Deer described how 139 government members could get extra money out of the treasury. I suggest that that would be hardly enough to satisfy the boys over there.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the President of the Treasury Board if we can expect to continue with this bill tomorrow. I imagine that quite a number of government members wish to speak. Will we carry on with this measure tomorrow?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I think the House Leader intends to present, hopefully for rapid disposal, three bills dealing with veterans' affairs. After that, we would continue with this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): As I gazed around on this beautiful day I found that winter has almost gone. Spring seems to have injected fresh energy into our debates. I wish hon. members a quiet and restful evening. It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until two o'clock tomorrow.

At six o'clock the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE IN SPEAKER'S GALLERY OF DELEGATION REPRESENTING NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF CZECHOSLOVAKIA

Mr. Speaker: May I bring to the attention of hon. members the presence in the Speaker's gallery of an important delegation representing the National Assembly of Czechoslovakia. This delegation is under the distinguished leadership of the President of the National Assembly of Czechoslovakia, Dr. Hanes, who, being a very renowned, well-known, highly respected and distinguished member of the legal profession and professor of law at the University of Bratislava, has acquired in his country and in Europe a fine reputation as a very distinguished parliamentarian. Hon. members welcome Dr. Hanes and his delegation to Canada and to the Parliament of our country.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

YOUTH

INFORMATION ON OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM —REQUEST FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO MOVE MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43 I propose to ask unanimous consent to move a motion on a matter of pressing and urgent necessity. Students and graduates throughout Canada are having difficulty in getting accurate information about the Opportunities for Youth programs. Their prospects for earning money are prejudiced by late information, vague information, and closing deadlines. I would therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Lundrigan):

That this House urges the government to extend the deadlines for the youth programs and simultaneously initiate crash programs using all forms of mass media appropriate to the various regions of Canada, to inform and guide students and voluntary bodies about these programs and, in particular, with respect to the policy for submitting project proposals.

Mr. Speaker: Hon. members have heard the motion proposed by the hon. member. By virtue of the terms of Standing Order 43 this motion requires unanimous consent of the House.

[Translation]

I must therefore have unanimous consent of the House.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: There is not unanimity. The hon. member's motion cannot be put at this time.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

LABOUR RELATIONS

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—POSTPONEMENT OF DEADLINE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour relating to the announcement by the locomotive engineers that they will be going on strike at the first of the week, which I know is a matter of great concern to the minister as it is to all Canadians. Has the minister anything he can report on this problem?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker. First of all I would like the House to note in a positive vein that at six or seven o'clock this morning the non-operating unions, representing 55,000 railway workers, signed an agreement subject to ratification, and that the engineers, with whom I met last evening, are resuming negotiations with the CNR and in all probability with the CPR as well later this afternoon, probably about 2.30.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that all elements for a settlement are in place, and I can only remind the railways, as well as the unions, of their obligation to the people who are not directly represented at the bargaining table, the farmers and the other people affected by the slowdown or wildcatting who could be detrimentally affected by a long strike. The responsibility now lies on the railways as well as on the men to realize their obligation to the Canadian people.

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the optimism of the minister, has he approached the representatives of the engineers' union or, if not, would he do so with a view to examining the possibilities of a postponement of a strike in any event, since the minister seems to suggest that some settlement may be worked out? I ask this question in view of the very disastrous effects such a strike would have on the economy.

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I think the suggestion is a reasonable one. It is one that has already occurred to us, but it would only be fruitful if between now and Sunday there are some obvious signs of progress. When I say I am optimistic, I mean I am optimistic in the sense that both sides are resuming negotiations. This thought had occurred to me and I shall repeat it to the union later today.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—NUMBER OF VESSELS WAITING FOR GRAIN AT VANCOUVER

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister who reports for the Wheat Board how many vessels are waiting on the west coast for the loading of grain which the elevators are unable to provide to them?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Vessels are still loading at the west coast, Mr. Speaker. The report I had on yesterday's situation was that seven vessels were loading, eight were waiting and three more were expected to arrive soon. Stocks, of course, have been reduced quite remarkably at Vancouver.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—POSTPONEMENT OF DEADLINE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. All members and all Canadians will be very pleased that the minister has been able to persuade the representatives of both the railways and the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers to resume negotiations. I should like to ask the minister if he has urged that the deadline for the strike, which is called for twelve o'clock noon on Monday, be postponed if the deliberations today and tomorrow indicate that a settlement may be in the offing?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Yes Mr. Speaker, I have urged this in a very gentle and persuasive way, I can assure the House. In addition, we have the problem of the engineers who are already on strike on the west coast. I think the House can appreciate that in so far as farmers on the Prairies and the people of British Columbia are concerned, in a sense the strike is already in progress. I would hope that that particular group of engineers, who will be meeting again at two o'clock this afternoon in Vancouver, will show their good faith and their concern for what could be a very serious emergency by returning to work in the interim. This would hasten the possibility of postponing the deadline.

Mr. Douglas: In view of the meeting being held on the west coast with those who are already out on strike, I should like to ask the minister who is representing him at this meeting with the locomotive engineers in Vancouver?

Mr. Mackasey: At the moment, Mr. Speaker, Don Tyso, head of the Department of Labour branch office in Vancouver, is there as well as my parliamentary secretary who is acting in his capacity as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Labour. Both are on the scene in Vancouver and are working as closely as possible with the engineers to reassure them that everything possible is being done by the negotiating team in Montreal.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—WAGE INCREASE OFFERED BY CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Labour could advise the House what increase in wages has been offered by the Canadian National Railways?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I just cannot divulge that. I think the hon. member should understand that in the negotiations it is not simply a question of money but also a question of work rules and safety in certain parts of the country. While money is important it is not the only consideration.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—POLICY ON KEEPING VANCOUVER GRAIN STORAGE CAPACITY FILLED

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the fact that most types of grain stocks in store at Vancouver terminals are presently depleted and that if storage facilities had been filled at Vancouver loading could have continued for another week or ten days and all the ships in port could have been filled regardless of the strike, is the minister prepared to reassess his position with regard to keeping terminal storage filled?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the position of the Wheat Board has been a most reasonable one. Their objective has been to maintain stocks at Vancouver as close to 15 million bushels as possible. In their judgment this figure allows for the maximum efficient use of the terminals in order to get the high throughput that is required with the record loadings which are going on and are anticipated. The stocks remained at 15 million bushels until early in the year. At that time the beginnings of labour difficulties reduced the efficiency of the transportation of grain and lost, in the opinion of the Wheat Board, effectively one week's unloadings at Vancouver. But even as late as March 10, and notwithstanding these difficulties, stocks were at 12.3 million bushels of grain, apart from screenings, at that terminal. I think the Wheat Board is to be commended for doing what they have done in keeping stocks there and in keeping the terminals operating as efficiently as possible in those difficult circumstances.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister who reports for the Wheat Board whether any extraordinary measures were taken to replenish and, indeed, to increase stocks of wheat to full capacity at Vancouver and west coast points in view of the difficulties with regard to railway negotiations which must have been apparent to the minister?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As difficulties occurred during the earlier months of this year, the Wheat Board, operating through the block system, alternated orders to the opposite railroad as required in an attempt to keep stocks up. This created some difficulties, however, and made it more difficult to put the required grain in place. Some particular kinds of grain are handled, by the nature of things, more by the Canadian National than by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and this creates particular difficulties. The Wheat Board tried in every way to adjust its shipping schedules to keep stocks as high as possible and to have the right stocks there to meet the vessels which were expected.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—AVAILABILITY OF BOXCARS FOLLOWING SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether he has a crash program to be put into effect immediately after the strike is settled in order that all boxcars available may be directed toward Vancouver, inasmuch as there has been a delay in the opening of the seaway, so that ships will not need to be diverted or delayed in loading?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there is a very large number of boxcars actually under load for the western region now, so that the determining factor in building up stocks again at Vancouver will be the capacity of the terminals to unload those cars rather than the supply of cars. I think I can assure the hon. member about the supply of cars available and already loaded for that movement.

Inquiries of the Ministry

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—SPOTTING OF GRAIN CARS ALREADY IN VANCOUVER YARDS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct my question to the Minister of Labour. It also concerns the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. Since more than 1.5 million bushels, or over 700 carloads, of grain are on hand in the yards at Vancouver and since the strike is slated to commence at noon, Monday, would the two ministers concerned—and I specifically ask the Minister of Labour—endeavour to persuade the enginemen involved in yard services at Vancouver and the railroads to make every effort to spot those 700 cars between now and next Monday so that an additional 1.5 million bushels may be unloaded?

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think that is a very progressive suggestion and I will contact them immediately. I wonder if I might also be allowed to say that in my efforts to get the men back to work in Vancouver I have been ably assisted by the hon. member for Moose Jaw and the hon. member for London East, both of whom are members of that particular union. Their efforts have been greatly appreciated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—POLICY RESPECTING UTILIZATION OF VANCOUVER GRAIN STORAGE CAPACITY

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister in charge of the Wheat Board a supplementary question. Am I to understand from his answer that it is the settled policy of the Wheat Board and of his department to keep 10 million bushels of the 25 million bushel capacity on the west coast vacant or as working space? Is that what the minister said?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. I should first of all point out my reference to screenings, which is not an inconsiderable quantity. Sometimes some millions of bushels of capacity can be taken up in that way. The objective of the Wheat Board is to assure that stocks are at such levels that boats can be met and also in order that the terminals themselves can operate with maximum efficiency. We are facing a period of months, and have been, when we will be testing the capacity of the terminals to put grain through them, and it is therefore extremely important that stocks do not rise above levels which allow the most efficient operation of those terminals. In the opinion of the Wheat Board, that would be about 15 million bushels of grain.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—GRAIN SALES LOST BECAUSE OF LABOUR UNREST

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): I have a supplementary question for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Can he inform the House as to the amount of sales that have been lost because of the unfortunate labour unrest on the west coast and does he anticipate any further losses in grain sales due to this unfortunate situation?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have been continually heartened by the extremely effective work of my colleague, the Minister of Labour. I share with him the optimism that the threat of a strike for any long period of time across the country may yet be avoided. The difficulties in the west, through what is effectively a strike, during the past week or so have certainly inconvenienced the flow of grain, but there is no evidence yet of any lost sales. Of course, the effective operation of the port of Vancouver is a part of our over-all position in promoting sales of grain in that direction out of Canada. This is why I share the concern and hope of the Minister of Labour that the parties come to an agreement so that we do not face additional difficulties.

IMPENDING STRIKE BY LOCOMOTIVE ENGINEERS—STOCK OF GRAIN ON HAND AT VANCOUVER—NUMBER OF SHIPS THAT CAN BE LOADED

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): My supplementary question is also for the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Can the minister indicate how much stock there is in Vancouver at the present time and how many ships can be loaded with the existing stock?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not have an up to the moment figure. According to yesterday's figure, I believe stocks had been reduced to something in the order of five million bushels. There were seven boats at berth still taking on grain. Some boats were waiting for which no grain was available in the Vancouver terminal at that point in time. The type of grain for which they were waiting was not available in the terminals. Until further unloadings take place, those ships cannot be loaded.

Mr. Speaker: There are still a number of hon. members who want to ask supplementaries about this same matter. I realize how important it is, but perhaps at an early moment we might give consideration to going on to another subject and eventually returning to this very important matter. I will recognize supplementaries for a few minutes, beginning with the hon. member for Edmonton Centre.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): My question is for the Minister of Labour. Now that there seems to be some success in the strike negotiations, is the minister having Information Canada prepare five-foot, glossy photos of himself for distribution to union locals?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This may be the moment at which we should go on to another subject.

[Mr. McIntosh.]

AGRICULTURE

FEED GRAIN—MEASURES TO ESTABLISH PRICE PARITY BETWEEN EASTERN AND WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Agriculture.

In view of the fact that since November 1970, feed grains in Montreal's harbour cost twice as much to eastern farmers as they do to their western counterparts, does the minister or his department consider taking steps to improve the situation in order to achieve cost parity between eastern and western producers?

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there has been no significant change in the cost of transportation. There has been an increase in the price of feed grains all across Canada, perhaps more in western Canada than in eastern Canada. If the hon. member is addressing himself to whether or not we are going to do something about this, I do not think that we are intending to take action that would reduce these prices because until recently they have been at very depressed levels.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary to the hon. Minister of Agriculture.

Could he at least commission a study by officials in his department to ensure that eastern producers are not penalized with respect to production costs while western producers are in a privileged situation in this regard?

[English]

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise on which that question is based.

UNITED NATIONS

REPORTED CONSIDERATION OF HOLDING ASSEMBLY MEETING IN GENEVA—CANADIAN POSITION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in connection with the reported consideration being given to the matter of having the United Nations Assembly meet in Geneva. What is Canada's attitude in this regard? As the United States will be facing a presidential election next year, has it taken a stand that if removed from the United States it would be more conducive to arriving at an agreement in the assembly on the Israeli-Arab question than would otherwise be the case? What are the reasons this change is being considered?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Like the right hon. member, Mr. Speaker, I heard the report on television last night and on the radio this morning. It was the first report I had heard of this possibility. It has not been considered or brought before the Canadian government or, so far as I know, before the United Nations. Personally, I would not accept the reasons given for the change of venue because I believe this would do damage to the United Nations.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I say I am inclined to agree with the minster's view, I would ask him whether the spokesman, for the CBC, if I may use that expression, spoke with the authority of a representative for our country in New York, and has any member of the establishment in the Department of External Affairs communicated with him to find out why the CBC representative has better sources of information than the minister himself?

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

POSSIBLE REVISION OF POLICY—STATEMENT BY MEMBER FOR MATANE

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the hon. Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

In view of today's Canadian Press report to the effect that the member for Matane (Mr. De Bané) has said that the government should as soon as possible revise its regional development policy which is bound to fail because nobody wants to pay for it, does the hon. minister intend to revise the orientation of his regional development policy in order to invest more money in the underdevelopped areas of the country with a view to fighting unemployment and poverty more efficiently?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I shall meet with the hon. member and inquire as to his exact words before making any comments.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED HANDING OVER OF FILM OF ALTERCATION BETWEEN LABOUR BODIES TO MONTREAL POLICE

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State arising out of a report that the CBC had handed over to the police in Montreal some film taken of an altercation between two labour bodies in the city of Quebec a week or more ago. Is the minister aware that this was done by the CBC? If not, would he look into the matter and also find out whether it has become the policy of the corporation to give film taken of people who were not aware of the purpose of the film to the police?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of those facts, but I shall inquire in order to give the hon. member an answer.

NATIONAL SECURITY

DISCUSSION WITH QUEBEC ON ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL PROVINCIAL SECURITY AGENCIES

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General whether there has been any discussion with the government of Quebec on the question of the establishment of special security agencies in that province to anticipate terrorists and to gather inside information on terrorists, and does the government consider such proposition to be constitutional?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, we are in constant communication with Quebec Provincial Police authorities and when they ask us to help them in their work, we do the best we can within this framework. It is not up to us to decide what their structures will be and what kind of organization they will set up.

Mr. Baldwin: Have the government of Quebec complained to the minister or to the government of Canada that the traditional law enforcement agencies are not adequate and for that reason they are contemplating these new measures?

[Translation]

Mr. Goyer: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that in the area of internal security, the provinces are responsible for law enforcement within their territory. As far as we are concerned, we have to collect all useful information to keep the government advised of what is going on in the country.

FINANCE

FREEING OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MEASURES TO ASSIST INDUSTRY

Mr. René Émard (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Following the decision of the Finance Department to let the Canadian dollar fluctuate freely on the international market, the minister stated that if some industries were hurt, they would be helped through special measures. Is the minister ready to tell us what measures he intends to take?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, if one looks back at the statement I made at the time one will see I indicated that there were measures within the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce to help industries of this sort.

FREEING OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES OF PULP AND PAPER INDUSTRY

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Yesterday the Minister of Finance stated in the House that the difficulties of the pulp and paper industry do not arise only from the unpegging of the Canadian dollar. Could he tell the House if his officials or himself are aware of the other known factors bearing on the present financial difficulties of the pulp and paper industry?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday that it was not the sole reason. I think part of the difficulty might be explained as well by the 30 per cent wage settlement that they reached last year.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REMOVAL OF UNEXPLODED AMMUNITION FROM MEAFORD TANK RANGE

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact that there is a large quantity of unexploded ammunition scattered over several areas of the Meaford tank range and that this is a constant danger to people wandering over the property which is unguarded, would the minister give early consideration to using some of our unemployed people, under proper supervision, on the job of cleaning up this menace?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the method suggested by the hon. member does seem a little drastic. However, I might inform him that the Defence Research Board has under way a study of processes by which ammunition might be searched out of the ground and made harmless by somewhat less dangerous methods than the hon. member suggests.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

REPORT ON FUTURE PLANS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the statement by officials of the Cape Breton Development Corporation on March 8 that they would be presenting the minister with their future plans and recommendations for an economic blueprint for Cape Breton on March 31, may I ask the minister whether he has received such report? If so, how soon will it be made public?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I have not received the report yet and I must receive it before I can decide when it will be made public.

Mr. Muir: A supplementary question. Is today's date of any significance since the minister has not received the report?

[Mr. Benson.]

HEALTH

INCREASE IN FUNDS TO COMBAT ALCOHOLISM

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I want to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Having in mind the approximately $1 million a day federal tax income from the sale of alcohol and the almost total absence of any federal funds to combat alcoholism, may I ask the minister whether he is giving consideration to increasing the funds for that very necessary purpose?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe on the health side the Department of National Health and Welfare is funding various programs, not only generally but with particular reference to the Indian community, who themselves have submitted projects for financial support. On the welfare side, through the Canada Assistance Plan we are assisting the provinces in the treatment of alcoholics, and so on, who fall within the category of needy persons.

YOUTH

OPPORTUNITIES FOR YOUTH PROGRAM—SUBMISSIONS OF APPLICATIONS TO FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Referring to his answer yesterday to the hon. member for Roberval with regard to the right of veto of the province of Quebec in the case of youth programs, the minister said that the information of the member for Roberval was incomplete and erroneous. In the meantime, the Quebec government, through Mr. Bourassa, stated that the province had secured the right to veto any federal initiative in the field of student employment.

In view of those contradictory statements, I ask the minister specifically whether the federal government will have the final say with regard to any student program?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I want to stress above all, Mr. Speaker, that the two statements are not contradictory, as the hon. member claims. I will read back what I said yesterday: —that the federal and provincial governments had agreed to make joint decisions which do not adversely affect the priorities of the one or the others.

Whether the hon. member wants to call it having a say in the matter, or veto rights, or whatever he wants to call it, I repeat that what is actually involved is making joint decisions compatible with priorities of both governments.

Mr. La Salle: In view of this reply, Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us whether the federal government, should it decide to implement a project, would need the agreement of Quebec to do so?

Mr. Pelletier: I have said before and I say so once more, that an official will be delegated to take decisions jointly with us and the federal government's final course, lacking agreement of Quebec or another province, would be to cancel any project about which there was no agreement.

Hon. Théogène Ricard (Saint-Hyacinthe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

Would the minister then give an explanation concerning Mr. Quenneville's statement to the effect that Quebec would have the last word in this matter?

Mr. Pelletier: I do not see how, Mr. Speaker, I could be asked to interpret the statements of all provincial ministers in Canada. This would be quite difficult and would require a great deal of work.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

STATE OF FUND—STIMULATION OF ECONOMY TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT AND BENEFIT PAYMENTS

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Can he bring the House up to date on the present state of the unemployment insurance fund?

Hon E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would have to get up to date figures for my hon. friend.

Mr. Hees: I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. As the heavy withdrawals from that fund have been considerably added to by the additional unemployment caused by the serious drop in retail sales, export sales and freight car loadings which has taken place since the first of the year, has the government given consideration to slowing down these very rapid withdrawals from the fund by stimulating the economy and thereby reducing the unemployment which is causing these withdrawals?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, that was a pretty good speech. I am sure my hon. friend is upset that all signs are that the economy is turning upward.

Mr. Hees: A further supplementary—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for a supplementary but we are running short of time again and there are a number of members who tried to ask questions yesterday who are still trying today. I would invite the members of all parties on the front benches to give a chance to their distinguished colleagues at the back of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's answer I should like to ask him if he would advise the House just how high unemployment must rise before the government snaps itself out of its monolithic lethargy and does something to halt growing unemployment?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PROTESTS BY TEACHERS AGAINST INCLUSION IN NEW PROGRAM—COST-BENEFIT RATIO

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to a question my colleague on the front bench addressed to the Minister of Labour in respect of unemployment insurance. Would the minister indicate to the House how many letters he has received from teachers and teachers' groups protesting the inclusion of the teaching profession in the new unemployment insurance program? Also, in researching the legislation, was a figure arrived at in respect of the cost-benefit ratio for teachers in contributing to unemployment insurance unde rthe new program, and what was that figure?

Mr. Speaker: The member is asking for what obviously is statistical information. This kind of question should be placed on the order paper. As an alternative, the member knows that the bill to which he is referring will be before the House in due course and I would think that would be the time to seek this kind of information.

COMMERCIAL CARRY-OVER OF WHEAT—MENZIES COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION—DISCUSSION OF REPORT WITH FARM ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Is the government accepting the principle that there be no commercial carry-over of wheat in excess of 200 million bushels as outlined in the Menzies report on grain marketing?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we will certainly be examining very closely with the Wheat Board the view of the Menzies committee. The Wheat Board itself had drawn some conclusions about the amount of wheat which would be required in commercial storage positions and is satisfied that 250 million bushels is adequate. They may review the situation further in view of the Menzies committee's recommendation.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It would seem to me that we are to some extent returning to the original question. There are again eight, nine or ten supplementaries sought on this subject. Perhaps hon. members would want to finish the question period on this subject. For the moment the Chair will recognize the hon. member for Vegreville on a supplementary.

Mr. Mazankowski: This is not a supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lisgar on a supplementary.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary to the minister responsible for the Wheat Board. Is the government considering holding any form of hearings in western Canada to discuss the Menzies report with farm organizations and particularly producer organizations?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we will certainly be interested in having consultations with these organizations as we have in the past in respect of various proposals and measures that have been put forward. I personally will look forward to receiving the views of these organizations on both formal and informal occasions.

FUTURE USE OF RIVERS AIR BASE

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. Has his department reached a decision on the future use of the Rivers air base and, if not, when can Manitoba expect an announcement?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, we are in contact with the Manitoba government with regard to the two bases of Rivers and Gimli. As soon as an agreement is reached with the Manitoba government, I will be happy to inform the House.

[Later:]

Mr. Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, as Rivers is facing slow death as a result of no action, is the minister's department assisting the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in its negotiations for the base and what is the state of these negotiations?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is the one most involved in the Rivers base. I do not know what the situation is right now but I will get the information from that department and I can supply it to the hon. gentleman.

NATURE OF NEW PROGRAMS FOR PRAIRIE PROVINCES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In light of the fact he has announced that there will be new programs under his department assigned to the Prairie provinces, can the minister indicate whether these programs will take the form of extensions to existing designated regions or will take the form of extra special areas as was announced last year?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to know to what statement the hon. member is referring.

Mr. Mazankowski: I am referring to a Canadian Press article of March 30.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

USE OF FULL CAPACITY OF VANCOUVER TERMINAL ELEVATORS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the minister who reports for the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of his intimation that perhaps as many as 10 million bushels of the capacity of the Vancouver terminal grain elevators cannot be used in association with maximum efficiency in terms of loading, has a study been undertaken concerning what would be involved in enabling the total capacity to be used efficiently, has that study been completed, has a decision been made to implement such a program, and what would it cost?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think one should appreciate that, in the nature of grain handling operations, when you are handling many grades of grain at many stages from unloading through clearing to loading on ships, it is inevitable that you must have additional apparent capacity compared with the usable capacity to have the terminals operate at peak efficiency. This is universally true and not something that exists specially in the Vancouver region.

Mr. Stanfield: Am I to take it, Mr. Speaker, that the minister regards the effective capacity of the elevators and the loading system at Vancouver as amounting to some 15 million bushels and that no plans are under way to adopt a program to enable increased use of the storage capacity which exists there?

Mr. Lang: The point I was making is that the terminals are designed essentially to serve the function of putting grain through rather than holding it. The important factor is the quantity of grain which can go through. We have in the months of January, February and March put through Vancouver a record quantity of grain, more than ever before in those months in our history.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me we are at this point entering the field of debate and running short of time as well.

Mr. Marshall: May I redirect my question to the Secretary of State, Mr. Speaker? I will repeat it. BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT—EASTER RECESS

Mr. Baldwin: May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to ask the President of the Privy Council about the business for the rest of this week and next week, and whether or not there is any change contemplated in the date for the beginning of the Easter recess in light of the situation in western Canada?

Mr. MacEachen: The present plan is to adjourn for the Easter recess on April 7, next Wednesday, and to return on Monday, April 19. It may be that developing events will influence those dates; I cannot say.

We shall continue with the government organization bill after we have completed the three veterans bills, which will be called first today. I have the textile bill very much in mind also and, hopefully, will confer with the House leaders as to the manner in which we might dispose of items of business before the Easter recess, keeping in mind that after we have disposed of the government organization bill as the next major item I should like to call one of the labour bills, probably the unemployment insurance legislation.

Mr. McGrath: In view of the fact that 12 standing committees of the House are meeting today, requiring the presence of more members of the House than, I suspect, are present, and in view of the fact that some of those committees are meeting without a quorum and hearing evidence, and also bearing in mind that the House is sitting in Committee of the Whole on an important measure, the government organization bill, is the leader of the House giving consideration to revising the whole system of committees with a view to reducing the number of committees which are sitting and making them more omnibus in their nature?

Mr. MacEachen: I have under very active consideration the difficulty which is posed when the Committee of the Whole is sitting at the same time as a large number of standing committees. As the hon. member knows, on the last occasion a large number of these committees were meeting while this bill was under consideration in Committee of the Whole, several of the sittings of other committees were adjourned because the attendance of members was required in Committee of the Whole. It might be necessary to do that later today if we complete the veterans bills while the standing committees are in session.

Mr. McGrath: Since the fact that these 12 standing committees are meeting makes it impossible for hon. members to attend to their duties in a practical way, do I understand that these committees will not be required to function today if the House is to meet in Committee of the Whole to consider the government organization bill?

Mr. MacEachen: That is not necessarily the conclusion. If we do reach the government organization bill while these committees are meeting and members are required in the House, then it might be possible to make arrangements of that kind.

Mr. Ricard: Why does the leader of the House not undertake now to have the textile bill considered first and then proceed with the organization bill?

An hon. Member: Your party is against it; that's why.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacEachen: I am very keen on getting the textile bill completed but we have made arrangements to begin this afternoon with the veterans bills.

CIVILIAN WAR PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE PAYMENTS

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-232, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: When shall this bill be read the third time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Dubé moved that the bill be read for the third time and do pass.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT, 1952

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE TABLE AND CEILING OF ALLOWANCES

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved that Bill C-233, to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952, as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Dubé moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. William Knowles (Norfolk-Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House are very pleased to see the high priority which has been given to this piece of legislation. It is important that it should be passed now, and I shall take only three or four minutes so as not to impede the progress of the bill.

First, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all members of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs I would like to say how much we missed the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Legault) who has been hospitalized as a result of a coronary. We hope he will soon be restored to good health. The hon. member for Sarnia-Lambton (Mr. Cullen), as vice-chairman of the committee, was able to substitute in a very commendable manner and to maintain the same decorum, the same spirit of co-operation and of non-partisanship that characterizes that committee.

The object of all members of the committee, as always, was to improve the lot of our veterans. After all, they are the people who gave of themselves in the cause of our country. The very best evidence of the correctness of the decision which Your Honour made when you suggested that these items be taken out of the estimates and introduced as three specific pieces of legislation, came when a very useful amplification of the legislation was given to the committee. The committee hearings provided an opportunity for the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) to clarify some of the rather hazy clauses, and the results which their passage would have upon veterans. A lot of us did not know what was involved, and I am sure a great many of the veterans did not know either, at least to judge by the number of letters which all hon. members received from them.

The minister's presence was much appreciated. His statements were also greatly appreciated, particularly the one relating to veterans allowances. It was on that matter that a great deal of confusion originally existed. Veterans are now being asked to apply for old age security pensions and guaranteed income supplements. We wondered how this would affect their status as veterans. The thing that bothered a lot of people was that a veteran may now be forced to pay income tax on his old age security pension and supplement, whereas he was exempt from income tax on his war veterans allowance. In the committee the minister was not able to say whether, in fact, this would be the case. He said it would be up to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Gray) to decide whether or not this portion of a veteran's income would still be exempt from income tax.

One other small point which was raised concerned the fact that under the proposed new arrangement a veteran cannot live outside Canada for a whole year. For example, if he happens to have good friends who are able to take him away for a long holiday, say to the southern United States, he must return to Canada to qualify for pension, as do all people under the old age security pension scheme.

There were some other minor benefits about which we were also concerned, but again I say that Your Honour's decision meant that specific legislation had to be introduced and this enabled members of the committee to be enlightened further on the subject. Having made these few comments, may I add that we in this party are more than willing to give third reading to these important pieces of legislation. Our only regret is that it took so long to have them introduced. Since it took so long, we think the proposed benefits should be made retroactive to January 1, 1971, instead of coming into force on April 1, as is now the case.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I join with my namesake, the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles), in expressing our regret at the illness of the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Legault). We all wish him an early and speedy recovery.

Your Honour will recall that on Wednesday, March 10, when you ruled on a point of order having to do with the use of dollar items to effect certain kinds of legislation, you expressed the hope that although your ruling was going to make it necessary to have three separate bills introduced, nevertheless, since these matters related to veterans, the House would expedite the handling of this legislation. I can assure you that you expressed at that time the view of members generally. We dealt with this legislation expeditiously in Committee and are most anxious that there be no delay whatsoever in putting into effect the three bills, third reading of which we are dealing with this afternoon.

As the House is aware, we have already given third reading to Bill C-232, to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, without debate, and unless somebody upsets the understanding the same will happen to Bill C-234, the bill to amend the Pension Act. But some of us feel that with respect to the War Veterans Allowance Act amending bill, there are a few things that should be said. Since I have indicated that we are not debating the other two bills, perhaps I might be permitted just to say that we welcome the 10 per cent increase in disability pensions provided in the next bill. We wish it were more, but we know that at this stage of the game the chances of getting an increase are not enhanced by further debate. That is why we are giving our approval to the other two bills without debate.

However, with respect to the changes in the War Veterans Allowance Act, although we welcome the increase of 15 per cent in the amount that can be paid as an allowance to war veterans allowance recipients, there are some ancillary things that have been done which we do not like and some things that ought to have been done which are not before us. What is happening is that the maximum amount that can be paid in the case of a single war veterans allowance recipient is being raised by 15 per cent from $105 a month to $121 a month. In the case of a married recipient, it is being raised from $175 a month by 15 per cent to the new figure $201 a month. In the case of these increases, it is roughly 15 per cent or it is 15 per cent, in round figures.

When it came to adjusting the ceilings on permissible income however, remembering that these allowances are under a means test, the government did not raise the ceilings by 15 per cent but only by the same dollar amount as the increases in the allowances themselves. The result is that the increase in the permissible income for a single war veterans allowance recipient is only 11 per cent and for a married recipient it is only 10 per cent. I should like to point out also that the amount of other income that a war veterans recipient can earn and still draw the full war veterans allowance is less than it was a number of years ago. We do not like that; we think the move should be in the other direction.

When the minister announced the changes on December 2, 1970, I pointed out that one of the effects of the new ceilings on the war veterans allowance payments, and the new provisions under the guaranteed income supplement, is that the preferential position of veterans on the war veterans allowance as compared with civilian pensioners has been narrowed. Under the former legislation a single war veterans allowance recipient could have, as a combination, $145 a month. At that point the ceiling for a person on the guaranteed income supplement was $105 a month. In other words, the single war veterans allowance recipient enjoyed a preference of $40 a month. Now, however, the ceiling on the income that a single war veterans allowance recipient can have is $161 a month, and the maximum under the old age security and guaranteed income supplement is $135 a month, so the difference is only $26 a month. In other words, the single war veterans allowance recipient who is unable to work and has no other income now has an advantage, and most of us in this House think he should have an advantage over the non-veteran, of $14 a month less than was the case before these two pieces of legislation were changed.

Under the former setup the married war veterans allowance recipient could receive $245 a month; under the guaranteed income supplement it was $210 a month or a spread of $35. That has been reduced. Now, the maximum permissible income under the War Veterans Allowance Act will be $271 a month as opposed to $225 a month combined old age security and guaranteed income supplement. In other words, the married war veterans allowance recipient's preference has been reduced from $35 a month to $16 a month. I think I am quite justified in saying that in these cases veterans are being short changed. They are being given $14 less preference if single and $19 less if married. I do not think the people of Canada feel that we should short change our veterans that way.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

These matters, Mr. Speaker, relating to the income that war veterans may have and still receive the war veterans allowance, are not covered directly by statute. The Statute permits the war veterans allowance board to deal with them by regulation and many of the changes to which I object have been made by regulation. I protest that the new ceilings were not made higher, and I protest that the preference for veterans was not at least maintained. Many of us in this House would like to go much further, but I think it is unfortunate that this change for the worse is being made. I know there are some on the government side who will ask what we are complaining about since veterans are going to get more money. But other people are getting more money, too, and I think we have a duty to our veterans that is not fully discharged by short-changing them in this way.

My friend, the hon. member for Norfolk-Haldimand (Mr. Knowles) has already referred to some of the results flowing from a decision made by the war veterans allowance board and concurred in by the Governor in Council. This is something over which we have no control in Parliament. The decision was that war veterans allowance recipients from now on must apply for the guaranteed income supplement if they are aged 65 or over. Some may ask if there is a law that forces people to apply. The fact is that a regulation has been passed to the effect that if they do not apply for the guaranteed income supplement they will be regarded as having applied and their war veterans allowance will be cut back accordingly.

Some may argue that it makes no difference, that in the end the ceiling is the effective figure, that a single war veterans allowance recipient ends up with $161 a month and a married war veterans allowance recipient ends up with $271 a month whether it is made up of OAS and WVA or OAS, GIS and WVA. That is quite true; the ceilings in the War Veterans Allowance Act are the determining factors on how much income will be received. But there are a number of other factors that veterans do not like and I share their point of view.

Perhaps the first factor is psychological, but a psychological factor can be very real. Veterans like to feel that what is being done for them, if it is not a matter of right as it is under the Pension Act and if there has to be a means test proposition as there is under the War Veterans Allowance Act, at least is being done under war veterans legislation. For them to be told to move over to the kind of legislation that is general welfare is not what they were led to believe would be their lot when they enlisted in the armed forces. I do not think it is right to tell these people that they must move over to the welfare side, rather than getting what is their due under veterans legislation.

In addition to the psychological disadvantage that veterans feel flows from this change, there are a few other things. The previous speaker has already referred to the income tax situation. I know that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) is not in a position to disclose income tax secrets, not even in a meeting of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs. He could tell us what is in the white paper on taxation with which we are all familiar but, in effect, he asked us to believe that when it becomes legislation veterans will not be taxable because they have been moved over to the guaranteed income supplement. I say that is a pig-in-a-poke. We do not know what is going to happen in terms of income tax reform; we do not know what the figures are going to be. Certainly for the month of April the income tax law is such and the exemption levels are such that veterans, having been put on old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, will find that their income is subject to income tax, and their net income will thus be reduced. On the other hand, if a reasonable portion of a veteran's income were made up of veterans allowances, that would not be taxable income. Until such time as the income tax law is changed, this will be the picture and veterans will face the possibility or probability of paying income tax, and thus receiving a reduced net income, as a result of this government's action in forcing them to apply for the guaranteed income supplement. This I do not like.

Another element came out in the meeting of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs yesterday. I think, in this respect, that I must say the minister met our point. When he asks the House to believe something that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) will do, he is asking us to buy a pig-in-a-poke. But when he tells us what he will do, I feel that he is speaking for himself. I refer to the fact that we complained that the benefit of the 2 per cent annual escalation that has taken place in the guaranteed income supplement which has been given to war veterans allowance recipients was being stopped. The minister said at the end of that discussion that there was no reason to believe it was stopped for all time. I plead that he make that a commitment. He and I already have made a bargain, to the effect that if he does not keep that commitment he can expect questions and late show debates next year to see that it is done.

At present the married veteran, let us say, gets a total of $271 as a result of getting the OAS and GIS, plus a little bit of the war veterans allowance. One year from now he can have his old age security and guaranteed income supplement increased by 2 per cent; but as the law now stands, unless something is done, the amount that he would get by way of an increase on the one hand would be taken out of the other. It would be taken away from his war veterans allowance, because the ceiling is $271. I say, quite readily, that the minister asked us to believe yesterday that he would not let that situation obtain next year. I accept his assurance in that matter. The law does not help us at this point. I plead that there be no cases next year of veterans having their war veterans allowance payments reduced to offset the increase that they get by way of an escalation in their old age security and guaranteed income supplement payments.
