Practicability of its use said to Shown in Denmark.

Experiments made in Denmark with notors for fishing boats to determine the practicability of using fish oils for operating them appear to have been so successful, according to Commercial Attache I. W. Thompson, that it may be possible for the fishermen who now have boats equipped with kerosene motors to make some slight changes and use this kind of fuel. It is even proposed, he says, that fishermen may make their own cod liver oil while at sea for use in their mo-

When the experiments were called to the attention of the manager of a Copenhagen firm which makes Diesel engines for the purpose of getting his opinion regarding them, he re-plied to Mr. Thompson: "I take pleasure in confirming that the fish oil for Diesel motors will be excel ent to use as a moving power. Further I beg to say that, no doubt, the said oil will also be practicable for smaller fishing boats where the mo-

There is one other point I should like to draw to your attention—the vacancies in the People's House. There are four vacancies in the city of St. John's. One in Placentia Bay, one in Carbonear—perhaps others. What is there to prevent all these seats being filled before the House meets. Surely it is wrong to have these districts disfranchised. These bye-elections would afford a splendid opportunity of learning the minds of the people on the question of the country's duty in this hour of peril and trial.
