THE PIRATING OF THE KATRINA BY ADELE AND ALBERT SHAW

(Copyright, 1908, by the New York Herald Co. All Rights Reserved.)
On Board The Chicola.

Somewhere off Labrador, June 19.
John says there will be no rest for the weary so long as I insist on playing nurse to the universe. But that is nonsense. Anything with a hint of adventure is dear to John Dwight. In the past we have had plenty of it. This season we meant to dawdle from harbor to harbor among the summer colonies and, as John says, exchange food and fireworks with our friends. Instead we are getting further and further from our friends every minute, and all because of what John calls my "fatal habit of surmise."

THE CAPTAIN OF THE KATRINA HAD FIRED

was so crushed that she was on the point of relenting when Berry Manning was announced, and Clarke gave her no chance after that, but went away with a very sober and, she thought, cold good night. Afterward she remembered that Manning's greeting had been uncommonly warm and that she had not repulsed him. Indeed, she had been so busy thinking of Clarke and how she could get a word with him that she had hardly known it was Manning who was there. But Clarke must have believed Manning was the cause of her hesitation; the man's every word implied an intimacy that didn't in the least exist, and when she had been left alone with him she had snubbed him roundly. But that had not brought Clarke back, and he had never come at all for his answer, unless Berry Manning was telling the truth. He said he knew. Two or three times he had told Kate of Clarke's sudden change of plan and of some mountain trip in Oregon.

Of course he accepted our invitation with Kate in the party. But the thought of the Chicola seemed to give him a pang. "My poor Katrina," he sighed. "I'll tell you what we'll do," answered John. "We'll go hunting your Katrina." "I wouldn't permit that for an instant," Manning fairly jumped at John with his refusal. "Captain Waley will do all a man can—see mustn't be thinking of shipwreck all the time. It would ruin the cruise." He spoke so naturally and so glancing with such concern at Kate and me that it seemed scarcely fair to be suspicious of his protest.

John is stubborn. "Stuff and guff, Manning," he said. "It will give us an object, we'll scour the seas for the Katrina. If your worthy Waley has turned pirate and run off with her we'll bring him back in irons." He laughed. "Well, you see, Manning, 'Obnoxious fool' but John was gazing carelessly at the Colonel as he made his offer, and I was sure Manning suspected nothing worse than a meddling interest.

John's reason for leaving the man along beside himself, as he said, was that he was not sure Manning suspected nothing worse than a meddling interest. BODY OF GEO. COOKE FOUND

After three days and three nights of unavailing search, the body of George Cooke was found Wednesday at McAlpine's landing about two miles below where he was thought to have been last seen on his yacht Myrtle. The body was located on the bottom of the river by Albert Cook, brother-in-law of the deceased, and Mr. Chase, who was with him.

BACK OF THE CURTAIN OF THE CHIEF OFFICERS OF SUBSIDIARY COUNTY FARMERS

The Agricultural Commission resumed its sittings on Tuesday with a meeting at the Court House, where there was an interested audience of representatives of the various farming interests.

Taking up the discussion of farms for sale and vacant lands, the evidence showed that practically no vacant land along the river, although there were a good many farms with 30 or more living upon them, the land being used by other farmers in the district.

The chairman pointed out, while there was a settlement almost deserted in the back part of Marguerite, it would not be desirable to place people on that land, in his judgment the land should be used as wood land for agricultural purposes.

It was also shown that there had been a marked decrease in the number of live stock kept, not because the farmers had any surplus or pasture, but perhaps there is no need of the kind of live stock that was kept in the past, but rather that better advantage, but lack of transportation and the migration of labor had made it imperative upon farmers to curtail their operations.

In discussing the different breeds of cattle, the speaker pointed out that the Shorthorn would undoubtedly be the best breed for the river parishes, a variety could be used to good advantage, but the Jersey was the best breed of cow for the county.

In regard to sheep, Isaac Stephenson said they were the best breed of stock for a farm, as it was unfortunate that they had been almost entirely neglected, it being now the exception to find a farmer who keeps any sheep, and a few more trouble from dogs, but Messrs. Farley, Treddwell, Stephenson, and others, thought that the greatest difficulty was in the method of fencing, Barb wire fences, which were effective in containing sheep, but the resistance to sheep.

F. A. Hubbard said that one reason why many farmers had discarded sheep was because they found they injured the pasture for cattle, and they found that the low land pasture which was not adapted for sheep. He said, however, that sheep would give more profit with less trouble than any other stock.
