GEO STOTHART. RICHARD HOCKEN. Chatham, July

(From the Sunday World.) The full moon shed its mellow light over one of those mild, dreamy landscapes of Southern Russia which are so common, so uniform and yet varied in their simple beauty; a broad stream, its rippled surface glittering in the silvery rays; sleepy willows bathing their overhanging boughs in the water; the endless, undulating steppe, veiled in a dreamy mist, extending on the left bank of the river, on the right of which the ground rose in a steep slope covered with fruit trees resplendent with the white blossoms of spring. On the crest of the slope, where the trees clustered the thickest, a high wooden roof was visible, shining in the moonlight, and from behind the foliage, the ruddy light of a lamp-lit window cast a

This ray of light was the only trace of human life. Not a sound came to disturb it, except those voices of the night which in themselves, seem to form part of silence—the chirping of the crickets, the frogs' choir chanting their evening song in the reeds below, the sleepy bark of a dog in the distance A peaceful repose seemed to have spread over the earth, bidding rest to all troubled, aching hearts, peace to all hatred and strife.

slanting ray into the silvery night.

And yet the man who paced up and down the short gravel walk in front of the house hardly felt the influence of the peaceful scene. His steps was troubled and unsteady, and though his deportment, evidently through long habit, was as stiff and rigid as that of a soldier pacing the parade ground, yet the head covered with snowy white hair, was bowed low on his breast. The tingers of his clasped hands worked nervously and occasionally a suppressed exclamation of a heavy, half-subdued sigh issued from between the firmly set lips, with the thick, bushy white mustache overshadowing them.

The martial figure of this old man was well known throughout the whole province of Goltava and whenever General Savelleff, or "the old General" as he was familiarly called, appeared he was gladly and respectfully greeted by every one without distinction of age, of class, or of position. Peasant or noble, young or old, all felt an instinctive respect for him, all came under the influence of that peculiar atmosphere with which an honest life, a straightforward nature surround old age, winning the hearts of the honest and awing knaves into respect. After resigning his posi- ment in artillery, or the projected retion in the army at the close of the forms in the military administration Crimean war, General Savelleff retired when he entered the Government service and resolutely refused to accept any other office. "My Emperor is dead (he meant the Emperor Nicholas) and I do not understand all your new ways of the books, "The Life and Writings

Military discipline and the will of the Czar, which he considered as being an emanation of the will of God on earth, had been the only guiding principles of his whole life. Benevolent towards all, indulgent for all faults and shortcomings, on these two points he was unflinchingly severe. "A foe of the Czar is a foe of God," he was wont to say. When in 1848 he had to superintend the execution of a so called political criminal—a child nineteen years of the military career after the other, old--he prepared himself for the task as for a holy sacrifice and went to the communion on the eve of the bloody day. On the other hand, his rigid, fanatical lovalty did not in the least impair his naturally honest, straightforward, benevolent disposition. The poor of his parish venerated him and even his enemies could not held rethe best military reviews of St. Petersspecting the character of a man whom burg, and his house was the gathering-

And the boy's temper was changed too. Of his former awe, mingled with an impulsive tenderness towards his father, no trace was to be found. He met the latter respectfully, but with a certain mien of independence and of manly dignity which struck the old General with utter amazement, though it pleased him on the other hand to find in his son something akin to his own iron nature.
