I urge the government to insist on some improvement along the line I have indicated. Soldiers should have free passage on the railroads. It is unjust and unfair to send Toronto men, who should be accommodated at the exhibition grounds in Toronto, as far away as Vancouver or the eastern seaboard, or a few over to Labrador, where they cannot get home for six months and where the cost of transportation may be as high as $180. At the same time we have a pass system under which, according to the last Duff report, 687,000 passes were granted on the two railways. Unfortunately I am not able to be a soldier, but I plead for them, and I say that a showdown is called for. I admit that the board of transport commissioners has no jurisdiction over railway companies for soldier fares in war time; under the Railway Act they have not that power; but they or some other body should be given the power or authorized to enforce what I have suggested. Trains are being run now to Camp Borden—a camp on which, I venture to say, if the present minister had been minister at the time, $7,000,000 would never have been spent. I have called it an ice-box in the winter and a hot-box in the summer, and that is exactly what it is. There was no necessity of moving so many local troops out there when we have in Toronto the exhibition grounds, when we have the Elizabeth highway, and in view of the munificent help which the Ontario government has given to the extension of their highway system. It costs $1.95 to $2.05 to go to Camp Borden on a week-end; and if there are say, three children, half-fare must be paid, or more than a week's pay to the soldier is taken from the wife and family for one visit to Camp Borden. At the same time hitch-hiking on the road has been stopped. No wonder recruiting is handicapped. I notice the Minister of Finance in his seat. I sympathize with him in a great many ways; he has shown much patience towards some hon. members; but I must say I am very sorry that he could not see his way to aid recruiting and help the Minister of National Defence in carrying on the burden of the war by giving soldiers' dependents a cost-of-living bonus, the same as civilians get who draw around $175 a month.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is the women's army. I hold in my hand a copy of a debate of forty-six pages in the British House of Commons, sent to me by a British member of parliament who is interested in women's efforts as applied to the war. There was a long debate in the British house on March 6 of this year. I have written for three or four more copies of this report to give to the leaders in the house. I hope that the minister and his deputy will study this question, and have time to read of what the women of Britain are doing to win the war. In my opinion a committee of the house should be appointed to study this whole question; it might include our two lady members and others of women's services. What are the women of Britain doing? In the course of the debate a British woman minister refers to the fact that in Birmingham, or Manchester, some women with three or four children are screening coal. Every woman in England is conscripted and is engaged in some war work. I do not urge that that should be the case in this country, but I believe that if the minister will study this question—and he has given it a lot of thought—he will learn how women's efforts could be greatly increased. Take the pay service, where male civilians as soldiers are employed; their work, or much of it, could be done by women, because it is done by women very well and efficiently in private industry. Note also how British women are transported to the munitions plants, and how dozens of government hostels have been erected all over the country in every district to take care of the children, the cost being borne by the government. While their children are being cared for, the women of England are engaged in the munitions plants and in all forms of production and in all kinds of work, whereas here it often happens that street cars are not available, nor are our women escorted to work and back, as they are in the old country. After all, women constitute 50 per cent of the population and will have to bear their share of paying for the war and the suffering of their children. Yet what they have had to put up with in the homes bombed and destroyed, with their soldier husbands away, is intolerable; they must look after their children, send them to school, provide them with meals, and many of them cannot keep body and soul together because of the high cost of living and lack of a bonus.

I wish to refer to one other matter. I do not think the minister will take objection to my remarks about the troops who got into trouble at Halifax. It is due to no fault of the minister, and I have already referred to the lack of equipment on the railways and his active efforts to better things. After two and a half years of war, surely a railway corporation, so well equipped with some luxury trains to which I have referred, or steamship company, can afford better accommodation for our troops. After all the people of this country have done for the railways and for shipping, they should be expected to treat our troops decently in land and ocean services. I have in mind the complaints of those who came from Vancouver to Halifax. I believe that the large majority of those young fellows wanted to obey the law, and I regret that we are not better provided with ships and railway cars. I know something about the navigation business. I was chairman of and a member of a harbour board in those capacities for twenty-seven years; I have taken a great interest in the waterfront and in shipping. Unfortunately the Canadian National Railways and the merchant marine sold some of our finest vessels for $10,000 each. I know of ships which were built for war service in the last war, costing one and a half to one and three quarter millions apiece, which were sold for a mere nothing. The history of shipping in the five years before the war discloses a deplorable state of affairs. Largely owing to the rate of taxation in England, it was not unusual a few months before the war to see in the British newspapers pages of advertisements offering boats for as low as $50,000. Liners sold for taxes. A number of the ships, the Prince line, which the Canadian National Railways disposed of for about $10,000 could now have been used to transport our troops. I had a return of these ships of the merchant marine and the cost and sale price thereof.

In the last war there was an inquiry with reference to the Dardanelles expedition and the Mesopotamia affair which revealed a shocking state regarding the troops. The minister himself is a soldier with a very fine record, and I know he is a man of keen personal sympathies. Although I am not here to speak on and know nothing of the Halifax incident, I think there should be some further inquiry and some action taken in this matter, and I hope due consideration will be given to fair and most lenient treatment of these men, because nobody sitting up here in an office should give orders regarding an incident of this kind at Halifax until there has been a proper investigation into the cause and effect, and proper transports afforded. I hope the inquiry will relate to the conditions under which these troops are labouring in transit, and also why, after two and a half years of war, we have not adequate transportation for war purposes on land and sea.

On Saturday night I stood at the corner of Queen and Yonge streets in Toronto. I saw a great many soldiers in the air force and the army, and along came five or six ladies, officers of the women's army, and these men had to salute them. The whole principle of saluting, except on parade, should be abolished. I fail to see the common sense of soldiers who are going overseas being obliged to salute those not going overseas, or women troops. I was with a young soldier last Saturday night, a fellow who had been thirty-six times over Germany and who has now been transferred to the west coast. These are the men who have gone overseas and have been doing the fighting. Why should young soldiers in the air force and the other forces, like this young gentleman, have to salute a lot of people who are only civilian soldiers or, as a British member once called them "glorified civilians"? I am not here to criticize any man wearing the king's uniform; they deserve our praise, but I do suggest that the saluting business in principle is carried too far and except on parade it might well be abolished or curtailed. At any rate, some new, modern regulation should be made to govern this matter. I fail to see why veterans of the great war and this, and non-commissioned officers should be required to salute a lady. Every man salutes a lady in the proper way by taking off his hat, but I repeat, this saluting should be abolished or properly controlled.

I salute the minister and say to him that I hope he will go after this transportation question with which I have dealt and do something with the railways in order to improve conditions. Dear knows, improvements I suggested are badly needed. When I came here first we had a debate for six months on the question of the shipping combine in the Atlantic off Halifax. I do not know what sort of regulation we have in this war time. There was a long debate when I first came here on that shipping combine in the Atlantic and on improving it, and I do hope that this whole question will be further investigated.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to return the salute if I may. With regard to the use of the Canadian National Exhibition grounds, my hon. friend is touching on a point which I mentioned earlier to-day and which was referred to by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), namely, the desirability of promoting community esprit de corps. No one can say more for the Toronto units than I do. They are equal or almost equal to the 85th Battalion in the last war, and I should like to see some of these fine Toronto units in Toronto. But there is a difficulty here—difficulties are always cropping up. We have not sufficient training grounds in that area for manoeuvres. It is no use for me to fool myself or to try to fool the hon. member. I say frankly that the army is not planning to have units stationed on the exhibition grounds at Toronto. What we are planning on is having the grounds used as a proper depot, because I must say for the Toronto district, and district No. 2 generally, that I think they have carried on under as difficult conditions, so far as accommodation is concerned, as any district in Canada and have done a splendid job in connection with recruiting, notwithstanding that. We want to provide a better type of accommodation, and the exhibition grounds will give us an opportunity to do so. At the same time, no small part of the exhibition grounds will be taken up both by the air force and by the navy. We are carrying on extensive operations on the lake shore. I cannot give my hon. friend much hope that the Toronto units will be stationed there for any length of time, but I fully agree with him as to the desirability of having that done whenever it is possible.

With regard to transportation, the hon. member has been the champion of the soldiers, so far as transportation fares are concerned, from the beginning of the war. He readily concedes that something has been done in connection with fares. My colleagues and I had conferences last year with the railways and we did feel that we had secured a very genuine and substantial concession in the matter of fares. As the committee knows, we secured one-third fare on embarkation leave and one-third fare after six months, and that was contributed to by the government and the railways. I do not think I am justified in holding out any hope with regard to revision of that matter.

As to the conditions of transportation, I agree with the hon. member that improvements are desirable, but it is not the matter of money, I am assured, which leads to the paucity of rolling stock, but the necessity of devoting the car shops to the manufacture of other requirements than cars. Every scrap of rolling stock that can be used is being utilized, being shuttled back and forth from central Canada to the Atlantic coast, and as my hon. friend knows, the car shops are busy in the making not only of cars but of munitions of war. Conditions are not ideal in connection with transportation, but I do think that so far as the army is concerned there has been a slight improvement owing to the fact that a change has been made in the matter of accommodation so that there is now no discrimination as between the army and the air force.

The hon. member speaks of hockey teams and I agree with him. He also refers to theatre companies. But if you had as many hockey teams and theatre companies travelling as soldiers you would have to provide tourist accommodation for them as well as for the soldiers. It is a question of lack of rolling stock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Supply and demand.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, and the emergent situation, in which there must be priorities having regard to the necessity and the urgency of war materials. The hon. member mentioned Borden. I agree with him about Borden so far as climate is concerned. It is an old and developed camp. The development has been crystallized and made more permanent by the air force going there as well. Instead of pulling out at Borden we are acquiring additional ground there and it does make an ideal ground for Canadian armoured corps training. We had good results so far as the fifth division is concerned, notwithstanding lack of tanks, and we shall have to keep on using Borden for a while, although we should like to use ground nearer Toronto or in Toronto if it were available.

The hon. member also referred to the boys going off the ship. That was a matter of bad accommodation; it was a combination of poor ship, short time for turn-around, and, along with that, the difficulties surrounding the fact that there were 69 different units, which gave rise to much greater trouble in the way of organization, supervision and control. That was the real cause of the trouble, and accommodation on the trip was not at all satisfactory.

The hon. member has referred to the place that women have in connection with the defence effort. I do not think that hon. members fully appreciate what a tremendous programme has been cut out for the country in utilizing the woman power of Canada this year. If we are to do the job we have to do in the raising of men and in connection with the mobilizing of formations which we have planned, there will be a great many more women in industry than there are to-day. My hon. friend is perfectly right that one of the prime necessities in connection with getting women in is to see that those who have families are given the assurance that their families will be looked after and that, as regards all of them, there will be accommodation, recreation and training. That is a tremendous job. You have to persuade the woman that she should go into industry, you have to move her to the industry or the industry to her, you have to train her, to provide accommodation for her at the industry and, if she has children, to provide accommodation for the children, and recreation facilities and medical attention, and persuade the employer that the woman is suitable for the job. As Minister of National Defence I am vitally interested in the matter; I thoroughly agree that we ought to pay all the attention possible to the accommodation and comfort of women who may be available to go into industry, and the hon. member will find no more enthusiastic supporter of what he advocates than I am myself.

Mr. CHURCH: I have a return here and blueprint of the pay of officers and men in all the services, and I have been asked by some hon. members if it would be possible for the minister to give each member of parliament a copy of this schedule of rates of pay. I am satisfied the members do not know what the rates of pay and sustenance allowances in the army, navy and air force of all ranks are, and I think each hon. member should be provided with this list. The inequalities are absolutely absurd.

I should also like to know whether any instructions have been given to the military authorities in No. 2 district for members of parliament to be invited to see a parade or inspect a camp or a munition plant or an air camp or something of that kind. I can say on behalf of two or three Toronto members that we have never been invited to see a camp or a parade or anything by army, air or navy since the war started. I think Toronto is about the only city in the dominion where that state of affairs exists, and it should not exist. How can hon. members represent their constituencies or vote funds when we have never been asked to see a camp or parade or attend a meeting since the war started?

Mr. RALSTON: Camp Borden of course represents a good deal more than the Toronto district; my hon. friend understands that. But I will see that an invitation is given to any hon. members who want to come any time I am there. I recall that my hon. friend and I did take a salute at a parade one time at the Toronto exhibition.

Mr. CHURCH: I have never had an invitation since the war started and I do not want any, because I am otherwise engaged.

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to ask my friend to come just the same.

Mr. STIRLING: There was a question I wanted to ask when the minister was dealing with the camps for reserve units, but I did not get an opportunity. When I was at home during the Easter recess I was pleased to find a happier atmosphere among units in the interior of the province with which I came in contact. The equipment question was progressing more satisfactorily, and consequently there was a happier feeling.

The minister has described the setting-up of the brigades in the various military districts. That appears to me to be an excellent idea, if those brigades can carry out training in camp as a brigade. The question I wanted to ask is whether, when these summer camps come this year, the units which compose those brigades will have an opportunity of training in brigade work. For them to be able to do that it is obvious that equipment suitable to all the units of the brigade together must be available; not only the artillery, not only the armoured units, but the signals and other technical equipment of that sort will be required. To what extent will brigade training be possible, particularly in military district No. 11?

Mr. RALSTON: To a very much limited extent this year I would think. When one recalls the fact—my hon. friend recognizes it, I know—that these reserve units will be composed largely of men from thirty-five to fifty who may not have been in military work at all, there is not much chance for brigade training, if by brigade training my hon. friend means tactical training, where the infantry advances and whatever carriers there are go ahead and the infantry and the guns are behind and the services follow up. Probably there will be opportunity for an exercise or something of that kind, but it would have to be pretty sketchy and, I would expect, not very finished. At the same time that is the kind of training I have in mind as being more attractive to the members of the reserve units than the ordinary drill ground training or even musketry or gas training. But I think it would have to be very much limited this year. I will bring my hon. friend's suggestion to the attention of the training officers and see what can be done in that respect, having regard not only to the equipment but to the possibility of carrying out something which will be intelligible.

I am told that generally speaking—and my brief experience in the service I think bore it out—brigade tactics and even battalion tactics training to no small extent is training of staff rather than of men. Sometimes you can do a brigade scheme on the ground with staff almost as well as you can with the troops themselves. For the purpose of preliminary training at least you have to have staff training first. As everyone knows, the very essential of brigade or division or even battalion training is to have your troops together and explain the whole scheme before you start, and in order to do that intelligently you have to have your staff go over the ground first.

I will bring the matter to the attention of the training officers, because I sympathize with the suggestion and should like to see it carried out.

Mr. EDWARDS: Has the minister detailed information as to volunteers in the reserve army, as to enlistments since the programme was announced? I think that would be a matter of public interest, having regard to the agitation there has been on the Pacific as well as on the Atlantic coast, whether or not the patriotism or interest of those people who are probably most vitally concerned, those between thirty-five and fifty, is being reflected in the numbers volunteering for Canada's reserve army?

Mr. RALSTON: What my hon. friend would want I think would be a progressive return, and I have not one at the present moment. I have here the figures for April 9:

Reserve units	71,737
National Resources Mobilization Act recruits on establishment	5,062
Employed on training centre staff	1,523

That gives a maximum of a little under 80,000, that is apart from the supernumeraries, that is National Resources Mobilization Act recruits who are attached to the reserve army but whom I am not counting in that figure. In order to help my hon. friend one would have to have the previous week's figures. I will endeavour to get those. I know that in Vancouver the number that have enlisted from the time the camp started was something like 1,200 to 1,400. Their objective was about 3,000 altogether.

Mr. GILLIS: Most of the discussion this afternoon has centred on one end of the country. I had no desire to take part in the discussion, but it would appear to anyone reading the record that in regard to the question of defence we are concerned about only one end of the country. I was pleased to see one hon. member rise in his place and make some observations regarding Halifax. But I do not think he touched on the important thing so far as Halifax is concerned. I spent a week or so there within the last month, and I think the greatest danger Halifax is confronted with is the congestion that exists in the city. There has been perhaps a doubling of the population and nothing has been done with respect to establishing services to care for the increase. It is impossible to get a meal; it is impossible to get a room in a hotel. In that city there are large numbers of troops from all over the country, and naturally their families want to be with them. The rents that these airmen, sailors and soldiers are obliged to pay is something terrible, and that is one question which I think the minister should take under consideration.

I believe a large part of the population of Halifax is non-essential, and should not be there. If there is no accommodation for the families of men who are obliged to live there, they should be made acquainted with that situation, so that their families would not be taken from one end of the country to the other to create the congestion that exists in that city to-day. In my opinion Halifax is in the worst shape of any city I have ever been in; anything could happen there. The question raised by another hon. member, as to getting people out of the city, is important and should be attended to; but I believe the influx of people into Halifax at the present time is a matter that should be taken under advisement as well. I heard some terrible stories in Halifax, stories which I would not want to repeat publicly. Perhaps the minister knows all about them, but according to the information I obtained there, from sources I consider reliable, things certainly are not in good shape.

Of course Halifax is not Nova Scotia, though a great many people think it is. In the other end of the province there is a large section where they are making fairly good strides with regard to organization for air raid precautions work and all that sort of thing. But there is one matter which I do not think has been considered. Most of the collieries of Cape Breton island are located right on the coast. I do not know whether representations have been made to the department in this connection, but for sixteen hours a day you have working in many of these collieries approximately a thousand men. They are a thousand feet under ground, some of them five miles out under the Atlantic ocean. With one shell a ship near that coast could knock down the bankhead and entomb a thousand men, and it would not have to be a very large shell, either. The miners realize this, and no doubt this would be one of the first things an enemy ship would try to do. I know the men have been taking up this matter with the companies for some considerable time, but to the best of my knowledge very little progress has been made. This I think is another matter the department should take under advisement.

Then there is the question of promotions in the army, the establishment of officers. On several occasions in the house the minister has stated that this time the army was being formed on a democratic basis; that service and experience were the only things that would count; that men with the necessary qualifications, who went through the basic training, would be promoted and developed into our leaders in this war. I was very glad to hear the minister make those statements, and I should like to believe them to be true. But from the information I obtain, that is not so. If the minister would ride on a regular train from Montreal to Halifax and back again, and talk to the troops on the train, I think he would get a different picture. The story I get is this, that if you enlist, take your basic training and become a non-commissioned officer, you are there for the duration. It is considered bad manners for the rank and file soldier to make application for a commission. I do not know whether or not this is true, but the minister should know. I am told that most of their officers are being pitchforked in from the top. Most of them appear to be college students.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Canadian Officers' Training Corps.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, perhaps with the necessary pull to get a commission. They are being shoved in through the back-door. This is the one thing that will tend to break down the morale of the army to a greater extent than anything else, when you have boys who have served eight, nine or ten months, or perhaps a year in the ranks, who have the qualifications necessary to become officers and who have the respect and confidence of the men with whom they are working, and you find a group of officers brought in through another door, many of them just youngsters, given command of units over the heads of men who have been in the army for a much longer time. It breaks down discipline. There is no respect for the fellow who comes in on that basis. He does not get done what the man who served in the ranks would get done. That is the story I hear right across the country, that there is absolutely unfair treatment as far as the rank and file of the soldiers are concerned, with respect to the obtaining of a commission; in other words, rank discrimination.

There is another matter which I think the minister should take into consideration, which I believe is retarding enlistments on a voluntary basis. Most of the industrialists of Canada to-day refuse to give employment to boys who have been discharged from the army as medically unfit.

Mr. RALSTON: Refuse to do what?

Mr. GILLIS: Refuse to accept men in industry who have been discharged from the army as medically unfit. I have met numbers of boys who have told me, "I have applied for a job. I have done the best I could. I was in the army for four months"—or eight months, or a year—"and I cannot get a job. I present my discharge certificate, and they tell me it is not worth the paper it is written on. They say they do not want men who are physically unfit, that if I am not fit for the army I am not fit for the work they have to offer." There are many men running around with discharge certificates, many of whom have had considerable service, unable to get work. The other boys, who would like to enlist, see what happens to these men and say, "If I get a certificate showing that I am medically unfit I am out of luck as far as work is concerned," and they do not enlist. The minister should check up on that matter.

With respect to the question of women in industry, we all agree on this principle, but I think we must be careful to see that the employer does not take advantage of the present situation to weed out many of the men and bring in women at much lower wages. This has been done. Right here in Ontario men who were receiving 80 cents an hour have been shoved out of industries and replaced by women at 35 cents an hour. The principle of employing women in industry is sound, but it should not be followed until there is a shortage of labour, and certainly employers should not be permitted to take advantage of it, as some are doing at the present time.

Mr. Chairman, it is almost six o'clock and I do not want to take up any more time. I did want to make these few observations with respect to the east coast. Matters are in bad shape there, perhaps more so than on the Pacific coast. People are beginning to realize the situation. I believe one great mistake we are making is in our refusal to take the people of the country absolutely into our confidence with respect to the seriousness of the situation. It may be said that to do so would cause fear, or this, that or the other thing. It will not. I think our greatest mistake is in trying to minimize some danger that may be a great deal more serious than the people imagine. You are lulling them to sleep, and if anything should happen they will not be ready for it. If the people are told the absolute truth, with all the cards laid face up on the table, they will go to work with good heart. I know on the island of Cape Breton they are war-minded to-day. The workers themselves are taking the initiative in pushing the employers in connection with many questions. The steel workers, the miners and others are setting up production committees themselves, and so on. They are beginning to realize that the situation is serious, and they are ready to meet it with everything they have. That should be the general policy right across the country.

Mr. McCULLOCH: Returned men are given preference in the steel and car works. I have had a great deal to do with returned men there, and I know they are given this preference.

Mr. ILSLEY: Before I move that the committee rise, I am going to have my colleague move an amendment, that the amount mentioned in this resolution be reduced from $2,000,000,000 to $1,500,000,000.

Mr. MULOCK: I move accordingly.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is that because we have already voted $500,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 23, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO MAKE PHOTOGRAPHS OF BOOK ENTRIES ADMISSIBLE IN EVIDENCE

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 66, to amend the Canada Evidence Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. St. LAURENT: The purpose of this bill is to submit for the consideration of parliament an amendment following a recommendation of the commissioners on uniform legislation of the Canadian Bar Association. It would add a section to the Canada Evidence Act to make admissible as evidence photographic copies of entries in the books of banks or of the dominion government or of any of its departments, and incidentally permit the destruction of voluminous old records, thereby saving considerable storage space. A similar bill has already been adopted by five of the provincial legislatures and is being considered by the others.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION BONUS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. What are the names and addresses of the persons to whom cheques were issued (a) for over $10,000, (b) for $5,000 to $10,000 on wheat acreage reduction bonus?
2. How were the amounts made up?
3. How much did each receive?

Mr. GARDINER: This question has been given further consideration and I would still suggest to the house that it be dropped, on the grounds stated a few days ago. I have no objection at all to the names being given to any member of the house who desires to have them, but I hesitate to set a precedent by bringing down a list of names out of a group of 186,000. It would require a great deal of work by the staff, and, if given with respect to this legislation, similar information might be asked for in connection with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and other measures of the kind. It would entail an enormous amount of work if the house were to take the position that all these names must be given, together with the amounts received.

Only seven names are involved in this particular list. Three of them are names of companies, and four I think are names of individuals. I do not know any of the individuals except one in Saskatchewan; the others are in Alberta. There is no personal reason, involving the individuals themselves or the companies or the government, why these figures should not be given, and as I have said, I have no objection to giving them to any individual member who desires to have them. But companies have asked us for lists of these names for the purpose of using them in making collections. I do not want to be misunderstood when I say that. It is not a question of the individual, but they want these lists of names in groups in order that they may send out their collectors to make collections. We have not thought it proper to turn over to them lists which might be used in that way. They could be got indirectly through people asking for certain names in certain areas and by giving certain dates. But we hesitate to have that done, and for that reason I suggest that the question be dropped.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, before the question is dropped I would point out that a matter of principle is involved. If the government feels that it is not in the public interest to give certain information to the house, the government may withhold that information; or if giving it would entail too great an amount of work, the information may be withheld. But in this particular case there are only seven names, and regardless of everything else I think as a matter of principle we should insist upon this information being given to the house. I have asked from my place for the amounts paid to certain persons in the lower categories, and no objection was ever made to giving me that information publicly in the house. As to giving such information to companies which ask for lists of names, that is a different matter. But when members of the house ask for details of the expenditure of public moneys, for the information of parliament, I think the principle is sound that we should be given the information, and on that ground I hope the question will not be dropped.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I do not recall ever having brought down in the house any list of names or any figures applying to individuals. The question has been asked a number of times and the same position has always been taken with regard to it as is being taken now. It is true that when we have been discussing a matter in committee back and forth across the floor some information has been given, as also when hon. members have written with regard to individual cases, but I do not recall any list ever having been given.

Mr. COLDWELL: No. I asked what an individual had received, and I received the information in answer to the question.

Mr. HAZEN: I put this question on the order paper, and I object to its being dropped. If you will examine the question you will notice that it asks not only for the names and addresses of the people who have received these large amounts, but also for further information; it asks how were the amounts made up. Under this wheat bonusing act, as I understand it, $4 an acre was allowed for land which was put in summer-fallow and $2 an acre was allowed for land which was put into coarse grain. This is public money, and we as the trustees and representatives of the people are entitled to know how that money was spent. Surely we are entitled to information of this kind. If we are not, I really do not know what good we are here so far as the public treasury and finances of the country are concerned.

Mr. STIRLING: If I may, I would like to suggest that the question be not dropped to-day, that at least it stand over until the Minister of Finance has made the statement on subsidies which he proposes to make. It may easily link up with what is divulged on that occasion. I should like it to stand.

Question stands.

USE OF CHARCOAL IN PRODUCTION OF GAS

Mr. NEILL:

1. In view of the scarcity of gasoline, has the attention of the government been called to the widespread use in Australia of what is called producer gas units, whereby charcoal is used to produce gas, and over 13,000 have been fitted to motor vehicles?

2. Would the government have the matter investigated as to the possibility of its introduction in Canada?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. The government has had this matter under active investigation since midsummer of 1941.

INCOME TAX CONVENTION—UNITED STATES COMPANY DIVIDENDS TO CANADIAN SHAREHOLDERS

Mr. MacNICOL:

1. Is the income tax convention between Canada and the United States, signed at Washington on March 4, as announced by the Minister of National Revenue to this house on March 5 (official debates, page 1143), now effective?

2. If not, why not?

3. What action is the government taking with regard to certain United States companies which are still deducting 27½ per cent from the dividend cheques of their Canadian shareholders, contrary to the provisions of the said reciprocal convention which now only call for a 15 per cent deduction?

Mr. GIBSON:

1. No.

2. It has not received formal approval by congress.

3. None, as the convention is not yet effective. When it becomes effective it will be retroactive by its terms and refunds will be made.

GASOLINE RATIONING—BEER AND INTOXICATING LIQUORS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. How many brewery delivery wagons or trucks have been furnished with ration books for gasoline?

2. In what category are these vehicles placed?

3. What, if any, instructions have been issued regarding delivery of beer and other intoxicating liquors?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Approximately 240,000 applications for commercial vehicle ration books have been issued. These cover all users entitled to commercial rating but no segregation has yet been possible to show the different types of commercial houses concerned.

2. Brewery delivery trucks come under the commercial category and as such are not rationed in gasoline.

3. All deliveries come under the jurisdiction of the administrator of services of the wartime prices and trade board. There is close collaboration between the administrator and the oil controller. Deliveries, so far, are restricted to one per day.

QUEBEC FISHERMEN—REQUESTS FOR ASSISTANCE

Mr. ROY:

1. Are the fisheries of the province of Quebec, except the Magdalen islands, administered by the dominion or the provincial government?

2. To which government, federal or provincial, should the needy fishermen of Quebec address their requests for assistance to procure nets and other fishery equipment they require?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. By the provincial government.

2. The federal government does not provide nets nor other fishing equipment to fishermen.

EXPORT OF SCRAP AND WASTE RUBBER—FAIRMONT COMPANY

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Does the Fairmont Company, Limited of Toronto export scrap and waste rubber to the United States?

2. If so, is all the reclaimed rubber returned for use in Canada?

3. If it is not all returned for use in Canada, what portion is returned?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. It is anticipated that the return tonnage of reclaim will be at least equal to the scrap rubber exported. So far, the receipts of reclaim into Canada from United States have been in excess of the scrap rubber exported to the United States.

3. Answered by 2.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—MIDLAND, ONT., SHIPYARDS

Mr. ROY:

1. Have the workmen in the naval yards at Midland, Ontario, been on strike since April 16?

2. Has the government taken any steps against the instigators of the strike?

3. If so, what steps have been taken?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. A strike in the Midland shipyard in violation of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act began on April 16. The employees returned to work on the morning of April 22.

2 and 3. On April 20 the situation was reported to the Department of Justice and that department has instituted prosecutions.

VICHY REPRESENTATION

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION—ACTION OF SOUTH AFRICA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he can confirm or otherwise the rumour that the Union of South Africa has ceased diplomatic relations with Vichy, and whether he can make any statement on Canada's relations with Vichy.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend the acting leader of the opposition that I believe the statement that South Africa has severed diplomatic relations with France is correct.

The severance of diplomatic relations between countries is always a serious and regrettable matter, and it would be doubly serious and regrettable, I think, in the case of countries which have been as closely associated as have Canada and France for a period of three centuries. Also, at a time of war, a matter of such grave concern should, I feel, be considered not only in the light of the feelings or interests of one's own country but also in the light of how one country's action may possibly affect the interests and relations of other countries with which it is allied. For that reason our government have felt it advisable to have a very complete exchange of views between the government of the United Kingdom and ourselves and the government of the United States and ourselves, before reaching a final decision with respect to the attitude which Canada should take towards France as a consequence of developments in that country in the last few weeks. This exchange of views is still in progress. I am not in a position to make a statement this afternoon, but I shall be, I expect, in a position to make a statement to the house when hon. members reassemble on Tuesday next.

THE PLEBISCITE

REPORT AS TO ALLEGED PURPOSES AFFECTING LABOUR AND UNION ORGANIZATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, of which I sent him notice this morning.

It has been reported to me from several sources that some suspicion has arisen in the minds of the workers in various parts of Canada regarding an alleged purpose of the forthcoming plebiscite. It is rumoured that the government intends to use an affirmative vote as an indication of approval for the further immediate regimentation of labour and as a means of controlling union organization and activities. In view of the influence this may have upon the outcome of the voting on Monday, will the Prime Minister make a statement to this house and to the country denying these rumours?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I thank my hon. friend for directing my attention to the rumours. I had not heard them, but I do give the most unqualified denial to them. As a matter of fact the government has had no intention of the kind in its mind, nor would its intention be influenced or affected one way or the other by the result of the vote on Monday next. Indeed, the vote on the plebiscite has no bearing whatever upon the question to which my hon. friend has referred.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

REMOVAL FROM BRITISH COLUMBIA COASTAL AREAS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Some time ago some assurance was given us that all the Japanese in the coastal areas of British Columbia would be removed. Is the Minister of Labour in a position to inform us what length of time it will take to remove them from the coastal areas to beyond the Cascade mountains?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I had notice of this question just prior to entering the house. I think this may be said in fairness, that we have broken the back of the Japanese problem as it was presented to this house. The exact date I could not say, and I do not think anybody else can say, but the hon. member can rest assured that we are moving with expedition to carry out the will of this parliament in connection with the removal of Japanese from the coastal areas of British Columbia.

Mr. REID: Is it the intention of the government to remove all Japanese from the coastal areas?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. We have had questions along this line already. I think the question should be put on the order paper.

STRIKE OF ROAD WORKERS—ARMED GUARDS FOR CAMPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. What action is being taken to prevent a repetition of the sit-down strike of Japanese road workers while in camp? What action is being taken to place sufficient armed guards over Japanese workers while in camp?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I received a copy of this question just as I entered the house. The hon. member is well aware that the question of discipline comes within the jurisdiction of the commission charged with the Japanese problem in British Columbia. I assume that they would be quite capable of putting into force any needed disciplinary measures. With regard to the second question, here again the commission has full responsibility for the placing of necessary guards over the Japanese while at work. If my hon. friend has any representations that he would like to be made to the commission through me with respect to the matter, I shall be glad to carry out his wishes.

POSTAL SERVICE

SOUND REPRODUCTION RECORDS FOR USE OF THE BLIND TO BE TRANSMITTED FREE OF POSTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, in Canada books for the use of the blind are transmitted free of postage under section 47 of the Post Office Act. In recent years an entirely new method of publishing books for the blind has been developed and is widely used by blind people throughout the country, namely, sound reproduction records or "talking books." It is understood that there are as many blind readers in this country reading from sound reproduction records as there are from the conventional books in raised type. In view of this fact I have in the interests of the welfare of the sightless people of this country issued instructions to the effect that sound reproduction records for the use of the blind may be considered as books for the use of the blind within the meaning of the Post Office Act and as such will be transmissible in the mails free of postage. This change will become effective immediately on publication of the usual notice in the Canada Gazette, which I expect will be this week.

CHEESE

NEW AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH MINISTRY OF FOOD IN RESPECT OF 1942-43 PRODUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. C. SENN (Haldimand): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has a new agreement been reached with the British ministry of food for this year's output of Canadian cheese? If so, what is the amount of the quota? Further, has the price of Canadian cheese been set for 1942, and is it the intention of the administration to continue to pay a bonus on high grade cheese?

Mr. SPEAKER: I think this question should be placed on the order paper.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in view of some very extenuating circumstances that arose last night perhaps the house will permit me to make a statement at this time, especially in view of the fact that it will be closed for the next two or three days.

Mr. SENN: That is why I asked the question.

Mr. GARDINER: An order in council was passed after the house rose last evening, and the passing of that order in council resulted in an announcement being made to the press. The reason for making an announcement last evening, as the hon. member who is asking the question knows, was the fact that to-day is the cheese board day and biddings on cheese will be made to-day all over eastern Canada. If an announcement had not been made last night, if it had been made to-day or to-morrow, considerable loss might have been taken by certain people who are dealing in cheese to-day. The new agreement entered into with the British government is to be effective from April 1 until April 1 next. I have here a summary of the agreement which I think I should place on Hansard.

The arrangement provides for the sale to the United Kingdom ministry of food of 55,800 tons, 2,240 pounds per ton, or approximately 125,000,000 pounds of cheese from the Canadian production of the fiscal year 1942-43. The ministry also agrees, subject to freight being available, to purchase such additional quantities within their requirements, as Canada may have available for export.

A schedule of quantities to be shipped each month from the present time to the end of April, 1943, is provided and the ministry assumes responsibility for providing marine transportation. Payment will be made by the ministry to the extent of 90 per cent of the value as soon as possible after the cheese are shipped and the remaining 10 per cent of the value will be paid within 28 days after arrival of the cheese in the United Kingdom, or in the event of the steamer being lost, within 28 days of the estimated due date of arrival.

The shipping schedule will necessitate storing of considerable quantities of cheese in Canada to await shipment during the months of scant production. Last year 90 per cent of the value of cheese held in storage by licensed exporters for later shipment was paid by the ministry of food when the cheese were placed in storage. This year the Canadian government will make the initial payment of 90 per cent of the value to the licensed exporters when such exporters place the cheese in storage, for export during subsequent months. When the cheese are shipped the ministry will reimburse the Canadian government for the advanced payment made to the exporter. This change in procedure of payment is designed to simplify accounting for the ministry of food.

Accuracy of weights is to be verified by the official weigher appointed by the Montreal board of trade, under authority of act of parliament. Such verification will be checked from time to time by an officer of the Department of Agriculture. The quality of the cheese is to be determined by graders of the staff of the Dominion Department of Agriculture. The prices to be paid f.o.b. ocean steamer Montreal or f.o.b. car Montreal for export through the winter ports are:

For first grade (92 score and over)..	20
For second grade (87 to 91 score)...	19·50
For third grade (under 87 score)....	19

The ministry of food has intimated that the prices specified are higher than may be desirable in view of the probable effect that post-war conditions may have on the markets for cheese, but that subject to due consideration by the government of Canada of the proposed price in relation to post-war developments, the ministry of food is prepared to approve the agreement.

By way of explanation of that statement, which is taken out of the order in council, possibly I should say that the British government was concerned about the advisability of their agreeing to a payment of 20 cents per pound at this time. They believed that if they agreed to pay that it might have some effect upon the price which would be required from Canada for cheese after the war is over. They suggested that if the dominion government would take the responsibility for saying that this price was necessary to production in Canada at the present time and that it would not necessarily affect prices when the war is over, then they were prepared to agree to it for this year. I may say that it was discussion over that point which somewhat delayed the announcement being made. We had hoped it would have been made not later than early in the month of March rather than at this time.

Information available indicates that Canada may supply not more than approximately 15 per cent of the cheese which the United Kingdom will receive during the current year, and in view of increased costs of labour and supplies required in the production of cheese, the prices provided in the agreement are not considered out of line with increased costs of production. The agreement has received formal approval of his excellency in council and, as already stated, the ministry of food has intimated it is prepared formally to approve the agreement.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ALLEGED INTIMIDATION OF UNION WORKERS BY MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice arising out of a complaint or complaints made to me by Allan C. Wright, Canadian Congress of Labour organizer at Vancouver. Mr. Wright makes two complaints of alleged intimidation of himself and union workers by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I sent to the minister a much fuller statement. One of the complaints made is in connection with security officer Payne, whom Mr. Wright accuses of asking workers about their trade union membership. I should like to ask the minister if he will have an investigation made at as early a date as possible and take whatever steps are necessary to protect workers in their lawful activities.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): The hon. member's question will appear in Hansard; I shall have the matter investigated and give any information that I may be able to obtain.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. 64, to assist in the carrying on and coordination of vocational training.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee on vocational training.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

PROVISION FOR SETTLEMENT ON THE LAND OF VETERANS OF THE PRESENT WAR

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved the second reading of Bill No. 65, to assist war veterans to settle upon the land.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Before this bill is given second reading and passed on to the committee, there are certain remarks and suggestions I wish to offer. I approach this subject as one who has had close and intimate contact with those who went on the land under the old soldier settlement scheme, known as the soldier settlement board scheme, and I know something of the tragedies as well as some of the successes of that scheme. At the outset I wish to compliment the minister upon the forward step made in this bill. But knowing what has happened in the past I have one or two further suggestions to make.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) the other evening, following the fine speech made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Sissons), suggested to the government that in the allocation of money or the settlement of men under this scheme his particular constituency or the province of Ontario be not overlooked. Might I point out this interesting fact, that when the soldier settlement scheme was put into effect many years ago British Columbia put more soldier settlers on the land than the provinces of Ontario and Quebec combined. In fact almost as many ex-soldiers settled in British Columbia as in Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces. Therefore we in British Columbia were more concerned, shall I say, and had closer contact with the welfare of the men, than perhaps hon. members from some other provinces.

My first suggestion is in regard to amortization. The committee might very well look into the matter of straight annual payments rather than amortization, because if one looks at the scale of moneys payable over the years he will see that, under the amortization plan as proposed, a settler in ten or twelve years would pay less principal and more interest than he would under straight annual payments.

I am very well pleased that the suggestion has been made to reduce the interest from 5½ per cent to 3½ per cent, but I say frankly to the government and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that he might just as well face the issue now and consider reducing the interest for those under the present soldier settlement scheme. They are now paying 5 per cent, and the government and members of parliament are going to be faced with this very issue. The veterans of the last war are going to ask: "Are we not as good soldiers as the soldiers of this war? We also offered our lives and services in 1914-18 and so should receive like consideration." I warn the government that they might just as well now look to reducing the interest under the old scheme from 5 to 3½ per cent. Up until the end of last year the total amount paid in under the soldier settlement scheme, in principal, was something over $31,000,000, whereas the interest payable totalled $24,670,190. While many reasons have been given why men left their farms under the soldier settlement board, to my way of thinking one of the grievous enactments was the 5 per cent interest rate. In the lean years and years of depression the debts of the soldier settlers mounted up, and many instances could be cited where after ten or fifteen years of toil and payments, soldier settlers found themselves owing more money to the government than they did when they first entered the scheme.

We hear a great deal about a new order after this war. I am going to leave this thought with the ministry and hon. members of this house: if we are thinking of that new order, why should not a start be made now in this bill? I am not unmindful of the far-reaching effect this bill will have, but I suggest that consideration be given to the scheme in operation in Australia. There if a man purchases land under a land settlement scheme—I am speaking of ex-service men particularly—he knows from the day he goes on that land that no matter how good or how bad the times are he will not be required to pay any more than the original debt. In other words the debt to the government is tax free.

I know there are those who were disposed to laugh when the leader of the Social Credit group the other day spoke about making a grant of farms or land to these men. After all, is there anything extraordinary or out of the way in giving to the men who offered their lives a portion of this good land of ours? Looking at the losses the government incurred under the old scheme, I say in all sincerity that we could very well have given the land free to every man who came under the old soldier settlement board scheme at its inception, and we would still have been money ahead, because, as has been pointed out by the minister, some $4,000 per capita has been lost under that scheme. I believe that $4,000 average is somewhat more than the average debt incurred by each settler under the original act.

I am therefore suggesting that the committee give some consideration to the Australian scheme. After all what is the real intention of this act? Is it to establish men on the land after the war? I know there are doubts in the minds of some hon. members as to why we should place men on the land at all, but in a country such as ours soldier rehabilitation must embrace some land scheme.

One of the important points not touched on by the speakers the other evening was the economic conditions which may exist after this war. While the minister pointed out that $144 per annum would be the total amount any soldier taking up land would have to pay under a total scheme—by which I mean one involving the limit of $3,600 plus $1,200 for stock and equipment—it should be remembered that to this amout must be added taxes and insurance premiums, so that roughly speaking a man taking up land under this scheme will be called upon to pay at least $200 a year. I think I can speak fairly well for the farmers of the province of British Columbia when I say that in many years few farmers can pay a debt of $200 and live decently. If you have no markets and cannot sell your goods, the amount of interest and even the unpaid principal will become a very great hardship indeed. I suggest for the consideration of the committee that the government might very well absorb these interest charges. According to the figures given by the minister when speaking on the resolution, $1,000,000 a year would, I believe, take care of all the interest which would be charged those taking advantage of this scheme. It might be well worth considering whether, when we help these men go on the land, we should further burden them with interest payments.

I am not so much enamoured of the suggestion contained in the resolution that the director should have the right to sell out any settler. We should be very careful in transferring a right of that kind from parliament to an individual. Remember that under this scheme a settler will be required to pay taxes. If he does not pay them he may be sold out by the municipality, subject of course to the interest retained in the land by the director or the board. But I doubt the wisdom of giving the director absolute power to sell out a settler in the event that such settler should fall down in his payments.

Another suggestion I have to offer is that the act should not be put into operation until the end of the war. I fear that if we start in on this scheme now, by the time the war ends so many things may be said against it that there will be no inducement to the great majority of the men, who might otherwise do so, to go on the land at the conclusion of the war. When this act is passed it should contain a clause providing that it shall not become operative except by proclamation; and I commend that suggestion in all seriousness to the committee that is to study this measure. I am particularly interested, however, in the "no interest" clause; for I believe that if you relieve these men of the payment of interest you will not only remove a great burden from their shoulders but you will give them more hope and more incentive to pay up and establish themselves permanently on the land.

There was one other thought I wanted to leave with the committee. I believe this scheme envisions a man working partly on the land and partly in industry. This idea was suggested many years ago by Henry Ford, who had a scheme for establishing small Ford factories all over the country in which men might be engaged for five or six months of the year and sustain themselves for the remainder of the time by working on the land. Perhaps that is what is in the mind of the government in connection with this scheme, but it will not work in British Columbia. Later I intend to have a great deal more to say with regard to the centralization of industries in this country, which to my mind at any rate is going to bring about a troublesome uneconomic condition after this war is over. We have practically no industries at all in the Fraser valley, and I might almost say few in British Columbia, and I am just wondering where the men who take up land in that province, especially those who have only small farms, will be able to find employment. In the past in British Columbia many men went on the land with the intention of ranching; many others went in under the old soldier settlement board, and after they got settled on the land they all had to find additional employment somewhere in order to earn einough money to keep going.

Many of those who reside in the cities believe that a man on the land gets all his food free, that his eggs, his milk and everything else come to him without cost. To those who have that mistaken idea I want to say that generally speaking it costs the man living in the country these days more for his goods than it costs the man in the city. If he does get eggs he has to buy wheat and other grain to feed his chickens; if he does get milk he has to buy feed for the cow, so that his food does cost him more than his labour. I make this statement because I rather got the impression the other day that some hon. members had the feeling that a man living in the country could manage to exist without any monetary cost at all.

I apologize for having taken up the time of the house to this extent, but having dealt with this matter for a great many years I thought I should offer these suggestions in the hope that they will be given every consideration when the committee meets to study this bill.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Before this bill is given second reading and sent to the appropriate committee I should like to offer a further suggestion which perhaps has not been particularly emphasized heretofore in this debate. I have often wondered why so much was said about the advantages of a new act as compared with an old one. It seems to be becoming almost a byword to say that a certain act is a great improvement over the old act, and so on; but I could never understand why, if that were so, the old act—whether this act or another one—was not changed and improved when it was found to be unworkable.

During the course of the debate on this bill many hon. members have said that of course this act does not in any sense guarantee security for the soldiers who will be settled on the land. Obviously, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) mentioned the other day, governments have no control over the sunshine and the rain. They have no control over the forces of nature, and many things may happen in the intervening years to make the situation desperately hard for these soldiers who will be settled on the land. We cannot help the reverses that nature may bring us, but we can so frame our legislation as to give these men the security they deserve. I do not believe anyone will disagree with the principle that any soldier who offers his life, as he faces shot and shell in bloody battle, on his return should be offered security for the rest of his life. I am not going to enlarge on the details and ramifications as to what he should do and what the governments should do. The principle that any soldier who offers his life in defence of his country upon his return should be given security for life, should be made clear and clean-cut. We do know that that has not been done.

I have a suggestion for the committee which will review the bill and will have power to make amendments and dress it up so that it may be acceptable to the house. I visualize that when the bill is passed and the time arrives for the government to purchase land under the scheme, there may be wholesale foreclosures on the farming public of Canada who are to-day in desperate need and debt. They may be made under the assumption that those who foreclose may then offer their land for sale to the government at a price satisfactory to the vendors. I am suggesting that the committee give this possibility some consideration. We should cooperate with the provinces in bringing about certain just debt laws.

Let us not be misunderstood in this matter. We have never claimed that debt should not be paid. Our stand is quite the contrary, that the adjustment of the fiscal policy of Canada should be such that debts can and would be paid. Under the present fiscal policy of Canada with regard to agriculture, we are fast reaching the place where the sanctity of debt is regarded as being a little bit greater and more important than the sanctity of the home. That should not be so. I agree of course that if debtors throughout the years have had opportunity to pay off their debts and have failed to do so, they must be dealt with accordingly. In Canada agriculture has done its best to pay its way, but it has not been able to get out of debt.

The other day in this debate the Minister of Finance questioned the hon. member for Acadia as to whether the trouble under the old act had been that the land was purchased at the close of the last war, a time when there was serious inflation. I maintain that the difficulty was not so much that the land was purchased during a period of inflation as that a period of deflation was permitted to follow, which no government of that day had power to control. The minister's statement was an admission, not necessarily by his own government, that the government is powerless to control that which the banking institution of Canada can bring on when they desire.

May I go a step farther. It is all right to cry to high heaven and to raise the bogey man of inflation. But so far as the debtor is concerned inflation helps him, because in a period of high prices he is in a better position. If agriculture in Canada to-day were experiencing an inflation of their own commodity prices they would be in a better position to pay off old debts. I am not advocating that there should be inflation, but I am saying that there should not be inflation at one time and deflation at another, a circumstance which will cause even the measure we are now discussing to fall far below our expectations with respect to it.

I would ask the committee to consider the advisability of suggesting that the government should in some sense be restricted in the purchase of land. My particular suggestion would be that it should be restricted in respect to the purchase of any land which had heretofore been the subject of foreclosure. That may seem to be an extraordinary suggestion, but all things being equal I claim that in the great majority of cases as to lands with respect to which foreclosures have taken place there would be no guarantee of security for those who might take them at the close of this war. I suggest that the committee give serious consideration to placing in the measure a section which would say to the government, "In all purchases of land you must guard against purchasing those which in bygone days have experienced foreclosure." As I said earlier, there is a possibility that there may be wholesale foreclosures as soon as the act becomes effective. In such circumstances the government should be reluctant to make such purchases. There should be something in the act to prevent the repurchasing of that kind of land. If it could not produce to serve the interests of one man, I doubt whether it could produce to serve those of another. If there is one thing above all others we want after this war is over, surely it must be that full measure of happiness and sweet content which every last man in the fighting forces deserves upon his return home.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the special committee to consider settlement on the land of veterans of the present war.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, April 22, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1943, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, this afternoon I should like to make a statement on the question of subsidies that are being paid in the application of the price ceiling policy. I am sorry that the statement is long but the subject is an important one; there has been much discussion in the press about it, and I feel that I should take the earliest opportunity in committee of the whole or in the house to make a statement to parliament. I do so in order to make clear the policies and principles being followed in the payment of such subsidies and the reasons why they are necessary.

There have been a number of questions asked about these subsidies and some concern expressed about them, both in this house and outside. There have also been some implied criticisms of what is being done, although no very specific or direct criticisms have yet come to my attention. I would like to tell the house as clearly as possible what is being done and why, so that there will be no misunderstanding and so that any comments and criticisms can be both specific and constructive. It is, I believe, the duty of members to understand this policy, which involves substantial expenditures for an essential purpose.

The payment of subsidies is an integral part of the general policy of price and income stabilization. Everyone is well aware that the government last fall undertook a vigorous programme to control prices and to secure the necessary stabilization of wages and salaries to make that effective price control possible. This control of prices was absolutely essential in order to defend this country against inflation and all the difficulties and dangers that it brings, all the chaos that it creates. It was necessary in order to enable us to devote our full effort to the war, unhindered by those difficulties to which inflation gives rise. We were faced with the prospect of a substantial reduction in the supplies available for consumers at the same time that the incomes of consumers were rising much more rapidly than fiscal and financial measures could offset. Prices were bound to go up, and go up rapidly, unless a limit was placed on them. The general method that was used in placing that limit on them by means of an overall ceiling is familiar to the house and was explained initially by the Prime Minister in a broadcast and subsequently in detail to the house by myself. The reasons why that rather drastic method was chosen have been fully explained, and I believe they have commended themselves to the Canadian people as well as to parliament. It has been understood that in order to control the price level, we have had to control all prices and to secure a stability of wages and salaries by means of various regulations.

In carrying out this policy, the wartime prices and trade board, with the approval of the government, has been very firm in refusing to permit any increases in prices above the ceiling. In a very few cases special circumstances have made it administratively impossible, or nearly impossible, to establish or maintain the ceiling; for example, in the case of fresh fruits and vegetables, and imported books. But these have been true exceptions and not any relaxation of the general rule. In addition, of course, the board recognizes and permits a normal seasonal variation in certain prices.

After thorough consideration of all the difficulties and all the conditions involved, and after continual re-examination of our experience up to date, the wartime prices and trade board has remained convinced, and the government has remained convinced, that we must really hold prices firmly if we are to hold them at all. We cannot let prices move up first in this sector, and then in that, in response to special conditions or pressures. We must make the ceiling stick. We are not doing this merely as a matter of principle or as a means of rejecting arguments for adjustments; it is being done for good practical reasons. Each increase in prices that we would permit by means of a flexible ceiling would be bound to lead directly to other movements. Sometimes they would lead directly to increases in the prices of goods made from other goods or into which the prices of other goods enter as a cost. In other cases, increases in prices would have their effect on many other prices through bringing about higher wages and consequently higher costs in many other industries. This sort of process would gather momentum like a snowball rolling down hill. It is, we believe, on the basis of all the information we can find, far more practicable and equitable to make whatever adjustments are necessary to prevent any prices from rising than to permit some of them to rise and then to make the necessary adjustments in others. Secondly, it would be manifestly unfair to permit some industries or some trades to increase their prices and not permit others to do so when they had equally valid reasons. Consequently, if we permitted any increases, we would be forced to consider other cases of the same kind throughout the whole economy. We could not, therefore, deal with a few of the most difficult cases without creating other cases at the same time. Thirdly, we wish to carry through a simple, straightforward policy and method that consumers can understand as well as traders. We want the women of this country, who do its shopping, to know what we are doing and to be able to see to it that the regulations are being observed. If we were always tinkering with prices, letting them go up a little here and a little there, the consumer would not be able to understand what we were doing, or to detect any infraction of the price regulations without great difficulty and study.

Finally, of course, we realize that any increase in prices, arising from the shortage of supplies of a particular commodity or service, would prevent some people from obtaining it because they could not afford it, or would force them to do without other things. It would be part of the process of inflation that we are trying to prevent. It would amount to permitting the supplies to go to the highest bidders, rather than to those who most require them. This we wished to avoid, and we do not wish to compromise with the evil that we are attempting to prevent.

From the beginning of our price stabilization policy it has been foreseen and understood that some unusual methods, such as subsidies, or their equivalent, would be necessary to meet a number of the special problems that would arise in carrying out the price ceiling policy. I mentioned this fact in speaking in this house in November on the price control policy, particularly in relation to imports. The British government has been paying subsidies for some time in order to stabilize the cost of living in Britain—actually 125,000,000 pounds last year. We realized that we would probably not be able to escape the necessity of paying subsidies ourselves if we were to succeed in holding prices steady despite rising costs, particularly of imports.

The necessity for subsidies or their equivalent arises from the fact that the costs of providing goods or services to the Canadian consumer cannot be completely controlled or from the fact that in some cases these costs were actually higher at the time the ceiling was imposed than the level of costs that was then being reflected in the prices charged. We can control and hold down most of the costs which enter into prices of Canadian goods and services, but we cannot control them all. In so far as these costs rise beyond the amount which the industry can absorb with fixed prices, we must either do without those goods, or raise the ceiling on their prices, or else pay subsidies or take some equivalent action to meet the rising costs without increasing prices. We have been firmly resolved not to permit the ceiling on retail prices to be increased in order to meet these increased costs. We are prepared to permit some non-essential supplies to disappear from the Canadian market rather than permit either their prices to be increased above the ceiling or to subsidize what are really non-essentials. However, there are a number of essential commodities the costs of which have risen beyond the amount which the industry can absorb at fixed prices, and the supplies of which must be maintained in the Canadian market as far as possible, and in these cases we have undertaken to pay a subsidy or else to make bulk purchases of them for government account and resell them to Canadian dealers or manufacturers at prices that will enable them to be sold to the public at the ceiling price.

By far the most important cases where we cannot control costs and where these have risen substantially since the ceiling period are found in the field of imports. This country always has been dependent on a very large variety of imported goods, and particularly of imported fuel, materials and semi-finished goods to be manufactured in Canada. We must continue to import a great variety of commodities in order to maintain essential civilian supplies, as well as for war purposes. Obviously we cannot control the costs of these imports up to the stage where they reach Canada, and these costs have risen in very many cases. In part the increased costs have been due to higher prices and higher costs of production in the United States and in the United Kingdom, where we obtain these goods. In both those countries costs have been going up during the last year, and in the United States prices have been rising rapidly since the time our ceiling was imposed. Furthermore, we have had to pay shipping and insurance costs, which are increasing daily, for all those commodities which reach this continent from overseas, and in some cases we have had to meet the cost of bringing them by more roundabout routes or more expensive forms of transport than would normally be employed. For example, in the importation of some goods from South America, I understand that the normal method was that they would travel approximately five thousand miles by water and five hundred miles by land, and that now, frequently, those same goods travel three thousand miles by water and two thousand miles by rail.

I would like to call the attention of the house to the fact that since the base period used for price control purposes the war has spread over all the oceans of the world, and has caused enormous changes in shipping and in sources of supply. The Canadian consumer has been protected by the price ceiling against any effects of this spread of the war on his cost of living. Without the price ceiling we should all have suffered higher costs of living because of the fall of Singapore and the German submarine offensive off the Atlantic coast. As it is, our prices are not reflecting these very serious developments, but somewhere the cost must be borne, and in part at least it is being borne in the subsidies we are having to pay on imports in order to make supplies available to Canadians at ceiling prices. The disasters in the far east and the greatly increased scarcity of shipping have also shut off a number of our usual sources of supply and made us dependent upon more expensive sources. Consequently we have had to pay higher prices to obtain things from near at hand or from secondary sources of supply than the prices we were paying at the time the price ceiling was established, when we could buy in much cheaper markets.

As a consequence of all these factors, we have had to undertake to pay subsidies on imports, or in a few cases, to buy imports by means of government agencies and resell them to Canadian producers or dealers. This import policy was announced at the time the price ceiling went into effect. I shall give some details of this policy in a few moments but I wish to say something first about subsidies on commodities produced at home.

Here, the principal increases in costs which have given rise to the necessity for subsidies are those which originate in the difference in time at which things are produced and at which they are sold. The goods that were being sold during the base period from September 15 to October 11 were produced during an earlier period. Sometimes it was much earlier; sometimes it was only a few weeks previously. During the period between the time the goods were produced and when they were sold, costs had in many cases already risen, but retailers and other dealers had not increased their prices to reflect the increased costs of producers and manufacturers. In other words, they were not taking an abnormal profit on their inventory. However, when the dealers and retailers had sold the goods which they had bought at the lower prices before the base period, they had to replace them with goods purchased at higher prices, and yet they could not sell these goods at more than the ceiling price, which was the price they had been selling at during the base period. This naturally reduced the margin between their buying and selling prices, which is the source of their revenue from which they meet their expenses and derive their incomes. It was this rise of costs in relation to selling prices which produced what has come to be called the "squeeze"—I am going to use some phrases now which have formed a limited new vocabulary—and which has caused many of the most difficult problems that the wartime prices and trade board has had to face.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Squeezes and squeaks!

Mr. ILSLEY: Some squeaks, yes. The board has managed to arrange that manufacturers and dealers would share this "squeeze," so that it would not all be thrown upon the unfortunate retailers or other dealers. This is what has been called "rolling back the squeeze." In some cases, however, the producers and dealers together could not absorb all the increase in costs that had occurred since the time that the goods had been produced which were being sold in the base period. In such cases where supplies are assumed sufficiently important, the government has undertaken to absorb a portion of the "squeeze" by means of a subsidy, pending the working out of methods to reduce costs by every possible means.

In a few cases an increased price to producers has been necessary in order to obtain the volume of supplies required of some real essentials, such as milk, for example, where circumstances have been such that an increase in the supply, or even the maintenance of supplies, was difficult without some special action. In some of these cases—almost all of them agricultural products—the government has undertaken to meet this increase in costs, or at least a portion of it, until a better permanent arrangement to guarantee a satisfactory volume of supplies could be worked out.

Before going on to describe the various subsidies now being paid, I will describe briefly the methods by which the subsidies are decided upon and paid. The general policy with regard to the payment of subsidies has been determined by the government on the advice of the board in the light of the reasons which I have just given you. The decisions of principle needed to apply this policy are made by the board, subject to my approval—for example, decisions as to whether or not a particular commodity should be subsidized and by what general method, and also decisions as to whether the agents of the board should make bulk purchases for the government's account. When these decisions of principle have been reached, the details of each particular case are worked out by the particular administrators of the board concerned with these commodities or trades, in conjunction with the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, the government-owned company which serves as the agent of the board for the payment of these subsidies. The corporation and the administrators are able to take into account the details in each particular case and to devise practical means of giving effect to the decisions of the board and myself. When these details have been worked out, the corporation makes the actual payment of the subsidies and verifies the claims made for them by those importers or others who may be entitled to subsidies. The corporation and its importing agents also make bulk purchases of certain commodities when directed to do so by the board. For example, they have recently arranged the purchase of our entire import requirements of raisins and other dried vine fruits from Australia. There are very substantial advantages, particularly under present emergency circumstances, in making such bulk purchases for government account, and for several reasons I think such methods are preferable to simple subsidies, although it should be remembered that they may involve the government in some trading loss in order to permit the commodities so purchased to be sold to Canadian consumers at ceiling prices.

In describing the principles of the subsidies now being paid, I do not wish to go into a great deal of detail that will simply duplicate information which has already been published by the board, and which members may obtain readily from the board in the form in which it was published. However, perhaps a brief review of the general principles on which import and other subsidies are being paid will give the house an opportunity to consider the policy as a whole.

The main subsidies being paid are those on imported goods, for the reasons which I have indicated above. These are being paid in accordance with the principles laid down in the statement on import policy, dated January 1, 1942, which was issued as an extra of the Canada Gazette of date December 29 last. I shall not attempt to read into the record that long statement, but would refer members to it if they are interested in the details. In it the objective of the board was stated to be:

> to ensure a continued flow of necessary imported goods for sale in Canada under the retail price ceiling. If import prices of such goods rise to a degree which cannot be absorbed by trade and industry, subsidies will be paid through the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation. Duties and taxes on imported goods may, however, be reduced from time to time in such a way as to reduce the need for subsidies. The board reserves the right to exclude any goods from the import subsidy and to adjust the amount of any subsidy from time to time. When any exclusion is made, consideration will be given to forward commitments of reasonable character and amount entered into on or after December 1, 1941.

I have quoted that from the statement of the board published in the Canada Gazette. It was stated that subsidies would be paid only on imports of consumers' goods and materials to produce consumers' goods. They are not paid on capital equipment, nor on goods for re-export, nor on goods imported for war production, which, of course, the government would purchase ultimately. Nor are they paid on goods imported directly by consumers themselves, or on goods imported prior to December 1, 1941, or where the increase in cost is trifling, or on goods the production of which is prohibited in Canada, or, finally, on any goods to which the price ceiling does not apply. Most important of all perhaps, from our point of view, a long list of various classes of goods regarded as non-essential was given on which subsidies would not be paid. Of course, in addition to the restrictions on goods eligible for subsidy, there were also the restrictions under the War Exchange Conservation Act, intended to prevent the use of foreign exchange for the purchase of a great many non-essential goods. Consequently it should be noted that there is a double sieve, so to speak, to prevent the subsidizing of non-essential imports.

It will be noted that in the case of these imports we specified not those goods on which subsidies will be paid, but rather those classes of goods on which subsidies will not be paid. The reason for this is a very practical one. It is impossible to make a satisfactory list of the many thousands of materials and parts and other items that it may be necessary to import into Canada even for ultimate consumers' use. It is more practical to rule out all those classes of goods which we can identify as being non-essential. We have attempted to do that, first under the War Exchange Conservation Act, and again now in excluding them from subsidy. This selection of non-essential goods has been based upon a careful study of our import trade and our tariff items. Quite possibly it is not complete, and it is probable that as we go along we shall be increasingly stringent in classifying goods as non-essential and excluding them from subsidy.

However strictly we draw the line of essentiality, there are bound to be some borderline cases—some items which will appear to some of us as essential and which will appear to others as non-essential. Some types of food, for example, will seem to many of us unnecessary at least in view of what we can substitute for them from our own supplies, while other persons in this country will regard them as valuable articles of diet which cannot be satisfactorily replaced. To decide whether such items should be included or excluded involves questions of judgment which we must decide as best we can and in the light of a developing supply situation. In making any decision of this kind we must take account not only of the character of the goods themselves and the possibility of substituting others for them, but also the possibility that by excluding them we may divert demand to other items, particularly domestic items, and thereby create serious shortages. We should remember that in those cases where prices have risen substantially when we classify an import item as ineligible for subsidy we are, in effect, placing an embargo upon its entry, and we must be prepared to deny ourselves entirely those supplies. Perhaps I should add that in the case of minor items, it may be possible that traders will continue to import them, even at a loss, simply to maintain certain connections and to continue to supply the markets which have been supplied in the past, but we cannot expect this to happen in any important cases.

In a number of cases it has been possible to avoid or substantially to reduce import subsidies by means of simpler action taken with regard to customs duties and other charges. For example, we have eliminated dumping duties at this time, since there is almost no danger of unfavourable effects of such action. It has also been provided that on the recommendation of the board in specific cases, invoice values may be accepted for customs purposes instead of home market values, as are normally required. In other specific cases duties have been reduced or eliminated in order to enable goods to be imported at a cost that will make it possible to sell them at the ceiling price.

On other than imported goods, only a small number of subsidies are being paid, and most of them are not yet of significant proportions. Much the most important of these domestic subsidies up to date has been that on milk. This is a temporary subsidy being paid at the rate of 40 cents per 100 pounds for milk used in the manufacture of concentrated milk products, and of 30 cents per 100 pounds on milk sold for fluid milk in all areas where no increase in milk prices took place between August 1, 1941, and the date of the price ceiling.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): To whom is the subsidy paid?

Mr. ILSLEY: To the dealer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would that apply in the case of dried and processed milk?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure about that. The purpose of this subsidy was to maintain the supply of milk for use in concentrated milk products and as fluid milk during the winter season when costs are normally higher and when this year producers faced a shortage of feed, and there was the danger that milk supplies would be diverted too largely to cheese production, as cheese prices were relatively high.

Mr. HOWDEN: Whom do you mean by dealer?

Mr. ILSLEY: No—I thought the question related to fluid milk, but it did not; hon. gentlemen were talking about concentrated milk. I am not sure to whom the subsidy is paid in that case. I will get the information. The subsidy is paid to the distributor or manufacturer under an arrangement by which it would be passed on to the producer. I think that is correct; it is the distributor of the fluid milk and the manufacturer of the concentrated milk.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How does it get back to the producer?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it does. I have said that this subsidy is a temporary one; already it has been announced that it will be discontinued at the end of this month and a better arrangement of prices for milk products substituted for it, which will enable us to meet our domestic requirements for milk and its products and also the abnormal demand for exports of cheese and concentrated milk products to the United Kingdom. The details of this new scheme were made public this morning.

Another domestic subsidy worth noting is that on the 1941 pack of domestic canned fruits and vegetables. The need for this subsidy arose from the fact that many retailers established their prices in the base period on the cost of these canned goods in the spring and summer of 1941, while the canners, on the other hand, had increased their prices over these levels before the end of the base period, thereby establishing their selling prices f.o.b. cannery quite substantially above those which the retailers had paid. Consequently the retailers were unable to replace canned goods for sale at the retail ceiling prices. In order to enable them to sell at the retail ceiling, it was decided to reduce the cannery prices of these goods, and some of the wholesale prices corresponding to them, to the levels of the spring and early summer of 1941. The costs of these goods have already been incurred and cannot therefore be reduced. It has been necessary, as a consequence, to provide a subsidy to enable these goods to be sold at the lower prices necessary if they are to be moved through the retail channels. Canners are being compensated by 80 per cent of the amount of the reduction in the selling prices that they have absorbed on their inventories, while the wholesalers whose prices are reduced are being compensated to the extent that the f.o.b. cannery price is reduced, but wholesalers are being required to bear the extra carrying charges and sales tax incurred on the higher prices and for which they cannot recoup themselves in their new wholesale prices. Members interested in the details of these operations can find them in a press release and a statement issued by the board on March 24.

Some subsidies are also being paid to permit the sale of leather footwear and of leather clothing at the retail ceiling prices. In the case of footwear, the problem arose from the fact that the goods sold during the base period were made back in the spring of 1941 and the cost of manufacturing such footwear increased by some 15 per cent between that time and the base period. Somehow this increase in costs had to be borne without any increase in the retail price, if the principle of maintaining the ceiling was to be observed, as the board felt it must be. After a thorough investigation of all the circumstances, it was decided that part of the increased costs, amounting to about 8 per cent, would be shared equally by the manufacturer, on the one hand, and the wholesalers and retailers, on the other, and that the government, through the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, would pay a subsidy to manufacturers equal to 7 per cent of the selling price of their shoes to enable them to sell at reduced prices. This subsidy was only to be paid pending the working out of measures to eliminate unnecessary costs. Advisory committees have been established by the industry to devise methods of simplication and cost reduction, mainly I think by the reduction of the numbers of styles of shoes. Extensive plans are being made to that end. It is the intention of the board to see that as soon as possible costs are reduced to the point where the subsidy can be discontinued.

The case of leather for clothing is more complicated in detail, and I would refer hon. members to a statement of the board, dated February 13, and various orders issued at that time. Again the problem arose from the substantial increase in the cost of production that took place between the time when the goods sold in the base period were manufactured and the time that they were sold, establishing the ceiling for the seller. It was arranged that tanners would reduce their prices of leather below those they received in the base period, thereby absorbing part of the squeeze, some of which, however, was to be borne by the wholesalers and retailers. A subsidy was provided for the tanners to enable them to sell at these specially reduced prices, the amount of the subsidy being related to the reduction in the particular prices concerned. The various branches of the industry involved are being asked to cut their costs as rapidly as they can, in order to make possible the reduction or elimination of the subsidy.

Announcement has recently been made of subsidies to be made available for about 40 grocery items specified in order 116 of the board, dated March 23. The need for this subsidy arises out of the same sort of time lags that have been noted above in connection with leather items and the 1941 canned food pack. The manufacturers' prices for these goods have increased in the months preceding the base period, and many retailers were selling at prices below those appropriate to the higher manufacturers' and wholesalers' prices prevailing in the base period, although some other retailers had increased their prices to correspond with this rise in wholesale prices. The board and the administrators struggled with the problem created by this situation for months, endeavouring to find the most satisfactory solution to it, meantime imposing a very difficult burden upon many retailers. Finally the decision was reached that the only practicable method to solve the problem was to require the manufacturers to reduce their prices back to June 1941 levels, at which all or nearly all retailers can replace their goods at prices which enable them to sell at their ceiling prices. Those retailers whose base period prices were based upon higher wholesale or manufacturers' prices than the new ones are required to reduce their retail prices by an amount corresponding to the reduction in manufacturers' prices. To enable manufacturers to sell at their lower June prices rather than at the later prices of the base period, despite the increase in costs which occurred in the interval, the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation is preparing to pay them a subsidy based upon and not exceeding the reduction in prices below those prevailing in the base period.

In the case of these grocery items, where the number of producers and dealers will likely prove to be very large and where there will be a difficult problem in assessing how far the industries and trades concerned are in fact able to bear the increases in cost without help by way of subsidy, a special condition has been attached to the payment of subsidies to provide a sort of automatic check that will ensure that subsidies are not paid to businesses which do not in fact require them in order to sell at the designated prices. This provision is to the effect that the subsidy shall not increase the net profits of the business after taxes beyond the level of net profits after taxes in the standard period as established for excess profits tax purposes. In order to carry out this provision, the corporation will only pay such subsidies in the form of accountable advances and final settlement of the subsidy claim will be delayed until the claimant is able to furnish the necessary information respecting his profits in the fiscal period concerned.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Would the minister permit a question there? Would the standard profit for the base period apply also to provision (B) in the Excess Profits Tax Act which sets a base? There are two bases, one the standard period of four years and the other agreed-on as standard profits.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I understand it, it is the standard profits based on the four-year average. I do not remember what (B) is.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Section (B) provides for a standard profit to be agreed upon.

Mr. ILSLEY: Argeed upon by whom?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): By the manufacturer and the department.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not familiar with section (B). The intention here is to take the standard profits under the Excess Profits Tax Act, whatever they are.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): The minister mentioned the four-year period, modifying the standard profits obtained by averaging the four-year period.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have to get information on that. It is a point I am not able to clear up at the moment.

This concludes what I have to say at this time on subsidies or types of subsidies, but there are a few important points about them which I would like to emphasize.

In the first place it should be realized clearly that the subsidies are being paid in the interests of the consumer. They are paid when there is no other way of ensuring adequate supplies of a particular product for the consumer at prices permitted by the price ceiling. In principle, these subsidies are paid to the consumer to keep down the cost of living. In practice, because consumers are so numerous, they are paid to producers or dealers on condition that they maintain supplies and carry out the policy of the price ceiling by supplying goods to others at such prices as will permit them in turn to operate within the limits of the price ceiling.

Any statements therefore that the XY company or the AB company is receiving such and such subsidies are misleading. A subsidy may be of no advantage to the firm receiving it except that it will permit others to continue to buy from it. By law consumers are prevented from buying at higher than ceiling prices. It is an obligation of the government therefore to see that goods are available at the ceiling prices.

When it has been determined that a subsidy is necessary, the point in the trade at which it is paid is a matter of administrative convenience. Since there are many more consumers than dealers and many more dealers than producers, subsidies (aside from import subsidies) are more likely to be paid to producers. What are in effect subsidies to consumers are paid at a point in the trade where the basis of the subsidies can be most readily and quickly verified.

The second point arises out of the first, and it is that the subsidy paid to any particular industry or any particular firm does not constitute a benefit given to it, for the subsidy is conditioned upon certain action which increases the costs or reduces the receipts of the industry or firm. It is a fundamental principle that the industry or trade receiving a subsidy should bear a part of the increased costs in respect of which the subsidy is paid. In other words, the subsidy, in conjunction with the special conditions attached to it, should leave the industry in a worse, not a better, profit position than before the price ceiling was imposed. The Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation makes every practical effort to check the facts supporting claims for subsidy and the good faith of the applicants, so as to ensure that all payments are within the principles which apply to the subsidy in question. Under the heavy pressure of a programme of such magnitude as universal price control, however, it is necessary to take short-cut methods of investigation, and to apply sound business judgment rather than the exhaustive statistical analysis which a more leisurely examination would make possible. It is essential that claims be dealt with promptly so as to ensure an orderly and continued supply of goods.

The third point I would emphasize is that the board and the government are laying great stress upon the reduction of costs by means of standardization, simplification and the elimination of all unnecessary frills and services. We hope by means of such reduction in costs to eliminate or at least drastically reduce the need for domestic subsidies. I think all business men are anxious to co-operate to this end, because they see the need for it and most of them, we find, are reluctant to accept subsidies from the government, even under present conditions, and they are trying to cut costs so that they will not need to depend on help from us. But the importance of this simplification programme extends far beyond the elimination of subsidies. The reductions in costs that can be achieved by eliminating frills, unnecessary services, unnecessary varieties and patterns, etc., are very real national gains at a time such as this. We cannot afford to waste either materials or manpower on frills or fancy varieties. Consequently I am, on behalf of the government, urging the board to press ahead with its cost reduction programme, and I am glad to say that the board itself is equally convinced of the very real value of this part of its work. I certainly hope that all businesses in this country—whether manufacturers or distributors—will cooperate to the full extent of their ability in this simplification programme.

I understand that in some conferences which have been held the question has been raised as to whether this is merely a board programme or whether it is a government programme. I want to make it very clear here to-day that this programme of standardization and simplification and economies in production has the sanction of the government, is in accord with the wishes of the government, and is regarded as extremely important by the government.

In combination with this programme of simplified practice being worked out in co-operation with industry, the system of subsidies constitutes a fully mobile, not static, defence against the pressure of costs on prices. We cannot hold up supplies while we are searching out the possibilities of cost reduction. Subsidies ensure current supplies. Simplification and standardization will reduce costs and permit subsidies to be discontinued. I do not suggest that all domestic subsidies can be thus eliminated, but many of them can and will. I referred earlier to subsidies made available on some 40 grocery items on March 23. Arrangements are being worked out which will eliminate a number of those items from subsidy. The picture which some people have drawn of a system of subsidies to vested interest, a system into which the government would sink deeper and deeper and never be able to withdraw, has no relation to the facts.

I should like to be able to give the house a reasonably accurate estimate of the cost of these subsidies this year and in future, but that is not possible. Their amount will depend on a large variety of circumstances which cannot be foreseen, particularly on the costs of import and of shipping, and on the speed with which savings can be effected by the simplification programme I have just referred to. Subsidies paid on a product of universal consumption will necessarily appear large in total. Of course the saving they make possible to consumers will be correspondingly large. After nearly 5 months of operation of the price ceiling, the subsidies actually paid make quite a small total, about $2,125,000 up to April 21. They will increase, of course, as the full volume of purchases is reflected in them and as more claims are submitted for imports that have been made. There is no evidence or reason to believe that they can ever reach the fantastic totals of several hundred million dollars suggested in some quarters. I have included, however, in making up the estimates I gave the house when I introduced this war appropriation resolution, an arbitrary figure of $50,000,000 for this purpose. Some details of the amounts expended in subsidies on various items are given in a table which I have here and which I will place on Hansard at this point, with the consent of the house.

Just here I want to say to anyone to whom the sum of $50,000,000 looks large—

Mr. MacINNIS: It was large at one time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. In the United States I understand it is thought that unless the price situation is taken in hand, costs may rise at the rate of two or three per cent a month. If costs were allowed to go; if we were to remove our control and let the price level rise in this country, and it rose not two or three per cent a month but twenty per cent in a year, and it that full twenty per cent were reflected in increases in government expenditures alone, the increased government expenditure would be $700,000,000, because in the next fiscal year our expenditures will be about $3.500,000,000. But the increased cost to the government is not the serious feature of the situation at all; it is not a one-hundredth part of the trouble the country would be in. It is not the taxpayer, as such, that is the victim of inflation, even if he does have to pay $700,000,000 more in the course of a year. It is the workman, the consumer, and practically everybody in the country. And more serious than that, in a period of rising prices such as that everyone begins to try to rectify his own personal situation. He begins to wonder whether others are not getting a little better treatment in the situation than he is. The economic situation is changing very rapidly. The person in receipt of a pension says, "I cannot stand this; I have to have an increase in my pension." The wage earner says, "I must have an increase in my wages." Strikes and disputes between labour and capital take place. There are differences of opinion as to the quantum of increase suited to the rising price level, and so on. The result is turmoil and disorder throughout practically all centres of your economy.

As I said last fall, I cannot imagine anything internally which would have a more destructive or disruptive effect on the war effort than a rapidly rising price level in Canada. So that if the cost of these subsidies can be kept within reasonable dimensions—and I am sure it can—it is an insignificant cost to pay, as compared with the evils which we will avoid by using it.

Mr. COLDWELL: In other words it is insurance against inflated prices?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it is a very reasonable insurance premium.

Attempts to estimate the ultimate annual total of subsidies are likely to be unprofitable because, as I have said, the deciding circumstances cannot be forecast. There are certain considerations worth bearing in mind, however. The fact that a subsidy is paid initially is no evidence that it will be continued indefinitely. Many interim subsidies have been established so that supplies can be obtained quickly and freely. Investigations are now proceeding to determine more precisely the extent to which economies and standardization can be effected, and what amount of subsidy, if any, will continue to be required, and whether alternative supplies are available without subsidy. The basis of subsidies is continually under review. Experience will show which are essential and which are not.

If certain essential supplies are to be obtained, some increases in cost must be paid because those costs cannot be avoided. The question to be decided is whether they will be paid directly by the consumer in the form of higher prices, or by the consumers as citizens and taxpayers through the government treasury. I am satisfied that the cost to the country at large is much less and is much more equitably distributed by meeting these costs at this time by means of these subsidies paid on a conservative basis, rather than through permitting increases in prices above the legal ceiling and leading to great difficulties in the maintenance of the established level of prices.

There have been a number of questions raised concerning the amounts of subsidies paid to individual firms or businesses and requests that such information be furnished to parliament. After very careful study of this subject, I have come to the conclusion that it is definitely not in the public interest currently to give the names of persons to whom subsidies are being paid, or the amount paid to each. To do so would reveal to competitors and others intimate details of the nature and volume of such person's business. The principle of refusing such detailed information has always been followed in connection with both the payment and drawback or refund of duties and excise and other commodity taxes, income taxes and similar items. As I have already emphasized, subsidy payments by the commodity prices stabilization corporation are not really subsidies to any manufacturer, importer or dealer, but are in reality subsidies for the benefit of Canadian consumers, and are paid solely for the purpose of making goods available to consumers at prices prescribed by the board. Consequently the important facts are the amounts of subsidies necessary to stabilize prices of each class or kind of commodities or particular commodities, and not the channels through which such subsidy payments may happen to be made.

Moreover, the conditions attached to the payment of specific subsidies may reflect many different forms of adjustments, and payments to individual businesses could be most misleading without full reports in regard to all the arrangements made with the interested parties. For example, in some cases a subsidy nominally paid to manufacturers or distributors may carry a condition requiring the effect of it to be carried through a line of dealers until eventually it appears in the cost at the retail store. Another example is the kind of subsidy arranged for milk, in which case it is paid as a matter of convenience to the milk distributors, on the specific condition that it be used to increase the price paid for raw milk delivered by the dairy farmer.

I am confident that when members reflect upon what I have said and the various examples I have given them of these subsidies, detailed information on which is available in the published statements and orders of the board, they will not continue to request information on subsidies currently being paid to individual businesses, which would only be apt to lead to misunderstanding and unfounded charges.

At the same time my feeling is that at the appropriate time information as to the individual recipients of subsidy payments should be given to the members of the house. I have carefully considered methods by which this can properly be done.

First, I was of opinion that I should offer to lay this information confidentially before the war expenditures committee. This course, however, has certain disadvantages. I am afraid that the information would be referred to in the house, not in breach of confidence, but in such a way as to cloak subsidy payments with an air of mystery. This is undesirable and would lead to misconstruction by the public.

The second method that I have considered is to see that the information is presented either in the form of a special report by the board or in the report of the auditor general or the public accounts with the other accounts of the fiscal year. The information would not then be presented piecemeal and with inadequate explanation but would be presented in such a way that the qualifications and conditions necessary to the presentation of a fair and complete picture would not be absent.

It must be remembered that we are in the early stages of a most difficult programme and it is possible that the implications of any method of presenting this information are not fully realized. My present view is that after the end of each fiscal year there should be a complete report of some kind along the lines I have indicated, and that course will be adopted unless, in the meantime, some compelling reason appears why it should not, in which case I will make a statement to the house before the end of the present session, a statement that the house will have full opportunity of debating.

I have given this matter full consideration, and, while I do not ask the committee at this time to accept this disposition of the matter, I wish they would consider it, because I think they will realize this is the best way to handle the situation.

Mr. LOCKHART: I realize that the problem is an extremely difficult one to handle. Do I understand that matters such as I have raised privately, with respect to the importations of certain fruit juices, for instance grape fruit juice, and so on, are being given serious consideration?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: So that the public will not have any misapprehension about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is correct. In the list of subsidies the hon. member will find the amount of subsidy paid on the importation of that particular commodity.

Mr. LOCKHART: And an honest effort is being made to reduce that type of subsidy.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that particular subsidy has been receiving consideration, and is at the present time.

Before concluding, I would like to say a few words about some of the criticisms that have been made of our subsidy policy. Most of these criticisms have, I believe, been vague and general in nature and of a negative character, rather than constructive. I would urge those who wish to criticize the government's policies both in regard to subsidies and in regard to the price ceiling in general, to be as specific and precise as they can, and to consider carefully the various alternatives to the policies which they criticize or condemn. It is only when there is an alternative open that criticism is really useful, particularly at a time like this when we must act and act quickly.

There are two general types of criticism to be considered—criticism of principle and criticism of detail. In regard to principle, I believe I have set forth my views at sufficient length to make clear the answers to many of the points that have been raised. Many of the other criticisms of principle apply really to the whole price ceiling policy, and it would lead me too far afield to go into that at length to-day. However, there are a number of points in regard to subsidies which perhaps it would be well to take up at this time. The first is the charge that subsidies cost a great deal and that we cannot, or should not, afford them at this time. To this I would reply that the real issue is whether the goods in question should or should not be produced or imported under present circumstances. If these goods are required, someone must meet the element of cost being covered by subsidies until the time when those costs can be reduced, if they can be reduced. We feel that the best and fairest method of meeting these additional costs is by means of subsidies paid at the cost of the public treasury rather than through allowing prices to go up, bearing in mind both the direct and the indirect effects of permitting prices to increase above the ceiling level. Certainly it is desirable, as I have emphasized, to eliminate costs rather than to meet them by subsidy or otherwise, at this time, and it is that which we are attempting to do to the limit of our ability, but until we can achieve those reductions, the subsidies are a useful and sensible means of ensuring supplies in the interim without disrupting our price policy. The cost of them is insignificant in relation to the very real benefits the country is deriving from the successful methods of preventing inflation at this time.

The second point I would mention is the suggestion that because we cannot estimate these costs we should not embark on this policy. I do not think a very extended reply is necessary to this point. Obviously at a time like this we must undertake action and measures the cost of which cannot be precisely forecast. If as time goes on we find the cost does become greater than is reasonable, greater than the value of the benefits which we obtain from our price control policy, then we will have to amend our policies, but as yet I see no indication that that contingency will arise.

Thirdly, there is the suggestion that the subsidies benefit or enrich certain producers or dealers. I think that what I have said above demonstrates clearly that these subsidies benefit consumers, and not the producer or dealer except to the extent that they enable the production or importation of necessary goods to be maintained. Subsidies are paid only when they are coupled with measures of control which throw a burden upon those who receive them and the net effect of price control and subsidies inevitably is to worsen and not improve the position of the recipients.

There is a fourth criticism that is suggested in some quarters: that somehow or other these subsidies are inflationary. The argument advanced in support of this point is apparently a subtle or even obscure one, but I think it desirable that we should take note of it. In my opinion, subsidies cannot properly be construed as inflationary. It may be suggested that the government by holding prices down with the aid of subsidies is encouraging the public to buy, and that somehow that is inflationary, and that it would be less inflationary if prices were allowed to rise and thereby cut down the buying of the public. This is certainly using the term "inflation" in an unusual sense. If supplies are dangerously short, their sale should be restricted by other means at this stage, rather than simply by an increase in prices that their producers and sellers are allowed to receive. To check sales by permitting prices to rise means in effect rationing supplies to the highest bidders, which means that those who have the long purses will get the most. It does not mean that there will be any fewer goods produced; it means that the people with the big incomes will get the goods. The government decided that that sort of thing should be prevented, and it had the support of the Canadian people in that decision. I believe that now more than ever it has their support. Moreover, if prices of goods were allowed to rise wherever the supply is short, that would put more funds in the hands of those who produce them and sell them, and would enable them to bid up the prices for labour and material to produce such goods, which would certainly be inflationary and might well interfere with our war programme. When we subsidize these items we are able to scrutinize and regulate the amount of production and to prevent this undesirable competition with the war programme and inflationary results. Perhaps those who suggest that the subsidies are inflationary have in mind that they somehow put more funds at the disposal of the producers, who will go on to spend them. This same effect, however, would be produced by a rise in prices, since the producers would obtain additional funds in that process just as they would through the payment of subsidies, and they would not be subject to the same control.

There have not been enough criticisms of detail for me to take them up at any length to-day. Such criticisms are appropriate subjects of discussion in this house, and I would certainly welcome any comments that members can make on the details as I have set them forth and as they are published by the board from time to time. One obvious line of detailed criticism will be as to whether or not various items being subsidized are essential; whether, for example, certain types of imports should be subsidized. That is a live issue at the moment. There are a number of items which we are importing from the United Kingdom and for which we pay in sterling. Under present circumstances it costs the nation nothing, or practically nothing, to obtain these goods as long as the British are able to send them to us, and a small subsidy paid to enable them to come in does serve a useful purpose. Other cases, however, will be less obvious, and undoubtedly members will wish to discuss them. It should be borne in mind that, where prices have gone up abroad or where higher shipping or other costs have increased the cost to us of imports by substantial amounts, to rule such imports ineligible for subsidy means placing an embargo upon their entry into Canada, and means requiring the public to do without them. We can certainly ask the public to do without many things these days and I think we can take a fairly stern attitude in this respect and secure the wholehearted approval of the Canadian people in doing so. We must also bear in mind at the same time the effects on our own supply condition of diverting demand from imports or from relatively less essential to more essential goods.

Just a word or two in conclusion. I know the committee realizes, as does the public, the magnitude and difficulties of the task that the government has assumed in launching and applying its price ceiling policy. There is general recognition that no more courageous policy and no more difficult administrative task have ever been undertaken in this or any other democratic country. The work of the wartime prices and trade board and of its chairman has been of an exceptionally high character. Mistakes have probably been made, but these have been minor. On the whole, the price ceiling policy and the work of the board have received the commendation and commanded the admiration not only of the Canadian people but of observers in other countries.

This policy is a test of the capacity of this democracy to organize and discipline itself in such a way as to wage total war on the economic front. I had many misgivings at the outset as to whether we could succeed. I now believe that we can and will. We can only do so, however, if this parliament approaches its task of criticism in the proper spirit. If any hon. member wishes to launch a frontal attack on the ceiling policy, it is needless to say that he has the right to do so. The issue can be squarely joined with such hon. member and the matter fought out on its merits. What I do ask is that if there are any hon. members who feel that way about the ceiling policy, they say so frankly and attack frontally.

If their criticisms are merely criticisms of detail, I ask that they make them with a due sense of responsibility as to the gravity of the issues involved. Suggestions as to methods in which the policy can be improved in execution are, of course, welcome. These suggestions should, however, be constructive rather than purely destructive. They should take into account not one factor alone in the situation but, as far as possible, all factors in the situation. They should go beyond mere sniping at the board or at the details of administration.

I would like to feel that all hon. members of the house, whether they criticise or praise, will do so in a responsible and patriotic attempt to assist the government in making a success of its efforts to attain an end admitted by all to be of the utmost importance for the welfare of the nation and success in the war.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): If it be in order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few general observations at this stage.

The general statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) is appreciated not only by the house but, I am sure, by the country. But of what the minister said in the last five or ten minutes of his remarks the member for Danforth was not overly appreciative, because I am of opinion that very few members in this honourable chamber would desire to make indirect attacks which might undermine, although the minister did not use that word, the work of the board, rather than make a frontal attack. The minister did refer to indirect criticism which might tend to destroy the structure which he is at present building. With all respect to the minister I do not accept his last remarks, which had a sort of schoolteacher effect upon the mind of the member for Danforth at least.

The minister went to some length to explain that the government had adopted this price ceiling policy and now could not vary very much from it because, if they varied from the principles laid down—I presume when he said "principles" he had also in mind the basic period to which the price ceiling policy applied—not only those charged with the responsibility of producing products for the people of Canada but those who consume the goods, and particularly the housewives who in the final analysis do the greater part of the family purchasing, would be confused.

Just why the forty commodities mentioned in the grocery trade were taken out of the September-October bracket and put back to the June date is something which I hope will be enlarged on while this subject is under discussion. It certainly was confusing to most of those in the trade; and if a subsidy of the amount mentioned by the minister, namely $50,000,000, might obtain in the course of the twelve months, surely there was ample to take care of the period from June to September without confusing the entire section of the trade which had to do with that certain set of commodities. While the subsidy is available to those who are producing goods in the particular class even from June, 1941, the minister will agree with me that raw materials so far as cost of production is concerned, in comparison with other essential goods apart from those that are listed, went through a period of advanced costs from June to September. The raw material of the commodities was costing progressively more in June, July, August and September, and then the advance was halted in October. That is quite all right. But to take up that period from June to September not only will create a hardship, which to some degree will be offset by the subsidies to be paid, but will cause those engaged in the production of these commodities to appear to be asking something which is not in line with what obtained in September and October, and it is going to bear very heavily on the subsidy fund.

The subsidy is to be paid to those who have just cause for compensation in that the ceiling price which obtained in June was much lower than that which obtained in September and therefore they experience a considerable loss in bringing the price back to the June selling price. But it is going to be controlled or checked. I am quite in accord with some method of control or checking. When I interrupted the minister, I did not wish to interfere with the sequence of his remarks, but as they were being read I recognized that he could return to the sentence at the point where he left off and not lose the continuity of his remarks. Under wartime price order No. 116 the base period of four years would govern the maximum profits which could be made by anyone claiming the subsidy. But I think the minister will agree that if during that base period an organization had a loss in each and every year, his putting in that phrase "four-year period" had not to do with the standard profits. I think his sentence should have stopped with the "standard profits in accordance with the act", rather than adding the phrase "over a four-year period".

I was going to ask the minister, although I might defer it to some later stage, whether, before a change is ordered, any contact is made with the trade that are supplying different commodities. There is some criticism that these orders are coming too thick and fast. I would prefer to see these subsidies used more to iron out difficulties to having regulations coming out one after the other, some of which in due course must be rescinded or amended. In other words, I am of opinion that in Canada we who are engaged in industry are getting regulations faster than we can take them,—leaving the impression that our democratic organization known as government has a tendency to become a little autocratic.

There is another observation I should like to make with regard to this ceiling, particularly referring to the June-September reversal or squeeze which caused some squeals and squeaks when it went into effect on March 24 last. The labour costs went on until September, and the cost of living bonus is taking care of the situation fairly well so far as labour is concerned. In passing, may

I remark that the cost of living index as determined by our bureau does not take care of the actual increase; there seems to be something which is not included. But labour costs rose in that period, and for those manufacturing the goods to have to extract back from this fund the labour costs is just adding another burden. Whereas the industry and the individual workman received their increase, costs in respect of these forty items reversed as at June, although the average cost of living went up between June and September.

In the main this legislation is necessary now. Mark you, I am careful not to say that it is sound for an ordinary economy; it may be sound for a wartime economy. But in the final analysis it is driving individual enterprise to lean on governments and not exercise the initiative which ordinarily we find among the people of our country.

One other observation I should like to make. If the subsidy is going to be paid to any industry, and the sum payable is to be lessened by the amount of excess profits made during the fiscal period under review, then if there are sufficient excess profits in the industry there will be no subsidy, the only subsidy payable being that portion which is left after excess profits are deducted. Then they will find that they come into this difficult field: an industry may be in a score of lines which are not necessarily departmentalized. I think the act covers excess profits made in all lines of business conducted by the particular enterprise making a claim for subsidy.

I warn the minister and the department that this part of order No. 116 of the wartime prices and trade board is going to tend to break corporations down into smaller units. The units which are profitable will probably make their returns under one company, and those that require subsidies for the portion of their business which they are operating at a loss and which comes under this act, will be segregated in a corporation under their control. In that way the provisions of the order of the board providing for over-all profits on all their operations will be circumvented. I mention this as a constructive point, but I am sure that the department is apprised of it. I want it to go out to industry in this country that this parliament is fully aware of what is going on and of what might be running through their minds. I want it to be known that we do not intend to tolerate any circumvention of the act by that particular method.

I hesitate to mention any particular commodity, but this is necessary in order to illustrate the point I want to make, not only with regard to imports coming into the country, but with regard to exports going out. Because of prevailing prices, particularly in the United States, the export of certain lines of commodities from Canada has been quite profitable to some of our United States friends who are in a similar line of trade. Large tonnages of commodities find their way to the United States market, and the result is that there are shortages of raw materials in this country. In order to meet the requirements of Canada, and in view of the fact that there is a ceiling on the selling prices of the finished Canadian products, Canadian industry has had to go farther afield for raw materials. This has caused increased costs, and they have suffered to some extent.

While it is not the example I have in mind, perhaps the one I intend to give will bring this matter more forcibly to the attention of hon. members than anything else. I refer to the export of live cattle, which is causing a shortage of beef . This one industry seems to be curtailing their production of beef because they were losing a few shekels in that particular branch of their business. I suggest that the government could very well consider this situation and see to it that they keep on producing the normal requirements of the Canadian consuming public until such time as prices in the United States and Canadian markets adjust themselves. They should not embarrass our Canadian economy by allowing a supply of that commodity to be exported off the market. If subsidies are to be available to take care of excess import prices, some consideration should be given to subsidies to balance export prices.

I am satisfied that in the main industry will work closely with the government to help out during this war-time crisis. I am also strongly of opinion that orders from the wartime prices and trade board should be slowed down a little in order to give the Canadian people a chance to catch their breath. Before I sit down I should like to leave one thought with those engaged in industry. I do not purpose to speak for industry only; I happen to be a farmer as well, in common with many others in the house. But I do hope that industry will hear the echo from this sounding board of public opinion, namely, the Canadian House of Commons, and understand that we expect them to carry on and play their full part during this war-time emergency, even though they find themselves not able always to have a credit balance.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to say a word about the course this discussion has taken. It is in order for this matter to be discussed now, but at the same time it was arranged that so far as possible we would consider the army, the navy, the air force and munitions in that order. I merely suggest to the committee that perhaps this matter could be more profitably discussed if the prepared statement which I delivered this afternoon were read and considered first. An appropriate time could be set later on for discussion in accordance with the convenience of hon. members. My colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), is ready to answer questions. As I said before, this is merely a suggestion. I do not know how far to go in attempting to organize the proceedings of the committee in connection with this particular measure. It would be in order for hon. members to go over the whole field of every department; but if the committee sees fit, it could go on with the army and then come back to this matter on some future occasion. If hon. members prefer to discuss this now, they are in order, but I would recommend the other course.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am inclined to agree in the main with the minister that discussion would probably be more profitable after we have had an opportunity of reading his statement and making a study of it. I do not know the desire of the committee, but if there is going to be a general discussion, there are some things I should like to say now. If, however, it is agreed that we let this matter rest until we have studied the statement, I am quite content to reserve any remarks I have until that time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand it is the wish of the acting leader of the opposition (Mr. Stirling) that we go on with the army estimates. Is that correct?

Mr. STIRLING: I suggest that it would be quite convenient to those who sit around me if we proceeded with the original suggested order of army, navy, air force and munitions, and then at a later date, when hon. members have had an opportunity to read and consider this long statement by the Minister of Finance, this matter can be discussed.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am quite agreeable if that is to be the procedure, although there are one or two questions that might be raised at the moment. For example, there is the situation that exists with regard to certain agricultural products, notably beef, of which we have been hearing, and the effect of the policy upon the agricultural producer of that and other commodities. I am, however, quite willing to proceed as suggested by the acting leader of the opposition and discuss these matters at a later date.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that would be best. The only reason why I broke in with this statement was because it had to be made; there was so much discussion and so many surmises about subsidies that I simply had to make the statement, and so it was announced earlier in the week that I would.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Agriculture be prepared next week to make some statement regarding these agricultural commodities, particularly beef, about which there is much controversy?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not a thing has been done about beef. It is just controversy.

Mr. COLDWELL: But we get a great many communications about it.

Mr. GRAYDON: The controversy is because nothing has been done.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Our group would be quite content to have the discussion come at a later time. I think, however, it is in order for me to say briefly that we support the minister in his efforts; we believe he has done a very fine job. Our one general criticism would be that too little attention has been given to the productive element of our economy; that is, not enough profit has been allowed, or not enough opportunity even to clear costs and make a living has been allowed to the farmers and other primary producers, resulting in just such things as the beef situation, and certain to result in trouble over sugar, molasses, alcohol, wool, and a great many other commodities as sure as we are here. Having said that, we will just call it a day as far as my group is concerned and be ready to go into the discussion at a later date.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence how many privates and non-commissioned officers of the Canadian army overseas have returned to Canada for the purpose of qualifying as officers? In this connection I should also like to know how many privates and non-commissioned officers in the Canadian army overseas have received commissions overseas without returning to Canada, if any.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot give an answer to the last question. With regard to the first, the policy is to receive about one hundred a month from the ranks overseas for qualification at Brockville and Gordon Head. I cannot tell my hon. friend at the present moment how many have actually come back.

In that connection, dealing with something that was said by the hon. member for Cape Breton South yesterday and by someone else with regard to promotion of officers generally, I have inquired with reference to cadets training at Brockville, and I find that 65 per cent of the cadets training are those recommended from the ranks; about 35 per cent are officers, most of whom I think are those who have received commissions in the technical services, such as engineers, ordnance, signals, et cetera, men who are qualified mechanically or industrial engineers, who either have been at universities as teachers, or are university graduates who came from either civil life or directly from universities in order to take particular jobs where their special qualifications fitted them to serve. There are a few who have been recommended from the reserve army, but those are all active service men. As I understand it, those being recommended from the reserve army will from now on be very few, if any, on account of the low medical categories and age limits for the reserve army.

Mr. WHITE: What is the educational standard that is set for non-commissioned officers and privates who are recommended for commission, if there is a certain standard, and what allowances, if any, are made from that?

Mr. RALSTON: The minimum is junior matriculation.

Mr. WHITE: Is that always insisted upon, or is it waived in certain circumstances.

Mr. RALSTON: Without looking over the roll I cannot tell, but that is the standard set. If my hon. friend knows of any instance, I shall be glad to look it up.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to ask the minister with regard to what seems to me a vicious practice that has grown up; that is the practice of discharging men who have been invalided home, and turning them over to the Department of Pensions and National Health for care and support. I do not remember a great deal about the last war; but if I remember correctly, my own father was in hospital for a considerable time after the war. In the last war if men were wounded or invalided home, they were a charge upon the Department of National Defence and received pay and allowances until they were discharged. I find now to my surprise several cases of the kind I have mentioned. Take one in particular, a young man wounded in England, and invalided home. I saw him during the Easter recess. He still has a tube in his side, and has a prospect of perhaps half a dozen operations. He now finds he is going to be invalided out, discharged from the army and turned over to the Department of Pensions and National Health. That department will be responsible for giving him hospital and medical care. I believe he can claim some $9 a week. If he were married it would be $13.50 a week. It may be necessary for this man to get treatment over a long time. It is not quite so bad for a single man, but I had a case of a man who developed pneumonia, one lung being affected. He was discharged from the care of the Department of National Defence and put in a sanatorium as a civilian. His wife found her separation allowance stopped. When she came and told me about it I could not believe it, but I got in touch with the authorities and found it correct. He is now a civilian under the care of the Department of Pensions and National Health, despite the fact that he is not yet able to take his place in a civilian occupation.

Could the minister give some statement as to what the policy is in that regard? Does the Department of National Defence discharge a man when it finds he is going to be invalided out? Does the separation allowance stop, and is that man dependent entirely on the $9, or $13.50 a week if married, for his support and that of his family?

Mr. RALSTON: The general statement is that the Department of National Defence does discharge a man when he is physically unfit for further service. That is obviously necessary, otherwise we would be showing on our strength men who could not serve.

There is no break between the discharge and the Department of Pensions and National Health taking on and seeing that the man is given treatment because he has become a civilian. I do not think my hon. friend objects to that; if he is discharged he would become a civilian. Then he is taken over by the Department of Pensions and National Health and given treatment. If he is mendable he is not discharged; he goes to a military hospital for treatment. If the prognosis turns out eventually to be wrong and it is found that he cannot be restored to a category which would enable him to serve, then he would be discharged and go to the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As I remember, the practice in the last war was that even a man who had been badly wounded was not discharged. I have seen men in the Deer Lodge hospital who would never fight again, but they were in uniform, receiving army pay and family separation allowances. Why the difference in the treatment now?

Mr. RALSTON: I think my hon. friend will find that when men are in England they are treated there and treated until they become convalescent. Then, of course, if the prognosis is such that they cannot be restored to their units, they are sent home here; and if further treatment is required, they are taken over by the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not referring to treatment in England, but after the last war men were in Deer Lodge hospital in Winnipeg for several years following the war. They were still soldiers, receiving army pay and allowances.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend mean that Deer Lodge was operating under the Department of National Defence? I think Deer Lodge is under the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, but as I understood it, the men in the hospital were still in uniform, still receiving army pay and allowances.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid my hon. friend and I are at cross-purposes. Deer Lodge is a hospital under the Department of Pensions and National Health. My hon. friend says the men were in uniform, but I have said that, generally speaking, the men are discharged, and then go to the Department of Pensions and National Health as civilians. My colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health tells me that as soon as the men are fully convalescent they are given vocational training, or some sort of rehabilitation training, during which they are kept on pay and allowances. Perhaps the best thing for me to do is to get a little more information about the matter. I am only telling my hon. friend the general principles, and I do not think my hon. friend has in mind what the army does, because I cannot conceive that a man, having been discharged from the army, would continue to receive pay and allowances. I shall, however, find out what compensation is given men after they have been transferred to the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Probably I did not make myself clear. I was not referring to Deer Lodge hospital at the present time, but after the last war I had occasion to visit some of the military hospitals, and I noticed that even one or two years after the war was over, men were still wearing their uniform blue. To my knowledge, and I am trusting entirely to my memory—

Mr. RALSTON: The blue is the hospital uniform.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): To the best of my memory these men were still receiving army pay, and their families were still being paid separation allowances. Apparently that principle is not being followed this time. What provision is made for a man's family upon his being discharged and turned over to the Department of Pensions and National Health?

[Mr. T. C. Douglas.]

Mr. RALSTON: I said I would find that out myself, but I would rather have my colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health answer the question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If the man discharged is awaiting decision on entitlement to pension, family allowances may be granted for a period of 122 days. By that time, of course, the entitlement will be determined by the board. Of course, if the man is finally discharged from hospital, the various provisions of the post-discharge order of October 1 would come into effect, in regard to whatever sort of compensation he could qualify for; and in addition, of course, he is entitled to free treatment for most remedial conditions, but not to pay and allowances, for a whole year after his discharge.

Mr. GILLIS: Just to follow that up, these things all sound very nice when explained in the house, and they look fairly well on paper, but in practice they are not working out in that way. Last November I had occasion to be in Halifax doing some work at Camp Hill hospital in reference to old soldiers. There was a board of inquiry there looking into the administration of the hospital; there had been numerous complaints. Doctor Miller was there at the time. The situation, as I heard it discussed to-day by the hon. member for Weyburn, worked out there in this way. A large number of men were coming in from the military districts. The regular doctors were boarding them. Take the case of a man who was recommended for discharge. The treatment branch of pensions and national health then found themselves with a civilian on their hands, and they had no authority to treat that man. I know of one or two cases in which a man required a serious operation. Apparently pensions and national health had no authority to have that operation performed, because the man was recommended for discharge. In one case the man had to go to Kentville and undergo the operation; he had to pay for it himself and then found that he was unable to accept employment. I do not know whether that case was settled, but at that time there was quite a controversy going on in the hospital. I took the trouble then to go across to the camp and talk to some of the officials there. I did not find one of them satisfied with the arrangement. I thought I had some conception of the regulations, but certainly my understanding of them was not being carried out there. The treatment branch of pensions and national health find themselves with a civilian on their hands, discharged by the regular army. They are without authority to treat him, or pay him allowances, or anything else; he must go through all the machinery of rehabilitation. That is the way in which it was working out at that time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not the correct way, according to the provisions of the various orders in council.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not think it was.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If he is discharged while in hospital, he is either pensionable or not pensionable. If he requires treatment in the meantime, until such time as his pensionability is assessed, his family are entitled to allowances. If he is not a pensionable case, of course he would be immediately placed in the hands of our welfare officers, whose duty it is to look after him, follow him up, and see to what benefits he is entitled under the post-discharge regulations. I should be very glad if my hon. friend would give me privately the name of the man to whom he refers, in order that I may have it looked into immediately.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I have a similar case. A man came home on leave from the camp at Calgary. While home, he was taken violently ill and it was necessary to perform an emergency operation. His father wrote me, stating that he had to pay for the operation, which was performed in a local civilian hospital. The boy went back to camp, and his father has been trying to obtain some adjustment from the military authorities. What could be done in that case?

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will refer it to me, I will see what can be done, but this is the first I have heard of it. It must be an exceptional case. Of course, almost always in these cases which seem to be so obvious there is some fact which has been overlooked. I know nothing about the case, and I would not presume to pass judgment on it until I had all the facts, but I shall be very glad to look into the facts if my hon. friend will give me the name.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I can get it from my files.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to ask a question in regard to a matter of general policy, in order to clear up some misconceptions. Let us say a man returns to Lansdowne park after serving in England for a year and a half. He is placed in category E and discharged. Is the clothing allowance handed to him, or is the money given to some sergeant or other officer to spend as he wishes? In the second place, how long does it take before the man gets his month's pay and dependents' allowance? Supposing he leaves here on April 15 and goes back to his home city; how long should it be before he gets his pay?

Mr. RALSTON: I should think it would take only a short time, if all his documents were here.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister say two weeks would be too long?

Mr. RALSTON: My guess, again right off the bat without knowing the facts, would be two weeks. I suppose my hon. friend is going to say it took two months?

Mr. LOCKHART: No; but how can a man live in the meantime, a man who was getting only $1.30 a day, coming back to Canada without a cent in his pocket? Then he is given $35 for clothes, but is taken to a store here in Ottawa and apparently the money is spent without any direction at all on his part.

Mr. RALSTON: I have heard that statement before.

Mr. LOCKHART: I should like to have some general direction.

Mr. RALSTON: If I find it necessary I will deal with it myself.

Mr. LOCKHART: Does the man receive $35 himself, or is it spent for him?

Mr. RALSTON: There is no reason, so far as I know, why he should not receive it himself.

There were two or three questions asked me yesterday, and perhaps the committee would permit me to record my answers. Some hon. member asked me respecting the number of periods spent in connection with rifle and light machine-gun training. I have here a table respecting Camp Borden, which I shall place on record. This schedule shows the number of periods and the number of rounds fired at the various training centres.

Hon. members will recall that at Camp Borden there is basic training; a Canadian armoured corps training centre, which would be an advanced training centre; an infantry training centre, which is an advanced training centre; and a Royal Canadian Army Service Corps training centre, which is advanced, too. As a matter of fact, there are two armoured corps and two infantry training centres. The following is the information with respect to the standard periods of training in training centres at Camp Borden:

—	Advanced Training Centres
	Basic T.C.		C.A.C. T.C.		Inf. T.C.		R.C.A.S.C. T.C.
	Periods of Instruction	Rounds Fired	Periods of Instruction	Rounds Fired	Periods of Instruction	Rounds Fired	Periods of Instruction	Rounds Fired
Rifle.....	49	45	10	50	24	55	13	25
L.M.G. (Bren Gun)..	34	0	10 (Bren)	100	28	120	18	50
Anti-tank Rifle.....	0	0	6	32(·22″) 5(·55″)	6	32 (·22″)	6	32 (·22″)
Thompson Machine Gun (Tommy gun).	0	0	5	18	5	38	5	38

Hon. members will realize, of course, that when the period of instruction and the rounds fired for the Canadian armoured corps training centre, for instance, are indicated on the table, the amounts mentioned are in addition to the amounts indicated for basic training.

I might make a further explanation, with regard to the table in connection with the rounds fired from the anti-tank rifle. The ammunition for the anti-tank rifle has not been coming off in sufficient quantities for us to permit firing. But what we are doing is to use converters. That is to say, cartridges are fired through converters. Therefore a man gets practice in loading and aiming, but he fires a ·22 bullet instead of a ·55.

Mr. WHITE: While the syllabus shows the number of training periods and the number of rounds fired, I should like to know if the required number of rounds are actually fired, or if this is in fact only a syllabus. Is it only a paper syllabus? Is it carried out, and are those rounds actually fired?

Mr. RALSTON: It is practical military training; it is not a paper syllabus.

Mr. WHITE: The minister mentioned the anti-tank gun—

Mr. RALSTON: No, not the anti-tank gun; I referred to the anti-tank rifle. I shall deal with the anti-tank gun at a later time.

Mr. WHITE: I have been advised by people who, I have every reason to believe, have given me correct information, that on account of lack of ammunition, no private or no non-commissioned officer fires an anti-tank rifle.

Mr. RALSTON: As I have said, there is no ammunition; converters have just now been distributed. As a matter of fact, firing has commenced. Converters are now being distributed for use in connection with the anti-tank rifle to enable firing for practice purposes. We expect some ammunition from Canadian production within a short time. It is only recently that converters have been obtained and used.

Mr. WHITE: I said something yesterday to the minister about the firing of machine guns, and I mentioned the firing of fifteen rounds. The minister has given a great many more rounds to be fired in the ordinary course of training.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member is talking about the Bren gun?

Mr. WHITE: Yes, or the Lewis gun. I should like to be assured by the minister that every soldier training does actually fire, in practice, the number of rounds as set out in the syllabus. The minister said yesterday he did not have the necessary information. I should like to have accurate information, and I should like to have the minister advise the committee that a soldier does fire the actual number of rounds set out in the syllabus.

Mr. RALSTON: The chief of the general staff advises me, I can say, that that is the situation—that those rounds are fired.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister was going to say something about the anti-tank gun.

Mr. RALSTON: Did I use the words "anti-tank gun"?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, so far I have been talking about the anti-tank rifle.

I wish now to say a word about the anti-tank gun, because I think some inquiries were made about that gun by an hon. member on the other side of the house. With regard to the two-pounder anti-tank gun the committee will understand that those guns are not weapons for infantry units. Anti-tank guns are weapons used by armoured corps and artillery units. I may say with regard to the anti-tank gun that the ammunition is just beginning to come off the line. As a matter of fact, I have information to-day with respect to the number of rounds which have been distributed to the various training centres, and the number of rounds which remain on hand. Those are being fired at both types of training centre; that is, at armoured corps training centres and artillery training centres. Therefore do not be disappointed if you find that anti-tank guns are not being fired at infantry training centres. The reason is that they are not infantry weapons.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the muzzle velocity of the anti-tank gun?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Not even approximately?

Mr. RALSTON: It would only be a guess. Some hon. member asked about the filing of a syllabus. I do not know whether hon. members would be interested in the whole syllabus. I have consulted with the chief of the general staff, and as a result I have here a block syllabus for advanced training centres and infantry training centres. I do not wish to file particulars of the syllabus, but I should like to give a block syllabus which would indicate the division of periods and hours with respect to the various items of training at both advanced and infantry training centres.

First, with regard to basic training centres—

Mr. STIRLING: I understand the minister is entering into a new subject. Perhaps he would deal with that at eight o'clock.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, because I wish to give an explanation.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. RALSTON: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was proposing to comply with the request which had been made that I give the syllabus for the training centres. I have in my hand the standard syllabus which is in use at the basic training centres. I am sure that the committee does not desire me to read it in full, and if I may, I shall put the syllabus on Hansard, together with a memorandum explaining the abbreviations used. The syllabus shows the various subjects taken in, the total number of periods in the two months, and the number of periods spent in the eight weeks on these different subjects, with the total:

† Fieldcraft should be visualized as a "course" within the Syllabus and should be worked in with map reading in the 6th and 7th weeks of training.

‡ FT periods are only 30 minutes long. All other periods are 45 minutes. The weekly allotment includes one weekly "barrack-room" period under platoon NCOs for cleaning equipment, etc., as "make-and-mend periods".

N.B.—The periods laid down DO NOT include time for daily barrack-room duties, clothing or pay parades, ordinary recreational training, etc., time for which must be found outside the periods stated.

I will just run over the first column of the above table. Drill, foot, arm, saluting, 50 periods. I indicated before that the periods were 45 minutes, and I am advised that there are 8 of them in a day. That means there remain fifteen minutes of each hour during which the man is still on parade, and that period is used for a break-off and also for changing from one place to another. If there are any blanks, the time is used in the ordinary activities around the camp. Next is physical training, 40 periods; first aid, 20 periods; marching, 23 periods; rifle 26 periods—that is musketry apart from the rifle range; rifle range course, 18 periods; anti-aircraft, rifle and machine gun, 9 periods; bayonet, 15 periods; light machine gun, 30 periods; respirator course, against gas, 12 periods; fieldcraft, 18 periods; map reading, 22 periods; fundamental training, 20 periods; organized sports, 14 periods; reception and transfer, 20 periods; spare periods pool, 22 periods. The spare periods are for rainy days and give the course a flexibility which enables the chief instructor to introduce extra lectures or other matters which may come up and be of interest to those who are training and useful in connection with their work.

In addition, there are the usual activities around the camp, cleaning kit, making up bunks and all the work that has to be done in connection with accommodation and living, and all this is done outside the periods mentioned above in the syllabus. The total number of periods in the syllabus is 359, which means approximately 264 hours actually spent in taking the course, apart from the other activities I have mentioned.

For the advanced infantry training centre the syllabus is made up in much the same way, as follows:

NOTES: (a) Thirty-minute periods, all others forty-five.
(b) To be carried out during field training.
(c) Total to be carried down as "17" in case of MT, MC and carrier, finishing in Weeks 9 and 10.

It will be seen from the table that the syllabus for the advanced infantry training centre is made up in much the same way. The drill is cut down very considerably, there being 8 periods; physical training, 36 periods; marching, 53 periods—there is much more time spent in marching; map reading, 20 periods; fundamental training, 24 periods; protection against gas, 15 periods. There is a good deal of weapon training; rifle, 6 periods; light machine gun, 10 periods; anti-aircraft, 4 periods; bayonet, 16 periods; anti-tank rifle, 3 periods; two-inch mortar, 10 periods; grenades, 10 periods; fire orders—that is along with judging distance and visual training—4 periods; range courses, 32 periods—that is actual firing on the range; cooking in the field—there is no provision for that in the syllabus, but it is carried out during the field training, and comes later in the syllabus; organized sports, 16 periods; reception and transfer, 16 periods.

In addition, under infantry training, digging and wiring takes 32 periods; field training, 50 periods, and the spare pool amounts to 20 periods. That makes a total of 385 periods which are spent by the normal infantryman. That is 274¼ hours.

In addition, a certain number of the personnel take mortar training. The three-inch mortar is the battalion weapon, and training in the mortar recruit course takes 52 periods; digging and wiring, 12 periods; field training, 18 periods, and 20 periods are spare. In the motor transport section, driving and maintenance of wheeled vehicles take 183 periods, and there are 15 spare periods. Under carrier training, which is another section of the headquarters company, there are spent on driving and maintenance of wheeled vehicles, 99 periods; with the carrier itself, 89 periods, and there are 10 spare periods.

Under motorcycle training, in the signalling section, driving and maintenance of motorcycles take 143 periods, and there are 7 spare periods.

The summary for the advanced infantry training centre shows a total for any infantryman, 385 periods or 8 weeks; for three-inch mortar personnel, 385 periods or 8 weeks; for motorcycle drivers, 433 periods or 9 weeks; for motor-transport drivers, 481 periods or 10 weeks, and for carrier drivers, 481 periods or 10 weeks.

Mr. GREEN: The minister spoke yesterday of commando training and told us that a school was to be established in western Canada to give this new type of training. I suppose it would be difficult to expand that training to cover all the infantry recruits training in Canada, but would it not be a great help if that commando training could be undertaken in Canada on a really large scale? Would it not help our army a great deal if several of these schools were set up and if eventually we could put all our infantrymen through such a school?

Mr. RALSTON: I think I indicated yesterday that the purpose of the school was to train instructors, and the instructors are sent from the units. These instructors go back to the units; and I think I can say that the selection of instructors will be pretty general from all companies, and also from the trained soldier companies which are the graduates of the advanced training centres. They will be sending officers and non-commissioned officers as well to be trained. All my hon. friend is speaking of is the degree to which that training is to be done. We shall take into consideration what he has said about the comprehensiveness of it. But it is intended that the training shall get back to all the combatant units.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. GREEN: It would not only greatly increase the efficiency of our army but also interest the men a great deal if they could be given this new type of training.

Mr. RALSTON: That is one of the reasons why we are setting up the school.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The name of the party whom I mentioned before dinner is Gunner Metro Semenuik, L.600658. He is in the Canadian artillery, A.T.C., Fort Connaught, Halifax, Nova Scotia.

Mr. RALSTON: Thank you.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Would the minister mind making a statement at this time with regard to the situation at Debert camp? Complaints are coming through, from western men at least, as to the dampness and the difficulty of heating the huts. I have seen several complaints that men find it very difficult to acclimatize themselves to that area. I was wondering whether there has been an unusual amount of illness there due to camp conditions.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend from Saskatchewan is making some reflections on the climate of Nova Scotia. I was at Debert camp last week, and the chief of the general staff was there a day or two afterwards, under conditions—I mean as regards rain—which I should think were about as unfavourable as they could be. I have taken up with the quartermaster-general certain matters with regard to the improvement of the camp and seeing to it that the roadways and the general means of communication are better. I did not hear a single complaint with regard to the heating of the huts. Of course it was then getting on to spring; it may be quite different in the winter time. I shall certainly take this matter up with the quartermaster-general.

As everybody knows, Debert camp was selected at a time when we were looking for a place which would give the proper operational location and be not far from the air force. It was ideal so far as the map location was concerned, because the air force had located a very large and useful aerodrome not far away. You cannot have everything. I believe that whatever natural disadvantages Debert camp may have by reasons of soil can be overcome; indeed they have been to a very large extent overcome in the year and a half it has been operating. I must pay tribute to the troops who went there a year ago last fall. I know what it was like, for I was down there myself. It was, so to speak, in the forest primeval; conditions were not too good. But they went at it with a will, and I must say that some of the western units, particularly, gave one an extreme sense of satisfaction at the way they took it in their stride.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They are good men, from the west.

Mr. RALSTON: I found one unit busying itself taking stumps out of the parade ground in front of their particular hut. But Debert camp has great possibilities, and I anticipate that we can overcome the difficulties my hon. friend has mentioned, although as a matter of fact I have not heard that the huts were cold or anything of that kind. Generally speaking, it is a fact that the soil is heavy, the water does not run off readily, and therefore drainage and roadways must have very much more attention paid to them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The minister has not answered my other question: has there been an unusual number of cases of sickness at that camp?

Mr. RALSTON: I must say that I did not ask about that. I was in the hospital—I believe, in every ward—and talked to the officer in command there. He did not mention that there had been any abnormality. The hospital was running well. I believe I asked a good many men as to their illnesses, and as far as I remember, hardly any of them mentioned colds or any affection which would arise as a consequence of damp weather. To answer my hon. friend's question directly, I have not heard that there was an abnormal amount of illness at Debert camp. I shall certainly make inquiries.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Can the minister give us an assurance that munition dumps in the east are placed where there is the least possibility of danger?

Mr. RALSTON: I can at once assure the committee on that point. This matter has been considered by the chiefs of staff and by the defence council. The location and construction of ammunition dumps were decided a good while ago, and the locations are such, I believe, as will provide for the greatest security and, at the same time, the greatest utility.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: We have been discussing for over two days questions connected with the army, and as yet we have had no statement from the minister regarding recruitment for the active army or for the reserve. The only statement which I have seen in connection with the reserve is that men are enlisting in large numbers. That statement did not come from the minister.

In so far as active service units are concerned I think we should be informed how many men have joined during the past two or three months, and whether the numbers joining are sufficient for the purposes of the army, not only to provide for its needs at the present time but also to meet the contingency of our men overseas being actively engaged.

During the last four or five days I have received a large number of letters from farmers and farmers' sons pointing out that, in spite of the announcement made by the Prime Minister on March 24 last, every consideration would be given to not calling up farmers' sons necessary in agriculture at this time, by granting them a postponement for the time being, the situation is very unsatisfactory. As far as those men are concerned who are actually in service, the promise was made that, upon application to the commanding officer, favourable consideration would be given to releasing men engaged in agriculture on leave to assist with the spring work.

In the latest issue of Canada at War, April, 1942, the following appears at page 8:

> Emphasizing the vital role being played in this war by food, farmers, their sons and farm labourers are granted an indefinite postponement of compulsory military service if they are doing essential farm work. They may enlist as volunteers in the armed forces, but they cannot accept any non-agricultural work except seasonal employment. . . .

The situation in western Canada, especially in Saskatchewan, is no better than it was when the announcement was made on March 24. I have had letters from men pointing out that they have brothers overseas and have been called up, although they are the only remaining young men on the farm able to carry on the operations. When applications are made to the national mobilization board, they contend that not sufficient attention is paid to them. I have every regard for the men who compose the national service board in that province, but I do not believe these applications are finding their way to the proper authorities. We are adjourning to-night for three or four days —I wonder why an adjournment is being had at this time of grave seriousness—until next Tuesday. We who come from the far west find ourselves in the position of having come to Ottawa to do the business of the country, to assist in doing it in any event, and yet an adjournment is to be made until next Tuesday. I mention that because if this matter is allowed to remain without some consideration being given to it immediately, the situation in so far as agriculture in western Canada is concerned will become most serious.

I suggest to the minister that he should issue instructions to the various boards throughout Canada—this does not apply only to Saskatchewan—which would provide some common denominator of action for all the provinces. It cannot be that men are wanted in the reserve army. There is not such a rush because only the other day Major-General Browne issued a statement which appeared under date of April 20. I quote:

> Things are rolling along with the Canadian reserve army, says Major-General B. W. Browne, director-general of that force.
> "They took on 2,000 men in military district No. 2 (Toronto) last week and other districts are getting lots of recruits, too," he reported to-day.

If that statement be correct and if recruits are rolling into the reserve army; if men find their way into the reserve, why the necessity during the period between April 15 and May 15, to call up men who are on farms? They are willing to serve; all they ask is that the government carry out the promise which was made on March 24, not only in the House of Commons but in a radio address to the country. I suggest to the minister that if recruits for the reserve units are piling in, no harm would be done to this nation if these men were allowed to continue the necessary work of assisting in the spring work. Unless something is done at once, many parts of western Canada will not be placed under cultivation this year.

I am not asking for any different consideration for these men from that given to any other group. If they have not been called up yet, why the unnecessary rush since April 12? I ask the minister to give consideration at once to informing the national mobilization boards in the different provinces of the need of allowing as many men as possible to remain on their farms during the next three or four weeks, by postponements granted for that period, and that those who are in the service be permitted to return to their homes to assist in the spring farm work.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend mentioned April 12, but I do not understand the significance of that date.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Two or three of the letters refer to being called up then.

Mr. RALSTON: From men?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Men on farms?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Men on farms who have been called up.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. RALSTON: I thought I understood the Prime Minister to make an announcement that men who were on farms, who were wholly or mainly engaged in the occupation of agriculture on March 23, would be allowed to stay on the farms.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is what was announced.

Mr. RALSTON: I have no doubt that the boards will deal with that. All a man has to do is to call attention to the fact that he is wholly or mainly engaged in the occupation. I do not know of any occupation in Canada—I think I am correct in saying this—the utility and usefulness of which in connection with the war activity has been so recognized as the farming industry. The army simply gives up any claim to those men who can show that on March 23, 1942, they were wholly or mainly engaged in agriculture. This is done regardless of how many there are on the farm, unless there are special circumstances. In other words, the burden is placed upon the army or the boards of showing that these men are not essential in industry. I do not know what greater concession my hon. friend wants than that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The promise is all right, and I am not complaining about the declaration of policy. I am simply asking the minister to have representations made so that the policy will be carried into effect. It is not being carried into effect.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to know of a case where a man has shown the board that he was wholly or mainly engaged in agriculture on March 23 and has not been relieved, unless it was a case in which it was shown that he was not essential in industry. This comes under the Department of National War Services, but since I am representing the government here to-night I shall be only too happy to see that the matter is brought to the attention of the board. I thought we had that pretty well behind us so far as the army was concerned. We simply called it a day so far as the agricultural industry was concerned, except in those cases where we could show that a man was not essential in industry. In other words, the burden was on us. If he showed that he was wholly or mainly engaged in agriculture, I understood that the board would excuse him. If my hon. friend has some cases, I shall bring them to the attention of my colleague the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson).

Mr. DONNELLY: I have found no difficulty whatever in having farmers exempted from military service. The only criticism I would make is that not enough time is given to the men in Regina who call up these men. In other words, you will want some men for April 12 and you send word out to Regina asking that they be called up. It takes up to ten days for the notice to reach some of these men, and it will take four or five days or a week for the notice to get back. These men do not have sufficient time in which to ask for an exemption on the ground of being farmers' sons. I think more time should be given. In many of these places there is only one mail a week. There are some districts in my constituency like that. The mail may get there the day after it leaves the main centre, and then it stays eight or ten days before it gets out. Then it will take probably another week for it to come back. I ask the government to consider the advisability of giving these men a little more time so that they will have time to ask for an exemption. Otherwise, I think this is working out very well.

Mr. RALSTON: There would seem to be some mistake about the facts here. I called the adjutant-general to find out when the next two classes were called to report. I am not sure of the exact date, but it was between May 9 and May 15. I am sure it was no earlier than that, but I have an idea they had to report on May 15. By the way, the number for the first class is very small; I assure whoever mentioned one thousand men that there were not anything like one thousand men called in Saskatchewan in that first call. This is April 23; that is seven days until the end of the month; if the call is for May 9, that is sixteen days, and that call went out some time ago. That does not seem to me like too little time. I should like to get to the bottom of this thing, because on the facts as they are put to me there is ample time for these men to apply.

Mr. DONNELLY: I can assure the minister that what I have said is so. I went to Regina and saw the committee, and they assured me it was right.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend know what date he is speaking of?

Mr. DONNELLY: No.

Mr. RALSTON: I have in mind that the next two calls are May 9 and May 15; both those calls have gone out now. But no matter what the facts are, I shall have inquiry made, because if there is anything understood by the Department of National Defence it is that we have not much call on the agricultural community from now on as far as calling up men under the National Resources Mobilization Act is concerned.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the policy of the various units with regard to granting requests for spring leave for farm work?

Mr. RALSTON: Just before I went west—that is three weeks ago—I received a communication from, I think, the president of the farmers' association of Saskatchewan representing that he thought it desirable that men have spring leave. I want hon. members to realize the situation. I am responsible for the maintenance and training, and operation if necessary, of the army in this country, and time is represented to us as flying fast. It is intimated in some quarters that we are not going fast enough. I considered that my responsibility as Minister of National Defence would not permit me to give any wholesale direction with regard to releasing men who have come into the army, who have been trained or are in training, possibly for an operational role. The air force are not being asked to do it; the navy are not, and I did not feel that the army ought to be asked to undertake that obligation. At the same time I took occasion in Regina both going and coming to see the district officer commanding and discuss the matter with him. He fully realizes the situation and has taken up personally with Judge Embury cases which he thought or which Judge Embury might think were cases in which leave should be granted, and these are being considered. I went so far, and so announced in the house, as to place in the hands of the board—which is separate from the Department of National Defence entirely, that is a board under the Department of National War Services, the power to say whether men should be relieved on compassionate grounds—that, of course, is the only ground on which these leaves could be granted—and we provided in the regulations that the district officer commanding would take the recommendation or decision of the board in those cases notwithstanding the fact that the man was in the army: the only exception being one which you would expect, that is, if military exigencies were such as to make that impossible. That has been done and been discussed by me personally with Brigadier Trudeau in Saskatchewan, and I think, as far as can be, the serious cases are being attended to.

But I do feel that members of the committee ought not to expect me, as head of the Department of National Defence, endeavouring to mobilize, train and prepare an army for operation, to allow men in large numbers to go even for seeding operations. They are members of the army now; they had opportunity to apply for postponement; they did not, and I submit it is not fair at this time to ask that I simply issue a blanket order and say to the men, "Go home and do your seeding and then come back."

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I did not ask that; I merely asked a statement of policy.

Mr. RALSTON: It would completely disorganize the training. We have men going through this four months' training plan; we have men going out in the first month, the second, the third and the fourth; we are not using the training facilities to the limit. I want hon. members to put themselves in my place and realize that I have some responsibility and that we cannot make a general declaration, much as one would like to. There are a few units; we have listed them and sent the list to the district officers commanding depots, where we can give leave, and we are glad to do so as far as possible; but apart from that I cannot make any general declaration of policy which would allow the release of large numbers of men.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Reverting to men being called up, I do not think there is any objection as to the period between the time they are called and the time they have to report, but I think the objection is that the notice says they must have their application for postponement in within eight days, and sometimes they do not receive the notice until the eight days are up.

Mr. RALSTON: That is an objection I can understand. I shall be glad to take that up with my colleague the Minister of National War Services.

I have now the dates. I was too modest. But what my hon. friend says put another complexion on it, because if a man has only eight days in which to apply for postponement, the fact that the time he will have to report is a long way off does not make any difference. The next call is for May 15 and, after that, May 21, so we have actually three weeks before they report on the first call and four weeks for the next. But this eight days is something that I shall be glad to take up with the Minister of National War Services. I do not know whether it is set arbitrarily or not.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I understand it is on the notice.

An hon. MEMBER: Not all of them.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): On all in our district, and I know of men who have not received the notice for ten or fifteen days.

Mr. RALSTON: Does it say eight days from the date of the notice, or from the receipt of it?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The date of the notice.

Mr. NICHOLSON: In connection with the point raised by the hon. member for Lake Centre, I think you have one group in a special category. Calls went out before the Prime Minister made his statement of change in policy; some men had been called and actually did report and they are now in the army. The Department of National War Services in Regina takes the position that these men are now out of their hands and that any decision must be made by the Department of National Defence. I have in mind a young man, the only male worker on a farm of three hundred acres, to seed a tractor operated farm, and I am advised that it is impossible to get anyone to operate the farm. This young man is in the army. I made representations to the national mobilization board in Regina, and they said that this man is now out of our hands; that he will have to make representation through the officer commanding. In the light of what the minister has now said, the officer commanding will now turn him back to the board and it will be too late for this young man to be back home in time for seeding. Could not something be done with this group that was called to report for service before the Prime Minister's statement was made?

Mr. RALSTON: That is, they had been actually called to report for service before March 23-24, but they were on March 23 or 24 of the class mentioned in the order in council?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: That has not been called to my attention before. I shall take it up at once.

Mr. GRAHAM: I can certainly appreciate the difficulty that the Minister of National Defence has in weighing the necessities of our war situation and the desire of the very important industry of farming to be maintained in the matter of man-power. I wish to express my sympathy with and support of the policy the minister is attempting to carry out so fairly, and with reasonable satisfaction. I think every Saskatchewan member would say that we have in that province a national war service board which has independently and without any suggestion of unfairness or partiality administered duties which must, in some cases, be very difficult.

Mr. COLDWELL: We do not agree with that; in fact I thoroughly disagree with it.

Mr. GRAHAM: I must confess that my experience with the board, which is composed of Mr. Justice Embury, Mr. Bickerton, representing the Saskatchewan farmers, and Mr. Stewart of Yorkton, has been most satisfactory, and it has seemed to me that they are devoting close attention to each application and dealing with it in a fair, impartial manner. There is, however, one point which was brought out by the minister to-night and about which I should like to ask a question. He mentioned that he had a conversation with the officer commanding military district No. 12 at Regina, with regard to the spring leave which might be granted under certain circumstances to young farmers who have been called up for service. Was the same communication directed to the officers commanding other military districts in which Saskatchewan recruits may be now located? I have received letters from Saskatchewan boys who in the course of their training have been moved to British Columbia, Manitoba and Alberta, and I wondered whether the officers commanding those military districts had been instructed to give the same consideration to young Saskatchewan men applying to them for spring leave.

Mr. RALSTON: No, I do not think I have had any communication with any other district officer commanding. The reason why I had that communication with Brigadier Trudeau was because I had a telegram I think from Mr. Bickerton, whose name was mentioned by my hon. friend and who, I believe, is president of the Saskatchewan farmers. I had the telegram that very day; I had it up at army council, and I wanted to find out from him what the situation was. But I did not give Bragadier Trudeau any instructions; I do not want anyone misled in that connection. I asked him what the situation was, and he told me that Judge Embury and he were taking up certain cases of particular hardship. I felt that Brigadier Trudeau had been there a good while and knew conditions, and I believed that he would deal with them as fairly as possible, having regard to what he knew as to the necessities of the army.

Mr. COLDWELL: Since the hon. member for Swift Current has rather given the impression that Saskatchewan members have been quite satisfied with the operations of the Saskatchewan board, I just want to express my disagreement with that suggestion. I am not going to discuss it with the minister now, because it is not in his department; but when the Minister of National War Services is here, we shall probably have some questions to ask him as to the operations of that board. I would suggest to the Minister of National Defence that perhaps some of the difficulties which have arisen, such as those outlined by the hon. member for Lake Centre, may have come about as a result of the attitude and actions of that board; I do not know. I do know of other cases, however, in which not very much sympathy has been shown for people such as those described by the hon. member for Mackenzie a few moments ago. I am not going to say anything more about those cases now, but I would suggest that the minister discuss the record of the Saskatchewan board with his colleague the Minister of National War Services.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the best I can do there is to bring my hon. friend's remarks to the attention of my colleague.

A short time ago the hon. member for Lake Centre asked a question with regard to recruiting figures for the first three months of this year. I have already given the figure for the active army for January; it was 11,713. For February it was 8,152; for March, 8,821; and for April, up to the 18th, 7,060. Perhaps I should give all the figures while I am at it. For the navy the figures were 1,200 for January, 1,347 for February, and 2,175 for March. For the air force the figures were 5,774 for January, 3,104 for February, and 4,153 for March. That is something over 42,000 for the first three months, and there are also the 7,000 enlisted in the army this month up to the 18th.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Before the minister leaves that point, of those 42,000 how many were in the age group from twenty to twenty-three?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry but I have not the faintest idea, and I have no quick way of finding out. We would have to look at the attestation papers.

Mr. WHITE: In regard to the matter just under discussion, that of farm leave, I should like to know if I correctly understood the minister to say that soldiers now in the army, in the active and reserve forces, might obtain leave for farm work. If that is correct—

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want my hon. friend to continue on that assumption. That is not so.

Mr. WHITE: Is that not correct?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. WHITE: My reason for asking was this. I have had various cases brought to my attention, in which men in the active force found that their commanding officers refused to grant them farm leave. Therefore on April 11 I wrote the department, and under date of April 15 I received a reply from the deputy minister, in the last paragraph of which he states:

> The above procedure applies to active force soldiers, as well as those called out under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

The point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is that there appears to be a great difference of opinion between various officers commanding as to whether or not a soldier in the active force can obtain this farm leave. The minister has just borne out that statement by saying that an active force soldier cannot obtain leave, while at the same time I have a letter from his deputy minister in which it is said that an active force soldier may obtain leave by complying with certain requirements. I should like to have the matter clarified, as to just what is the position, and if an active force soldier can obtain farm leave, what procedure must he follow in order to do so.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought I had made myself clear. I have not seen the letter of the deputy minister—

Mr. WHITE: I will send it to the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: The letter outlines the procedure only; it does not state that he can obtain leave.

Mr. WHITE: Yes; in the last paragraph it definitely states:

> The above procedure applies to active force soldiers, as well as those called out under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. RALSTON: There the deputy minister is saying that the procedure applies, just as I might say that a certain procedure applied whereby you might sue me for $10,000; but the question of whether you could recover would be another matter, and the question of whether I could pay would be still another. There I think the deputy minister is outlining the procedure, rather than indicating the action which may be taken as a result of that procedure being followed.

Let me make myself clear; I hope I have not confused the committee. An hon. member asked what was the policy of the department with respect to farm leave for men in the active force. I replied that I had taken the position that I could issue no general order or general direction with regard to granting farm leave. There is always the provision for compassionate leave. It may be that some individual cases may be so serious and so desperate that compassionate leave would be justified, and those circumstances have to be taken into consideration. But I would think there would be very few cases in which farm leave would be granted on that ground. If there are some, they would be dealt with by the board, as I have said, and the recommendation of the board would be accepted. But I do not think the board could at all find that there were compassionate grounds in those cases. That would be taking into consideration another matter altogether, namely the national interest. They find a man in the army, and they do not take him out on compassionate grounds because of the fact that he has to operate a farm.

Mr. WHITE: What does the minister mean by "compassionate grounds"?

Mr. RALSTON: That is a general term used in the army in connection with leave, and may cover half a dozen cases. Any case where there is no leave as of right, that is to say, no furlough, but where leave is granted on special grounds, we put them all together and call it "compassionate leave". There is no general policy that leave can be granted from the army for seeding purposes. Previously we have had harvest leave, in which a general blanket order was issued so that men could be given such harvest leave. Such and such a proportion of a unit might be given harvest or seeding leave. That does not apply now. It is only in the individual or in the exceptional case that it can apply, if I am going to do my job of carrying on the army.

Mr. WHITE: Do I understand clearly that men in the active forces cannot obtain farm leave?

Mr. RALSTON: Not as farm leave. But they might show certain conditions on their farms, or certain family matters which might entitle them to leave. That is to say, there might be one man on a farm, conditions might be desperate, and the people would not be able to get along without having their boy at home to work the farm or to put in the crop. That might come within the designation or category of compassionate leave. But that would not be given as farm leave; they are two different things.

My hon. friend knows that harvest leave was granted, on the ground that the completion of the harvest was more important than the army. That is not the situation to-day, as we see it in the department. Therefore we cannot grant farm leave as farm leave, and I have so said to Mr.

Bickerton in the telegram. The deputy minister tells my hon. friend that a soldier, if he is at a training centre, must make application in writing to his commanding officer. Such application will be entertained only during the first three months of his four months' training. But on completion of training and when dispatched to a unit he may apply at any time. Then the deputy minister goes on to speak about the evidence which must be given, and how the application is to be prepared. He says that is the way you go about making an application for leave. But he does not suggest that it is to be granted, simply because application is made.

Mr. WHITE: I might say I have the letter I wrote to the department, and I asked specifically for the department to advise whether or not this method of applying for farm leave applied to men in the active force. That is why the last paragraph is attached to this letter. Certainly, if one reads the two letters together, they could give only one impression, and that is that men in the active force could apply for farm leave in the same manner as men in the reserve force.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me put my hon. friend right, when he refers to applying in the same manner as men in the reserve force. By men in the reserve force he means men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: The provision for application for leave for men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act is not for farm leave as such; it is only compassionate leave. There is where my hon. friend is either misleading himself, or has been misled. There is no regulation anywhere whereby a man gets leave or where there is procedure to apply for leave for farming. It is for compassionate leave—for special cases. The deputy minister tells my hon. friend that exactly the same procedure applies with respect to the active forces.

Mr. WHITE: The statement was made by the Prime Minister some time ago, in March, that this was going to be a general regulation to help the farmers to meet a very serious shortage of labour. I never heard the word "compassionate" used before in connection with farm leave. My interpretation of "compassionate leave" was one arising out of a death in a family, an accident, or something like that. Then, under those circumstances, the term "compassionate leave" was used. But for the first time to-night I hear the minister using the term "compassionate leave" as meaning permission to get home to work on the farm. I consider that an entirely wrong interpretation of "compassionate leave," as it has always been understood in the army. After what the Prime Minister said, I for one assumed there would be a general policy whereby soldiers of the reserve and active forces could now apply for leave to work on farms.

Mr. RALSTON: And from the air force, too, my hon. friend would have to say.

Mr. WHITE: Yes. I have a case where a man has got out of the air force, under the same conditions.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to say to my hon. friend that he and the hon. member for Lake Centre are the first two I have ever heard say that the Prime Minister said anything about leave to men already in the army. What the Prime Minister spoke about was what we might do from this time on. We took March 23 as the date because it goes back so that men could not change their positions in order to be affected by that order. The Prime Minister took that date, and he said that from that time we will say that if the Minister of National War Services wants those men, under the National Resources Mobilization Act, he has to show affirmatively that they are not essential to agriculture, provided they have been wholly or mainly engaged in agriculture on that date. But if my hon. friend or the hon. member for Lake Centre has a statement by the Prime Minister where the Prime Minister said that leave was to be granted from the army for men to go on farm leave, I should like to see it.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister deny that a great many applications have been made since March 23, or a great many in March, for men to obtain farm leave, and that a great many have been granted?

Mr. RALSTON: I have said that I have no idea of a single case having been granted. I have said, too, that Mr. Bickerton, the president of a farm group in Saskatchewan, is the only one whose communication has come to my attention, and he very forcefully applied on behalf of a large number of men. He indicated that some general order should be made, and I had to decline to comply with his suggestion. I do not know of any individual case; there may have been individual cases granted, but they have been granted under the compassionate leave provision, and not under a provision for farm leave. I say that is so, unless they have been men in depots. As to those men we have made special regulations, and those regulations have gone out to all the districts. But there is no provision in the Department of National Defence for farm leave, and no application has been granted on the ground of application for farm leave.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister say there is any difference made in these applications for farm leave whether a man is in the active force or in the reserve force?

Mr. RALSTON: Any difference?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think there is any difference.

Mr. WHITE: Would the board give the same consideration to an active force man as to a reserve force man?

Mr. RALSTON: Remember, this is a board—and it is not my board.

Mr. WHITE: I understand that.

Mr. RALSTON: I say I cannot tell my hon. friend that, but I would assume that exactly the same considerations would apply.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Did I understand the minister to say that he now interprets the Prime Minister's statement to mean that it was to apply only to men called after March 24? If that be so, this whole principle is inequitable and discriminatory. The very point made by the hon. member for Mackenzie then comes into clear view. Here I have before me letters from men, each of whom is on the farm, and in several places the only help besides their aged fathers. The answer given to these men called for April 9 is that nothing can be done.

Mr. RALSTON: I said about those cases that if they were men who were in farming occupations wholly or mainly, I would take the matter up. I did not know about that group of men at all, and I do not think my hon. friend need concern himself with making a case about them. I do not know what I can have done, if anything; but I will certainly look into the matter of these men, to see if they were wholly or mainly engaged in agriculture on March 24.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is the point. One man I have in mind was wholly or entirely engaged on the farm; he was the only male on that farm. These boys have been called up, and nothing is being done about their cases.

Mr. RALSTON: I can assure my hon. friend that this is the first time it has been called to my attention.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I am sure the minister will now admit there was good reason to raise the point.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, I have been too long in the house to make admissions without looking into cases.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Yes, but it is equally wrong for the minister to say that since these men were called up prior to March 24, therefore the promise of the Prime Minister does not apply to them. As a matter of fact, the promise of the Prime Minister was based upon the needs of agriculture, not upon the time that the men were called up.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, yes, there had to be a time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: As long as we are perfectly clear that a man called up before March 24 does not come under the statement of policy set out by the Prime Minister, there is no further objection to it.

Mr. RALSTON: I say there is a point to be argued there. The man was called up before. He was wholly or mainly engaged in agriculture, and he comes in after. I should be glad to look into that class of case, because it comes in that period while the order in council was coming into effect.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Is it the intention of the government not to pay dependents' allowances? I ask the question because in an address last night over the radio the hon. member for Lethbridge intimated to the people of Canada, and particularly to the mothers of Canada, that the reason for asking for an affirmative vote on the plebiscite was that the government was going to stop paying dependents' allowances. I do not know what he could possibly hope to contribute by that to the national defence of Canada or to its welfare or anything else. I should like to quote a passage from his radio address, and I should like the minister to answer it, not for my benefit, but for the benefit particularly of the mothers of the men who are serving in the army and the mothers of the young men we want to join the army in the future. Here is this one sentence and I quote:

> Without any explanation an affirmative vote on the question as it is worded could mean that the people are in favour of releasing the government from that kind of obligation.

I think it very important that the minister make it quite clear that no such thing was ever intended.

Mr. RALSTON: What kind of obligation?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Paying the dependents' allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend just read something that indicates that. He has not put enough on the record.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am rather ashamed to read it.

Mr. RALSTON: I mean just the reference to dependents' allowance.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It is rather difficult to pick it out. I am not used to reading such stuff as this.

Mr. RALSTON: If the hon. member wants me to deny it, I want to see what I am denying.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I want the minister to deny that it is the intention of the government, under an affirmative vote for the plebiscite or any other vote or for any reason, to cease paying the dependents' allowance. The hon. member insinuated, according to the radio report as I read it and as many people in Canada heard it, that it is the intention of the government, in seeking an affirmative vote on the plebiscite, to cease paying the dependents' allowance. It is unfortunate that some members, who apparently have not a proper sense of responsibility, should have the privilege of broadcasting from one end of Canada to the other a statement like that, which may do great harm to the defence of Canada. I think it is the duty of the Minister of National Defence to assure the mothers of our soldiers that, irrespective of anything which may be said in language such as that used by the hon. member for Lethbridge with respect to holding the plebiscite, the government and we as a parliament are going to continue to pay the dependents' allowance. I think it is the duty of the minister to make that clear, and to assure the people of Canada that in giving an affirmative vote on the plebiscite, which the Prime Minister, the leader of the Conservative party and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation asked for in a straight-forward, manly way, they are not in any way endangering the dependents' allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: I can say to my hon. friend and for the benefit of the committee that if any such statement were made, it is wholly inaccurate. There is not the slightest intention in the world of the government's discontinuing the dependents' allowance for mothers or wives or any others for whom dependents' allowance is provided.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. After the distortion of my speech which the hon. member for Fraser Valley has given, I think it is his duty to read enough of the speech to make clear the reference of the words which he quoted. No wonder he does not want to read any more which would make clear what the meaning was!

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out that we are not discussing the plebiscite. That whole matter was out of order. As to the question which was put to the minister to ascertain the government's intention with respect to the dependents' allowance, I do not think the hon. member for Fraser Valley is called upon to read any part of the radio speech to substantiate his question. His question has been answered, and I would point out that an argument should not develop with respect to the plebiscite.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But, Mr. Chairman, a remark like that appears in Hansard and stands there opposite a man's name for generations. The hon. member for Fraser Valley has put on Hansard a remark which is a reflection on me.

The CHAIRMAN: It is the privilege of the hon. member, if he thinks he has been misquoted, to make a correction. If he has not been misquoted, there is no point of order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. member for Fraser Valley certainly gave a distorted version of what I said. Never a word did I utter that had any such meaning as he attempted to convey. He must have listened to the speech with a very hectic mind.

Mr. MacNICOL: Better give it again.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There is one further question I asked of the minister, namely, the enlistments in the reserve army from January to the present day.

Mr. RALSTON: Somebody else asked me that question last night, and I am sorry I have not the figures here. I intended to give them. I gave the figures up to April 9, I think it was. Perhaps I can get the other figures before the house adjourns.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister gave the numbers who had enlisted voluntarily between January and April 18, and roughly the enlistments in the army amount to about 7,000 a month.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is wrong about that. It was 28,000 for the three months.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It was 4,713 for January.

Mr. RALSTON: No, 11,713.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I beg pardon. That would be approximately 10,000 a month.

Mr. RALSTON: It was 28,919 for the three months; for January, 11,713; February, 8,385; and March, 8,821.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Should the voluntary enlistments continue at the rate prevailing since January, would there be sufficient to meet the present needs of the army and the anticipated needs during the present year?

Mr. RALSTON: That is my advice. I think I intimated when I spoke in February that my advice was that if enlistments were maintained within a reasonable distance, I think I said, of that level, we would be able to take care of our commitments.

Mr. WHITE: When the minister is giving the figures for the men in the reserve army, would he at the same time give the number of men who have been called up for training under the National Resources Mobilization Act?

Mr. RALSTON: I think I have given that.

Mr. WHITE: The reason why I ask is this. I have in my hand a return brought down by the Department of National War Services, dated April 20, 1942, according to which the number of men called up since the four months training period came into effect was 44,846. That seems a very small number for fourteen months, and I wonder whether it is correct or not.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that given by months?

Mr. WHITE: No; it is just the total number.

Mr. RALSTON: I have no break-down here of the figure, but I would think that is about correct. For how many months was it?

Mr. WHITE: My question was asked in the house on February 25, 1942, and I am quoting from the return that was brought down by the Department of National War Services, which shows, in answer to my question, that the number of new men called for the four months and accepted at national defence basic training centres was 33,955, and the number of 30-day men recalled for national defence, for further service, was 10,891, making a total of 44,846.

Mr. RALSTON: I think that is right.

Mr. WHITE: When the minister is bringing that information down, or perhaps at the present time, could he tell the committee what forces in Canada make up what is called the reserve army, or the reserve force, in addition to these 44,846 men? I believe there is a certain amount of confusion as to what makes up the reserve army.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend does want me to give the list of the reserve units?

Mr. WHITE: No—just the two or three categories which make up what is called the reserve army.

Mr. STOKES: I should like to ask the minister whether I am correctly informed with regard to the extending of a military property at Barriefield. At the eastern side is a valuable property which produces large quantities of apples, and on which there is a good dwelling; probably the west side is uncultivated land. I am informed just to-day that it is the intention of the department to expropriate the land to the east, and not the property to the west, which might be taken without putting any good, producing land out of production. As the latter property is vacant land, and the other property has produced in the last few years large crops of merchantable apples, I should be glad if the minister would look into the matter.

Mr. RALSTON: If I had not looked into it already, I could quickly get rid of the question by saying that I would do so. I can, however, assure my hon. friend that I have looked into it. I had a senior officer of the department with me for over two hours, looking over the map; I have had the real estate people and the engineers down there; I went to the trouble of telephoning the real estate adviser who was in Toronto; I have talked to Mr. Harvey, who owns the land; and we have come to the conclusion that this property is necessary to the development of the training centre which we are building. We realize it looks peculiar to be taking an apple orchard for use as a training centre; but we have examined the cost of developing any other site to which we have been referred, and we find that, apple orchard and all, the cost will be considerably less than if we took another property. Further, the property just to the west is rough ground which cannot be used so advantageously. It would make a very poor location indeed for a camp. The ground across the road is the ordnance training centre, which will be extended, and our only way of extension is toward the east. The development we propose has already grown three times greater than was originally planned, and we expect that it will grow even more. I have not myself looked at the ground, but I have examined its location on the map and have seen the people who have to do with it in the department. I am advised that there is not a chance of making a reasonable job of extending the camp, providing the necessary room for expansion, and at the same time providing a training ground, without taking that property.

Another property there, known as the Cartwright property, has been offered to us more than once. Though I am not crying down that property at all, it, too, is rough ground; my hon. friend probably knows it much better than I do. It does not seem to be suitable for camp ground. We estimated that the cost of putting in the services and building a camp there would be greater than the additional cost involved in the purchase of the property my hon. friend has in mind, putting a camp there, and having room for development in the future. For better or worse I have passed the project. I have advised Mr. Harvey, and I think he understands the situation. I believe he would have preferred to keep the farm because he has just bought it, but what we regard as the paramount interests of the service made it necessary that we should take it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Could the minister give the committee a break-down of the figure of 44,846 men who were called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act; that is, how many of these have gone into the active forces, how many are now on home defence, how many have gone into the reserve army, and how many, after finishing their period of training, have returned to civil life?

Mr. RALSTON: I have that information here. The important thing which my hon. friend wants is, I think, the percentage of active enlistments, and I am sorry I do not have it for all the services. I can tell him that the percentage of active enlistments of those called up to report from March 20, 1941, to October 2, 1941, was 36 per cent. That is, 36 per cent of those accepted enlisted in the active army, the air force or the navy. I have not a break-down of percentages as between the three services; but, roughly speaking, the division is 25 per cent for the army, 10 per cent for the air force, one per cent for the navy; that is, of active enlistments.

My hon. friend asked me how many had returned to civil life. Of course he realizes that, of those who have been called up, none have been returned to civil life unless they were discharged on account of being medically unfit or something of that kind, because they were all called up for service. If my hon. friend wants the information, by tracing through the record of each individual I could tell him to which units they have gone after they have come from the training schools, but I do not believe he would ask me to do that.

The chief of the general staff reminds me that my hon. friend also asked how many went into the reserve army. None of these would go into the reserve army; all would be called up and be on full-time service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister gave a statement of enlistments from January on in the active army; would he also give us the number discharged during the same period?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not that here.

Mr. GREEN: During the last two days there has been some discussion about the reserve army, and perhaps this house might be of considerable assistance to the reserve army at this time. They have fallen upon better days at long last. As the minister explained yesterday, about three weeks ago a director-general of the reserve army was appointed in the person of Major-General Browne. I think General Browne gave the picture quite clearly when he was quoted as saying at that time:

> "The reserve force may have to fight and it must be ready to fight as soon as possible," he said.
> "After all, there is no more war overseas than there is here now, and we may have some here sooner than they have, in view of the threats to our coast."

In other words, as I see it, the reserve army has now been given its proper role, the defence of Canada in the event of an attempted invasion. General Browne has also been quoted as saying that he hoped the reserve army would be recruited to a strength of at least 150,000 men. Yesterday the minister told us, as reported on page 1861 of Hansard, that as of April 9 the strength was 71,737 men in reserve units, 5,062 men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act and 1,523 men employed on training centre staffs. This gives a total of a little over 80,000 men.

There has been some talk to-night about the men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act; but as I understand it, apart from the 5,000 odd, they have become part of the active force although they are only for service in Canada. The men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act do not become part of the reserve army as it was described by the minister last night.

Mr. RALSTON: The only National Resources Mobilization Act men who are part of the reserve force are about 60,000 men, the 30-day men who have not been recalled.

Mr. GREEN: The 60,000 men to whom the minister now refers are men who took the 30-day course last year and who have now gone back to civilian life. They are merely names on the walls of the different armouries across Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: It depends on the unit, really.

Mr. GREEN: Generally speaking, I think my statement is correct. The 80,000 men who now compose our reserve army are largely men who have enlisted for the defence of Canada. They are not in the younger age groups, being mostly over 35 years of age. There has been some complaint that men are not rushing to enlist in this reserve army, and it is in that connection that I think the house could be of great help. When I was in Vancouver during the Easter recess I found that many men had the impression that if they joined the reserve army, they might be sent off to guard a railway somewhere and kept there for months. That made it impossible for them to enlist. They were perfectly willing to serve in an emergency; they were prepared to train and fight if the country were invaded, but they simply could not give up their businesses and their families and go away to do guard duty. In other words, the feeling was that they should be used for an emergency. I believe that it is the intention of the Department of National Defence that these men should be trained and will be used only if there is an emergency of that type. I feel perfectly confident that if the minister will announce that to be the case; if he will say that this reserve army is to defend the homes of Canada in the event of an invasion; that that is the purpose for which he is calling for recruits for the reserve army, he will be surprised at the response he will receive. Members of the house could help a great deal by spreading this news throughout their ridings. In that way we could help a great deal in the recruiting of this reserve army.

Conditions in Vancouver with regard to the reserve army have improved greatly within the last few days. For example, the night I left home there was a parade of the reserve brigade. I believe that this was extremely impressive and that many men made application to join after the parade. Another thing that was done was to have all the officers and men in the reserve units wear their uniforms to work, whether that was delivering milk, in a store or in an office. The idea was to impress the general public with the fact that the reserve force was really worth while and that there were excellent citizens serving in that force. I think the result will be to increase enlistments. Therefore I suggest to the minister that he make a statement to-night to the effect that the reserve army is to defend the homes of Canada; that that is the purpose for which it is being raised.

I have another suggestion to make. I think consideration should be given to changing the present rule with regard to the enlistment of married men. Until a day or two before we left here in March the reserve army was not allowed to recruit married men under thirty-five years of age. Then the minister announced a change and said that men from thirty to thirty-five years could be recruited in the reserve army. There are many younger married men who cannot join the reserve force at the present time and yet who are not subject to call under the National Resources Mobilization Act. As the committee knows, that act applies as yet only to single men and widowers without children up to the age of thirty years. Married men may not be called for a matter of months or perhaps even a longer period.

I realize that the idea in not allowing them to enlist in the reserve army was that this might push them into the active force by the back-door. The hope was that, not being able to join the reserve army and not wishing to be still in civilian clothes, they would join the active force. I think the time has gone by when methods of that type should be used. These young married men should be allowed to go into the reserve force at this time. Physically they are the best group we could get into the reserve force. They are entitled to have training to be able to defend their homes and families just as much as the men over thirty years of age. Even though they are eventually to be taken into the active force under the National Resources Mobilization Act, or go in voluntarily, they should be given the chance to get training in the meantime. It would be of great advantage to them, and I believe that under the regulations as they stand at the present time they could still be called up for service in the active force even though they had enlisted in the reserve force. If I am wrong, perhaps the minister will correct me.

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. GREEN: That is the position at the present time. There could be no question that they were sheltering from the active force by joining the reserve force.

Mr. RALSTON: They would not be "sheltered", to use my friend's word, from being called up, but they would be sheltered in this way, that they would be in the reserve army and perhaps would not feel the same urge to join the active army. I am interrupting my hon. friend, but let me say that this rule with regard to age limit did not come from the Department of National Defence; it was made on a suggestion to me personally by officers of the reserve army, who felt that the reserve army was being used, in some cases that they knew about, as a place where men went and felt that they were doing their full duty. It was the view of those officers that the reserve army was not intended for that purpose and that it was not quite fair to them in the reserve army to have that situation existing. I do not think it was some invention by someone who wanted to see that everyone was forced into the active force.

Mr. GREEN: I have had suggestions to the opposite effect made to me by officers of reserve units. Perhaps the viewpoint is changing a little as time goes on. There is a need to fill up these reserve units without further delay. I throw out the suggestion that the minister consider the position again, and if he does not wish to allow all married men in, he should at least allow men in, say from twenty-five to thirty years of age.

Another suggestion is that consideration be given to appealing to men in war industries to join these reserve units. For example, on the Pacific coast the role of the reserve brigade is of vital importance in the event of attack. It seems to me that the men who are working in war industries might be very badly needed in the reserve brigade should an emergency arise. I suggest that an appeal be made even to men in war industries to give up two nights a week and perhaps some time at the week-end in order that they may get at least some military training.

Then I think the department cannot be too careful to see that these reserve brigades are given at least enough equipment of all types with which to do some training. There has been that difficulty that men have joined these reserve units, found that there was no equipment and then became disgusted and left. There is a new enthusiasm now growing up, and I think this is the time to see to it that they get some at least of every type of the equipment with which they would be equipped were they fighting. They are all very keen; they have all had considerable experience in civilian life, and they are particularly interested in the new types of equipment and the more advanced training. I suggest that the department treat them with that condition in mind.

Mr. RALSTON: I appreciate the spirit in which my hon. friend approaches this matter and the interest he has taken. I think every point he has made has been made at these meetings of reserve officers which I have attended. The suggestion he makes with regard to some declaration respecting a limited role for the reserve army—I put it in that way—was made to me in Vancouver. It has not been made to me anywhere else. I do not say that by way of reflection at all.

Mr. GREEN: I think the reserve is more badly needed there.

Mr. RALSTON: Three very responsible officers came to see me about the matter and left me a memorandum, and it has troubled me considerably. But I say frankly that I am a little cautious about undertaking any obligations with regard to methods of using troops, particularly in view of the situation which faces us in this country to-day and the fact that we are having a plebiscite on a statement of that kind made some time ago. I want to be just as fair as I can and to encourage enlistment in the reserve army; but I do not want someone coming to me and saying, "You gave us a pledge or an assurance that we would not be used elsewhere than in our home community, and now you are taking us somewhere else." I heard my hon. friend say, "except in an emergency" which, of course, is an elastic phrase. But I have not shut the door on the idea. The reserve army has a place in the Militia Act, and everyone knows what the duties are. People should join the reserve army with the realization of the full implications of that duty, whatever they may be. I feel that they can join the reserve army with some confidence that they will not be called on unduly, but for me to say under just what conditions they will be used and under what conditions they will not be used, is something I hesitate to do.

A statement was prepared which I was asked if I would sign. It was prepared in a most careful way. The gentleman sought to make it as easy as possible for me to make that statement. It did not tie one down very much, but it was to give the impression at least that the reserve army would not be used outside the particular community or area in which it was mobilized.

Mr. GREEN: May I interrupt to point out that I carefully avoided saying that they should not be used in other than their own communities. I said, to defend the homes of Canada; if the Atlantic or the Pacific coast were attacked, it would be understood that men from Ontario or Quebec would go, and I am sure they would do so gladly, to fight on either coast. But I mean, for example, that they should not be taken and put on full-time guard duty or be sent outside Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: I have my hon. friend's representations. They are along the lines of representations I have received and they are being considered. The committee will understand my reluctance when I say that there is a specific place for the reserve army, and whether one should say anything indicating a limitation of its duties is something which should receive a good deal of consideration. Of course there is less consideration required when my hon. friend suggests that taking in men twenty-five to thirty-five—

Mr. GREEN: Married men.

Mr. RALSTON: One of the arguments which might be put forward for indicating a possible modification of the duties of the reserve army would be that the men were between thirty-five and fifty; but when you say, "no, we are going to put in men twenty-five to thirty-five and give them assurance that they are not going on coast defence duty or guard duty," that makes it more difficult. The suggestion was made at Halifax as to the age limit, and I told the officers there frankly that I could not agree to that alteration in the age limit.

My hon. friend mentioned another point with which I am particularly concerned; that is, men in war industries. I thoroughly agree, I think he has the right point of view, the point of view I tried to express yesterday. A man has the satisfaction of working at a lathe in a war industry, he feels he is doing a good job for the country, but his conscience is bothering him a bit as to whether or not he should be in uniform. The reserve army gives him an opportunity to work at his lathe and to turn out in uniform and be ready to do other duty if necessary. It seems to me that has an attraction for many of our citizens who want to do their duty; it gives them two chances instead of one.

I feel also that the appeal should not be only to war industry workers, but in some cases to employers, not only in war industry but in others as well. I have found a case or two, one in particular, in which I remember a man writing to me reporting that a man had refused to give him employment if he went into the reserve army. That came up at a conference, and I have taken it up directly with the firm concerned.

I do want to say generally that when my hon. friend speaks about war industries and workers in those industries, I feel that we should and I believe we can enlist the interest of the employers, who will not discourage but will rather encourage their men, though they are doing good work where they are in connection with the production of munitions, to give at least two or three of their evenings to do this very important part of our war activity. I propose to do that at a very early date, and I appreciate the suggestion of my hon. friend that members of the House of Commons should do the same thing. I would ask them sincerely to join in influencing the people around them to do this. There is nothing formal about this work in connection with the reserve army. It is a real job; it is going to take some time, and perhaps occasionally it is going to be grim. I often think that people would far rather do without some ration of gasoline, do without tires and pay more taxes, but that time and particularly comfort are two things we find it hard to sacrifice. The reserve army does cut into comfort; there is no doubt about that. It does not leave men free in the evenings; they cannot play bridge or go out to entertainments, or anything like that, after a hard day's work. But this is something we have to do if we are going to win this war.

Mr. GREEN: What about equipment?

Mr. RALSTON: I can only say to the committee that I have dealt with that matter at every place we have gone. General Browne and the master-general of the ordnance have gone over the equipment situation thoroughly with the chief of the general staff. As I indicated yesterday, some priority will be given in connection with equipment. I can only say that the last bit of equipment that is available for the reserve army will be given to them; but that must always have regard to the necessities on the active fronts, as everyone understands. Someone said to me in Saint John, "You do not need to worry about equipment. You tell us that you will give us all that is available, and we will not expect anything more." Of course they cannot expect anything more, but we will try to make available everything possible, having regard to the needs of the active forces. Production certainly is increasing; there are some particular items in which the reserve army will, I think, be better served than ever before. I am sure we are not making any false moves in connection with this matter. We are asking the reserve army to improvise to some extent, as it always has done; to put up with one piece of equipment where it would like to have two or three. I believe we can make a success of this movement, which will make a splendid second line in connection with the defence of this country, should the worst come.

Mr. WHITE: A few moments ago the minister said he would bring down a return in connection with the reserve army. When he does so, would he be good enough to break down that return as between infantry, rifle, machine gun, tank, artillery and so on?

I was pleased to hear the minister say a moment ago that at last the reserve army had a real job to do, and would be recognized to a greater extent. The minister mentioned the eleven brigades that have been set up for the reserve army. Those, however, will accommodate only about one-third of the reserve force units. I fear that perhaps the minister is forgetting those other, orphan battalions and units which will not be included in these brigades. They are located in small cities and towns; in fact, some battalions are decentralized and split up between perhaps three, four or five different places. I think the minister will admit that in the days gone by, the reserve army supplied a great many instructors and men to the active force. At the present time one of the great difficulties in the reserve army is that they sadly lack qualified officers and non-commissioned officers for instructional purposes. The minister said yesterday that about a thousand officers and men had returned from England to act as instructors in Canada. I would ask if at least some of those instructors could not be allotted to various reserve force units.

Another point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister is that when a reserve force unit covers perhaps one or two communities, very often there is a distance of from fifty to a hundred miles between battalion headquarters and some of the company headquarters, and in attempting to carry on training there is that age-old difficulty of who is to pay the travelling expenses of the officers, non-commissioned officers and men who come to company headquarters to carry on drill at night, or to take part in week-end manoeuvres. I am sure this question has been a headache to the department in days past, but it is most important to the men, who are paid only a matter of some sixty cents for one night's drill. If they have to use their own cars and gasoline and oil in order to come to headquarters for training, I believe some plan should be worked out under which these men might be reimbursed in some way for their travelling expenses. I should like also to point out to the minister that now the question of gasoline is going to be of vital importance. Many of these men have to travel fifteen or twenty miles in order to take their training, and I believe they should receive some consideration in connection with their gasoline allowance.

I was pleased to hear the minister state that every possible consideration will be given to the reserve force units in the allotment of equipment. I am sure the minister will agree when I say that nothing discourages the average recruit so much as to carry on continually with parade ground drill and lectures, with perhaps only an old Lewis gun for training. Naturally these young men are greatly interested in the newer forms of automatic weapons; and if the minister could give two or three or four of these newer weapons to each reserve force unit, I am sure that in itself would create a great deal of interest and assist materially in the recruiting of new men. Perhaps the minister might be able to tell the committee in some detail just what equipment he hopes to be able to furnish to the reserve force units. The minister shakes his head. He will realize, I am sure, that at present the average member of a reserve force unit has a rifle and a bayonet, and that is about all, with perhaps one or two old Lewis guns for the whole unit. If they could be assured that they would be given some of these newer weapons, or if they could be told in some detail what they may hope to get, it would be of great help in bringing in new men.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think I can say anything more than I have said already with regard to equipment. General Browne has had a full discussion with the chief of the general staff and with the master-general of the ordnance with regard to equipment. He knows the forecasts of production and the forecasts of needs. I may tell my hon. friend that I think we have been very frank with the reserve officers in telling them the situation, not in general terms but in some detail, giving some figures, endeavouring not only to have them realize the situation but to learn what they may expect.

With regard to the units which are not in the reserve brigade groups, I must admit that they will be on a lower scale than the reserve brigade groups. I am not forgetting them, by any means; I have not been allowed to forget them at the last three meetings I have attended. I am going to Montreal on Friday evening to attend another meeting in this connection, and I am sure that my hon. friend or someone representing his unit will be at a meeting which I believe is to be held in Toronto very shortly. All I can say is that they are not being forgotten by any means. They are regarded as part of the reserve army, but I do say that for tactical and operational purposes we feel it necessary to get these reserve brigade groups going first, a little in advance of the other units. It is not that the other units will not be training, but they probably will not have the same scale of equipment. The gasoline question is being taken up now with the oil controller. The point was made, as my hon. friend has made it, that men, and particularly the officers, are long distances away in rural communities, and it is hard on them, in view of the small gas ration, to have to attend these exercises, manoeuvres and parades.

With regard to the matter of allowances for expenses, may I say that that suggestion has not been made before. All I can say is that it rises in connection with the work of the reserve army. I do not think there is anything more that I can say that will be of use except to say that, as my hon. friend would, no doubt, anticipate, the points he has raised have been made by some of the officers in the meetings we have been holding. In fact, the chief of general staff just said to me a moment ago that one might almost think we were at a meeting of the reserve army command, because all the points my hon. friend has brought up have been talked out there.

Mr. WHITE: What would be done about the payment of travelling expenses? The minister knows the great trouble there has been about it.

Mr. RALSTON: That has not been brought up before, but I shall take it up. That is a new point, and I may say to my hon. friend that he is entitled to credit for having brought it up for the first time. However, the matter of gasoline has been discussed frequently. There is another matter he has not brought up, and that is the matter of increasing the administrative staff. That, however, has really not anything to do with expenses. He is speaking more particularly of those units which are in isolated districts.

Mr. WHITE: The minister knows that in the past there has been a certain amount of confusion and a great deal of diffidence about the payment of travelling expenses. Troops have been led to believe that if they came to training, they would be paid their travelling expenses. Perhaps it was a misunderstanding. They were, however, later advised that their travelling expenses would not be paid. In order that that condition may not arise again, could the minister give some clear-cut statement through the district officers commanding regarding these travelling expenses? If so, I am sure it would eliminate a great deal of grief which falls on the company commanders and the junior officers, and it would remove one of the great stumbling-blocks.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend elaborate his point? Has he in mind the expenses of officers coming to the armouries, or to the central places for purposes of attending parades?

Mr. WHITE: No; they are paid.

Mr. RALSTON: The administrative officer is paid.

Mr. WHITE: Yes; I know that. I am speaking of the ordinary private or non-commissioned officer whose company headquarters is in a small village or town or city. Many of those boys have to travel from ten to twelve miles. It is quite true that a number of them may come in one car, but when they come two nights a week for many weeks it runs up to quite a total. There has been great grief in many places, because they were under the impression they were going to be paid. But after they have travelled for weeks they are suddenly advised that they are not to be paid.

Mr. RALSTON: Were they ever paid? Have expenses of that kind ever been paid?

Mr. WHITE: In my own unit a great deal of dissatisfaction was caused. I do not know whether it received special consideration or not, but they were paid.

Mr. RALSTON: Were they paid by the government or was the pay pooled?

Mr. WHITE: The cheques came from the government, and then there was some further adjustment through battalion funds.

Mr. RALSTON: Was it considered as reimbursement for mileage? Was it so much per mile?

Mr. WHITE: It was just put down to travelling, on the usual mileage basis. I should like to impress upon the minister most strenuously that that is one of the greatest detriments to reserve force units recruiting in rural districts. If he will see that instructions are issued to district officers commanding so that there may be no further misunderstanding, and so that some reasonable allowance may be made, I am sure he will find there will be many more recruits.

Mr. HAZEN: Have any reports or complaints been received by the minister's department about excessive drinking among the troops in Canada? If such complaints have been received, has any action been taken? Has any investigation been held or any report made; and, if a report has been made to the minister by any investigating committee, would the minister care to say what it was? Does his department intend to take action? I have been prompted to make these inquiries by reason of statements appearing from time to time in the press.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has me completely in the dark. Naturally, from time to time one receives statements about this or that occurrence which may happen on a train, or somewhere else. But no definite complaint has been made to me, and so far as I can recall, no report has come to me with respect to excessive drinking generally amongst the troops. I have in mind two or three instances of, shall I say, parties which have been called to my attention, and with respect to which action has been taken. I have also in mind complaints made with regard to men on the trains. I had hoped that the lack of reports in the past winter might indicate a very considerable improvement. The provost service is very much strengthened, and I know that Colonel Piuze and Major Goad are doing a good job. But if my hon. friend has anything further in mind, I would ask him not to hesitate to say so.

Mr. HAZEN: I have no individual cases or parties in mind. I have been prompted to to ask the questions by reason of certain articles appearing in the press from time to time, arising from meetings of certain organizations which have passed resolutions. I was wondering whether anything had been brought to the minister's attention, and if any action had been taken.

Mr. NICHOLSON: A similar resolution was debated a year ago, and at that time the minister placed on record his estimate of what the expenditures would be in the year 1941-42. Could he tell us what a similar estimate would be for 1942-43.

Mr. RALSTON: I gave the figures a few nights ago; perhaps my hon. friend has not seen them. I gave the break-down of a total of $997,000,000, divided into various functions and objects of expenditure. I believe I said at that time that the expenditure of that amount depended on deliveries and on operations. Having regard to some forecasts which we have received, and some forecasts we hope might be fulfilled, I believe it might be possible that deliveries would be such that expenditures would be considerably more than that. Judging by deliveries last year, and by the acceleration there has been, the amount has been placed at $997,000,000, with possibly more to follow if deliveries are greater than expected, or if the operations use up the materials faster than is anticipated.

Mr. NICHOLSON: A year ago the minister said the expenditures would be $666,000,000. Can he say whether the expenditures were more or less than that amount?

Mr. RALSTON: Up to the end of the fiscal year they will run close to $600,000,000. In other words, it is $66,000,000 less than the estimated amount.

Mr. BOUCHER: While we are in this part of the discussion, would the minister feel it advantageous to the committee to make some observations by way of explanation relative to the allocation of various men in the army? There are many cases which might be taken into consideration, and concerning which the public might be enlightened. For instance, about a month ago we had a report to the effect that 150 senior officers overseas, in England, were being replaced by younger men. Those officers were giving up their rank, and coming back to Canada. Could we have an explanation as to what use has been made of those officers in Canada? We have the case where officers, non-commissioned officers and lower rank are being brought from England to take special courses in connection with officers' training corps instruction in Canada. What particular use is the government going to make of those men? Are they going to be retained in Canada for instructional purposes? Are they going to rejoin their units overseas, or are they going to form new units in Canada?

What is the position of the department with regard to draftees who volunteer for active service? Does the army try to place them in the particular branch for which they are best adapted?

Then, take the veterans of the last war, too mature in age and perhaps not physically strong enough to stand the strain of overseas service; what particular use is the department making of them?

There is also the Canadian Women's Army Corps, which has been formed to take over certain duties in the armed forces.

There are a great many places in the army where these classes of people can serve their country efficiently and release those who are physically fit for more active service. Guard duty, mess duty, driving of cars and trucks, patrol duty, clerical work, and perhaps the less exacting kind of administrative work, are all branches of service in which various classes of people can be usefully employed in the service of their country, and I think the public would be pleased to have the assurance from the minister that the government is giving consideration to the proper allocation of those who are offering their services by way of draft or otherwise, taking into account their capacity, aptitudes and physical condition, and the duties they may be called upon to perform.

Fatigue duty has been discussed, and it was pointed out that the training of a soldier is not complete until he has had considerable training in fatigue duties. That is true, although it can be carried to excess, but undoubtedly certain forms of service do not call for as exacting qualifications as other forms.

Another question that comes to my mind, which I have been asked several times, is this: What assurance is given to the ladies at present in the Canadian Women's Army Corps, that, while possessing other aptitudes, they are not to be taken away from the particular spheres of endeavour for which they are qualified and in which they wish to serve?

I think it would be of great interest to the country if the minister would make a detailed statement along the lines of my suggestions and assure the Canadian people that the government is giving serious consideration to this matter, just as it is giving consideration in the mustering of the army to certain age groups, the restraining of employers in certain industries from giving employment to men of military age, and matters of that sort.

Mr. RALSTON: What my hon. friend has last referred to is probably one of the most interesting and important phases of the whole army programme, or of any war programme. It means trying to put the right man in the right place and trying, if one possibly can, to save a man who is best equipped for a certain job to do that particular job, letting somebody else perform a less difficult one. We have tackled that question in the department in a realistic way. There has been no fanfare of trumpets about it, but we have a personnel selection board under the adjutant-general, headed by Brigadier Chisholm, who has personnel selection officers at all the basic training centres, officers' training centres and district depots. Do not let me mislead the committee. That branch has been functioning for not more than six months, but already we have seen a marked usefulness and an improvement through its efforts. Everybody, of course, cannot do that work. We have had to some extent the benefit of personnel people from industry who have come in and helped us. We have tried to keep the idea of psychology out of it. I think it always scares a man to be put through a psychological or I.Q. test. What has been done has been by way of interview and by way of test at the same time. The soldier will talk to a man who understands judging men, their mental capacity and mental aptitudes. Such a man will talk to a soldier for, it may be, only ten minutes, give him a test and be able to estimate pretty accurately his general capacity, and then endeavour to steer him along the line where that capacity can best be used. If statistics mean anything, at the present moment the number being tested and interviewed in Canada is 22,000. We have not a big staff; and when the committee realizes that we have 60 training centres across Canada, it will be understood that it takes a big staff to cover them all. But we have these staffs operating in every basic training centre, in the officers' training centres and in the depots.

To give the committee an idea of the results of these tests, 61 per cent of those taking them have been given normal placement in the armed forces; that is to say, they were found fit for the job they enlisted for. Thirty-four per cent were recommended as trades trainees, having particular aptitudes, regard being had to their previous training or to their whole mental outlook; for 3·7 per cent there were special recommendations, such as for special appointments or transfer to other services. If a man who has enlisted in the army is particularly adapted to the air force, I do not think the personnel selection board are averse to seeing the man go where he will give the most useful service. Then 1·2 per cent have been set over for further examination. Altogether there have been examined, interviewed, to be dealt with further, no decision or final classification having yet been made, 76,000 men. Therefore that particular branch of the service has been working at top speed.

That is what is done, and that is apart from what is being done every day in any well-regulated institution, and in every organization. The senior officer is over these men, and the non-commissioned officers are keeping an eye on them to see where they can best be used. When you have an army which contains, in some branches, 35 per cent of tradesmen you have to keep a watch upon them all the time. We are doing that; it is being done by the officers as well as the men. But this personnel selection branch is a growing concern, and we have got great value out of it.

As regards the use of C category men—I refer to that because it is generally illustrative of the class to which my hon. friend refers—he understands, of course, the battle which is going on and has been going on since the beginning of the war, and is now, I believe, intensified: that is to say, we are not using an A man for a C man's job. That applies particularly to the depots. I suppose that if the adjutant-general has one headache more than another, it is with relation to the depots. When men get into the depots it is difficult to get them documented, inoculated, and passed on to the next stage, to go to the training centre, because they are pulled off for this duty and that. The depot seems to be the place where you can get a man for a job, it may be a fatigue or what-not. We try to see that the administrative part of a depot settlement is filled as far as possible by low category men, so that active men can be spared for the service for which they were intended and for which they enlisted.

With regard to over-age officers, nothing would give my hon. friend the information to which he refers except a nominal roll of each officer showing what disposal was made of him. I have in mind the list which came over about January 1, when the age limits were put into effect. I believe that very few of them have retired—

Mr. BOUCHER: About one hundred and fifty.

Mr. RALSTON: —and I understand that many of them were absorbed in England at holding units, training centres and places of that sort; they were simply taken from field formations. As the committee knows, a number have returned and taken positions here, and they are, of course, proving exceedingly useful, because they have experience of the training and operations which are taking place in England. I believe that, generally speaking, they are giving an extremely good account of themselves.

With regard to the junior officers who are coming back, not as instructors but to take the junior war staff course, they will be utilized both in England and in Canada. I would not want General McNaughton to hear me say this, because I believe he has in mind that most of them will go back to the staff in England. But the search for capable young staff officers will never cease, and the men who are coming back here are needed to do real jobs when the crisis comes.

With respect to the instructors, I mentioned yesterday that about a thousand officers and non-commissioned officers have come home. They will probably stay here about eight months at their work, and they will then go back to England Some of them, we hope, can be spared to join units here and help strengthen the forces in Canada wherever they may be most needed. Certainly it is a great stiffening of our training to have them come over here. At the same time it gives them a change and an opportunity to utilize their experience of the training they have had by imparting it to others.

This is very general and, I am afraid, sketchy. But the big point which my hon. friend made, and the one to which I want to refer, is, first, that we are trying to make use of the best in the men in order to get the greatest utility possible out of their capacity; and, second, we are trying to save the more active men to do the more active jobs.

The chief of the general staff reminds me in reference to the cadres we are forming now for the seventh and eighth divisions—for that matter, for the sixth division also—that for every cadre of officers and non-commissioned officers we form here for these units, a certain number are brought back from England. It is some recognition of their services there and it helps us here. As an illustration of that, just before I came in the house to-night I approved the recommendation of the selection board of no less than ten officers who are now overseas to commands in Canada. All of them have been recommended by our staffs over there to take commands here. If I published a list of these it would be quite a striking thing. I do not believe that the public of Canada understand how many men who have served in England are in this country at the present time and how much help we are getting from them, nor do they realize how many are going to England. I find myself losing count of them; a week goes by and when I ask for this or that man I find that he is in England with an n.c.o. or two, attached to some battalion over there in order to get experience. This constant interchange is going on.

In reference to the Canadian Women's Army Corps, I speak subject to correction, but I do not believe that the personnel selection board have actually taken on work in relation to that corps. Primarily they are devoting their attention to four branches: one, dietetics, which includes cooking and waiting as well; secondly, clerical; thirdly, auxiliary services; fourthly, motor mechanics and things of that sort. The corps is, I think, making a great success. We are very much pleased with the work which has been done in the training of them at the school at Macdonald college. Accessions to the ranks have not been as rapid as we should have liked, not because of any lack of applications but because it is so difficult, with all the building that is going on, to provide accommodation. The committee will understand that we have had some difficulty in providing accommodation in camps, training centres and places like that for these young women, but it is being overcome, and overcome very rapidly. All the reports I have had about the work which these women are doing indicate that they are quite capable of taking the places of the men in the jobs to which they are assigned, and there is no doubt that they will be the means of saving a very substantial amount of man-power. I am extremely pleased and proud of the way in which they have carried on.

Mr. GREEN: What is the aim as regards the size of the Canadian Women's Army Corps?

Mr. RALSTON: Just whatever is needed. We have applications now from every district for hundreds and hundreds more than we are able to give them: we could provide them if we had the accommodation. I believe that provision is being made at Gordon Head, Calgary, Kingston and Montreal. We are just now getting accommodation here, where problems of subsistence and living conditions are very difficult. At present the enlistments are about 2,800 or 3,000.

Mr. NICHOLSON: What are the age limits?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not sure, but I think it is nineteen. I know we made a change, slightly lowering the age limit.

Mr. BOUCHER: Could the minister not enlarge on what he has already stated to show to what extent he has used lower category soldiers and the women's army corps for the replacement of higher category men in such duties as motor mechanics, clerks, guards, chefs, et cetera?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think I can enlarge on that except to state what must be obvious to my hon. friend. Wherever possible, sedentary jobs and certain types of fatigue duty which do not involve great physical effort, are done by those in the lower categories; that is, so long as their mental equipment is all right. We are endeavouring to place these people all the time. I mentioned the depots particularly because there is a steady job there, as well as on the administrative staffs. I think of another place, the Royal Military College. Just the other day the question came up, and I was told that for some time the commandant has been employing a number of low category men. At any place where there are permanent or semi-permanent jobs, if anything is permanent in this war, we use as many low category men as possible. This is a very general statement, and I am afraid it does not give my hon. friend much more information than he would have guessed himself.

Mr. BOUCHER: Could the minister give us any particulars as to the extent to which civilians are being used to replace soldiers?

Mr. RALSTON: No. Of course, as my hon. friend knows, a great many civilians are being used in ordnance as well as at national defence headquarters. Civilians, particularly young ladies, are being used at district headquarters. The engineering service uses a great number of civilians, but they are more in the way of labourers and craftsmen than for office or administrative work.

Mr. BOUCHER: Perhaps the minister could tell us something about the civilian guards that are being used in connection with the mounted police, or it may be that is not under his department.

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There is not only the problem of making an intelligent allocation of men in the different branches of a service; there is also the problem of allocating men to the different services themselves. I know this is a ticklish and delicate problem, but sometimes fools rush in where angels fear to tread. Has any thought been given to this? I know of men who have trained in the reserve units and would have made first-class soldiers or non-commissioned officers. They went, however, into the air force as members of the ground crew. There is a certain glamour about that force; they have natty uniforms, and it seems to be attractive to the young men. I know a number of these fellows. They are splendid physical specimens, all in category A1, and yet they are members of the ground crew.

Has there been any collaboration between the army and the air force with a view to meeting this situation? I do not know enough about the matter to speak categorically, but from a layman's point of view it would seem that men in B category could do the work of a ground crew. I cannot understand why a man who is short-sighted or who has flat feet could not service a plane in an aerodrome. But that has not been done. As I say, many of these men in A1 category are members of the ground crew in the air force. The day may come very quickly, should another front be opened up and there be many casualties. when we shall need as many A1 category men in the army as it is possible to get. I know the Minister of National Defence for Air will not appreciate my suggesting this, but this problem will have to be faced. Probably it should have been faced earlier in the war.

Is any attempt being made as between the different services to allocate men? I know it is a difficult thing to say to a man that he should not join the air force, that he should go into the army or some other service. On the other hand, if one service has a waiting list as they have in the air force, and the army is just making its quota month by month, sometimes as a result of terrific work by the recruiting officers, something should be done. There has been a definite tendency for men to go into the one service. It is too bad when the government has spent a lot of money and the army a lot of time in training men, that they should go into a different service.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I can give my hon. friend only a very brief statement. Naturally, what he has said is not open to argument. There has been, not only consultation but collaboration with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air. There is this to be said with regard to the ground crew. From the very beginning of the air training plan it was recognized—I was going to say 50 per cent—that a very large percentage of the activity of the air force would be in the ground crew. I shall not give the figures to-night, but most hon. members know the small number of air crew there is compared with the ground crew in a squadron. The real mechanization of Canada's army came later, and many of these men were already in the ground crew.

I do not argue for one minute against what my hon. friend has said about the possibility of our being able to utilize these men in the lower categories in connection with the air force. I would not want to be taken as saying that this is the case because I do not know enough about the air force and its service requirements. It may be that only certain men can stand up to the needs of the service. This matter has been the subject of earnest, thoughtful and intensive discussion between myself and my colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air. We have an interdepartmental personnel committee which is considering how best we can help each other in connection with the matter of recruitment. We try not to step on each other's toes, but to assist one another. The matter of joint recruiting offices was considered, but there were reasons which I need not go into to-night which seemed to make that impracticable. We have always had the arrangement that one would send a man to the other if he seemed more fitted for a particular job.

I do not think I can say anything more to my hon. friend. I shall take note of what he has said and bring it to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air. This is discussed, I may say, at defence council more often than my hon. friend may believe. We are all endeavouring out of a limited field to get the men we need for the different services. So far, we have been able to do it. By this personnel selection board we think we are improving that situation, and we hope that it will result in the very best allocation of men possible, having regard to their capabilities.

Mr. GREEN: Is the army responsible for the defence of air fields and airports, or is that the task of the air force? That is a very important question, particularly in northern British Columbia and the Yukon, and on both coasts. There has been considerable trouble and difficulty about it in Great Britain. Has Canada got around that difficulty?

Mr. RALSTON: The army accepts responsibility for the defence of air fields. I regard it as the army's job to see, if possible, that the enemy is kept far enough away that the planes at the aerodrome can get into the air. We do that by anti-aircraft guns and by keeping paratroops from landing on the field and things of that sort. Once the planes are up, they take care of the situation themselves. But it is the defence of a post, just as the defence of a naval base.

Mr. GREEN: It is recognized as a job for the army?

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. HAZEN: Reference was made a minute or two ago to employment of civilians in the army. I have in mind the employment of carpenters by the engineers. I think a good many carpenters are employed in some places. Has the government or the minister's department made any change recently in the employment of carpenters, or do they contemplate any change? Is it proposed to take such men into the army and have them work as carpenters in the army rather than to employ them as civilians?

Mr. RALSTON: I know of no intention to make any change in that respect. We have some construction battalions in England.

Mr. GREEN: In yesterday's Montreal Star there was a dispatch from Victoria stating:

> British Columbia may give Canada and possibly the United States, a new defence arm —the motor boat and automobile "emergency transportation squadrons". . . .
> Harold Husband, representative of the Dominion Department of Transport here, disclosed that squadrons were being organized on Vancouver island and the "blueprints" would be made available to other parts of British Columbia and Canada as soon as possible. They also may be sent to authorities in the United States if there is any interest in them there.

Then it goes on to describe the work of these transportation squadrons, which apparently is to supply automobiles and also motorboats for emergency transportation. Does the Department of National Defence know anything about this move?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not heard anything yet. My hon. friend has the credit of having brought it first to my attention.

Mr. GREEN: I will send the clipping to the minister and perhaps he might investigate. I think there is a good deal of merit in the suggestion.

Another question is with regard to what used to be known in the last war as the paper war. We get complaints repeatedly, relating to all three services, that there is far too much correspondence, too much passing the buck, letters from this department to that department and so on right down the line. Two or three months ago I had an unsigned, anonymous letter from an officer in the force; strictly speaking I suppose I am not entitled to read it, but he had some very good suggestions. I should like to read the one dealing with correspondence:

> Speed-up of interdepartmental correspondence. At present the red tape that ties up interdepartmental business is dreadful. Officers and men are often kept kicking their heels about for weeks at a time doing nothing while their papers (documents to us) are undergoing some mysterious process. I myself had time to take five weeks training in another branch of the service while my papers were undergoing this process, and when they did call me in the papers were confused and nobody seemed to know where I was to go, so I went back to sitting in the mess reading the morning papers and enjoying life for another ten days, at $5 a day. Surely a telegraph service could be installed in each camp for the use of routine business, it would be an excellent training ground for the signal corps. In one case a letter from Ottawa was sent west for an officer to be dispatched east to catch a draft, the letter was mailed with a three-cent stamp. The time lost was made up by the officer being brought east by air travel. A good telegraph service linking every camp in Canada would be excellent training for the signal corps and put our Canada army in Canada on a war basis.

I realize the difficulty. In all our business, civilian as well as military, there is far too much letter-writing, but probably the army is very prone to develop in that direction. Is any attempt being made to cut out some of this letter-writing and, if so, what?

Mr. RALSTON: I could show my hon. friend cases that make that one pale into insignificance.

Mr. STIRLING: Doesn't it make you mad?

Mr. RALSTON: No one knows better than the army the difficulties that exist. Constantly, steadily, all the time, slowly but persistently I think we are improving in that respect. Some most radical things have been done at headquarters with regard to cutting red tape; the trouble is, the organization is so big and has grown so fast, there have been so many people appointed who have to have a look at a thing and consider it, that it takes a long time to get around. If a man could go to one man's desk and have him stop his work and attend to that particular thing you would get that through splendidly, but you would not get the day's work done. You must have some system. I have in mind now an improvement which has taken six weeks to get through, but I am sure it will result in a great deal of labour saving.

The difficulty in connection with army administration is to separate the big from the small. That is, each thing has to take the same amount of time, no matter how important or unimportant. The trouble is, a return may be asked for in the house in connection with something that amounts to only $100 which may cause more back-fire than something amounting to $10,000. That is why everyone is concerned in seeing that things are done regularly. But we have to take some chances in connection with the army as with everything else, and verbal instructions are given sometimes and confirmed afterwards on the file.

At the last district officers' meeting, instructions were given about this point of postage, that the telephone could be used and used freely in order to hasten matters, because a letter has to go to some central distributing office and so on. With thousands of letters in a day, it is the next day before the letter gets to the department; it may be the next afternoon before it gets to the officer who has to attend to it, and he may have to send it to different places to get notes in regard to costs and materials and so on. We are short-cutting to a reasonable extent, I think; we are toiling slowly upward—I would not say through the night—but we are making definite progress in that respect.

Mr. GREEN: Is the situation any better in Great Britain? Have they any better system? If they have, we might copy it.

Mr. RALSTON: I would not want to comment. I am willing to say that anyone's system is better—I do not believe it, but I would not want to say that anyone's system is worse.

Mr. STIRLING: Certainly not in stenographic help.

Mr. RALSTON: No. But, you see, we have had officers who have been at the war office. The former chief of the general staff was there for three or four years, and we have had other officers attached there. I believe we have adopted anything from there that has seemed useful.

Mr. GREEN: What about this suggestion that there should be a telegraph service between the camps? Is that feasible, or is it not? If a telegraph service could not be instituted, what about a wireless service? Would that not be possible?

Mr. RALSTON: There is at present a complete wireless service between districts. I think what my hon. friend means by a telegraph service is the up-to-date apparatus called the teletype. We have spent a good deal of the money of the people of Canada in connection with teletype service, and it has been of tremendous help. I do not want to make a public statement as to where the teletypes are located, but they are working every minute, and we are having to increase the number. We know they are well worth it, not only in connection with the money saved but in the efficiency produced and the speed with which we can get on.

Mr. GREEN: They come under the signal corps, do they?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. In some instances one service puts them in and then puts in switch lines to the other two services. In other words, they just have the one teletype set for out-of-town service, and the three branches get the benefit of it.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister has made a very fair but extremely limited statement on the allocation of men. Perhaps he cannot enlarge upon it, but I am not yet satisfied that a useful purpose would not be served if we could be told a little more about the way a man seeking to enter the army is put in the place for which he is most fitted. I have in mind several cases which have come to my attention, perhaps more by hearsay than by direct contact. It seems to me that when a man goes to join the air force he is given almost every consideration in being directed to that particular branch of the air force for which his trade, training or experience best fits him. On the other hand, it seems to me that in the army, if you do not go to a particular unit, there is no place where you can get information as to the branch of the service you should enter. With most of the recruiting depots being depots for all units, very little guidance is given to the recruit seeking to enlist, as to the particular unit or particular branch of the service he should enter.

One case drawn to my attention a short time ago was that of a man with experience in electrical engineering. Then, not two weeks ago another case was brought to my notice, that of a man who had perhaps five years' practical experience in connection with precision tools. In common with many other people he did not feel like sacrificing that experience by going into the ranks in any particular branch of the army, without some assurance that full use would be made of his training. I wondered whether the minister had given consideration to the position of the average man, who does not know as much about military life as he might, who has some special qualifications and who does not know where he can secure guidance as to the possibility of his particular knowledge being used in some particular branch of the service. Perhaps the minister might explain that a little more fully.

Mr. RALSTON: I should be very much surprised if one statement made by my hon. friend should be true. He said the recruiting offices were recruiting for particular units. That is not intended. If the recruiting officer is doing his job—and I have seen a good many of them; I have met them at conferences, and I have an idea they are on the job—

Mr. BOUCHER: I do not mean to cast any aspersions on any recruiting officer.

Mr. RALSTON: I appreciate that; but I believe these officers are qualified to do exactly what my hon. friend asks about. That is to say, my hon. friend is quite right in suggesting that a man is entitled to all the advice and all the information he can get about the particular branch of the service he would like to enter. But what I wish to impress upon the committee is this, though it may sound a little impersonal. First of all, a man has to make the decision as between the army, the navy and the air force. If he decides to go into the army; if he will only enlist for general service, I will undertake that when he meets these personnel selection people he will find them sympathetic; he will find that they know what the army has to offer, that they know what qualifications are required for a particular branch. They will find out from him what qualifications he possesses, and they will put him in the right place. A man may say, "I want to be a signaller." He has a right to say that; that is his own decision.

But if he wants help, I really think he should enlist for general service and then take the advice of these personnel selection people as to where he should go if he really wants full use made of his abilities. That is pretty simple, but I really think it is sound.

Mr. BOUCHER: I can appreciate that viewpoint in one who is, as it were, looking from the inside out, but according to the minister's explanation it puts a man with special qualifications in the position that, first of all, he must join for general service. He may have some diffidence about trusting his future to general service without first knowing—

Mr. RALSTON: He does anyway.

Mr. BOUCHER: That is so, but not with the same degree of recklessness, perhaps, as he does when he joins for general service. Consider the man I mentioned a moment ago, with five years of technical experience. Apparently he had taken special training and had considerable experience in connection with precision instruments. He wanted to join some branch of the army in which he would have some reasonable assurance that he would use that experience, and would have an opportunity further to develop himself as well. From the inside looking out, one might be inclined to say that he should join the army for general service and trust to the efficiency of the army, about which he knows nothing, to put him in his proper place, to see that he gets proper pay and proper promotions. Yet it would put him much more at ease if, before signing on the dotted line and joining the army, he could be given much more guidance than, in my uninformed opinion, he gets now. I believe this point might be well worth consideration, and perhaps the minister might give a little further explanation in that regard.

Mr. RALSTON: I have suggested the method. We try to have the recruiting officers well acquainted with the needs of the various arms of the service. They try to size up a man, and I am really satisfied that most recruiting officers would be willing to give any man helpful, sound and useful advice. If it would help, I would set up a bureau anywhere, but that is what the recruiting officers are for. We have also formed these civilian committees to assist in that direction, because often a man does not want help about a technical matter but rather information about what his duties will be. It seems to me these civilian committees can be of great assistance in this regard.

Mr. BOUCHER: I would not want to suggest that this situation does exist; but very often a man, not knowing the army, not knowing the officers, has every reason to feel that he possesses qualifications which should entitle him to a higher rank than that of a raw recruit just entering the army. Though perhaps I should not say so, frequently people are led to believe that, to some extent at least, you need a little pull, a little assistance or a little drag to get the better positions in the army. That very situation leads to that opinion, in so far as it may prevail.

Mr. RALSTON: I have said all I can about the matter of drag. I know that is the feeling not only about the army, but about almost everything—it may be the church, or anything else. It seems to be the idea that if you want to get anywhere, you must get someone to speak a few words for you. But I believe that the army is about as clear of it as it has ever been, or as any organization is.

Any man with the qualifications of a machinist, or with other technical qualifications, will be snapped up so fast, and will be taken so quickly, that it will certainly make his heart warm, if he is enthusiastic about the service. It is not a question of drag; it is a matter of taking advice, and of being satisfied with and having confidence in the person who gives it. We will do our level best to see that a man will not think he is being influenced by people inside. If he does get into the army, we will shift him around so that he can go to the place where he serves best. Having done that, I believe we have tried to serve him as best we can.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is there any definite rule of procedure a boy in the service should follow? He may know that he possesses mechanical skill and may wish to be transferred to some other unit where that skill might be useful. Under such circumstances, what procedure would he follow? I have been told it is contrary to the rules for him to write to his member of parliament, and it seems there is no one else to whom he can write. If he happens to be shy, he does not wish to be paraded before his superior officer, and may not have the ability to express himself. Under those circumstances he might remain a long time without recognition.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not a matter of recognition. My hon. friend has put his finger on something which I know always presents some difficulty, and that is that the young man in the army feels that he cannot apply to his commanding officer. I am preaching and always have preached—and I believe I am sound in this—that an officer as nearly as possible ought to be a father to his men. By that I mean that that young fellow should immediately apply to his platoon officer—and he does not need to be paraded, either. The platoon officer will talk to him at any time. He might go to his commanding officer and ask to be transferred. If his qualifications are mechanical, he will be readily picked up. There is a general comb-out—I believe that is the right word to use—of all units. Men with mechanical qualifications are taken quickly. Without my hon. friend using any pull, or anything like that, I should like to know of any case in which that would not work. I do say that the young man should first of all exhaust that way of doing things. I say that because it is just this procedure of writing to a member of parliament, and something happening as a result of it, that gives the impression there is some sort of drag.

I believe that if the young fellows would go to their officers, if those officers are the kind of men they ought to be they will see that ability is recognized. This pressure is not coming from below only; it is coming from the people above, as well, who are looking for these men and who are trying to get them to go to the trade schools at Hamilton, Barrie-field, Woodstock and other places where trades are being taught.

Just the other day a father came to me and, naturally, wanted me to write somebody on behalf of his son. I said, "I cannot do it; but tell your boy to go to his platoon officer." I have not heard from him since, and I do not know whether he took my advice or not.

That is another thing about soldiering; I do not think they teach the boys enough about army procedure. I should be very much surprised if the procedure I have suggested would not work, if the boy had the qualifications I assume he has.

Mr. BLACKMORE: My experience has been that the minister's officers are very considerate, once a matter like this is brought to their attention. They do manifest the interest the minister would like to have them show. But at the same time several cases have been brought to my attention where the boys were just too shy, and they did not know what to do. When I was approached I did not know what to tell them to do. The minister says they should approach their sergeant-major?

Mr. RALSTON: Their platoon officer. Those boys probably have not a platoon officer; they probably have instructors. Probably the boy whom the hon. member has in mind is in a training centre, and is not in a platoon. If he is in a training centre, he will surely be caught, because the comb-out officers will be all around the training centres looking for men with mechanical ability. If he is in a unit, have him go to his platoon officer, or speak to the officer commanding. He does not necessarily have to parade before the commanding officer.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The training centres are organized in platoons, are they not?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. But with all due respect I never think the platoon officer in a training centre is quite as close to his men—because he knows his men for only a short time—as the officer who is in a unit and expects to have his platoon permanently.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): As a matter of fact, I know what the minister has suggested is being done very often. I know some of the platoon commanders in some training centres, and I know that is what they are doing. A few weeks ago I had dinner with a young platoon officer, and he showed me that he was keeping a record of each man who went through his hands, to show what his aptitude was. I think a great deal more of that should be done.

Mr. RALSTON: At six o'clock I believe we were talking about that, and I am delighted to hear it is being done. I have felt that in this war the army is too impersonal, the fault being possibly that of the training centres. We are trying more and more to impress upon the officers that their biggest job apart from training the men is to look after them and be a sort of father to them. When an officer sees that a man is in difficulty he should help him out, even though that man does not happen to be his man for all time. The officer on the job has charge of that man, and is responsible for his comfort as well as for his work.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there any delay with regard to promotions in the forces now in England? I have in mind a chap from the west who is in England, and who is an experienced druggist. He has been over there for more than a year. Although I have not done anything about the matter, it has seemed to me that there has been some difficulty with regard to getting his promotion confirmed on this side. Are the officers in charge on the other side permitted to make promotions over there, or do they have to be recommended from Ottawa?

Mr. RALSTON: They may make promotions over there, up to a certain rank. I am sure that rank is probably far above the rank to which my hon. friend's friend expects to be promoted.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is that rank?

Mr. RALSTON: I can say that it is up to lieutenant-colonel; I shall not say anything further than that. I do not imagine my hon. friend's friend will plan going any higher than that.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: He is still a private.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I can say he need not await approval from this side.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If a boy's parents desire that he go home to work on the farm or to put in the crop, whom should be approach? The rule is that he must approach his commanding officer, is it?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have known several boys who have been at a loss to know whom to approach. They felt somewhat shy about the matter.

Mr. RALSTON: They should approach their commanding officer, through the platoon officer or whoever happens to be the officer next to him.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, until Tuesday, April 28.

The house met at three o'clock.

MID-WEST CHEMICALS LIMITED

TABLING OF AGREEMENT UNDER WAR EXCHANGE CONSERVATION ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I desire to lay on the table copy of agreement made under the War Exchange Conservation Act between His Majesty the King in the right of Canada and Mid-West Chemicals Limited.

CANADA'S WAR EFFORT

RESULT OF THE PLEBISCITE—QUESTION AS TO ACTION BY THE GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I crave the indulgence of the house while I make a brief statement and put a question to the ministry. The people of Canada yesterday spoke emphatically. Now there is no stumbling block, real or imaginary, to total war. The hour has struck when every human and material resource must be mobilized for war service. Parliament now is free to act—there are no fetters upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) or his government. Let us act, and act now. We can decide and decide now that nothing shall limit our effort and we can repeal now those limiting or restricting features. I invite the Prime Minister to respond to the people's will for total war, waged by total effort. Let him rise to the occasion now, and he will strike a great blow for victory. Let us go forward to greater and ever greater effort, secure in the knowledge that the people of Canada are ready and prepared for the sacrifices which that will entail.

The right of way is clear. What does the government propose to do about it?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I hope my hon. friend will be content to wait until the final returns of the plebiscite have been given to the house before he asks me to discuss any matters arising out of it. The questions that will have to be considered are all important and fortunately all members of the ministry and members of the House of Commons are now free to speak their minds without its being assumed for a moment that they are being influenced by any past commitments or considerations other than those which bear immediately upon the questions they are discussing. In due course the government will make known to the house what action it proposes to take in the light of the plebiscite vote of yesterday.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

EXPLOSION AT PLANT OF INTERNATIONAL FLARE AND SIGNAL COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. LECLERC (Shefford): May I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) whether he is aware of a disastrous explosion that took place at the International Flare and Signal Company, Waterloo, Quebec, of which seven or eight persons were victims? Has the government any contracts with this company? Is there a scale of salaries for employees of these munitions plants, and if so what is it?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question should be placed on the order paper.

VICHY REPRESENTATION

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION FOLLOWING RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I intimated to the house before the adjournment that I might possibly make a statement to-day with respect to Canada's relations with Vichy. Since the house adjourned I have asked Mr. Pierre Dupuy, who is in charge of Canada's legation to France, to return to Canada immediately in order that there may be an opportunity of conferring with him before reaching a final decision in the matter of our relations with Vichy. After I have had an opportunity of conferring with Mr. Dupuy, unless some occasion should arise to make it necessary to take action before he returns, I shall then be in a position to make a full statement to the house.

Mr. COLDWELL: When does the Prime Minister expect Mr. Dupuy to return to Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Very soon. He will, I think, come by the quickest route.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, April 23, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1943, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the discussion becomes general I desire to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). The minister will recall that on March 24 last, on a question of privilege, referred to at page 1583-4 of Hansard of that date, I asked him certain questions relating to a report, No. 47, sent out by the military intelligence section of the Department of National Defence, entitled, "Summary of Military Intelligence for Military Districts." This was referred to in the debate on the United Kingdom financing resolution on the Friday previous, March 20, by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), as reported at page 1494 of Hansard. I then asked the minister three questions.

1. Has the attention of the minister been called to this portion of the hon. member's speech?

2. Will the minister advise the house how the hon. member came into possession of what I assume to be a confidential military intelligence release?

3. What does the minister propose to do about the matter in the premises?

The minister replied categorically: First, that his attention had been called to the report of the speech; secondly, that he had not the faintest idea of how the report came into the hands of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency; and thirdly, that the most rigorous investigation was being conducted to ascertain who was responsible for the hon. member receiving the copy and that appropriate action would be taken according to the circumstances.

I now desire to ask the minister what was the result of the most rigorous investigation to which he referred: how did the hon. member obtain the copy of the report; and what was the appropriate action taken in the circumstances?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not made inquiries in the last few days. I have asked the vice-chief of the general staff to look into the matter but he has not yet been able to ascertain how the hon. member got possession of the document or through whom. The investigation is still continuing and I assure the committee that from the point of view of the department as well as of the house it will not be discontinued until every possibility is exhausted of ascertaining how it was that this particular document got into the hands of anyone outside the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am satisfied so long as the matter has not been lost sight of.

Mr. GRAYDON: The points which I desire to bring to the attention of the committee this afternoon are confined very largely to matters affecting the morale and general conditions of the men and women of our armed forces. I shall not have a great deal to say, but I wish to touch upon one or two matters which I think are of prime importance and which, I believe, have engaged the attention not only of those in the armed forces but also of the public at large.

The whole question with respect to parity of pay and allowances in connection with our armed forces is, I realize, a matter that must be dealt with in the light of common sense and sober judgment in times like these, but I would call the attention of the minister and of the government to one particular phase of the situation which was originally brought before the house by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) and which later on was touched upon by myself. It is something that is very close to my heart and which on numerous occasions outside this house I have dwelt upon. Whatever may have been in the government's mind with respect to the question of rates of pay and allowances for our armed forces, there is one matter which has been to a large extent overlooked, whatever the reason may be.

I do not know what reasons may properly be advanced against a general rise in pay for the armed forces and I have never been greatly convinced by some of the arguments which have been put forward on that score, but I suggest that the government might well do something now with regard to an alternative method by which the same object may be attained. I refer to a plan of savings, or a savings rehabilitation fund, which I mentioned in the house before and which I urge again. I believe we could do a great deal towards improving the morale not only of our men in the armed forces but of the people at home by a system of this type. In my opinion, the idea of a nest-egg for the men in the armed forces when this war is over has a twofold object. It would be a twofold achievement at the present time. One thing that occurs to me right away is the fact that it would bring up the standard of returns to the armed forces of Canada to a point at least within measurable parity with the returns which other people on the home front may be receiving. In addition to enhancing morale, which would normally flow from such a change, it would wipe out at one fell swoop many of the rehabilitation problems which various departments of the government are attempting to deal with and which they will have to solve at the end of the war.

I think the nest-egg plan, of putting something in addition to his present pay aside every month while the soldier or airman or sailor serves, can be justified on every ground—in the first place, on the ground of morale and secondly, it would remove one of the great obstacles to rehabilitation when the war is over. With all deference to those who have spoken from the government benches during the last few weeks on the very laudable efforts that have been made with respect to rehabilitation of the men in our forces, I would say that these are all promises relating to things to be done after the men are discharged. But I should like to see the government take hold of this problem and make sure that the men of our armed forces know that day by day and month by month, in addition to the rates of pay and allowances they are receiving, the government is setting aside a substantial savings fund for their use when they return. I want to emphasize that idea and impress it upon the minister.

Further with respect to the question of higher pay for our armed forces, I do not want the idea to become general that every little while someone must get up and raise that question just for the purpose of hearing himself speak. The reason I am making this statement now is that I honestly and sincerely believe that the programme which has been outlined, of a nest-egg for our armed forces, is not only justified but is long overdue so far as government policy is concerned. I should like to see the minister take this matter into consideration without further delay. If there is no good basis for it, the government should let us know; we should at least be given some explanation and some assurance that the matter will be considered carefully from every possible angle.

I know, as does the minister, that in the United States legislative changes relating to this subject are now under consideration in the congress. To what extent they will improve standards with respect to returns to men of the armed forces I am not prepared to say, but at least the United States congress has seriously under consideration legislation to improve the position of men in the forces of that country.

Also I want to say to the minister—perhaps I should do this when the estimates of the minister of naval services are before the committee, but I want to bring it to the attention of the Minister of National Defence—that there does not appear to me to be any justification for the vast difference in pay and in dependents' allowances of the naval services and the other services of Canada. Without any reflection on any of the other branches of the forces I am sure the people of Canada are sufficiently proud of the achievements of the officers and men of the navy to rise up in a body and cheer any government that would place that service at least upon an equal footing with the other services.

I come now to the question of dependents' allowances. In a speech made to this house by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) on November 14 last in relation to war allowances and provision for a board of trustees to look after dependents, the minister set out a plan which I think the country welcomed. But in the light of subsequent events that announcement fell short of being any real solution of the problem of increased allowances to the kin of the men on service. The trustee board deals largely with emergencies outside the normal course of life. The minister did not take into sufficient consideration the rising cost of living, which bears with great force upon the dependents of the men serving in our armed forces.

I took the trouble to make some investigation into the increase in the cost of living since the beginning of the war. At the beginning of the war a private in the army was entitled to dependents' allowance of $35 monthly outside of the provision made for children. I have no doubt that that allowance was based upon the cost of living as it existed at the outbreak of the war. But if it was a proper allowance in September, 1939—and I am sure the government must have given it every consideration; if they were convinced that $35 a month was a proper allowance for the wife of a private at that time, then surely the government must now take into consideration the rise in the cost of living since that time. Let me give a few figures which I have obtained from the bureau of statistics. In August 1939 the index figure was set at 100. By December 2, 1940, a year and three months later, the cost of living in Canada had increased 7·1 per cent. By August 1941 it had increased by 12·8 per cent, and on March 2 of this year the cost of living had risen, not 7 per cent, not 12 per cent, but 15 per cent over what it was when the war broke out. That gives us this very simple equation: If $35 a month was a proper figure at the outbreak of the war, now that the cost of living has increased 15 per cent I submit that the allowance for the wife of a man in the armed forces—I am speaking particularly of the army—should be $40.25 a month.

True, it may be said that the government has extended the field in which dependents' allowances may be paid; in other words have added an allowance for a third child and for a fourth. But that is merely a rectification of an obvious error at the beginning and can scarcely be regarded as an argument that the government has increased the rate of allowance so far as the wife is concerned. Order in council P.C. 8253 provided for a cost of living bonus of 25 cents a week for each 1 per cent increase in the official index figure over that of August 1939. If my figures are correct it would mean that the allowance paid to the wife of a private in the army, instead of $40.25, would be increased to $50 per month. I leave these figures with the minister, with the suggestion that this is not something to be bandied about this committee for the sake of argument, but something to which I hope the minister will give careful consideration, and which he might take up with the Minister of Finance. Many times it is argued here that something cannot be done because of the cost to the treasury. That is always an important consideration, but I do not think it is a consideration which should be the last word when we are dealing with the dependents of men who are risking their lives for all of us on the home and overseas fronts. I hope the minister will give this suggestion the comprehensive consideration which I feel it richly deserves.

I am going to offer another suggestion, also having to do with the morale and general welfare of our forces. I know this point has been brought before the house previously, and I raise it now only to emphasize the need for some change in this respect. Many good arguments may be advanced by the government and others against the general granting of free transportation to soldiers, airmen and sailors. Perhaps there are good reasons why that should not be done, but it seems to me the reason would have to be extremely good for the government to turn down the suggestion that in connection with furlough leaves and particularly embarkation leaves, free transportation should be made available to the armed forces. Since this war began the government have found ways and means of doing many things; surely ways and means can be found of seeing to it that the men of our armed forces are not required to scrimp and save out of their meagre pittance for months at a time in order to pay their transportation back home to their loved ones before they leave for overseas. I want to impress upon the minister the importance, in my view in any event, of making some change which will bring about free transportation for our soldiers on their furlough and embarkation leaves.

Let me say further that I am not so sure it is good for the morale of the soldier, or for the morale of any of us, that there should be any distinctions on the railways of this country. Some people are allowed to travel free, while others are not. If there is to be any distinction made; if any are to travel free, then let it be the men who are willing to lay down their lives for us. Surely that is not too much to ask, and I make this plea to the minister. I know that the question has been brought up time after time, but I do want to make this one last appeal. I have spoken to many of these men. I know what they say and what they think, and in view of that I am going to offer another suggestion, if there is still any doubt in the mind of the minister. This may not be quite orthodox, as far as military matters are concerned, but these are not the days of orthodox things. I suggest that the minister choose ten men from among the privates in the ranks of our army in Canada; have them form a select committee to meet with him, and get right to the root of this question. He could find out from them their views, and I think the views of the whole army, with respect to the matters I have mentioned, and particularly with respect to this question of free transportation on furlough and embarkation leave. I would not make this suggestion if it would affect in any way the discipline of the armed forces, if it had anything to do with questions of seniority or anything of the kind. This, however, is a matter entirely apart, having nothing whatever to do with the discipline or organization of the army. It seems to me that nothing would better show the democratic spirit of this great country than for the minister to select ten or more men from the ranks of our armed forces to advise him on this and similar matters. I hope the minister will give this suggestion his careful consideration.

There is one other question I should like to ask the minister, which he might answer in the course of his statement. This situation has been brought to my attention by men in the air force, but I must confess that I have not had it brought to my notice by men in the army. In connection with embarkation leave, we will take a man in camp in eastern Canada who has to travel perhaps thousands of miles in order to get home. I should like the minister to give the committee some explanation or some information as to whether or not the time required for that man to reach his home is added to his embarkation leave, or whether the time spent in travelling is included in the normal leave. I should like it very much if the minister could give us that information during the course of his remarks.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend referred first to the matter of deferred pay. I take it that he was really referring to an additional amount which would be deferred until after the war.

Mr. GRAYDON: Quite so.

Mr. RALSTON: Then there is no question that my hon. friend was advocating an increase in pay, and simply deferring the time of payment.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am not apologizing for it.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not asking my hon. friend to apologize, but I want to be clear about the matter, because as my hon. friend knows there is provision now for deferred pay. My hon. friend was rather protesting that he was not arguing for an increase in pay, but that was exactly what his suggestion amounted to. I am not arguing against it at the moment—

Mr. GRAYDON: I meant increased cash pay.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): For my own information would the minister say what the position is with regard to deferred pay?

[Mr. Graydon.]

Mr. RALSTON: The provision with regard to deferred pay applies only to those who are overseas. If no assignment of pay has been made, then fifty per cent of the pay is deferred. If less than fifty per cent has been assigned the difference between the amount which has been assigned and 50 per cent of the pay is deferred. Those are the two points. That deferred pay is held at 3 per cent until the man is discharged or appointed to a commission. There are certain cases in which the deferred pay may be drawn upon. I know that at least every two or three days I sign authorizations for men to draw against their deferred pay. I believe marriage is one reason; or if there is illness on the part of his relatives, and I think there are some educational matters—

Mr. LOCKHART: Does that apply to both officers and men?

Mr. RALSTON: —for which he may obtain authority to draw against his deferred pay.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is there deferred pay if a man assigns 50 per cent or more of his pay?

Mr. RALSTON: No. The hon. member for Broadview when speaking the other night indicated that he felt that there should be placed on record a statement showing pay and allowances in the Canadian army. He had a photostatic copy of pay and allowances, and I have a copy in my hand. I have made notes with regard to maximum allowances. It might be helpful to the committee and perhaps to the country generally to have on record a statement showing the pay of various ranks in the army, up to the rank of colonel. I do not propose reading it all, but with the permission of the committee I shall have it printed. On this table the allowances shown are divided up into per diem allowances. That is to say the allowance of $35 to a wife is divided into a per diem amount. The allowances for children are also placed on a per diem basis.

The result is that a class 1-A warrant officer, the highest of other ranks, when in quarters, single, receives $1,533. A warrant officer of the same rank in quarters, but with two children, receives $2,301. A warrant officer, class 1-B, in quarters, gets $1,423.50, and a warrant officer of the same class in quarters, with a wife and two children gets $2,191.50. A private soldier, a trooper, gunner or sapper in quarters gets $474.50 if single, and if married with two children he gets $1,182.50. These amounts of course are exclusive of clothing, accommodation and subsistence. The complete table is as follows:

OFFICERS: Command Pay at $1.00 per diem and additional pay at $0.50 per diem for Adjutants and Officers extra-regimentally employed is also payable.
OTHER RANKS: Warrant Officers, N.C.O's and Men employed as tradesmen in capacities and under such limitations and conditions as authorized by the Minister, if qualified and approved by the Officer Commanding the unit to which they belong are entitled to receive tradesmen's pay at .25, .50 or .75 per diem, in addition to rates shown above.

Maximum—
$12.00 per month for 1st child } All ranks.
12.00 per month for 2nd child }
9.00 per month for 3rd child } Ranks below Warrant Officer, Cl. 1.
6.00 per month for 4th child }

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is included in the term warrant officer? Does that include regimental sergeant-major?

Mr. RALSTON: The regimental sergeant-major, the regimental quartermaster-sergeant, the company sergeant-major, the company quartermaster-sergeant, the master gunner—I could give my hon. friend a complete list, if he wishes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is sufficient.

Mr. RALSTON: The table shows the rates of pay allowed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister supplement that by a statement showing what is paid to the higher ranking officers, from a brigadier up to a full general? I do not know that we have a full general.

Mr. RALSTON: We have not.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We have many major-generals.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The public would be interested in that information.

Mr. RALSTON: It is no mystery.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would the minister permit a supplementary question with respect to dependents' allowances? He probably has noticed my question on the order paper.

Mr. RALSTON: I am getting off the subject mentioned by my hon. friend; may I deal with it for a moment? With regard to pay and allowances I can say, without being euphemistic at all, that these matters are receiving constant study and attention. I certainly will give his observations every possible study. I am not holding out any hope, but with the situation as presented there are some points in connection with pay and allowances which I feel should be corrected. Certainly I will take my hon. friend's suggestion into consideration.

May I say this—and I do not say it by way of defence at all—that I believe my hon. friend will find the pay and allowances of soldiers in Canada's army are at least as high as and probably higher than the pay and allowances in other armies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Higher.

Mr. RALSTON: Probably. I have sent out for the information with respect to Australia, but I believe with the possible exception of Australia our pay and allowances are higher than in any other army.

Then, the question of dependents' allowances follows directly after the statement I have just made.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before the minister leaves the question of pay and allowances, sometimes it is alleged that there is discrimination between the pay in the army and in the navy. I have had many representations to that effect. I have been told with respect to that matter that when one considers the allowances received by men in the navy, which the men in the armed forces do not get, the pays are almost equivalent. However, I have never had that point demonstrated to me, if it is so.

Mr. RALSTON: In that connection I recall a conference I attended on that very subject when I held the portfolio of finance. Certain proposals were made with respect to the pay and allowances of one of the armed forces, and the treasury board insisted on what has just been suggested, namely a parity of the services. There is a difference in one respect with regard to pay in the navy, although I am sure I cannot remember the particulars now. I think, however, that when the pay and allowances are added up they will be found to be about on a parity. Possibly this is in the field of my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, but I shall be pleased to get the information. I remember particularly one peculiar expression, namely an allowance for hard lying, which is awarded in the navy and not in the other services.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Does that apply to the air force, too?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, in the air force there are differences of pay, but not in equivalent ranks. It will be found there are a larger proportion of non-commissioned officers in the air force than in the army.

We are dealing now with the matter of dependents' allowances. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked a question which is on the order paper, and with which I shall now deal. No doubt his quesion arises out of a report he saw in the press, with regard to action which has been taken by the dependents' allowance board in respect of the allowances to the wives of soldiers who had enlisted in the West Indies, who had come to Canada, but whose wives remained in the West Indies. In that case the dependents' allowance board apparently made an examination of the cost of living in the West Indies as compared with the cost in Canada. The result was that they fixed the allowance payable to the wife at $20 instead of $35. A man with four children received allowances of $6, $6, $6 and $6 instead of $12, $12, $9 and $6. I may state frankly to the committee that the matter was brought to my attention when I was on the train going to the eastern coast; I had not heard of it before. In common with many hon. members, I believed that so far as a wife was concerned, in practice the allowance of $35 was inviolate, and that that amount was not to be disturbed. I can recall an occasion in the house when I was explaining the difference between the allowance payable to a mother and the allowance payable to a wife. I said then that the allowance payable to a wife was not disturbed or reduced, no matter how much the private income of the wife may have been. It was regarded as a matter of right. That was the way I believed it to be.

The matter was brought to my attention, and I immediately wrote the dependents' allowance board. I also wrote the correspondent who had written me. I have taken up the matter with the chairman of the dependents' allowance board and with the government. My position—and it is one which I know will be supported by the government, and carried out by the dependents' allowance board—is that notwithstanding the fact that the terms of the dependents' allowance regulation provide that the amount to be paid to a wife is such amount as the board may allow, not exceeding $35, at the same time in practice my feeling is that that amount should remain stationary, regardless of the cost of living of a particular individual who happens to be receiving the allowance. That rearrangement is being made. I have never taken that position with regard to the children. It does depend, I think, upon the cost of living, and there is no doubt whatever that the cost of living in the West Indies is very considerably less. I have not come to a decision in connection with that point, nor has the government. As a matter of fact I had not brought that part of it up because I was particularly concerned with the allowance to the wife.

Mr. COLDWELL: You have not decided as to the children?

Mr. RALSTON: That has not been decided. It will be dealt with this week, as a matter of fact.

Mr. BOUCHER: Has the minister decided the position of a wife drawing dependent's allowance and working for a department of the government? Is it possible now for a wife getting a dependent's allowance to work for a department of the government and not have her allowance decreased or diminished by virtue of such other employment?

Mr. RALSTON: Previously a wife who was in the employ of the government could not get dependent's allowance, but I think that has been remedied. I just want to be sure that it has been remedied in full and that there is not some relationship between the salary received and the dependent's allowance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where a member of parliament is serving in the armed forces his wife receives no dependent's allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: This is the reverse.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think this ought to be decided upon some principle. Assuming that the wife of an enlisted man or an officer is in the employ of the government and getting $1,800 a year, any allowance paid to her would be based more on her marital status than any question of necessity. Certainly there could not be any argument that it was necessary. I think these cases should be looked into most carefully. I do not say that she should not have it, but certainly she is not as much entitled to it as a wife who is not in the employ of the government.

Mr. RALSTON: The answer to that is that the wife can obtain employment in a civil institution or private firm and receive her dependent's allowance and salary as well.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I admit that.

Mr. RALSTON: There is also the fact that the public service has been finding it a little difficult to get female employees. Obviously private industry could bid against it and would be in a better position when a wife seeking employment would be entitled to a dependent's allowance and salary as well. The case my hon. friend mentions is the reverse of this. Where a member of parliament, or anyone else, is in the army and is drawing pay from a public authority—I think that is the wording—the assumption is that he is in a position to support his wife.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not complaining about that, but I think it should be understood, in justice to members of parliament—I know there is some criticism of members of parliament being in uniform and drawing the pay of their rank as well as sessional indemnity—and it should be pointed out authoritatively by the minister, that when these officers come to parliament they do not draw the pay of their rank. While they are serving in the army overseas their wives and children get nothing.

Mr. RALSTON: What my hon. friend says is absolutely true. The wife of a member of parliament who enlists in the army does not get a dependent's allowance. This applies not only to members of parliament, but also to members of the provincial legislatures, who get far less than members of parliament. There has been a ruling by the Department of Justice to the effect that provincial governments are public bodies within the meaning of the regulation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not objecting to the rule applying to members of parliament, but I do know that this rule is working hardship on members of the provincial legislatures. The sessional indemnities paid by provincial legislatures are not large, and many of these women have the responsibility of looking after their husbands' constituencies. The minister knows from long experience what that means. I know of women in Saskatchewan whose husbands are overseas and who are deprived of dependents' allowances by virtue of the fact that their husbands are members of the legislature. It seems to me that while the rule ought to be applied in the case of members of parliament, some consideration ought to be given to members of the legislatures. There is considerable hardship in many cases because of the fact that the indemnity is quite small whereas the families to be maintained are quite large. It seems to me that some amount might be set; it might be said that if the amount received from a public authority was above, let us say, $2,000, a dependent's allowance would not be payable. In some provinces the indemnity paid to members of the legislature is only $1,200.

Mr. RALSTON: If you fix an amount and take into consideration the cost of living, then you have exactly, I assume, what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was objecting to. The idea is that a man receiving pay from the government by way of pay of rank, plus pay from a government authority, either the government itself or some other public authority, is in a position to provide a dependent's allowance, which is not so in the case of those who are not in that fortunate position. If you started out by saying that dependents' allowance would be payable if the amount received from a public authority was not more than $1,000, then you would have to provide also for the question whether or not there was other private income. I am saying, rightly or wrongly, that in connection with the allowances for these wives, I have felt that they ought to be treated as being inviolate. The regulations are there. That is the practice which we have instructed the dependents' allowance board to follow, and it will be followed so far as I have anything to do with the dependents' allowance people. I consider that that is inviolate, whether a wife is worth a million dollars or nothing at all. That is $35 a month she can depend upon, win, lose or draw, as some compensation for additional expenses because of the fact that her husband is away.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is based on a question of marital status, and that alone.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If that principle is applied to wives employed by government bodies, will some consideration be given to applying it to the wives of members of the legislatures, for instance?

Mr. RALSTON: She can go to another employer, but she cannot go to another husband.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It seems to me that if you are to apply the principle of the dependent's allowance being inviolate to a wife who is employed by a government body, it should also be applied to the wife of a legislator.

Mr. RALSTON: I meant the amount was inviolate. I had in mind a case—it may be the one my hon. friend is thinking of—of a member of a legislature out west, and I have also in mind the case of a member of the New Brunswick legislature in which it has been pretty hard going. I think the commission was accepted expecting that a dependent's allowance would be paid, and then it was found that it would not. In fact, in one case, I think the one out west, some refund had to be made and no doubt hardship was caused. I do not mind saying to the committee that I shall look into the matter again. I have every sympathy for the hardship cases if you can make a rule which is going to make bad law. The hard cases frequently do that.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does a member of parliament who is overseas and not able to attend the house draw full pay?

Mr. RALSTON: I think there is a bill passed every session—I am not sure about this but I rather assume it is so—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the legislatures.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think they pay in full.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Does the member have to be overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: I have an idea that we pass an estimate at the end of the session to provide for those who are ill or who are absent through some cause beyond their control. I think they are included in that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sure they are.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am very glad to hear the minister's statement regarding the allowance to wives, and I hope that the same consideration will be given to the children. I feel this way about it, that if a man came from the West Indies, let us say, and volunteered for service in the Canadian forces, his family should be treated as our own Canadian families are treated. I am glad the minister takes the position he does, because I was afraid that this might extend to other parts of Canada where it might be claimed that the cost of living is lower than in some other places, and that we might reach right back on to the Indian reserves; we would then have a very complicated system of dependents' allowances.

There is dissatisfaction among the men in some quarters because they feel that the matter of leave is not sufficiently well regulated by the department itself. What I have in mind is this. At the end of six months a man may get, I understand, fourteen days' furlough. There are married men in, for example, the veterans guard. In some battalions or companies the commanding officer will allow men who are married and living home a day or two at a time as compassionate leave when they may go home and visit their families. There is provision for compassionate leave, I believe, in other respects. Some commanding officers give compassionate leave for sickness, or to attend to sickness at home, or whatever it may be, and make no deduction from the fourteen days' furlough which is coming to them at the end of a period of time. In other places that compassionate leave is deducted from the fourteen days' furlough, with the result that men who, perhaps because of sickness in the home, have had compassionate leave, find at the end of six months that they have no further furlough coming to them, while in other cases the commanding officers are much more lenient and do not deduct the compassionate leave. In my opinion some policy should be stated, particularly for the married men in the veterans guard. I suggest that where compassionate allowance is given for family reasons—good and sufficient reasons—commanding officers should be instructed not to deduct that compassionate leave from the fourteen days that a man gets at the end of a given period—say six months; I am not just sure on that point. Lack of uniformity in this matter sets a group in one company against a group in another company; it discredits, perhaps, one commanding officer and makes another popular. I think that kind of thing ought to be eliminated as far as possible. Would the minister give consideration to issuing an instruction that necessary compassionate leave, when given to these men, should not be deducted from their regular furlough?

Mr. RALSTON: I have just spoken to the adjutant general. He tells me that generally speaking compassionate leave or week-end leave is not deducted from the regular furlough. As a matter of fact the adjutant general's branch have now under consideration the whole question of leave. We have had some very great difficulties in connection with leave, simply because, for operational reasons, leave had to be postponed. I remember one battalion—I visited it—which had gone out west and which had nearly 400 men who had been waiting for furlough for some months after the time when they were entitled to it. We are endeavouring to see if we can "regularize" leave, as the adjutant general expresses it, and see to it that there is no discrimination. I assure my hon. friend that the point he has raised will be taken into consideration at the same time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will have to be done under some general principle.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to ask the minister a question regarding a specific case which I have in mind. The wife of a soldier is acting as postmistress and for that employment gets a sum total of $100 a year. Is that $100 a year deducted from her dependents' allowance while her husband is in the army?

Mr. RALSTON: On that point I have just received a statement from the chairman of the dependents' allowance board. Somebody over here asked me about it, and I stated that I thought that remedial measures had been taken so that a woman in the civil service is not deprived of her dependent's allowance. I find that it is dangerous in these matters to rely on one's memory. Here is the statement:

> The dependents' allowance board advise that wives of soldiers who are employed under the civil service commission cannot draw dependents' allowances except they are employed as typists or stenographers grade 1, 1A, or 2. Clerks cannot draw allowances. Also exempt from order in council: certain laboratory workers in national research; employees of arsenals and munitions works; inspection boards of the United Kingdom and Canada.

The order in council is P.C. 6/1248 of February 18, 1941. It is a regulation made by the treasury board, not by the dependents' allowance board, and it is much more limited than I gave the committee to understand. The only persons who draw dependents' allowance if they are in the employ of the government are typists or stenographers grade 1, 1A or 2, laboratory workers in national research, employees of arsenals on munitions work, and in the inspection board. That this is a regulation, not of the dependents' allowance board but of the treasury board, indicates that the motivating reason for it was the necessity of getting female employees.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would not the minister take that matter into consideration? Now that we are so short of help, and where the soldier is doing his part, surely it is only a reasonable expression of the good-will of this house and the department to let women who could be employed in private enterprise work in the government service without reduction of their dependents' allowance. Surely we should not penalize a woman who is a soldier's widow and perhaps the mother of two children in getting what work she can in the service of the state, or handicap her in comparison with those who can get work in an industrial concern. The pecuniary consideration does not come into the question, because she might get more money in a private concern than in the government service. A woman should draw her $35 a month as of right, and if she works in the government or the civil service that allowance should not thereby be diminished.

Mr. RALSTON: I will take it into consideration. I am now only speculating as to what was behind the original regulation. But what was in my mind is that there were people seeking employment who found they were being competed against by those who were already drawing dependents' allowances and were taking positions as well. That was in the days when jobs were scarce. To-day employees are scarce, and evidently that is the reason for the loosening up of the regulation. I shall take it into consideration, but I would imagine the treasury board would consider it more from the point of view of getting man-power than from the point of view of changing the principle. I shall be very glad to bring the matter to the attention of the treasury board, with the representations which have been made.

Mr. NEILL: The minister, speaking a short time ago, alluded to an occasion on which he spoke in the house and to the record of Hansard where he said he had explained, or possibly he had endeavoured to explain, the difference between a mother's and a wife's pension. I would be awfully obliged if he would put on record the page of Hansard on which the remarks he refers to appear, so that I can look it up, and also if he would explain, perhaps once more, to the house—I know a number of members must be interested, because these cases occur repeatedly—the reason for the difference between the allowance granted to the wife, which is $35 a month, and the allowance granted to a dependent mother, which is $20 a month.

Mr. RALSTON: It is now $25.

Mr. NEILL: It is now $25. They have raised it? Yes, but both the $20 and the $5 are given only as a matter of charity, and there is a mass of red tape to go through. A man could get into the senate more easily than succeed in one of these cases. It is not right, and more than that it is a waste of time. I do not see why the woman should have to appear in forma pauperis. I have heard this referred to as a "lousy" $5, and I have received enough letters to fill a cabinet. In one letter I was told by an official that I did not appreciate the situation, that even I should understand that the responsibility of a man towards his children is naturally greater than any responsibility he may have towards his brothers and sisters. This was a case where the man was the only support of his mother and three children and had gone to the war. They would not give the allowance. My answer was that I was not talking about responsibilities. I said that I was aware of the difference in responsibility between the case of a man supporting his children and the case where his responsibility was only towards brothers and sisters. I said I was talking about dependency, and that argument was not answered. I said that the dependency if it existed in one case was equal to that in the other, and indeed in some instances it is greater, for this reason, that a young, active woman can get around and chop her own firewood and do her own washing and things like that, whereas an old woman is unable to do these things and needs medicine and so on. So far as children are concerned, I cannot see that because a child happens to be a brother or a sister that fact makes it any cheaper to keep that child than if the child were the child of the soldier. I have been given different arguments, one of which was that they did it in Britain. I do not know what they do in Britain, but we are concerned with what is done here in Canada. Now, I want some justification which I can give to this widow and the children. I have to say to them, "You are in a different class.

You may only get $20, or at most $25 handed out as charity, but the other person, the wife, can demand $35 by law." The minister said he was thoroughly convinced that wives should have as a basic sum $35 a month. I do want some explanation that I can take home to these people as to why dependent mothers are not treated in the same way. There are not so many, and Canada might afford it. It is not a matter whether he is responsible or not. The question is one of dependency and the government have admitted a certain amount of dependency. If the question is one of dependency, why not give her the same sum as the wife can claim as of right?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): May I add a word to that. Yesterday I was talking on the train to a young man who told me his story. Fifteen years ago he came from Glasgow, and he married his sweetheart also from Glasgow. They did not get along and she went home and he has not seen her for twelve years. She has never come back. Two children were born and his mother, who is a widow, took them after the wife left. This man enlisted. He had been earning $18 a week in a cotton mill—I forget what he was doing—and he was told that she would get $20 a month assigned pay, which was his, $20 dependents' allowance, and so much for each child. He assigned his pay and the mother gets so much for each child. She has never been able to get dependents' allowance although he was, I understand, the sole support of the family. It may be that twelve years ago his mother was able to work—I do not know about that—but the fact is that the dependents' allowance board draws a sharp distinction between the wife and the mother. Their rights are in entirely different categories. The wife has a legal right to support by her husband; the mother's right to support is based on another principle. My hon. friend objects to the words ex necessitate; he translates that into charity. I do not think it is quite that. Certainly the mother has not the legal right that the wife has, and that has been recognized in a degree; there is a discrimination in the amount. I am not objecting to the discrimination; there is a basic difference between the two.

All these cases of mothers' allowances and dependents' allowances cause members of parliament a great deal of trouble. They cause me much trouble, but fortunately I have somebody to help me. I should like the minister to give consideration to the question of the widowed mother who takes the burden in a case such as the one I have mentioned. The children of the enlisted soldier are in a different category from brothers and sisters of an enlisted man. Certainly he is legally as well as morally responsible for the support of his own children. I do not think there is the same obligation for the support of his brothers and sisters.

Mr. NEILL: The government takes it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does the government take it? I can see a clear distinction between the case of children and that of brothers and sisters.

Mr. RALSTON: The passage in Hansard to which reference has been made will be found at page 205-06 of May 24, 1940. I am not sure that the question that has been asked was not answered then. The leader of the opposition has indicated the distinction. All I can say further is that in all pension legislation—and this applies to disability pensions as well, after the man has been discharged—so far as I know there has been a straight line of distinction between the basis of assessment for the mother and that for the wife. The wife being the direct dependent, literally, of the husband is entitled as of right to the amount which is set out in the statute; that is to say, in practice, whether or not the statute may be mandatory or permissive. The rule has always been that the wife was entitled to a pension of a certain amount regardless of her own income or her financial position. What applies to the mother applies also to the father, and I would point out that if my hon. friend's argument applies to the mother it applies to the father as well, and the father would be entitled as being in the category of dependents. He would be a dependent, regardless of how much income he might have, on the ground that his son was in the army. The right of the mother depends altogether on this question: Of what has she been deprived financially by reason of the enlistment of her son in the army? What the country does is to try to make up to her financially the support of which she has been deprived to the extent to which her son has been supporting her. That is a clear distinction, and the principle is altogether different from that on which the allowance is made to the wife. Certain cases arose, which the committee will recall, in which the son would have supported the mother had he been able to do so but he had been prevented by reasons beyond his control, and an amendment was made to the dependents' allowance regulations to provide that the board could ascertain whether or not, in their opinion, the son would have supported the mother had he been able to do so; and if they found that was so, they made provision for her to the amount which would have been contributed had he been in a position to contribute. Now that is exactly the same practice, on all fours with the provisions of the Pension Act providing for dependents of soldiers after their discharge, and I think it has worked very well. It does of course require the assessment of the means of the soldier and of the needs of the mother, which is not required in connection with the wife, but it is a principle which has been in every piece of pension legislation that I know anything about. I think it is manifestly equitable because it endeavours to make up to the mother the financial loss she may have incurred by reason of the son's enlistment.

Mr. NEILL: In that case why was it raised from $20 to $25?

Mr. RALSTON: The maximum was raised. It was on the ground that here was something which had to do with the cost of living, because that was an up-and-down pension; it was not a fixed amount. The hon. member mentioned mothers' allowances; the $35 for wives in my judgment should not have been an up-and-down amount in practice. Then we have provided for supplementing that, in case the cost of living has gone up in a particular case, by the appointment of the board of trustees which deals with cases where the $35 is found not to be sufficient or particularly where there are emergent circumstances requiring assistance to the family from time to time.

Mr. LOCKHART: What are the trustees empowered to do? There seems to be some doubt about that.

Mr. RALSTON: The dependents' board of trustees have about as wide powers as any board could have. The board was appointed by order in council P.C. 18 of January 2, 1942. I will not read it all but sections (d) and (e) of paragraph 4 provide that the dependents' board of trustees——may pay such supplementary grants or give such special assistance not provided for by the marriage allowance or dependents' allowance regulations as it deems necessary to or on behalf of or for the benefit of the dependents of ratings in the navy or dependents of soldiers and airmen below the rank of warrant officer class I in the army and the air force in those cases where the board of trustees is satisfied that such supplementary grants or special assistance are necessary to prevent hardships arising because of unusual circumstances or to relieve misfortune and meet domestic emergencies, including serious illness of a member of the family, or to assist a mother whose dependent's allowance has been reduced by reason of the prior claim of more immediate dependents of the son;

To determine subject to the approval of the Minister of National Defence the terms and conditions upon which special advances may be granted to the local and regional dependents' advisory committees for the purpose of enabling the committees to provide supplementary grants or special assistance in cases of temporary emergency requiring immediate remedy not provided for by the marriage allowance or dependents' allowance regulations to the dependents of ratings in the navy or dependents of the soldiers and airmen below the rank of warrant officer class I in the army and air force, and, subject to the approval of the Minister of National Defence, to make such advances from time to time in accordance with the terms and conditions so determined.

Mr. LOCKHART: Do I gather that they can give supplementary aid in addition to providing such things as teeth and glasses? The interpretation given in some places I believe is that only such articles of necessity are provided but no supplement to the $35 is provided.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, yes. I am very much surprised to hear that. It is giving me information which I am sorry to hear, but I am glad to have.

Mr. LOCKHART: I will give further information on that.

Mr. RALSTON: As I think hon. members know, the board operates through regional advisory committees. The board is composed of a representative group of citizens who have had a great deal of experience in connection with the administration of matters of this kind. The board consists of: Chairman, Dr. Weir of Vancouver; A. H. Brown, formerly acting chairman of the Dependents' Allowance Board; Mrs. Catherine R. Collier, of Bracken, Saskatchewan; Madame Forget of Montreal; Philip Sydney Fisher of Montreal, who has been very active in connection with welfare work for a number of years; John Walter McKee of Ottawa; Lt.-Col. Joseph Gustave Raymond of Ottawa; Frank N. Stapleford of Toronto, who has had long experience there in connection with the Neighbourhood Workers Association, and J. Douglas Winslow of Woodstock, New Brunswick, the representative of the Legion. The dependents' board of trustees is at present established in the following cities: Charlottetown, Halifax, Saint John, Quebec, Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, Toronto, Hamilton, London, Port Arthur, Windsor, London, Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Vancouver and Victoria. I am advised that applications are coming in and being dealt with promptly by the board. They work independently of the dependents' allowance board but are in the same building and have the benefit of the files and organization of the dependents' allowance board. From the reports I get they are filling a real need in connection with emergencies and special cases where assistance is needed for dependents. The idea was that "he gives twice who gives quickly", and there is provision that the regional board themselves can make if necessary special advances of money to assist in urgent cases of need and misfortune.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In the air force if a man is reported missing, say on January 1, the assigned pay to the mother is cut off and she cannot get his effects or anything else for six months. Does that apply in the army and the navy? Why does it apply at all? It seems very unfair. The mother has to make other arrangements in order to live. If the man is reported a prisoner of war the assigned pay goes on, but if he is killed or reported missing the mother does not get anything.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall have to inquire and advise my hon. friend about that. I cannot tell him at the moment.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): I noticed in the press this morning a picture of a soldier in the new uniform. He looked very smart and I wish to congratulate the minister and those responsible in his department upon making it possibe for our soldiers to have respectable walking-out uniforms. It will add greatly to the morale of the troops and to the discipline. It never did seem to me fair that a soldier should have to wear the same clothes to go down town at night that he has worked in all day. A man working in a factory changes his clothes at night, puts on walking-out clothes, and it is only right that such conditions should prevail for our soldiers. I think this is a great step forward. Have these walking-out uniforms been issued to all units in Canada, and are they issued or to be issued to our troops overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: The answer to the first question is no; they are being issued just as fast as they come in, but as yet they are coming in only in comparatively small quantities. I think the number of jackets on hand at this moment is seven thousand. That is the limiting factor. As a matter of fact there has been some delay, which I am not going to dwell upon here, but which I think could have been avoided. It has nothing to do with the Department of Munitions and Supply or with the manufacturers, directly; but a situation which I think requires looking into has caused the delay in reference to manufacture. The matter is receiving the personal attention of Mr. Eaton, the co-director general of the purchasing branch of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

The answer to the second point is that the walking out dress, as at present devised and planned, is not being issued to our troops in England. Hon. members will understand that with the overall and two suits of battle dress, the man already has a considerable weight to carry around. There is no question of parsimony in the fact that it is not being issued; it is because it is not regarded as practical.

Mr. GILLIS: I wanted to say a few words while we were still on the question of dependents' allowances. There are many ramifications to the minister's department, and I think it would be well if we kept to one question at a time and endeavoured to settle it.

There is a matter in connection with dependents' allowances which I brought to the attention of the minister last year and which I want to bring to his attention again. Personally I find that this is causing considerable hardship on dependents; I am referring to the men who go absent without leave. After a man is absent without leave for twenty-one days he is posted as a deserter, and his pay and the dependents' allowances are cut off. As I see it, the man is not punished at all, except by being confined to the guard room. He is fed; he is clothed; he is kept comfortable, and he has no worries. The family, however, is left on the outside, perhaps a wife with four or five children, having to go for three or four months at a time without any allowance or any income whatever. She has the family to provide for, children to send to school and so on, and in many cases she must go to the municipality and seek relief. If every hon. member receives as many letters and protests from dependents in this connection as I do, there are many cases of hardship across Canada. I receive perhaps three or four cases a day.

Mr. RALSTON: Not of this kind.

Mr. GILLIS: Yes; there is no doubt of that.

Mr. RALSTON: Not cases of men in detention?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, cases in which allowances have been discontinued. If the minister will check with the board he will find that to be true. Perhaps we are getting them all down in Cape Breton; perhaps soldiers in other parts of Canada do not go absent without leave.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is perhaps a little enthusiastic.

Mr. GILLIS: Only to-day I had occasion to write to the board in connection with four separate cases, and I am at it continuously. Last year I suggested to the minister that the man himself should be punished instead of the dependents. If the man can just spend his time in the guard room, then step out and have his pay start again, it is an encouragement to him. I suggested last year, and I suggest again, that the dependents' allowance should not be touched. If a man goes absent without leave he should serve his sentence. His pay should be discontinued, and if he is fined a certain amount of money he should not receive any pay until such time as that fine is paid, after he returns to duty. It is a deplorable situation to have a woman come to you and say, "It is three or four months since I received any allowance. My husband is in the guard room. I have written to the board." In those cases the dependents are really taking the punishment. The sergeant-major is responsible for discipline. If the man were at home the wife would see to it that her husband got to work, and if the sergeant-major cannot keep him on duty the wife should not be punished because of that.

Mr. GRAYDON: She should not lose the assigned pay.

Mr. GILLIS: Certainly not, but she does. While I am on my feet there is another matter I should like to mention, because it is not so easy to get the floor. I refer to the unreasonableness of the sentences that are meted out to young boys who go absent without leave. Only to-day I had occasion to write the minister with respect to one case that came to my attention. The mother wrote that she had a young boy in the army in Halifax, which is in military district No. 6. He went absent without leave; she did not say for how long. He was taken back to Halifax and kept waiting in the guard room for sentence for three months after being tried. Then he was sentenced to nine months' detention. In my opinion the crime of being absent without leave in Canada, in the case of a young, inexperienced soldier, does not merit a sentence of a year in the guard room. As I see it, the army is not making a soldier of that boy or any other boy dealt with in that way. It is making a rebel of him, and there may be considerable trouble with him in future. There are other measures that should be taken to handle boys who commit offences of this kind. The psychological approach is the proper one. That is not an isolated case; I have had several of them. As I say, I have written the minister with regard to this case, giving him the details, but I believe he should check up on the matter in the various districts in order that young boys who never had jobs, who never had any discipline, who get into the army away from home for the first time and perhaps get some money for the first time and then go absent without leave for the first time, should not be dealt with as though they were old, hardened, seasoned soldiers who understand K.R. and O. from cover to cover. I bring this to the minister's attention, and leave this thought with him.

Mr. RALSTON: First with regard to the question of cutting off dependents' allowances; this is one of the cases in which one hesitates to express an opinion because of the fact that it appears rather obvious that some remedial measures should be taken. I am not going to express any opinion until I am better acquainted with the facts, but I would ask my hon. friend to give me say three of the cases he mentions, the three worst ones if he wishes. I appreciate that with regard to the court-martial case he has written me already, giving me the name of the soldier involved. I shall be very glad to look into that matter, because there again on its face it would seem that the sentence was entirely too severe. As I remember it, these sentences have to be confirmed by headquarters.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have had a few cases where the dependents' allowance has been cut off and the citizens have had to come forward and raise the money necessary to look after the wife, the innocent bystander, as it were, and the children. She has had to suffer for what her husband has done. I honestly feel that something should be given the wife in order to carry her over, even if it has to be taken out of the husband's pay later on.

Mr. RALSTON: Just to get it on the record, I think it was the hon. member who just spoke who asked with regard to the practice in the army in connection with a man reported missing. In the case of a man reported missing, the pay and allowances are continued until such time as he is reported found or reported dead.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West:) That is in the army?

Mr. RALSTON: Of course it is understood that after a certain time he is presumed dead and appears as such in the orders, from which time the pay and allowances are discontinued.

Mr. BENCE: Does the same thing apply in the air force?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): No, it does not.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to add a word to what was said by the hon. member for Peel with regard to the cost of living bonus for dependents of soldiers. I should like to point out that although the general index increased by fifteen points, the weighted food index compiled by the bureau of statistics increased by twenty-three points. The man himself, of course, is out of the picture; the government are taking care of him, his clothes are being bought, and all that sort of thing. But the cost of living really is up 23 per cent in connection with the food that has to be bought for the family. For the life of me I cannot see why we should give the civil servants of Canada the cost of living bonus while we refuse to give it to the dependents of our soldiers. They have just as much right to it as any other persons employed by or under the direction of the government.

Mr. GRAYDON: Far more right.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes, as my hon. friend says, far more right. In my constituency I have received many communications respecting mothers' allowances, and I must say that in dealing with them I have received the most courteous treatment from the board and from others in charge. There is one point however which I cannot understand: they always say, "It comes down to a consideration of what she has been deprived of." Is this matter to be judged only from the point of view of what the mother is not getting from a boy who has joined the forces? The mother will get older, and I am wondering how she will be dealt with in a year or two. In the ordinary course of events she will suffer from losing that boy, and from having him away from her. Is she not entitled to a dependent's allowance, just as much as a wife would be? It seems to me that these points should be considered.

Then, some matters have arisen in connection with dependents' allowances. In my constituency to-day it is difficult to get living accommodation—rooms, houses or flats. In fact it is almost impossible to get accommodation anywhere. And I am as sure as I am of anything that the ceiling on rents is in many cases not being enforced. This sort of thing is bound to happen: an owner will want more money for his flat. It is all very well to say that he cannot have more, but he may make it so uncomfortable for the tenant by depriving him of hot water and other necessities that he must leave. In these circumstances I suggest there should be some authority in the army who could bring cases of this kind before the rent control board.

Speaking in the house a few days ago the minister referred to the impossibility of obtaining reduced fares on the railways. Well, Mr. Chairman, every day of the week business men are commuting from Oakville and other outside points to Toronto, and they enjoy reduced commutation rates. Similarly, business men travel between Dorval, Lachine and other points and Montreal.

What can the men do who get week-end leave from Camp Borden? There is nothing much for them to do, with the exception of going to Barrie. That is about as far as they can go, because in these days they cannot get motor cars to come to Toronto. Motor car traffic is becoming less frequent. If business men can obtain commutation rates on a basis of a cent a mile return, or something like that, from Oakville, Port Credit and other outside points, to my mind there is no reason in the world why certain trains could not run at week-ends to take the soldiers to Toronto for about fifty cents return, or possibly less than that. I believe that is one solution of the problem.

Before gasoline restrictions came into effect the people in the Muskoka district, around Camp Borden, were most generous; they did not hesitate to fill their cars with soldiers when they had the chance to do so. Under present restrictions however, because of a shortage of gasoline and tires, the men will not be able to travel as much as they did. I suggest the minister should take this matter up with the railways, to see if they will not do something about it.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would the minister answer my question respecting embarkation and furlough leaves? Is the time used in travelling taken out of those leaves, or added on?

Mr. RALSTON: They are given extra leave to compensate for the time taken in travelling.

Mr. GRAYDON: Is that full compensation?

Mr. RALSTON: Not in every case; I shall find out exactly the number.

Mr. PERLEY: I have found the discussion most interesting, and I have no doubt all hon. members have had representations with respect to dependents' allowances. I should like now to ask the minister what would happen in certain circumstances which I shall outline to him. A widowed mother in my home town had three sons. At the time of the outbreak of war the second son was the only wage earner. The youngest boy was going to high school and the oldest had spent one year in university. At the outbreak of war the second son enlisted. It was not until a year ago that we succeeded in persuading the dependents' allowance board in Ottawa that the widow should receive some allowance. Her husband had left very little insurance, and she had taken out so much per month. The board maintained at first that so long as she had some income from that source she should not have consideration. When that money ran out about a year ago the board put her on an allowance of about $20 a month, I believe. About a year ago the youngest son became of age to enlist, and did so. He was transferred to Montreal to act as instructor in the Royal Canadian Air Force. The other son continued his studies at the university, and after graduation joined the forces.

Mr. RALSTON: The air force?

Mr. PERLEY: No, I believe he joined some other branch of the service; he had studied pharmacy. The boy who had been overseas contracted either stomach or tubercular trouble, and about a week ago landed back in Halifax on sick leave. The first information the mother had that the son was coming back to Canada was a wire from Halifax to that effect. A few hours later she received a wire from Montreal stating the boy had been taken off the train and had been sent to a hospital in that city. A couple of days before I left home she received a further wire from the doctors at the hospital suggesting that she come right away, because her son was dying. A few of the business men hustled around and sent her off by aeroplane that night. I have received word to-day that the boy is dying.

What consideration will that mother receive? The youngest son is in the air force, and the eldest boy is in one of the services. If the second son dies what will the mother receive? Will she receive special consideration on account of this boy, who was the only wage earner? The other boys have never earned money which they could turn over to her.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not wish to evade the issue, but the hon. member is really asking me what the pension board will do.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: This would not be a case for the dependents' allowance board. I am not in a position to say what would happen. I do not wish to embarrass the pension board one way or another by attempting to guess what it should do. The hon. member says he was in the air force?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell, either, what the air force would do with regard to payment under those circumstances. I am afraid I shall have to refer the matter to the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. PERLEY: Will it come before the pension board?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Will the fact that the other two boys are enlisted affect her allowance?

Mr. RALSTON: Does the hon. member mean the pension to be paid her?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend, and there is no use in my trying to guess. I assume there is assigned pay.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, I believe so.

The CHAIRMAN: I have not wanted to interfere so far because of the latitude which has been granted to hon. members, but I would draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the last question is clearly beyond the purview of the resolution before the committee. If we carry on as we have been for the last hour or two we are bound to have a tedious repetition of questions that will be raised when the estimates of the Department of Pensions and National Health are being considered. The purport of the resolution is to provide $1,500,000,000 so that the government may carry out the war effort of Canada. While questions dealing with general principles involved in these expenditures are in order, and while we do not want to draw the line too tightly, it seems to me that hon. members should cooperate to help the committee dispose of its work.

Mr. GREEN: I should like to approach this question of what consideration ought to be given to the men in the fighting forces and their dependents from a slightly different direction than has been followed this afternoon. There is now in Canada a boom, and this boom has been on for several months. Much money is being earned, much money is being spent and much money is being saved, all of which is as it should be. I have no fault whatever to find with that state of affairs, but I suggest to the ministry and to the private members of this house that there is an uneasy feeling growing up across the country that the men in the fighting forces and their dependents are being left behind. I suggest that this whole matter should be approached with this question in mind: is it or is it not a fact that the men in the fighting forces and their dependents are being left behind in this boom which has developed in Canada?

Members of the house also should ask themselves this question: is there in this nation at this time equality of sacrifice? Those of the present house who were members of the last parliament will recall that when the question of Canada's declaring war was discussed in this house the thought uppermost in the mind of practically every member who spoke was that whatever happened there must be equality of sacrifice in this war. We had memories of the last war of 1914-1918, memories of the profiteers and the hardships suffered by the men who did the fighting and their dependents, and there was a firm resolve on the part of those who were in the house in the fall of 1939 that there should be equality of sacrifice in this war.

I have reached the conclusion that there can be no equality of sacrifice, because no matter what sacrifice is made by those who stay at home, the greatest sacrifice is being and will be made by the men of the fighting forces and their dependents. I think that Canadians on the home front realize that fact instinctively, and they are quite right in having this uneasy feeling that the soldier, sailor and airman, and their dependents are being left behind. This feeling will grow as we have more and more men going into the forces, as heavier casualties are suffered and as Canada really gets into the business of waging war on an all-out scale. So I suggest that the members of this house, and particularly the private members of this house, should realize that such are the facts and insist that leadership be given by the ministry in remedying this situation and in making sure that the fighting man and his dependents are not left behind.

There are several ways in which such an objective can be reached. I do not pretend to have all the solutions, but I should like to suggest four. First of all, I suggest that the ministry give the most careful consideration to providing post-war credits for the men in the fighting forces, what the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) referred to as a nest-egg. While this idea may be comparatively new in Canada, it is not new in Great Britain. A few months ago, on February 10 of this year, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Right Hon. Winston Churchill, announced in the British House of Commons that a new policy along this line had been adopted by Great Britain. I propose to quote a paragraph from the speech he made on that occasion; hon. members who would care to check it up will find it at page 1399 of the British Hansard. The Prime Minister said these words:

> We have sought also for the best way of meeting the criticism—with which I must say that I personally always felt much concerned and very much disturbed about—that service men are at a disadvantage, by comparison with civilians, in regard to the provision which they are able to make for the financial needs which they will have to face after the war. To my mind, it would be a very anomalous and invidious situation if those who had worn uniform had no nest-egg and everybody else had one as a result of savings from higher pay or through the income tax credits. We have decided to institute a system of post-war credits under which a sum of 6d. per day, or approximately £9 a year, will be set aside for all other ranks and ratings; the sixpences will be accumulated on behalf of the men, and will form a nest-egg available for use after the war and after discharge from the forces. It is the intention of the government that the introduction of this credit shall not prejudice the question, when the time comes to consider it, of granting a war gratuity to the forces on appropriate lines. The cost to the public of this bonus will be £32,500,000 a year.

I realize that every hon. member is sympathetic to suggestions of this type and so I shall presume to read also from a white paper which was published by the British government at the time of this speech from which I have just quoted. This white paper sets out the story quite well and I suggest that it sets an example which Canada might very well follow. I read from that portion entitled "Post-war credits", as follows:

> His Majesty's government have also given careful consideration to the question whether, in addition to these immediate improvements with respect to compulsory allotments and to allowances made in respect of children and dependents, any measures should be taken to enable men and women in the ranks of the services to accumulate sums for use after the war in the same way as is now possible for civilians.

I break into my reading of this white paper for a moment to say that this question comes up in connection with men who have obtained war work and are getting good salaries. No one has any complaint to make about that, but the comparison is always made between them and the men who are serving in the forces. The white paper goes on:

> His Majesty's government regards this as a most desirable object.

If it is desirable in Great Britain, it is certainly desirable here. I continue:

> The period of reconstruction after the war will produce problems of readjustment for many of our people; and personnel of the armed forces will clearly be affected in this way. His Majesty's government feel therefore that in addition to the improvements announced above and to the revised war service grants scheme introduced in October, 1941, some financial aid should now be provided for other rank members of the forces against the needs which will arise in the period of post-war readjustment.

They therefore propose to introduce a system of post-war credits for the forces which will be of a simple and straightforward character. Under this system there will be set aside for all ratings and other ranks a sum of 6d. in respect of every day of paid service from the 1st January, 1942. In the case of the women's forces the sum will be 4d. per day, following the two-thirds principle adopted for basic pay and war pay. The sums so set aside will be accumulated and will be made available to the individuals concerned after the war and after discharge from the forces.

The method of payment of the credits will follow that which is to be adopted in the case of the special credits associated with the increases in the income tax made in the last budget—i.e. they will be made available to the individual in the form of a deposit in the post office savings bank (or in such other institutions as may be approved for the income tax scheme).

Why would it not be possible in Canada to provide these credits in the form of war bonds or war saving certificates which could be held for the fighting men?

The white paper concludes:

Arrangements will be made for the credits to be specially released to persons invalided out of the forces or to the estate in the event of death.

The minister has explained this afternoon that Canada goes part of the way along that road, in that she holds back some pay from those of our men who do not assign any of their pay, but I suggest that we go much further and make an extra payment to all our men in the form of a post-war credit, much in the manner that the British government has done.

The second suggestion is that steps should be taken to extend the wartime housing work so that it will help the dependents of these men in the forces. That scheme was initiated last year, but the Minister of Munitions and Supply explained on March 7 that it was meant only to help men in war industry. As reported in Hansard, page 1454, he said:

I should like to emphasize that this is not a general housing project but is confined solely to housing that is found necessary for the successful prosecution of the munitions programme.

He repeated the same statement last fall, when he said, as reported at page 4229:

These houses are entirely for the purpose of housing munitions workers.

Well, this position has arisen, that soldiers' dependents are being forced into the poorer houses. There is a demand for houses to rent, and as higher wages are being paid to civilian workers the soldier's wife goes down the scale and is forced to rent poorer and poorer accommodation. I suggest that the work of Wartime Housing Limited be extended so that some provision can be made for the dependents of men in the fighting forces. These dependents should have suitable living quarters at a low rental, and now is the time to get busy on providing them with that type of accommodation.

The third suggestion is that Canada should pay an allowance for all the children of the man in the fighting forces. In Great Britain they do that. The scale of pay there is seven shillings and sixpence per week for the first child, five shillings and sixpence for the second child, four shillings for the third child and for any subsequent child. In Canada at the outbreak of war the government adopted a policy of paying an allowance for only two children, the idea being to restrict the enlistment of men with more than two children. I have never been able to see the wisdom in that policy, because the man with more than two children was allowed to enlist, but when he had enlisted no allowance was paid for more than two children. That in effect made his dependents pay the shot for his enlistment. I believe the policy was based on the wrong line of thought. The Minister of Finance repeated the same policy last fall when he announced that Canada would pay an additional allowance for the third and fourth child. He used these words in stating, at page 4424 of Hansard, that the government would not pay for more than four children:

—because we believe that definite steps should be taken to discourage the recruiting of men with large families.

The fair way to handle the problem, if it is a problem, would be to say, "We will not take any men who have more than four children." Then there could be no hardship suffered by the wife and the children. But if the government does not wish to do that, I suggest that it follow the British practice and pay an allowance for all the children, no matter how many there may be.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not get my hon. friend's point. He was making an alternative suggestion; what was it?

Mr. GREEN: My suggestion is that the minister should pay an allowance for all the children, no matter how many there may be.

Mr. RALSTON: I got that. But I thought he said, "in the alternative".

Mr. GREEN: I suggested that if the government was not prepared to do that, men with more than four children should not be taken into the forces.

The fourth and final suggestion has to do with a cost of living bonus for the dependents. That has been covered fully already by other speakers this afternoon, so I shall not take any time on it other than to say this. Canadian wage earners are getting this bonus as a matter of right. It is not a question of dragging a wage earner before some board and finding out whether his family are hard up or whether there is some other reason why he should get the bonus. He gets that bonus as a right; and in my opinion the members of the fighting forces should be placed in the same position—their dependents should get the cost of living bonus as of right. At the present time an increase is given only in the hardship cases, which means that there is a means test, and that, I submit, is not the proper procedure to follow.

Those are the four suggestions. Many others might be made, and I would urge private members not to be bashful in bringing forward proposals for the improvement of the lot of the fighting men and their dependents. Some will say that changes like these cost money. That is quite true. But I thought that great Canadian, Stephen Leacock, put the situation very clearly in one of his articles which advocated equal pay for the fighting men, when he stated, towards the end of the article:

> But even if it looks too great a financial burden we must pick it up anyway. We who can do so little while they go to do so much, have no choice. Surely we can face a deficit for those who face death.

I appeal to hon. members to bear in mind those three words, "equality of sacrifice", at all times when questions of this type are being considered, and I should like to suggest to them that at all times our main concern in this house should be to help and take care of these fighting men and their dependents.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The members of this group would like to associate themselves with the other hon. members who have pressed upon the minister consideration of the cost of living bonus to dependents. We raised this question last year. I do not want to labour it again now, but certainly it is worthy of consideration. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) said that the general cost of living had gone up 15 per cent since the beginning of the war. One of the western newspapers made a survey last August in the stores in the city of Winnipeg of the thirty-eight commodities which people buy most commonly in these stores—that is, the things which the common people buy. It was found that on these commodities the cost of living had gone up at that time 22 per cent since August 1939. There is no doubt that the woman who is supporting a small family and whose husband is overseas has actually less purchasing power to-day in her allowance than the purchasing power which she received when her husband first joined the army. I hope the government will give consideration to this matter.

I want to ask the minister two questions; they are not related, but I thought I would double them up together because a number of hon. members will want to ask the minister questions. The first is with relation to the men overseas. I have had letters from a number of men overseas, and with hardly a single exception they have all mentioned the same thing with regard to the question of living allowance when they get leave overseas. A part of their pay is deferred. I was under the impression that all had some part of their pay deferred irrespective of how much earned pay they had, but the minister says that is not correct. These men had a certain amount of pay deferred and received only a small part of their pay. It took nearly all of that pay to buy necessities such as cigarettes, shaving materials and so on, and when they were granted leave they were not given any living allowance. I understand that in the British forces some living allowance is granted. These men I am speaking of are not given any, and a number of them actually found that it was better to stay in camp, but then they discovered that they could not stay in camp because the quartermaster's stores did not assign supplies for them on the ground that they were not on the roster for those particular days. For that reason they could not remain in camp. The complaint was that a good many of them who got leave would have liked to go to London or Glasgow but could not do so unless they could borrow money from their comrades or make other arrangements. Will the minister give consideration to that? I am citing the facts as they have been given to me in correspondence. The minister can check them up.

The other matter I want to mention has no relation to pay and allowances. I wish to raise the question of what coordination is taking place in the Canadian army that is being set up in England. One of the greatest military problems which the united nations have faced is that of unification or coordination of command. In reading Lord Gort's report, one of the things with which the reader was impressed was not only the lack of air power during those fateful days when France fell, but the fact that the commander in chief did not have the control and disposition of that air power because the Royal Air Force was under a different command. The escape of the Gneisenau and the Scharnhorst a few weeks ago raised the same question in Great Britain. There they had three general staffs, and there was a feeling that there was not sufficient coordination and there might be need for complete unification of command. There is no doubt that if the Canadian troops go into a theatre of war, their success and indeed the lives of the men will depend to a large extent upon the amount of air support they get and whether or not the commander in chief has at his disposal that air support.

In the Canadian army under General McNaughton, will the Royal Canadian Air Force operating there be under his command or under the command of the Royal Air Force? Will he have, as army commander, control and disposition of the Canadian air forces, or will he depend upon the general staff of the Royal Air Force for such air support as they care to place at his disposal from time to time? That is important. No one doubts—and we say it with pride—that if operations are opened in Europe, the Canadian troops will be in all probability in the vanguard, and we owe it to these men and to their chances of success to see to it that they have the best type of air support and that there is complete synchronization in all branches of the service. That is possible only if the commander in chief has some voice and has under his command complete control of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Would the minister now tell the committee about the new organization that is being set up in Britain in connection with the Canadian army under General McNaughton; what will be the position of the commander in chief with respect to the Royal Canadian Air Force, whether they will be under his command or whether they will continue under the Royal Air Force? Will General McNaughton depend upon them for such support as they choose to give from time to time?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot go very far into the question my hon. friend has asked except to say that the Royal Canadian Air Force will not be under the command of General McNaughton—that is to say, the Royal Canadian Air Force as a whole. Most of the Canadians who go over under the joint air training plan become members of the Royal Air Force. There are 28 squadrons of the Royal Canadian Air Force which are operating with the Royal Air Force.

So far as the Canadian army is concerned, plans for the present time and for the immediate future have been discussed. The whole matter was discussed with General McNaughton when he was here, and definite representations have been made. As regards the Royal Canadian Air Force, there is no difficulty. With regard to certain units being attached to the Canadian army for specific operation with the Canadian army, I cannot give the number, but it is a substantial number, which was to be increased as the organization developed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Forming part of the Canadian army but under the direction of the Royal Air Force.

Mr. RALSTON: This was to be under the strategic control of the army commander.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The army cooperation squadron.

Mr. RALSTON: And bombers too, of certain types. That is the situation. The arrangement has not been completed at the moment, but the Royal Air Force is still in that picture, because the Royal Canadian Air Force is operating with the Royal Air Force at the present time. I anticipate an arrangement will be made which will be satisfactory to the army commander. It is definitely in the mind of the Royal Canadian Air Force, and we have it in mind and want to arrange to see that proper air support and cooperation are provided through squadrons with the Canadian army.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is anything being done to train officers in ground regiments in air operations? Is there coordination of that type in connection with the various forces? The Russian and German armies provide that their officers shall receive some training in the three forces, the ground forces, the air and the navy, so that there may be coordination in their activities.

Mr. RALSTON: I am instructed by the vice-chief of the general staff, recently returned from England, that in our army we are not teaching our own officers, but sending our officers to schools conducted by or under the direction of the Royal Air Force for the purpose of liaison with the Royal Air Force. They are learning all types of cooperation which are useful, and flying with them as well, so that the training may be coordinated, and in order that they may become acquainted with one another and understand the methods of operation of the air force.

With regard to living allowances on leave I must confess that that is a new subject to me. I have heard almost all sorts of suggestions with regard to leave but not that suggestion before. I have inquired whether it is done for the United Kingdom forces and am unable to get the information at the moment. I shall inquire into the matter. My hon. friend will, however, realize that rates of pay for United Kingdom forces are far different from our own. Nothing illustrates that better than the figures given by the hon. member for Vancouver South. For instance, a dependents' allowance of 7/6 per week for the first child would come to about $5 a month in Canadian funds, whereas our amount is $12. I mention that only to indicate that what is done for the United Kingdom forces in a matter of that kind would not be a precedent for us having regard to the very much larger amount of our pay and allowances. I shall, however, look into the situation with a view to giving it consideration along with these other matters.

Cost of living bonus has been dealt with. All I can say is that the measure announced by the Minister of Finance, the appointment of the dependents' trustee board, was intended to provide for cases where the dependents' allowance did not cover the situation and, as the minister frankly told the house and the country, the idea was not to make a uniform increase but to deal with cases on their merits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Individual cases.

Mr. RALSTON: Individual cases, because it was felt that the $35 paid the wife—and I cite this in support of my contention that the $35 should be $35—was being paid already, and therefore any addition to that caused by increased cost of living could be taken care of by the dependents' board of trustees. It would revolutionize the whole system of pay for soldiers and dependents if this were adopted. It would mean the scrapping of the dependents' board of trustees altogether and the dependents' allowances regulations. If that is the proper thing to do, nothing is impossible. I have made a note of the point in connection with the other matters to which reference has been made.

The hon. member for Vancouver South mentioned allowances for all children instead of only four. That was very carefully thought of and studied at the time the amendments were made. The allowances are $12 for the first child, $12 for the second, $9 for the third and $6 for the fourth, and without being facetious I think a man in England would have to have quite a family before he would approach in the aggregate the amount here, namely $39.

Mr. GREEN: I think the minister will admit that is not a very fair comparison because the cost of living is quite different there.

Mr. RALSTON: I was in Great Britain lately and I must say the cost of living that I experienced there is not much different.

Mr. GREEN: But these people cannot live at the best hotels.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend's suggestion in a word is, allowances for all children. I agree with my hon. friend in this, that personally I am not in accord with the idea that a man should be discouraged from enlisting because he has a large family.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They still take them in even if a man has a dozen children.

Mr. RALSTON: That is right. A man in my own constituency has ten boys. Seven are in the army; two are on the waiting list now for the navy and air force, and the last is being called up. That is not a bad contribution.

With regard to housing, that is a problem which has concerned me more than anything else. If we could settle that, it would be a tremendous relief all across this country among dependents of service men. The ground taken by my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply in regard to the Wartime Housing Act was that these men going to work in industry were moving in and becoming part of the establishment and these houses were being built as part of the plant. On the other hand, a soldier's wife presumably has a residence some place; she does not necessarily have to move, and therefore the provision she had should be sufficient. The complaints that come to me are not quite the same as those coming to the hon. member for Vancouver South, to the effect conditions are getting poorer and poorer because of the lack of dependents' allowances or ability to pay. I think the dependents' allowances permit them to pay rent if the houses are available, but what comes to me is that landlords are not enthusiastic about taking soldiers' wives; some are defintely reluctant.

Mr. ISNOR: It is the scarcity of houses.

Mr. RALSTON: The idea is they had a house when the husband enlisted.

An hon. MEMBER: It is sold over their heads.

Mr. RALSTON: The landlord has rented it to some one else. We have not been taking on the question of housing because I have not felt that it was our responsibility. It is a financial matter and a national matter which has to do with housing conditions in Canada generally, not with soldiers' wives alone.

What I have done—and my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply has been very cooperative about it—is to endeavour to get for the benefit of municipalities the use of ten or twenty or more houses in order that they may use them temporarily as at least a stopping place for soldiers' families who are moving. I must take this position—it is the position taken by my colleague the Minister of Finance—that this question of housing the citizens of Canada—not people moving transiently—is the problem of the municipalities rather than that of the federal government. I have appealed on a number of occasions to bodies in different towns who were anxious to do war work, and have received most heartening response; I said, "you can help by taking under your wing soldiers' families who are having difficulty, acting as big brother and getting them places to live"; and that has been done with the assistance of these houses temporarily loaned by Wartime Housing Limited. The problem is perplexing; we have not overlooked it. I know the situation in regard to the navy is very much the same; I have not heard so much about the air force. Whether anything can be done from the point of view of the service departments I am not able to say at the moment, but we have it under active study and attention.

Post-war credits are really the same principle as the deferred pay suggested by the hon. member for Peel, which I promised to look into. I notice the amount in the United Kingdom is sixpence a day, which is not very much translated into Canadian dollars, something like $25 or $30 a year. War savings certificates would probably be more appropriate than war bonds.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there any arrangement whereby the dependent of a man who has enlisted in the forces of a friendly allied nation could receive dependents' allowance? I have had drawn to my attention the dependent of a man who enlisted in the Netherlands army, and his wife would like to know whether she is eligible to receive dependents' allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: No; she would not be eligible, but from what I know of our friends from Holland I am sure she would be looked after. She would not be eligible to receive the dependents' allowance from Canada.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: It is their responsibility?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is there not some way in which the government could do something about these cases? Last year, of course, the friendly allied governments were not allowed to exercise compulsion on their nationals in this country. I understand that more recently an order in council has been passed giving them power to call up their nationals resident in Canada. If those nationals are called up, then would it not be proper, in giving these governments that power, also to stipulate that something should be done for their dependents? Otherwise those dependents are going to be the recipients of relief in this country. Some arrangements should be entered into by the governments concerned so that the dependents of men subject to call by the allied governments in exile would be protected to the extent of some living allowance. Would the minister look into that matter?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall be very glad to do so, though really it is a matter for the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. QUELCH: We in this corner would like to associate ourselves with the remarks of those who have been urging an increase in pay and allowances, and also with those who have been requesting free transportation for furloughs and embarkation leaves. I am not going to labour those matters at this time, because we have taken a consistent stand in connection with them.

There is something else I should like to mention, a matter which I do not think has been referred to this afternoon. Earlier in the day the minister stated that he believed the dependents' allowance should be kept inviolate.

Mr. RALSTON: No; I thought the $35 payable to the wife should not be reduced on account of the cost of living.

Mr. QUELCH: I am wondering how the minister would justify the passing of order in council P.C. 138, 1936, which gives the soldier settlement board the right to attach a certain portion of the wife's allowance, not exceeding $20 a month. I would point out that the wife of the soldier is in the position that she has to hire a man to do the work her husband was doing; and for that reason, if for no other, she will need the allowance to pay this man's wages. The argument is advanced by the soldier settlement board that the amount seized would not be greater than the rent the wife would have to pay for the house in other circumstances. I would point out that the soldier settlement board have no more right to take that stand than a mortgage company holding a mortgage on a farm would have. The soldier enlists; the wife is left on the farm. The mortgage company would be equally justified in asking permission to attach the dependents' allowance for the purpose of charging that woman rent; or a storekeeper would have just as much right to say that he should be allowed to attach the dependents' allowance for the store bill. I cannot see why the soldier settlement board should be given this special privilege. They argue, of course, that it helps pay off the debt of the soldier settler, but exactly the same argument could be advanced by any private creditor, by a mortgage company or by a storekeeper. I was wondering what justification the minister could suggest for the passing of that order in council.

It is hardly necessary for me to point out to the minister that this action destroys the principle of section 118 of the allowance regulations, which states that the dependents' allowance cannot be attached. It also destroys the principle of section 98, which states that the allowance is for the purpose of promoting the well-being and efficiency of the military forces of Canada by providing that means to alleviate the financial anxiety of members with respect to the domestic welfare of dependents, while they are in the service of his majesty. I would point out that if there is one class of society in this country that is in financial difficulties, it is the soldier settlers. Certainly it is not going to relieve the anxiety in the mind of a soldier to know that a certain portion of the allowance is being seized instead of going to his wife. Would the minister say a few words in that connection?

Mr. RALSTON: I was not in the house at the time, but I believe my hon. friend brought up that point the other night when my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources was in his place, and I believe the minister made a somewhat extended reference by way of explanation of the provision.

Mr. QUELCH: He just took an individual case and justified it. He said in that case the dependent had seven children and was receiving a large allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: I have sent for a copy of Hansard containing that discussion. I intended to discuss the matter with my colleague the Minister of Mines and Resources. My hon. friend has been very fair about it; I think he has given the reasons which the soldier settlement board give for taking this action. The principal reason that struck me was the fact that they were not charging any more than the rent that would have to be paid if the farm were leased, and under those circumstances it did seem that there was no hardship and nothing improper in asking that this amount be paid. I have not had a chance to discuss the matter with my colleague, but I intend to deal with it more thoroughly and will talk to him about it. I am not in a position, in view of the explanation which my hon. friend makes, to say that any change will be made, but certainly I shall look into the matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose the technical question of a crown debt has some influence on the treasury.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. Just on that point the section which my hon. friend quoted, which indicated that the allowance was not garnishable or attachable, does not apply in a case of this kind.

Mr. MAYHEW: I should like to bring to the attention of the minister the question of the hospitalization of dependents of soldiers. Quite a number of soldiers are getting into financial difficulties through having to pay hospital bills for their dependents. Not only are they creating hardship for themselves; they are creating hardship for many of the hospitals in the smaller communities. This matter has been brought to my attention in regard to the Nanaimo camp. The hospital at Nanaimo is now some $6,000 in arrears on account of soldiers' dependents being hospitalized there, and I am wondering whether there is not some way of taking care of this load for the men in uniform.

Mr. RALSTON: That is in connection with the dependents?

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a new thought.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. I do not think I am prepared to say anything more, but I will have the matter examined. I think it must be a special case, of a large camp near a small town with limited hospital facilities, but I am just a little concerned about hospital bills—which I am sure must be reasonable—not being paid. Or is there a particular epidemic among the dependents of soldiers out there, which means that a large number of them are becoming ill?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the hon. member will allow me, in my province the matter is taken care of by law. If the dependent of a soldier is in need of hospitalization and that person goes to hospital and is unable to pay, the municipality pays as a matter of law and a matter of course. That is the way I think it ought to be. It is not a charity; it is a community duty which is performed by the municipality under a well considered and well regulated practice.

Mr. MAYHEW: In British Columbia the municipalities pay so much and the provincial government pays so much, but there is something left which the patient is supposed to pay. That accounts for the amount left unpaid in this case. We talk about equal sacrifices. I think at least we have arrived at the point where we know we cannot make equal sacrifices, but I think we can do a great deal more to share the burdens of the soldiers. We are not doing it as far as hospitalization is concerned. Whether it should come from this government or from the municipalities or from any other source, it should not be a matter of passing the buck and leaving the soldiers stranded with a load of debt on account of their wives or children.

Mr. RALSTON: I wonder whether that would not be taken care of by the trustees of the dependents' allowance board?

Mr. MAYHEW: If they can go far enough.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend has a case in mind I shall bring it to the attention of the chairman of the board of trustees.

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes; I have a list of sixty or seventy cases from the Nanaimo hospital alone.

Mr. GOLDING: The observations of the leader of the opposition are quite correct. I happen to be chairman of a hospital in Ontario, and I know that the governments of the province, the county and the municipality pay the full cost of indigent patients. No cost is charged to the patient if he is indigent.

Mr. COLDWELL: But are soldiers indigents?

Mr. MAYHEW: Does the hon. member call a soldier an indigent person?

Mr. GOLDING: I was just talking about the cost they could not take care of themselves.

Mr. COLDWELL: As the hon. member for Victoria, British Columbia, has pointed out, the distinction is that the wives and dependents of soldiers cannot be considered as indigent charity cases. They deserve something better than the poor law. That is practically what is done in New Brunswick, Ontario and, I may say, my own province of Saskatchewan. But the thing is wrong. Surely these peolpe are entitled to better treatment than the ordinary charity case in a municipal or other hospital.

Mr. REID: The law in British Columbia is that the municipalities are called upon to pay seventy-five cents or a dollar a day, and the government pays a like amount. But that does not deter the hospital from sending a hospital bill to the patient.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This is not a question of the application of the principle of the poor law. It is a question of policy on the part of the civil authorities in a province or municipality. They must decide how people who cannot pay, whether they be dependents of soldiers or others, are to be cared for. If they can pay they are asked to pay, and if they cannot pay they are not asked to pay. No one who is not able to pay gets a bill. I am not prepared to say whether it is the responsibility of the government, but I know in my own province it is taken care of by the community. It is a community service and community obligation, and is in no sense a reflection on any of the recipients. If the suggestion is made in a derogatory sense, it is entirely out of place. It is community service rendered by reason of enlightened public opinion crystallized into law.

Mr. MAYHEW: Many of the men in these camps come from provinces which have not laws similar to those in British Columbia or New Brunswick. Therefore there is no compensation for part of their keep. It must all come from the portion paid by the provincial government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a residence qualification.

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes, there is a residence qualification.

Mr. BENCE: I presume the Minister of National Defence has under his jurisdiction dependents' allowances for all the services—the air force, the navy and the army.

Mr. RALSTON: The navy has a special set of regulations mentioned in the orders.

Mr. BENCE: Does the dependents' allowance board deal with them?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. BENCE: The dependents' allowance board comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, but I try to keep my hands off the dependents' allowance board entirely. The only time I ever interfered with it in the slightest was with respect to a discussion of policy raised by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. That matter was discussed in a letter to which I referred. I do not know that I can help the hon. member much with respect to the navy or the air force.

Mr. BENCE: With whom, then, should we take up these matters?

Mr. RALSTON: They should be taken up with the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, if they are naval matters.

Mr. BENCE: He is in a position to say that this comes under the dependents' allowance board, and the dependents' allowance board comes under—

Mr. RALSTON: I made the recommendations with regard to the appointment of the dependents' allowance board, originally. But dependents' allowances for the navy are under naval regulations. Naval pay and allowance regulations are quite separate from army pay and allowance and air force pay and allowance regulations. Each service has a liaison with the dependents' allowance board; each service has a member on the board, so that my hon. friend would probably get better service and better information, if he has in mind a matter concerned with the naval service, if he would take it up with the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, who would have communication with the naval member on the board. The same would be true with respect to the Minister of National Defence for Air. However, I should be pleased to make a note of any case to which my hon. friend might refer.

Mr. BENCE: I was going to ask someone to make a statement with regard to the great disparity between dependents' allowances for members of the navy, and those of the army and the air force.

Mr. RALSTON: I will get all the information I can. But as I said a little while ago, the whole matter of pay and allowances was discussed by a joint committee. There is an interservice committee on pay and allowances which is considering these matters constantly. I believe the feeling was that they had pretty well arrived at a parity with regard to allowances, in view of existing conditions. However, if there is any point my hon. friend wishes to bring up, or any particular ranks he would like to compare, I will see that they are compared, and that reasons are given why one rate of pay is paid in one case and another rate in another.

As indicated by the leader of the opposition, the general principle was that taking it in the aggregate—that is to say, pay plus allowances —you arrived generally at a parity. There are some cases, more particularly in the navy, where they prefer their system to the systems used by the army and the air force.

Mr. BENCE: I have some figures with respect to differences between the army and the navy. It appears, so far as commissioned ranks are concerned, that exactly the same amount is paid to the wife of a naval sub-lieutenant as is paid to the wife of a naval commander, namely, $30. The army position equivalent to the naval sub-lieutenant is that of the army lieutenant, and his wife is paid $45. The wife of the army lieutenant-colonel, who is the equivalent of a naval commander, receives $60.

Mr. RALSTON: What about the pay?

Mr. BENCE: The pay of a naval lieutenant is $4 a day, whereas that of an army lieutenant is $5 a day. Consequently the total amount received by a naval sub-lieutenant, including pay and allowances, is $150 a month, as compared with an army lieutenant at $195 a month.

There is not such a great distinction in the higher ranks. However, the army lieutenant-colonel obtains a total of $360 a month pay and allowances, whereas the naval commander obtains $330 a month.

Mr. RALSTON: Both married and with children?

Mr. BENCE: I am speaking of married men without children.

The minister made some statement with respect to men who are missing. He said it was the policy in the army that pay and allowances would be continued until some evidence had been found that a soldier was dead, or could be presumed dead. The presumption of death is arrived at after a period of six months.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the hon. member asking me that?

Mr. BENCE: I am making that statement; that is the way I understand it.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not think I mentioned six months.

Mr. BENCE: No; I am saying that. I understand there is a presumption of death after six months following the notice indicating that a soldier is missing. Who determines that policy? Is it the Department of National Defence in connection with a soldier, the Department of National Defence for Naval Services in connection with a seaman and the Department of National Defence for Air in connection with the air force?

Mr. RALSTON: The offices corresponding to the adjutant-general's branch in the army determine it for the navy and air force respectively.

Mr. BENCE: Is there any way in which there could be worked out a coordinated policy in that connection between the various services?

Mr. RALSTON: If there is a time when the fur gets up on the back of my neck it is when someone mentions coordination. We are working out coordination constantly; we have interservice committees. For instance, we have a pay and allowances committee. Some things are different in the three services. Each service likes to do things its own way, but I do not think it makes any great difference which way it is done when it comes to the rate of pay. If the army are satisfied with their rates and practice as they are and always have been, and if the navy has a different practice in that connection and is satisfied with it, it does not seem to me that there is any particular public advantage in pounding their heads together and saying, "you must accept this other system." There are some traditions in connection with these services. I think the answer to my hon. friend's question is that there is coordination by means of the defence council and the interservice committee on pay and allowances. There is an interservice committee which has to do with personnel conditions. We try as best we can to have coordination, which is not necessarily absolute uniformity. I think we should distinguish between the two.

Mr. BENCE: As a matter of fact what I had down was "uniform policy"; I did not intend to use the word "coordination." I am pleased to have the minister make the statement he did, that pay and allowances are to be continued in the army in the manner in which they are. I am particularly concerned with the air force, because it is in connection with that force that we have so many men missing. If a man is listed as missing in the middle of the month, his pay is paid for the balance of that month, but after that it drops down to the $60 a month his wife would get in case of his death. I do not see why a distinction should be made between the services in respect of a thing like that. At the same time, his child is continued at the lower rate, namely $12 a month, and is not raised to the $15 a month which would be paid if he were officially declared dead. It seems to me that the same policy should be adopted with respect to the air force as is followed in the other services. A wife who receives information that her husband is missing should not have the additional blow of having her income reduced automatically.

Mr. RALSTON: If I could I would be very glad to give my hon. friend an explanation, but it would be the merest guess and would not be informative. I would prefer that he take the matter up with my colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air. It may be that they are following the practice of the Royal Air Force with which they are closely associated.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The matter of the decision in regard to the payment of hospitalization of dependents was not cleared up to my satisfaction, although I may have failed to grasp what was said. As it was left in my mind, the only disposition made was that suggested by the leader of the opposition, that the municipality should pay. What information has the minister regarding that matter?

Mr. RALSTON: The way I dealt with it was to indicate that the dependents' board of trustees, which was established in November or December, has as one of its functions and one of its authorities, to pay such supplementary grants or to give such special assistance in those cases where it is satisfied that such supplementary grants or special assistance are necessary to prevent hardships arising because of unusual circumstances or to relieve misfortune and meet domestic emergencies, including serious illness of a member of the family. If the hospitalization which was referred to could not be handled by the soldier himself, I think it would come within that provision. I am not at this moment saying that the country should simply undertake the hospitalization of all the soldier's family. We must have regard for certain general principles. I am saying, however, that if the soldier is unable to take care of it, there is a provision which it seems to me could be made applicable and which seems, in terms at least, to be amply sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I would say that the idea behind the minister's proposal is more sound than the idea behind the suggestion of the leader of the opposition. I would say that this burden should be borne by all Canadians, not by the people of a particular community in which there happens to be concentrated a large number of soldiers. I would feel a little better if the wording of the powers given to that board was a little more specific, that is, that there was more of a duty placed upon them to see to it that all necessitous cases were taken care of. As I understood the minister's reading of it, they just have permission to do it.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend understands that all these things are covered by enabling phraseology; that is, the authorization is given to spend money and to make grants.

Mr. COLDWELL: I notice the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald) is here, and I hope that when he comes before the house with his estimates we shall be able to have a full explanation of the discrepancy which now exists between the pay and allowances of naval ratings and members of the other services. We have had quite a discussion here this afternoon. I have met a large number of naval men in the last six or eight months and have found that many of them have a real feeling that they are being discriminated against. I have had no explanation which convinces me that it is right and proper that dependents of naval men and the naval men themselves should receive allowances and pay which are less than those given to members of the other armed forces.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): As the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) has indicated, there is some discrepancy. In some cases naval personnel receive more; in other cases they receive less. The chief stumbling block at the moment is the amount allowed to a man who lives out of quarters. The navy man who has to board and feed himself gets $1.45 a day, whereas one of my colleague's men gets only $1 a day. There you have a difference of from $14 to $15 a month to the advantage of the naval rating. It is true that for the last six months the wife and children of a naval rating have been getting somewhat less than the wife and children of a private soldier, but on the other hand the naval rating receives this greater amount for lodging and compensation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On balance is there equality?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): That is a big question. Some officers receive a little better pay than the corresponding officers in the army, while other officers are not quite so well off. It is difficult to work this thing out to the last cent and decimal point. The whole matter of naval pay and allowances has been before the treasury board. I appeared before the board last week; I intend to appear before it on Thursday morning, and I hope that this whole matter may be adjusted then. However, the minute I ask that the dependents' allowance be raised, it will be pointed out that the sailor receives this $14 or $15 a month more than the soldier.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is only at certain times.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): When he lives out of barracks.

Mr. COLDWELL: A man living in a port such as Halifax will find it an exceedingly expensive place in which to live.

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): My hon. friend is quite right; living in Halifax is expensive.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In the artillery training camps have we any modern guns for practice purposes? For instance, it is represented to me that at Petawawa there is not a modern gun, and that they are using for training purposes old 18-pounders of the last war.

Mr. RALSTON: I know there are 25-pounders at Petawawa. I have seen them, and I am informed by the vice-chief of the general staff that they are there. I cannot give my hon. friend the number, but I saw them in the gun shed there.

Mr. MARSHALL: I do not know whether the Minister of National Defence has made any comment with respect to a question which I should like to ask him at this time. I understand that prior to the Easter recess he was giving sympathetic consideration to the proposal that the government should advance loans to medical students who are attending the various Canadian universities, to enable them to continue their studies, provided, of course, that they undertake to join the Canadian army medical corps. During the recess I discussed the matter with some of these students, and they were in a quandary as to what the department intended to do. I wish the minister would make a statement on this matter, because some of the universities are closing, and others will close in a very short time.

Mr. RALSTON: I made a statement on this subject in the house about four weeks ago or perhaps a little more. The provisions with regard to the assistance were, first, that men who undertook to give their services in the national effort would be assisted, where the need existed, by the Department of Labour, who would give them scholarships. For the last two years those who enlisted would be given leave with pay and permitted to continue their studies. We had meetings with representatives of the universities. They have concurred in the plan, and the orders have actually gone out to the universities. As a matter of fact, I have myself signed a letter to either the deans of the medical faculties or to the presidents of the universities themselves, outlining the plan. In addition, the regulations were completed recently; I am told that they would have reached the universities about three days ago. Those regulations give full details as to what these young men should do. I think the matter is now wholly in order, and that the universities understand the procedure thoroughly.

Mr. MARSHALL: Have any of the universities refused to accept the proposals?

Mr. RALSTON: No—none of the medical schools. There are medical schools in only a certain number of the universities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to ask the minister a question with respect to the rehabilitation of men. I will put this case. A young man of very good education, bilingual, of French origin, teaching in an academic course in the maritime provinces, enlisted in the air force, was taken to the manning depot, and from there transferred to the air school, where he taught certain subjects connected with aeronautics. While there, it was discovered that he had a hernia; and he was to be transferred to the army for a course, on the theory that he would get hospitalization and have an operation—which I believe is very simple—and would then go into the infantry. I am now informed that no provision is made for hospitalization of this sort, and he is not able to afford the operation himself. I think I have read that some provision is made for the physical rehabilitation of men under such conditions. This man is of a very fine type, and I believe that if he could be rehabilitated physically he would be a valuable officer because of his bilingual qualifications; I understand that such men are all too scarce. What is the position with reference to a case like that?

Mr. RALSTON: The case my hon. friend cites is exactly the sort which the regulations and the policy announced a short time ago were intended to cover. There could only be one possible "out" in connection with it, and that would be if the officer or man referred to was too old; that is to say, that the doctors would not consider that a hernia operation would be sufficient to mend him to pass army requirements. My hon. friend is right in assuming that there is provision for such a case as that. The provision is that he is handed over to the Department of Pensions and National Health. I do not mean that we are shelving the responsibility, but that is the department which actually does the operation.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I shall be glad to send the minister particulars of the case if he has not already received them.

Mr. RALSTON: I would appreciate it.

Mr. GILLIS: A few nights ago the minister intimated that it was the intention of his department to set up on the west coast a school for the purpose of training inspectors in the development of commando troops. Is there any particular reason why that school should be set up on the west coast? If it is the intention to train troops for that purpose, and to establish a school, would it not be more economical, more in the general interests of the country, and serve a greater purpose if it were located more centrally? I presume some would be taken from the east coast for that purpose. Taking them from one end of the country to the other seems a rather silly operation, and I think the school might be established somewhere in the centre of Canada because it would then serve the whole dominion to greater advantage.

Mr. RALSTON: Consideration along that line has been going on for some time. The primary reason for considering the west coast—it was not necessarily the west coast, although I said the west—was the fact that conditions there prevail all the year round and are better for training than they are in the east. Moreover, at the present time we have a great many military establishments in the east.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Before the dinner recess we were dealing with the matter of the health of dependents. Discussing this question a short time ago, a number of us came to the conclusion that it might be a good idea for the department to lay out some sort of plan whereby a form of state medicine or state health insurance might be provided for all dependents of soldiers. That might be extended to take in a number of old age pensioners, of whom we have so many in various parts of our province. A constructive suggestion that occurred to us was this. This is one branch of the minister's work that might be handed over to the Minister of Pensions and National Health. It would act as a proving ground for the question of state medicine on a small scale and we might learn some interesting and instructive facts from the experiment.

Then, would the minister give an outline of the steps that are taken to ensure that members of the armed forces shall receive supplies and equipment which are up to standard. What steps are taken by the Department of National Defence to inspect technical equipment? Are munitions, tanks, small arms, anti-aircraft guns and so on tested in Canada before shipments are made to our forces in other parts of the world?

A third matter which I would discuss for just a moment is that of seeing that men are placed in occupations in which they can do the most effective work in the forces. We saw a number of enlistment advertisements in which men were asked to join the armed forces. They were calling for tradesmen, and on one visit to the camp last year I ran across a man who had entered as a butcher and was then in the hospital, while a blacksmith was serving as a cook and a medical orderly was working as provost. In the early days of organization, of course, there must be some confusion; but would the minister give us a statement as to what is being done to ensure that men are being used in the armed forces in those occupations in which they were previously trained?

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the first question respecting health insurance for dependents, I have learned enough in my short career not to step into the field of other departments if that can be avoided. It is part of my responsibility in an indirect way, in connection with the welfare of the soldiers, to assist with regard to their dependents. But health insurance is a matter for two other departments, namely, the Department of Pensions and National Health, as my hon. friend has suggested, and the Department of Finance, under which the superintendent of insurance operates. I will bring the matter to the attention of these two departments. I will not say any more at this stage with regard to it.

So far as the matter of inspection is concerned, I could speak at length in reference to what I know of the organization; but let me say briefly that after-inspection is carried out by the joint inspection board of the United Kingdom and Canada under the direction of Major-General Locke, who came here early in the war, and is himself not only a most competent and capable organizer, but has a thorough technical knowledge of arms and equipment and the munitions which are being turned out. The board has employees running into thousands, both in Canada and in the United States, and every type of equipment and munitions is inspected by the board before it is accepted by the Department of National Defence or, for that matter, by the British government. I can assure the committee that nothing is left undone in the way of inspection and testing. I know of a number of proving grounds which they have, and tests are carried out. As a matter of fact, for our own satisfaction, these tests are supplemented or are preceded by tests with pilot models made by the master-general of the ordnance, who is the provision officer of the Department of National Defence. The board has expanded rapidly and is most capable and efficient, the organization consisting of personnel who know their job thoroughly.

With regard to the question of personnel, since the committee was last discussing the resolution I have had an opportunity of a long discussion with the director of personnel selection at headquarters, Brigadier Chisholm, who has charge of the personnel selection branch, and I incidentally had an opportunity of visiting one of the training centres where his men are carrying on. At the present time in each training centre in Canada there is a personnel selection officer. He is one who has been trained in that sort of work, to give sample tests and also, by means of personal interviews with each man who is training in the training centre, to endeavour to establish the aptitude and capabilities of the men. Recommendations are made to the officer commanding the training centre with regard to the qualifications of a particular man. If they find a butcher, I think his presence will be advised to the quartermaster-general who has to do with the stores. If they find a blacksmith, his presence also will be advised to the quartermaster-general, and probably it will be notified as well to the commandant of the trade school at Hamilton where training in blacksmithing among fifty other trades is carried on. My hon. friend is quite right that many mistakes were made particularly when we were organizing the forces last year and the tremendous drive was on. We were building training centres and getting men there, getting staffs organized, and men were taken and trained in the particular subjects taught at that training centre. I have no doubt therefore that in many instances men were trained in one line even though their aptitude could have been put to better advantage somewhere else. I do not say that this has changed completely, but the system which has been in force is, if I may use the word, scientific; and I think it is a competent approach to this matter, which is extremely important and is becoming more so every day in connection with the armed services. The selection of mechanics particularly is vital to the armoured forces we have and to the mechanical trades which are needed in the infantry to-day. I have reason to believe that the personnel selection branch which has been organized for only a few months is doing most efficient work.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: About how many men, skilled mechanics, have been taken out of the armed forces to go into munitions work?

Mr. RALSTON: I assure my hon. friend that if I can avoid it, none are taken out of the armed forces to go into munitions work, because there is room in the armed forces for every mechanic. As I said, there are nearly fifty trades, thirty-five at least in the armoured division; mechanical men who are physically fit enlisting in the armed services can all be used to good advantage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They told us at Aldershot that they did not have enough skilled men.

Mr. RALSTON: Aldershot, Nova Scotia?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, England.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the mechanical training school in Exhibition park at London, Ontario, under the minister's department?

Mr. RALSTON: It is under my department. It is with the ordnance depot. I confess I have not been there. Our establishment is in new buildings there. Can my hon. friend tell me who is in charge? Is there an officer in charge?

Mr. MacNICOL: I cannot say. There is one large building where there is an officer in charge; that is in the northeast corner of the city. But in the exhibition buildings there is a large mechanical school operated by the government. In my judgment that school is doing very fine work.

Mr. RALSTON: That was our first mechanization depot. We had a very large establishment there, put there primarily for the purpose of assembling and storing vehicles and having them ready to ship overseas as well as in Canada. Along with that the practical work provided gave opportunity to establish a school which has been operated for some time under the general staff and the master-general of ordnance. But whether the school to which my hon. friend refers is an army school I cannot tell. I have in mind that there is a commercial school as well.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are two large depots, one of which does just what the minister says, assembles trucks and mechanical equipment from all round the country and repairs it and sends it forward. The day I was in the Exhibition park school there were perhaps one thousand young men learning all about cars, tanks and everything, and I was greatly struck with it. It is the only school I know of in the country where classes are taught by study of the actual machines and parts all cut open so that the classes can see just how they are put together. They told me they would be there for perhaps three or four months. I talked to many of the young men; they were all enthusiastic about how they were able to get along and learn. Apparently from there they are sent to different parts of the country. Why are there not more such schools, say one in the maritimes, and one in the western provinces? I believe the school is operated by a firm in the United States.

Mr. RALSTON: Anderson's.

Mr. MacNICOL: I could see from my knowledge of mechanical equipment that they were doing a splendid job, and I would suggest that we should have such schools not only in London but one perhaps in Toronto, one in the maritimes and one in the west.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has tied it down so that I know the school to which he refers is the school operated under the direction of the Department of National Defence. We got the Anderson company to come from the United States. They are also doing some instructing at Barriefield. It is called a mechanics' training school. That is an army school. In addition, we have a driving and maintenance school at Woodstock and the ordnance school at Barriefield, also a signal school at Barriefield and the Hamilton trade school at Hamilton.

Mr. MacNICOL: But is any other school set up like the one in Exhibition park, London?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend knows the Hamilton trade school?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I have visited the Hamilton trade school and I had an idea that the Anderson school at London was along the same lines.

Mr. MacNICOL: I thought the London school was much more advanced.

Mr. RALSTON: About a year ago we found the necessity for mechanics increasing all the time and felt that the quickest way to get them was to get people who had made a success of such schools in commercial work. The Anderson company had schools in California and elsewhere and they came and set up these schools. We have found it highly desirable to concentrate as much as possible, equipment being difficult to get. The air force found the same situation when they started their first initial training school. Therefore we have concentrated as much as possible in order to save both equipment and instructors. I think the plan is turning out very well. Of course my hon. friend understands that what we call phase 1 of the training is basic training. Then phase 2 is done all over the dominion in what were formerly the provincial technical schools, who do the elementary work in connection with mechanics. These are helped by the provinces. We have had fine cooperation from the provinces in that respect. Schools all over the dominion have been turned into trade schools for the benefit of the army. Then they go from there to either Hamilton or London or Barriefield or Woodstock or some of these schools to take phases 3 and 4. My hon. friend says they stay for four months. Men in some trades stay longer; in the trade of fitter, which is needed badly, the course takes longer than four months. Generally speaking, I think an excellent job is being done in training tradesmen. Many of these men, unlike the one to whom my friend referred a moment ago, are men who had not had training at all; they are simply taken off the street and found to have an aptitude and put immediately into phase 2 and then phases 3 and 4.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Are these men given special rates of pay after graduation?

Mr. RALSTON: We have a tradesmen's establishment in connection with the various units. It may be a tank battalion or armoured battalion or any of these mechanized units, and the men in these establishments are given special trades pay.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A few minutes ago in answer to the hon. member for Yorkton the minister said the equipment was examined and tested by the Department of National Defence—

Mr. RALSTON: The joint inspection board, representing the war office in England and the Department of National Defence in Canada.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Could the minister give some information about the results at the proving grounds in Canada? I am reluctant to ask any question tending to elicit information which the minister does not want to give, but at one time I heard some disconcerting reports, for instance about tanks made in Canada. The situation may have been improved since, or things may not be as I heard. Could the minister give any idea of the percentage of these tanks that had to be sent back from the proving grounds? Or if he is not prepared to give that, could he say whether or not the percentage rejected has decreased to any extent? I should like some information with reference to other equipment as well, but particularly tanks.

Mr. RALSTON: I can say to the committee sincerely that I have not heard of any large or substantial number of tanks being rejected. Of course the very object of the proving ground is to find defects, and some of the tanks are tested to destruction intentionally; that is they are driven until they wear out or break. Both our tanks, since there are two models, have been sent to Aberdeen, Maryland, where there is an extensive proving ground, and we are now turning out tanks of both types in commercial quantities. I do not think many are being rejected now that they are in production. Of course my hon. friend understands that beginning with the transmission and on to the suspension, the engine, the turret and the track, all these are inspected separately before the tank is assembled, as well as the wireless equipment and the guns. Therefore, what you inspect in the complete tank is a combination or an assembly of things which already have been tried and tested. Perhaps my hon. friend could tell me privately anything he has heard about tanks being rejected in any quantity, because I think his information is incorrect, or he may have been hearing about the time when we were trying out models and ascertaining the best material or best type to use. I think we are now past the teething stage in connection with tanks, and the output has been gratifying having regard to all the difficulties we have had to meet.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am very glad indeed to hear that.

Some time ago the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar placed a question on the order paper and I believe it was passed as an order for return, which as yet has not come down. Could the minister give us any information with regard to insurance agents canvassing the soldiers for the purpose of selling life insurance policies and also what I believe are called savings bonds?

Mr. RALSTON: I think I saw the answer to that question, and I thought it had been brought down some time ago. I believe there were two questions asked, the first being whether or not insurance agents were allowed to go to the camps. I believe the answer was that this depended on the district officer commanding, in connection with the regulations of the camp. Of course these agents would not be allowed in during parade hours or anything like that, but after hours it would depend on the district officer commanding and the particular regulations of the camp. To answer specifically, there were no general regulations prohibiting insurance agents going into camps. The second question was whether the government had examined the policies which were being sold, and that question I think was quite properly answered by saying it had been referred to the superintendent of insurance, because that is not a matter into which our department would examine.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It would seem that there might be some conference between the officials of the Department of National Defence and the superintendent of insurance, with a view to examining into that situation. The government should satisfy itself that the policies being sold to these men are pretty good financial propositions, and that these savings bonds and things of that sort are not merely rackets. It should know something about the amounts being paid. As a matter of fact, I was hoping for something along the line suggested by the hon. member for Peel this afternoon. If we are going to have any type of savings scheme at all—and I believe there should be some scheme—I had hoped that the government itself might institute it. If there is going to be any type of insurance policy for these men to pay on while they are on active service, the government itself should initiate it. Failing that, it seemed to me that the department would have some responsibility for a very close supervision of anything being sold to the men. After all most of these men have not had a great deal of experience in taking out insurance policies, or buying savings bonds, or anything of that sort, and I believe it is the responsibility of the government to see that any people allowed into the camps to sell commercial propositions like these adhere pretty strictly to some sort of regulation and submit to the government the proposition they are trying to sell. Otherwise I am afraid a great many of these boys, some of whom are handling money for the first time, may be victimized by salesmen.

Mr. RALSTON: Has my hon. friend any particular policy or any particular instance in mind?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): No, no particular policy, but I have had letters from a large number of men and also from soldiers' wives, saying their husbands had taken out policies. The mere fact that they were so indefinite as to the benefits and provisions of the policies led me to believe these men had taken out policies without knowing very much about such things as maturity, cash surrender values and so forth. It seems to me they have been simply persuaded to take out policies, for which they were paying so much money, with very little knowledge of the benefits they might receive.

Mr. RALSTON: The most important thing, of course, would be what would happen under such a policy in case the policyholder should become a war casualty. I would agree with my hon. friend that one should look out for matters of that kind in connection with these policies. Knowing the superintendent of insurance, I cannot imagine anybody selling a policy in the nature of a gold brick for very long in this country without being caught. I shall be glad, however, to have the officials confer with the insurance department, and also with one or two camp commandants, to see if policies are being sold and what is the nature of them.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to add a further word in connection with the school in the Western exhibition grounds at London, Ontario. Since the school is filled with a great many machines which are fixed in place, is it the intention of the department to take over the exhibition grounds in London for the duration, as they have taken over the Canadian National Exhibition buildings in Toronto?

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I cannot make any statement in that regard at the moment. We have the buildings at present, but to be quite frank with my hon. friend I have not in mind at the moment the terms under which we now hold those buildings. I imagine they are leased for the duration, though I am not certain. I shall, however, ascertain the position, and if I can make any statement to my hon. friend with regard to future policy I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. MacNICOL: Personally I was sorry to read that the exhibition grounds in Toronto are not going to be used for exhibition purposes this fall. Perhaps they have been taken over at the request of the city; I do not know. Perhaps they have been taken over because the government needs the space which can be provided by the buildings, and I am sure, if that is the case, both the city and the exhibition authorities would be content to let the government have the buildings. But since reading that article I have been thinking: what about the great number of men and women who have been working in those exhibition grounds every year for perhaps the last twenty or thirty years? I have had a number of letters from people who have been in the habit of working there, wondering whether the government, in its agreement with the exhibition authorities to take over the buildings, is going to compensate those people who, after having worked there for perhaps fifteen or twenty years, now will lose their employment. Many of them have looked forward year after year to the extra money they make during the exhibition. That money is used for the payment of room rent, for the purchase of coal, and so forth. Has the department formulated any policy whatever to take care of people who are going to be unemployed as a result of the government taking over the grounds of the Canadian National Exhibition? The same remarks would, of course, apply if the government should take over the buildings of the Western exhibition at London.

Mr. RALSTON: There is in the arrangement no provision to take care of those who may be unemployed by reason of the government taking over the exhibition grounds. I do not think there are going to be very many unemployed in the city of Toronto, though, of course, it may be that these are people who cannot work at other jobs. I am afraid, however, that in the exigencies of the war we shall have to ask them to make that contribution.

The taking over of the exhibition grounds was very carefully and seriously canvassed by defence council, by the chiefs of staff and by the deputy ministers of the departments concerned. I can say that it was not done at the request of the city or at the request of the province or at the request of the commission, though from all these sources we received the utmost cooperation that could be expected. A decision had to be arrived at after examining the alternative possibilities of moving out, as we have been doing in other years, or of building permanently a very large establishment somewhere else for all three services. As I said the other night, the navy have an establishment there, which is very well suited to their purposes, on the shore of the lake. They occupy that and expect to expand. The air force have a large establishment there as well, and moving would have meant interference with their activities. The army had not the same training situation as the other two services, but the army needed a depot, and needed it very badly. Having examined the cost of using the exhibition grounds for the duration of the war and paying a yearly amount therefor, implementing the arrangement which had been made between the city and the province, we felt that it was advantageous for the three services to stay there and that it was also in the national interest. An amicable arrangement was arrived at in very short order, having regard to the size of the proposal and the details which had to be worked out between the city, the exhibition authorities and the province, and an order in council has been passed fully implementing the terms of the arrangement.

Mr. MacNICOL: That was for Toronto. Has anything been settled for London?

Mr. RALSTON: Not so far.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): On the 26th of March I asked a question which was passed as an order for a return in connection with the daily rates of pay and allowances for the army, navy and air force, also with regard to separation allowance and so forth. Another question was asked by the hon. member for Broadview on the same day. It would be interesting to have that information. How soon may we expect it?

Mr. RALSTON: It ought to be down now.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I understand that the minister did table one return to-day. It would not take very long to complete the whole returns asked for.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not want to say that others are in default and that we have all our returns in, but I am satisfied that the return from the army has gone in to the Secretary of State.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the policy of the department with respect to the erection at permanent camps like Petawawa, we will say, of large and expensive permanent buildings? I shall be frank with the minister. Information has reached me that an officers' mess has recently been built at Petawawa at a cost of $150,000. Having regard to the facilities at the training camps, that would appear to me to be a rather elaborate structure. I do not know whether there is any truth in what I have heard, but it came to me from a retired army officer, and he thinks it is a scandalous waste of public money.

May I ask where Vimy barracks are? Are they at Barriefield or at Kingston?

Mr. RALSTON: Barriefield.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is another permanent camp. Have not some very elaborate buildings been erected there for officers' services—I will put it that way, not to use some other term? These are things which the public is questioning—expenses on these elaborate, I shall not say social structures, but structures that are there for the use of the officers, and erected at a substantial cost. I am told that the one at Petawawa cost $150,000. I do not know anything about it myself, but I am told that an elaborate mess has been built at Vimy barracks. The public of this country are quite willing to contribute money for the war, but I tell the minister frankly that they are not willing to see it put into an elaborate, shall I say, social establishment—you can take any interpretation you like out of that. I am asking for information; I am making no charges. I should like to know the history of these expenditures.

Mr. RALSTON: I thank my hon. friend for bringing the matter to my attention. I cannot at the moment give him an answer about Petawawa, but I shall have the information before the committee rises to-night. We are making extensions at Petawawa all the time, but I would be surprised if just an officers' mess cost any such sum as that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would, too.

Mr. RALSTON: I am satisfied there will be some permanent buildings there because Petawawa will be a camp after the war.

With regard to Vimy barracks, if my hon. friend is referring to the officers' mess, it is the finest officers' mess I ever saw, but it was built pre-war. It was built as a relief project in the years between 1930 and 1935, if I am not mistaken. It is a very fine structure. Vimy barracks is also a permanent camp.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then there is one at Calgary.

Mr. RALSTON: That is Currie barracks.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Those are barracks?

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend goes to the officers' mess—it is the officers' mess, of course, and I do not want to interfere—he will find furniture and chairs which he will not find in many other places. That also was furnished some time pre-war, and I am advised that the furniture was purchased by the officers themselves.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would assume that that was so. I am not criticizing; I want to know the facts.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: The minister a few moments ago in referring to skilled trades or specialized skills in the ranks used the phrase, "if they find a butcher or a blacksmith". Is any definite policy or procedure followed to find men who have specialized skills who are now in the ranks in units in which those specialized skills are not being used? A few days ago I met a radio expert and a hydro engineer who told me they had been trying for months to obtain a transfer to a unit in which their specialized skills could be used. Is there any reluctance on the part of officers in charge of units to prevent the transfer of men with specialized skills to other units?

Mr. RALSTON: I have mentioned the personnel selection branch. We put them to work at the very inauguration of the soldier's life at the basic training centres. To answer the hon. member's question specifically, the personnel selection men are on the move constantly on what we call a perpetual combing out of the units themselves, looking for men who have some special qualifications not needed in the particular unit. I would be obliged if my hon. friend would give me privately, if he does not mind, the names of these men and their units, and I will do the rest. I found only last Saturday at a basic training centre a meteorologist in the ranks, but I also found that the personnel selection officer had already catalogued him and was sending his name in. I also found in the ranks two men who had had special jobs in the Department of National Defence at headquarters here. They had also been catalogued and their names sent in to the corps of military staff clerks.

The procedure at the basic training centre is for the personnel selection officer to interview each man. The selection officer calls for the roll of the men in the unit, and he goes through the ranks and ascertains the qualifications of the men.

My hon. friend asked, "are the officers of the units reluctant to let men with special skills go?" Having had to do with a unit myself, I know an officer is always reluctant to let such men go. He always thinks a radio expert, for example, might possibly go into a signal section before very long. At the same time, however, we have found cooperation. We have not found them intentionally hiding men with special skills, but they put up an argument to retain them for their own service, hoping they can be used in their own unit, and that is not unnatural.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I should like to have some particulars about the building which it is proposed to erect in Plouffe park here in Ottawa. A return shows that this permanent ordnance building is to cost around $800,000 and that the floor space is to be about 135,000 square feet. How did the department come to the conclusion that a permanent ordnance building worth $800,000 should be put up at the present time?

Mr. RALSTON: The central ordnance depot is at Ottawa and it is necessary to have a permanent building.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): It seems to me that $800,000 is quite an amount of money to pay for a permanent building. Why could not a temporary building be put up?

Mr. RALSTON: At the present time we are putting up buildings in Montreal which will cost between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000. These are necessary for the servicing of Canadian production which goes overseas. These buildings will not be permanent in the sense of being built of stone or anything of that kind, but they must take weights and stresses and permit the use of cranes to carry quite heavy loads necessary in the assembling of tanks, guns and all the other trappings of war.

Mr. FAIR: Has any attempt been made by the department to supply men in the service in Canada and overseas with tobacco at cost? I understand that quite a large profit is made in this business.

Mr. RALSTON: As my hon. friend is no doubt aware, that would be handled by the canteens and the auxiliary services.

Mr. FAIR: It has been suggested to me in different sections of the country that this be done. I think our soldiers are entitled to everything possible and they should not have to pay exorbitant profits.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall make a note of the matter.

Mr. REID: There are two small matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister. The first has to do with the travelling allowance for men on active service. I am not going to raise at this time the question of free transportation for soldiers; what I have in mind is the reduction in fare allowed to a man going on furlough. This reduction is granted only to his home, and it may well be that his wife and family have moved to another town, or that he wants, while on furlough, to visit his mother or other relatives. Many men have told me that they feel they should be allowed the cheaper rate while on furlough, even though they are not going home or to the place where they enlisted.

The other matter has to do with certain men who are giving a service but who may be termed the forgotten men. When the war started it was the apparent intention of the military authorities to have it a drab war; that is, there were to be no bands and no flying of flags. The war has been drab enough, but I do not think the situation has been improved by the lack of martial music. Of late, a certain attempt has been made to supply military bands, but in certain towns the colonels of the regiments have formed bands, not entirely at their own expense but on their own volition. These bands are used when the men are on parade. In many instances the boys supply their own instruments and pay their own upkeep, and yet the bands are used on parade. It is unfortunate that we have not had more bands to lead out our men. Here in Ottawa you will see a small platoon walking through the streets without music or even a drum. We are all human, and I believe a certain amount of martial music should be provided for platoons or regiments.

As I say, these men are giving their time as bandsmen; they are not receiving one penny more than the ordinary soldier, and I contend that they should be classified properly and given a little encouragement. They are serving a useful purpose. I was invited to meet some of these boys and found that they are supplying their own instruments and putting in their practice, and yet the military authorities will not designate them either as tradesmen or bandsmen. It is high time that some encouragement was given to these boys who are rendering such a splendid service.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is right when he says that at the beginning of the war there were few bands authorized, but I think I am correct in saying that we have authorized a band for every active unit that has requested one. Not only have we authorized that the instruments be supplied, but we have authorized the personnel, to a limited number, of course.

I shall deal now with the question of trades pay. This matter has been up before. I am not quite as much impressed as my hon. friend is with the matter of trades pay for bandsmen. I know these men are rendering a splendid service. I happen to have had two bands in my own battalion, but they were men who were on the strength in the regular way and were giving their time. My hon. friend will be glad to know there was a pipe band as well as a brass band.

As I say, the matter of trades pay for bandsmen has been up, and up repeatedly. It is not settled yet as far as that goes. But I must say that I do not see the argument for trades pay for bandsmen as clearly as my hon. friend does. It seems to me that if men are taken on the establishment as bandsmen and love music as my hon. friend does, they will not insist upon trades pay in order to enjoy the privilege of playing. We have authorized a band for each advanced training centre; that is the establishment and the instruments. This is done on the authorization of the minister, and I may say that I have approved every application which has been made. We authorize the instruments for the basic training centres, but we do not authorize the men. They must be men from the establishment, but we make a small allowance of $200 a year. I want to assure my hon. friend that the matter of bands is not being overlooked. I think the real objection he has to our present system is the fact that so far bandsmen have not been recognized as tradesmen, but this matter has been under consideration for some time.

Mr. REID: The minister should not forget that in many instances they are supplying their own instruments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about bagpipes?

Mr. RALSTON: The same thing.

Mr. CHURCH: There are one or two matters about which I should like to ask the minister. The first has to do with the dependents' allowance, as amended last November. There is a great difference of opinion as to how this is working out. May 1 is housing day, and a great many soldier families in military district No. 2 have been ordered out of their homes. They receive very little protection from the federal law. This is not the fault of the minister; I am free to admit that all parties in the house are to blame for our lack of defences because of their support of pacifism for years before the war and the league. It was not to be expected that you could rearm or do this in a year or two years or three years when you threw away your defences like you did. A high cost of living bonus is needed very badly by the soldiers' wives and families. They have been urged to get in their coal for next winter, and there is a great scarcity of houses in the city from which I come.

I urge the government to reconsider the proposal to give a high cost of living bonus to the soldier and grant it to them. I fail to see why all civilians who stay at home should be the only people to get the bonus, while those who are defending us for $1.30 a day in England are denied it. All should receive it equitably. Both classes need it.

The minister has made a great many improvements; I am free to admit that he did well over a year ago in appointing Colonel MacNamara, who has done splendid work while there in remedying inequalities and getting the pay cheques direct to the dependents.

On September 9, 1939, the house was given a schedule of pay for the army, the navy and the air force. The house was not consulted; it was a hard and fast schedule attached to the Canadian Patriotic Fund Act, and passed in about half an hour. The minister has been kind enough to promise to provide us with a list of the pay of officers and all ranks from a colonel down. The inequalities are apparent to anybody who looks it over. The inequalities are unjust and unfair. We shall soon be in the position of Kentucky and Missouri, where everybody wants to be a colonel or a judge; down there every lawyer is called judge, because if he is not judge to-day he hopes to be a judge to-morrow. So with our army. I repeat that the inequalities in the schedule of the three forces are very apparent. I trust that the house will give more attention to this particular matter, and seek a new and fairer schedule.

The vote yesterday shows that Canadians are greatly alarmed at the state of this country's defences. Germany has now entered her third spring offensive. What are we in Canada doing to meet the enemy, whether he comes to the front door, the side door or the back door—and dear knows he is at all the doors now. I contend that we should heed the handwriting on the wall. It may be necessary to change our whole method of training and strategy in the twinkling of an eye, in view of our allies' disasters. I know the minister has seen the report of Lieutenant-General Gordon Bennett made to the British government as to what was wrong with the Pacific campaign on land, on sea, and in the air. I wish that every hon. member could be given a copy of that report and would carefully study it. Remember that the training, the strategy and the equipment which we are now following may be obsolete and as worthless as a scrap of paper in twenty-four hours. The whole war and its conduct is a ceaseless change every year. A great deal of our present discussion for that reason may not be relevant later. There is need for effective coordination between the services.

As I interpret the vote of the people yesterday, it is a demand for not less but more real war effort, so that our sacrifices, which have been many, may not have been in vain; so that we shall make better use of the splendid men in our armed forces, see that they are properly armed, and give them a real show in battle. I admit that a great deal has been done; in many departments the war effort has been effective. But I press upon the attention of hon. members the report which was made to the British and Australian governments on the disasters in Malaya and generally in the Pacific so that we may not fall into similar traps. The report was transmitted to Australia, and as a result a serious effort at coordination has been made there. After yesterday we can get rid of our cobwebs, prejudices and inertia, come down from the clouds, and have a total war effort with clarity, energy, wisdom and strength of thought and action. We need more clarity and energy and more fearlessness of thought. The vote yesterday exhibits the anxiety of the average voter as to the outcome of this titanic world struggle; the demand is for a greater and better effort in view of the money we are spending—four million dollars a day.

What are our objectives for 1942 and planning and strategy in the light of the changes which have been brought about in the scope and strategy of the war by Germany and Japan and their directors of training? Our plans should be formulated and acted upon now before it is too late. This is the third spring of the German offensive. The first spring she captured the whole of western Europe. The second spring offensive began in the conquest of the Balkans and continued until the conquest of Greece. The third offensive may come to Canada. Nobody can tell. It is speculative at present. It is generally supposed to be directed towards the Caucasus, but that may not be the only offensive. Hitler is the grand master of timing. So I say we should revise our schedule and syllabus, and revise our programme in view of this and other expected emergencies. The enemy is about to try a new effort and plan on the Atlantic. Hitler will probably invade Portugal; he may take Spain; and if he cuts our life lines of communications on the Atlantic with the United States, I do not know where the allies are going to be. We face now tremendous odds at sea and on the land. We may be assailed by Hitler from the direction of an attempt to take Iceland. Our fine friends of the United States have done a great deal well, but, as was shown in the Pacific, they are not ready for war and her rearming is far behind schedule to Russia and Britain. Japan destroyed the best part of their navy and they are confronted with serious strategic problems. It is not the will but the power that is wanting. In addition to that, they are not ready as a military power, and we cannot expect them to be ready, because they were an unmilitary power, untrained and unprepared, much in the position of Great Britain after Dunkirk. When they are ready, in a year the war will change at once. It will take them nearly two years to get completely ready, and Hitler is well aware of the fact and wants a knockout in 1942. We should amend our programme to fit in with the realities of the third German spring offensive. Until Britain and the United States have regained control of the Pacific, Canada is in a very dangerous position. So are India, Australia, Ceylon, Burma, Madagascar and South Africa.

I sympathize with the minister in occupying the position he does at the present time. I do not believe that he ever was a pacifist, but this house was imbued solidly with pacifism and disarmament, with the result that it is going to take us a long time to get us into the position in which we should be. Britain, France, and other democracies have suffered the consequences of the same attitude of mind, because they threw away their defences and friends.

I suggest that the minister is fully aware of the fact that we are opposed by a first-class naval and air power in the Pacific. For the first time in nearly 100 years Great Britain has been driven out of southern Asia and India. Japan, no doubt, has other designs and will engage in new attacks. Already she threatens Ceylon and India; she has overrun Burma, and there are reports of an attack on Madagascar, which would bring her to the front door of South Africa and her eastern shores in the Indian ocean. The threat to South Africa is a very real one, and all classes, including the natives, are being mobilized. She has had a bad scare, as has our whole empire.

In the Pacific, three dominions—South Africa, New Zealand and Australia—are near the danger zone. They are looking for aid to the United States, and while the United States is sending men of a good type, we know that men who are not fully trained are of little use to-day and are not ready. Here let me refer to a report which was made by Doctor van Mook, the great Dutch governor general and patriot of Java. Recently he flew to Australia, and he has given Australians some good advice. He does not say anything inimical to Britain, which had promised Java some help that failed to come; he has shown himself a great patriot; and his report is of real significance to Canada, because it proves that without an adequate armed force neither this nor any other dominion in our empire can continue to exist. Only one thing matters in our empire—the military power to defend it.

The very fate of the British empire is now at stake. It is threatened not only in South Africa, Australia and New Zealand but here as well. Let me give you the splendid advice which the great patriot soldier I named of the Dutch Netherlands gave to Australia—and Canada also should hearken to these recommendations. In the first place, he said, the war should be waged by air and sea. In the second place, the Japanese supply lines are vulnerable; and third, Japan has so many soldiers that even if a large number are killed it will not make much difference. They have, however, strained their resources and now are trying to link up with the Italian and German front in order to get a foothold in north and west Australia and with Italy and Germany. He recommends some simple truths as a means of avoiding the setting up of separate commands. Remember, he says, that this is a totalitarian war. Put aside politics and those aspects of it which do not directly bear upon the war. Do not use untrained men. Whenever the Dutch had anything like equal chance in Java against Japan in the air they dealt with them successfully, he says; but when we were outnumbered ten to one the merits of the pilot hardly entered into the calculation. That is excellent advice which that great man has given on military and political strategy to all our empire.

We are spending money on munitions and equipment that may be obsolete to-morrow. It has been shown since this war started that the methods which have been adopted have been inadequate to cope with Japan and Germany. Germany with her mechanized horde simply marched through Europe. It has been shown that at Singapore they were overmechanized. General Bennett has described the Jap tactics and the chief weapons they used. What we may be looking for if they invade Canada may not be the weapons that they will use. What were the weapons which they have already used? The machine gun, the tommy gun, the rifle and the bayonet. Their main tactics consisted in infiltration by small, daringly led patrols who were sometimes mounted on captured cycles and who pushed far ahead of the regular troops. The House of Commons in London was told on March 27 that Singapore fell because munitions had to be given to Russia and Libya. That is wrong according to the Bennett report. This authority declares that it was the lack of sufficiently numerous and adequately trained and equipped and well commanded forces of infantry to counter the Japanese infiltration tactics that was responsible for the reverses, even though at Singapore their armoured force and their air force and artillery were outnumbered. These are only a few of the matters which are dealt with in the Bennett report and by the commanding officer of Dutch Java.

I admit that the government is faced with a very trying and difficult task to rearm, especially the minister who has to bear the brunt of these three services, because I think he is bearing the brunt of the whole thing. I should like to see better attention paid to soldiers and their dependents. I should like to see a reallotment of pay and reconsideration by the military experts of the report of General Bennett, and other reports which have been submitted to the British government and which have stirred up criticism in conflict with the non-military experts. Japan got back to simple methods and more of the 1918 mentality of warfare—as I say, the infiltration tactics by the surprise of infantry. That was not a new venture in this war. It was adopted by the Germans in 1918 against Britain and France when they made raids without tanks, and it was successful. They captured a lot of equipment and prisoners, as did the allies also in similar tactics later.

Simplicity has been vindicated not only on land and sea but in the air on the Pacific and in other theatres of war. There is bound to be criticism; but criticism is a tonic, or to change the metaphor, it is a weapon that strengthens the hands of the minister. The government must expect reasonable criticism, and I may say that the criticism here cannot compare with the criticism that takes place in Australia and the United States. I hope that now a further contribution will be made to the dependents of soldiers and that there will be better equipment. The minister has said that he has been giving attention to this, and I believe he has been giving attention to it in the last twelve months.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: There are a few matters which I wish to call to the attention of the committee with a view to securing from the minister certain information, which up to the present time the committee has not received. The vote on the plebiscite yesterday brought under immediate consideration the question of the mobilization of the man-power of this nation. On April 23, the minister, in answer to a question asked by myself as reported at page 1904 of Hansard used these words:

> I think I intimated when I spoke in February that my advice was that if enlistments were maintained within a reasonable distance, I think I said, of that level, we would be able to take care of our commitments.

That answer was given to a question which I asked and which read:

Should the voluntary enlistments continue at the rate prevailing since January, would there be sufficient to meet the present needs of the army and the anticipated needs during the present year?

I think now, in view of the tremendous and overwhelmingly favourable vote yesterday and the decisions which will have to be taken in connection with further mobilization of our man-power, the committee should be made cognizant of the facts relating to the mobilization of our men up to the present time. The minister stated that during the months of January, February and March some 29,000 men voluntarily joined the active service forces of Canada, and he gave details of the numbers who had enlisted month by month. I asked a question, the information with respect to which was not then before him, and I think it is necessary that this committee should be possessed of this information if it is to be in a position to have a proper perspective of the man-power situation. How many men were discharged during the same period?

Another question which I asked and on which the committee should have information is this. When the minister points out that some 29,000 men have enlisted in the army during the last three months, before we are in a position to know whether these were voluntary enlistments or not, we should be furnished with information as to how many of them were of the age limits 18 and 19 and then again from 20 to 24. When I asked the minister for this information the other day he said he was unable to give it at the moment. I hope he has the information now, because by no manner of means can many of those who enlisted in the active army be called voluntary enlistments, having regard to the system which is now general over all this dominion so far as young men are being compulsorily called and who enlist in the active army thereafter are concerned. There is not a day passes that hon. members do not receive letters to the effect that after these men are called up they are subjected to all kinds of intimidation with a view to securing their enlistment for overseas service. They are badgered, bulldozed and browbeaten. Therefore, to be in a position to judge whether or not these are voluntary enlistments and the voluntary system can continue in the months to come to supply the necessary numbers, we must be informed of the ages of those who are enlisting.

Mr. RALSTON: Let me interrupt to tell my hon. friend that I would have to go over the attestation papers of every man who has enlisted in the last three months to find the ages.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Surely there are records showing the groups, twenty-one, twenty-two—

Mr. RALSTON: I am saying to my friend that there are not.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Well the presumption from the fact that this information cannot be procured is that the major portion of the 29,000 are within these age limits and are joining the army because they do not wish to be called up for service in Canada and subjected to the treatment that to-day is being accorded to those called up. Without having that information neither this committee nor the minister is in the position of being able to determine whether, if the present record of enlistments continues, the government will be able to carry on with the present system. The present system operates against the youth of this nation, and under the guise of being voluntary, it is taking young men of eighteen and nineteen and from twenty to twenty-five and placing them in a position where they must join the active forces, and that is called voluntary enlistment.

I suggest that now, in view of the lapse of three or four weeks since the selective system was discussed in the house, we have a right to know what the basis of the selective service system is to be and how the man-power is to be chosen thereunder. Is there to be an extension from twenty-five to, say thirty-five years of age? The time has come when man-power for overseas service should not be restricted to young men in the age limits now being called. The committee has the right to know the attitude of the government at this time, the stand it intends to take, the type of selective service it intends to adopt, so that men all over Canada will be directed into doing their part in the types of service for which they are qualified. Without that information any discussion on man-power is purely hypothetical and of little or no consequence.

Furthermore, the minister says that the department has no information regarding the ages of the men joining for overseas service except by an examination of the attestation papers. Surely among the number of officers in administrative work here in Ottawa there is a statistical branch which could furnish that information without any difficulty. This country has the right to know in what age groups the man-power for overseas service is being mainly mobilized.

To-day's discussion was most interesting. The contributions of the hon. member for Peel and the hon. member for Vancouver South in regard to the treatment that should be accorded to dependents of men overseas were worth-while contributions; the discussion was joined in without regard to party by hon. members in all parts of the house, and I would say the opinions they expressed are almost unanimously acceptable. A suggestion was made this afternoon that the time had come when men going overseas should receive an addition to their pay of an amount to be set aside as a cushion against the day of rehabilitation after the war.

Mention was made, I think by the minister, that in Canada rates of pay as far as the army is concerned are higher than those in any other part of the world except Australia. It is interesting to note that in the United States within the last few weeks a measure was passed by the senate under which the amount paid to soldiers in the army and sailors in the navy would be materially increased. The increases have not yet been passed by the house of representatives, but in the debate in the United States senate it was generally admitted that in order to have something bordering on equality of sacrifice there should be an increase of pay for men in the armed services. A private, first class, in the United States is in receipt of $36 a month; that is raised to $48. A master sergeant's pay is raised from $126 to $138. All through the non-commissioned ranks material increases are shown. The government of the United States recognizes that in order to secure at least a semblance of equality between men serving in the forces and men remaining at home, the pay should be approximated to some extent. In that connection may I point out, as far as a private in the army is concerned, as the minister stated, Australia pays the highest, namely, $62.10 a month. The United States now pays $42 a month; Germany, $21.60; Britain, $12.20, and Japan, 37 cents. I mention the rates of pay in the countries because they may be of interest. To-day men in the armed services feel that the time has come when some consideration should be given to them along this line as well as a cost of living bonus for their dependents, to which I am not going to make any further reference except that I agree that something along this line should be adopted.

I now want to bring to the attention of the minister two or three causes of dissatisfaction. I am glad the Minister of Mines and Resources is in his place because I want to speak of the situation concerning the Indians in this country. They have not been mentioned during this debate; they very seldom receive any mention; but if all the people of this country had enlisted as generally as have the Indians, there would have been no need for a plebiscite or of discussion along the lines on which I am speaking at this moment. In western Canada the reserves have been depleted of almost all the physically fit men. The Indians in service ask, "Why are we discriminated against? Why are the ordinary rights to go to refreshment places and so on which are allowed to other members of the army denied to us? Why is it that as far as dependents' allowances are concerned $35 is paid to the wives of other soldiers while the wife of the Indian receives $10 and $15 a month?" I ask the minister to give consideration to these natives of our country who to-day are shouldering their responsibility in the armed forces as are those of no other race. They ask that the same consideration be given to their loved ones as is being given to the loved ones and dependents of the soldiers of other races.

This afternoon the hon. member for Brantford City said that one of the greatest aids to morale in the army was the adoption of the walking-out uniform for our soldiers, and presented a very good case in support of his contention. I want now to bring to the attention of the minister a very serious source of dissatisfaction among the armed forces, particularly in western Canada. Under the department for air, air observer schools have been established in Canada. These schools are privately owned. Go to them in any province; I speak of Saskatchewan, with which I am better acquainted. There you will find young men wearing uniforms that would almost lead one to believe they belonged to the fleet. They have blue uniforms with not only one set of wings on the breast but wings on their hats as well. These are civilians wearing uniforms which are mistaken by men returning from overseas for the uniforms of naval officers. Only the other day, while walking down the street, I noticed one of these fellows coming along in his uniform, with two rows of gold on his sleeve, and he received a salute from two men who had been invalided home from overseas.

Mr. POULIOT: Why do they not go to Hollywood?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That is not a bad suggestion in reference to this type of uniform. For all the world it looks like the uniform of a naval officer with peacock trimmings. The time has come when men in civilian air schools, while permitted to wear uniforms in order to identify themselves, should be required to wear uniforms that in no way detract from those worn by the men of his majesty's forces. I realize that under the criminal code to wear a uniform of this kind may constitute an offence, but I believe the time has arrived when, in the interest of the men in the armed services, the practice which exists to-day should be discontinued.

People ask why men do not join the army, and in what I have to say now I refer particularly to those who live in areas in which there are congregated large bodies of conscientious objectors. I am not one of those who suggest that because a man conscientiously believes it is wrong to participate in war, every regard and consideration should not be given that man's religious feelings. That is right and proper, but here is the objection which I have heard stated so frequently by men living in those districts, who have sons and brothers overseas. The services of conscientious objectors consist in going to a national park for a period of four months, during which time they are paid. After they have worked there for that length of time, their service to their country, for the entire period of the war, is over. Is there any justification for that? I suggest to the minister that while we should respect rigidly the beliefs of those who conscientiously object to war service, every man in this country within the age limit set out in the mobilization act should be required to serve for the same length of time, and that the contribution of these people in the period of service should be the same as that of the men who are subject to call for service in the army.

What I have stated, Mr. Chairman, in general summarizes the suggestions I have to offer, except for one further point which I raised last fall and which I raise again this evening. I have in my files a letter from a man who served overseas in the last war. He was blinded in the service of his country and receives a pension of $75 a month. On January 1, 1942, he received notification from the Department of Finance that in consequence of a ruling made by a department of government, his pension would be subject to the national defence tax. That was not a ruling of parliament. That ruling was not the consequence of a statute passed by parliament. It was made under a ruling of an administrative body, and not under an act of parliament. When I brought up this question the last time the Minister of National Defence for Air indicated that he would give consideration to the situation, with a view to ascertaining whether or not such a regulation was legally in effect and, if so, whether consideration might be given to the introduction of the legislation necessary to relieve these 100 per cent pensioners from the payment of such tax. I think we all agree that the men in the army should receive the utmost consideration. I was glad to hear the minister say the other evening, if I understood him correctly, that the discrimination which heretofore existed in favour of the air force as against the army, in the matter of transportation, had been removed. It should be removed. On more than one trip from western Canada I had occasion to see men who were being sent from one part of Canada to the other, under conditions which were anything but favourable to enlistment by those who might see those men in those circumstances.

These may be said to be little things. But, Mr. Chairman, it is these little things which, when rectified, will result in a great improvement in the morale of our troops. All of us in this parliament want to do our part. It is not as a demagogue that I speak; that is not at all the spirit in which I have addressed these remarks to the committee. Throughout this day the arguments that have been advanced in regard to the problems of the soldier have come from this side of the house. That is not because hon. members in other parts of the house do not agree with a great deal of what has been said, but I do think that regardless of what side of the house we are on, it is our duty at this time to bring to the attention of hon. members and of the government such matters as we believe will improve the position of any service men and their dependents and will ensure that they will receive the consideration which can be accorded to them.

Mr. POULIOT: In the first place it is my desire to congratulate the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for Lake Centre upon the remarks they have made to-night. They have spoken with knowledge of the subject, and have offered constructive suggestions which should not be forgotten.

This is the most important item of the estimates. Before the Easter adjournment $500,000,000 was voted, and the measure now before the committee provides for the expenditure of a further billion and a half. Our duty here is to check the expenditures, according to the old British principle of ministerial responsibility for the expenditure of public money. The responsibility is all the greater by reason of the fact that we have no detailed estimates for such tremendous amounts of money.

It has been the custom for several years for members of parliament to lay their grievances before the minister, as though they were laying them at the foot of the throne. Of course, the function of the cabinet is entirely different from that of the throne, and if the throne has the right of grace, which the cabinet does not have, the cabinet has the duty to render an account of all expenditures, even down to the cents, which the throne has not. In order that there shall be no confusion, I establish that distinction before expressing my views on the discussion of estimates in this committee of the House of Commons.

What member knows the organization of the Department of National Defence as it now stands? Of course, there are charts made by draftsmen, showing the organization of each department. Those charts are not available to members. But, since necessity is the mother of invention, I have found a sketch of the department in the dominion government telephone directory. That is just a commonplace book which appears on the desk of every member of the house and of every official who has the right to a telephone number of his own. In this directory under National Defence Department (Army) there commences a list, under subtitles of the different branches of the department, starting at page 80 and going on for several pages. I see a mass of paper on the desk in front of the minister at the moment. There are several brief cases and a big box which must be full of information. That information we want, and we have a right to get it. When we are here in the committee of this House of Commons to discuss estimates, we are not here to put the minister through the third degree. We are here to know what is done with the public moneys which come from the pockets of the taxpayers of Canada. We want to know what use has been made of that money. If the use is good, the department is praised and so is the minister. If the use is bad, then the department and the minister have to be blamed. That is only common sense, and it is in accordance with the old tradition of British parliamentary practice, as is known to every hon. member of the house, even if it is ignored by a large number of dominion government officials.

At page 80 of this dominion government telephone directory, under the heading of National Defence Department (Army), we find first a subtitle—"Administration—Woods building—Minister," and under that heading several people are listed. The next subtitle is "Military Secretary", and under that there are four people who have a telephone besides one for the military secretary himself. Next comes "Deputy Minister—Woods building"; "Real Estate Adviser"; "Secretary of National Defence—Canadian building"; "Stenographic pool—Elgin annex".

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Then there is the next subtitle—"Judge Advocate-General". This was an important function when the judge advocate-general was supposed to examine all contracts before they were signed by the Minister of the Department of National Defence. That was before the department was sterilized in the matter of purchasing ammunition, clothing and so forth. Now, however, all these purchases are made by the Department of Munitions and Supply, who have their own advisers, and the position of judge advocate-general has suffered what is called in Roman law a diminutio capitis—or in English, a reduction in status. The judge advocate-general looks after courts-martial, but as everyone knows, courts-martial are decided mostly by the officers commanding. Still the judge advocate-general travels from coast to coast.

The next subtitle is "Estates branch", and then, "Central registry—Woods building", and under that subtitle appear "Subject index"; "Charge-out"; "Personnel index"; "Charge-out"; "Confidential section"; "Mail room"; "Office services".

Next is the subtitle "Contracts branch—Canadian building"; then "Printing and Stationery branch—Elgin building"—that is a duplication of the king's printer, of the printing bureau. The next subtitle is "Translation services," followed by "Translation services"; "Stores audit"; "Inspector General (Central Canada)—Canadian building;" "Chief of the General Staff—Woods building," "Vice-Chief of the General Staff"; "Assistant Chief of the General Staff."

I am reading only the subtitles. I am not going into the details of the minor officials who have the right to have a telephone.

The next subtitle is "Directorate of Military Operations and Intelligence." Intelligence is very important in that department, and I am glad to find it there. There are several subheads under the "Directorate of Military Operations and Intelligence," such as "Operations"; "Intelligence"—double intelligence, apparently, and it is required, of course—"Censorship"; "Geographical section."

Then there is a subtitle, "Departmental library—Canadian building," and then we come to the next, "Directorate of Military Training—Canadian building"; "Directorate of Staff Duties—Woods building," and these last two cover a long list of officials. Next is "Historical section—Records building, Experimental Farm"—"sub tegmine fagi." That is from Virgil.

Next is the "Adjutant-General's Branch—Bate building"; "Deputy Adjutant-General (A) —Bate building"; "Deputy Adjutant-General (B)—Bate building."

The next is "Personal Services—Bate building". Then we have "Selection board B". Then "Appointments, Promotions, Retirements (other than reinforcements)". Then "Officers Reinforcements Courses Routine Orders Gazette Discipline and Records". Here we have Major Leighton who is a good friend of the French-Canadians. That is a long name, just like some of those German names. It is just about as long as the name of the Spanish ambassador.

Then we have the "File Room" and "Organization and Administration". Then "Administration and Personnel", and "Discipline and Ceremonial". Then "NRMA Missions and CWAC". I do not know what that means because I have forgotten my alphabet. Then there is "Internment" and "Officer administering CWAC". Then we have "Mobilization and Recruiting—Bate building"; then "MR Section" and "RS Section". This seems to be the most important. They must have a lot of military secrets. Then we have the "Civilian Director of Recruiting" and "DAAG (sigs.)". I suppose that refers to signals. Then there is the "File Room" and the "Directorate of Personnel Selection—Bate building".

Then the "Regimental Funds Board—Elgin building", and "Medicals—Elgin building". There are a lot of those; there is Zumstein, Zinkann and Vanwart. Then we have "Medical Inspection Room", "Naval Medical Services", "X-ray Laboratory", "Central Medical Stores—Earlscourt building", "Directorate of Pay Services—Canadian building", and "Records—Daly building". I have nothing to say about that because I think it is important to keep records of the whole thing.

Then we find the "Corps of Military Staff Clerks Headquarters—Regal building". That must be a regal staff of clerks. Then "Dental Services—Fraser building", "Chaplain Services—Elgin building", "Chaplain Services—Royal Trust building", "Directorate of Public Relations—Central chambers", "Auxiliary Services—Carleton chambers", and "Quartermaster-General—Canadian building". This is divided up. Plato used to say that no one who could divide was divine. I am using the pagan meaning of the word for divinity, and I expect the minister to be just as good with his definitions when I ask him to give me the duties of these people.

Then there are "Engineer Services"; then "DDES Fortifications and Equipment Section". That must be something most important because it is in two parts. Next comes "DDES Works and Buildings Section". It is not so important. Then there is the "Draughting Office (general)", and there is another "Draughting Office for Fortifications and Equipment". There is the "Ottawa Engineer Services Offices", "Engineer Workshop—Cartier square", and "Orderly Room RCE". There is "Supply and Transport", "Movement Control", "No. 9 Detachment RCASC—Landsdowne park". There is the "Master-General of the Ordnance—New Post Office building"; Deputy Master-General of the Ordnance", "Assistant Deputy Master-General of the Ordnance", "Directorate of Ordnance Services (administration)", "Assistant Officers", "General Office Clerks", "Director of Ordnance Services (general stores)", "Assistant Officers", "Clerical Staff", "Tools and Workshop Equipment", "Director of Ordnance Services (technical stores)", "Assistant Officers, Civil Clerical Personnel and Library", and "Joint Technical Stores Depot Office".

Then we find the "British Army Staff". There is a great duplication here. This is under Lieutenant-Colonel Fernyhough, AQMG. Here we have "Director of Mechanical Maintenance", "Director of Mechanization", "Mechanical Transport", "Vehicle Establishments", "Vehicle Records", "Vehicle Spare Parts", "Accounting and Records Branch", and "Director of Technical Research". Then we have "Chemical Warfare Research Establishment", "Signals", "Central Ordnance Depot", "Accounting Branch", "Ordnance Inspecting Officer—Cartier square", "Ordnance Stores—Cartier square sub-depot". There are a number of sub-depots. There is the "Morris building sub-depot", "Supreme Court building sub-depot", "Beach building sub-depot", "IMS building, sub-depot", "CPR freight sheds No. 2", "Garage and Workshop".

There is a long list, and it takes a long time to go through it. I do not intend to deprive hon. members of the pleasure of looking at this most interesting telephone directory. A tremendous amount of money is being spent in Ottawa. I have no objection to enough money being spent in Ottawa for the general staff and those who direct the military part of our war effort, but there should be order in Ottawa if we want order in the army. I say this mostly for the benefit of the rank and file who are told that they will be penalized and sent to "CB" if they report any unfair treatment they receive. My humble idea of the Department of National Defence is that it should be established along business lines and that there should be coordination between the various services in order that the minister could control all the actions of each one of the various services under his department. It is a most important service, and the organization of the department is such that the five war ministers are jointly responsible for the management of all their departments, not only in virtue of the old principle of ministerial responsibility, but also in virtue of the new principle of joint management.

Therefore, sir, I want order in the Department of National Defence; and in saying that I say it on behalf not only of those who are already serving in the army but of those who are about to be called to the colours, in order that what the minister said the other day, that an officer commanding a regiment should be like a father to his men, shall always be true.

There is one thing to which I strongly object. It is the idea of infallibility of all those under the minister. That is a great mistake. No man in this world is perfect. Members of parliament have opportunities of seeing what is going wrong. Sometimes they have a better opportunity than any minister, because they are in contact with the people; they are in touch with those who are affected by what is done. The department and the minister should accept with the best possible grace any criticism which is made of any branch of the department. They should get the right information and then act upon it.

It is very easy to reply to criticisms about brass hats and the like. It was done during the campaign on the plebiscite. It is done right now. It is to the effect that hon. members who make criticisms are not loyal citizens. What an absurdity! Each hon. member when he is sworn in takes one oath of allegiance, and only one; it is to His Majesty the King. The first duty of members of parliament is to honour the king and to serve their country; and I cannot conceive how any cabinet minister could substitute himself for his majesty and pretend that members of parliament owe him the same kind of loyalty which is due to his majesty, the commander in chief of our army. There is a great difference. Yet the impression is given to the country, by men who are paid by the government, that those who disagree with the government on certain points are, just because of that, not loyal citizens. Is it not a shame?

You have only to read the debates at Westminster to know that there they have freedom of speech to an unlimited extent, and that no member of the British cabinet ever tried to use such means to prevent his fellow members in parliament from saying what they had to say, not only about civilian politics, but also regarding military matters.

We are in this war to win it and we shall win it. But what is required is not only mobilization or national selective service. Everything will depend upon the manner in which the mobilization is carried on and how the national selective service is understood, not by the people, but by those who will be in charge. Therefore I will say this to my young friend, the hon. member for Lake Centre, who at the beginning of his very interesting speech advocated immediate mobilization. No? Well, if I am wrong I will let Hansard speak. I do not wish to impute to my hon. friend anything he has not said. If he has not said it, I will go on with what I want to say. It is, that by beating the drum it is very easy to create excitement among the people. Excitement is a bad thing; it is just as bad as fear, during a war. But what I meant when I started on this point was this, that even those who are for total war, including conscription for overseas, all those who are for national selective service, all those who are for total mobilization, with the same definition that I gave it a minute ago must see to it that there is order in the Department of National Defence. That is the first essential.

The only way to have some kind of order in the Department of National Defence is to have the control of expenditure of that department. Who should have it? We, the members of the House of Commons of Canada and the members of the Senate. It is all very fine to say that they are going to defend democracy on all of the five continents, on the land, on the high seas, and in the air, but what will happen if we here in Canada are deprived of the basic rights of democracy? I was astonished last year when all of the items under $5,000 did not appear in the public accounts. I brought the matter to the attention of my chief, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). My hon. colleagues remember that on that occasion, which was a day of last summer, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the right hon. gentleman told me that he would see to it that the public accounts should be more satisfactory this year. What happened this year? It is seven times worse, according to the statement of the leader of the opposition, the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). When I said that there was no improvement there—I mentioned $5,000—he said, "No item below $35,000, I think". It was not denied by anyone. How can we have a check on the expenditures of the Department of National Defence? In the first place, we have no detailed estimates; we have a global amount. Before that, we had public accounts. During the last war, when Sir Robert Borden was Prime Minister and Sir Wilfrid Laurier was leader of the opposition, there were two things which we do not have now. They had estimates for the two war departments and there were complete public accounts. Now we have no estimates whatever except a global amount, and we have no public accounts for all items under $35,000. We do not know what huge salaries are paid to brass hats, what huge salaries are paid to men who have high ranks in the army and who were unable to earn five cents in civilian life before they got those positions, or others who were getting probably too much. We are here just for these matters.

The role of a government and of parliament must also be that of a pendulum, to maintain order. We must regularize everything in this country so that no one may suffer injustice; and the role of parliament is so well acknowledged in that regard that in the rules of the house there is a provision to the effect that every Canadian citizen has a right to petition parliament for the redress of any wrong. I am very sorry that I have had to repeat to-night what I have already said about estimates and public accounts.

Would it not be fair for the minister to give us the details of salaries paid to each of the officials whose names appear in the telephone directory, or, if not, the full details of their staff, with the name of each one, at least the number of employees under each one of them, because, as is well known, very few of the appointments in the Department of National Defence are made by the civil service commission. We are here in the fog. Although I appreciate deeply the constructive criticism made and the suggestions that have been offered to the minister by all members who have already spoken, I find it my duty as a private Liberal member of this hon. house to urge upon the minister the necessity of giving complete information about the salaries of those gentlemen whom I have already mentioned and also about their travelling expenses and all other expenses in the department. The same thing should be asked of the other war departments, especially the air department and the Department of National Defence for Naval Services. On top there is the Department of Munitions and Supply. We know nothing about it. There are some good men there; naturally there must be some. But we must know the functions of each of these men so that when we have a case to submit we shall not have to telephone to ten or twelve or twenty before finding the right man, who usually says he does not know a word about the matter that is submitted to him.

We need order; and the minister, who received in his youth the Liberal training of Nova Scotia, who was told as a young boy to have deep respect for a great national figure who is regarded as a hero in that province, Joseph Howe, should return to parliamentary principles which have had the test of centuries and which are still deeply respected at Westminster and in all other legislative bodies on this continent except here.

Mr. WHITE: In connection with the matter of compulsory deferred pay I am very much in favour of the principle which has been adopted by the department. I am also very much in favour of the suggestion made this afternoon by the hon. member for Peel. I believe—and I have expressed this opinion in the house before in connection with citizens of our country generally—that we should endeavour to supply them in some way with funds to be utilized at the end of the war; we should follow as far as we can the principle of putting the funds of this country into the hands of as many of our citizens as possible so as to assist in the transition from a war-time to a peace-time economy. In that connection I would ask the minister whether the sole purpose of compulsory deferred pay for soldiers overseas is to provide them with money as a nest-egg at the end of the war and, if so, why the same principle does not apply to soldiers in this country?

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I cannot give an answer as to why it does not apply. I think it was the hon. member for Broadview who indicated this afternoon that the dependents' allowance regulations had been brought into effect at the beginning of the war. They were studied for something like a year and a half by committees, civilian and service, and it was determined that this method should be adopted. I had often thought of it and, in fact, was pressed very strongly in the department to provide deferred pay for those serving in Canada, but it seemed to me that it might be regarded as breach of contract to start withholding pay after enlistment. It might be regarded as bad faith.

Mr. WHITE: But when they go overseas the principle is immediately adopted.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes; that is part of the contract, but it is not part of the contract to have pay withheld in Canada. That is the sole reason. I think it is a sound principle and useful for the purpose suggested, and but for that I would have adopted it.

The hon. member for Lake Centre referred to the matter of discharges. He asked how many had been discharged during the three months period January to March. The exact number is 4,482, in England and in Canada. That is something like half of one per cent per month, which I think is quite a normal figure of wastage. The number discharged as physically unfit, included in that figure, is 3,261.

The hon. member asked how many had enlisted between the ages of eighteen and nineteen. As I advised him, I have not the figures, and the only way of getting them that I know of would be to go through the attestation papers individually. But it developed that the real reason why my hon. friend wanted this information was to be able to demonstrate that the enlistments, the record of which I had given for January, February and March, 28,686, had come from men who, to use his own expression, had been bludgeoned and browbeaten in the miltiary training centres and that he wanted to show that they came within that age limit. I can tell him that he does not need that information in order to find out pretty accurately how many were men from the training centres. Of the number who enlisted in that time approximately 16 per cent were men from the training centres. That means something like 4,000 out of the 28,000 enlisted from training centres or National Resources Mobilization Act camps. Therefore I do not think my hon. friend should feel that those enlistments are very seriously boosted or increased by men from training centres. The figures for April are now practically complete, because we are close to the end of the month. Over 10,000 enlisted, so that the figures for the first four months are something like 38,000 or 39,000 altogether, and of those, on the same percentage, something like 5,800 would have enlisted from the training centres.

I want to repudiate in the strongest possible terms the statement that men are bludgeoned, browbeaten and generally forced to join the army. I have stated to the committee on previous occasions that when reports have come to me from time to time or statements been made such as my hon. friend made to-night, I have investigated them and have found no grounds for any statement that there was undue or improper pressure except on one occasion, and I took prompt action in connection with that. I say to the committee that the recruiting figures are not built up to any extent by recruiting from the training centres. I do not think my hon. friend does recruiting good service when he makes statements of that kind. There is no doubt that in the training centres the men themselves, men who are "active" as they call it, bring a certain amount of pressure to bear, but I have also indicated that I have been in a number of evangelistic meetings in my youth in which exactly the same sort of enthusiasm and pressure was used. I have said and I repeat that the instructions are that there shall be no difference whatever in treatment in the training centres. Leave is given to men who enlist to allow them to go home and arrange their affairs, but as far as treatment is concerned they are given exactly the same treatment as the others. The orders are that there is to be no discrimination of any kind, no undue pressure, no improper influence used. If any hon. members have any cases to bring to my attention, I will see that they are investigated as thoroughly as possible.

My hon. friend dealt with the matter of pay and allowances. That had a pretty thorough discussion this afternoon. I do not think there is anything I can add to what I have said.

The cost of living bonus was discussed to-night by the hon. member for Broadview. I did not reply to him because I had already said what I had to say on that.

My hon. friend referred to pay and allowances in the United States. He knows they are considerably below Canadian rates. Those below the rank of warrant officers get no dependents' allowance at all, whereas since the beginning of the war we have been paying them and paying rates higher than those in the United States. There is a movement going on now to increase the rates of pay there. I have said I will give consideration to the representations made respecting dependents' allowances and the suggestion as to deferred pay.

My hon. friend made another suggestion, namely, in regard to Indians. I do not know whether he was in the committee this afternoon when I dealt with the matter of dependents' allowances to those who are in the West Indies. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar brought it up. When I went to investigate the question of dependents' allowances to those in the West Indies, Jamaica particularly, I found that a reduction had been made to some of the Indians in this country. Exactly the same action will be taken and, as a matter of fact, has been taken in connection with the Indians as I indicated would be taken with regard to those in the West Indies. That is to say, the amount of $35 for the wife's allowance will be paid in full, and will not be subject to any reduction. I may add that in connection with Indians there are some cases, as my hon. friend may understand—and this does not apply to Indians alone but also to other citizens of Canada—where it is thought well, both under the Pension Act and under the dependents' allowance regulations, to appoint guardians for administration. There are some odd cases of that kind.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: It was a general principle in regard to Indians not to give their wives the full allowance.

Mr. RALSTON: In that connection I am told that savings for future emergencies are being encouraged among the Indians. As has been intimated, no permanent reduction in allowance is contemplated. As a matter of fact, I am not sure whether there were any actual reductions in allowances to the wives of Indians, but I rather think there was, in some instances, a withholding of pay, and administration by the guardian. In any event I want to assure the committee that the full amount will go to their credit, as in the case of the wives of those in the West Indies whom I mentioned this afternoon.

My hon. friend had two other suggestions, one with regard to air observer schools. I heard what my hon. friend said, and he gave a graphic description, but I have not the faintest idea what is occurring there or who are these civilians wearing uniforms. Certainly I shall inquire into the matter, because I agree with him that there is no reason why civilians should be appearing in any uniforms which might be misleading, or which might indicate that they were in his majesty's service.

With regard to conscientious objectors, I think I caught the drift of what my hon. friend said. He was indicating, I understood, that they should serve in some non-combatant capacity, for the same length of time as those who are called up to serve in the armed forces. There is no reason in the world, as far as legal power is concerned, why this should not be done, and I shall bring it to the attention of my colleagues who have been dealing with this question, one of whom has just come into the house.

This matter has been brought to my attention in another way. The suggestion has been made that there is a place in the armed forces where these conscientious objectors could serve; that is to say, in the medical corps. I have taken the position, rightly or wrongly, that the men who serve in the armed forces must be in a position to take on whatever is necessary in the army. I do not want a distinction made between the duties which men may be called upon to perform. As a matter of fact, from time to time we may have medical orderlies who go into other branches, or who come from other services. Someone may come from headquarters into the medical corps, or on the other hand a medical orderly may go to headquarters duty. I have a distinct recollection of a time when medical orderlies, cooks, batmen and everyone else went into the line. To make any distinction of the kind in a unit I do not think is for the good of the unit itself, so I would hesitate to have men in the unit who could not be called upon to do combatant service.

I think the hon. member for Témiscouata took a good deal of time, if I may say so, in explaining why he took the trouble to ask for particulars with respect to the estimates. I have no objection to any hon. member asking for particulars or for any information he desires. I thought the hon. member took nearly half an hour to get a running start at the real question he was going to ask. He put up some straw-men in order to knock them down again. He suggested that there was some idea of infallibility in the Department of National Defence. There is nothing of the kind—

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend just set up that straw-man and knocked it down again. I do not think he added to the strength of his argument, however, in doing so. I can assure him that I am the first to admit our fallibility, so there was no need for him to argue about it. Changes have been made in the Department of National Defence from time to time, and probably still more changes will be made. In fact, if one may judge by my hon. friend's prediction and suggestion, which he made on the public platform, a change in the minister probably will be the first thing he will advocate. The hon. member suggests that someone in the department has suggested that it is disloyal to offer criticism. No one has suggested anything of the kind. The hon. member simply makes that up as he goes along.

Mr. POULIOT: No, no.

Mr. RALSTON: He puts it up for the purpose of knocking it down again. No one has suggested that it is disloyal to offer criticism. I think I have taken as much criticism as anyone, and I have not accused anyone of disloyalty. The hon. member also suggests that there is some idea in the government that members of parliament owe the ministers a loyalty the same as that we owe the king; that is as I took down his words. That only has to be mentioned to indicate that it is simply a figment of the imagination which my hon. friend has built up to air on this occasion. Let me say to the hon. member that, while I have not the reference here, he is absolutely incorrect when he states that no estimates have been given except the global estimate. I read into the record the first day I was before the committee a statement showing the various objects of expenditure, and the various functions, or, in other words, a break-down of the $997,000,000. I quite agree that it was not in the detail which my hon. friend would suggest. I believe it contained only seven or eight items altogether, but it did indicate to the committee the sort of expenditure which was proposed, and there was no objection whatever to giving any estimates of expenditure if my hon. friend wanted them.

Mr. GREEN: Just on that point, would it be possible for the minister to give a further break-down of the army estimates?

Mr. RALSTON: I am advised that it would not be possible to give a further break-down of the total amount; but in regard to items such as my hon. friend asked for, namely salaries, there is no objection whatever to giving those. My hon. friend used these expressions. He said there were huge salaries being paid to brass hats, and huge salaries to men in the army who were not able to earn five cents before they got in the army. I just say to my hon. friend that this statement is absolutely without foundation. The men in the army do not profess to be infallible; but they cannot speak for themselves, and I say to my hon. friend that I do not propose to have a statement of that sort go unchallenged. I have received and this country has received loyal support and loyal and efficient service from the men in the army; and I want to say to my hon. friend that I think it ill becomes a member of parliament to stand in his place here and make a statement of that kind.

In connection with the salaries which are paid to men in the army, I may say to the hon. member that as a matter of fact most of those men are not professional soldiers at all. They are men who have been in the militia. Most of them served in the last war. They have been called in and have changed their profession for the time being in order to help out in connection with war work. There are a certain number of professional soldiers, and thank heaven there are, because we did not treat our professional soldiers any too well, at least during the period when I was Minister of National Defence previously. I take my share of responsibility for that. From 1926 to 1930 the army and national defence services were nearly starved, and I make that statement now. It seemed to me that perhaps the most popular indoor sport in those days was cutting amounts off the estimates for national defence, and the hon. member for Témiscouata did his share of advocating that this be done. Now I say to my hon. friend that in spite of all that, the men who were professional soldiers did keep on. The organization that we have to-day, which does not suit my hon. friend, does not suit me nor does it suit the men who are in it, but it is an organization that had to be built from the ground up. I say that when you expand an organization from ten thousand men, as it existed on September 9, 1939, to about three hundred thousand men as it exists to-day in the army alone; when over 425,000 men have been enlisted; when you have had the expansion which the establishments of the army have had from the Atlantic to the Pacific, not only in connection with operations but in connection with training; when you have sent overseas the men who have been sent and the organizations which are over there, it has meant a tremendous amount of work. I was glad my hon. friend read the list which he did read, because it indicated the multiplicity of activities which are carried on by the Department of National Defence. We have to enlist and train and clothe and house and feed these men. We have to move them from place to place. We have to see that they are supplied with proper rations; we have to see that they are furnished with training facilities, that armaments are supplied, that arrangements are made for getting them across the country and over on the other side of the ocean, and then we have to arrange for the same things over there. Therefore the activities carried on by the department are not small, and I make no apology for the list which my hon. friend has read or the list which he could have put on record.

I say to my hon. friend now that if he will look at the tabulation which I put on the record this afternoon, he will see the salaries for the men in the army from the rank of colonel down, and I give now the information I was asked for this afternoon, a statement with regard to the salaries in the army from the rank of colonel up, so that my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen will know exactly what salaries are being paid.

The highest pay in the army is that of the Army Commander, General A. G. L. McNaughton—a total of $14,000 per annum, without any additional allowances.

The two corps commanders are each paid $10,585 per annum, with dependents' allowances in addition.

Divisional commanders are paid $8,760 per annum, with the same allowances.

District officers commanding are graded in class 3 with pay of $6,205 per annum, plus the same allowances. Where they are compelled to provide their own quarters and subsistence, an allowance of $365 per annum is added.

Other officers of the rank of brigadier and up usually hold staff appointments in which they are graded according to classification. The higher classifications are listed in article 124 of Financial Regulations and Instructions. The chief of the general staff is paid by order in council a flat amount of $10,000 without any allowance; the adjutant-general and the quartermaster-general are paid $7,300 per annum. The tabulation of classes is as follows:

	Exclusive of dependents' allowances Per annum
Class 1	$8,760 00
" 2	7,300 00
" 2A	6,752 50
" 3	6,205 00
" 4	5,840 00
" 5	4,745 00

The vice-chief of the general staff comes in class 2A. While class 1 appears in the table above with a salary of $8,760 per annum, I do not think there is anyone in the department receiving the pay of that particular class at this time. So my hon. friend can take the ranks of the officers, put these figures beside them, and find the answer to his question about these huge salaries paid to brass hats and men in the army who were not able to earn five cents before they got into the army. That would give my hon. friend the information he wants, and I assure him that if I can give him any further information within reason which will be of help to him and the committee, I shall be glad to do it.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. I do not wish the minister to misquote me and give another meaning to what I said. He has given the impression that I complained that the soldiers are too well treated, that the sailors are too well treated, and so forth. That is not the situation. I complained only of Ottawa; that is all.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend the leader of the opposition asked me with regard to the building of a mess at Petawawa. I have the figures here. I am advised by the deputy director of engineering services, which I might say for the benefit of my hon. friend the member for Témiscouata is what D.D.E.S. stands for, that the only mess construction during the year April 1, 1941 to March 31, 1942, at Petawawa was as follows:

Engineers' mess—reconstruction of old building to provide messing accommodation for a total of 160 officers...	$ 6,555
Royal Canadian Artillery mess—reconstruction of old building to provide messing accommodation for a total of 160 officers.....	3,150
Royal Canadian Artillery—reconstruction of old building to provide messing accommodation for a total of 160 officers	14,000
Camp Headquarters mess—reconstruction of old building to meet present requirements	2,544

For the benefit of my hon. friend the member for Témiscouata, I just want to say that the number of civilian employees at headquarters, is 1,673, and the total paid to them is $1,616,985. The military personnel comprises 385 officers and 900 of other ranks, or 1,285 altogether, with pay of $1,542,000. The total personnel, civilian and military, is 2,958, receiving total pay and allowances of $3,158,985, which is ·32 or 1 per cent of the total cost of the Canadian army for 1942-43.

Mr. POULIOT: I congratulate the minister. We have got some information. That is a start, and if I had not been so insistent about it we never would have got it. Of course I may have made a mistake when I said that we had no information about the $2,000,000,000 vote. But the details of the items were contained in only seven lines, as the minister said just a moment ago. That is perhaps less than fifty words to explain an expenditure of $2,000,000,000. Imagine what detail that is!

Mr. RALSTON: One billion dollars.

Mr. POULIOT: It is one and a half billion dollars. It includes that branch.

Mr. RALSTON: I was speaking of the amount of $997,000,000.

Mr. POULIOT: Even at that it is practically one billion dollars. Divide that into seven, and it means that each estimate is one-seventh of the one billion dollars. That was not very much detail to give, and it is a good thing that the minister has given us some information to-night. It is a good thing for his own protection in the department and a good thing to satisfy the minds of the electors of this country.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They are satisfied.

Mr. POULIOT: If they are satisfied, it is because they do not know. If they knew more, they would not be satisfied.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: They would not elect the men they do.

Mr. POULIOT: I will tell the hon. member for Fraser Valley I absolutely share his views regarding the defence of this country and what he said previously. It was his best speech.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: No.

Mr. POULIOT: There is a difference between better and best. His best speech was when he complained of the brass hats in the Department of National Defence, and when he spoke on that I cheered him heartily and banged my desk and said to myself, here is one man who is not afraid to tell the truth.

I say that in the army there are not only good men but very good men. But the value of an officer is not in his uniform alone or in the shine of his boots. It is in his brains and in the kindness of his heart. The minister was right when he said the other day that every commanding officer should be like a father to those in his regiment under him. But what I find is that the soldiers are very often exchanging their fathers, meaning by that, that recruits and soldiers of my county are presently defending British Columbia. I do not complain about that. I understand that this is their country and our country from ocean to ocean. But what was extraordinary was this. I was informed by the Department of National Defence, dated April 6, telling me that a farmer's son had been given six months' leave to return to cultivate his father's land. I was greatly surprised two weeks later to receive a letter from this young man, who was at first at Valcartier, Quebec. It had been posted under date of April 20, at Nanaimo, British Columbia. This young man was awarded six months' leave by the constituted authority, the commission of national war services, but he could not enjoy that leave because the Department of National Defence did not stand by the decision of the commission which, according to the national war regulations, is final. The Department of National Defence did not respect the law; they took that boy and instead of sending him to his father to cultivate the farm, they sent him to British Columbia. He was never informed that he had been given that leave. I do not know if that was done in bad faith or through ignorance, but it was done just the same. Here we have an example of disrespect of constituted authority, disrespect exemplified by that action of the Department of National Defence.

The minister said, in the first place, that I spoke too long and, in the second place, that he was glad that I read part of the long list of departments under his control. He said it is costly because there are so many. I do not object to the minister having a number of branches in his department provided they are useful and provided that these people do not spend their time clicking their heels and spurs on Sparks street, Slater street, Elgin street and the other streets in Ottawa, showing how important they are. What they should do is not to show that they are important—I say this to the minister as well as to his subalterns —they should show that they are useful, that they are defending this country well and are making the best possible use of the men who are serving in the three branches.

When we dare to raise our voices to complain of injustices we receive the spurn of contempt, we hear contemptuous laughing; we do not need that. I will tell the minister once again what the greatest soldier of our times, Marshal Foch, said about the military art. He said that it was based on common sense, meaning that every action of the army had to be justified on the basis of common sense. Common sense is accessible to all; it is not an unusual gift. If the minister acts in fairness to all, to the army as well as to the members of the House of Commons; if he wants to act in fairness to all, he should go on in the way of his first steps to-night. He should give us more information, not only about the salaries paid in the Department of National Defence, but also about the expenditures for travelling, for allowances and other things.

We want a policy of national defence that can be commended to the Canadian people, that will satisfy the Canadian people and that will mostly satisfy Canadian soldiers, Canadian sailors and Canadian airmen. The minister may be a great man. I am a humble private member of this hon. house, but I am ready to do anything to help the Department of National Defence provided we get rid of all the nonentities who are there and who are responsible for the things like the one I have just mentioned. They cannot be defended. If the minister wants the number I will give it to him.

Mr. RALSTON: I would like it.

Mr. POULIOT: I shall send it by mail to-morrow. The other night the minister said that agriculture was rendering great service in this war. That is quite true. However, I do not understand the exact position of the government with regard to farmers and farmers' sons, in spite of that general statement which was made. The minister has led the committee to believe that if a certain delay in the training could be given to new trainees, it was difficult for the department to give leave to farmers and farmers' sons who were already in the army.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 29, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REFERENCE OF BUDGET, ANNUAL REPORTS AND CERTAIN ESTIMATES TO RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

Hon. C. D. HOWE (for the Minister of Transport): I wish to lay on the table the financial budget of Canadian National Railways and Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for the calendar year 1942 and to move that the same be referred to the standing committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government, together with the following annual reports for the year 1941 which were laid on the table of the house on March 19 last: Canadian National Railways, Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, Canadian National Railways Securities Trust, George A. Touche and Company, auditors of the accounts of the Canadian National Railways System; also the annual report of Trans-Canada Air Lines for 1941, tabled March 23, 1942, together with the following items of the estimates for 1942-43:

400. Maritime Freight Rates Act, Canadian National Railways eastern lines;

401. Maritime Freight Rates Act, railways other than Canadian National Railways;

410. Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited, capital advances;

411. Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals deficit, 1942.

And that the resolution passed by the house on the 20th February, 1942, referring votes 400, 401, 410 and 411 to the committee of supply, be rescinded.

Motion agreed to.

EXTRADITION TREATY

ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES GOVERNING EXTRADITION OF CRIMINALS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): A new and comprehensive extradition treaty between Canada and the United States was signed this morning in Washington. The signatories of the treaty were the Canadian minister in the United States, Mr. Leighton McCarthy, for Canada; and Mr. Cordell Hull, the Secretary of State for the United States.

The new treaty, which governs the arrangements between Canada and the United States for the extradition of criminals who have fled from one country to another, replaces a series of treaties and conventions which began with the Ashburton-Webster treaty 1842, which was subsequently modified by conventions in 1889, 1900, 1905, 1922, and 1925. In 1931 a new treaty, similar to that now signed between Canada and the United States, was entered into between Great Britain and the United States. While the 1931 treaty replaced the Ashburton-Webster treaty and other conventions, it had no effect upon the position of Canada and the United States. Such modifications as have been made in the new treaty are designed to bring the regulations governing extradition into line with modern conditions.

The new treaty is subject to ratification. It will not be published until arrangements have been completed for its presentation to parliament and to the Senate of the United States.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PRICE CEILING—SUBSIDIES

Mr. HAZEN:

1. On what goods and materials, domestic and imported, are subsidies now being paid?

2. What subsidy is paid on each kind of goods and materials?

3. How much has been paid to date on each kind of goods and materials?

4. What are the names and addresses of the persons or companies who have been paid subsidies and how much has each received?

Mr. ILSLEY: I request that this be made an order for return, but with clause 4 dropped for the reasons that I stated the other day in the remarks I made to the house with regard to subsidies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suppose this is not debatable, but there is a matter of principle involved, just as there is in regard to question No. 2, which has to do with the wheat acreage reduction bonus.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have been looking into this question and the principle involved. I believe the principle to be this: if the minister will state on his responsibility as a minister that it is not in the public interest to divulge names in answer to an inquiry of this kind, he takes the responsibility and the matter stands there. That of course does not relieve the ministry of the responsibility of giving the information if some other method is adopted of asking for it. For instance I think it would not apply on a motion for a return. But I am bound to say that with some surprise I find the rule laid down in May and Bourinot could be such as I have stated.

With respect to the principle underlying question No. 2, the minister has never yet stated that it is not in the public interest to divulge these names; he has given another reason, a reason which no doubt commends itself to him, that it would not be desirable to divulge all the names to those who are seeking them for ulterior purposes. As to question No. 3, as I appreciate it the reason might be on an entirely different basis, namely, that these persons who are to be the recipients of subsidies have these subsidies more or less forced on them—I do not understand that they are applicants for subsidies, but by reason of government policy they are entitled to subsidies. I can well understand that individuals coming within the category of those who are to receive subsidies might get a good deal of undesirable publicity if their names were mentioned.

Mr. ILSLEY: The subsidies are not forced on them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But by reason of government policy they are entitled to them and must receive them if they are to continue in business.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct in most cases.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Therefore I can understand that it might prejudicially affect their business in the mind of the public. For instance a mortgage company might receive $10,000 for summer-fallowing and carrying on good husbandry. I am not saying there is such a recipient of government largesse, but there might be, and I think the two things ought to be distinguishable. We ought to be able to work out some satisfactory method which will protect the public interest and at the same time leave to hon. members some of the rights of which I am sorry to think we are being deprived.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am going to take up this matter as one concerning the privileges of the house. It seems to me that the privileges of the house are being infringed by the refusal of ministers to give information regarding the expenditure of public money. I have been looking up some authorities. I have before me Durell's "Parliamentary Grants". The case that has been made by the opposition for the presentation of accounts of the kind asked for in two of these questions is supported by the practice of the British parliament. I quote from page 2 of Durell:

> The bed-rock on which the English system is built is the principle of the maintenance by parliament of control over the grants which it makes. This can only be properly and intelligently discussed if the general principles of the whole system are understood. A preliminary consideration of the English financial system generally is therefore advisable, before dealing with the more restricted subject of control and accounting.

Then it goes on to quote the British practice regarding appropriation and accounting. Again I quote from page 4:

> The power of appropriation drew with it the necessity for estimates being regularly laid before the House of Commons, and, by exposing the management of the public revenues, has given the house not only a real and effective control over an essential branch of the executive administration, but in some measure made parliament a partaker in it.

I would like to draw particular attention to these words:

> Appropriation alone is, however, of little avail if no provision is made for securing compliance with it. The right of appropriation must be accompanied by the right of parliament to satisfy itself as to the expenditure of the money on the services for which it has been voted.

Then again we have this:

> The supreme control of the Commons over public grants, as already mentioned, necessarily demands the complete right of control over the manner in which those grants are spent.

I should like to quote what the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone said in this connection:

> It is undoubtedly the business of the House of Commons to be responsible not only for the inception of all public expenditure, but also to follow the money raised by taxation until the last farthing is accounted for.

This authority also deals with the question of withholding information from the house. It says:

Information in connection with the accounts may be required either for the purpose of testing the accuracy of the accounts—that is to say, for the verification of computation, appropriation, authorities, and regulation; or with a view to investigating the propriety of the expenditure;
or, finally, information may be required not directly connected with the accounts, but relating to the system. Information under the first head cannot be withheld by a department.

In other words it seems to me that the contention that it is the right of this house to demand an accounting of these expenditures "to the uttermost farthing" is perfectly sound and perfectly valid; for we can have no real accounting unless we know where the funds have been spent. I submit we are on sound ground in asking that these questions be answered.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question before the house, I take it, although not so stated, is in the form of a point of order with regard to the answer of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) respecting paragraph No. 4 of the third question. What the hon. member has just quoted deals with the merits of the position taken by the minister with regard to something in his department. The responsibility of course must be upon the minister, but what we have before us now is a query with regard to a question which the Minister of Finance is willing to make an order for return subject to the exclusion of part 4 of the question. We must confine ourselves to what the minister has stated. In that connection question No. 2 has already been before the house, and I recall that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in making his reply stated that it was not in the public interest, as he understood it, to give that answer. If any other hon. member wishes to speak I shall be glad to hear him, and then give my ruling.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know that the point I am going to raise in this connection is purely a point of order. But I should like to point out that the Minister of Finance seeks to stipulate the kind of question that may be passed as an order for return. He moves that this question be made an order for return on the understanding that clause 4 be dropped. We must object to that, because clause 4 is the very one which relates to the furnishing to the house of the information asked for. If we allow this clause to be dropped without a protest we shall be creating a precedent. I suggest that the proper way to proceed would be to pass this question as an order for return as it stands, and then if the minister is not satisfied he can ask that the question be amended. There would then be an opportunity for discussing it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A word as to the question of privilege which the hon. leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) has raised. The hon. member has cited from Durell the principles which govern the control by the Commons of all its grants. There can be no question at all as to the Commons having the full right to control all expenditures and the full right to a most complete examination into those expenditures. The point in question is not one of the principle involved; it is a matter of procedure, as to the time, the place and the manner in which control and examination is to be exercised and the possible harm which may result if information is given to parliament in one way rather than in another. The minister has drawn attention to the fact that if the information is presented in one form it might further ulterior purposes which hon. members of the House of Commons would not wish to have served. On the other hand, as my hon. friend knows, in committee of the whole and before other committees and at other times there is ample opportunity to have all the information requested extracted from the ministry if it is desired that this be done.

Of course the rule that governs in these matters equally is that an answer to a question cannot be insisted upon if the answer be refused by the minister on the ground of the public interest. Unquestionably that is why the answer is not being given by the minister at the present time, but that does not mean that at another time, in another place and in another way the Commons may not exercise its full control over the expenditures.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may ask a question, I do not understand that either minister has insisted on the ground which the Prime Minister has just mentioned, I believe referring to Beauchesne, which is the same as that appearing in Bourinot. I have not understood that either minister put the refusal on the express ground that it would not be in the public interest to divulge these names. If I may be permitted further—I do not know that I have any right to speak at all—I would say that if the information can be obtained in another way, perhaps in committee of the whole as the Prime Minister suggests or by some other modus operandi, is it not just a farce to say that members cannot obtain it by putting a question on the order paper? There is a principle behind all this, and I am going to ask the ministry to take it into consideration. Is it not in the public interest that we should know where public moneys are going? There can be only one answer to that.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to this matter, on April 23, 1942, at page 1881 of Hansard, I said:

> After very careful study of this subject, I have come to the conclusion that it is definitely not in the public interest currently to give the names of persons to whom subsidies are being paid, or the amount paid to each.

Then I went on to give the reasons, and continued:

> At the same time my feeling is that at the appropriate time information as to the individual recipients of subsidy payments should be given to the members of the house. I have carefully considered methods by which this can properly be done.

I went on to consider two methods, and expressed my preference for the second method. I then concluded that portion of my remarks with these words:

> My present view is that after the end of each fiscal year there should be a complete report of some kind along the lines I have indicated, and that course will be adopted unless, in the meantime, some compelling reason appears why it should not, in which case I will make a statement to the house before the end of the present session, a statement that the house will have full opportunity of debating.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I stand corrected so far as the minister is concerned. I was not here at that time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it would be of much advantage if I should give further consideration to this question; I have given so much already. I am as fully aware as any other member of the salutary effect upon public officials and upon applicants for subsidies of the knowledge that these payments may be made public at any time, or at some time. I do not regard it as an advantage to myself or to the government at all to keep these matters secret. It is not for that reason.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think anyone suggested that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps I have not made myself clear. I am not taking this position on any ground of convenience to the government, or anything of the kind. I am taking this position because, after full consideration, I do not think it would be a salutary or wholesome practice for persons in business to be able to rush in from day to day, place questions or motions on the order paper, and find out whether their competitors were getting some payments, and how much, particularly since that information cannot be given, unless accompanied by a lengthy explanation, without leaving a complete misunderstanding of the situation. That information cannot be given piece-meal without doing a great deal of harm and considerable injustice. For that reason I stated that my present view was that the information should be given as part of the whole picture, that the whole picture should be presented at once. If I find some objection to that of which I have not thought so far, I have undertaken before the end of the present session to make a statement that can be fully debated.

Mr. SPEAKER: This matter of answers to questions came up previously in the house, and perhaps it may be as well to clarify and amplify the position as much as possible now.

When the question came up whether a member could withdraw a question and what procedure he should follow, I quoted citation 355 in Beauchesne's "Parliamentary Rules and Forms", which states a ruling made by Mr. Speaker Marcil on January 13, 1910, in which he said:

> In my opinion there are only two ways in which a question can be properly withdrawn when once it has been presented for answer in the house, that is, first by written notice by the member putting the question to the clerk of the house, stating that the question is withdrawn, or by the member in his place in the house informing the Speaker that he desired the question to be dropped or withdrawn.

Now we have the question on the order paper; the minister has taken the position that he will give an order for return subject to the deletion of paragraph 4, and the point is whether or not he can be compelled to answer that question. The rule is perfectly clear. The practice here is the same as in England and, as already mentioned by the Prime Minister, citation 353 of Beauchesne states:

> An answer to a question cannot be insisted upon, if the answer be refused by the minister on the ground of public interest.

Bourinot, 13th edition, at page 314, states:

> An answer to a question cannot be insisted upon, if the answer be refused by a minister on the ground of the public interest, nor can the question be replaced upon the notice paper, nor the refusal of the minister to answer be raised as a question of privilege.

So that there has been no diminution of the powers of hon. members of the house with regard to questions. The practice which is now followed is the practice that has been followed in the past and, as I have already said, the practice which exists in the British House of Commons. When the minister, therefore, on his responsibility takes it upon himself not to answer a question because of the public interest, an answer to the question cannot be insisted upon. There is nothing before the Chair and the Chair is not obliged to give a decision. All that happens is that the question is dropped and the next question called.

Question passed as an order for return with the deletion of paragraph 4.

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION BONUS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. What are the names and addresses of the persons to whom cheques were issued, (a) for over $10,000, (b) for $5,000 to $10,000 on wheat acreage reduction bonus?
2. How were the amounts made up?
3. How much did each receive?

Mr. GARDINER: When this question was called a moment ago I asked that it stand. Now I should like to have it dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister asked that the question stand, and I am going to ask to have it stand, on the theory that later he may not think it is not in the public interest to give the answer.

Mr. GARDINER: I thought I had said and argued on two previous occasions that it was not in the public interest to answer. I state now that it is not in the public interest to give the answer.

Mr. HAZEN: Before this question is dropped I should like the opportunity to say a few words about it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is in the hon. member's name; he should be allowed to speak on it.

Mr. HAZEN: I put this question on the order paper over a month ago. The Minister of Agriculture on a number of occasions has objected to answering it. In view of the position he took I thought it might be advisable for me to withdraw it, but on giving the matter further consideration I came to the conclusion that I should not do so.

The information for which I asked means the publication of the names and addresses of 7 persons, and the particulars as to the amount each of them received. I do not know the total amount those 7 persons received, but I believe it is well over $50,000.

I was under the impression when I asked the question that those 7 persons were farmers, but from the statement made in the house a few days ago by the Minister of Agriculture it appears that 2 of them were corporations. This, it seems to me, is another reason why the question should be answered.

The other day the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar said he had asked for information on the floor of the house about some of the men in the lower brackets who had received these subsidies, and that he had been given the information. I do not believe that creates a precedent, because I do not think it is necessary to create a precedent in this matter. We are dealing here with the well-established principle that the government and the ministers thereof must account for public moneys passing through their hands.

A reply to this question involves the publication of only 7 names, not 186,000. I would point out that until January 31, 1941, the enormous sum of nearly $26,000,000 was paid to 186,000 farmers—and, it now appears, corporations—under the wheat acreage reduction bonus plan passed by order in council on April 30, 1941. In my opinion, while a good deal of clerical work, a good deal of departmental work and a good deal of time might be involved if the question were asked—and it has not been asked—as to details of that enormous amount of money, there is no sound principle upon which there could be a refusal to furnish information of that kind.

I believe there are only two grounds on which information respecting the expenditure of public moneys can be refused by the government. One is that such information would not be in the public interest; the other, which arises in wartime, and which is probably included in the first one, is that to furnish it would afford information of value to the enemy.

It cannot be argued that the answer to the question I have asked would afford information of value to the enemy, and I do not think it can be seriously argued that it is not in the public interest for the government to give a complete accounting of the manner in which it spends the money it obtains by taxation and loans from the people of Canada. It cannot be argued that it is not in the public interest for the people's representatives in the House of Commons to know the names of the individuals who are paid money by the government, why they are paid that money, and how much each receives.

When the house passed the War Measures Act in 1914—

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member's explanation. I did wish that he should have an opportunity to speak on the question appearing under his name on the order paper. I did not expect, however, that he would develop an argument with regard to the merit of the minister's refusal. After all, that is a matter for which the minister must take the responsibility. As I have already said, I am bound by the rule under which the minister has now stated that in the public interest he is not prepared to give that information. I am bound by the rules of the house, and I shall have to rule that question No. 2 must be dropped from the order paper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As I understand it, Your Honour has now ruled that question No. 2 should be dropped. I believe this matter ought to be settled, so far as we can settle anything here. Therefore I am under the obligation of respectfully appealing from Your Honour's ruling. I should like to indicate that my appeal is not intended to involve any reflection upon Your Honour, but is taken as the only means of expressing our dissatisfaction with the position taken that the information sought in this question should not be given.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, before the question is put may I say, as I have said on earlier occasions when this matter has been discussed, that there is no objection on my part or on the part of the government to giving the information sought, to hon. members, or, under conditions or circumstances other than those involved in the asking of this question, to a committee of the house, to the public accounts committee or to any other body set up for the purpose of obtaining such information. The objection raised is to the publication in Hansard, as a result of answering this question, of a list of names and the amount paid to those individuals. The reason for the objection is that requests have been made to the department for lists for collection purposes. Those lists may not have been exactly the same as these, but there have been similar lists, sometimes involving one group of people, and sometimes another. We have always objected to giving such lists. To have a question asked in the house and a list of this kind published is an indirect way of getting that information. I have stated I do not think it is in the public interest to have lists of that kind published, and therefore I have suggested that the question should not be answered.

Mr. HOMUTH: It is an expenditure of public money.

Mr. GARDINER: If the house desires to have the information with regard to those seven or eight persons, and will permit my giving it, without in any way involving the necessity of answering similar questions with regard to a long list of people from among the 186,000, I have no objection to giving it, and can give it at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER: The leader of the opposition has raised the question of appealing from the ruling of the Chair. I would point out that at the present time we are dealing, not with a point of order, but only with a question which, under the rules of the house and in view of the answer given by the minister, should be dropped. I therefore proceed to the next question. There can be no appeal against such ruling.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then on a question of privilege may I not appeal from the ruling?

Mr. SPEAKER: No, not even on a question of privilege.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I suggest to the minister that he give us the names of these seven or eight people now, and the thing will be over with. A matter of principle is involved and the government must take the responsibility.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have pointed out already that Bourinot states that an answer to a question cannot be insisted upon if the answer be refused by a minister on the ground of the public interest, nor can the question be replaced upon the order paper after a refusal by a minister to answer, nor can the refusal of the minister to answer be raised as a question of privilege.

Mr. POULIOT: Permit me, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: Question No. 2, Mr. Hazen, is dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Before it is actually dropped, I would point out that the minister has offered to give us the names. Let us have the names.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Did I not understand the minister to say that he is willing to give the names? The question should not be dropped if he is willing to do that. In view of the Prime Minister's statement, it is merely a matter of how the information will be given.

Mr. GARDINER: I did state that I was willing to give it now. I think probably it would be better if we agreed to the Speaker's ruling. I can give this information without prejudice and without establishing a precedent, on the orders of the day.

Mr. POULIOT: I have only one thing to point out. Bourinot has been quoted, but Doctor Beauchesne's book contains the rules of the house. When Bourinot's treatise was published, the public accounts were completed and—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Question dropped.

SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS ALLOWANCES

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Have any changes in policy been made recently in deciding what allowances shall be made to soldiers' dependents?

2. Are such changes based upon alleged differences in the cost-of-living indexes in localities where soldiers' dependents reside?

3. Have dependents of volunteers serving in the Canadian forces, West Indies, had their dependents' allowances reduced recently? If so, what were the former allowances? What are the new allowances, (a) to wives, (b) to children, (c) to dependents?

4. Does the government approve of drastic reductions to dependents of men who came to Canada to volunteer at their own expense?

5. If reductions in dependents' allowances are being made by the board, is it the policy of the government to pay dependents' allowances in accordance with the cost-of-living indexes of standards of living in different parts of Canada including Indian reserves?

6. Does the government consider that discrimination against certain classes of men serving in the armed forces would be conducive to the morale of our people, or beneficial to our war effort?

Mr. RALSTON: I spoke to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar about this question, and I think in view of the statement I made yesterday with regard to this matter of dependents' allowances the hon. member is willing that the question be dropped.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am agreeable to the question being dropped. The minister answered it in committee yesterday.

Question dropped.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATION IN THE UNITED STATES

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Have arrangements been made to have Canada represented on the munitions assignments board at Washington?

2. If so, who will represent Canada?

3. Did the Prime Minister while in Washington make arrangements for improvement of Canadian war information facilities in the United States?

4. Have any changes been made in respect to the duties and personnel of the Canadian legation at Washington?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1 and 2. Arrangements to this end are in progress.

3. This matter was taken up by the Prime Minister during his recent visit to Washington and is continuing to receive attention.

4. No.

CATTLE

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East):

1. What was the total number of cattle (a) in Canada, (b) in Alberta on the 1st April in each of the last ten years?

2. What was the amount of beef in store in Canada on the same date in each of the last ten years?

3. What was the total number of cattle exported from Canada (a) to the United States, (b) to countries other than the United States in each of the last ten years?

4. What number of cattle were marketed in Alberta in each of the last ten years?

5. What number of the cattle marketed in Alberta in each of the last ten years were beef cattle?

6. What was the total tonnage of beef cattle marketed in Canada in each of the last ten years?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. The total number of cattle on farms in Canada and Alberta at June 1, 1932* to 1941, inclusive, was as follows:

	(a) Alberta	(b) Canada
1932	1,223,600	8,529,700

EMPIRE WAR CABINET

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Did Canada object to the government of Great Britain creating an empire war cabinet as in the last war?

2. What stand did Canada take in the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The question as to the advisability of creating an imperial war cabinet has, at different times, been a subject of consideration and consultation between the governments of the several nations of the commonwealth. No formal proposal was made by the government of Great Britain.

The Canadian government expressed the view that the methods of consultation which have come into existence since the last war were more effective as a means of reaching conclusions and decisions as between the several governments of the commonwealth than those afforded by an imperial war cabinet would be. It was also represented that under war conditions it was inadvisable for the prime ministers of the several dominions to be absent from their own countries for any length of time.

CANADIANS INTERNED IN EIRE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many Canadians of His Majesty's forces are now interned in Eire, and for what reason?

2. Have any representations been made to the government in Dublin for the release of them, and what is the reason for their internment?

3. Do we still retain a minister in Eire?

4. If so, for what object and purpose, at what cost and who are the personnel of this office?

5. What action will be taken regarding the internment of Flying Officer Jack Calder of the Royal Canadian Air Force?

6. Will any steps be taken to secure his release and the release of all other Canadians so interned in Eire?

7. Have any representations been made with reference to the use of the Eire bases by the government or her allies, on behalf of Canada?

8. If so, what are they?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. There are nine Canadian airmen interned in Eire. Two of these are members of the Royal Air Force and seven are members of the Royal Canadian Air Force. The government of Eire in accordance with their policy of neutrality have followed the practice of interning any members of the armed forces of the belligerent countries on either side who, while engaged in operations, have landed in Eire.

2. Beyond the answer to No. 1, it is not considered advisable that a statement should be made at the present time.

3. Canada is represented in Dublin by a High Commissioner.

4. The function of the Canadian High Commissioner is to represent the Canadian government and to conduct negotiations with the government of Eire. The cost of maintaining the office of the High Commissioner for Canada in Dublin for the year 1941-42 was approximately $24,000.00. Mr. John D. Kearney is High Commissioner. The following is the personnel of the High Commissioner's office: secretary, office of the High Commissioner, Mr. E. J. Garland; stenographer, Miss E. O'Malley; clerk-messenger, Mr. P. Beirne; janitor, Mr. W. Murray.

5. Answered by No. 2.

6. Answered by No. 2.

7. It is not deemed in the public interest to give any information at the present time with respect to representations made or not made on behalf of Canada concerning bases in Eire.

8. Answered by No. 7.

WORKERS' REGISTRATION FORMS

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. Have employers the approval of the government for using mimeographed copies in lieu of official registration forms for workers?

2. Has the government any means of ascertaining whether the information given by workers on mimeographed forms is correctly transferred to official forms forwarded to the department?

3. Has the government considered the extent to which the practice of using these mimeographed forms may lead to abuses?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. Under order in council 1955 of March 13, 1942, the employer is responsible for the registration of his employees on forms provided by the unemployment insurance commission. The method of obtaining the required information from employees is left to the employer.

2. The information given by the employer must agree with the pay-roll and the unemployment insurance commission has developed a system of inspection to check the pay-rolls and the accuracy of the official registration forms.

3. Penalties are provided for non-compliance with the regulations of the unemployment insurance commission, and any information given on the registration forms will be subject to the close scrutiny of the insurance inspectors.

RENFREW COUNTY DOLOMITE DEPOSITS

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. On what date, or dates, did Mr. Robert Jowsey and Mr. Walter Sedgsworth carry on and finally consummate their arrangements to develop the Renfrew county dolomite deposits under the sponsorship of the government?

2. What cash investment, if any, have the directors of Wartime Metals, Limited, in this particular company (Wartime Metals Limited)?

3. What salary, if any, do they receive for their services?

4. In what manner, or proportion are the shares of Wartime Metals Limited, distributed?

5. What is the name of the government official, or officials, who negotiated with Messrs. Jowsey and Sedgsworth, in respect to the government's investment in the development and processing of the dolomite deposits in Renfrew county.

Mr. HOWE:

1. The "Go-Ahead" letter authorizing Dominion Magnesium Limited to proceed with the construction of the initial plant of the Dominion Magnesium Limited project in Renfrew county is dated January 13, 1942, and was addressed to Dominion Magnesium Limited and signed by the deputy minister, Department of Munitions and Supply. Prior to this, several conversations took place, the first official interview being between Mr. Robert Jowsey, President of Dominion Magnesium Limited, and the Minister of Munitions and Supply, on November 1, 1941.

2. The directors of Wartime Metals Corporation have no cash investment in this corporation.

3. None.

4. Wartime Metals Corporation is a wholly-owned government company. It is incorporated under Part II of Dominion Companies Act and does not have shares.

5. Mr. G. C. Bateman, Metals Controller.

JAPANESE NATIONALS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. REID:

Is it the intention of the government to remove all Japanese in the coastal areas of British Columbia to east of the Cascade mountains?

Mr. MITCHELL: Confirming statement already made on Thursday last which appears in Hansard page 1866 and in reply to the hon. member's question, the movement of Japanese from the coastal area in British dian Red Cross society or to the International

The responsibility for working out the details has been placed with the British Columbia security commission and already over two thousand males have been placed in work camps in the interior of British Columbia and on the trans-Canada highway in Ontario. The movement of 500 families to Alberta for cultivation of sugar beets and the same number to Manitoba is well in hand and within a very short time the transfer of these 1,000 families or approximately 6,000 individuals will have been completed.

Buildings in four abandoned mining towns in the interior of British Columbia are being repaired and made ready for the housing of women and children and just as soon as the repairs are completed a large group of women and children will be sent to these locations.

The movement of all Japanese from Vancouver island and from the vicinity of harbours and other especially vulnerable points has been completed.

It is the intention of the government, as stated on Thursday last, to proceed with the movement rapidly and I believe it can fairly be said that very satisfactory progress has been made and the problem is well on the way to solution.

LORETTEVILLE, QUE., AIRPORT

Mr. ROY:

1. Did the government purchase land since 1938 for an airport at Loretteville, Quebec?

2. If so, (a) what land was purchased, (b) what are the names and addresses of persons from whom this land was purchased, (c) how much was paid to each person for such land and when were payments made?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. Acquisition of land for Lorette airfield, Quebec:

PRISONERS OF WAR IN JAPAN

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What arrangements have been made by the government to insure that Canadian prisoners of war now in Japanese hands will receive the services of the Red Cross and the protection of a neutral power?

2. What is the number of Canadian prisoners now in Japan, upon what work are they engaged, and what medical services are given them in the way of hospitalization, food or other rations?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: 1. It is not clear whether the first question refers to the Canadian Red Cross society or to the International Red Cross committee.

The Canadian government have been in frequent touch with the International Red Cross committee at Geneva which have instructed their delegate in Japan to do everything possible to secure information about Canadians, and, whether civilians or combatants, to assist Canadians in Japanese hands. The committee has already transmitted a report on conditions in an internment camp for civilians in Japan and has transmitted some communications concerning Canadians in Japan and Shanghai where the Japanese government is in control.

Up to the present the International Red Cross delegate in Japan has not been able to transmit any communications to or to receive information about Canadian nationals, whether prisoners of war, interned civilians, or others, in territories such as Hong Kong where the Japanese military authorities are in control.

Both the delegate of the International Red Cross committee and the representative of the protecting power for Canadian interests in Japan have transmitted lists of Canadian nationals interned there. Next of kin of all persons on these lists have been informed and the list was published in the press several weeks ago.

The Canadian Red Cross Society has already provided food parcels for British and Canadian prisoners of war in Germany. Arrangements are being made to extend this service to Hong Kong and also to provide clothing, medical supplies and other necessities for prisoners of war and civilian internees in the Hong Kong area, as soon as it may become possible to send them forward. These arrangements involve correspondence between the various governments and National Red Cross Societies concerned, and negotiations through the protecting power and International Red Cross committee. As they have not yet been completed, it is not thought advisable that information about them should be made public at this stage.

2. So far as is known there are no Canadian prisoners of war in Japan. There appear to be about 70 Canadian civilians interned there but they are not classed as prisoners of war. Information so far received appears to indicate that the interned civilians are being employed only on work in connection with the maintenance of the camps. No official reports have been received about Canadian prisoners of war in Hong Kong. The Minister of National Defence has given to parliament statistics of the members of the Canadian forces who were in Hong Kong before the Japanese invasion and of a report which had been received on the number of casualties. Information received from diverse scources appears to indicate that there are about 2,000 Canadians including members of the armed forces and civilians interned in Hong Kong and Kowloon by the Japanese. It does not appear that any of the Canadians detained by the Japanese in Hong Kong and Kowloon are being employed by the Japanese although it may be assumed that they are doing work about their camps. No definite information is available on medical services and hospitalization, although reports received from various sources would indicate that medical services and hospitalization are inadequate. No information is available from official sources on food rations being supplied but information from China which has reached the government indicates that the food situation is unsatisfactory, the staple diet provided the prisoners being soup and rice. It is reported that some additional food supplies can be purchased by prisoners and internees but no information as to the amounts or kinds is as yet available.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

PRICE CEILING—SUBSIDIES

Mr. HAZEN:

1. On what goods and materials, domestic and imported, are subsidies now being paid?

2. What subsidy is paid on each kind of goods and materials?

3. How much has been paid to date on each kind of goods and materials?

PRICE CEILING—BEEF

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the government any statement to make to the house on the beef situation?

2. Have complaints been received that the price ceilings have been exceeded?

3. If so, what action will be taken?

4. Have any subsidies or bonuses been paid? If so, to whom?

5. Do speeches made by the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board herein, and orders made by the board represent government policy?

6. Were the orders and speeches first approved by the government?

Mr. ILSLEY: As this question involves more than one department it should be made an order for return, subject to the latter part of clause 4 being dropped, for the reasons mentioned in connection with question No. 3.

SOLDIERS' DEPENDENTS—COST OF LIVING BONUS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Will the government reconsider the whole question of paying a high cost of living bonus to dependents of his majesty's forces?

2. What boards have been set up in each military district to give effect to the veterans' assistance regulations adopted last November?

3. What amount of money has been paid out at Toronto, military district No. 2, for such work, how many have applied, how much has been paid out and to what number of dependents?

Mr. McLARTY: Return tabled.

TEMPORARY BUILDINGS ERECTED SINCE OUTBREAK OF WAR

Mr. ESLING:

1. Since the outbreak of war how many temporary buildings have been erected by the government for war purposes?

2. Where are such buildings located and how are they designated?

3. What was the cost of each building?

4. What temporary buildings are now under construction and what is the estimated cost of each?

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to speak to the hon. member about this. I really do not think the hon. member intended to ask the question as it now stands. The first clause reads, "Since the outbreak of the war how many temporary buildings have been erected by the government for war purposes?" I rather think that what the hon. member had in mind was temporary buildings erected for administrative purposes. To answer the question as it now stands would mean the taking of a census of all the buildings erected in camps all over the country. There are at least sixty training centres in connection with the army and I imagine there must be 125 establishments of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the hon. member meant to limit it to Ottawa.

Mr. RALSTON: Administrative buildings, I should think.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I imagine so.

Mr. RALSTON: It will be noted that this question is being passed as an order for return, subject to the amendment that it applies only to administrative buildings in Ottawa.

PLEBISCITE—PERCENTAGE OF ELIGIBLE ELECTORS VOTING

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. How many names were on the lists of people eligible to vote on the plebiscite?

2. How many of these people voted on the plebiscite?

PLEBISCITE—COSTS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. What was the total cost of the plebiscite?

2. What was the cost of the radio broadcasts on the plebiscite for. (a) chains, (b) individual stations?

3. How much did J. H. Fitzgerald and his firm receive for their work on the plebiscite?

4. What was the cost of the printing in connection with the plebiscite?

5. How much did the work done by the Department of National War Services through the information bureau on the plebiscite cost?

6. What are the names of all persons employed by the national plebiscite commission?

7. How much did each receive in, (a) salary, (b) expenses, (c) travelling expenses?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

COMMODITY PRICES STABILIZATION CORPORATION

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing—1. A list of the price ceiling subsidies issued, the estimated amount of same and on what articles, or in what trade and commerce.

2. A list of the members of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, a list of their chief officers, servants and agents, showing where they are located, the number thereof, together with their salaries and other allowances.

3. Estimated cost of one year of maintaining the ceiling prices staff herein, and the aggregate number of officials and total payroll.

4. The estimated cost per annum of the operation of this corporation.

5. The walks of business life that are not yet supervised or directed by any departments of state.

6. What training the members of this corporation and their chief officials have had in actual trade or commerce, or in a competitive business.

7. What minister of the crown is responsible to parliament for the work of this corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think that there is any objection to this provided that the request for a list of the price ceiling subsidies issued is interpreted as meaning a list of the articles or classes of articles upon which subsidies are paid rather than a list of the names of the recipients. Subject to that, I think it is in order.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order. I should like to direct the attention of the Chair to the authorities which I quoted in the house on this very matter on March 26, 1942, as reported on page 1807 of Hansard. Some of our rules apply to this question, but there is a summary rule which says that where our rules do not apply, we are bound by the rules and regulations of the British parliament on questions and motions for papers. I will read the authority. It is only about ten lines.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that the minister is agreeable to the order passing subject to the interpretation he has given.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not want any amendment made, and I have the authorities to support my contention. The rules of the British parliament bind this house because the last clause of our rules provides that where they are not specific with regard to a point, the rules and regulations of the British parliament shall apply. Here is the authority; it is only ten lines in length.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I read the following:

> Not later than three o'clock the question hour begins. This is a more important item of business than any yet described. It is expected to provide lively moments and seems to be of unfailing interest to members and the public. It is modern and affords a useful method of supervising the administration of the government. Its effectiveness is generally recognized. Questions "turn a searchlight upon every corner of the public service." (Lowell, i. 332.) Their chief object is "the explanation to the public of the meaning of political events," and "they are often arranged by the government itself, so as to give them an opportunity of making announcements in a somewhat informal way."

We are entitled to this information as asked.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not accept the amendment and I ask for a statement of the authorities on the point. We are not here to play. I have raised an important principle, the control of expenditures under the minister, because the minister is responsible for this board. I ask for your ruling on the point of order. I do not accept the amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The motion is not debatable. It has been placed before the house and has been carried.

MOBILIZATION OF INDIANS

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of the legal opinions given to the Department of National War Services relative to the mobilization of Indians.

VULCAN, ALTA., LEGION BUILDING

Mr. HANSELL:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, agreements and other documents exchanged between the government or any department thereof, and any person or persons in respect to the renting of space in the Canadian Legion building at Vulcan, Alberta.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S WARRANTS

Mr. McGREGOR:

For a copy of all governor general's warrants issued since the 31st of March, 1941.

1941 VICTORY LOAN

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing—1. How much of the 1941 victory loan is general savings, and how much is bank and insurance companies created credit.

2. The ratio of the total amount raised, subscribed by, (a) banks, insurance and other companies, (b) private individuals.

3. The details of a breakdown of the 1941 victory loan.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that this motion stand, and I would suggest to the hon. member that he redraft it because it is ambiguous as it stands and I would not know how to comply with an order for a return if it passed.

Question 1 asks how much of the 1941 victory loan is general savings. There is no way of telling what proportion is general savings. It occurred to me that the hon. member may have meant genuine savings, rather than general, but even that would be hard to answer. The latter half of this question is also difficult to understand unless it means how much of the loan was purchased by banks and insurance companies. If that is what is meant, this information was given in answer to a question by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) which appears at page 4463 of Hansard of 1941-42. If the hon. member refers to bonds financed on the official instalment plan or by loans from chartered banks, this information was also given in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Battle River.

Question 2 has already been answered, the information having been given in reply to the question by the member for Battle River.

Question 3 should be more specific. The word "breakdown" may refer to provinces.

In its present form it would be impossible to decide what information was desired, and so I suggest that the hon. member read what I have said about his motion, redraft it and put it on the order paper again. In the meantime I ask that it stand.

Motion stands.

WAR EXPENDITURES

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein, and that notwithstanding standing order 65 the committee shall consist of twenty-four members, as follows: Messrs. Abbott, Bercovitch, Black (Cumberland), Boucher, Bradette, Chevrier, Cleaver, Douglas (Weyburn), Fournier (Hull), Gladstone, Golding, Graham, Harris (Danforth), Homuth, Johnston (Bow River), Macdonald (Halifax), Mayhew, McIlraith, Picard, Pottier, Reid, Ross (Moose Jaw), Sissons, Winkler, with power to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses and to report from time to time to the house.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution is identical with the one which I moved a year ago, and is similar in all particulars to the resolution with respect to war expenditures which was adopted at Westminster, and which has been the basis of any inquiries which have been made with regard to war expenditures in Great Britain. The only change in this resolution from the previous one is that the name of Mr. Boucher is substituted for that of Mr. Diefenbaker, and that of Mr. Homuth for Mr. Green, and Mr. Winkler for Mr. Thorson.

The committee appointed last year made several reports to the house during the last session. At one time I thought of including in this resolution some of the additional powers which were given to last year's committee in accordance with its requests from time to time, but upon reflection it seemed preferable to introduce the resolution exactly as it was introduced a year ago. No doubt the committee at its first meeting will ask the house to renew the additional powers given to it last year.

When I introduced the original resolution I made a comprehensive survey of British procedure, cited numerous British precedents, and generally sought to give to the house an expression of the British attitude in dealing with this all-important matter of public expenditures relating to the war. I do not intend to-day to repeat what I said at that time. There is no necessity for doing so, because it appears on Hansard.

I should like on behalf of the government to take this opportunity to thank members of all parties who served on the committee last year for the sustained and devoted labour given piece-meal without doing a great deal

I have no doubt that the members who are to be on the committee this year will find through membership on the committee as did the members last year an opportunity for service of the highest character to the country at this particular time.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have no doubt that the members of the war expenditures committee will have a very ungrateful task before them. Its work will be tremendous if the committee goes into all expenditures by war departments.

There is one thing I do not understand. It is that the public accounts committee has been nominated each year for the last eleven years, and yet has not sat in all that time. I do not see the use of appointing a public accounts committee that does not sit. I would point out that during the last war in particular all these matters of war expenditures were studied by the public accounts committee, and its reports were made public.

If we are to follow the Westminster practice, I do not see why we should not have a committee on national economy to study items of expenditure in the war departments as well as in the others. There is a great difference between our new system and that at Westminster and also the system in the United States congress. At Westminster they have complete public accounts, and at Washington the estimates, which they call the budget, are given in a book as large as the telephone directory of the city of New York. Here we give much simpler information, and I wonder whether the public accounts commiteee will be called to do something with regard to public expenditures.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): There are two observations I desire to make in respect of this motion for the setting up of this committee. The first is that the proceedings of the committee should be published on every occasion and be open to the public and the press. The second is that there should be no limitation or restriction of the power of the committee to investigate any and every contract which it might wish to investigate.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): I have been named on this committee to replace the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). I am quite willing to accept that responsibility because I consider that this committee can do good work; but I accept the responsibility as a member of the committee from the point of view not so much of trying to find out whether we are getting No. 2 apples for No. 1, or whether we are getting cow beef for the beef specified in the contract, but in the belief that if the committee is going to deal with the idea of Canada going into an all-out war effort, we must realize that there are a great many industries in the country which to-day are producing nothing in the way of war materials. They are not producing these materials because in the early part of the war the government paid for the tooling up of certain industries to produce certain commodities which we needed. To-day we let our contracts by tender, and we do so because we think it is the proper thing to do. The industries that were tooled up are able now to underbid industries that never made any of those products, with the result that the industries originally making these products are crowded with orders and it is impossible to produce the amount they ought to turn out, whereas a good many non-essential industries which to-day ought to be doing the same thing are not doing it because the government or the departments—and I find no fault—feel that it would be wrong for them not to ask for tenders, and that they must accept the lowest tenders. I suggest that in view of the vote on Monday, in view of the fact that to-day we are engaged in an all-out war effort, we must make up our minds. It is not a question of the cost of one or two cents on a unit that costs $2.50 or $4 or $5. It is a question of putting all the effort of our man-power and every machine into the war work in which we are engaged. I am one of those who are not prepared to find fault with the government if they say to industry, "It is going to cost a little more to produce things in your industry than the cost of the lowest tender, but we have to get the goods we need."

Our idea in studying these matters in the committee is not that of trying to uncover scandal or some things that might hurt the government, because I am not interested in that, much as I should like to see them out of office. I am concerned with the war effort, and I feel that the committee could do better work—I am not saying this to belittle what was done in the past—by trying to work with the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and other ministers of the government in an endeavour to put the whole industrial force of the country behind the war effort, instead of going ahead as we are doing today, perhaps giving some industries far more business than they can handle, while other industries which are more or less non-essential are not doing any job for the war. It is with that proviso that I accept the responsibility as a member of this committee.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): As a member of last year's committee during the latter part of the year, I think that in spite of the limitations under which they laboured they did a good job. In the fields which they examined they went into the matter quite thoroughly and, I think, presented to this house something of a comprehensive report on the subjects into which they had inquired. In that regard, I say, they did a good job. But I rise primarily in order to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to interpret to the house the order of reference in this particular resolution.

Last year, I remember, there was some discussion as to what the powers of the committee really were, and it was contended that we were to inquire into defence services and to report what, if any, economies, consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government, might be effected therein and that, therefore, we were limited in certain respects by the order of reference. It seems to me that if this committee is going to be useful this year, it should go into the much wider and more important field of the department which is providing the supplies for the defence departments. I refer particularly to the Department of Munitions and Supply.

If this order of reference is sufficient to enable the committee to deal adequately with all matters which they may wish to examine in connection with the operations of the Department of Munitions and Supply, then I am satisfied with the order; if on the other hand the committee is to be narrowed down to the recommendation of economies which may be effected in relation to the three defence services, then I contend that this committee is not going to do the job which really must be done this year. I feel that we have reached the stage in Canada, where, without endeavouring only to uncover scandals or anything of that sort, we ought to look into the operations of the department which is making large expenditures in relation to the provision of supplies for the army, the navy, the air force and in other fields.

I am—and I state it quite frankly—alarmed at the state of things in this country. Since the war broke out we have seen powerful industrialists, and those who serve powerful industrialists and monopolies, placed in key positions in connection with the purchase of supplies and the control of the economic side of our war effort. I do not believe that is wise or good. I do not believe it is wise, because it undermines the confidence of the great masses of the people in what is being done in this country. I have heard it stated over and over again by people of quite moderate views, not extremists by any means, that when they look at the names of the people who surround the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) they wonder whether the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and all their friends are not assembled in that department. I think I said in the house during the debate on the address that in my opinion this was dangerous to the country; that if our war effort is to be properly and effectively controlled in a manner that will command and retain the confidence of the Canadian people, then much wider representation should be given in the control of these economic organizations. I am thoroughly of opinion that this war expenditures committee this year—without any reflection whatsoever on the minister or those employed in the department—ought thoroughly to investigate the operations of that department. I think it is our obligation to do this.

I quoted a little while ago from Durell's "Parliamentary Grants," and one of the most interesting sections in that authoritative volume deals with grants made by parliament in wartime. It deals with the experiences of the British in the South African war, and deals particularly with their experiences during the great war. The book itself is dedicated to the Right Hon. David Lloyd George, and much of it was written during the last great war. It points out that it is the duty of the civil authority to examine very carefully all expenditures made in connection with the operation of war. It says, and rightly, that war is an extravagant business, a wasteful business, even if it is a necessary business; that during wartime the normal peace controls must be removed; that decisions have to be made quickly, some of them involving perhaps certain expenditures which are necessary but which turn out later on to be extravagances; that it is more essential in wartime than in peacetime that every detail of public expenditure should be thoroughly scrutinized.

I have been following with some degree of interest the work of the committee in the United States. I do not know what the condition is in our own country in regard to the power of some of these great organizations which are so well represented in the Department of Munitions and Supply. But I have read of the attitude of the Standard Oil company, of the situation created by the steel corporation, the aluminum company, the great corporations of the United States and so forth. I think it is the duty of this House of Commons to make sure that nothing of that kind has happened or is happening here. That ought to be one of the duties of a committee of this kind. Its scope should not be narrowed down as some of us understood it was last year.

Mr. THORSON: There was no restriction whatsoever upon the scope of the committee's work.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would say to the minister, who was chairman of the committee last year, that quite often it was said it was not the business of our sub-committee to go into the Department of Munitions and Supply and particular contracts.

Mr. THORSON: There was an inquiry into the Department of Munitions and Supply, and it was indicated later on that there would be the fullest opportunity of making any inquiry that the committee might wish to make into the operations of that department. There was no restriction last year; there will be no restriction this year.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to know there will be no restriction this year. I know of no investigation being made into that department last year, although I think the members of the committee were all agreed that when the committee sat again that should be its principal job. I am urging that if there is any doubt as to the meaning of this order of reference it should be clarified, so that we may have a clear understanding that the committee this year may devote the major portion of its time to a study of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) raised the question of the public accounts committee. That is a peace-time organization. That committee should be sitting all the time to examine our normal peacetime expenditures. The committee which it is now proposed to set up is a special war committee to examine expenditures in connection with the war. Of course I recognize immediately that there are certain questions regarding the provision of supplies for the army, such, for example, as the number of guns, number of tanks, number of aeroplanes, the places where they are, the cost of them and so on, that, if answered openly in this house, might give information of value to the enemy. But it seems to me that there is no reason in the world why a committee of this house should not go quite thoroughly into the matter of expenditures for the provision of equipment.

I am therefore in support of this resolution. But I urge that this year there shall be no doubt as to what the committee is going to do —I will put it that way—that instead of dividing the committee into three subcommittees to look into three parts of the war services, the committee make it its main business, its entire business if you will, this session, to look into the expenditures and operations of the Department of Munitions and Supply and the contracts that hon. members would wish to examine that have been and are being let by that department. At the same time I suggest that the committee think over carefully the large expenditures that have been made by this government and with the British government in their establishment of government-owned industries in this country, so that we may understand how they are controlled and what the implications of those controls may be for the future; for there is vividly in my mind a recollection of a suggestion made that even during the process of this war a committee of business men might examine those organizations and might recommend how they shall be salvaged when the war ends. I think it is the duty of this parliament to see, not how these new industries and new plants can be salvaged after the war but how they may be utilized for the good of the Canadian people when the time comes; and that meantime this country should be protected against those who consciously or unconsciously on account of their economic interests are anxious to see that their interests rather than the interests of the great masses of the people of this country are protected.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): In rising to speak to this motion, having been a member of the committee that sat last year I should like to make a few remarks and perhaps a few suggestions for the consideration of hon. members who will comprise the committee this coming year.

I must say I was a little surprised at the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) with respect to restrictions on the work of this committee. I well remember my first experience with this committee, when I asked definitely as to the scope of its work. I recognized that all war expenditures were not mentioned in the little stereotyped programme that was handed to us, and I asked the chairman of the committee, the present Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), whether or not we had a right to investigate all war expenditures. I used this illustration: "I do not notice ships mentioned in this little programme. Have we the right to investigate the money that has been spent in the construction of ships?" The minister replied, "Yes, we have the right to go into any war expenditures."

Even at that, the point is not that we do not have the right to go into any sort of war expenditures whatever. The point is that we do not have time to go into these matters. For instance, this committee has not met, I think, during the last nine months. It was not set up until late in the session; after the session was concluded it adjourned for a couple of weeks, then came back and sat for five or perhaps six weeks. Then it adjourned again and nothing has been done until now. As a result, though the committee was divided into three subcommittees, I am sure all those who served on the committee will agree that we only began to touch the mere fringe of war expenditures in this country. The subcommittee on which I served had the opportunity to investigate expenditures in respect to the medical services of the various branches of the Department of National Defence. Well, I am sure we only touched the fringe of that subject. We had the right to investigate expenditures in relation to salvage. We did not even get into that question. We had the right to investigate expenditures in respect to gasoline and oil, but we did not even get into that matter. If this committee is to be of any value at all to this house and the country, if it is to accomplish that which it should be designed to accomplish, it will have to work hard and long, and will have to remain in session almost three hundred and sixty-five days in the year.

In dealing with the work of this committee, Mr. Speaker, and also with the work of the committee that is about to be set up, I wish to say a word in respect to secret sessions, or sessions held in camera. It seems to me that this sort of thing is becoming more or less a joke. We speak of sitting behind closed doors, but we might just as well throw the doors wide open and let the public in. If we have any objection to letting the public in, however, I suggest that we might just as well let the press in. I am sure the representatives of the press would play ball with us. If there should be a little bit of evidence of such a nature that we could not possibly let it go out, I am confident those men would say, "All right; that is off the record, and we will not print it". Some of us regarded these sessions as being secret, only to find after a few days, a few weeks or a month or two that information coming from some source appeared in the newspapers and periodicals of this country in bold type. I have here a clipping which I took from a newspaper. You cannot read it, Mr. Speaker, but you can see that it includes several columns, and it contains a report of the work of this committee. I do not know how that got out, when the committee was supposed to be sitting behind closed doors. I might mention another occasion, when none other than Air Commodore R. W. Ryan, who was director of the Royal Canadian Air Force medical services, was on the stand. That afternoon the press were excluded, and I recall that Air Commodore Ryan said, "Now, I am giving you something that is absolutely confidential". I need not mention what it was, but we regarded it as confidential and treated it as such. The committee concluded its work in August, I believe, and on November 25 there appeared in the press a report almost a column in length, dealing with that afternoon session. Someone must have had access to the records. They must have gone to the office where the records were kept, taken out the records, looked them over and reported upon them.

I have no particular objection to these matters being reported. My point is simply that if a session is regarded as secret by all of us, then somebody somewhere is breaking confidence. I might mention as a further illustration another committee which sat about a year ago. A secret document was brought before the committee by an officer from the Department of Justice. He would not even let that document out of his hands. He would not permit it to be passed around. It was something that he had received from a foreign legation here. But what happened? We regarded it as secret, but not long afterward a certain member of this house read that secret document over a national radio hook-up in Canada. When I placed questions about that incident on the order paper last session the hon. member who read the document thought I was finding fault with him. I was not. The fault did not lie with the hon. member. I suppose most of us, if we could get access to something of that kind and broadcast it over a national hook-up, might do the same thing; in fact I do not think we would lose any time in doing so. But I place the responsibility for that occurrence upon the Department of Justice, whose representative considered the document to be secret and would not even let the committee see it. Then it was given to one of the members of this house, on the government side, to read over the radio.

I say that at that time the government, through the Department of Justice, broke faith with the work of the committee. I put a question on the order paper asking if any other hon. member would have the same opportunity of having access to such documents and reading them over the air. The answer was that that was a matter of government policy. The only conclusion one can make with respect to an answer of the kind is that the government policy is to let one of the Liberal members read it, but not to let any member of the opposition read it. That is the only conclusion one can come to.

Now, to get down to the work of this committee, last year we investigated some of the medical services of the army and the air force. May I say in passing that this is the only opportunity we have had in a year to discuss the work of that committee. It has reported several times—I do not know how many. There has been no motion for concurrence in any of the reports, and while we have been able to discuss war expenditures in the various branches of the service, through the defence ministers, in committee of the whole, we have not been able to carry on a discussion on the basis of the work of the war expenditures committee.

To me at least it was a glaring fact that there was not sufficient coordination between the army, the navy, the air force and the Department of Pensions and National Health with respect to the medical services of these branches of the forces. Perhaps my language would not be considered vulgar if I were to say that each seemed desirous of running its own little show. It did seem to me that there was an element of that principle, all through the evidence. While the suggestion may not be acceptable to the Minister of National Defence and to the other defence ministers, my own observations lead me to suggest that there should be one department or, shall I say, one great organization for the conduct of the medical services of all, and that this organization should be under the Department of Pensions and National Health. I know that the suggestion will not be acceptable, but to my mind there is no good argument against it. It was the view of one of the outstanding medical witnesses who gave evidence to the committee. I see no reason why it could not be carried out, and it would effect the saving of a great deal of money.

The Department of Pensions and National Health purchases its own supplies, while the Department of Munitions and Supply purchases the medical supplies, for the rest of the forces. It seems logical that if a man has appendicitis it makes no difference whether he wears the uniform of the air force, the army or the navy; he has appendicitis just the same. If a man has a fractured leg, it does not matter whether he is in one branch of the service or the other. Not only could there be greater coordination, but in my view if the medical services of the country were under one department and one head they could be carried on more efficiently.

The evidence before the committee showed that the Department of Pensions and National Health had a good deal of bed space to spare, while some of the other branches of the forces were overcrowded. I recall that the committee took one trip to Toronto and while there visited a small hospital which in peace-time was known as Grace hospital, situated at the corner of two busy streets. It had been abandoned by the hospital authorities of Toronto as being inadequate for hospital purposes. When we went in there it seemed to be full of patients. The corridors were narrow and the equipment was anything but what it should have been That hospital came under the medical services of the army. From there we went to the magnificently equipped Christie street hospital, operated by the Department of Pensions and National Health. There we found about 800 beds available. I believe that condition could be duplicated right across Canada. I can see no reason why the medical branches of the three armed services could not be coordinated with the medical services under the Department of Pensions and National Health. I know the present rule states that no man may come under the Department of Pensions and National Health until he reaches category E or is discharged. Well, a rule can easily be altered. After all, it is only a rule, and one of the functions of governmental administration is the altering of rules. The government has altered plenty of rules in the past few years, and there is no reason why a change could not be made in this instance.

I have something further to say which may not be strictly in line with the idea of economizing in war expenditures. Each war service controls its own medical branch and has its own hospitals. Each air-training school, for instance, has hospital accommodation, either small or large. May I make a suggestion to the government which, I believe, would coincide with what was said a little while ago by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, in connection with the salvage of this equipment after the war. I suggest that wherever possible, instead of building hospitals in air training schools and military camps they should build additional permanent space in the civil hospitals, and equip those hospitals for the added responsibilities they will have to shoulder. If this were done, when the war ends the communities concerned would have assets. There can be no question that there are hundreds of communities in Canada which lack proper hospital facilities.

There is a number of air training schools in my constituency. The government has been very liberal with me; I believe there are more in my constituency than in the constituency of any other member of parliament.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You must have some good will.

Mr. HANSELL: I have ways. A number of these air training schools are situated within a few miles of town. For instance, take the town of Macleod—I am sure the picture will be the same in other constituencies —with a population of nearly 2,000 people and a hospital of twenty-five beds. There is a huge air training school just across the tracks, right on the edge of town, and this school has its own little hospital. Why could not the amount of money spent on that hospital, or a little more if you please, have been put into an addition to the hospital already located in the town, making it a permanent feature that could service the air training school and yet be an asset to the community when the war is over? I think that is worth considering.

I do not believe I shall be breaking any of the rules if I read part of the evidence that was given to the committee, because it was not in any sense confidential. We had the evidence of a man who was an authority on hospitalization. I asked him:

> What would be your attitude to a suggestion that an addition be built to that hospital at the hospital's expense but the government underwriting that additional expense for so many years; guaranteeing the loan, and so forth—underwriting it—so that the hospital could care for the army or air force patients in those districts and when the war is over still have the accommodation for their civilian purposes?

This is the answer:

> Yes. I foresee at the end, if this war goes five years or four years even, if there is no building of civilian hospitals at the end of this war we are going to be very short of accommodation if these people are going to be thrown back on the civilian institutions; and that was one of the purposes of my letter to the Prime Minister, to try to get something that would cushion the shock of the change-over.

I do not think I need to read all this. The argument is used that the air force must have a hospital at its quarters in case of crashes, but the reply would be that crashes do not always take place over the airport. They may occur thirty, forty or fifty miles away, and the men involved are rushed to the nearest hospital. I make that as a suggestion, and I ask the government to give it serious consideration.

There is another point I should like to raise in connection with the work of the committee that will sit this year. It will experience the same difficulty in extracting evidence from those who are in the different services, in the army, the air force and the navy, as was experienced by the committee that sat last year. The members are going to find it difficult because of the military attitude that is to be found throughout the services. An officer in the army appears and attempts to give evidence, but when he finds that he does not agree with his superior officers, I challenge the committee to get evidence out of that man.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Not if it is in open session.

Mr. HANSELL: It is not only in the closed sessions that that occurs.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend says, "oh yes," but I should like to read some of the evidence. I will not give the name of the man who was on the stand, but there was nothing private about this matter because no information was revealed. When we found that we could not get any information, the chairman asked this question:

> You notice the point we are concerned with —the duplication of agencies. Have you thought about that at all—how to eliminate and still perform the task—how to eliminate the unnecessary duplication?

The answer is:

> I think that is a question for the senior men in charge of the services to decide among themselves; it is not for me to pass any opinion on anybody else; it is their duty, it is their prerogative, shall we say.

I am not blaming that man for adopting that attitude; I suppose he could not help it. Another question follows by the chairman:

> We are in camera, and it is our duty as members of parliament—
> A. And I am in the army.
> Q. Mr. Picard: But we are here as a committee to investigate some aspects of army administration.
> A. Sure.
> Q. The Chairman: We represent the taxpayers and you are one of them.
> A. Very much so.
> Q. And we would like to draw on your wide experience. Have you any thought on that?
> A. No. I do not think it is right to ask me.

I am convinced that that gentleman had the facts. I am convinced also that he was a witness who knew whereof he spoke, yet because he realized that he disagreed with his superior officer he dared not venture the evidence. That is the position in which the committee found itself on that occasion. I am not a lawyer; perhaps some hon. members of the committee who were lawyers could have extracted the evidence. I understand that the chairman is a lawyer, and there were a few others, but they could not get it. It may be necessary sometimes to go outside the services altogether in order to get evidence, or there may have to be some principle brought into play under which these men will be completely protected.

Another matter to which there has been little reference is that of patents and inventions. Quite often we read a news item stating that some man has invented something that may prove useful to our war services. For instance, a few years ago a carburettor was supposed to be invented by some gentleman that would run a car a hundred miles or some very large mileage on a gallon of gasoline. There was a good deal of reference to it in the press.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Pogue carburettor.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not know whether it was Pogue or Poke; anyway it never came into general use. Perhaps the Minister of Munitions and Supply or some other expert will tell us that it never did exist, but there is a feeling throughout this country that the inventive genius which may be inherent in Canada can sometimes be sabotaged by the big interests if it happens to interfere with their private profits. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I do know that in the United States of America the government has set up what is known as a national inventors' council under their Department of Trade and Commerce. That council will receive any invention that anyone under heaven cares to send them. All the ramifications of copyrights and all that are avoided, so that even if a young high school lad has discovered some little twist or something of that kind to improve something, he can send it direct to the council. All these suggestions are looked over by the council and if there is any merit whatsoever in any idea submitted, it is passed on by the council to their research board, by whatever name it may be called, and is tested. If the test proves that the invention is worth while it is passed on to the army, navy or air force or whatever branch may be involved, and the person who first suggested the idea is given adequate compensation for his discovery. Something like that should be done in Canada. I believe it would be a tremendous encouragement and of great benefit.

There is another point about it. We know that inventions, royalties, copyright and all that sort of thing constitute a tremendously complicated question. Anyone in this country or any institution in this country which would take any such invention and sabotage it in the interests of their own profits is performing an act of treachery, if that is not too strong a word. They are saboteurs indeed. This is something that is well within the realm of possibility because the other day I saw by the press that a committee of the United States senate was investigating this sort of thing. The clipping which I have here says:

> Among other things the committee was told of a vast patent pool linking the General Electric company with Krupp interests in Germany which prevented greater manufacture of cemented tungsten carbide.
> Another cartel agreement between German interests and the Remington Arms company had at one time impeded American sales of military ammunition to Britain and other parts of the empire.

I do not know what goes on behind the scenes at the Department of the Secretary of State, who has copyright and inventions under his administration; but I am quite certain that all the inventive genius which there is in this country and which could have been utilized should be brought into play and be used in the prosecution of this war. If there is a carburettor anywhere in this country that will save only one mile a gallon on gas we should know it, and if that idea has been sabotaged the saboteurs should be dealt with accordingly.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. HANSELL: I have not much time left.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Has he not seen in the evidence that an expert made the statement before one of the subcommittees in the United States that the Pogue carburettor was impracticable?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is not borne out by what Mr. Pogue said himself. I have corresponded with him.

Mr. HANSELL: Answering my hon. friend's question, I do recall evidence given to that effect, but I also recall that when that gentleman gave that evidence he said, "Hush now, boys, this is not to go on the record," and that is why I did not mention it this afternoon. My hon. friend has mentioned it; I have not. The gentleman said that that carburettor was so much boloney. I do not know whether he had seen it or not. Maybe it is so much boloney, but this country was given to understand that it was not, and that such a carburettor was in existence. I am not finding fault with the work of the committee. I am simply making the suggestion that the government set up a council on inventions, to which a man can bring his ideas or discoveries or inventions, without having to go through all the various ramifications of the copyright office, for which procedure he requires a lot of money, and many a poor inventor has no money.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): Why waste time when there is an inventions board now?

Mr. HANSELL: If there is a national inventions council in Canada I have not heard about it. That may be my fault, but if I have not heard about it, and I am here for five or six months of the year, I conclude that the rest of the country knows nothing about it. In the United States the work of their inventions council is publicized. They say in effect: "Come on, you Americans; if you have any suggestions to make, make them to us." Certainly that is not being done in Canada, even though an inventions board may be in existence here.

May I say in conclusion that I am, of course, in harmony with the government and with the committee in desiring to reduce, so far as practicable, war expenditures. If, however, we attempt to reduce war expenditures in this country at the expense of efficiency, we shall be making a huge mistake. We have found—and I know the committee will agree with me—that some departments needed more money than they were able to lay their hands on for particular purposes. We went down to the hospital at Petawawa and were taken through the nurses' quarters.

Mr. FAIR: Oh!

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend does not like to think that we were taken through the nurses' quarters. We saw the nurses sitting on nail kegs because they had no chairs in their rooms. What they needed there was a little more money, instead of a little less. The brigadier who was showing us around said, "You ask us to cut down our expenditures. I wonder what we could cut out here." There was not very much they could cut out in those quarters.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. HANSELL: If I may, Mr. Speaker, I shall take not more than half a minute to conclude.

The Social Credit philosophy is simply this: if a thing is physically possible, let us make the treasury reflect that fact. Let us save in every possible way every material thing we possess, but do not let us impair our efficiency by paring down expenditures where that does not seem to be absolutely necessary.

Mr. J. J. McCANN (Renfrew South): The brief observations I have to make have to do more with the motion before the house at the present time than with the discussion of the report of the war expenditures committee of last year. In passing, however, may I say I agree with the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) in several of the remarks which he has made. As a matter of fact, I appeared as a witness before the war expenditures committee last year, and several of the recommendations which I made are recommendations which the member for Macleod is making to-day. I am very glad to tell him that some of those recommendations made by myself a year ago are being acted upon. For instance, with reference to hospitalization, grants have been made to civilian hospitals in different parts of the country with a view to augmenting and extending their facilities to be used in wartime purposes for our armed forces, and they may in later years be used for the civil population.

In looking over the personnel of the present committee I observe that geographical considerations appear to be given more prominence than either the capability or the experience of those on the committee to hold the type of investigation that will come before them. In a committee consisting of twenty-four members, there are fourteen lawyers. Fortunately, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has seen fit to put along with them one or two preachers to guide them along the right path. Last year there was quite an investigation with reference to hospitalization and medical and dental services. The heads of the dental services of the three branches of the armed forces appeared before the committee.

A very considerable amount of money has been expended in connection with hospitalization. Much more will be expended in other years, and enormous quantities of supplies are being bought for the three branches of the service. It will be noted, however, that on the committee that is appointed there is not a single medical man, although there are fifteen or twenty medical men in the house. In the matter of selection that is an oversight. If we want to use the capabilities and facilities which are at hand in this house, then they should be put in the places where they can be of best service, and I submit to the Prime Minister, or whoever is responsible for this and similar committees, that there are in the house engineers, dentists, doctors, and other men, especially medical men, who could give valuable service on committees with reference to hospitalization, expenditures on construction, expenditures on medical and dental supplies. Yet their services are not used.

I laugh when I read the personnel of the committee, and I laugh at myself when I am put on the fisheries committee, when I do not know any more about lobsters or the fishing industry than other hon. gentlemen know about medicine. If such a situation applies to myself, I do not doubt that on analysis it will be found to apply to a great many others. I suggest to the Prime Minister, therefore, that in the setting up of the committee they utilize the services of some medical men who could give them valuable information as a result of their lifelong experience in the medical field, and the same thing applies to dentists with regard to the matter of dental services. Valuable assistance could be obtained from the experience of these men.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I want to take a few moments to lodge a vigorous protest against the manner in which parliament has been compelled to conduct the nation's business, particularly during the war. I am sure that every person who cherishes democratic institutions to-day must be concerned with regard to the fact that parliamentary institutions in this country have to some extent fallen into disrepute. One has only to read the daily press and some of the popular periodicals and listen to conversations in railway smoking cars and on the street to realize that parliament has become fair game for punsters, wits and columnists. While it is true that some of the criticism is not fair or justified, it must also be said that we ourselves in this house must accept some share of responsibility for the fact that there is a growing feeling that parliament has become largely a talk-shop rather than a workshop.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The "hear, hear" does not affect me. I have taken very little time in this house in the past few weeks, but I assume that hon. members approve what I say.

Mr. ROSS (Moose Jaw): You are right, whether you take time or not.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am always glad to have any epigrammatic remarks from the hon. member for Moose Jaw. They always add to the wisdom of the house.

There is a feeling that in this twentieth century, when the whole tempo of life has been speeded up, our parliamentary institutions must develop a technique to meet the problems of the times, and it seems to me that there are two main problems facing this parliament, particularly in a time of war. The first is the problem raised by the hon. member who took his seat a moment ago (Mr. McCann), the problem of giving members some effective task to do, particularly in relation to the war. A large part of the administration of the affairs of the country is done by order in council. Much of that, of course, is necessary and I am not complaining; but a good deal of it is unnecessary. Boards are set up with power to pass regulations based on orders in council, and the whole machinery of administration has been set up outside parliament altogether. The result is that this house has become to all intents and purposes a forum for the expression of ideas and the carrying on of debate. Members on both sides have expressed the opinion again and again that they feel frustrated and, in some instances, almost useless. I know the impression is sometimes created abroad that members of parliament have a soft job and are glad to get here as a sort of refuge. This is not fair. Some members on both sides of the house have left lucrative legal and medical practices and others have left business concerns to come here at considerable sacrifice, and members have said to me and, no doubt, to others, that they felt that, having made that sacrifice in order to come here, they should be given an opportunity to exercise their talents, to use their business judgment and to give the country the benefit of their experience gained in different walks of life, to the end that the war effort might be prosecuted more effectively. That is the first problem that faces us. I think the Prime Minister, as leader of the house and the government, should help to work out some technique designed to use the services of members of this house.

The second problem is the method of handling in parliament the expenditures of the country. We all recognize that the method of passing estimates as followed in peace time is no longer sufficient. The committee of the whole house has over 240 members, and to question a minister in that committee, as we have been doing for the last two or three days, is futile. One feels almost apologetic when he tries to ask two or three questions, because he is holding up other hon. members who have been up and down on their feet for ten minutes trying to get the floor. It is impossible to follow a logical sequence in questions with such a large committee. The result is that we have been getting very little information to enable us to see clearly the whole picture as to what the government is doing with the public funds. Even when we do ask questions, much of the information desired cannot be given, because to do so is not in the public interest. There has been some discussion as to what is and what is not in the public interest, but I agree with what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) said, that there are a great many facts that cannot be given to the house or the committee of the whole. But that does not relieve us as members of parliament of our responsibility, and if we cannot be given the information in the house we ought to be given it in a committee. We ought to know what the government is doing with the people's money. In the last two and a half years we have been voting astronomical sums. Most of us could not begin to explain to our constituents the exact purposes for which they were spent. It is not now a matter merely of hundreds of millions of dollars but rather of billions. Even if it were possible for the government to issue public accounts covering all the items, it would make so many volumes that few hon. members would be able to go over them.

With that in mind clamour began in the first war session, 1939, to have parliament set up some kind of machinery by which these war expenditures could be examined by hon. members. Nothing was done then; the war was just beginning, and nothing could be expected. In 1940 nothing was done. A good part of 1941 went by, and late in the 1941 session a war expenditures committee was appointed. It sat for a few months. It examined only one small field of the Canadian war effort. It tabled its report, and that report has never yet been discussed in the House of Commons. We have been two and a half years at war, and during all that time the public accounts committee has not met. We have never yet examined the contracts let by the Department of Munitions and Supply, not because we could not do so, but because the war expenditures committee, sitting only a few months last year, could not even begin to cover the tremendous field that lay before them. Here we are now in the session of 1942, close to the end of the third year of the war, and on the 29th day of April, three months after the opening of the session, we are setting up a war expenditures committee. What possible excuse can there be for this delay? We know that in all probability the house will adjourn in the course of the next two or three months; the time left at the disposal of the committee will be at the most eight or ten weeks. Nearly half a million contracts have been passed since the outbreak of the war. If the committee sat twelve hours a day it could not make even a respectable dent in this great mountain of contracts. It could not begin to examine with any care or on any sound basis of judgment the great number of expenditures that have been made during the last two years.

It seems to me that the time has come for the members of this house on both sides to insist that the government shall take steps to streamline the work of parliament. I know the Prime Minister is busy with all the administrative duties that fall upon a war government. But if the Prime Minister is not able to do it, there ought to be a deputy leader of the house, with no departmental responsibility, to take up the task of streamlining the work of the house and setting up a number of subcommittees, following the suggestion of the hon. member who has just taken his seat, (Mr. McCann); to bring together medical men, men with business experience, engineers, men experienced in science, and refer to them the various branches of our war effort. Let them examine what has been done. Let them make constructive suggestions. Let them point out frankly what has been wrong so that we can benefit by our mistakes.

I have been very much encouraged during the last few weeks by a reading of the reports of committees on national expenditure sitting at Westminster. If anyone has developed the complex that parliament cannot meet the problems of a country at war in the twentieth century, that person is wrong. In Great Britain they have worked out very successfully a technique by which parliament can become an effective democratic instrument. They have set up what I suggested a minute or two ago, a number of subcommittees. To read the reports of these committees is a revelation and a source of encouragement. They were made up of members of the various parties; the government would naturally have a preponderance of the membership, yet the reports are anything but complimentary. Where there have been mistakes they say so; they call them to the attention of the appropriate department and ask the government to correct them. That is the only way in which we can hope to make any progress.

I have here the report with reference to the air force from which I want to make two short quotations. This is part of the report tabled by the committee with respect to the Scottish repair depot. It states:

> Early in 1939 the Air Ministry acquired 160 acres of land adjoining this aerodrome for the sum of £26,637. The land so acquired was an undrained bog with a covering of peat up to a depth of 7 feet lying upon a bed of clay. Though with modern engineering knowledge and appliances it would be wrong to say that any site is impossible for the erection of a building, it would be difficult throughout the length and breadth of this country to find any site which was likely to prove more difficult and expensive than the site here selected.

The report goes on to say:

> The site to the east of the aerodrome, which had been favourably reported upon, was found to be subject to flooding, and was discarded. There remained the site to the southwest of the aerodrome, which had also been favourably reported upon. The subcommittee were informed that the Air Ministry was familiar with this site and all the other sites adjoining the aerodrome and was aware both of the nature of the soil and of the fact that it would probably be found necessary to resort to piling to obtain support for the foundations.

Further on it says:

> The subcommittee are not satisfied that sufficient care was taken before rejecting other sites in the immediate neighbourhood. It is, they think, to be regretted that the advice of competent local people was neither asked for nor obtained.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask the hon. member what is the date of that report?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It was tabled in the British House of Commons on May 28, 1940.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was the very reference I quoted last year as an example of the kind of thing our committee might be expected to do.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): If that is a good example I should think the Prime Minister would have had this committee appointed about January 28, rather than April 29. I have a number of reports here. I need not bother to quote them all, but I would refer to one which refers to propaganda in Great Britain. Many of us have been critical of the type of British propaganda that has been carried on, and it is rather interesting to see what the committee has to say about the films issued by the British ministry:

> Against the three films which the ministry was able to influence and assist must be set a number of cases in which commercial producers made films which they thought were excellent propaganda but which in the opinion of the ministry were disastrous and were calculated to have precisely the effect which the minister did not desire. This state of affairs would be ludicrous if it were not intolerable. It has arisen through the lack of sufficiently close cooperation and mutual understanding between the industry and the ministry, the need for which has already been emphasized. Day-to-day interference by the minister in the affairs of commercial producers is to be deprecated.

I need not quote the many other reports I have; hon. members can obtain them from the parliamentary library, but I do invite hon. gentlemen to give them some consideration. In England they have made use of practically every private member of the house, working on subcommittees. At a time like this, when the tentacles of government have reached into almost every aspect of our economy, for its own sake and for the sake of the morale of the Canadian people, as well as for the reputation of parliament, the government should have every aspect of its activity constantly subjected to the scrutiny and examination of members of this house. I feel that the government would do well to make use of hon. members in this way. The Prime Minister has sitting behind him a great many private members who have had experience in various walks of life and who are given very little opportunity to do any work of the sort being done in England. I feel that it would be of tremendous help not only to them but to Canada as well if subcommittees of this type were set up. Now, almost three months after parliament was convened, we are setting up a small committee of twenty-four members, broken up into three subcommittees of eight members. They cannot begin to do the work that should be done. There is no reason why a dozen subcommittees should not be set up dealing with the various aspects of Canada's war effort. There is no reason why hon. members could not be grouped, not necessarily by provinces or by parties, but according to their particular training and experience. I feel that they would greatly assist the ministers; that through these committees the ministers would get advice based on the experience of the members, instead of having, as we have had for the last two or three days, members rise in committee of the whole and present individual cases to one minister or another. We cannot conduct the business of a nation in that way. If every hon. member of this house were to bring from his files all the individual cases which have come to his attention and place them before the Minister of National Defence, that minister alone would be here for six months. But if we had committees to go over these cases, they could come to some conclusions with respect to them; they could make suggestions as to changes in policy; they could offer recommendations to the ministers, and many of the cases of hardship or injustice or miscarriage of administration would never come into this house at all. Then this parliament would become what it should be, a place for the discussion of policies, and matters of administration could be dealt with by a large number of committees made up of private members of this house.

I do not offer this suggestion merely because I want to see private members have more to do, or merely because I want to find some new opportunity to criticize the government. I offer these suggestions to the government because I am convinced that if we are to win this war we must maintain the morale of the Canadian people. We are constantly repeating in public statements that this is a war for democracy, but we have to convince the people that democracy is a reality; that it is not some outworn shibboleth that belongs to the nineteenth century but is something which can operate in our day; that it can operate more efficiently and more effectively than the totalitarian states can operate; that it can harness the experience and ability of private members representing the people, and use that experience and ability in the common task of winning the war. I feel certain that if we do this the position of parliament will be much enhanced in the mind of the Canadian people, and the government will be greatly assisted.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, if this resolution passes to-day, in my opinion parliamentary government will be at an end in Canada. Over a hundred years ago they had a civil war in England in order to obtain control over the executive and of all expenditures. Since this war started this parliament has had no such control over anything. Here the session is almost two-thirds gone—this is the fifty-third day of it—and the government bring in a motion at this late hour to appoint a committee, to do what? To take out of the hands of this parliament any remaining control it may have over the expenditures in connection with the war or discussion of it from now on. So far, that control has been very little and is a myth. We have rules and regulations of the house; we have statutes; we have the auditor general and an audit act; we have a treasury board, which is supposed to pass on estimates, allotments and commitments and guard the treasury. We are simply going around as a parliament in a circle because control is daily taken from us. For many years I was a member of the public accounts committee, but since the Bren gun matter in April, 1939, I doubt if that committee has had a meeting; at least I do not remember one.

To-day with these rising billions of dollars in uncontrolled estimates, the people are wondering what kind of parliament this is when we allow money in astronomical figures to be spent like water by the government absolutely without any control or authority on the part of this parliament or its knowing a thing about it. What audit is made of the nearly $4,000,000 a day which is being expended on the war by the various departments of government and all these outside boards and commissions? I raised that question last year in connection with the estimates of the Minister of Finance. I asked: Does the auditor general audit each account in detail, and, if not, what check or audit is provided by law, statute, custom or usage, and by whom? Here we are at the fifty-third day of this session, and at this stage we are asked to pass this resolution by which we consent to hand over to a select committee all these billions without any check or control or say in it, over our heads.

What is the object of appointing this select committee? Speaking on the appointment of a similar select committee on war expenditures last year, as reported at page 1257 of Hansard for March 5, 1941, I said:

> What is the object of having a select committee if it is going to have its hands tied behind its back through the failure of the government to give it the power which any committee should have in order to function properly regarding war expenditures, manpower, recruiting, munitions and overseas policies. . . .
> I notice by the explanation which the Prime Minister gave of the resolution last night that the committee has no power to go into any question of government policy.

If it has no power to do that, why is the committee appointed?

> As far as this war is concerned the committee will have its hands tied behind its back because it has no power to deal with any question of government policy regarding the war. . . . My second point is this: the government has decided that it is to be the tutor, custodian and guardian of the committee. The committee is not to be allowed to do anything but what the government allows it to do. The government will decide, so far as its war effort is concerned what information shall be kept secret and what not. No member of this house wants to give the enemy any information—

But I say this, that at the present time Canada needs an auditor general like the late Auditor General McDougall. Auditor General McDougall, thou should'st be living now! Canada hath need of thee, right at this very hour—as Wordsworth said of Milton—because "never were there as many who knew so little about so much." History will condemn this House of Commons for having allowed all these expenditures without the power to deal with this matter in the manner indicated.

I am dealing only with the system and great principle of parliamentary control. The men nominated to the committee are all good men. They have done admirable work. I have sat on committees with some of them, and they are some of the best men in the House of Commons. It will be understood, therefore that I am not saying anything about the personnel of the committee, but the system functions and policy herein. When the committee has its hands tied behind its back, and is refused power to function, when secret meetings are held and we have reports made thereof to parliament and no concurrence in the findings; when we have an estimate made by the treasury board of $1,325,000 for war expenditure and have a deficit of over $135,000,000 at the end of the fiscal year and when we get up in the clouds this way, then I say it is high time parliament had some control over war expenditures, because the minister can himself authorize them when the treasury board is not meeting.

The figure for the next year's expenditures is set at $2,200,000,000. What control has parliament over those expenditures? It has no control whatsoever. I am not a believer in this lack of any system. We know that in the mother of parliaments there is a war expenditures committee. But that committee sits nearly three hundred days in the year. It sits when the house is in session. On the other hand, the committee in this parliament, has not, up to this fifty-third day of the session, held a single meeting. It is not yet appointed. Neither has the public accounts committee sat.

As I said last year with regard to these particular matters:

> I have already expressed the hope in this house that this committee will not be in any sense a whitewashing committee but will deal thoroughly with Canada's war effort. I hope it will consider the whole war effort, not from any partisan point of view but for the purpose of letting the people know the real facts with regard to what Canada is doing, and be in effect a fact-finding committee. If the committee is intended to be a business committee, appointed to go over all expenditures incurred since the war—expenditures past and current—in connection with defence and all that sort of thing, very well and good. But I hope that the committee when appointed will cover all the ground and will see to it that the Canadian people are given the real facts about our war effort—

And value for their money. I may say that that was not carried out. What was done at almost the first meeting of the committee? They passed a resolution to the effect that they had nothing to do with past expenditures on the war, and that they were only conducting a post mortem and decided on a whitewash of the war money spent. That is all this committee is doing; it is just conducting a post mortem over expenditures, and it sits mostly and almost entirely when the house is not sitting, and meet as various subcommittees to find out nothing, owing to the text of the resolution.

The committee of this parliament operates in an altogether different fashion from the committee in England. I hold in my hand the last report of the war expenditures committee to the house, and I can say that the house has not yet seen it, and the house has been refused the right to deal with concurrence in this report. In the old country, almost every day the house meets, fifteen to twenty pages of questions on the orders of the day are asked about war expenditures, and it saves extended debates such as this. On the other hand, we in this parliament who are proceeding to spend billions of dollars are doing so without any control over the executive.

On November 3, 1941, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked if it was the intention of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) to move concurrence in interim reports 4, 5, 6 and 7 of the special committee on war expenditures, which had been tabled that day. The Minister of National War Services who, I believe, was chairman of the committee, said that he did not think there was any intention of doing so. Following that, the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) asked if an opportunity would be given to discuss the report. To this hour no discussion has yet been held.

What is the object of the committee, if the house is to have no control over it or deal with its findings? Here we are, spending these large sums of money. As we go about the country we see lots of waste. I could take any hon. member right to Toronto, and I could show him around the normal school where there has been a great waste of public money in connection with the erection of buildings at that point, when the government could have obtained other buildings, possibly at no expense of public property and schools, for the same purpose. Just look out of a train window when passing along the Toronto waterfront, and one will see the numerous huts built along there. Many of them are vacant. I am not attempting to criticize the three war ministers—far from it. But it was stated by one minister in the house at the last session that those ministers had not located the various camps from Vancouver to Halifax, but that they had been located by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. I can tell the house that after some of those camps were established it was most difficult to get sewers, water supply and transportation facilities, and in the winter weather get proper training.

Then, let us consider the purchase of ships. What information can we get about them or about those sold before the war for a trifle? The history with respect to select committees has always been the same. The standing committees are all right, because they stick to their task. It is altogether different, however, in regard to select committees. I have been in the house since 1921, and I have never known a select committee to do anything useful. I am not making these observations in any partisan sense, but it is a fact that the party in power selects the members of a committee, and it prepares the text of the resolution appointing such committee and drafts the report to the house. These select committees are bound by the resolutions setting them up, and they must operate within the four corners of their orders of reference. They cannot go beyond those four corners.

We had a committee on Atlantic shipping. We had a committee in connection with the customs scandal. We had another committee which dealt with Beauharnois. There was another committee to consider price spreads, and another to consider the Canadian National estimates and the public accounts in connection with the Bren gun. All those committees did not find a thing useful, made reports to the house, and they were discussed, except the Bren.

I am not casting reflections upon such committees, but I do know that the government has always had one or two ministers on each committee, and that majorities have always written the reports. There has always been a good deal of partisanship in the work of such committees, and that is bound to take place under this parliamentary government. It is true that the report of a select committee when presented to the house is to a great extent a partisan report, and sometimes a minority report is made also.

I understand all parties are united in the war effort, and for the remainder of the session I should like to see all other domestic discussions, except those having to do with the war, excluded. We have now reached the fifty-third day, and it is only at this time that the motion has been presented to deal with war expenditures. The committee which sat last summer did not deal with the important question of rearranging of soldiers' pay. There should be a better system of soldiers' pay, for the lower paid groups. That matter was not heard of until, after I dealt with it many times, it was discussed in the house. Then, these dollar-a-year men, and many price and trade controllers have been appointed since that committee sat, and there should be some discussion on that point, because they are a law unto themselves and spend millions over our heads as they like.

I notice the resolution states:

That a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein, and that notwithstanding standing order 65 the committee shall consist of twenty-four members. . . .

And then the members are listed. When the committee of last session presented its report there were no discussions in the house. No concurrence was moved in any of its work.

We are spending money like water. Large amounts of money are spent in an unknown way, and we have no control at all over expenditures when a mint of money is being spent. Since the last committee met there have been several innovations.

We have this price ceiling board and many others which have been set up under the War Measures Act. They have roving commissions to go all over Canada and there is no control over their expenditures. Six weeks ago a motion was moved by me for particulars about the dealings of this board and corporation on ceiling subsidies, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to give any information. During the Easter recess the chairman of the board announced that the expenditures on subsidies were up to $2,000,000, and two weeks later the Minister of Finance gave out approximately the same figure. We have information with reference to victory loans and war savings certificates, and we are told that $9,000,000 was the amount of the expenses in connection with the 1941 victory loan. The details have been refused. Entertainments of various kinds have been held; many expenses have been incurred, and yet the public are denied information, although these will add to the interest to be paid on the loans. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), who was a member of the war expenditures committee, dealt with this matter on March 5, 1941, when he said, as reported on page 1267 of Hansard:

We can go back to other days. I do not use the word "whitewash" which was employed by my hon. friend (Mr. Church) a few minutes ago. It describes rather well, however, what happened in the days of the customs investigation, what happened in the price spreads investigation, yes, and what has happened in every committee that has sat on any special problem in the last twenty years to my own knowledge.

These outside boards have been spending money like water. Last session I asked the Prime Minister what the other legislative body that meets in another place in this building was doing and if he would give them useful work to do. They have met for about six hours since last June. Why should their services not be utilized? They have a number of financial men and able parliamentarians there whose services could be used to advantage in doing some of this work in such a war crisis as this. Why are they not summoned and given some of this war work to do? They might be asked to do this work, even though it meant that they had to meet every day. The system is all wrong and it cannot go on much longer. The country is heading for bankruptcy unless we protect the business man and the taxpayer. Too much money is now being taken from him. The small business man has been put out of business. Without any authority from this parliament the small retail business man in Toronto and other cities has had so many artificial burdens, barriers and restraints of trade placed on him in connection with the conduct of his business that he is losing his business and the right to make a living. We are sitting here as a parliament; yet we do nothing about it, and this is the fifty-third day of the session. The whole system is wrong and it must be changed. Parliament must regain control over the expenditures of these bodies. It is now or never. If we do not do so, then parliament might just as well be abolished. We may as well go home and leave the conduct of business to the executive. No matter what motion is proposed, objection is raised by the Minister of Finance.

With all due respect to the present Minister of Finance and without intending any disparagement whatever of him, I must say that he has not had the necessary financial training or experience for this important position in times like these and relies on men who are not experts in finance. A total of $2,200,000,000 may be spent over parliament's head for next year, without any adequate control. They would not allow that in England or in Washington. As a member of the House of Commons I wish to protest against these outlandish expenditures being made without any control by this house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I rise to a point of order. When the house adjourned last evening the minister who was leading the house made the distinct statement that to-morrow we would continue with the present discussion, which had to do with the resolution for $2,000,000,000. When we met to-day the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) moved this motion to set up this committee, and a debate has developed, unexpectedly to me.

Mr. RALSTON: And to me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The effect has been to prevent us from reaching the orders of the day, for which hon. members have been waiting all afternoon. I suggest to the Prime Minister that someone move the adjournment of this debate just before six o'clock so that we can have the orders of the day called. I think that is only fair in view of what occurred last night.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is understood that the references that are made to the matters to be taken up for consideration relate to those items which stand on the order paper as government orders. It is always understood that a preliminary motion is liable to be discussed, unless there is some special question raised about it. I do not think there are many who still desire to continue the discussion this afternoon, and I should think that it still may be possible to give an opportunity to any hon. member who wishes to ask a question on the orders of the day to do so before we adjourn. I would be the last speaker on the motion, and I promise to make my remarks exceedingly brief. I think we ought to continue.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I have been impressed more or less with the remarks of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). I was not a member of the committee which sat last year, but I was in close contact with its activities through our own members. I believe that altogether too little time is being allowed for so extensive a task as is assigned to this committee by the resolution. I should like to divide what it is proposed that it shall do. First, this committee is to examine the expenditures defrayed out of money provided by parliament for the defence services. Second, "and for other services directly connected with the war." That could cover the raising of wheat, the production of honey, the production of wool, and so on. Third, "and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein."

I agree entirely with the purpose of the committee as set forth in this resolution, but to expect hon. members to accept in sincerity that as being the real purpose of this committee is to execute a farce. This committee has only twenty-four members, and even though it sat every day from now to the end of the year it would have no chance whatsoever of accomplishing any one of these three tasks, let alone all three. I do not wish to be merely critical. I aim not to speak any more in this house than I feel it my duty to do. There are members who talk about the amount of time that we spend talking, but I should like to ask any one of those members who spoke a few moments ago what on earth else they think a member of parliament can do in this house except talk? What is he sent here for if it is not to talk? There is an attitude developing in the minds of members and some people throughout the country, and in certain newspapers, which is altogether subversive to democratic government. I am not in favour of wasting the time of the house or of spending it in unnecessary discussion, but there is business for the members of this house to do. How on earth they can go through a time like this, travelling uncharted ways, without spending time in discussing matters, I should like to have the Toronto Telegram and three or four more Canadian newspapers tell me.

Mr. GRAYDON: Leave the Telegram alone.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Name any one of them, I do not care which; most of them are tarred with the same brush.

Mr. GRAYDON: The Evening Telegram is a great supporter of the working man.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then let us support the Evening Telegram. I have three or four suggestions which may be of value in connection with the work of the war expenditures committee. Could the Prime Minister not arrange it so that the committee would have power to add to its numbers indefinitely? That has not been provided for here. Can not the Prime Minister say to the committee: "Look here, this job we are giving you to do is no joke. We want you to understand you must do this job and do it right, and then come back here and report to this house in a manner that will not only satisfy the house but the country. We will give you all the facilities that will enable you to do that, not only in the amount of time at your disposal, but in the number of members you shall have power to appoint."

I think the suggestion made by the hon. member for Broadview was a good one, that the services of the members of the other house should be used. I do not know what on earth this country is paying the members of the other house $4,000 a year for, if it is not to come here and do something; and why in the world they should not in these times participate in the work of this committee is beyond me. They will have to explain why in order to satisfy me.

Why should the war expenditures committee not have power to add to its numbers indefinitely, from the members not only of this house but of the other house; and if the membership is still thought inadequate, why not bring in public-spirited men from the outside who are prepared to cooperate with the committee?

I must confess that no one, no matter what his previous business may be, can come in here and undertake to deal with the tremendous affairs of a country like this in a time like this without being bewildered by his own inability to comprehend the hugeness of the whole thing, be he as earnest and sincere as he may, and no party in this house lacks either earnestness or sincerity in dealing with the conditions we are facing to-day. Nevertheless we must have some facilities through which to work. Why not let the war expenditures committee be one of these facilities?

Having given the committee power to add to its numbers, the Prime Minister should then say to them: "You are free to sit whenever you like." It will be argued that this would cost a great deal of money, but I do not think any business concern ever lost money by paying it out for adequate supervision, and I do not think this country will lose money by paying it out for adequate supervision of its affairs in these times.

The details of the task of the committee suggest another thought to me. It will be noticed that the committee is to consider contracts which have been awarded. I am really surprised to hear that the contracts let under the Department of Munitions and Supply were not brought under review by the committee of last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has not been in the house. All that was explained a short time ago. The contracts were under review when the committee met last year. There is no limitation in that respect.

Mr. COLDWELL: We did not reach them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I beg pardon for bringing up that point on which I should have been better informed, but I was unavoidably out of the house when that explanation was made. I had understood that the committee did not reach those contracts last year.

Mr. THORSON: There were many sessions of the committee devoted to munitions and supply.

Mr. COLDWELL: When?

Mr. THORSON: Right at the commencement.

Mr. COLDWELL: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. FOURNIER (Hull): The hon. member was not on the committee at that time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad to hear that the committee was more effective than I had been led to believe, but let us hope that it goes even more fully into these matters in future. All one has to do is to look at these thick blue-backed books which are coming to us from time to time, listing the contracts which have been let under the Department of Munitions and Supply, to know that about all the supervision that the committee was able to give to those contracts was what we give to estimates that are being considered in the very hot weather after midnight when we sometimes pass millions of estimates with a wave of the hand. I do not think that is good enough; I should like to see the committee go into these contracts with much greater care.

There is another thing with which I believe the committee should deal. Since arriving in Ottawa in the winter I have had come to my desk about twenty letters, speaking from memory, from various parts of Canada. They are more or less confidential letters, telling me about waste, inefficiency and irregularities in various war activities. I would not blame the government for this at all. I have not risen and said anything on the floor of the house about these complaints. In many instances I have not even spoken to the minister about them, which would be the first thing I would do, for the simple reason that I realize that under the circumstances the minister cannot possibly take care of such matters. But why should not this committee as a part of its work investigate these complaints which are brought to the attention of members of the house? Some of the complaints are very bad; I am sure that if the Prime Minister heard about them, he would have more difficulty in resting at night. But he is not to blame, nor is the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). The work is so big and the means of control are so meagre, that these things cannot be avoided until they are brought to one's attention. There must be a way of getting around the difficulty. I would suggest that one way is to let the committee consider the complaints which come in to the members of the house, and which they could present to the committee either by word of mouth or by means of the letters.

There is one other matter which was hinted at by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), and that is this—

Mr. SPEAKER: Six o'clock. Does the hon. member wish to move the adjournment of the debate?

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, April 30, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. RALSTON IN DEBATE ON APRIL 28

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): As a private Liberal member of this hon. house I rise to a question of privilege.

On April 28, Colonel the Hon. J. L. Ralston, Minister of National Defence, is reported at page 1968 of Hansard as having spoken as follows:

> There are a certain number of professional soldiers, and thank heaven there are, because we did not treat our professional soldiers any too well, at least during the period when I was Minister of National Defence previously. I take my share of responsibility for that. From 1926 to 1930 the army and national defence services were nearly starved, and I make that statement now. It seemed to me that perhaps the most popular indoor sport in those days was cutting amounts off the estimates for national defence, and the hon. member for Témiscouata did his share of advocating that this be done. Now I say to my hon. friend that in spite of all that, the men who were professional soldiers did keep on.

With regard to the two first above quoted sentences, such a confession of incompetence and incapacity has been delayed for a considerable time indeed, but it had to be made in due course and it is duly acknowledged.

The second part of the above quotation is even more absurd than malicious. Who would believe that the then Minister of National Defence did ever substitute for four years or for a minute the advice of the member for Témiscouata for that of all the pompous brass hats that adorn the Department of National Defence?

What are the facts? The hon. Minister of National Defence was elected for the first time to the House of Commons in September, 1926.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. On a question of privilege the hon. member is of course entitled to refute anything that has been said which he thinks is a breach of the privileges of hon. members, but I would not wish the hon. member to think that he can make an extended argument—

Mr. POULIOT: I am not making an argument, Mr. Speaker; I am stating facts.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: You certainly are.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend should keep quiet and listen to learn what I am doing now. I am not making an argument; I am stating facts, which is the privilege of an hon. member. I do not contend that any hon. member is supposed to withdraw what he said about another hon. member if he does not use unparliamentary language, but when a statement of fact is made in relation to an hon. member, that member unquestionably has the right to state the relevant facts as he sees them, and that is what I am doing now.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Make it short.

Mr. POULIOT: Between September 1926 and 1930 there were four sessions of parliament. I have the index of Hansard for each of those sessions, and in those for 1926-27 and 1929 I challenge the minister to find anything that I said concerning his department. The only question that I asked him in the session of 1928 was on the estimates and in connection with the establishment of a landing field at Rivière du Loup. The minister answered that he had nothing to do with it. That was all for that year.

With regard to the session of 1930, in order to prepare my speech on Mr. Bennett's amendment to the budget I had asked all the cabinet ministers what they considered their greatest accomplishments, and I assumed personal responsibility for what the Minister of National Defence and his colleagues told me when I included their notes in my speech to boost my party before the general elections of that year.

I have sent the four Hansard indexes of those sessions to the Minister of National Defence, and they are on his desk. I challenge him to prove his erroneous contention that the hon. member for Témiscouata did his share of advocating the most popular indoor sport in those days, cutting amounts off from the estimates for national defence.

With regard to the last sentence of the above quotation, the truth shall never be falsified even by a self-centred miniature navel of the whole world.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has been speaking in the light of the privilege which he has as a member of this house, and he has also been speaking on a question of privilege. In so doing he referred to members of the staff of the Department of National Defence as "pompous brass hats". I submit, Mr. Speaker, that at this time when many of those members are offering their lives on the field of battle this house should not countenance a characterization of the kind in these halls of parliament. I think, Mr. Speaker, you would be justified in asking that those words should be withdrawn by the hon. member.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did notice with regret that remark made by the hon. member; I thought it was uncalled for and contrary to the sense of the house of which he is a member. I agree with the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the statement should be withdrawn, not only in justice to the members of the forces but also in justice to the hon. member himself.

Mr. POULIOT: I would ask, under what rule?

Mr. SPEAKER: The ordinary rules which obtain in debates in this house, that persons who are not in a position to defend themselves here should not have a derogatory statement of this kind go out to the country as an expression of the views of this house. I think the hon. member should withdraw.

Mr. POULIOT: If that is your ruling, sir, I bow to it.

First report of special committee on land settlement of veterans of the present war.—Mr. Macmillan.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

Mr. J. P. HOWDEN (St. Boniface) presented the first report of the standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, and moved that the report be concurred in.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I rise not for the purpose of opposing this motion, which of course is purely pro forma, but to call attention to the fact that a large number of committees are now meeting simultaneously and, as has been represented to me, it is obviously impossible for hon. members who serve on more than one committee to attend the meetings of committees which occur at the same time. I merely ask that some provision be made for staggering the meetings of committees so that hon. members who are on more than one may have the opportunity of attending and taking part in the proceedings of those committees. These reports are illustrative of what I have in mind, and if you will look at the Votes and Proceedings you will see that many of these committees are meeting at the same time. Members of our party particularly, since we have a limited number, cannot possibly perform their duties when they are members of committees which meet at the same time, and I would ask the minister who is looking after the distribution of the business of the committees, if I may so describe it, to see that the meetings are staggered.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): That is being attended to. The chairmen of the various committees have been asked to meet together and arrange their work accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

CANTEEN FUNDS

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City) presented the first report of the special committee on canteen funds, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

TUG "BALLY"

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. What vessel was purchased by the Department of National Defence for Naval Services to replace the tug Bally?
2. From whom was she purchased?
3. At what date was she purchased?
4. What was the total purchase price?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City).

1. Restico.
2. Restigouche Power and Paper Company.
3. July 3, 1941.
4. $11,000.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Is any portion of the Alaska highway to be constructed by Canada, or under the authority of the government of Canada?
2. If so, how many miles and what is the location thereof?
3. Upon what basis are the contracts to be awarded?
4. Have any contracts been awarded as yet? If so, to whom?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The United States government, by agreement with the Canadian government, has undertaken the building and war-time maintenance of the Alaska highway from Fort St. John to Fairbanks. Present plans provide for the construction of a pioneer road which will be built by the United States using United States troops for surveys and initial construction. The highway will be completed under contracts made by the United States public roads administration and awarded with a view to insuring the execution of all contracts in the shortest possible time without regard to whether the contractors are Canadian or American. No portion of the highway is to be constructed by Canada.

2, 3 and 4 answered by No. 1.

SASKATCHEWAN PENITENTIARY—SCRAP IRON OR STEEL

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. Did the Department of Justice during the year 1941 sell or dispose of any scrap iron or steel accumulated in the Saskatchewan penitentiary?
2. If so, to whom and what was the amount thereof and the price per ton realized therefor?

Mr. ST. LAURENT:

1. Yes.
2. Saskatoon Metal Company, Saskatoon, Sask., on salvage minutes 16848 and 17046, through salvage office, Department of Finance:

23,190 lbs. wrought iron, mostly pipe, $2 ton	$ 23 19
40,365 lbs. cast iron, $6 ton	121 10
600 lbs. cast iron lasts, last stand, etc., ½c lb.	3 00
2,490 lbs. scrap steel, $2 ton	2 49
	$ 149 78

SHIPMENTS OF CATTLE AND MEAT PRODUCTS TO THE UNITED STATES

Mr. DIEFENBAKER:

1. How many head of cattle have been shipped to the United States in each month between July 1, 1941, and the date hereof?
2. What was the corresponding export during the said months in each of the years 1939 and 1940?
3. How many pounds of beef and meat products were shipped to the United States during each of said months and years?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1 and 2. Exports of cattle to the United States:

MAGDALEN ISLANDS SHIPPING SERVICES

Mr. ROY:

1. Does the government give subsidies or grants to shipping companies for services with Magdalen islands, Quebec?
2. If so, what are these subsidies or grants, to which companies have they been given, and for what services?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Yes.
2. The Lovat Steamship Company, Limited, of Halifax, N.S., has been subsidized for a number of years past for a service between Pictou, Souris and the Magdalen islands, during the season of navigation in each year. The subsidy paid in 1941-42 was $42,500. The service consisted of two trips a week from the opening of navigation until the end of November, and one trip a week in December, with trips from the Magdalen islands to Halifax every three weeks, at the contractor's option.

The service is being continued during the present season, with the exception of the Halifax trips, but the contract has not yet been completed.

The Clarke Steamship Company's subsidized service between Montreal, Quebec and Gaspe extends its trips every two weeks from Gaspe to the Magdalen islands, but this extension is not subsidized by the federal government.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN NAVAL COLLEGE

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the Minister of Naval Services any statement to make as to the opening of the naval college and has his attention been called to a statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty on March 11, last, as to the condition of the personnel and their avenues of promotion and standards of training in the Royal Navy?

2. What provision will be made by way of aid or scholarships or otherwise, in secondary Canadian schools to those whose parents cannot afford expensive training, to attract the youth of Canada to service in our navy and merchant marine?

3. What is the method of selection now in vogue?

4. Who are the staff of the college and what actual naval experience have they had either in the Royal or Canadian navies or merchant marine at sea?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): Return tabled.

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. HANSELL:

1. What is the number of unemployed in each Canadian city, of a population of ten thousand or over?

2. How many in each of these cities are receiving direct relief?

MAGDALEN ISLANDS AIR SERVICES

Mr. ROY:

1. Are there any air line companies receiving grants, subsidies or allowances for certain services in Magdalen islands, Quebec?

2. If so, what are these companies and what amounts are they receiving or have they received and for what reason?

[Mr. J. A. MacKinnon.]

PRIVILEGE—MR. ESLING

OBJECTION TO REMOVAL OF JAPANESE NATIONALS TO MUNICIPALITY OF KASLO, B.C

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I would ask to be permitted to make a statement on a matter of immediate and vital importance to my riding. As is well known, there is in progress a movement of Japanese from the British Columbia coast to areas east of the Cascade mountains. According to a Canadian Press report from Vancouver under date of March 10, the chairman of the British Columbia security commission, under whose direction the movement is being carried out, is credited with the statement that Japanese will not be moved to any area until opinion is unanimously in favour of that being done.

Recently officials at Kaslo, a community on Kootenay Lake, invited the chairman to send a contingent of Japanese into that city, and preparations are now under way for the housing of women, children and aged Japanese men. On the other hand I have a protest signed by 112 Kaslo citizens protesting vigorously against the bringing in of the Japanese. In last year's census Kaslo was recorded as having a population of 463. In the opinion of the dominion statistician 30 to 40 per cent is a conservative estimate of the proportion of children in a municipal census. It may be accepted therefore that the 112 who protested are a representative proportion of the adult community. It is in order that we might avoid factional feelings, ill will and perhaps bitterness that I have been requested by those who protest to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) to interest themselves in this matter, in the light of the statement by the chairman that these Japanese would not be placed in any community without unanimous approval.

This matter is of real importance not only in its relation to Kaslo but in its relation to other communities. Perhaps the difficulty has arisen because of the original statement that the northern boundary of the prohibited area in West Kootenay was to be the fiftieth parallel. In that event Kaslo would have been included in the prohibited area. But for some reason perhaps best known to the Minister of Justice that area was changed; thus we have the difficulty to which I direct the attention of the government.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): It is difficult to get unanimous agreement to put the Japanese anywhere. I believe in almost all cases where we have been able to move them there has been a considerable body of opinion against their being moved to particular localities. In view of the situation at the coast I think in the national interest too much notice should not be taken of that.

A request came from the board of trade of the district to which the hon. member has referred, and there was a further request from the mayor of that community. I believe it would be fair to say that Kaslo is what might be known as a ghost town. A number of ghost towns in that area sent in requests—four of them, to be exact—that the Japanese be removed to those communities. The commission sent in an inspector, and after investigation contracts were let for the repair of houses in which Japanese women and children could be placed. It is estimated that we can put about 5,000 persons in those particular communities.

I have been out there and looked over the ground, and it does make it very difficult for those charged with the responsibility of facing up to this problem when it is found that everyone wants them to go but no one wants to take them. A decision has to be made by somebody, and in the light of all the facts I can think of no better place to put those Japanese than in the ghost towns to which I have just referred. The climate there is comparatively good; the Japanese women and children will be treated well, and there will be ample protection. It should be remembered by hon. gentlemen that we are removing Japanese to other provinces, and we have had similar objections from certain quarters. But if this movement is to become effective in the most dangerous areas we must at times overlook some of the objections raised.

So far as I am personally concerned, as I said before I do not know of any better place than those ghost towns up in the Crow Valley to which these women and children might be moved. All facilities are available; it will be comparatively easy to carry on the education of the children, and all necessary sanitation and housing facilities are there. The houses need only a little repair, and when that is done those people will be out of harm's way. In view of the requests received and the investigations we have made I do not think that at this time we should be asked to change our decision in the matter.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the minister care to tell the house whether or not the dominion government has assumed responsibility for the expense of educating the children of these Japanese people? Obviously if a considerable number of people are brought into a community the local people will object on the ground that there must be increased school facilities. Again, who assumes the responsibility for looking after these people after they have been placed in those communities? Does the dominion government shoulder the financial responsibility, or must the province do so?

Mr. MITCHELL: The dominion government.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

QUESTION AS TO APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. The special committee to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations presented its report to the house on June 4 of last year. In that report was the following recommendation:

> 11. Your committee recommends that for the duration of the war a special committee of the house should be appointed at each session to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations and matters incidental thereto.

Having in mind particularly the fact that there has been a change in the head of the department since those recommendations were made, does the government contemplate the establishment of such a committee, as recommended?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will answer in the affirmative, yes.

HOUSING

INQUIRY AS TO OPERATIONS UNDER EXISTING ACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, as to-morrow is the first day of May, I should like to know if the government is in a position to make any announcement about the housing situation, first under the Dominion Housing Act and, secondly, with respect to taking care of the soldiers under the war-time legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend's question had better stand as notice.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member sent me notice of the question he has just asked. It is an important one, and raises a question with respect to additional moneys which will have to be appropriated to carry on operations under the Dominion Housing Act. That matter is not yet definitely settled, but I believe I shall be able to make a statement in regard to it within about a week.

The remainder of the hon. member's question relates to the department headed by my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), under whose jurisdiction Wartime Housing Limited operates. I do not believe he has had notice of the question. It may be that he would like to look at it and, if he so desires, he could make a statement later.

POSSIBILITY OF REVIVAL OF HOME IMPROVEMENT PLAN

Mr. LOCKHART: As the Minister of Finance in his annual review will no doubt be making a statement on the housing situation, would he give consideration to commenting on the possibility of reestablishing some form of home improvement plan to help relieve certain aspects of the housing situation?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I will give consideration to that matter and make a statement with regard to it as well.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CURTAILMENT OF SHIFTS AT TRENTON SHELL PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply, of which I sent the minister notice on Tuesday. This matter arises out of a telegram which I have received from the secretary of the steel workers union in New Glasgow, Nova Scotia. It states that work at the shell plant in Trenton was being curtailed to two shifts of eight hours a day each, because one company finishing shell forgings had cut down on its order. Can the minister explain why a plant working on shell forging parts should curtail its orders at this time?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have a report from my office on the subject matter of that wire and my advice is that this plant has always worked two shifts a day, that it was organized on that basis. Our total requirements of forgings of the size in question are 20,000 a month. These are being provided currently and have been right along on the basis of two shifts. This production of 20,000 forgings a month takes care of all our requirements for finished shells.

STRIKE OF EMPLOYEES OF BANQUE CANADIENNE NATIONALE IN MONTREAL

On the orders of the day.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I have just been informed by telephone from Montreal that the employees of the Banque Canadienne Nationale have gone on strike this morning. The immediate cause of the strike is the refusal of the management to negotiate with the representatives of the employees, and of the regional war labour board to set a date to hear their grievance. I should like to ask the Minister of Labour if his office is aware of the situation and if he will see that the rights of these employees under the special legislation are properly looked after.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I have knowledge of the strike at this particular bank. On the 28th of this month Mr. Pat Conroy of the Canadian Congress of Labour stated that they were having some difficulty in negotiating with the bank. Through the agency of the conciliation staff of the Department of Labour a meeting was arranged. I understand that this was the first time they had sat down with the management of that institution, but unfortunately no agreement could be arrived at. I say "unfortunately" because of this day and age. I would point out that while this matter does not fall primarily within the jurisdiction of the federal government, we felt that if we could be of any assistance in conciliating this dispute we would be ready to give it. With regard to the other question raised by my hon. friend, I shall be glad to bring it to the attention of the Quebec regional board.

ALLEGED INTIMIDATION OF UNION WORKERS BY MOUNTED POLICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. S. St. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on the 23rd of April the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) asked a question arising out of complaints he had received from one Allan C. Wright, Canadian Congress of Labour organizer at Vancouver, alleging intimidation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in connection with the examination of his registration card, and also in connection with the conduct of one security officer in the plant of the Dominion Bridge company. I stated at the time that I would have an investigation made and give the result of the investigation as soon as it was available.

An investigation has been conducted and has established that Allan C. Wright's registration card was examined by members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at the request of the divisional registrar, Department of National War Services, Vancouver, as a routine check-up. Mr. Wright was not intimidated, no other matter was discussed, and he did not offer any objections.

In connection with the allegation that employees of the Dominion Bridge company, Vancouver, have been intimidated by a plant security officer and questioned regarding union membership, an investigation established that this complaint has no foundation in fact. No restrictions have been placed on any employees at the plant of the Dominion Bridge company, and access to the plant has not been denied to any accredited trade union organizer. Furthermore, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have no connection with this matter. If the hon. member wishes to have full details of the investigation I have made I shall be very glad to communicate them to him.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

"JOHN DE KUYPER"—QUESTION WITH RESPECT TO ADVERTISING AS GIN

On the orders of the day.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Return No. 303D of June 5, 1941, states that it is not permissible at any time to call de Kuyper's gin, a gin. I was greatly surprised to see an advertisement in the Montreal Standard of April 25 describing this concoction as gin. I ask the minister if he will be kind enough to submit this matter to his colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), for a legal opinion at the earliest possible opportunity.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): My attention has not been drawn to the publicity referred to by the hon. member, but I shall act immediately on his suggestion.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AUDIBILITY IN THE CHAMBER—SUGGESTED INSTALLATION OF LOUD SPEAKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. K. BLAIR (Wellington North): I should like to direct the attention of the ministry to the fact that 75 per cent of the members in this house do not hear what is said in this chamber. I do not think we can accuse the ministers of not speaking clearly, but there should be a loud speaker on the desk of every minister. When certain ministers are speaking I can hear what they say, but when other ministers are speaking I cannot hear a word. I am sure that this house would heartily approve of having a loud speaker on the desk of every minister so that we may be able to hear what is going on.

TAXATION

CONCESSION TO ENCOURAGE PROSPECTING FOR BASE METALS AND STRATEGIC MATERIALS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I should like to make a brief announcement of a tax concession which will be contained in the budget and which is designed to encourage prospecting in Canada for base metals and strategic materials. Certain of these metals, such as tungsten, chromite, molybdenum and manganese, for example, are vitally necessary in our war equipment and in manufacturing processes. The demand for them may increase sharply. Some present sources of supply hinge upon precarious ocean transportation. We must cut down wherever possible the risk of failure of supply. It is more than possible that we have undiscovered sources of these metals right under our very door-steps. It would be inexcusable to neglect this possibility, and the government has decided to assist in the search for these metals.

The tax concession, which will be available to both individuals and corporations, will be in the form of an allowance against income for income and excess profits tax purposes in respect of amounts contributed to prospecting syndicates registered with provincial authorities. A person may not claim an allowance of more than $500 in respect of any one syndicate, and there will be an over-all limit of $5,000 on the total amount which one person may claim. This would allow a person to participate up to $500 in each of ten syndicates. These allowances will be subject to the provision that in no case shall the tax saving to any person by reason of the allowance exceed 40 per cent of the amount of deductions. In addition, in registered prospecting syndicates it is proposed to allow mining companies and bona fide exploration companies a deduction up to $5,000 for expenditure in sending out their own prospectors. This allowance shall also be subject to the 40 per cent limitation on tax saving previously referred to.

The syndicates and companies would be required to satisfy the Minister of National Revenue that they had been actively engaged in prospecting for the metals and minerals in question under qualified persons during a substantial part of the 1942 season, and in the case of syndicates that they had carried out the purpose for which they were formed. An audited statement of expenditure will be required. These tax concessions will be given for one year only and will apply in respect of income for 1942. I am making this statement now because this prospecting should begin at once.

GASOLINE

RULING OF OIL CONTROLLER RESPECTING RATION UNITS UNDER CATEGORY A

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Munitions and Supply. In view of the ruling of the oil controller in respect to category A, that twenty-four units must be used in the summer months and only eight in the winter months, which will make it necessary for people with permanent homes in the country and offices in the city to close those homes in the winter and move into the city, will the minister look into the matter and see if this ruling can be changed so that these units may be available all the year round?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I feel quite sure that my hon. friend's interpretation of the ruling is not correct, but I shall refer the matter to the oil controller.

RADIO BROADCASTING

ORGANIZATION AND FUNCTIONING OF SELECT COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): I should like to ask the Minister of National War Services why the radio broadcasting committee, which was set up on March 13, has not yet been organized. When may we expect this committee to begin its work? I think we ought to have some explanation as to why it has not been set up before this?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): The committee will meet early next week.

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION BONUS

STATEMENT WITH RESPECT TO PAYMENTS OF $5,000 AND UPWARDS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Yesterday I agreed that when we reached the orders of the day I would give certain information with regard to payments under the wheat acreage reduction plan. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, and the permission of the house, if I may give this information without prejudice or without setting a precedent for the bringing down of lists of names in answer to questions on matters of this kind, I should like to give this information now.

The information desired is with regard to the persons who received payments of $5,000 and upwards under the wheat acreage reduction plan. It will be recalled by the house that under the regulations of last year provision was made for payment to any person who reduced his wheat acreage in the western provinces in the year 1941 as compared with an established acreage for the year 1940. There were seven cheques issued which exceeded $5,000 in amount, and the information desired was the names of the persons to whom these payments were made and their addresses.

The first name on the list which I have in my hand is Mrs. Marie Wilson, of Harris, Saskatchewan. The total decrease of wheat acreage made on the farms of Mrs. Wilson was 3,170 acres. The total number of acres of the reduced acreage that was placed in coarse grains was 977, which at $2 per acre amounted to $1,954; and in summer-fallow, 2,193 acres at $4, which amounted to $8,772, or a total of $10,726.

The second on the list is the Canada Permanent Mortgage company. The payments made appear on the list as having been made through the Regina office, although I think the head office of this company is in Toronto. This payment covers 218 farms located throughout the prairie provinces which I think are operated under a central organization that has been set up by the Canada Permanent Mortgage company. It is not for any one single farm. The total reduction in acreage made by the company on these farms was 20,320 acres. Coarse grains were seeded to 9,047 acres, which at $2 per acre made a total of $18,094; summer-fallow, 11,273 acres, which at $4 amounted to $45,092, or a total on the 218 farms of $63,186.

The next name on the list is G. H. Wesley, of Wrentham, Alberta. I am not familiar personally with the facts of this case. I do not know whether Mr. Wesley is an individual farmer or a man who operates a farm on a company basis, but the payment was made to Mr. G. H. Wesley, of Wrentham, Alberta. The number of acres put into coarse grains was 615, which at $2 amounted to $1,230; grass, 50 acres at $2, amounting to $100; summer-fallow, 3,145 acres at $4, or $12,580, making a total of $13,910 for a wheat acreage reduction of 3,810 acres.

Next on the list is Noble Farms Ltd., Nobleford, Alberta. The number of acres put into coarse grains was 149, which at $2 amounted to $298; summer-fallow, 2,635 acres at $4, $10,540, or a total of $10,838 for a reduced wheat acreage of 2,784.

J. T. Heninger, Lucky Strike, Alberta, put into grass 138 acres, which at $2 amounted to $276; summer-fallow, 1,441 acres at $4, or $5,764, making a total of $6,040 for a total wheat acreage reduction of 1,479.

H. Newfeld, of Lethbridge, Alberta, put into summer-fallow 2,250 acres, which at $4 amounted to $9,000. His wheat acreage reduction was 2,250 acres.

Wm. Kynock, of Maybutt, Alberta, put into coarse grains 805 acres, which at $2 amounted to $1,610; summer-fallow, 1,793 acres at $4, or $7,172, making a total of $8,782 for a total wheat acreage reduction of 2,598 acres.

HONG KONG COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION OF REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. Will he tell the house when we may expect the report of the royal commission set up to investigate the Hong Kong expedition? The commission in the United States which was appointed to investigate the Pearl Harbour bombing flew to Pearl Harbour and tabled its report with the President of the United States on January 24. I imagine that most of the members of the house would like to have the report on the Hong Kong expedition as soon as possible.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The entire proceedings of the Hong Kong inquiry have been under the direction and complete control of the Chief Justice of Canada. The Chief Justice has been giving his time continuously to the inquiry. I believe he has of necessity experienced delays in obtaining some of the evidence which had to be obtained from a distance and there may be other reasons as well, but I understand that he expects to be able to present his report to the government very shortly. As soon as it is received it will be tabled.

THE MINISTRY

REPRESENTATION OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is it the government's intention at this decisive hour to grant immediately to the province of Quebec the representation in the cabinet to which it is entitled?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that matter is being carefully considered, I may say.

WAR EXPENDITURES

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, April 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the appointment of a committee on war expenditures.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned yesterday I was giving some attention to the apparent duties of the committee according to the somewhat indefinite wording which I find in the resolution, and making suggestions as to how the committee's effectiveness might be improved. I should like briefly to refer to one item which I did not take time to cover yesterday, and after that I shall be done with this question. I refer to the words:

—to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein,

As these words stand, they are capable of an exceedingly wide interpretation. If I understand aright, the government's policy is to have a total war effort. In order to have a total war effort a great many things require attention in Canada which at the present time are not being considered. I do not suppose the Prime Minister has in mind the inclusion of all the subjects which could properly occupy the attention of the committee, but may I just suggest one. In order to have a total war effort it is extremely necessary that we should have a high degree of morale in the country. While this is not the place to discuss the question—I intend merely to refer to it very briefly—matters of this kind ought to come before some committee somewhere. I have in mind the question of non-pensioned veterans' war widows. This properly comes under the scope of other committees, but it is not specifically pointed out what this committee shall cover, and the war widows have been presenting their case for a good deal of time now. When veterans who are receiving war veterans' allowance die, the widows, no matter in what condition they may be, according to the information I have, are deprived of the income. The result is that we are causing a great many people in Canada to feel exceedingly unhappy, and that unhappiness is spreading in a way which is not building up the morale of the people at home or of the troops.

That is just one matter. I referred yesterday to the fact that the committee's duties might easily involve the consideration of the production of food and clothing and many other things. However, in the interests of cutting short the discussion so that the government may go on with its business, I will defer until some other time anything else I may have to say.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) was speaking yesterday afternoon he mentioned that the war expenditures committee had not investigated any of the war contracts. It was my understanding, as I looked across at the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), who was chairman of that committee last year, that he did not agree with that point of view and insisted that war contracts had been investigated. Now I have every regard for the minister, but, so far as my observation goes I must disagree with him. I was on the committee during the session of 1941, and no contracts were investigated at that time—that is, up to June 3. I was not present at the sittings of the committee between July 7 and August 21, but my reading of the report leads me to believe that no specific contracts were examined. Yesterday the Department of Munitions and Supply was specifically mentioned, and my understanding is that the chairman of the committee at that time said that contracts were investigated. I must repeat that while I was attending the sessions of the committee, contracts were not investigated. We did investigate the procedure. We had the deputy minister of the Department of Munitions and Supply before us, and I really believe, in view of all the circumstances, we expended too much time on acquiring information on the procedure followed from the time the Department of Munitions and Supply gets a request for material from any of the other departments. If my interpretation of the department's function is correct, it is largely a purchasing department. Orders do not initiate within that department; they come from some other department. I was on subcommittee No. 3, of which the Minister of National War Services was chairman. All our time was taken up with the investigating of the financial controls and the financial set-up in the various branches of the armed forces. I believe that the work was worth while and that good did accrue from it.

I have in my hand the report which was tabled on November 3 of last year. From a reading of it I cannot see that any contract as such was investigated by any of the subcommittees or by the committee as a whole. Subcommittee No. 1 dealt with precisely the same matters while it sat during the recess as it did while the house was in session—that is, contracts for civilian flying clubs, associations or companies, airports, aerodromes or air force building construction, specification or design, or such projects or inspection thereof during construction.

While the methods of calling for tenders and such things were examined, no specific contract was examined, so far as I can find. The paragraph in the report of this subcommittee dealing with those contracts reads as follows:

> The subcommittee finds that great care is exercised to assure secrecy of bids and assure competitive bidding. The subcommittee finds contracts are let on a lump sum basis or on a unit basis depending upon the nature of the work to be done. The subcommittee also finds that where all of the tenders are considered to be too high the contract is not awarded until tenders are again called for. In every instance the contract is awarded to the lowest bidder. Before the contracts are awarded the whole project is checked by the timber controller's office and the tenders are also submitted to the defence department interested for its approval. The subcommittee finds that the construction branch of the Department of Munitions and Supply is very efficiently managed and that precautions are taken to protect the public interest. During the year 1940 something over 92 million dollars worth of buildings were constructed.

This is clear proof that it was not the specific contracts that were examined, but the method and the procedure by which contracts were let.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then what did the committee do?

Mr. MacINNIS: Just what I said; it examined procedure. And there may have been a great deal to do in that regard. I want it to be quite clear that I am not finding fault with what the committee did; I am simply pointing out what the committee did not do, and it needs to be done.

Subcommittee No. 2 dealt with the matter of medical, dental and hospital services, also I believe with the matter of salvage and such things. Subcommittee No. 3 dealt with precisely the same matters as we dealt with when the house was in session last spring and summer. The three parts of the report are as follows:

Part 1 deals with the recommendations and principles enunciated in the interim report of former subcommittee No. 3.

Part 2 deals with the recommendations by the subcommittee in the light of the evidence submitted to it.

Part 3 deals with the evidence before the present subcommittee. It is an insight of the financial controls and checks operating within the Department of National Defence.

These are the matters that were investigated during the time the committee sat in 1941. While it was desirable to do this as a preliminary, I think a wider and more specific investigation should be carried out. It is more than time that we had a specific investigation of contracts, if for no other reason than to allay the suspicion that all is not well in our war production.

I think almost everyone admits the need for this committee. The Prime Minister, when proposing the committee to the house last year, stressed the desirability of having such a committee functioning. But there is a contradiction between this admission and the reluctance to start the committee going and the seeming hesitancy about having it investigate these very important matters. It is most desirable that the committee meet this year without delay. It should investigate and report on specific contracts that may be brought to its attention so that the public may be assured that no one is making financial gain out of the distress of the people at this time. A further function would be a continuation of what we did last year in regard to promoting thrift and efficiency in the organization and handling of our war production. As was pointed out yesterday by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas), such reports and such scrutiny would have an important effect on the morale of the people of this country.

It cannot be denied that in the setting up of war organizations and war boards almost the whole control has been put in the hands of big business and its representatives. This is a standing disgrace to the government. I wonder if this government remembers the investigation that was made by a committee of the house in 1934 into the activities of business organizations in Canada. Do they remember what was brought out and not contradicted? Have they forgotten the price spreads commission? I have under my hand a typical case of the kind of appointments made to responsible positions. Someone forwarded to me a press clipping from New Westminster referring to the appointment of a man to a position in the Royal Canadian Air Force. The headline reads:

Byron Johnson gets R.C.A.F. building post.

The item gives Mr. Johnson's biography. Let me read it:

Byron Johnson of New Westminster has been appointed representative of Hon. C. G. Power, air minister, in connection with the building of new air bases forming part of Canada's air defence programme, the Royal Canadian Air Force announced yesterday.

Mr. Johnson will act as technical adviser to the minister and deputy minister, S. L. de Carteret, reporting directly to Ottawa on the progress of various aerodromes and buildings in course of construction for the R.C.A.F., particularly in western Canada.

Here are his qualifications:

Mr. Johnson has been loaned to the dominion government by the firms with which he is associated. He is managing director of Gilley Brothers, Limited, and vice-president and director Evans, Coleman and Gilley Brothers, Limited, of New Westminster.

One of these is a fuel company and the other deals in lumber and building materials.

He has had long experience in operation of quarries, gravel pits, dredges and towboats and in the contracting industry.

Evidently this man's experience in dredging, quarries, tugboats and such things has eminently fitted him to be a supervisor of the building of airports. This is something that is continually going on, and it is sapping the morale of the people of Canada, to the extent that almost every person you meet is so cynical that people are just ready for anything. When people get to the state that they say nothing matters, then nothing does matter; they are ready for fascism or for anything that may come. This is what happened to the people in many parts of Europe. They lost faith in their government; they took the attitude that things could not be any worse than they were. It was not true, of course; things could be worse, but things were so bad that the people believed that when they were told it.

Then we have the investigations that are taking place in the United States into what the Standard Oil people have been doing. These matters have appeared in Canadian newspapers, and people realize that there is a very close association not only between big business in Canada and big business in the United States but between big business all over the world. According to the New Statesman and Nation, of London, under date of April 4, in the course of evidence given by the representative of Standard Oil this came out:

> Later in the year Standard Oil made arrangements with Mitsui of Japan, because, as it delicately put it, "As we fear the U.S. government, in the near future, may have grounds for action unfavourable to American and British trade, we consider it timely to organize with our Japanese partners."

In other words these representatives of big business realized that if hostilities broke out between the United States and Japan there would be a blockade, and they were getting ready to break the blockade. Let us remember also the evidence that came out after the last war with regard to the Briey iron mines in France, which were neither bombed nor attacked by artillery during the entire period of the war, and in which British, German and French investment was recognized and respected by all the belligerents.

These are facts which we must keep in mind. I suggest that this committee get to work as quickly as possible, and look into specific contracts. I doubt if there is a member of this house, at least on the opposition side, who has not had a number of contracts drawn to his attention in connection with which everything does not seem to be quite right. These contracts should be brought before the committee and investigated in every detail. I am satisfied that such an investigation will have a good effect upon the morale of our people, and will enable us to fight this war to a successful conclusion.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I was a member of the committee that was set up last year, and I attended its meetings not only while the house was sitting but also during a portion of the time it sat during the recess. I have a few suggestions to offer which occurred to me during the sittings of the committee, as well as certain criticisms in regard to the set-up of the committee. I am one of those who believe the committee had a great work to do, and I think the challenge to do that work is still before the members of the committee which will function during the present session, to contribute something worth while to reassure the people of Canada and to increase the morale of this nation.

At the outset I must frankly say as a member of that committee that I do not believe the committee discharged the responsibility which was placed upon it. I was on the subcommittee that dealt with air matters; with contracts with civilian flying clubs, associations and companies, and also with army, navy and air force buildings, construction, and so on. With regard to my relationship to the other members of the committee, I shall always look back upon it as a very happy experience. Let us look at the number of contracts that have been awarded since the outbreak of this war. I do not know the figure at the moment, because there has been no statement by the Department of Munitions and Supply since last September as to the number of contracts let. This committee, which was at least suggested in the fall of 1940, during last session sat for a period of only six weeks, during which time it was actually in session for a matter of only some thirty to forty hours in all. Then last summer, when the committee sat during the recess, the three subcommittees had a total of only eighty-three meetings. Subcommittee No. 1 had 29 sittings and called 49 witnesses. That was the subcommittee on which I served for part of the summer, until it became necessary for me to leave in order to attend to certain personal matters. During the entire period of my absence, however, the chairman was kind enough to have forwarded to me copies of the evidence that was taken, so that I know what was actually done while I was away. Subcommittee No. 2 had 29 sittings, and 15 witnesses appeared before it. Subcommittee No. 3 held 25 sittings and called 25 witnesses. In other words last summer these three subcommittees had a total of 83 sittings. The average length of a sitting was not over two or two and a half hours, but make it three hours, if you will. The committee which was set up by parliament to investigate the billions of dollars' worth of contracts that have been let sat in the aggregate since its inception for a total of not more than 280 hours.

That will give you the picture, Mr. Speaker. That will tell you whether it would have been possible to look into any contracts whatever. Personally I do not know of any individual contracts that were inspected and examined during the time I sat on subcommittee No. 1. We did study the question of the awarding of general contracts by which the training at air observer schools and elementary flying training schools was placed in the hands of civilian companies. That was all we did in so far as the matter of contracts is concerned, and a little later I am going to deal with the results of our work in that connection.

The recommendations made by the committee appeared in the Votes and Proceedings of November 3, 1941, and comprise some sixty or seventy pages. They represent findings based on the essence of the evidence that was taken; but to-day not a member of this parliament knows whether any of these recommendations has ever been carried into effect, and as yet we have not had an opportunity of discussing them. It was on November 3, 1941, that the Minister of National War Services placed these recommendations of the subcommittees on the table of the house. Yet to-day, months later, there is not an hon. member who has any idea whether all our work, short as it was and incomplete as it necessarily would be having regard to the scope of the task and to the all too few hours we spent on it, or whether any portion of the findings, the essence of which is to be found in the records of the said Votes and Proceedings I have mentioned, has ever been looked at, or has even been considered by any department of government.

The tremendous field before us was and is enough to overwhelm. Hon. members will realize the extent of the work undertaken when I say that if the members of the committee had taken up the contracts which had been awarded before the committee was set up, and if we had sat twelve hours a day from the date the committee was first thought of, in November, 1941, and had taken a reasonable length of time in the consideration of each contract, we would now be approaching only one-eighth of the contracts which had been awarded up to that time. For this reason we believed that the proper approach was simply to take under consideration first the general scheme of awarding the contracts and to ascertain whether or not improvements could be suggested in connection therewith. It was manifestly impossible to go further than that. I would have appreciated being on the committee again this year, were it not for the fact that I believe, because this is one of the major committees of parliament, the duty of serving on it should be passed around to the various members of one's group. The problem is so tremendous that the mere mention that contracts were being awarded at the rate of fifteen hundred a week when the committee commenced its sittings is enough to make anyone realize that it was not a public accounts committee where individual contracts could be looked into in particular.

We were not looking for scandal; we were not looking for wrongdoing. We had no opportunity to do so. Everything we did ascertain is concealed behind the secrecy established in the subcommittee on which I served.

Let us consider the set-up of the committee, and in that connection we might first consider the resolution forming it. I mention these points because frequently people will say, "Well, you have not shown any wrongdoing in connection with contracts awarded." In answer to that suggestion I reply that we never investigated any contracts, and I point out furthermore that we have no power to report to the house anything of an improper nature which may come to our attention.

The resolution reads:

> Resolved that a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war—

I am in agreement that it is possible for the committee to investigate contracts in the Department of Munitions and Supply. I believe its powers are wide enough for that, and I agree with the view to that effect which was expressed yesterday by the Minister of National War Services. You can investigate, but how much can you report? The resolution continues:

> —and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein.

In other words the only power we have is to investigate behind closed doors, and, having investigated, to report nothing but economies consistent with government policy. I point out, too, that when speaking on June 10 of last year in the house the Minister of National War Services explained that what took place in the committee was secret and that it could not be divulged, even to parliament—the parliament which had created the committee. At page 3751 of Hansard for June 10, 1941, I find this:

> Mr. Thorson: I rise to a point of order. The committee decided that the sessions of subcommittees should be held in camera. I think that means that the evidence given before such committee must be regarded as privileged. If the rule is relaxed in respect of one statement, then the whole value of "in camera" sessions is gone. If it is permissible to refer to a statement of fact given in "in camera" sittings, then it would follow that statements of expressions of opinion given in camera might also be stated in this house. I suggest to your honour that the distinction should be this: If any evidence or any facts are available from a source other than statements made in camera,—

And I emphasize the word "other"—

—then such evidence or facts may be given in this house. But statements that are made in camera and expressions of opinion given in camera ought to be regarded as privileged. Otherwise the purpose of "in camera" sessions is completely defeated.

So that the chairman of the committee, a minister of the crown, has stated that the proper view to take of the evidence placed before the committee is that it is entirely secret and cannot be referred to. Of the evidence given before the subcommittee, of which I was a member, there was not a line, not a word which by the greatest stretch of the imagination could have been considered as of possible benefit to the enemy. But there was evidence placed before that subcommittee which it was our duty and responsibility to place before parliament and the country, to the end that the people might be in a position to judge whether or not the system in effect of granting to civilian companies the right to turn out men for service in the air force of Canada is a proper one.

One objection I took at that time, and which I now repeat, is that if the committee is to be worth while, if it is to canalize the war effort of the nation by improving the morale and by making the people realize there is nothing wrong, while at the same time digging fearlessly to find out any wrongdoing, then the size of the committee should be extended. It is too small now, and is too overwhelmingly composed of members supporting the government.

I realize that in a time of peace there are certain regulations with respect to committees providing for distribution based on party membership in the house. Mr. Speaker, these are no ordinary times; this was no ordinary committee. I repeat my suggestion to the Prime Minister this year to do something he refused to do last year, namely to equalize representation on the committee so that we may have equal representation, with the exception of the chairman, the vice-chairman and the chairmen of the subcommittees. If that were done all of us could go to work in the committee realizing that there are no political considerations whatsoever, and we could work together to the end sought by the Truman committee of the United States senate, when it gave a unanimous opinion, irrespective of party, and when, summing up its activities, stated its aim to be that

The committee, however, wants the war to be won as soon as possible—

That is the purpose of this committee.

—and at a minimum expenditure of life and property. Carelessness and inefficiency have already cost us a great deal and, if continued, can cost us much more, even though in the long run we will win the war because of the sheer extent of our resources.

That committee was composed of members from both sides of the United States senate. It was not overwhelmingly Republican or Democrat. It handed down a report in the month of January to the United States senate which has resulted already in the saving of millions of dollars. I repeat that the membership of this committee should be equalized as nearly as possible between the opposition and the government. If the Prime Minister will not agree then I contend that there should be more subcommittees, that more members of this house should be given an opportunity of serving. In Great Britain there are seven committees—army, admiralty, air, supply, home defence, trade, agriculture, economic warfare, and finally a coordinating committee to coordinate the work of the other committees.

The private members of this house have asked for an opportunity to serve; therefore I contend that the size of this committee should be increased. It would then be possible to appoint a large number of subcommittees and would be enabled the better to attack this problem differently from the way we did last year because we had so few members. In my opinion the evidence given before this committee should be made available to the members of this house except in cases where the committee determines that it would not be in the public interest to do so. The secrecy of the evidence taken and thereby the concealment of the true situation from the people is something that I condemn and will continue to condemn. The secrecy of the proceedings is condemning this parliament before the people. Because of this secrecy people at home are saying that there must be something wrong. They are saying that this government has never made an admission of any shortcomings, and they realize that with the tremendous work that has been done, there must be some shortcomings. To-day the membership in this house is controlled entirely by the government of the day. It is a trend which has been accelerated during recent months; parliament is more and more being convened merely for the purpose of voting supply. The members of this parliament should be something more than voiceless vassals in connection with everything but the voting of supply. We have a right to know, the people have a right to know what is going on.

Following the results of the plebiscite, the Prime Minister the other day used some very significant words. I quote from page 1920 of Hansard:

> The questions that will have to be considered are all important and fortunately all members of the ministry and members of the House of Commons are now free to speak their minds without its being assumed for a moment that they are being influenced by any past commitments—

If the sentence stopped there it might have been all right, but it continues:

> —or considerations other than those which bear immediately upon the questions they are discussing.

What other considerations can there be that would prevent members of this house from speaking their minds? When members of the opposition rise in their places to voice fair and honest criticism, I cannot see what justification there is for members of the government invariably to point out that the war effort is being harmed thereby. Continue that trend and you destroy the independence of parliament.

Private members' days have been taken away. Why? Because there is an overwhelming majority supporting the government. Regardless of the fact that we insist on there being private members' days, these have been taken away. The right to place before parliament the things that we believe are necessary has been denied us. It was not denied in this chamber in the last war until 1918, just three or four months before the end of the war. The other day I looked up the records and I find that in 1916 private members debated such matters as the civil service, divorce reform, liquor restrictions, labour bureaux, wheat marketing, and women's suffrage. In 1917 such matters were debated on private members' resolutions as granting the franchise to women and the establishment of a department of physical welfare. In 1918 the coal policy was debated. As it should, the war took up then as now a large portion of the time, but I see no reason why private members' days should be denied, or at least should not be allowed in a restricted sense.

When the opposition asks questions to-day it is invariably met with the answer that it is not in the public interest to give the information asked for. Only yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) said that it was not in the public interest to tell the people of this country what was being done with their money in connection with agricultural payments. To-day, when he gave the information asked for, he did so in a way that I think this parliament should not accept. He said that he gave it without prejudice or without setting a precedent. If this trend is continued, if private members' days are taken away, if we have secrecy in a committee set up by parliament, if there is the extinction of our right to ask questions, what justification will there be for this house?

The other day Your Honour ruled that it was not proper that a question should be asked before the orders of the day unless it was of immediate importance. That ruling was quite right, but I would point out that in the British House of Commons, where the war is much closer than it is here or has been during recent months, two or three times a week members are allowed to ask questions of the ministers and to cross-examine them upon their answers. We are asked to accept the principle that ministers of the crown can answer by saying that it is not in the public interest to give the information, when the only justification for such an answer is some reason other than matters of state. I suggest that members on all sides of this house should get up and demand that answers be given.

If this practice is continued, regardless of the attitude adopted by other members around me, I intend to oppose it. If we can be put off with the reply that it is not in the public interest to answer, then our position as members of parliament is a mere sham. If this trend continues, this parliament will become nothing more than a sounding-board of the nation. If we are denied information on the ground that it is not in the public interest, the time may not be far distant when parliament and this country will be permitted to hear only the things and secure only the information which sounds well to the government, which in the opinion of the government will be to its interest to reveal. Against that I protest. The refusal to give information asked for from time to time is a serious infringement upon our parliamentary rights. I was glad to-day to find that three questions I had asked two or three days ago were answered. If the government would follow that example and provide us promptly with answers to the questions that are asked, there would not be so much objection to their not answering questions in the house on the orders of the day.

I protest against the secrecy of the war expenditures committee. Findings were made with some of which I disagree and I wish to take this opportunity to refer to some of the findings with which I disagree, for the reason that as yet we have not had the opportunity to discuss them which was promised us by the Prime Minister at the time the findings were brought down.

I was not present when the various findings of my subcommittee were made, and other members of the committee were not present. I point out that the recommendations made here are based upon the evidence that was taken before the committee, but I dissociate myself from the conclusions based on some of the evidence referred to herein.

The report sets out the number of flying training schools in Canada and the number of air observer schools—22 elementary flying training schools and 10 air observer training schools. These schools have on their shoulders the responsibility of turning out pilots and observers for the Royal Canadian Air Force, or at least of contributing to the training that leads to the final graduation of the pupils entering these schools. This system of turning over to a private company or to civilian corporations the training of the members of one branch of the military forces of the nation is not followed in Great Britain. A system somewhat along this line existed until the outbreak of the war, but when war came the stand taken by the British government was that there was no justification for training men for the army or for the tanks or for aircraft or other of the armed services in civilian schools operated by civilians for the profit of civilians. The report says, at page 551, referring to the elementary flying training schools:

> They are highly efficient and are carrying on their task without any thought of profits to the company or to private individuals; but the subcommittee also finds that under the great pressure of war work sufficient care has not been taken to safeguard the public interest as to what may happen in regard to profits after the war and when the war incentive will have ceased to exist.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: From page 551, the last sentence of paragraph 4. The elementary flying training schools in the main were set up and sponsored by flying clubs throughout the dominion. Very good salaries are paid to the operators. Those who put up the capital, $35,000 being the capital, receive 5 per cent, and if there is a surplus at the end of the war it is to accrue to the flying clubs in the interests of civil aviation. There were no controls, to speak of, which would have assured that these moneys would go to the flying clubs when the investigation commenced and last summer recommendations were made to prevent the shareholders of the elementary flying training schools from taking over the profit after the war, when patriotic incentive might very well tend to disappear. I think this house and the country has a right to know whether that recommendation of the committee was put into effect. Paragraph 5 of the committee's report says:

> The subcommittee recommends that all of the common stock of all elementary flying training companies should be held in trust for the flying clubs sponsoring the companies, and that in no instance should any individual be permitted to hold the beneficial interest of any common stock other than the qualifying shares of directors and that a declaration of trust should be taken with respect to these shares.

Was that done? Has anything been done along that line? As yet we have no information in that regard.

Mr. CLEAVER: Have you asked for it?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: At the moment I am dealing with the fact that the information has not been given.

Mr. CLEAVER: This is the first opportunity to give it. You have not asked for it before.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I shall be making further remarks with which my hon. friend may not agree, and he can make his speech when I have finished.

The committee recommended that the profit of 50 cents per flying hour received by the company should be reduced to 25 cents. Parliament met after that, and we were assured that that reduction had been made. Yet when our committee met in July and August of last year we found that these reductions had not up to that time been accepted and adopted.

At page 554 of the report the subcommittee recommended:

> That all profits should be invested in non-interest bearing Dominion of Canada bonds so that all profits earned will be available for war purposes until the end of the war. Most of the companies are already following this practice. The subcommittee has already recommended that the agreement should be amended making this compulsory.

Parliament has a right to know whether or not this recommendation was carried into effect.

I come now to what I consider is a subject of fair criticism, namely the establishment of air observer schools under civilian operation in this country. There are ten of them. These schools have received contracts from the government to train airmen as observers. The companies are capitalized at $50,000, and there is no limitation whatsoever on the profits which the companies are making. They are purely private companies. These companies have none of the justifications for their existence that the elementary flying training schools have, except in the results they achieve. I submit that the time has come when in the interests of the war effort of this nation the air observer schools should be taken over by the dominion and not be operated by civilian companies. At the present time these companies operating the air observer schools receive a management fee of $2,700 per month, and any saving they make on that basis goes to the operating company. In the matter of operation and maintenance, which includes salaries for pilots, engineers, electricians, mechanics, and so on, the agreement calls for the payment of a monthly target price, which in the first agreement was set at $17,500. The agreement also provides for a revision of the target price to make adjustment for changes made from time to time in the training syllabus. It further provides that every twenty-four weeks the target price will be revised in the light of existing costs and that any balance on hand in this account at the conclusion of the contract—and most of these contracts will end in March of 1943—will be divided on the basis of 75 per cent to the crown and 25 per cent as profit to the company.

Finally, there is provision for the payment of one dollar profit for every flying hour flown during the period. The committee recommended that that said amount be reduced to thirty-five cents. As yet we have no information as to whether this has been done. There is one item in the report which I challenge. At page 556 it is stated:

> The subcommittee has carefully considered the question of profits which will be earned by the operating companies. Partly on account of highly efficient management and partly on account of the pupil intake as fixed by the contract being increased without proportionate increase in management costs it was found that substantial profits were being earned.

It will be noted that this finding is surrounded by a good deal of explanation before you get to the fact, that "substantial profits were being earned". Then it says:

> The following examples of lunar monthly profits from one of the schools show an average profit of $1,112:
> | | |
> | Example No 1 | $1,176 |

This company is awarded a contract by the government to train men for the armed services, and even on the basis of this report would be making a yearly profit of $14,456, "under favourable conditions". I challenge, Mr. Speaker, the right of the members of the committee who drafted this report to reveal only part of the story and not the whole story; I challenge their right to try to explain away the very large profits at the air observers' schools which the operating companies are receiving. I do not know whether this is No. 1 or not, because there is no indication as to which it is, but I think this is the company which, in addition to showing the net profit here stated, paid to its parent company during one year $15,658.32 over and above what they showed as profit earned. In other words during the period of the first year this company made approximately $30,000, but was able, by showing payments to the parent company, to show that its profit was in fact less.

Mr. RALSTON: On what account were the payments?

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The minister asks, on what account. The payments were made to cover experience and responsibility on the part of the parent company, experience having been gained by its operations during the days of peace, and the other item for its responsibility to return the goods placed in charge of the company.

Mr. CLEAVER: And services. The hon. member has omitted a very important matter.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My hon. friend may explain this.

Mr. CLEAVER: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is referring to evidence given in secrecy and to matters not included in the report.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just as you did.

Mr. CLEAVER: I was stopped, and I am suggesting that the hon. member should be stopped. It is not fair. He is giving only half the picture.

Mr. McGREGOR: He is telling what you do not want to hear.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I do not think that that is a point of order.

Mr. CLEAVER: Mr. Speaker, I object, and I ask for a ruling as to whether the hon. member who is speaking has the right to quote from secret evidence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is quoting from the report.

Mr. CLEAVER: No, it is not in the report. What my hon. friend is referring to, is services rendered by the parent companies, and this is not mentioned in the report. If he wanted it in the report he should have been there when the report was prepared and asked that it be put in.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no point of order.

Mr. CLEAVER: I must press for a ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: As a matter of fact the question has been raised before with regard to what was said in secret not being available to the house. I believe I then ruled that the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) who has now spoken and who has raised the point of order could not refer to matters which were secret as before the committee, and he accepted the ruling and did not do so. With reference to the hon. member for Lake Centre who is now speaking, I did not know that he was alluding to something which was in a secret paper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He was replying to a question of the minister.

Mr. CLEAVER: That is not fair. He made the statement before the minister asked him.

Mr. RALSTON: I asked him, what account? I am just as ignorant as my hon. friend is; I was following the report and chasing down to find where the figure was which the hon. member had mentioned.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: My time has elapsed, but may I conclude with just one reference, because I do not want to go beyond my time. There are ten of these air observers' schools in Canada, and the time has come when they should be taken over by the government and profits should not be permitted to continue to accrue to private companies which operate the schools.

I point out in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that most of these schools are owned to-day by a great corporation, or should I say an auxiliary of a great transportation corporation —not the Canadian National Railways, which so far as I know has no interest in any of them. The time has come to take over these schools, and to take the profit away from private individuals in connection with training men for armed services. The government should take over these schools so that when the war is over Canada as a nation will be in a position to extend and develop her air services in all parts of the world.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): At the outset I should like to express regret that the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) will not be a member of the war expenditures committee this session. He did excellent work in the subcommittee of which he was a member, he contributed valuable criticism to the work of that subcommittee, and the vigour of his presentation was very helpful indeed.

The fourth report of the war expenditures committee last session recommended that the inquiry should be continued and that a committee should be set up this session for that purpose. Indeed, the work of such a committee as this can never be concluded; there will be plenty of work for a body of this kind as long as the war lasts.

Last year there was no restriction whatsoever upon the activities of the committee. I so stated yesterday; I also said that there would be no restriction upon the activities of the committee this year. The whole field of war expenditures is open to the committee for investigation for the purpose of recommending what economies are possible in connection with war expenditures consistent with government policy in the matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But nothing else.

Mr. THORSON: That is the function of this particular committee. The committee in the course of its sittings last session laid down certain fundamental principles. Some of them were referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre a few minutes ago. It was, I think, generally agreed that the war expenditures committee is not a public accounts committee and is essentially different in its functions from a public accounts committee. I think there was general agreement among all the members of the committee to that effect.

For example, it is not a primary function of the war expenditures committee to examine a particular transaction or to investigate charges in respect of a transaction.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is the point of disagreement.

Mr. THORSON: I think there was general agreement in the committee last year on that subject.

Mr. MacINNIS: I never agreed that that was not a function of the committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: Do they not examine contracts in England?

Mr. THORSON: I was very careful to point out that it is not a primary function of this committee to examine any particular transaction or any past transaction or to investigate any particular charges. The function of this committee is to recommend economies that may be possible. In order to enable it to recommend such economies it may have to go into particular transactions and examine them, but there is an essential difference between the functions of such a committee as this and the functions of a public accounts committee. May I say that it is open to any hon. member to bring any particular transactions before the public accounts committee. He may move that a particular transaction be referred to the public accounts committee. But I think it will be agreed that there is an essential and fundamental difference between the purposes of this committee and those of the public accounts committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This is the public accounts committee for war expenditures.

Mr. THORSON: Similarly any account, any contract, any transaction may be referred by any hon. member to the public accounts committee; he may move that any particular transaction go to the public accounts committee. That is his prerogative and his right.

Similarly it was agreed that this committee is not primarily a fact-finding committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then it is utterly useless.

Mr. THORSON: No, it is not utterly useless. The work this committee did last year was exceedingly valuable—

Mr. MacNICOL: The money spent on it was utterly useless, if that is all it produces.

Mr. THORSON:—and was instrumental in bringing about a good many economies, as I shall elaborate as I proceed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the minister believe that the function of this committee is to examine the expenditures?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Then does he not think the committee has to make the examination by looking into the transactions?

Mr. THORSON: They may—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: They should.

Mr. THORSON:—and they will. If the hon. member will allow me to continue, he will see that the work of the committee proceeded in an orderly manner, first, for the purpose of ascertaining what controls and checks there were, then to indicate what controls and checks there ought to be; then the intention was that the committee would move from such inquiries into any particular transactions that the committee wished to investigate. I think hon. members will see the plan upon which the committee operated and the sound reasons that lay back of that plan of procedure.

I think it was agreed that the committee is not primarily a fact-finding committee. It could not possibly examine the hundreds, the thousands of war contracts individually. If it had started in with the examination of individual contracts, it could not have accomplished the functions for which it was designed.

The committee is not restricted, as the British committee is, to the examination of present expenditures, it may look into past expenditures, but its purpose in looking into past expenditures is to ascertain what economies might be possible for the future.

The wording of the reference, which is exactly the same as the reference in the case of the British committee, subject to what I have just said, is that the committee should "examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein."

Therefore primarily the committee is an economy recommending committee. That, I think, makes its functions essentially different from those of a public accounts committee or those of any special committee that may be set up for the ascertainment of any particular sets of facts.

The committee is the master of its own procedure; it is also the master of its subjects of inquiry. It consists entirely of private members; no member of the government is on the committee; there are no governmental instructions to the committee; the reference is as broad as it is possible to devise. There were no restrictions upon its activities last year; there are no restrictions upon its activities this year.

Last year when the committee opened its inquiry it held open sittings. Six sittings were devoted to the Department of Munitions and Supply for the purpose of ascertaining the manner in which that department functioned, the manner in which it awarded contracts, the extent to which it awarded contracts on the basis of tenders, the extent to which it departed from that basis in awarding contracts and the principles subject to which it awarded contracts on a basis other than by tender. We explored the organization of the department, the checks and controls that existed in the department to see that matters were conducted with regularity and economy; we investigated such subjects as cost accounting in the department itself, the controls exercised by the comptroller of the treasury, the controls exercised by the joint inspection board of the United Kingdom and Canada, the controls exercised by the treasury board and by the auditor general.

Later, as subject after subject was brought to the attention of the committee, it became clear and obvious to every member of the committee that we must operate by subcommittees if we were to make the best use of the services of the members of the committee and cope with the tremendous volume of work that lay before the committee. That was essential. Consequently the committee resolved itself into three subcommittees, which sat during the period the house was in session and for six or seven weeks during the adjournment. When these subcommittees concluded their work, during the adjournment of the house, they made individual reports which were the basis of reports of the whole committee, which reports were all tabled on the reopening of parliament on November 3.

The fifth report dealt with contracts with civilian flying clubs, associations or companies; the sixth report with army, navy and air force buildings construction, specifications and designs for such projects, and the inspection thereof during construction; the seventh report with medical, dental and hospitalization services in the army, navy and air force; the eighth report with food and other supplies including miscellaneous services for the forces, the inspection and distribution thereof; the ninth report with the salvage of waste; the tenth report with such subjects as financial controls over army, navy and air force expenditures, and headquarters establishments in army, navy and air force.

All these reports indicate that the first subjects to be explored were activities which were initiated in the departments of national defence. There was a reason for this. The House of Commons sees the war appropriation bill for the first time when it is introduced in this house. The war appropriation is based upon estimates that come from the departments of national defence after going through a certain procedure; through the treasury board, to the war committee of the cabinet and to council. Then they become the basis for the appropriation bill which is submitted to parliament. But these estimates are themselves based upon war establishments, and it was thought that it would be wise to see what economies were possible in the defence departments, where these expenditures originated. Therefore a great deal of our time last year was devoted to an investigation of checks and controls. I believe hon. members will find an excellent statement of the checks and controls in effect at the present time over army, navy and air force expenditures—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister would permit an interruption, that was all academic. Did the committee, after some six or eight sessions, make any recommendation to improve or remedy conditions with respect to those checks and controls?

Mr. THORSON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What was that recommendation?

Mr. THORSON: I pointed out that the estimates themselves are based upon war establishments. Perhaps the outstanding recommendation of the subcommittee which dealt with that particular subject was that there should be a war establishments committee in every defence department where such a committee did not already exist; furthermore, that a financial superintendent should be appointed in each of the defence departments where such an office did not already exist, and that such financial superintendent should be a civilian, responsible to the deputy minister and be a member of the war establishments committee. That was recommended on the ground that there was need for civilian authority and control in the matter of army, navy and air force expenditures; not on the assumption that there should be civilian authority over the service personnel, or service personnel superiority over the civilian authority, but with the idea that each should be in aid of the other and complementary to the other, so that the matter of financial control should not be restrictive of the war effort but in aid of it. That is why the committee adopted as its objective a certain purpose, namely, that the people of Canada should know that there was at Ottawa a committee of private members of parliament concerned with seeing that a dollar's worth of war effort should be given in return for every dollar contributed to the war effort by the Canadian people, either by way of taxation or by way of loan.

These recommendations to which I have referred have been adopted, actually or in principle. In respect of the appointment of a financial superintendent, there already was such an officer in connection with the army. Since our recommendations were made, a financial superintendent has been appointed in the Department of National Defence for Air, and a similar appointment is proposed in connection with naval services. A war establishments committee was already operating in the army, and in November of last year, after our report was made, the financial superintendent was made a member of that committee. The principle has been adopted in the navy. In the case of the air force, a war establishments committee has been appointed, of which the financial superintendent has been made a member. I think these basic recommendations made by the committee will result in complete cooperation between the civilian authority and the service personnel in the matter of those controls and checks which are essential to the most efficient performance of the duties that are assigned to those departments.

In that regard I think a valuable contribution was made by this committee to the work of the defence departments, all three of which have expressed their appreciation of the assistance given by the committee in enabling them to put into effect the reforms that were recommended in the report, which reforms not only effect economies but promote efficiency in the departments as well. The primary purpose last year was to investigate that field of war expenditures that actually lay behind the war contracts, because it was in that field that the greatest economies were possible, and it was in that field that there was the greatest need for checks and controls.

A very full and complete statement of the existing checks and controls is contained in pages 627 to 643 of No. 15 of the minutes of proceedings of the special committee. This also appears at pages 585 to 601 of the Votes and Proceedings of November 3, 1941; I commend the reading of that statement to members of this house. They will see that we have a system of careful checks and controls of war expenditures, starting with the very origin of these expenditures.

They will understand the importance of the recommendations made by the committee in the matters of checks and controls. I am sure hon. members will be glad to see the manner in which the defence departments have acted in respect of these essential and fundamental recommendations of the war expenditures committee.

The war expenditures committee having explored the checks and controls that are in existence, and having indicated the additional checks and controls that there ought to be, then it was a logical matter to go into specific transactions and specific departments. The war expenditures committee, having explored these fundamental and foundational matters may now, with some understanding, go into the subject of war contracts and specific transactions generally. The committee may investigate any war departments, indeed any department of the government that receives war appropriations, and explore any of their activities connected with the war.

I suggest that there is reason in going about this exploration in an orderly manner. We have written into the record what I think is a valuable contribution to the system of checks and controls that there ought to be in the case of war expenditures. I think the committee may now usefully explore the activities of the Department of Munitions and Supply. Indeed, if I had been honoured with the chairmanship of the committee this year, as I was honoured last year, I would have suggested to the committee that the whole subject of war contracts should be made the subject of study during this session of the house. May I say this, that the government invites the closest scrutiny of any war contract and has no hesitation in extending that invitation. May I say again something I could not have said last year, on my responsibility as a member of the government, that there is no restriction whatsoever upon the activities of this committee. This is a committee charged with the duty of examining all war expenditures for the purpose of recommending economies. May I say further that if hon. members of this committee run into anything that they think should be referred, any member of the house has a right to move that such transaction be referred to the public accounts committee. That is a right any member has. It is open to any member to do that.

As we explored the subject of checks and controls last year, so the committee this year may study the subject of war contracts. I have no hesitation in saying that the Department of Munitions and Supply is one of the achievements of this government. It started off by being the central purchasing agent for all defence departments, after the awarding of contracts had been taken away from those departments. There was first of all the defence purchasing board, then the war purchasing board and, finally, the Department of Munitions and Supply. When the history of that department is written it will be one of the romances of the war effort of this country—and I say that without any hesitation at all. It started off as a central purchasing agent, but it has gone far beyond that. It is now also the controller of supplies. It has gone far beyond the simple function of being a central purchasing agent.

It has been instrumental in capital assistance. That is one subject that members of the committee should thoroughly and carefully explore. It has also set up a large number of government-owned companies for purposes of the war. Capital assistance has amounted to approximately half a billion dollars. There are eleven government-owned companies directly associated with the war effort. Their names, as set out at page 641 of the minutes of proceedings No. 15 of the special committee on war expenditures, are as follows:

Allied War Supplies Corporation
Federal Aircraft Limited
Research Enterprises Limited
Small Arms Limited Wartime Housing Limited
Fairmont Company Limited
Melbourne Merchandising Limited
Plateau Company Limited
Citadel Merchandising Company Limited Wartime Merchant Shipping Limited
War Supplies Limited.

The functions of these various government-owned companies are varied. Some of them are supervising companies; others are manufacturing or construction companies. Again, others are commodity procurement companies, while others are purchasing companies. To a very large extent the government has embarked upon public ownership of the production and procurement of munitions of war. I suggest that these are all exceedingly interesting subjects for inquiry—the whole subject of war contracts; the whole subject of capital assistance; the whole subject of publicly-owned companies engaged in the war effort of the country.

Reference has been made to the matter of war contracts. There are thousands of these contracts. It would be a most stupid method of procedure to start in to examine each individual contract. There would be far more sense in examining the principles subject to which these contracts are awarded, the considerations governing the awarding of these contracts and the general principles involved, so as to indicate in what way there may be an improvement in the situation, from the point of view of economy and efficiency.

Approximately 95 per cent in number of all contracts awarded is by the tender system. But there are some purchases made where the tender system cannot be used; these purchases fall into the following categories, as detailed at page 640 of minutes of proceedings No. 15:

(a) Where extreme military urgency requires immediate delivery.

(b) Where the requirement is so large that the productive capacity of the entire industry must be harnessed.

(c) Where the technical nature of the article required narrows the field of supply to one or two sources.

(d) Where, in the interests of military secrecy, it is considered unwise to give plans and specifications to more than one or two firms, such to be chosen because of their aptitude in this particular type of manufacture.

I know that some feeling has been created in the house because on a number of occasions the government has stated that it is not in the public interest to give certain information. We have given far more information than the British government has ever given. We are proud to be allies of Great Britain in this great conflict; the fact is that the British government has asked us not to give out information that we have been giving out. This is not done for the purpose of hiding anything. The government has nothing to hide. We can give this information to committees sitting in camera. I say again, if any member of this house thinks that a transaction ought to be referred to the public accounts committee, he can rise in his place and move to refer such transaction to that committee.

This raises the whole question of "in camera" proceedings. I do not know why members use the phrase "sitting in secret", when the proper phrase is "sitting in camera".

An hon. MEMBER: What is the difference?

Mr. THORSON: There is a vast difference. The committee did not sit in camera for the purpose of hiding anything; it sat in camera for the purpose of finding out things. The British committee on war expenditures sat always in camera, both the committee of the whole and the subcommittees. There was not a single session of the British committee, either sitting as a whole or as subcommittees, that was held otherwise than in camera. There is no parliament anywhere in the world that is more jealous of its rights and prerogatives, or more deeply concerned with doing its duty than the British parliament. In this regard the British parliament is an excellent model and example for us to follow, as we follow the British house in so many respects.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How many sittings have they had in the last two years?

Mr. THORSON: They have had a good many. A number of the recommendations made by the British committee have been in effect in Canada for a long time; it is only recently that the British government has been following some of the examples that we have set in the matter of a Department of Munitions and Supply, a central purchasing agency for all defence departments and so on. Our action will be also a model for the United States. They have acknowledged freely the value of the system that we have set up for the central purchasing and control of materials and commodities such as exists in our Department of Munitions and Supply.

There are arguments for sitting in camera as well as for sitting in open session. Last year we sat in open session part of the time, and in camera for most of the sittings of the subcommittees. The committee is completely master of its own proceedings; it can decide whether they shall sit in open session or in camera. The example of the British committee indicated the value of sitting in camera, and I express my own opinion as to the value of sitting in camera. There are arguments both ways, but I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that the argument in favour of an inquiry of this sort sitting in camera is overwhelming.

I know there is value in having the press present and in having the proceedings open, but if the essential purpose is to make recommendations for economy, as is the purpose of this committee, then it can best discharge this duty by sitting in camera. It is not a matter entirely of secrecy, although all matters of secrecy must be carefully guarded. I do not put the case for sitting in camera on the basis of secrecy; that is only a small part of it. I put it on a much wider base, and I indicated that base in the speech I made in this house last session. I gave two reasons, and I put forward one of them quite frankly and without intending to give offence to anybody.

If members sit in camera they will give more direct and more concentrated attention to the subject that is at hand than they would if the sittings were in the open with the press present. There will be fewer speeches made by members; there will be fewer efforts made to catch the head-lines. When I make that statement, I intend it to be general and applicable to all members. If there is no press there, if there is no competition to make the head-lines, members will be inquiring into what is before them rather than making speeches about something. Making speeches does not advance an inquiry. An inquiry is something that must be made with undivided attention to the subject that is at hand. That is one point, but it is not the most important reason for sitting in camera.

This committee is charged with the duty of recommending economies. In order to discharge that duty intelligently it must get information from either service personnel or civilian members of the various departments who have all the facts, who know all the surrounding details, who know whether economies are possible. Therefore it is necessary that there should be the freest and fullest interchange of opinion between those persons, whether service personnel or civilian, and members of the committee. Everyone who has had experience with parliamentary inquiries knows that you cannot have that full and free exchange of opinion—not statements of fact—except in confidence. It is only human for persons who are in the public service to freeze up when they know that everything they state, that every opinion they express may possibly be blazoned on the head-lines. There ought to be a free exchange of opinion, a mutual searching between the officers of the departments and the members of the committee for ways and means of effecting economies.

Let me say again that this is not a fact finding committee; this is a committee for the investigation of transactions, if you like, but for the purpose of recommending economies. There is another committee that can investigate particular transactions if it is felt that an investigation of such transactions should be made. I say again it is open to any member of the committee to move that a particular transaction be referred to a standing committee of this house, the public accounts committee.

The experience of that free exchange of opinion last year was splendid. It was valuable. It enabled the committee to recommend outstanding reforms, many of which have been put into effect and practised, with increased economies and increased efficiency resulting.

In the subjects that are before the committee this year, such as war contracts, there is the fullest possible scope for inquiry as to the various bases upon which contracts are awarded, when they are awarded otherwise than on the basis of tender. That opens a great field of inquiry, but a field that could not be fully or properly explored by sitting down and indiscriminately seeking to analyse all the facts of each individual contract. There has to be a certain amount of confidence in the fact that we have people in the department who are devoted servants of the public and are seeking to do their best.

So far as tenders are concerned, I should like to suggest to hon. members that they read the statement on checks and controls relating to war contracts and relating to purchasing in the Department of Munitions and Supply contained in pages 635 to 643 of volume No. 15 of the minutes of proceedings, and they will see what system of checks and controls there is in that department. How can that system be improved to bring about economy? That is a first-class and important subject of inquiry.

Then there is the matter of capital assistance. Are the conditions subject to which capital assistance is granted satisfactory—and we have spent approximately half a billion dollars in capital assistance? Can the conditions be improved? Can economies be effected in that field? Similarly with respect to the operations of the eleven government-owned companies set up for the purpose of aiding this country in its war effort, are those operations being carried on satisfactorily? All of these subjects are open to the committee this year.

Last year, as I pointed out a moment ago, the committee adopted as its chief objective that its purpose should be to see that Canada should get a dollar's worth of war effort for every dollar contributed by the Canadian people. I think I can say that last year the committee did excellent work. It was concerned with results. Not one of the members of the committee sought to glorify himself. They could have brought in estimates of large amounts of proposed economies. They did not do so, but they brought forward recommendations that will result in tremendous economies, and economies that are possible without in any way reducing the efficiency of our war effort. All of the war departments of national defence have expressed their appreciation of the cooperation of the committee. The committee last year was a stimulating factor in the promotion of economy reforms. The very existence of the committee has an extremely salutary effect, for no war department knows when its affairs may be examined or its expenditures scrutinized. The committee may well follow up all of its recommendations of last year to inquire what progress is being made in implementing them where they have not already been adopted, because there is always a value in following up an inquiry of this sort.

The work of this committee is not easy. It is very difficult. It is also very interesting and exceedingly important. Of course there are differences of opinion, but I think they have been bona fide differences of opinion. I think I may speak fully and freely when I say that the government invites criticism. I have myself frequently expressed appreciation of the value of criticism, and on this first occasion to speak on this subject as a minister of the crown I invite criticism. Criticism is helpful. But there must also be an appreciation of certain fundamentals. There is a vast difference between giving out facts in this house and giving information to a committee sitting in camera, and I am sure that members of the house on both sides will appreciate those fundamental differences.

Cooperation is essential; differences of opinion are unavoidable, and they are valuable because "it is only upon the anvil of discussion that the spark of truth is struck." I forget who was the author of that saying, but it is a very helpful one. We must have discussion. But at the same time we are engaged in a war effort in which every person in this country is vitally interested, and we must avoid giving information which may be of value to the enemy. Very frequently, again and again and again, for reasons which it cannot even properly give, the government is handicapped. It could answer certain criticisms easily if it felt that it could properly say certain things. But it often cannot safely make the answers without disclosing facts that should not be disclosed. While the government invites criticism, may I also suggest this, that members of the house extend a certain amount of confidence and faith in those who are engaged in this country's administration. I think they are entitled to that, and I believe that members of this house know they are entitled to have it. We would gladly give on the floor of the house the information asked for if we could properly do so, because I am satisfied that we have nothing to hide. Members of the committee, however, can get the fullest information. Members may not always be able to get information on the floor of the house for reasons of public policy, but I do not remember a single instance when a person came before the subcommittee, of which I was chairman, where information was refused. Sometimes the information was given off the record when it could not be given otherwise. There has to be cooperation, and a certain amount of faith and confidence in those who are charged with the administration. Let me assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we are just as deeply interested and concerned in the successful issue of this war effort as hon. members opposite are, and there is upon our shoulders a very heavy responsibility.

Mr. MacNICOL: On everybody's shoulders.

Mr. THORSON: And upon everybody's shoulders. I believe that this committee can do a marvellous job. I think it did a fairly good job last year, although perhaps it is not for me to say so. I regarded it as a great privilege to be chairman; I was deeply appreciative of the cooperation that was given me from all sides. Differences of opinion—yes, but unity of purpose—likewise yes. I hope that when this committee sits again there will be that same unity of purpose in the discharge of a very difficult but very interesting and important task.

I hope that this motion will pass the house with unanimity.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In view of what the minister says of the marvellous job which has been done by this committee—and I agree with him—will he tell us why the committee was not set up at the beginning of the session rather than at this late date?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was impossible to secure the names of some of the members of the committee; that is the reason.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, being one of the newer appointees on this committee, I wish to say a few words with regard to it. I did not have the privilege of sitting on the committee which worked last year, but I have read very carefully the report of its proceedings and have noted with a good deal of interest what the minister has said to-day with regard to carrying on the committee's work of last year. I was pleased to hear of its work and I thought I had some idea of its functions, until the minister in charge finished his speech. I confess that I am now rather confused as to what the real purpose of the committee was. For instance, he said that primarily its function was not to investigate any particular contract. I assume, therefore, that it was not the privilege of the committee or any member thereof to bring up any particular contract, but it was their privilege, as it is the privilege of any member of the house, to ask that that particular contract be referred to the public accounts committee. To me that is very confusing.

Mr. THORSON: The committee may inquire into any contract into which it wishes to inquire.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, but the minister said that primarily that was not the function of the committee.

Mr. THORSON: Primarily—no.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If the committee is going to rule that that is not a primary function—

Mr. THORSON: There has never been a ruling at any time that there could not be an inquiry into a particular contract, and it is open to the committee to inquire into any contract. I cannot be too clear on that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It never got that far.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): This is a little confusing, because the chairman knows as well as I do that a majority of the members of that committee were supporters of the government.

Mr. MacNICOL: Exactly, and you could not get anywhere.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When there would be brought before the committee the question of investigating any particular contract, it is useless to say that a member had the right to investigate it, because he had not. I would point out to the minister that it would be a great deal more satisfactory if he would accept the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) that this body should be made as non-political as possible, by having an equal representation of government and opposition members, possibly with the exception of the chairman. I supposed that I had the purpose of the committee straightened out in my mind, and I can now quite well understand why there has been much confusion with regard to the matter.

The minister said that one of the primary functions of the committee was to see to it that a dollar's worth of work, goods or services, was obtained for every dollar spent.

Mr. THORSON: That is the objective.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I submit to him that that is an utterly impossible ideal to set before the committee in view of the fact that it did not investigate a single contract. How in the world could they find out, for example in connection with a contract submitted for the manufacture of aeroplanes, whether a dollar's worth of services was rendered for each dollar spent. That would have been a useful avenue to follow with regard to some of the larger contracts.

Mr. THORSON: Name some of those contracts.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I could name some of the aeroplane contracts. I could also name some in connection with gasoline. My information is that it would be well worth our time to go into some of them.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And wartime housing.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There is suspicion all over this country—the minister will admit it—that huge profits are being made. In instances where it is suggested—and there are good grounds for the suspicion—that excessive profits are being made, it would have been well for the committee to make an investigation. It would have cleared up a tremendous amount of misunderstanding and, by tending to raise the morale of the country, have definitely helped our war effort.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): When the house rose I was discussing the apparently confused operations of the war expenditures committee. It seems that there has been a great deal of confusion over the order of reference relating to this committee. It must be evident to the house that there should be a clarifying of this order of reference. I was interested in the remark of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) in regard to the Department of Munitions and Supply when he said it was one of the greatest achievements of the war. He pointed out that under this department something over a billion dollars had been spent in the setting up of government-owned industries. I think the minister is perfectly right in saying that the Department of Munitions and Supply is one of the most important departments of the government at this time. I have persistently maintained that that department, which controls the production of this country, is most important, and we should not overlook the fact that that department should have, shall I say, a thorough investigation, not that I am trying to imply that the minister in charge is inefficient in handling that department, but in view of the great importance of that department.

The Minister of National War Services also tried to differentiate between a secret session and a session held in camera. I agree with the greater part of that statement; I can see a decided advantage, if it is properly handled, in the committee itself sitting in camera, if it is clearly understood that when the report of the committee is brought back to the house and concurrence in that report is moved, the members of this house in secret session be allowed to go into every detail of the work that was carried on in the committee. I do not think it is right that that committee should carry on its work in camera and the members of this house as representatives of the people of Canada have absolutely no information as to what was going on. It is also a matter of note that members of this house are ignorant of what policies or recommendations of the committee were accepted by the government itself. I recall just lately one of the members who was on that committee stating that he did not know of one recommendation of the committee that was adopted by the government. That seems to make the committee useless.

I also note that in the entire work of the committee they had only eighty-three sittings. That does not seem to be anything approaching a thorough investigation of the problems set before that committee. The work was thought to be so voluminous that the committee divided itself into three parts, each part taking a separate portion of the work. But my understanding is that never did those three subcommittees sit at the same time, on the same day; the reason being that there was a shortage of reporting staff. That is rather shocking, when you think of a committee of that size going to all the trouble they did go to, staying here in Ottawa away from their own work during those six weeks; yet one of those committees at least had to sit idly by because the reporting staff was not large enough to take care of the three subcommittees sitting together. Therefore it seems to have been useless to set up three subcommittees, especially when they worked only two or three hours a day.

I am not trying at all to belittle the work of the committee, because from reading the record I know that a great deal of strenuous work was carried on by it. Yet I am told that there was a great deal of confusion among the members of the committee themselves, not knowing where they were going. I hope that having had the experience of the past year's work in that regard, the Prime Minister will see to it that those difficulties are removed.

The work of the committee must necessarily entail a great deal of interviewing of officials from different departments to get the detailed information that the committee requires. But I cannot bring myself to believe that the committee will ever get anywhere unless it examines more thoroughly into the contracts, regardless of what the Minister of National War Services said, as chairman of that committee, that it was not a fact-finding committee. I really do not know what that term involves. He said it was not the function of the committee to investigate particular contracts. I think there will have to be a re-examination of the order of procedure of the whole thing.

Giving all due credit to the members of the committee for the work they did and the laborious time they had, I often doubt whether the results were worth the efforts made. It may be recalled that, speaking in the house a couple of weeks ago, referring to this committee, I expressed the opinion that the scope of reference should be widened to include production and the organization of production. I am more convinced now than I ever was that that is our problem, and that is why I referred a moment ago particularly to the Department of Munitions and Supply. If we are going to win this war we must get rid of that inferiority complex, saying that we are doing well enough. When a question is put to a minister in regard to contracts with a certain company, the reply is usually, "Well, that company has more contracts now than it ever had in its history." That is no answer to the question at all. Surely to goodness in war time it should not be a matter of whether or not a company has more contracts than it ever had before. The point should be, is it producing to capacity; could it produce more if certain changes were made. Perhaps we have now reached the point where some headway can be made, for in my opinion that is the most important question confronting this nation at the present time, and it seems to be the question that is most evaded.

I do not want to belittle the suggestion that the saving of money is important, but, after all, that is not my great concern at this time. I think money should be made the servant and not the master of this nation. I do not want to criticize the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) too severely, but I am quite convinced that he is not capable of carrying on the tremendous work of placing orders, checking those orders, checking costs and all the other work that is entailed in seeing that the production organization of this country is such that we can carry on at maximum capacity. The expression has often been used, even by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, that we are doing a marvellous job, that we are producing 100 per cent to capacity. Certainly that is not correct, and I think it is the wrong sort of propaganda to be putting out to the country. The fact is that though I have visited a number of factories I have never found one which, in my opinion, was doing what it should be doing, that is, working to anywhere near capacity. For us to go out and tell this nation that we are producing to capacity is, in my opinion, breaking down the morale of the people. They have only to walk by the factories to see the situation. They see some of them closing at five o'clock in the afternoon. They go by the employment offices in the cities and see hundreds of men unemployed. Finally they reach the point where they say, "Well, if the government is not more concerned about the safety of the empire than that, why should we worry?"

I have spoken to men working in certain factories. I have been told that the manager of a plant deliberately told his men that they must not work so quickly. One chap told me that the manager of a factory producing war material had this to say to him. This man's job was boring holes in pieces of iron. The foreman of the factory said, "We want you to drill fifteen holes to-day". The man replied, "Why, I can drill thirty." The manager said, "We are not asking you what you can do. We are telling you to drill fifteen." The man answered, "All right; I will drill two if you say so." This is the sort of thing that should be looked into by this committee, I contend, and this is exactly what I want to point out to the Prime Minister. I do not think the Minister of Munitions and Supply has time to investigate all these cases, but when members of this house have information such as this, I believe the committee should conduct a thorough investigation. Another man in the same factory, whose job was sawing metal, told me that the foreman said to him, "When anyone comes by, pretend you are cutting this piece of steel in two." Imagine that; he was to pretend he was doing some work!

We know that in the past delegations of workmen have come to Ottawa to interview various ministers. These skilled mechanics have come here from factories producing army trucks, and so on. They did not come to ask for any increase in wages; they came to complain because the factory was deliberately slowing down its production. I do not need to tell hon. members what plants I have in mind; they know. These are perhaps the three largest plants in Canada. If the cabinet have not already interviewed another of these committees, they soon will be meeting a group of men who are coming down to see them in regard to paper production in Canada. I was astonished to hear, as I think the Prime Minister will be astonished when he hears, that although those in charge of the salvage campaign are advertising far and wide that there is a great shortage of paper and that we must save every scrap of paper we can, there is one large paper mill in this country which, in war time, is working only three days a week.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Where is that?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is the Abitibi plant.

Mr. LACROIX (Beauce): And the St. John Paper company in Quebec.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that with a situation like that there is simply no use in talking about an all-out war effort, or in trying to keep up the morale of the people. These fellows said to me on the train, "You ought to walk down the streets of our town and hear what the people are saying about our war effort."

Mr. McIVOR: I do not think that is generally true, and I can give examples to the contrary.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am not going to permit the hon. gentleman to interrupt like that.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I want to ask you this, Mr. Speaker. Is it true in one instance? If it is, that is a crime. If it is true in the case I mentioned and in connection with the factory mentioned a moment ago by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix), here we have two factories at least that are working only part time. The mere fact that the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) knows of one factory working full time is not evidence of an all-out war effort.

Mr. McIVOR: I know of more than one.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not think we should be so narrow-minded as to confine all our attention to one little town on the map. It may be a nice little place; I am not trying to cast any reflections on it, but there are many more important places in Canada.

Within the last little while I have heard the Minister of Munitions and Supply say there was a shortage of steel. I do not believe that. I think that statement is absolutely incorrect, and I am going to tell you why. The rolling mills in Calgary quit work at five o'clock every afternoon. One of the men in the factory told me that they could produce three times the supply that they are producing.

An hon. MEMBER: Where will they get the scrap?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There is scrap all over the country.

Mr. DONNELLY: Mr. Chairman, I should like—

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Who is making this speech? I should like the hon. member to rise in his place and tell what he knows about the war effort—or possibly tell what he does not know about it. I am not concerned about that.

Mr. DONNELLY: We asked that question of the president of the Canadian National Railways and he says he cannot get steel.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Then let the hon. member ask this of the Canadian National: how many cars have the Canadian National given over to the Canadian Pacific?

Mr. DONNELLY: The Canadian National Railways president told us this afternoon that he could not get steel.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is a different subject which we will bring up later on. We have a little information in regard to that, too.

I have had the pleasure, too, of visiting different kinds of war factories. I have not visited one aircraft factory yet that has not told me that with a very small amount of change and without any great expense involved they could almost double their production in planes. That is supposed to be one of the most important things we need. They told me that certainly there would have to be a little expansion. But for us to sit here idly by, when the next six months may see either success or defeat in this war, and sit as members of parliament knowing that these manufacturers are deliberately held back by the government—well, I think that is a shame, and I think it is time the Prime Minister knew it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that if manufacturers say they are deliberately held back by the government, they are saying something which they know nothing whatsoever about—less even than what my hon. friend knows. It seems to me my hon. friend has been made an easy mark by some of these concerns.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Go ahead and clap! Clap this one off: I had the president of the Ottawa Car and Aircraft in this city tell me that he was working on planes for which he did not have a government contract, and he said, "The only reason why I don't shut down is that we are in hopes that the government will accept it. But we cannot wait on the government; they are too slow."

An hon. MEMBER: Did you say the Ottawa car?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, the Ottawa Car and Aircraft. Others were the same. It was in the paper that five hundred men were laid off, and I should like to ask the Prime Minister: Have they been put on again?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say to my hon. friend that my knowledge of these things is not as full as my hon. friend's knowledge appears to be.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I cannot hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not that omniscience, that knowledge of the entire war effort that my hon. friend appears to have.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Then I am sorry for the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He is taking everything that is being said to him as gospel truth. If he is prepared to make a charge with respect to any contract which is irregular or concerning any industry which is not performing its function because it is being held back by the government, then I will certainly ask the house immediately to grant him a committee of inquiry or have the matter referred to the public accounts committee. But if he cannot he had better not make such reflections.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am glad to see the Prime Minister is becoming alive to these issues. I think he is very much interested in them. I am not trying to cast reflections on the government at all, but I am endeavouring to draw its attention to a very important part of our war effort.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But my hon. friend is casting reflections on the government, on the war effort and on industry, and he is seeking to support his reflections by hearsay evidence.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The Prime Minister should withdraw that statement, because I made a reference before in the house to these 500 men being laid off in the Ottawa Car and Aircraft, and made it to the Department of Labour. What did they do? They did not know about it. I asked a question on the order paper as to how many war industries were working twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, 365 days of the year, and the department did not know. Then I asked how many were working only part time, and they did not even know that. So I say that is a commencing point from which the Prime Minister could start his investigation. How are we going to know whether we are making an all-out war effort or not? That is a proper function of the house committee.

I have a further suggestion to make, that the scope of this committee should be extended to include purchasing and production. My only desire is to see that every man we can put to work is out there working, and that every factory in this country is working 365 days in the year. My only wish is to see that the work is proceeding. Let them have things right at their finger-tips to go ahead, and let them do as much expanding as they would like to do. The statement made by the Prime Minister in the house that everything physically possible would be made financially possible—I believe that was the expression—had not, I think, much effect. I do not think that has been followed out.

One of the great fears under which this government is working, probably one of their own making, is that industry or big business has prevailed upon the government to such an extent that it has had to caution manufacturers that if we extend our war effort too greatly we are going to have too great a production, that we shall be making propeller shafts we cannot use, that we shall be making army trucks we cannot get rid of, and that we shall have too many things we shall not be able to use. It has a fear of what is going to happen after the war, instead of doing everything it possibly can to increase our war effort so that we shall be sure to win the war.

I am convinced that that is what is holding us back, or that that is one of the major factors. I believe one of the other factors to which reference has often been made in the house is the oil and gasoline supply. We are given to understand that we require oil and gasoline, and that this war might be lost for want of oil. Here again I direct my observations to the Department of Munitions and Supply. I do not believe the Minister of Munitions and Supply has time to look into all these things; but I do believe he has taken his advisers from the wrong sources.

I have some information in connection with the production of oil. I do not wish to go into too much detail, but my information—and incidentally I got it from the department—is that one of the reasons why the Alberta tar sands are not being developed is that the government believes it is not practicable at this time. So far as I can find out the only source from which the government has got its information is the heads of the big oil business, men who are either directly or indirectly financially controlling or interested in the production of oil in this country. My information is that it is a definitely established and proven fact that we can get oil and gasoline out of these tar sands and sell them on the commercial market to compete with the big oil companies, and that the by-products obtained will more than pay for the manufacture of the gasoline. I have that from what I believe is a reliable source, from men who are interested in the oil business. They have never been able to make any headway with the government. I think there should be an investigation of this. I am quite convinced that Imperial Oil are not going to expand our oil industry unless they are forced to do so, or unless some other steps are taken to expand this industry. They are going to make the present supplies last, cross their fingers and hope that we shall win the war, so that after the war we shall not have increased production which would force them to bring down the price of gasoline.

Let me bring up another matter in this regard. Mention has been made about carburettors and other inventions, I believe by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell). I think this is one matter that should receive consideration. I am referring to the carburettor which was advertised so widely in the papers. It will be recalled that it was stated that a carburettor had been invented which would take a car two hundred miles on a gallon of gasoline. In fact it came out in the press that this carburettor had been put on a car and an actual demonstration made with witnesses present.

Mr. THORSON: Do not believe everything you read in the papers.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister should not believe everything he reads in the papers. He is a member of the government and he should see that these things are investigated. I should like to ask the minister, through you, Mr. Speaker: has the government ever made any investigation of this Pogue carburettor? The minister shakes his head. It is my opinion that the research bureau here in Ottawa does not even know that such a carburettor exists. I have gone a little further in my investigation; I know that it does exist.

Mr. THORSON: The carburettor certainly could not run a car two hundred miles on a gallon of gas.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Why would that be?

Mr. THORSON: I have heard a good deal about that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If we are going to go into the science of this thing we might take an hour or two to debate it. I doubt the minister's remarks because I do not think he knows whether a gallon of gasoline can be made to run a car two hundred miles.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. THORSON: I know there was no such carburettor ever made that could take a car two hundred miles on a gallon of gas.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to know how the minister knows. Here is another instance where there should be a thorough investigation. The minister doubts that there is a carburettor made which, when put upon a car, will run that car two hundred miles on a gallon of gasoline.

Mr. THORSON: I do not doubt at all; I know there is not.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The minister is so sure of this, but I doubt his wisdom in this regard. I will put the minister on the safe side and say that if the car would go only one hundred miles on a gallon, half that distance, would it not be a matter worth investigating? If it would go only a quarter of that, just think what it would do for our present supply—it would double it. I say that if there is any possibility at all, it should be investigated.

Mr. THORSON: Get hold of Mr. Pogue and ask him to send it to the inventions board which checks on these things. You will find out that there never was such a carburettor.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There is. If the minister does not know it, he should. We are in the midst of a war. The Minister of Munitions and Supply contradicted the Minister of National War Services because the former said in this house that the very carburettor about which we are talking was thoroughly investigated by a man in Winnipeg, and that this man in Winnipeg had spent $40,000 to see if it was any good.

Mr. THORSON: It was a different carburettor entirely.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Than the one you are speaking of?

Mr. THORSON: The one you are speaking of now.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No; it is the same carburettor. The minister is trying to back out of his statement because the Minister of Munitions and Supply did make that statement in the house.

Mr. THORSON: They were totally different carburettors.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Hon. members across the house have taken a tremendous amount of my time, and I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will be a little lenient with me until I finish. I shall not be much longer.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to have to inform the hon. member that his time has elapsed.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is fine. I will remember that even though it is a minister speaking.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the argument about carburettors and the bickering back and forth across the floor of the chamber during the course of this debate, I for one have learned more about the workings and objectives of this committee than I knew before the debate commenced. I had not intended taking any part in the debate until the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann), the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the minister himself had spoken. I am not going to detain the committee at any length. The hon. member for Renfrew South, as reported on page 1992 of Hansard, said:

> I laugh when I read the personnel of the committee, and I laugh at myself when I am put on the fisheries committee, when I do not know any more about lobsters or the fishing industry than other hon. gentlemen know about medicine.

I congratulate the hon. member for Renfrew South upon the contribution he has made to the debate. I hope that when the membership of committees is being considered, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and other leaders in the house will remember what the hon. member has said. I am one of those who believe that a member appointed to a committee should have some knowledge of the matters that may be brought before that committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is a good way to acquire knowledge.

Mr. MacNICOL: The four members from this side who have been appointed will, I believe, render excellent service on that committee. Two of them are manufacturers with large plants, and their long business experience in buying and selling, in organizing and building their plants should fit them to sit on a committee of this kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How about the lawyers?

Mr. MacNICOL: Another one has had long experience in dealing with labour and in business. The fourth is a well known barrister who has sat on the bench and who has had the experience of weighing and sifting facts. I am quite pleased with the members from this group who have been placed on this committee. I have nothing to say about the other members of the committee; they are all good men, having a good deal of experience in many matters. Of the twenty-four, I believe fourteen are barristers; four are manufacturers, while the other four are farmers or closely associated with the soil in some way.

The hon. member for Renfrew South did not pass any comment on the members of the committee, nor do I. I agree with what he said, that the committee should be enlarged if it is to do better work. If that is to be done, I looked through the red book to see what hon. members could render excellent service on this committee. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Hoblitzell), has had considerable experience, not only in business but in the erection of oil stations, buildings and so on for the distribution of oil.

He must have had a lot of experience that would be valuable to any committee set up to delve into contracts. The same thing applies to the hon. member for York East (Mr. McGregor), who is a contractor of some note over the whole province of Ontario. His experience ought to be of material assistance to a committee inquiring into contracts. The same thing applies to the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin), who is a manufacturer, a dealer in lumber, a builder and contractor, and so forth. The hon. member for Prescott (Mr. Bertrand) is a business man with a lot of experience who would be valuable on the committee. Another hon. member who would be valuable on the committee is the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor). I have observed him on committees and have always admired his keen ability to bore right into the centre of things. The hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield), is one of the big business men of the maritime provinces. Another valuable member on the committee would be the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Hill). The hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley), who is not in his seat at the moment, is a man with whom I have had much conversation, and I am convinced that with his wide knowledge of business and manufacturing he looks at business from a practical point of view. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Lacroix), whom I see in his seat to-night, would be a valuable member of the committee. He has had much experience in matters pertaining to lumber, timber and business of that kind. Many lumber contracts will come before the committee, and he could give excellent assistance to the committee. The hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt) has been associated for years with a large manufacturing business. I believe his family are one of the largest manufacturers in one line of business in Canada. I believe he would be an excellent choice for the committee. The hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) would be of great assistance to the committee. There is, in my judgment, no more able man in matters pertaining to business. The hon. member for Northumberland, Ontario, (Mr. Fraser) is another business man who is an employer of labour and operates large plants. The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) has had a lot of experience in manufacturing. Who has had more experience in timber and lumber contracting than the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Hanson)? Then there is the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), an able engineer. He would be an excellent member on such a committee. I do not believe that an engineer has been named to the committee. I am afraid I am leaving many out. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lockhart) is another prominent business man with a wide experience in contracting which would be valuable to the committee. The hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) is associated with one of the large paper businesses in Canada. While that line of business has not been much discussed in parliament lately, it was referred to by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Johnston, Bow River). He would be a valuable member of the committee. Then men like the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, (Mr. Desmond), the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Cardiff), the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn), are all farmers with wide experience in cattle raising and in the meat industry. All of the men I have mentioned, as well as many others I could name, would be of great assistance to the committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol)? Has my hon. friend forgotten him?

Mr. MacNICOL: Others have had more experience than I have had. Therefore, if the suggestion made by the hon. member for Renfrew South is to be considered and the membership widened, I suggest that some of those I have mentioned be appointed to the committee. It might also be necessary to appoint one or two more barristers who are trained to look into contracts, but I would not have a committee composed entirely of barristers. I would have a good number of practical men on the committee. I am not saying that barristers are not practical men, but they are not as practical as men who work in business and in industry, such as the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) and other members I have named. That is all I have to say about the personnel of the committee.

The Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) this afternoon lauded the government plants. I am not going to say anything against them because I do not think that criticism of the government plants would help the war effort, and by criticism I mean denunciation of them. I suppose the government built its own plants, or had others build them, because manufacturers may not have wanted to assume the first cost of manufacturing special munitions of war without being compensated. But I disagree with the minister when he states that these plants are operating at 100 per cent efficient capacity in all cases. He may not have said that in so many words, but he gave that impression. I tell the minister that, in my opinion, no government plant can be operated 100 per cent efficiently, and that is not finding fault with the plant itself. It is merely because of the fact that it is the government that is operating the plant instead of a private individual or company. It is no reflection on the government, and so I hope the government will not take that as a criticism.

Let me give an example. My long experience in plants enables me on going through a plant to form my own judgment as to how the plant is being operated, whether it is being operated as I had to operate a plant. I have been in different plants operated by the government where I have seen at times many men standing idle by their machines for some considerable time. It was not the men's fault because I have talked with these men and asked them why they were not working. They told me that their machines were not operating because the materials for their machines were not available or because the plant could not get the materials, and I presume that the government, being a benevolent employer, does not do what a private operator is compelled to do when there is no material available to keep a machine operating. There is only one thing the private operator can do in such a case, and that is to send the men home. But the government does not need to do that because it has all that is required, so far as finances are concerned, to operate the plant. Let me say right here that I am not in accord with sending men home simply because the material is not available for them to work with. It is not fair to the workmen, and I hope when this war is over and the whole set-up pertaining to labour is reorganized, that men present and willing to work in the plant in which they are engaged but not having the material to work with, will be compensated if they are laid off through no fault of their own. I think the time has gone by when the working man—and I was one for years—can be called back and forth at the will of the operator of the plant. It is not fair to the working man. It is not just. So perhaps, when the government or those who are operating these plants for the government, when they keep a man on, standing around doing nothing, are doing it because of humanitarian reasons. I look forward to the day when the working man will be treated throughout the whole of industry as he ought to be treated. But as I said, the minister was wrong, if unintentionally. He must know that a government-operated plant cannot function with the same degree of efficiency as a private institution properly managed.

The hon. member for Vancouver East said, if I remember it correctly, that not a single contract had been investigated since the committee was set up. The hon. member for Lake Centre asserted that the committee of which he was a member had not sat for more than thirty or forty hours altogether since it was constituted. If contracts are not to be investigated where necessary—I do not mean all contracts, for, as the minister well said, that would be impossible—the committee is not performing one of its most important duties. I do not suggest that the purpose of investigating a contract should be to unearth a scandal. I would be opposed to blazing before the public any scandal in connection with a government contract. Where the chairman or the minister has received evidence of something wrong, I would endorse an investigation in camera; first because, as the minister said, the publicizing to the country of scandals in time of war will not help the national effort; second, the purpose of such an investigation should not be to publish scandal but to encourage responsible authority to take the measures necessary to prevent a recurrence of what has been found wrong. There is a saying handed down by the Great Teacher, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone." All my life I have been careful about casting stones against anybody. You can never tell how far they are going to roll.

An hon. MEMBER: They might rebound.

Mr. MacNICOL: There are things which a committee could find out that might be rectified. I myself have made a number of investigations. Recently I inspected a building which had been erected under the government's direction. I am not condemning the government on account of what contractors or the men under their direction do, nor am I relating this to show that there is anything wrong other than extravagance. The boards on the exterior of the framework were planed on both sides; tarpaper or some other kind of insulating paper was attached to the outside planed surface, and then another, better sheathing was put outside that. On the inside, of course, the scantlings were lathed and plastered. The building was a large one and required a great quantity of this kind of lumber. As I went through the place, examining it, I thought to myself, for what reason would many, perhaps hundreds of thousands of feet of lumber, which is covered on one side with scantling, lathed and plastered, and covered on the other side with paper, be planed on both sides? Lumbermen may say that it costs no more than rough lumber, but it does not seem to me that that can be so; surely lumber costs more planed than unplaned. This is not a crime, but it is an extravagance. In these times, when the minister by means of large paid advertisements is begging everybody to save every scrap of paper, every bit of brass, every piece of iron which can be saved, for what reason is such high-class lumber used only to be covered up?

Let me mention another case. Perhaps the boiler part of the John Inglis plant is not under the government, but at any rate one section of the plant makes boilers and another part makes small arms. In a government building only a stone's throw from the John Inglis plant two boilers were installed which, if my memory serves me aright, came from a plant many miles away. Perhaps the John Inglis company did not have boilers on hand; but it struck me, after twenty-five years of keen business experience, as a most peculiar thing to transport boilers a thousand miles for installation in a building so close to a plant which is under government direction and which manufactures boilers.

One day I talked to a man who was trucking material from Hamilton. Its final destination was Niagara Falls, but first it was brought to Toronto and then it went to Camp Borden. I asked the man, "Why are you going to Camp Borden?" He said, "Oh, that is where it is to be inspected." So it was to be taken to Camp Borden, in Simcoe county, fifty miles or more from Toronto, then brought back to Toronto, then along the Hamilton highway to Niagara Falls, where the material was to be installed.

Perhaps such things as these cannot be avoided, but I believe if they were brought before a committee examining into contracts they would represent only a few of very many instances where savings could be made. At this time everybody should exert the utmost possible effort to economize. The main purpose of this committee should be to bring about economy; if it does that, it will have done something worth while.

In the course of his address the minister, as I understood him, referred to the eighth report, which was in connection with medical work. At that time I said to myself, "I will check over the names of the committee to see if there is a doctor on it", and I did not find one. I assume that that fact is what inspired the very apt remarks of the hon. member for Renfrew South. In any event, how a committee composed of everyone but doctors can issue a medical report is more than I can understand. So I will say to the hon. member for Renfrew South that I agree that there should be a doctor on the committee. As the hon. member for Danforth said, the question of hospitals was considered by the committee, and on anything pertaining to hospitals of course the hon. member for Renfrew South or the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly) or any other medical doctor in the House of Commons would be an excellent addition to the committee.

Last year on June 10, the hon. member for Danforth made some very constructive remarks. In some of them he went after the committee or the committee's report pretty hard, which led me to believe that the committee was a useless committee as I said this afternoon, but perhaps it was not as useless as the word would imply. The hon. member said, as reported on page 3764 of Hansard of June 10, 1941:

> Let the private serving in the ranks know that we are helping. Let the contractor who wants to obtain a government contract know that we are not only helping him but also watching him, in order to see that the contract is fair and right.

That is good, sound doctrine; no one can object to that. The hon. member was not seeking scandal when he said that; he talked as a business man of many years' experience, for he has to operate his plant with the greatest care. He cannot afford to pay two prices for the material he buys, nor can he waste money; he has to run his plant in a business way, and that is why he made this statement:

> Let the officers in our camps, who are looking after the men, know that we are anxious to help them, but that any extravagance on their part is going to be checked.

I hope that when the committee reconvenes, all matters such as the hon. member for Danforth has mentioned will be subject to scrutiny by that committee; not to find scandals, far from it, but to effect economies, as the minister says is the purpose of the committee.

That, I think, covers all I have to say in connection with the committee. If the Prime Minister does follow the suggestion of the hon. member for Renfrew South, I hope he will nominate some of these able members that I mentioned or others I could have mentioned, who would bring to that committee a wealth of experience in handling contracts, in buying, in selling, in engineering, in various lines of big business, experience that would enable them to present to the government something constructive and to assist the government in carrying on this war activity as these men who are in business have to carry on their own businesses.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker the preamble of the resolution now under discussion reads as follows:

> Resolved that a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the execution of the policy decided by the government may be effected therein,

The committee of inquiry on war expenditures with which the house is now dealing should not, this time, be content with skimming the subject. The Canadian people, who are staggering under a heavy burden of taxes and who lend their savings to the government for the prosecution of war, have a right to know how the public moneys are spent. It is high time that light should be thrown upon these abuses that are so frequently pointed out to us.

I have condemned in parliament and on the hustings the wastefulness which has been discovered in the granting of contracts for foodstuffs by the government to some companies which have made profits of 18 to 20 cents per pound on the butter sold to military training camps. I have urged the government to curb the wanton greed of the same contractors, who are still delivering to the army, at prices varying from $2 to $2.50 a bag, potatoes that were put in storage at 50 and 60 cents a bag, at the beginning of last fall and winter. I have directed the attention of the Minister of Munitions and Supply upon the theft of foodstuffs intended for the soldiers at Valcartier. I ask the government, moreover, to conduct a searching inquiry upon the disappearance of 240 wool blankets out of 5,000 delivered to military district No. 5 by a manufacturer of Cap St. Ignace. The Canadian people, as well as parliament, have the right and the duty to track down at all times and everywhere those who are guilty of dishonesty. Is it true that there was a shortage of coal at the Petawawa military camp last winter, while the temperature was 20 or 30 degrees below zero?

If this is so, what are the causes of this shortage and who is responsible for it? The proposed investigation should bear on all irregularities and abuses which, rumour has it, are occurring in our war plants. It is the government's inescapable duty to investigate the wastage of materials and man-power which certain persons, employed in these industries as foremen or labourers, unceasingly report to us. It is high time parliament reassumed control over public expenditures. The bureaucracy and the civil service have everywhere replaced the representatives of the people, and responsible government is about to expire in the hands of a man, who, in 1926, showered Lord Byng of Vimy with the thunderbolts of government responsible to the people. "The king reigns but does not govern," he cried at the time. Who is governing to-day? A gang of bureaucrats who ceaslessly trample underfoot the privileges of the elected representatives of the people. Who is governing to-day? Boards established by order in council without consulting parliament. Who is governing to-day? The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the most pernicious instrument of election propaganda ever known. Who is governing to-day? The Wartime Prices and Trade Board, where flourishes already the most cynical favouritism toward trusts and companies in the very good graces of the administration. Who is governing to-day? Shady contractors dealing with the department of munitions and supply, who pay the cost of monstrous advertisements for the purpose of eliciting a "Yes" vote from the people at the plebiscite. Who is governing to-day? The trusts, friendly to the government, who, under the minister of revenue's signature, were already abusing those who would vote "No" on plebiscite day, comparing them to Hitler.

Mr. Speaker, never, in the course of the last century, has our country assumed a more colonial status in the hands of this oligarchy which threatens to make short-work of provincial autonomy, of our constitution, our laws, our agriculture, our industries, our commerce, our man power, our youth and all the living strength of the nation.

How deplorable is the ignorance of dishonesty of the bureaucracy who recently froze the price of maple syrup at last year's level, without considering the cost of labour which has increased threefold. This is not all. The public accounts committee, who seem to be nothing but a name, should hold meetings as soon as possible. This committee should be empowered to scrutinize all war contracts and first those awarded to the government's pets, Messrs. J. A. A. Leclair and J. H. Dupuis, the first being the chief organizer of the Quebec provincial Liberal machine. Here are the values of the contracts awarded to Messrs. J. A. A. Leclair and Dupuis: $29,591.63, $34,-684.13, $7,793.64, $27,700; and the amounts already paid to the same contractors, Mr. Speaker, are as follows: $29,591.63, $34,684.13, $7,792.64.

After this contractor is paid a further amount of $27,500, he will have received approximately $100,000. In view of the peculiar position of J. A. A. Leclair in the Liberal party set-up, it is essential that we have all details and correspondence regarding these contracts.

As to the provincial member for Laval, Mr. François Leduc, civil engineer, this foremost promoter of an affirmative answer to the plebiscite question, has received from the federal government, from September 7, 1940, to December 1, 1941, the sizeable amount of $14,379.69. What for? In payment for professional advice and inspection services in connection with the Bagotville and Mont Joli airports.

From now on, there will be no mystery as to why the provincial member for Laval seconded the amendment to the Chaloult motion at the Quebec legislature.

Let us now revert to the present administration's abuses. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, during the plebiscite campaign, which has cost millions of dollars to the country, have resorted to shameless discrimination. Who will pay for the broadcasting of the speeches delivered by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the cabinet members and the party leaders who supported him?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order! The hon. member must resume his seat. I call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the motion before the house does not warrant a discussion of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation nor of government administrative orders. The matter submitted to the house is the expediency of forming a committee to investigate war expenditures. The hon. member may not review the various contracts awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply, as this will be the task of the committee. The matter submitted to the house is simply the advisability of forming such a committee.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, submitting to your ruling, I now revert to the subject.

What a prodigal spirit seems to animate our governments. Never have expenditures been higher, never have so many gifts been made at the expense of our national economy. According to reliable information, our forest resources are being dissipated on the spot. Considerable quantities of wood, copper, steel and even oil and gasoline are being shamefully wasted in our war plants. When will these reprehensible abuses come to an end? Let the committee see to it and enquire into the smallest details.

Moreover, the R.C.M.P. should be authorized to search and keep an eye on registrars' offices throughout the country. We all know, Mr. Speaker, the disgusting transactions that have taken place in some of these offices. Exemptions have been sold to Rumanians, Syrians, and even to citizens hailing from countries now at war with us. I have often been told that favouritism, bought with gold, has covered up many other cases to the detriment of fairness and honesty, of the war effort and the defence of this country.

Lastly, there is another matter which the committee should not overlook, that is the expropriation of lands required for war industries, aerodromes, military camps, and so forth. Why should the 4,000 acres of land formerly belonging to Georges Vandelac, of Montreal, and which he purchased from the Terrebonne county council for less than $200, for the taxes owing on the property, have been sold to the authorities for a price of $44,000?

Mr. FAUTEUX: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. LACOMBE: That should prove to be a very interesting matter.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order! The hon. member for Sainte-Marie has risen to a point of order.

Mr. FAUTEUX: I believe that the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, discussing in this house the advisability of forming an investigation committee, has no right to name certain persons and to bring against them charges of having obtained favours and money under false pretences. He named a moment ago Mr. Leclair, among others. I think—

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, on this point of order I would remind my hon. colleague for Sainte-Marie that he is out of order. He is not entitled to make a speech aside from the point of order he has raised.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Are there any members who wish to speak on the point of order? If not, I must once again bring to the attention of the hon. member who has the floor that he must not go into facts which will be examined later by the committee. I have already pointed out to the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains, that it is not in order to cover details when one is speaking on the question of principle, on the advisability of forming a committee. I trust that the hon. member will heed this further warning.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I shall conclude my remarks in a few moments. However, since the hon. member for Sainte-Marie, speaking on a point of order, has taken a hand in the debate, I wish to tell him without further ado that I have brought no charges against anyone. I merely pointed out to the house the amount of certain contracts awarded to certain people and I asked that they be scrutinized. That is all. I did not make any charge. The committee will attend to that. It will be its duty to do so. The honourable member has not understood me; neither have the electors of St. Mary at the last election and still less on the occasion of the plebiscite.

Mr. FAUTEUX: That is why your candidate was defeated.

Mr. LACOMBE: I believe the hon. member will be defeated by a majority of 22,000 at the next election and that he will swallow his pill once for all.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must direct the attention of the hon. member to the matter that is now before the house. The plebiscite is not under discussion. The honourable member has no right to discuss it at this time.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to discuss the plebiscite, but the holding of that plebiscite was ordered by the house on a matter closely connected with the war.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The matter is settled by the decision I have given. Will the hon. member now discuss the subject that is before the house?

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, let the committee which will sit shortly be relentless and adamant; let it summon all witnesses whose examination may be essential if the necessary evidence is to be obtained, and it will render a splendid service to the country and the Canadian ratepayers.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, there will be considerable consternation and dismay across this country when the people learn that, with the exception of a few weeks in the past year, the war expenditures committee has not been sitting. I think their consternation will be doubled when they learn from the observation of the chairman of that committee, the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) that the committee as constituted was not concerned primarily with the terms of contracts and the money spent on contracts. Pious platitudes about investigation of principles involved, and talk about the great trust and confidence the people must have in the government are scarcely good enough. Experiences in the past do not lead the people to place too much trust in those who, in many instances, have been given positions of trust in connection with public moneys.

All, I think, was not well in the Bren machine-gun contract. All was not well, I think, with certain purchases for officers' quarters in Vancouver. All was not well, I believe, with regard to the rental of certain buildings in Montreal. All was not well in the last war, and I am not satisfied that all is well in this one.

The minister has said that the job was to find out where savings could be made, and yet he says they did not investigate any contract. I think the duty of the committee is to investigate contracts. It should divide up the work, take the various types of contracts and go into them deeply and minutely. How can any committee recommend economies unless they know what the expenditures were for, and what type of work or service was given, or what type of construction was erected for the expenditure made? It will not be well for this government to try to whitewash the expenditures that are being made.

We have been spending money at a terrific rate. I wonder how many people in Canada realize it is likely that in this year alone the war expenditures will amount to almost as much as was the national debt in 1939. Each month we used to receive a record of contracts awarded. Those contracts were listed in a big book of about 500 pages, and the information was about six months old. But we do not get even those books nowadays. All we were told in those old contracts records was that on a certain date a certain contractor, whose name and address were given, had been placed under contract to supply a commodity. The date and the amount were given, along with the order in council covering the transaction.

For instance, Meakins and Sons of 125 Wellington street north, Hamilton, Ontario, were given a contract for boot polishing brushes on November 16, 1940, such contract amounting to $13,400. How many boot polishing brushes there were we are not told. I hope we have plenty of them. Then, we have a record of the National Steel Car Corporation, Lysander division, supplying Lysander aircraft spares to the value of $138,914. There are many details of that kind which the people of Canada should know, in view of the rate at which contracts are being made. I believe at the present time our contracts probably number about half a million. If the committee were to spend fifteen minutes on each contract, which it won't; and if it were to work ten hours a day, which it won't; and if it were to work 300 days in the year, which it won't, it would take the committee forty years to get through the contracts. The government had better put some young members on the committee.

I am not suggesting that every little contract of a few dollars should be investigated, but there is a large number of them which should be considered carefully. A return was tabled in the house a short time ago, in answer to a question to the Department of Munitions and Supply, in which it was shown that 300 contractors had been given one or more contracts on a cost-plus basis. Those 300 contractors should be investigated thoroughly. It is that cost-plus type of contract about which the people feel dubious.

Why there has been all this delay in setting up the committee is something for which the government will have to answer some day. The committee should have been working for the past two and a half years, at least, and it should be constantly tabling its reports. Not only should the reports be tabled, but the time of the house should be taken up in discussing them. The committee which sat last year tabled its report, but there was no discussion. That is scarcely good enough. I do not know what the delay is, but I believe there are certain contracting companies which have gone bankrupt but which a year ago were doing work for the government. It will not do much good to investigate their contracts, if nobody will be responsible for them. No one will be responsible; there will be no way of obtaining redress, and we are going to be in a rather bad way. This committee is going to have to divide itself into half a dozen subcommittees, and each one of those half dozen subcommittees should have the power to bring in other members of the house and to call on other persons to assist in looking into the contract business. I should like the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) to give the house the assurance now that it will be the duty of this committee to investigate all expenditures. The resolution reads:

> That a select committee be appointed to examine the expenditure defrayed out of moneys provided by parliament for the defence services, and for other services directly connected with the war.

There is a question of what interpretation may be placed upon the phrase "other services directly connected with the war". I suppose it is possible the committee may decide that it should not investigate wartime housing because that is not directly connected with the war. I maintain that it is connected witth the war, and very directly. All expenditures of money passed by parliament should be a matter of investigation by parliament, and a report should be handed down and discussed here. Otherwise this parliament is not doing its duty to the Canadian people.

The Canadian people want to know that when their money is being spent they are getting a dollar's value for every dollar expended. They should be given the assurance—and this is most important whether the government thinks it is or not—that when they are giving their sons and their brothers, their fathers and their husbands to die in this conflict, no person will be permitted to use this terrible crisis as an opportunity to fill his pockets with a lot of tax-free bonds.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, the making of steel is a gigantic enterprise. I am prompted to refer to this industry because of some statements which were made by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston). His remarks showed that he was getting into pretty deep water when he attempted to discuss the manufacture of machines fabricated from iron and steel. Last year the amount of ore shipped from the head of the lakes was some 80,000,000 tons, and enormous shipments were made from Newfoundland to the steel Mills of Nova Scotia. The ore is brought down to the steel mills, which are generally located conveniently to coal.

The first process is in the blast furnace. These blast furnaces are constructed of a great variety of materials, and many other materials enter into the process of making pig-iron. The next development is the production of steel and steel alloys made with combinations of nickel, chromium, molybdenum and other things brought from various parts of the world. The hon. member for Bow River referred to the plant at Calgary, and we are all proud to know that there is the beginning of a steel and iron industry in that city. This industry will make use of pig-iron produced in these great blast furnaces as well as scrap iron collected in that part of the country. We must, however, realize that the manufacture of special steels, such as are used in aeroplanes, is not possible in a small plant of that kind. Steel that is used for different purposes must possess different qualities, such as elasticity, elongation, resistance to fracture and so forth.

The making of aeroplanes is also a gigantic enterprise. Aeroplanes are not constructed of one material; their manufacture necessitates the use of textiles, rubber and many other things. The first operation in constructing an aeroplane is carried out in these wooden buildings here in Ottawa—the designing that is done on the draughting tables and so forth. The next step is the manufacture of gauges, dies, tools, et cetera. In order to assemble an aeroplane, the products of many industries must be brought together. These include propellers, precision instruments and the products of industries in all parts of the country. I am giving this picture to indicate, first, that it cannot be expected that a small industry like this one in the west, far removed from the great volume of business of the eastern plants, whose production is devoted almost wholly to structural steel, could produce the great varieties of iron and steel that are required in our war industries.

In the production of an aeroplane it cannot be expected that there will never be any shortage of parts or materials. It is a well known fact that as the process of manufacture goes on, certain parts will pile up, while others will be missing due to unforeseen causes. This is not the fault of the manufacturer or the assembler; these delays have arisen in plants perhaps one or two thousand miles away, and they may have been caused by the non-arrival of certain component parts or materials from distant parts of the world. One cannot speak lightly of or criticize a situation about which he knows very little and into which so many elements enter.

All this gives us some idea of the responsibilities that rest upon the shoulders of our Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) and of the wonderful work he has done in building up the organization we have here. It has been necessary for him to call in experts from every line of industry in order that he may have the best advice, so that the whole effort can be coordinated with the least possible delay and bring forth the greatest efficiency.

During my seven years in parliament I have seldom taken a strong political attitude. I may be regarded as rather a poor politician in a sense. It is my desire rather, always to view the problems that come before us from a business point of view and to contribute something, if I may, from that point of view. I had an opportunity during the past year of serving on the war expenditures committee, and I for one see many very important results of its work over a few months. The object of the committee is to promote efficiency, to save money, and to correct conditions that hamper our war effort and hurt our people. I am sure that in some respects the work of the committee has contributed a great deal toward giving confidence to our people as to the necessity of the efforts being put forward. While errors have been discovered, there has been a willingness and a desire on the part of those affected to have them corrected.

The statement was made to-day that there is a widespread feeling that enormous sums of money were being wasted, or possibly the statement was to the effect that millionaires were being created. That is a totally inaccurate statement. I am sure the people are confident that no millionaires are being created in this war, and there is also the circumstance that if they are being or should be created, there will, at all events, be no reward in the form of titles after this war is over.

There are many things for which the committee might well be praised, but it would not serve any useful purpose. I think it would be much better if I were to mention some ways in which we might improve our methods for the future, and this I shall endeavour to do briefly. Possibly I may be taken as criticizing the government's effort; but the function of this committee, I believe, is to act as a non-political group, looking to the promotion of efficiency and the saving of money in our war effort. I believe the attitude of the public so far has been that there has been justification for the committee, and that through the experience already gained there will be further opportunity for making corrections and promoting efficiency. If there has been any weakness or any handicap at all, I think it has been due to political psychology, a sort of feeling, perhaps, that the Liberals may mistrust the Conservatives and the Conservatives the Liberals, and even some of the other parties may be involved, for I think it may be said that they, too, are rapidly acquiring some of those qualities or attitudes of the older parties which come under public criticism most frequently. So I would say, Mr. Speaker, that for the greater effectiveness of this committee we should endeavour to get rid in every possible way of this bone of contention that the committee may be desiring or is endeavouring to serve some political purpose to cover up certain situations. From my experience I would say that that is far from the truth.

This attitude of political fear seems to be closely associated with the question of open or closed meetings. There are advantages in some respects in closed meetings, and at other times there are advantages in open meetings. As has been stated, open meetings discourage at times the giving of evidence freely, and they may also foster the political viewpoint. Consequently, in an open meeting a member often makes a statement which gets a headline in the press; in using the head-line the press will refer to the speaker as a member of a certain political party, and so the press report itself gives a tinge of politics to the work of the war expenditures committee. It is inevitable that the press at open meetings should attempt to give publicity to the proceedings of the committee. That factor is eliminated in closed meetings. If we could have the assurance that political considerations were entirely eliminated by all parties represented on the committee, then I think the suggestion that has been made by some members of the opposition, that the membership of the committee be increased, could very well be regarded as having some merit. I believe that additional members of the opposition groups could contribute to the work of the committee.

One hon. member has referred to the fact that only eighty-three sittings were held during the year, taking up some 280 hours. That to a large extent is due to procedure and red tape. It is my feeling that even though the war expenditures committee is a committee organized to promote economy and efficiency, its own procedure in some respects was not of the best. Much waiting resulted from the fact that every word of evidence had to be taken down. I do not believe such a thing would be countenanced by a board of directors discussing a large business undertaking, and without this necessity of taking down every spoken word there would have been the opportunity of holding a great many more meetings than were held. It is, I think, a weakness of the committee that we have had too much of this documentary procedure. There has been a great deal of interviewing witnesses beforehand, of which procedure one can hardly see the necessity; this, in turn, has imposed much work on the chairman of the committee. It seems to me that his work should be lightened by a wider distribution of the work among the members of the committee.

I believe that in some respects we were overstaffed, and that the money provided for the carrying on of the committee was expended too quickly. This caused postponements and adjournments and shortened the time that the committee operated. As a war expenditures committee we might set an example of economy, and in that respect we certainly were open to criticism.

The estimate provided for the committee contemplated the possibility of continued sittings during the adjournment of parliament. It seems to me that this committee should sit almost every week while parliament is in recess, and that in the estimates a generous sum should be provided so that the committee should not be under the necessity of adjourning through lack of funds. I am sure that every economy will be exercised, but the committee ought not to be handicapped in this direction.

A good start has been made; much experience has been gained, and I am sure that, realizing some of the imperfections of the past, we shall be able to expedite the work and get more direct results which will be well worth while. We ought to replace to some extent the rigid system of public administration by the more direct methods employed in any well-ordered business. Let us develop a new pattern of approach, using new methods, enliminating red tape, of which we had some, and adopting a procedure whereby we shall get at the kernel of the matters before us with the least possible expense.

I believe there is a great purpose to be served by this committee. Generous provision should be made so that, in whatever numbers are decided upon, the committee may sit continuously until we have a new parliament; and I trust that we shall rid ourselves of any thought of suspecting one another of playing for political advantage, and get down to the real work of correcting situations which are not right, and of assisting the government and the great organization associated with our enterprise, so that we may put forth the greatest possible effort on the part of Canada in the struggle in which we are engaged.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I desire to take about five minutes to put on record the facts with regard to three or four points which were mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) with respect to recommendations of the committee affecting the administration of the elementary flying training and air observer schools.

The hon. member indicated that the house had not yet been told whether these recommendations had been implemented. I think he was unduly critical in that respect, because obviously my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) will be here in connection with the resolution which is now before the house and will be giving a statement on matters which came up in connection with that committee, as those questions are raised. I do not believe there has been any opportunity yet for the army, the navy, the air or other departments affected formally to make a report to the house as to whether the recommendations have been put into effect. I want to say, speaking for the air force, the army and, I am sure, the navy as well, that reports have been prepared by these services to be presented to the committee in order to indicate the extent to which the recommendations in the report which was presented in November have been carried out.

Since, however, my hon. friend has mentioned two or three points and has indicated that we do not know whether they have been carried out, I should like to give the house this information.

In the first place my hon. friend said—I do not know where he got the information—that elementary schools are not conducted on a civilian basis in the old country.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Not to-day, was the evidence which was given.

Mr. RALSTON: Whether that evidence was given or not, the information I have is that some of the schools in England which were run on a civilian basis were turned to a service basis for a short time, but they are being turned back now and put on a civilian basis; and many of them were never changed.

I want to say also to my hon. friend—and I think he knows, although he did not mention the United States—that in the United States elementary schools are run by civilians. And by the way I do not see in the report of the committee any recommendation that the schools be changed from a civilian basis to a service one.

Mr. GOLDING: Far from it.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend asked with regard to the recommendation that the contracts with elementary flying training schools should be amended to reduce the flying hour profits from 50 to 25 cents. That recommendation, I can tell the house, was implemented, and the reduction was antedated to November, 1940, when the pupil population of each school was increased from 48 to 70.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When was that done?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend the exact date, but it was done some months ago, I am advised by the controller, Mr. Apedaile—

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is that a net profit?

Mr. RALSTON: It is the profit which is referred to in the report of the committee, and the committee recommended that the profit be changed from 50 to 25 cents per flying hour.

Another recommendation was made that the training contracts with elementary flying training schools should be further amended to provide that all profits of the schools should be invested in non-interest bearing Dominion of Canada bonds; and that recommendation has been implemented.

Next, there was the recommendation referred to by the hon. member for Lake Centre that all contracts with air observer schools, which are also operated by civilians, should be amended to reduce flying hour profits by 65 per cent, that is to say, from $1 to 35 cents. That recommendation was implemented, and the reduction was antedated to June 1, 1941.

Another point which my hon. friend mentioned was a suggestion that the stock of the companies should be held in trust for the elementary flying training clubs. The committee recommended a change in the dominion Companies Act whereby it would be provided that no private individual would receive anything by way of profits in the shape of dividends or distribution of assets. The proposal was that all the companies should have a uniform charter. I am advised that that matter has been fully gone into and that investigation of the matter discloses that a form of charter can be granted to the flying clubs under part 2 of the Companies Act without requiring amendment of the act except that the disposal of any residue of funds after winding up is not specially provided for. That is not considered a serious matter, because it is considered that no flying club would wind up except for lack of funds to carry on, and the matter is now under active consideration by the Department of the Secretary of State, the Canadian flying clubs' association and the deputy minister for air. I am told that the matter of uniform charters is practically completed, and that will be carried out.

Those are the four points mentioned by my hon. friend. I want to mention one other thing that came out in the debate to-night. The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) dealt at some length with a device called the Pogue carburettor. I recognize the name because I had some correspondence about it some time ago. The hon. member rather insistently intimated that the government had paid no attention to the Pogue carburettor and that it was a revolutionary device which would save a tremendous amount of gasoline.

Last fall the master-general of the ordnance, having had the device brought to his attention —of course in that branch they have a great many load-carrying as well as fighting vehicles, and we are just as anxious as anyone to save gasoline—brought in Mr. Pogue. He was put on an allowance of $10 a day for six weeks. We provided in the department Doctor King, a mechanical engineer of the national research council who is a special expert on carburettors. They went out to the proving grounds, and for six weeks worked there with Captain Irvine, a highly trained technical man on dynamometers, by putting the carburettor itself to practical test on motor vehicles. That test was conducted for six weeks. I am sorry to say that from the point of view of practical application of the carburettor and the saving of gasoline, the test did not prove it a success. Mr. Pogue, I think, would be as ready to admit that as anyone. As a matter of fact, I think he saw what the defects were. I do not profess to be able to discuss the thing scientifically, but I can say that he gets increased mileage with his carburettor at a sacrifice of power or of speed. That is to say, if you do not have to have much power or go at slow speed, you can get a larger mileage, but if you have to increase the speed of the vehicle or require power for a full load, the mileage per gallon goes down or, to put it the other way, the gasoline consumption goes up. Therefore, with load-carrying vehicles, it proved quite impracticable because they have to have the full pull all the time, and it was impossible to get his carburettor attachment to work under those circumstances. Mr. Pogue has never been able to give the branch a carburettor which works without being constantly adjusted. I mean that literally; you have to get out from time to time on the road and adjust the carburettor, which, of course, makes it absolutely impracticable.

Mr. Pogue went home. He was told by Major James with whom he was in contact, that we were ready at any time to consider any improvements he could make. He has been working on his carburettor ever since. In fact I think he is in town at the present time. I know Major James arranged for him to get into B class in regard to gasoline rationing so that he could have an opportunity of developing his carburettor.

I have an idea that my hon. friend must have known something about that, and I cannot understand his attitude when he suggests that the government has paid no attention to this matter. Mr. Pogue has had the fullest opportunity of demonstrating his device. That opportunity is open to him now. All the help that the department can give is there for him and he knows it. He has been the first to express appreciation for the way in which the department has treated him. He said that the help he received was far more than he expected.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not know whether the minister was referring to me when he said I knew it, or whether he meant Mr. Pogue.

Mr. RALSTON: I said I assumed my hon. friend knew it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have had correspondence with Mr. Pogue. My information is they are still working on it, but not with the government.

Mr. RALSTON: I have stated that the government worked with him for six weeks; he comes to see Major James from time to time now, to report on the progress he is making in trying to find something which will do the work that has to be done, and Major James has cooperated with him to the extent that long after he ceased to work with the department, Major James arranged for him to get special gasoline privileges in order that he might continue his experiments.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is still being conducted, is it?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): In the course of this debate much has been said about the duty of the war expenditures committee to investigate the Department of Munitions and Supply. I think anyone who followed this debate would assume that up to this time someone had prevented this committee from investigating the Department of Munitions and Supply. Let me say that that department was the first department of government investigated by the committee. My officers were before the committee for, I think, some two weeks, were excused, and fully expected to be called back. We were visited by a man who said he was chairman of a subcommittee of the main committee to investigate the Department of Munitions and Supply. We gave him the information for which he asked. I had a special officer delegated to see that the committee was served in any way that was required. It was the duty of this man to meet any members of the committee and to see that officers having special knowledge of the problems were placed at the disposal of the committee when required.

We have heard in the course of this debate many loose statements about the Department of Munitions and Supply, many from members of the committee. I suggest that the members of the committee are criticizing themselves when they make loose statements about the Department of Munitions and Supply. Here was a committee charged by parliament to investigate war expenditures, and now members of the committee rise in their places in this house and criticize the transactions of the department without ever having given the department a chance to lay the facts before them. I think it ill becomes any member of the committee, which has had all the facilities of the department placed at its disposal, to criticize the transactions of the department.

We have heard suggestions that there are men in plants who are not working as hard as they could work, and that there are plants which do not have all they could do. Surely it is the duty of the members of the committee to look into any case of that kind, obtain information on it and bring down a judicial finding, not just to make loose statements in this house. I believe two hon. gentlemen opposite visited my city and made a statement that they knew of thirty men who were out of work. I suppose thirty out of about 750,000 is a serious matter and worthy of comment. I am not objecting to statements of that kind, but I do say that when the information is readily available to members of the committee, such statements should not be made. It is very damaging to the war effort to have distrust built up about the Department of Munitions and Supply. I think the public in general have confidence that my department is carrying on its work honestly and with some efficiency. That being so, it is extremely important, when we are asking every man, woman and child in this country to buy war bonds, that that confidence should be preserved. If there is anything wrong with my department, there is no one more anxious to know about it than I am. We have special men constantly on the watch for irregularities or wrongdoing. We brought two or three men before the courts; they were brought before the courts, not by any outside investigators but by our own internal investigators. We shall be delighted if someone from the outside will give us a hand in finding any irregularities that may exist. I can assure hon. members that if there has been any irregularity, the guilty party will be punished to the full extent that the courts provide punishment.

I do not know that I should go into the specific charges that have been made in rather a loose way, whether or not it is worth dealing with them. I do say, however, that during this debate I have heard nothing which I am not prepared to discuss fully with the committee at any time. The files in my department are open to the committee. By international agreement we have undertaken not to publish lists of contracts, or to make public certain information. Those rules are much stricter to-day than they were a few months ago; but as far as the committee is concerned, and as long as it meets in camera, we are prepared to lay any document in the department before it or to have any of our officers appear before it to discuss any situation the members might wish to discuss.

I felt that I should say this. I believe every member of this house knows that what I have said is the situation, but just to keep the record straight I thought a statement of this kind on my part was warranted.

Mr. J. A. MARSHALL (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, I was honoured by my group by being appointed to the committee set up last session to investigate war expenditures. I regret that circumstances over which I had no control did not permit me to attend all the sessions that were held, but I wish to say that my relations with the other members of the committee were of the most cordial nature. I looked upon the work of the committee not in any partisan or political light but rather as a service I might give my country, because of my inability to serve in any other capacity. I gave up my work on the committee quite willingly, and for the balance of the time this group was represented by the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who, I believe, carried on in a very creditable manner. I feel sure that the hon. member who will represent us this year, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston), will bring to the work of the war expenditures committee the same high purpose and high motives which inspired those who performed this work last year.

I listened with strict attention to the remarks of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), and as a private member I desire to say that I agree with the minister in almost every particular. I fully realized from the beginning that we were not engaged simply in a fishing expedition. Rather our object was, as the minister stated, to view the situation in the broadest possible way and bring to the government and to the officials of the department helpful recommendations. I did not delude myself into thinking that this was a one-year job or a two-year job. It is a job that will tax the ingenuity of the members of the committee during the entire period of this war.

As a member of the war expenditures committee I understood that there was a definite and clear distinction between its work and that of the public accounts committee. I understood, further, that if anything came to our attention which seemed irregular, we could pass the information along to the public accounts committee for investigation. We spent a number of the early sessions in becoming thoroughly conversant with the routine operations of the Department of Munitions and Supply. This, to me at least, was fundamentally essential to the work which was to follow. If I were to offer any criticism in regard to the work done during the time I was a member of the committee, I should say that our meetings were too infrequent. We should have met more often in order to clear away the preliminary work with dispatch, and get down to matters of greater consequence.

I desire now to say a word or two about sittings in camera. As I understood it, there was more or less unanimity among the members of the committee with respect to this question. It was understood and agreed that we should sit in open session most of the time, but that if any matters came up of such a nature as to warrant a session in camera, the general committee or the subcommittee would weigh the facts and, if they were found to be sufficiently significant, would readily agree to such a sitting. But after many years of working on committees of various kinds I have come to the conclusion that sittings in camera are a joke. They are made such by the members themselves, who do not appear to know the meaning of the term "in camera" or the words "on your honour." I will admit that a very large amount of information which was given to us in the various sittings which were held in camera was of such a commonplace nature that it could have been given quite properly in an open session. One of the most informative articles I have ever read was published in Maclean's Magazine, and the information which formed the basis of that article was given in camera in a session of the committee of this house. I discovered that information of a more or less confidential nature was being constantly given out with perfect freedom and with utter abandon; and for that reason I believe the sittings in camera are a joke.

There seems to be some confusion in the minds of some hon. members about the war expenditures and the public accounts committees. It has been stated that the war expenditures committee has superseded the public accounts committee. If that is actually the situation, then I deplore it. I believe a very important part can be played by both the war expenditures committee and the public accounts committee.

As a member of the public accounts committee I frankly confess I have been disappointed because it has not been functioning. It should function, not for the purpose of washing dirty linen or of endeavouring to make political capital out of some situation, but rather to run down some of these insinuations, accusations, rumours and allegations which crop up from time to time. Let me cite an example. On one occasion I heard a member of the house make the statement that a building which normally would cost a million dollars would eventually cost two million. The information was given in such a way as to lead one to believe that something was radically wrong. I recall that the Minister of Munitions and Supply said he would see that a matter of this sort would be thoroughly investigated, and that an individual making an allegation such as that would be compelled to substantiate his statement. I have waited a long, long time, but nothing has come of that.

Mr. HOWE: As a member of the committee may I ask the hon. member why, if he considered that situation serious, he did not investigate it at first hand, and call for documents. I cannot be expected to run down every rumour.

Mr. MARSHALL: We were told definitely by the chairman of the war expenditures committee that matters of that sort did not fall within the purview of the committee, but rather were a question for the public accounts committee. It should not be necessary for any individual to rise in his place and make direct accusations in order to bring the public accounts committee together. The simple fact that a statement has been made should be the basis upon which we would be called together to run down an allegation, and see what it was all about.

I believe most of the recommendations made by the war expenditures committee would have been put into effect eventually, even if they had never been recommended by that committee. They were too obvious to be overlooked by a first-class business executive. I claim that nothing has been done thus far by the war expenditures committee which could not have been done in less time, at less expense and with less fuss by one good civilian cost accountant, one good office management expert and an experienced businessman. A committee of three men of this calibre would have accomplished more in one month than the war expenditures committee accomplished in the whole year.

However, the ground work has been laid, and the committee can build from that ground work. If irregularities can be found, I suggest that they be referred to the public accounts committee. I believe we who constitute the membership of that committee will endeavour to find out the real saboteurs of Canada's war effort, and recommend to the house what treatment should be meted out to them.

Canada is fighting for her national existence, and has given the "full speed ahead" signal to her Prime Minister. I assure the Prime Minister that I for one stand ready to do my part to see that we win this war, and to see, too, that proper punishment is meted out to those human vultures who would feed on the lives of patriotic Canadians.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): I am going to be brief and explicit in what I have to say. I am prompted to rise at this time by the remarks of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), who was chairman last year of the war expenditures committee. According to what he said, the committee did not have a very clear conception of its duties. In defending the activities of the committee this afternoon he made the statement that the probing into war contracts let by the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) was not the function of the committee, that it was not a fact-finding committee.

Mr. THORSON: I did not say it was not the function of the committee; I said it was not the primary function.

Mr. GILLIS: That is only quarrelling with words.

Mr. THORSON: There is a big difference.

Mr. GILLIS: The Minister of Munitions and Supply now tells us that the vouchers and records of his department were open to the committee at any time they wanted to make an examination. I consider the work of the war expenditures committee to be one of the most important functions of this parliament. I believe one of the best ways of maintaining the morale of the Canadian people at the present time is to guarantee that the money appropriated by means of war taxation is being spent to the greatest advantage in Canada's war effort. In going through certain sections of the country from time to time I find serious misgivings on the part of the people as to whether this is being done. In my opinion the committee should have been functioning since the outbreak of the war. It has a task of great magnitude before it; it will have to go back into the business which has been transacted since the outbreak of the war. A statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) which appeared in the Monetary Times of January 10, 1942, gives a clear picture of what the committee is up against at the present time. Referring to the war effort generally and war expenditures, he said:

> Its efforts in this direction are being stimulated by the war contracts awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply, which at the end of September had reached the enormous total of approximately $2,600,000,000. In order that our industries may be able to carry out their contracts, some $550,000,000 has been provided in the form of capital assistance for the construction of new plants, the extension of old plants, and the installation of new machinery and equipment. Again, since shipping is required to win the battle of the Atlantic and to carry our products to overseas markets, a programme of some $500,000,000 of new shipping has been authorized and some of these ships have already been launched. Indeed, our shipbuilding industry employs eight and nine times as many workers as it employed at the outbreak of war.

The wages of most of these workers have been frozen. From time to time the general public get the picture from the press that the workers in Canada consider that they are not getting what they should get in the way of wages and working conditions. They believe that production is not what it should be as exemplified in the steel industry, the mining industry and the shipbuilding industry. Union men have set up, of their own volition, production committees to see if industry cannot be speeded up. They are not quarelling about the question of wages.

The war expenditures committee is the only guarantee that the Canadian public have that the money is being spent to the greatest advantage. As I see it, the committee has avoided inquiry into the expenditures made by the different departments. According to the report which the committee made last year, I consider that its work was wasted. It inquired into the headquarters set-up of national defence, air, navy and army. There was no necessity for that. The different ministers come before the house with appropriations for their respective departments and we can make our inquiries from them. There is no necessity of a committee sitting in camera to inquire into the normal or natural expenditures of these departments. What is needed is an inquiry into the enormous expenditures made by way of contracts let, not only by the Department of Munitions and Supply but by the Department of National Defence. There is a great necessity to dispel the rumours that are being circulated. As an example, I would mention the airport at Sydney, Nova Scotia, a national defence project. People whom I consider as responsible have asked me questions about this. One of the tenders for the original contract for the construction of the buildings at this airport was $250,000, but it was refused. Yet the buildings were finally completed at a cost of $1,500,000. Why was this tender not accepted? This is the rumour, and I do not know whether it is true or not.

Mr. HOWE: May I suggest to the hon. member that he should not help to spread rumours of that kind. As a member of the committee he could get the facts.

Mr. GILLIS: I am not a member of the committee.

Mr. HOWE: Surely the hon. gentleman has friends. They only need to meet tomorrow and ask for vouchers on that, and the documents will be right there and every question will be answered.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The committee has not met since August.

Mr. HOWE: I suppose it will meet when this debate ends. As far as I can see, my hon. friend is preventing it from meeting.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): We have not prevented it from meeting during the last three months.

Mr. GILLIS: If the war expenditures committee were functioning as it should be, I could answer these rumours by saying that that was not possible, that there was a stopblock in the war expenditures committee which was checking these things. But the committee has not been fulfilling this function.

Mr. HOWE: I suggest that the hon. member's criticism should be of the committee and not of the way in which contracts are let.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It should be of the government for not setting up the committee sooner.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was not our fault.

Mr. COLDWELL: It was not our fault because we nominated our men early in the session.

Mr. GILLIS: That is not the only rumour I have heard. The hon. members for Halifax might have heard this one. The exhibition buildings in Halifax were taken over by the navy and were occupied for a short time.

When they moved in, the building was completely equipped with new plumbing. Then the army took over, and all the heating and radiation equipment and the plumbing was taken out and a new set-up put in. That should be investigated.

Mr. RALSTON: I am here waiting to go on with the details of the appropriations for my department. That is a question my hon. friend could ask me to-morrow or to-night if we finish this debate. He does not need a committee to do that.

Mr. GILLIS: The war expenditures committee should have been functioning since the outbreak of the war and then these rumours would not be circulating. We would have the machinery provided to stop such matters, or to investigate them. As I said before, it will not be possible to check current matters for some time because the committee is going to go back over the war expenditures of the last two or three years. This afternoon the Minister of National War Services, the chairman of the committee, pointed out that there was some misconception about the duties of the committee. It certainly did not perform the functions I thought it was set up to perform.

Another matter that should be checked is the ability of those who receive contracts to carry them out. Most of the criticism I have heard along this line is with respect to contracts let by the Department of National Defence. When a firm of undertakers is given the contract to construct buildings, put in runways and so forth on an air field, it certainly does not look good. The opinion among many people whom I have met is that it is simply pouring money down the sink. As the minister said a moment ago, the workers are being asked to buy war savings certificates, and they are doing it. They are doing their best to win the war. But the general opinion is that it is a partisan war, so far as the government is concerned, in the letting of contracts, and the committee can perform a useful and constructive service to the country if it will get down to business and make an examination of the many criticisms that are being levelled at the government on that score. I do not know whether it is true or not; I should like to know; it is the duty of the committee to find out.

Many members of the committee have stated in the house that the committee could not do this or could not do that. I think it is the duty of any member of the committee, if he is not satisfied with how the majority of the committee are handling its business and filing its reports, to come before this house with a minority report and let us know just what the trouble is.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the best service it is possible for me to render to the committee and to the country in this matter is to make as brief a speech as possible and let the committee get on with its work immediately. There is little to be added from the government benches to what has already been said by my colleague, the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson). In his address this afternoon the minister reviewed very comprehensively the work of the committee, and what had been accomplished by way of organization and investigation. I think he left the impression on the house, which indeed has been left generally by those who have spoken, that there is now a distinct agreement on the part of members of the committee that its objective is eminently desirable, that there is opportunity for very valuable public service in its work, and that while not as much has been achieved as members would naturally wish, there has been a measure of real accomplishment by the committee in its work thus far.

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) asked—and I think a similar request was made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell)—that I should state distinctly the view of the government with respect to the scope of the committee and give the house an assurance that there would be no restriction on its work by seeking to narrow down the extent of the committee's authority as set forth in the resolution. I wish to give that assurance emphatically and unequivocally. The desire of the government in establishing this committee is to have it investigate as fully and as completely as it possibly can matters which its members or others may bring to the committee as proper subjects for investigation. No group of members of the house could feel more deeply concerned about the expenditure of vast sums of money than the government itself does, and we look upon this committee not as a body that is investigating the government but as a body that is assisting the government in its control of public expenditures. I should like that view to be fully appreciated by all hon. members on the committee. Indeed, nothing has been more satisfactory, I think, to those of us who have this responsibility to carry than to observe that the members of the committee themselves have felt that the opportunities they have on the committee lie so largely in that direction. It is encouraging to know that they have felt that they do not regard themselves as a committee searching for scandal but rather as a body of members of this house who are seeking to render a public service in the matter of seeing that all possible economies are effected in connection with war expenditures and that matters which should be still further investigated may be brought to the attention of the government or of some committee of this house for that purpose.

In that regard I should like to draw the attention of the house to the significance of one statement in particular which was made this afternoon by the Minister of National War Services. Let me preface my remarks on that by saying that many have criticized the fact that the proceedings of the committee are in camera. But as my hon. friend the minister said, the purpose of sitting in camera is not that of seeking to conceal information. It is really a method of procuring information which could not be possible if the committee's proceedings were in public. That point, I think, has not been sufficiently dwelt upon. The very fact that the committee is sitting in camera and can bring before it any of the officials of any department connected with the war effort and can examine fully and in detail all matters that come before it, enables the members of the committee to obtain much more information than would otherwise be possible.

May I supplement that by drawing attention to what has been said so often in the British house, which is that while the public is not being informed daily of the proceedings of the committee, hon. members of that committee gain information and knowledge to a degree that would not be possible in any other way. If, in acquiring knowledge with respect to government contracts and matters of one kind or another, they feel there is need for fuller inquiry, there is nothing to prevent them from bringing up on the floor of the house questions which they think ought to be investigated further and asking for information from the ministry or seeking to obtain further inquiries before the committee of public accounts, if they wish so to do.

Viewed in that light I think it will be seen that there is an opportunity much greater than appears on the surface in the work of the committee. The members of the committee at Westminster have come across matters which they thought would not bear the light of day. They did not wish to expose them to the public gaze in a sensational way by having the proceedings carried on in public; they have felt that by having these matters appear in the press it would—I will not say be of assistance to the enemy, but be a comfort to the enemy, who delights in anything which will tend to create discord and suspicion in a country to which he is opposed. The opportunity, however, has thereby been afforded members of the committee to go to the minister of the department concerned and bring to his attention matters which they thought ought to be discussed.

Let me say on behalf of my colleagues and myself that if the members of this committee in the course of their investigations have reason to believe that there is some transaction that is not creditable or if there are good grounds of suspicion that there is some dealing that is not honourable, I invite them to bring these matters immediately to the attention of the minister who is at the head of the department; and if the minister does not find means to have the matter satisfactorily dealt with, then I would suggest that a direct request be made of the government to have the matter investigated by the committee on public accounts.

The reason why the war expenditures committee is not being regarded as a committee on public accounts is that we already have a committee on public accounts, a standing committee of this house, to deal with matters that should be dealt with in relation to public accounts. As I have indicated, the function of the war expenditure committee is not that of a committee on public accounts. Its duty is to investigate with a view to protecting the government's war effort in as many ways as may be possible, particularly in relation to unwise expenditures and unwise methods in regard to these expenditures.

The question of publicity has been fully explained by my colleague, and the question of the extent of the powers of the committee I think I have dealt with in a way to confirm the views already expressed by the minister in that regard.

Something has been said about the length of time which has been taken in setting up the committee, the insufficient time which the committee has had for looking into expenditures, and the lateness of the session at which the committee is now being constituted. I would be the last to deny that there has been ground for fair comment and criticism in that direction, but I would ask hon. members, when they speak about the committee not having been established at the very first session, to recall the matters to which the government had to give immediate attention. It seems to me that we would have been inviting unnecessary suspicion with regard to our own departments and administrators if, before we had begun to incur expenditures to any considerable extent, we had undertaken to form the committee, with other committees we already had in existence, at a much earlier time than we did.

Moreover, as hon. members themselves have found out, in the work of the committee the matters to be inquired into are so vast and extensive, the numbers of contracts so great, the whole business so large, that unless the methods of the committee were properly organized at the outset, unless the committee got a bird's-eye view, so to speak, of the whole field to be surveyed and a due appreciation of its own functions in the clearest possible way before entering on examination in detail, the time of the committee would have been very largely wasted and very little in the way of effective action would have followed.

I think hon. members who are on the committee will agree that, under the direction of the chairman, who was then a private member of the house, an excellent foundation was laid for the further work of the committee, and that much of the time that was taken up in organization will begin from now on to bear fruit in abundance.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) and others have spoken of the desirability of enlisting as largely as possible the services of the various members in connection with work on committees. I can assure him and other hon. members that the government is only too anxious to have the members' time employed as actively and efficiently as possible. There are now—it may surprise hon. members to hear me say it—no less than twenty-two committees; there will be, when the defence of Canada regulations committee is appointed, twenty-three committees at work this session. There are seven select committees, and the fifteen standing committees. That is a considerable number; indeed, some complaint has been made to-day that so many committees are meeting it is difficult to have members attend to the extent that they should.

Possibly there is room for improvement in the arrangement of the meetings of the different committees, and, speaking for myself, I should be wholly favourable to having the committee on war expenditures enlarged if that is going to help to further the work for which the committee was intended. I shall be glad to take up that matter with my colleagues; I think they will view it sympathetically; and if the committee itself, after a meeting, feels that its work could be better performed by having its membership enlarged to some extent, I for one shall be prepared to do what I can to have that recommendation favourably received by the house.

I might say the same in respect to other recommendations that may come from the committee to the house. I believe, now that the work is generally recognized to be of the importance that it is, this house will be ready to approve almost any recommendation which comes to it from the committee itself.

I do not know that there is more I should add at the moment; indeed, I do not want to have this debate go over to to-morrow. I would, however, not like to conclude without expressing appreciation to members of the house, and particularly to the members of the committee, of the general acceptance of the resolution which is now before the house, and which I believe will pass unanimously to-night.

Mr. ADAMSON: Will the Prime Minister state whether it will be possible at this session for private members to attend the sessions of the committee, not to take part in them, but to attend? It was allowed at some sessions which were held last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe that is a privilege of private members at all times. I feel certain, if the committee themselves wish to have that liberty granted, it will be granted in a moment. I can see no reason why private members should not be permitted to attend at any time.

Motion agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, May 1, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

First report of special committee on vocational training.—Mr. Donnelly.

First report of standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Golding.

RECONSTRUCTION AND REESTABLISHMENT—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. J. G. TURGEON (Cariboo) moved that the second report of the special committee on reconstruction and reestablishment, presented to the house on April 30, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

SOLDIER LAND SETTLEMENT—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Hon. CYRUS MACMILLAN (Queens) moved that the first report of the special committee on land settlement of veterans of the present war, presented to the house on April 30, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

JAPANESE NATIONALS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—HUNGER STRIKES—PROCEDURE IN RELOCATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. CRUICKSHANK (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask the Minister of Labour two questions with respect to a matter which I believe is of urgent national importance, owing to the prominence it has received in the Vancouver Daily Province of April 27. What steps are being taken to maintain the prestige of the authorities in connection with the hunger strikes by the Japanese in British Columbia? Are wealthy Japanese allowed to settle wherever they see fit, and in whatever manner they desire, for the duration?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): My reply to the first question is that any Japanese guilty of breach of discipline are being promptly dealt with by the British Columbia security commission, and those who do not comply with instructions are immediately interned. With regard to the second question, no Japanese, regardless of their financial standing, are being allowed to relocate in any part of British Columbia or anywhere else without first receiving the permission of the security commission.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

The house resumed from Tuesday, April 28, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1943, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. ADAMSON: As a member of the house I believe I have the right to speak on matters of vital importance, despite the fact that I happen to be a member of the armed forces. Naturally there are certain limitations with respect to what I can or should say, and I shall follow the procedure in the British House of Commons. Having due regard to those limitations I shall endeavour to bring before the house certain matters which I consider it is my duty to discuss. There are a number of things I may say here, and a number I may say in another place. I shall endeavour to keep the subjects I may discuss here separate from those of another nature which may be discussed elsewhere.

Discussing Canada's war effort a British general, not now in Canada, said to me the other day, "One of the greatest difficulties you have in Canada, one of the besetting sins of the Canadian war effort, is the office-bound staff."

Mr. RALSTON: The office-bound staff?

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, and by that he meant that the officers on the various staffs do not visit the training establishments as they should do. I believe I have had a rather unique experience in that not only have I had the opportunity and the ability on frequent occasions to visit national defence headquarters, but I have been in the districts and with the field formations. What we are up against in the army to-day is the task of correlating our points of view. There is a certain point of view in national defence headquarters, a second point of view in the districts, and still another point of view in the field formations. All the difficulties which have arisen have been largely due to the fact that the points of view of the districts, the field formations and national defence headquarters have been divergent. We have tried to work as a unit by carrying on too much correspondence, and that is the first point I wish to discuss to-day.

In over two years of war I have had only one visit in my own branch from a superior officer attached to national defence headquarters. I suggest that visits between the districts and headquarters should be very frequent, and I also suggest that the district staff officers should have more opportunity to visit the field formations. To show the enormous size of the work may I point out that during the last year I travelled between 25,000 and 30,000 miles for the department. Even so, there were in one district two establishments I was not able to visit in that one year. That is the first problem we are up against.

I would suggest that the training officers should be rotated between the basic and advanced training centres and by headquarters. The officers responsible for the training of the Canadian army would then have the point of view not only of headquarters but of the districts and the training centres themselves. We have tried to do this by correspondence, but the main difficulty is the fact that correspondence ties officers to their desks at headquarters. One visit of a training officer, even a junior officer, to the training centres would do more good than all the correspondence one could write. I believe they should be rotated.

I wonder whether the house realizes the complexity of the Canadian army to-day. First you have the headquarters establishment, then the districts, then the command headquarters, then the basic training centres, advanced training centres, technical training schools, veterans' guards companies, specialized units, and active army units in the fourth division. Each of these units has a definite and unique part to play. Unless the members of these units are rotated with their own headquarters, we shall not achieve the true efficiency that we should have in our army.

I should like to mention one or two matters as examples. I would refer first to the syllabus for physical training. The training centre officers tell me that with the PT syllabus now in effect they find it difficult to keep the interest of the men. They have no authority to alter this basic training syllabus. Our training is in a constant state of evolution, and they tell me that if this syllabus were modified even slightly it would help the morale of the troops and make them more keen about their training. Hon. members will realize that it would be manifestly impossible to allow the officers at the training centres to alter the training syllabus as they wished. But I do suggest that there should be an opportunity for the officers in the directorate of military training at Ottawa to go to these basic training centres and find out how these syllabuses could be altered. Our training changes after practically every new action or campaign fought in the war.

Another matter has to do with the basic training centres. The first thing you try to do with a new recruit is to make him enthusiastic about the army. The first few days in the army constitute a most vital part of the young man's military life. The first thing you do is to give the young man an old Ross rifle, dated 1905, probably with the bolt missing or the sight gone. He is told that this is to be his personal weapon of protection. This rifle may be all right for drill purposes, but it is good for nothing else and the psychological reaction is bad. I believe the department should consider providing a complete set of the most modern weapons for each basic training centre so that the young soldier, instead of seeing these dreadful old guns, can be shown the modern Lee-Enfield rifle, the two-inch or three-inch mortars and the rest of the excellent weapons we have. I understand that in the United States army the first thing they do with their recruit is to take him out on the range, give him a rifle, and tell him that there is the target, try to hit it. He is thus given confidence in his weapon. I mention these old Ross rifles as a sample of what we are up against.

Then there is the selection of men for the specialized branches. This selection is made at the basic training centres which I consider a most important part of our army. The raw recruit comes into the basic training centre, in most cases wanting to do a job. After he has spent the prescribed time there, he is selected to go into the infantry, the artillery, the ordnance, the signals, the medical corps or some other branch of the army. This is just one more reason why we should do everything in our power to provide adequate equipment. With such equipment we would be able to find out more about the capabilities of our troops.

The next step is from the basic to the advanced training centre. In the advanced training centre considerably more equipment is available. Naturally you cannot teach a man to run before he walks, and a much better job of equipping is done at the advanced training centres. It is here that the soldier really begins to appreciate his responsibilities. It is here that he realizes the job ahead of him. He begins to realize what a lot he has to learn. Here again I earnestly suggest that training officers be rotated so that the advanced training officer in the advanced training centre will know the difficulties which the district headquarters are up against and what national defence headquarters is up against. If the officers were rotated in this way, a tremendous amount of correspondence that is now carried on would be eliminated.

From the point of view again of the advanced training officer, he is trying to do a job; he is up against a difficulty; he is out with the troops. He explains that difficulty in writing as well as he can, and it has to go through the district headquarters and from there to national defence headquarters. If the officer at national defence headquarters would come to the training centre and spend a day in the field; if he would perhaps live for a month at the advanced training centre, the advanced training officer could explain to him in ten minutes what he is up against, rather than have to put it in writing and send it through the usual channels. In this war of movement time is absolutely vital, and time is just as vital in training as it is in actual combat. I do suggest that this method would speed up your training and make it more efficient.

Stonewall Jackson said this about war:

> War means fighting. The business of the soldier is to fight. Armies are not called out to dig trenches, to throw up breastworks, to live in camps, but to find the enemy and strike him; to invade his country and do him all possible damage in the shortest possible time. This will involve great destruction of life and property while it lasts; but such a war will be of necessity of brief continuance, and so would be an economy of life and property, in the end. To move swiftly, strike vigorously, and secure all the fruits of victory is the secret of successful war.

If anything has shown that he was right when he said that, it has been the successful campaigns of the German army in the present war. Each of them has been violent, rapid, and tremendously destructive, but I think it can also be said of them that they were all economical of life compared with a long campaign of attrition, compared with battles like Passchendaele in the last war, compared with trench warfare. If we are to defeat the powers arrayed against us, the type of warfare described by Stonewall Jackson is the type of warfare we shall have to fight. I believe that is generally realized, but it must be driven home every day to every officer and every soldier in the Canadian army that tremendous speed is essential.

Officers returning from the recent campaign in Libya—we have seen quite a number of them and have talked with them—have said that one of their difficulties was the breakdown of communications, the lack of coordination, shall I say, between the air force and the army. In this war every man, particularly every officer, and more particularly every staff officer, has to think in a three-dimensional plane. If you are in the army you must think also of the air force. If you are in the air force you must think also of the army. You must know the limitations of the weapons of the sister forces, their capabilities and their characteristics. I suggest to the government that that is one of the things we in Canada are not teaching. I suggest that there should be a joint staff of officers who are trained in the air and on the ground. I make that suggestion most sincerely. Suppose an air officer is put in a tank. At once he gets an entirely new conception of its limitations of vision, the hazards of ground, and other features of tank warfare. Or put a tank officer from one of the armoured divisions in the air, and at once he gets an entirely new conception of camouflaging his tank, of its vulnerability, its ability to move with speed and a thousand and one other things. It is an extremely technical matter and one that requires constant study. One requisite in the army to-day is constant education. No one should be in the army who is not prepared to work at his job and to learn all the time. Every new campaign has new lessons to teach. Let me give an example of the sort of thing that happens at the present time.

The other day in England an officer wanted photographs taken of a certain area. He telephoned to the local air force command saying he wanted those photographs taken. The air force commander asked, "What is your ceiling there?" The army officer could not tell him what his ceiling was. He did not know as elementary a thing as that about the sister force. Every army officer who is in charge of the movement of troops should be able to cooperate with the air force and know and understand the limitations of aircraft. Here, simply because of a lack of knowledge of the air arm, a request was made which it was impossible to carry out.

There are one or two small points I might also mention. There have been a number of accidents to mechanical transport. We have standing accident boards. They have them in England. The air force asked me, "What are you people doing about night blindness?" I do not know what is being done about night blindness, but we have had quite a number of accidents which have been caused by people whose vision at night was faulty, who were suffering from some degree of night blindness. Here is another example of how the air force and the army can cooperate. I do not know what is being done about night blindness, but the subject is very important. To a man driving extremely valuable equipment, and going into action in the dark, vision is one of the most essential things. We have found that many accidents in England have been caused by night blindness.

A word about discipline. It is no secret that one of the principal troubles is absence without leave. It is not as general as many people think, but it does exist, and is probably responsible for 80 per cent of detention crime in this country. Absence without leave is punishable by stopping a man's pay, perhaps for fourteen, perhaps for twenty-eight days, but the loss of pay goes on much longer than that because his allowance is paid to his wife and family, while he draws no pay on pay day. His psychological reaction is a loss of interest in the army; his attitude is, "what's the use?" This matter has been brought to my notice, as a member of this house, by constituents of mine who are in the army. They say, "We lose heart when we find that we are not to get any pay for a month, or even two months. There is no incentive to do well; why should we not go absent without leave again?" One tries to argue with such a man, but his is really a psychopathic case; a great deal of work has to be done on it, and if the condition goes on for a considerable time, his wife, family and dependents suffer also. I have a suggestion to make in that connection in a minute.

Another point I want to mention is that a great many soldiers have to wait a considerable time for district courts-martial. The judge advocate-general's department is required to prepare cases for courts-martial, and nearly all of them are for absence without leave. They are always very busy.

My suggestion is that the training centre commandants be given more power to deal summarily with these cases. There should be some system of immediate punishment, such as punishment drill, so that the man who is on leave and is tempted to outstay it will reflect, "I shall have to walk up that so-and-so hill a dozen times if I don't get back to the camp in time", and will make every effort to avoid the penalty. Let the punishment be immediate. Do not keep men hanging around in detention, not carrying on training, waiting for district courts-martial. Remember that we are terribly short of time for training.

There are a few other matters, concerning dependents' allowances, which I think should be brought before the committee. First let me mention the matter of soldiers' children. The soldier, going overseas, leaves his wife and family here in Canada. The wife gets a job in a munitions factory, and there is, I think, every reason why she should. It is important that everybody should be usefully employed, and many of these women are doing an excellent job. But they leave for work at an early hour in the morning and they do not get back before six o'clock at night. In the interval the children are entirely without parental supervision. Consequently we find in Toronto —and I believe the situation is general—a large increase of delinquency among children. I suggest that the minister's department should consult with other departments to see whether something cannot be done such as they are doing in England. In the schools of England a meal is provided at mid-day for the child whose parents are working. Also they have established certain types of nursery schools to take care of the children of soldiers and others whose work prevents them from remaining at home. Nothing can be more upsetting to the soldier overseas than to read in the newspaper or have somebody report to him that his eight-year-old boy has been haled before the children's court for stealing chocolate bars or throwing stones through a window. This is a matter for interdepartmental cooperation, and it should be attended to right away, for it affects the morale of the army. The soldier concludes that we who are still in Canada are not looking after his dependents, and there is nothing more likely to destroy his confidence in the cause for which he is fighting.

I have had mothers come to me and say, "I get no allowance although my boy is in the army, because he was on relief before he joined up and was not contributing to my support." For that reason, it appears, the department take the attitude that they should not be held responsible for the support of the mother. That attitude, it seems to me, is definitely wrong and false. It penalizes the soldier. If the man does not go into the army he can get work at $6 or $7 a day and thus support his mother, but if he enlists she is penalized because he was previously unemployed. Some attention should be paid to that, and very quickly.

Mr. McNIVEN: Have you brought such cases to the attention of the dependents' allowance board?

Mr. ADAMSON: I have brought one case to their attention and I did get action on it.

Mr. McNIVEN: I have had no difficulty with them.

Mr. ADAMSON: In two cases I got action, but several other cases have been reported to me in which nothing was done.

Mr. MUTCH: The provision is there.

Mr. McNIVEN: It is the law, and there should be action.

Mr. ADAMSON: There has not been action.

Mr. GOLDING: That is a long time ago.

Mr. ADAMSON: It was six months ago.

Mr. McNIVEN: It must have been at least as long as that.

Mr. ADAMSON: No; it was not more than six months ago.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The hon. member started late.

Mr. ADAMSON: No. I started long before that.

Another matter that I have in mind has reference to pensions in respect of men killed or injured in Canada. Very often men have been on leave, on pass away from military duty, and have been injured or killed, but the department has taken the attitude that it was no responsibility of theirs. That attitude should be reviewed. I consider it is the responsibility of the government just as much in Canada as in England.

I leave these suggestions with the government. The most important thing of all is to see to it, from the point of view of headquarters, from the point of view of field formation, that there is correlation. Do not do it by letter. Let us have an interchange of views so that we can get down to brass tacks with the men actually in the camps and training centres so that we shall know what we are trying to do, and so that they will know our difficulties and we shall know theirs. Five minutes spent in such discussion is worth all the correspondence in the world.

I am not going to bring up the question of reserves, nor am I going to bring up the question of home defence personnel in the active army, except to say this. I believe that the Canadian army should be the Canadian army and that, now that the plebiscite is over, there should be no distinction as to where a man serves. The sooner we can do away with home defence personnel in active units, the better it will be because we shall then be able to strike the greatest blow for improved morale in the Canadian army.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has mentioned quite a number of points that may be interesting to other members of the committee and perhaps I might be permitted to deal with them, though not at length, to indicate to hon. members what has been done and what is being done along the lines to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I do not think he does the British officer whom he quotes quite justice. I am not quite satisfied that the British officer, if he is of the type of British officer I know, made any such statement as that the besetting sin of the Canadian war effort was the office-bound staff. I know British officers well enough to know that they do not criticize in that tone or spirit, and I suggest to my hon. friend that he make the criticism his own and not bolster it up with a statement by a British officer whose name he does not give and whom, I am satisfied, he misquotes in using that expression.

My hon. friend has referred to the matter of personal contact between headquarters and districts. He has referred to something that is so elementary that I do not think it needs much emphasis from any of us. We all understand that if it were possible by personal visit to indicate all the things that have to be communicated in connection with the army or in connection with business, it would be highly desirable to do so, supplementing it with matters on record, so that people will not misunderstand what has been said. That is impossible in connection with the army and has been from the beginning. We have been just as busy as we could be in raising, equipping, organizing, feeding, clothing and transporting the army, but there has been no possibility of building up this staff as we should have liked to build it up. I know there is some criticism in this house in certain quarters, indicating that we have too much staff. I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that this view is not shared by very many who know the organization of the armed forces, either navy, army or air.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You do not say anything about the source of the criticism.

Mr. RALSTON: What I am endeavouring to do, and I say this frankly, is to increase the staff in order to meet the very natural demand which comes from all quarters, not simply from districts but from headquarters as well, for particulars, to study problems on the ground, to meet with officers on the firing line, if I may put it that way, and to endeavour to assist in their problems. My hon. friend is aware, I know, that I do not profess to suggest for a moment that the liaison has been perfect, but I do suggest that there has been considerable; and the fact that he as an intelligence officer has not been officially called to headquarters, or that he has had only one visit from an intelligence officer at headquarters, does not by any means represent the liaison between headquarters and officers in the district.

Let me say this in connection with the district officers commanding. As my hon. friend knows, there was, as soon as the chief of the general staff and I came back from England a year ago, an immediate conference of D.O.C.'s from all over the dominion. We cannot have them in very often, but we brought them in then to discuss the whole matter with regard to the war prospects, and they were brought in again only quite recently. But that does not represent liaison, because, particularly in some parts of the country which have been concerned with regard to their defence, there have been visits from senior officers from headquarters. I instance the chief of the general staff who in December, went to the Pacific coast, and the vice-chief of the general staff, who went at the time I went to the Pacific coast, or three months thereafter. The chief of the general staff has been on both coasts, and so far as the staff officers are concerned, I have made it a rule in connection with every convoy to see that some senior staff officer is there.

Perhaps I might give to the committee a list of the conferences which have been held at headquarters. That means officers coming from districts. The D.O.C. conference was held some time ago, and there was another in March this year. The A.A.Q.M.G.'s held a conference, and district recruiting officers held two conferences in the last six months—about six months. In January we had a conference of commandants of all basic training centres straight across Canada, and this is a matter to which my hon. friend devoted a considerable portion of his remarks, namely, work in the basic training centres. We brought the commandants of the basic training centres in in the month of January, and we had a conference of commandants and officers of training centres and advanced training centres as well. That was the middle of last year, the latter half of the year. We had a general staff officers conference in September and district ordnance officers conferences in October, 1941, and February, 1942. At the present time the chief of the general staff, with Brigadier Weeks, who is officer in charge of training, and a deputy chief of the general staff, and Brigadier Macklin, from the adjutant-general's branch, are on a ten-days' tour. They are not attempting to cover all Canada by any means but are making a meticulous visit to all training centres in Ontario. They will be out for something like ten days. As a matter of fact we have arranged the organization of the general staff so that we shall have an officer on the road practically all the time in connection with training. We have so arranged it that there are two officers under Brigadier Weeks, that is, Colonel Whitelaw, who is in charge of the regular military training, and under him is Colonel Sparling, who was overseas and who now has come back. In the other branch of training we have Colonel Kennedy, who is director of trades training and who also came back from overseas for the purpose of taking up that work. Then we have a liaison officer who himself can go out, or who can take the position of officers in the department in order to permit them to go out.

In connection with this matter of training my hon. friend lays down again what I think are some pretty elementary principles. He says that at the basic training centres—I believe this was the expression he used—there should be a full or complete set of the most modern weapons, and he deprecated very much the idea of issuing what he called the old Ross rifle. I wish to assure my hon. friend that there are not very many new Ross rifles in the Dominion of Canada or anywhere else. There are not very many new mark I Lees, or new mark II Lees, or new mark III Lees. These are old rifles, but that does not interfere with their efficiency. I suggest to the committee that while we would like to supply all basic training centres with complete sets of the most modern weapons, we in this country have some obligation to the people who are on the firing lines at the present moment, who are using weapons of that kind and who are calling for more. Speaking for myself, I do not propose to take the position that we will insist on having the most modern weapons in the basic training centres in Canada when they are needed more urgently elsewhere, where the fighting is active.

Mr. ADAMSON: I did not suggest that the whole establishment should be issued with the modern weapons, but a complete set of these weapons should be there, to be seen.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend said that a complete set of the most modern weapons should be at each basic training centre. The hon. member went on to say that we were issuing a lot of old Ross rifles, and he deprecated that very much. A soldier cannot be issued anything but an old Ross rifle. He may see one of the modern weapons; that is a different story.

Mr. ADAMSON: He could be issued a Ross rifle that would fire. These things were made in 1905, without any sights or bolts.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps I do my hon. friend an injustice, but I was sure the impression he left with the committee was that it was all wrong to issue a recruit an old Ross rifle.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To be perfectly honest, are they not obsolete now?

Mr. RALSTON: No, not for training. I would say that one could teach recruits the grip, the firing positions, trigger pressing, aids to rapid fire, and so on. I think the only thing one could not teach them on a Ross rifle, and it could be taught by means of diagrams, would be the sight, because the Ross rifle sight is different from the Lee sight.

Mr. ADAMSON: These rifles are without sights and without bolts.

Mr. RALSTON: I say to my hon. friend that he does not know what he is talking about when he states that large numbers of men at basic training centres are issued Ross rifles without sights and wthout bolts. He had better go to the basic training centres and see.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There are rifles issued at the basic training centres which, when the butts are grounded, have the bolts fall out. That has happened.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then why deny it?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not denying it at all. I am saying that rifles issued at the basic training centres are, generally speaking, not Ross rifles with the bolts out. I want to tell my hon. friend that these rifles are issued for the purpose of teaching musketry, and the recruits are given sufficient rifles with which to fire. I say to the committee quite frankly that I propose to follow this course until we have enough rifles for active work. I find that there has been practically no complaint from the basic training centres in that connection.

Let us understand this rifle situation. I have indicated before, and I have never concealed from the house, that the rifle situation is not as we would like to have it. At the same time we are doing everything we can to use the rifles we have to the best advantage, in the places where they are most needed, having regard to their condition. If my hon. friend and the committee knew as much as I do with regard to requirements for rifles in connection with this war, there would not be any complaint as to the fact that Ross rifles, some of them even without bolts, happen to be used in the basic training centres. We cannot issue complete sets of the most modern weapons to the basic training centres. Further, the training carried on there is not being carried on by those of us who have not been overseas in this war. It is being carried on by men who have come back from England and who know what training is going on there for the sort of warfare that we anticipate in this war.

I just want to give the committee a list in this connection. I have mentioned it before, but now I have the list under my hand. We have fourteen British officers here for three months as instructors. We have eleven officers from Canada on exchange with the British army at the present time. Some 93 officers have just returned to assume duties as second in command and as commanders of companies. Some 145 officers and 368 other ranks are now abroad or in transit for courses, and they will be brought back here later. Some 263 officers and 900 other ranks have just returned for instructional duties at advanced and basic training centres. That is the thousand men I mentioned the other night.

Mr. ADAMSON: They have just arrived?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly. My hon. friend laughs about it. What is wrong with that?

Mr. ADAMSON: I said it was an excellent thing.

Mr. RALSTON: Thank you very much. Then seventy-two officers and other ranks have just returned from overseas after attachment for three months to the Canadian army overseas, and seventy-six are now going the other way for three months. These are the sort of men who are carrying on the training in these basic training centres. I do not profess to know very much about training. I can only give the syllabus as I have it, but I want to say to the committee that the syllabus is under constant review by the training officers, who I think know their jobs fairly well. The changes are issued from month to month, as the opportunity arises. I would think—and I want to make sure about this, because my hon. friend struck a point in which I am very much interested—that the suggestion of a practical officer training men would receive the utmost attention and would be acted upon, unless there was something wrong with it. What my hon. friend said was that an officer at a training centre was not allowed to change the syllabus. Obviously you cannot have a syllabus prepared by people who we think understand what is required in that connection, and having due regard to the practice in the United Kingdom, and then have it changed at will by someone who thinks he knows a better way. But you can immediately take up any suggestion which is made by any officer. I agree with my hon. friend in this respect—and I have tried to preach it in connection with the Canadian army—that I believe not only is there always a difficulty in bringing together the people in the district and the people at headquarters, but there is a difficulty to some extent in bringing together the ranks themselves, that is to say the man who is very much senior and the man who is junior. The man who is junior is working away at his job, and he gets the idea that was expressed by my hon. friend, that any suggestion he makes will, of course, not be listened to by the people up top. As a result he does not make the suggestion. I have said I felt that our army, in order to get along and make the most of its opportunities, should have people pressing from the bottom up and from the top down in order to get together in connection with these matters.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that known among the junior officers?

Mr. RALSTON: I have tried to make it known, and I know the chief of the general staff has tried to make it known.

Mr. ADAMSON: That is just what I want to bring about, the interchange of junior officers. Do not send a general round to the basic training centres and try to get ideas from your junior officers. They will not give them to him.

Mr. RALSTON: Junior officers do not generally talk to the inspecting officer. The junior officer talks, I think, to the man with whom he works in the training centre. But the general, whoever he may be, is the man who has authority on the ground to make the change. I think that is the advantage of the minister going around once in a while. I say that because there are certain things which can be done off the bat. Otherwise, if you sent a junior officer he would have to write or to wire to his headquarters and be supported with documents. The result would be that the matter would get into the mails and it would be some time before action could be taken.

If at all possible, there is advantage in sending a senior officer who has power immediately to make a change or to give instructions that changes be made. There is no difficulty if the principle I suggest is adopted on the part of the senior as well as the junior officer, namely, that the senior officer sees to it that the junior officer's ideas are given a fair trial and a fair chance, and that they are receptive to suggestions which come in, notwithstanding the fact that they do not come from people on his staff.

The vice-chief of the general staff and I were out west for some time. I hope the committee will pardon my mentioning myself so much, but I make these observations simply to illustrate how time and again we ran across suggestions which had been made by a junior officer. We might find some equipment which was not there, and which the district did not know about. We would be told, "I have indented for it"—that is the favourite expression, as my hon. friend will know. That is the favourite word used in the district, the training centre or anywhere else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It means a requisition?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, a requisition. It would mean that he has signed a request. Then he might get the idea that that is all that ought to be done. He may be discouraged and think that there is no use doing anything else, and that that is the army way of doing things. In the army you can get after a thing, indent, call up somebody on the telephone and say, "Did you get it; is it on your desk?" He probably finds it on his desk, with twenty or thirty other files. There may be need to deal with that quickly, but if it is not called particularly to a person's attention it may go to the bottom of a file, and not be dealt with for the next day or so. Then it may go next day to the master-general of the ordnance and be sorted out there, with the result that it may take four or five days, or a week to deal with the matter. But in connection with a particular item a junior officer can follow it through. He can be encouraged to follow it through, either by telephone or otherwise; and if he were we would get certain things done that are necessary.

[Mr. Ralston.]

I beg the committee not to think that you can break down army or business routine and make it work. You will have chaos if you do. But you can have a sense of proportion in connection with the army, as well as with anything else. You can try to pick out things that are important.

Of course I am talking of departmental procedure. The danger is that a red tag may be placed on the file, marking it urgent. But everything of a routine nature will be tagged, with the result everything becomes urgent, and you are back to where you started. So I say there is room for initiative, and the actions of junior officers should be encouraged so that they would press, and do a little more than just indent. They should realize that their representations should not only receive consideration, but be acted upon.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know a great deal about the army, but I talk to officers who do know. Recently I had a conversation with an army officer with respect to this very matter of equipment. He made an observation to me which I shall pass on to the minister, because I believe it is sound. He said, "Is it not true that a man in training should, while training, have the weapons he proposes to use when he goes to war?" That is the idea, as briefly as I can express it. The minister has said it is not possible—and I quite agree. But should that not be the objective? It will be understood I am not raising this question with a view to reverting to the scolding the minister gave my colleague. I thought the minister was, perhaps, a little unfair, but I am content to let that pass. I suggest that the principle is sound, if it can be achieved. I believe it is a question of the ways and means, and the ability to achieve the objective.

The minister made it quite clear—and I agree with him—that if Lee-Enfield rifles are required elsewhere more than on our training fields, then they should be elsewhere. He will find no criticism I am sure from this side of the house on that score. But we are now in the war two and a half years, and I had thought that the rifle situation had improved. I should be glad if we were told just what the position is in that connection.

Mr. RALSTON: The leader of the opposition has enunciated what I believe is an absolutely sound principle. I am not speaking as an expert, but it is obvious that if you can give a man the exact weapon he will use in the field, then that must be absolutely desirable. I agree that that should be the objective. I believe we have attained that at training centres with respect to every weapon except the rifle—and the hon. member for York

West will have some information on that point. With respect to rifles we are using, shall I say, a different model from the rifle which may be used. As a matter of fact there are four marks of Lee-Enfields, two marks of Ross, besides the Springfields to which reference has been made. I could give the committee privately what the situation is in that regard; I believe I intimated it during the secret session. I can say only this, that the rifle situation is improving. It is improving very steadily, so far as production is concerned. The point is that demands, as well as production, are increasing; and that is the difficulty. The further point is that Canada's rifles are pretty well supposed to go round the world.

I referred to the officers who had been brought over from the other side, to indicate that there was liaison in that respect. I did not mention something which the hon. member for York West may know better than I, namely that conferences are held from time to time by the district officers commanding with the officers in command of units of the reserve army, and with the officers in command of the training centres in their districts; as well as of the active units in their districts.

I know that some general staff officers in charge of training pay visits more often than others. But what we are doing at headquarters, and have been doing—and we are endeavouring to do the same in the districts—is to go over the staff so that these visits can be made. So I leave that particular subject with the same thought with which I began the discussion of it by saying that I am thoroughly in accord with the idea as it has been expressed concerning the desirability of personal visits in every possible instance.

The hon. member mentioned joint operation. I do not believe the committee realizes just how closely the three arms of the service work. I have tried to make that clear before. We do work at headquarters through inter-service committees. We have joint service committees on magazines, hospitals, pay and allowances, chemical warfare and conservation. We have a joint chiefs-of-staff committee which meets each week. We have a defence council which meets every week and which consists of the three ministers, three deputy ministers and the three chiefs of staff. There is the junior war staff at Kingston teaching combined operations. So really we are not neglectful of the principle which has been suggested, namely that as far as possible we should be familiar with the aims and work of the other armed services.

I am not in a position to give the committee further information with regard to the advance and progress which has been made along that line. But I can repeat what I said the other night, that definite progress is being made in connection with having the air force and the army combine and work together; and there are certain plans and programmes under way in Canada along the same line.

My hon. friend referred to night blindness. A great deal of research work is being done along that line. We have ordered machines for testing night blindness, and the testing will start just as soon as the machines are available. As a matter of fact there are more on order for the army. The hon. member mentioned absence without leave and suggested that the officer commanding be given more power.

Mr. ADAMSON: Yes, power to deal summarily with these cases.

Mr. RALSTON: I think I am right when I say that the officer commanding can give up to twenty-eight days' detention, and I should think that that is about power enough for the commanding officer. I believe the soldier has the right to elect to take court-martial if he so desires. I do not think we could give very much more. I would prefer not to give more power to the commanding officer than he has already, that is, the power to give twenty-eight days' detention, which in fact may mean twenty-eight days' imprisonment. As a matter of fact, that is the provision in the army act. It does not follow that it is right simply because it is in the act or has been in force for many years, but one would think the test of time would have indicated that that is the extent of the power which should be given.

My hon. friend referred incidentally to the matter of creches for children of soldiers' wives. That is not strictly an army matter, but it has to do with the man-power problem. The problem to be considered by this country has to do with the drafting of women into industry in order to relieve men and make them available for the armed forces. I intended saying, when I was speaking just for a minute or two on that subject, that that was one of the many measures which has to be worked out and adopted if this plan of using women in industry is going to be effective. There are going to be married women who are soldiers' wives and married women who are not but who have children, and these children will have to be looked after if the services of the women are to be used in industry. It is not only a matter of training the women, it is not only a matter of moving them to industry, it is not only getting the employer to agree to have them; there is the additional problem of looking after their families while they are working.

Mr. ADAMSON: That was the important part of the question I was asking.

Mr. RALSTON: I just want to say a word or two about headquarters organization, in reply to the point raised by my hon. friend and along the line of what I have said already. My hon. friend suggested that the people at headquarters should go out more. There are two directorates of military training, one headed by Colonel Kennedy and the other by Colonel Whitelaw. In addition—I think I said this before—there is a liaison officer whose duty it is to travel to the training centres or to replace other section heads by staying at headquarters when they are travelling. I would say that the same principle is being developed in connection not only with the general staff but also with the adjutant-general's branch, the quartermaster-general's branch and the branch of the master-general of the ordnance. At this minute we have the quartermaster-general on the east coast, the master-general on the west coast heading east and the chief of the general staff with his deputy in charge of military training and one of the deputy adjutants-general travelling in central Canada. I am sure my hon. friend will not complain about the number of visitors from headquarters who are out on the road endeavouring to deal with the very problem to which he has referred.

I was dealing with the point raised by my hon. friend about junior officers not being able to amend the syllabus when I am afraid I got off on a pet hobby of mine. I am greatly interested in the necessity of paying attention to the recommendations of junior officers and seeing to it that we get the benefit of their views and experience. I only want to say that we are encouraging these suggestions. We are trying to get them through the officers in command of the basic training and advanced training centres. We are seeing to it that they do not fall by the wayside by providing these additional visitations from headquarters, either the district or national defence headquarters, in order to see that the suggestions are put into practice. As I say, we issue every month an amendment to the training syllabus embodying suggestions that we get from overseas and practices which we find from experience can be well adopted for our purposes. This is done in an endeavour to keep that training syllabus right up to date.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Is there any record of a shortage or incompleteness in medical stores in the training centres? I am referring particularly to Petawawa in 1941.

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend mean improper shortages, or that they had not been ordered?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Lack of supplies.

Mr. RALSTON: No, I have not; that has not been brought to my attention.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Could the minister find out whether there is any shortage?

Mr. RALSTON: Whether there was any during last year?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I was there three months ago. If my hon. friend has been there he knows that the field hospital is a well-conducted establishment. I talked to the officer in command and I did not hear of any shortage of medical stores. I shall certainly find out.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: The case I have in mind is that of a young man who about July 8 last year jumped from a truck during night manœuvres of anti-tank battery F and ruptured himself. He reported sick next day and was sent to hospital and was supposed to be furnished with a truss. He was reboarded and he reports to me that he did not receive his truss until January of this year. He went back to Saskatchewan on furlough and he received a wire to report to No. 12 military district depot in Regina. He paid his own fare into Regina, which he has not been able to get back, and received his truss. I am hoping that this is not the general practice, and I should like to have an assurance from the minister that it was due to some oversight.

Mr. RALSTON: I will go further than that. I will give my hon. friend the assurance that that is not the way the medical service is conducted as I know it. That particular case will be gone into. If my hon. friend cares to send me the name, he may do so, but if he does not I think the circumstances he has given are enough for me to ascertain just what happened.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: A letter will be in the mail this evening.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The medical services are said to be very good.

Mr. MUTCH: Because the comments I have made from time to time to the minister in connection with the administration of the army have not always been complimentary, I should like to express my appreciation to the minister for his remarks to the house the other day and again to-day in defence of those who are administering the Canadian active army, particularly against the attacks of those whose military knowledge is, generally speaking, acquired from observing the army from a sidewalk. There have been times when I have expressed views in this house and in certain other places which were not complimentary to the individuals charged with the administration of the army, but generally speaking I believe that a bad dentist is better than a barber for a toothache, and an imperfect staff officer is probably more valuable to the administration of the army than many of those who criticize it. But having said that, may I add that I do not think there is any reason for the minister to be over-satisfied with the administration, nor do I think that he is absolutely satisfied.

Leaving the administration out of it for a moment or two, I should like to make some observations with respect to something new in the administration of the present army and offer some suggestions in connection therewith. I refer to the new basic training centre which has just been established and which has been designed to take care of those men who have been unable under the present set-up to assimilate the basic training during the period of two months which is assigned to them. I think everyone who has had anything to do with the administration and training of the present army will realize the need for such a training centre until those who are in the army have been helped to the point where they are able to take training in the basic or advanced training centres or are eliminated from the army. But, by the same token I would not like to see any development of that practice because I think it would be tackling the problem, which I suggest is a serious one, from the wrong end. It is true that we have a considerable number of men in the active army in Canada who either should not be there at all or require special consideration in order to enable them to keep up with those who are training. It is my hope, and certainly it is the policy of the department, that the personnel selection boards will be able to take care of that situation. I think perhaps in most districts at the present time they are doing a fair job in weeding out men who have been enlisted as physically perfect but who by reason of one handicap or another have been unable to keep up with the training in the basic training centres. In some cases they have got to the advanced training centres. But that is tackling the problem after the men are in the army. I would like to have the assurance of the minister that something will be done to eliminate the necessity of such an institution as has been opened recently. The method of doing this does not matter a great deal so long as it is done, but I suggest that a personnel selection board officer might be attached to the various recruiting centres throughout the dominion to report on the recruits before attestation. I believe in that way you could eliminate within a comparatively short time the necessity of dealing with these men afterwards—these problem children, if you like to call them that, who are being provided for in the new basic training depot.

Arguments have been advanced against giving these men their examinations before they are attested. I know some of the difficulties in that connection because I am handling recruits every day that I am not here and have been doing so for nearly two years. At the same time, whatever the immediate cost and whatever the scarcity of suitable personnel selection board officers may be—and that is a real problem—I do not think this trouble should be allowed to grow.

About a year and a half ago some of us in this house were concerned over the fact that too many men, after having been duly enlisted and attested, were being discharged from the army before six months' training on the ground that they were not likely to make efficient soldiers. I expressed my opinion on that at that time; the regulations were tightened up, and the problem disappeared for some time. I suggest that it is in danger of recurring as a result of the weeding-out process which is now being carried on. Probably it is a good thing to insist on selection and intelligence tests for these men, certainly so long as we are able to get as many men as we can take care of in our present organization; nevertheless I believe the policy has been carried to an extreme. There have been cases and there are cases where adequately trained officers and men have been weeded out of their units at the age of thirty-three or thirty-four or thirty-five on the ground that they are too old. It seems to me that our Canadian army is thinking in terms of two and a half years of training, rather than in terms of what is the usual active life of a soldier, which is one hour or two. The worth of a soldier is determined by his courage and efficiency in action. There are all kinds of men who have been rejected for service who would live their hour, which is the life of a soldier, with gallantry and distinction but who have no place in the army at all, chiefly by reason of the fact that we have had very few casualties. We have been engaged in a two and a half years' endurance contest and great numbers of these men have not been able to make the grade. But that is not all it takes to make a soldier. I wonder if there are not here old soldiers of the last war who can remember the time when a forty or forty-five year old sergeant has had to carry on his back, figuratively speaking, some twenty or twenty-five year old subaltern until he found his feet. I wonder if there is anybody who was in the last war who does not remember the man we used to call the perfect soldier. Every company had one, almost every platoon, and in rank they ran all the way from corporal to colonel. They sat on a horse like a centaur, looked the part on parade, had a voice that could be heard for four blocks—in other words they had everything it took, except the courage to kill and die if necessary in the clutch, as the army calls it.

We have been concentrating on a perfect army. But even if we had a two-corps army composed entirely of men of the calibre of the commander I do not suppose it would, in the last analysis vitally affect the issue of this war. We are told that we have the best trained and most highly mechanized of all armies, but the experience of the last two and a half years has taught us that we must contemplate as a possibility our whole army, quite naturally and without any disgrace to themselves, entirely disappearing in the course of a forenoon. It seems to me that the department and the minister might give a little more attention to the expansion of the reserves of that army, and not so much attention to developing an overseas army of men who are super-soldiers. That is all right when you are preparing for a war five or six years from now, as we are told Hitler did, and we saw the effectiveness of that system at the beginning of the war.

There is one other thing I would draw to the attention of the minister. I understand at the present time it is not the policy of the department to allow any non-commissioned officer to proceed overseas with his rank. If I am correctly informed with respect to that—

Mr. RALSTON: As a reinforcement.

Mr. MUTCH: Quite so; then I would suggest to the minister that that is something which should be reconsidered. To begin with the difference between being a private and a sergeant in hundreds of instances is the difference, if you are a family man, between being able to enter the service and make anything like adequate provision for your family, and not being able to enter it at all. While on the face of it the present arrangement seems eminently fair, and one can understand that the commanding officers in England naturally want to promote men who have been overseas for some considerable time; while one can understand the reasonableness of that attitude and their desire to promote men with whom they are familiar, I question whether it is in the interest of efficiency of the service. Certainly the result is that we have throughout our whole training set-up in the Dominion of Canada too many A category men who cannot be forced to revert, who cannot afford to revert, and who are stuck in this country by virtue of that regulation, when they would prefer to be on the other side of the ocean. If there is any disposition to doubt that, I will give you a list of a hundred odd of them. I know whereof I speak.

With respect to the question of discharges from the service, there has been some improvement since I spoke to the committee before. With respect to discharging men from the present army discretion has rested in the district officers commanding to take men who are in C category and who have jobs to go to, and discharge them from the service and return them to civilian life. To the best of my knowledge that authority has not been abused. On the other hand, under this present system of reviewing these men by the personnel selection boards, we have a certain number coming back from basic and even from advanced training centres of a category which makes it unlikely that they will become efficient soldiers. They are sent back for duty in a depot, for example, where duties do not exist in any considerable numbers, and we are having a considerable number of these men being boarded out on medical grounds. In effect it means that they are classed mentally deficient; that is to say they are incapable of assimilating military training in the prescribed time.

We have not in this country anything in our army in the nature of a labour battalion. I know the arguments against the labour battalion, and I am not particularly hopeful of a sympathetic hearing for what I wish to say with respect to that. I do say, nevertheless, that there is a place in every district for, perhaps, a labour company. There are duties to be performed, particularly in winterized camps, permanent camps, which could be performed by men of this category, who would be more usefully employed in this war effort than they would be by being returned to civilian life. That is debatable, no doubt, but in my experience and in my opinion it is unquestionably true. I am not looking for labour battalions in the sense of a refuge for crocks, as has happened at times in the past.

But useful men can and should be employed. When I have made that suggestion on occasion I have been told, "Oh, there is a farm labour shortage; let those men who are unable to take training go back and work on the farms." Well, this country has paid the price of the thought, conceived mostly by city people, that anyone can farm. If men are not able to assimilate basic training at the present time, it is very doubtful whether they would be of any use in the war-speeded industry in the Dominion of Canada, and I am quite sure that they would be largely useless under the pressure of modern agriculture. So if anything can be made of their training and their physical condition—and I think it can—we should have organized in every district labour companies for the purpose of performing these duties.

It has been said frequently, and the minister has suggested again to-day, that it is impossible to have any real elasticity or any individual responsibility in an army, and I suggest to the minister that, while channels for the evolution and development of new ideas exist, they get horribly clogged at times. I am not going to use either the expression "bottleneck", or to try to suggest where it is. But I do know this, that it takes a long time for ideas to reach the place where they can be carried into effect; they are quite often not recognizable when they get there, and if they are good, sometimes they have even changed their paternity. But there is provision for that within the army itself. Not only the junior officers but the men in the ranks are being encouraged, if they have ideas, to report them and bring them forward. Some hon. members know the routine. It goes from the private to the sergeant, from the sergeant to the sergeant-major, from the sergeant-major to the company commander, from the company commander to the adjutant, from the adjutant to the colonel; and I do not pretend to follow it after it reaches district headquarters—it is supposed to go to national defence headquarters; but if everybody does his duty and anyone who is responsible sees it within three months, it is a miracle. Somewhere in the senior ranks of national defence headquarters there should be somebody to whom any private can write a letter and give his ideas. It does not matter how goofy it is, it won't be any crazier than some you get at times from the higher ranks, and if you get only one that is of real value, that officer's time will have been well spent.

Regarding our training, in connection with the general set-up, we are told in one breath that every soldier, under conditions of modern warfare, is his own general. I have been told that by training officers who have had experience on the other side in this war. I have listened to it with approval, and I hope that in fact it is being carried out. But we are told almost in the same breath that if the officer commanding a district in British Columbia wants an extension on his telephone, he will probably have to get treasury board approval for it. Somewhere between those extremes the truth may lie. I have no doubt the minister is working on it.

Mr. RALSTON: I have done it, about telephones.

Mr. MUTCH: Good. Those are the two extremes. There are all kinds of men in the army at the present time with enough business ability, quite apart from whether they ever saw a uniform or a Ross rifle or any other kind of rifle, to administer all the technical details of a military district anywhere, without visitations from district headquarters or anything more in the way of a link than a telephone call—and the telephone calls need not all go to one desk.

I commend the minister for the fact that there has been some attempt to break down this old system, but if anybody this side of heaven tried to indicate on a chart, even using lines so fine as to be almost undiscernible, the number of connected chains of transportation to get ideas from anywhere to national headquarters, it would be a chart which could be examined only under a powerful microscope.

Mr. RALSTON: Nobody hesitates to write to the minister. I can assure the hon. member of that.

Mr. MUTCH: I suggest to the minister that very few of us who are concerning ourselves in the matter would—

Mr. RALSTON: I am talking about the ideas.

Mr. MUTCH: The men in the ranks, I am sure, hesitate to write to the minister. I have had letters returned to me with instructions to reprimand men who presumed to write to a higher authority which was not nearly as high as that. I am speaking perfectly frankly in this respect. I do not disagree in principle with the practice, because that is what is laid down at the present time. But a bit of a barrage on some of these regulations would short-cut a lot of them. If a man thinks he has an idea, it does not matter how crazy it is, it is important to him; he wants to get it to somebody, and provision should be made for doing so.

I do not think you can administer all the districts in Canada with the same establishment. In a country as wide as this, with our variations of population and our varieties of climate, with the different dispositions and the various geographical distinctions, I do not think it is possible for national defence headquarters to evolve anything with respect to training which will fit more than two or three of the districts. With reference to what the hon. member for York West said before, about the importance of headquarters' staff visiting districts, I was glad to hear the minister say that the provision for that sort of thing is being expanded.

There is one thing I should like to emphasize before I conclude, and that is that more consideration be given to the work of the personnel selection board before a man is attested. Otherwise I can see a long chain of grief in a long chain of basic training centres. I am well aware that it is going to cost a little money. It is going to delay things a little bit, but we are in the fortunate position of having men come in under conditions and in numbers which at the moment we can handle. I would recommend again that the selection be made not in the basic training centres, and certainly not in the administrative centres, but in the recruiting offices throughout the country.

Mr. GERSHAW: The question of forming a labour battalion has been mentioned. There is one suggestion which I would offer the minister, and I shall be glad to hear his reply, to see whether it is within the realms of possibility. In southern Alberta there are a large number of people who have very strong convictions against handling rifles or shedding blood. It would seem that the young men in these particular groups or colonies would want to take part in this great struggle, and would want to hold their heads up with other young men and be regarded as Canadians. In 1923 a colony came in to one particular municipality and since that time they have doubled their holdings, and six new groups have come into the same municipality. They find that by their way of living and through their farming practices they are able to extend rapidly. The provincial government have recognized the danger and have passed a law to prevent these people from acquiring more land for the duration of the war. The population is about 1,866, and 700 of them belong to the Hutterite colony. Ordinary people of that municipality feel quite keenly on this point. They consider that in this great democracy all should be on the same basis and that these particular people should be on the same basis as other Canadians. Everyone realizes that they are protected by an agreement, order in council P.C. 1678 passed on August 12, 1899. At that time no one anticipated that we would be in the condition we are now in, such great changes have taken place. Inasmuch as there are a large number of these people, my suggestion is that the agreement might be reviewed to see whether all parties have lived up to it, and whether some of these young men could be enrolled in a labour battalion to do certain work. If they could, they would become interested in military affairs and become better Canadians.

Mr. RALSTON: I have consistently hesitated about taking on anything more in connection with the Department of National Defence than matters relating strictly to the military effort. The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) the other day advocated the same idea with regard to a group of citizens out west as we have heard this afternoon from the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch). The question of labour battalions is in mind. We have employment platoons whom we have been using in camps and in connection with special work in the way of fatigues and things of that sort. If labour battalions are necessary in connection with army activities, that is one thing, and I am willing to consider it. If, however, you are only forming a labour battalion, or using the Department of National Defence to form a labour battalion, for the purpose of doing civilian work on parks or other projects of that sort, then I suggest that it should not be under this department. The hon. member for Lake Centre had the better idea, that is, to allow the Department of National War Services to call them up, if that is necessary, and form a battalion, if you like to call it that; but it should be under some department other than National Defence. We have a good many activities and we are trying to keep our eyes on the target, which is to fight the enemy, and not to deal with matters which are extraneous, even though in connection with them organization might be useful. I will take into consideration the question as it affects army activities, but that is as far as I should like to go in that respect.

With regard to the matters mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg South, I spent a very fruitful and profitable three hours with the adjutant-general and Brigadier Chisholm, who is in charge of personnel selection, last Sunday on this very point to which my hon. friend has referred. He is right with regard to the matter of examinations. I think that the number of discharges could have been reduced substantially had the discharge taken place at the other end, in the sense that they should never have been accepted. The test for mental aptitude has not been sufficient; I am satisfied about that. As hon. members know, the test has been made entirely by medical boards. There is a very general provision in the medical regulations with regard to aptitude, and I am sure that a certain number of doctors have felt themselves not qualified to pass on that phase of a man's ability to serve. They have found him A, so far as physical condition was concerned, and have let it go at that; but very often the man has not been able to keep up training, so that you find him in the group, of whom many are going to North Bay for what the air force would call a cease training course. The air force had the same idea in connection with their work, and it has been, by the way, under a member of this house, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Massey). We are doing the same thing, and I do agree that a change is called for, and it has been made.

As I explained the other night, the directorate of personnel selection has not been functioning for more than six months, and weeding out has taken place as a result of the activities of that branch. To some extent the medical regulations are now being amended and provision is being made with regard to a test, I will not call it a psychological test, but rather an aptitude test, which is being given. Provision is being made for supplying medical boards with additional skilled help if needed to deal with aptitude as well as with physical condition. As the hon. member hinted, the men available for that are not too plentiful across Canada, and we have provided for special instruction for groups of men. They will not be fully trained in that respect, but will understand the fundamentals which are needed to find out whether a man gives good promise of becoming an efficient soldier. Hon. members know that there is a small discharge from the air force, and the disparity in that regard has struck me as one calling for an exhaustive investigation. The short way of explaining it is this. The air force requires, so far as educational qualifications are concerned, that men shall have gone to the eighth grade, whereas the army qualification is practically one of literacy. Practically, that is all that is required, if the man is to take the training laid down; and perhaps the severest feature in the matter of literacy is the map reading under the basic training syllabus. He is then taken on, and the men who are not up to that standard are finding it difficult to get along. That is why the change is being made and a new organization is being set up.

Mr. ADAMSON: The air force have the M test before they are attested.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not use the words "M test". I said they would be given a test for aptitude.

Mr. ADAMSON: They have a test?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, the M test.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If some of the suggestions offered by the hon. member for Winnipeg South and others this afternoon were adopted, K.R. and O. might have to be rewritten. Probably some amendments to it would be in order in any case. However, I should like to ask the minister a few questions in connection with the men taken into the army under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

In the first place, how many of these recruits for home defence have completed their training to date? How many have volunteered for active service? How many men are there in the Canadian army whose service is limited to Canada or the territorial waters thereof? Are some units in the Canadian army made up of both these recruits for home defence and others who have offered themselves for active service in any theatre of war; are they combined in one unit? If so, what units in Canada are composed of both these recruits for home service and the active service personnel? Is the minister in favour of having these recruits for home defence and the active service personnel mixed together in the same units for training? Has any plan been worked out to separate these home defence personnel and active service personnel in case any of these units should be sent out of Canada on short notice? Then is the dependents' allowance paid to dependents of recruits called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act?

Mr. RALSTON: I wish my hon. friend had sent me a note of these questions. He is asking what really should be an order for return.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I shall be glad to send the minister this list of questions. If these dependents' allowances are granted, are they paid when these recruits are called up for training, or only when they have completed their basic training?

Mr. RALSTON: What is that?

Mr. ROSS (Souris): If dependents' allowances are granted, do they commence when the recruit is called up for training or do they commence after he has completed his basic training?

Mr. RALSTON: The moment he starts to get his pay, I should think.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): This afternoon the hon. member for York West raised a question which has given me some considerable difficulty. It is the case of a young chap who enlists, and who applies for a dependents' allowance for his mother. Quite frequently the board will point out that at the time the young chap enlisted, his family were on direct relief; that he was not making any cash contribution to the upkeep of the household, and in such cases the allowance is not granted. It seems to me that these matters should be considered on the basis of necessity. If the family required assistance, and the young chap was not able to obtain gainful employment, I believe the allowance should be granted. I know of many applications that have been refused on the ground I have mentioned.

I am sorry I was not in the house last Tuesday, but I read in Hansard the discussion which took place between the hon. member for Lethbridge and the minister as to responsibility for the hospitalization of soldiers' dependents. To me the answer given by the minister is not very clear. As reported at page 1946 of Hansard he said:

> The way I dealt with it was to indicate that the dependents' board of trustees, which was established in November or December, has as one of its functions and one of its authorities to pay such supplementary grants or to give such special assistance in those cases where it is satisfied that such supplementary grants or special assistance are necessary to prevent hardships arising because of unusual circumstances. . . .

Could the minister say definitely whether that does become the responsibility of his department or whether there may be considerable bickering with the municipal authorities, whose responsibility normally it would be to look after those cases? Is that clearly understood?

Mr. RALSTON: Does my hon. friend wish me to answer that now? I understand that he is speaking about the hospitalization of dependents. What I said was that there was some suggestion from hon. members that this was the responsibility of the municipality. That is fundamentally so. I said that under the provisions of the dependents' board of trustees—I have not the exact terms before me at the moment—there is a regulation which permits the board to pay grants or give assistance in emergent cases or cases of hardship, such as the serious illness of members of the family. I do not know what the conflict is with the municipalities to which my hon. friend is referring, but I said it seemed to me that was the best answer I could make in reply to the suggestion that the federal government should undertake the responsibility for the hospitalization of dependents. I have never before known this to be recognized as a federal responsibility, even indirectly, and I do not think there is any intention to assume responsibility for the hospitalization of dependents, except in a case of hardship or great need. It is extending the Pension Act and the provisions of the dependents' allowance board beyond what I should think they were ever intended to cover if one were to say that when a soldier enlists he is entitled to his pay and allowances, his wife is entitled to separation allowance, his dependents are entitled to allowances, and the family are entitled to hospitalization. That is not so. In a case of hardship, under the provisions with respect to the dependents' board of trustees, in order to bridge a gap the board may help in a difficult situation by making a grant for that purpose.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The point I was trying to make is that to me it is distinctly a case of hardship any time it becomes the responsibility of the municipality.

Mr. RALSTON: That is a matter for the board.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think if the municipality had to report the matter to the board it would be distinctly a case of hardship; otherwise it would not have become the responsibility of the municipality.

Then I should like to support what was said by the hon. member for Winnipeg South with regard to work units. Ever since we declared war I have felt keenly that we should have work units or labour battalions as part of the army. In going round to the various camps I have seen a great deal of work being done and very fair rates of wages being paid, considering the training many of these men had to have in order to undertake the work. Certainly the pay was very much in advance of that being received by the men who enlisted, though much of the work could have been done by ordinary men. I do hope the army will see fit to organize work units or labour battalions, as part of the army itself.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps I may deal with some of the questions asked by my hon. friend. I think his first question was as to the number of men called up to the basic training centres. The total number called for four months training up to April 9, 1942, was 41,606, with an additional 10,730 who already had received thirty days of training and who were called up for the remainder of their training. That makes a total of 52,336. My hon. friend asked then how many came out. I am sorry I have not those figures here, but the hon. member will realize that we cannot get the reports concerning those who were called up in January for another month or two, because the first class of those who entered the camps in January will not be coming out until May, and so one cannot tell how many of those called up since January will graduate or come out of the training centres.

Then the hon. member asked as to the proportion of enlistments. I gave a statement to the committee on this question the other day, giving the number of men called out under the national war services regulations who, while under training, have enlisted voluntarily in the armed services. Of the four months classes, beginning March 20, 1941, and ending with the class which went in on October 2 and graduated on January 31 —I have not the enlistments from the training centres since that time, but the other night I indicated to the hon. member for Lake Centre that I thought those enlistments during that time would be in the neighbourhood of between three and four thousand.

The number who actually were accepted in that period between March 20, 1941, and October 2, 1941, was 25,892. That is, they were accepted in training centres. The number enlisting in the Royal Canadian Navy was 322; in the army, 6,185, and in the air force, 2,843, making a total of 9,350; or 36 per cent of all of those who were accepted in the training centres enlisted in one of the three services. I believe that percentage has been pretty well kept up. I cannot tell my hon. friend for certain, but I believe I used the same percentage when I estimated between 3,000 and 4,000 for January, February and March.

My hon. friend asked if there were battalions which have in them home defence personnel and active service personnel. Most of the battalions in the sixth and seventh divisions at the present time, and most of the artillery units as well, have both home defence personnel and general service personnel—and I prefer to use that expression—in the same units. My hon. friend has asked whether I favour that method. My reply is there are things to be said for it and things to be said against it. But from the practical point of view it was impossible to have these home defence personnel as they came out of training centres go to a separate unit. In order to give them training and get them used to operational work both in the artillery and as coast defence battalions it was necessary to have them gradually come into the units. We figured it was on a basis of about 10 per cent a month, so that they would be gradually absorbed in battalions or batteries, as the case may be. At the same time that releases general service personnel which could go overseas and follow the inclinations for which they originally enlisted.

With regard to the home defence personnel I would say that when I was out west there was some complaint about it. I can quite understand that complaint, because I had the same complaint when I was overseas in the last war. Men came to us who had come in under the Military Service Act of the last war. But those men came in and were absorbed in the battalions.

People are saying we should use the man-power of this country. We cannot use the man-power of this country, I submit, if we are not willing to take these men in and train them for operations. When I was talking to officers there I said, "You are commanding officers, and are training battalions for operation; you are citizens of Canada as well. You want to see the man-power of Canada utilized, and the way to utilize those men to the best advantage is to have them come to units and gradually become acclimated so that they may be able to carry on."

That is the situation with regard to this personnel and, as my hon. friend knows, I regard the units as active units. Certain of the personnel cannot be sent out of Canada except, as the Prime Minister explained, under the War Measures Act; and certain of them can. When the time came either the War Measures Act could be used, or other personnel could be put into the units, or these men could volunteer. Those are the three alternatives.

My hon. friend has asked if dependents' allowances were the same for home defence and general service personnel, and the answer is yes. He has asked whether payments start from the time men are called up, or after they have completed training. The answer is that dependents' allowances start at the same time as the pay.

I know the hon. member has asked a number of questions I have not answered; but I am endeavouring to answer the questions immediately, rather than leave them over. If he would remind me of others I would be pleased to give answers.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is the total number of home defence forces for the Dominion of Canada at the present time?

Mr. BOUCHER: And would the minister discuss, too, the subject of dependents' allowances for members of the reserve army while in training?

Mr. RALSTON: The number of home defence personnel, for service in Canada, in units of the Canadian army, is 15,269. Those are in addition of course to those in training. My hon. friend asked, I believe, for the number in the units.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I wished to have a general picture of the total number of troops for defence purposes in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: The number is 15,269 home defence personnel in units. In addition there are in training—not in the units—16,074. That is out of a total strength in Canada at the present time of over 150,000 active and home defence personnel.

Mr. GREEN: For several days we have been considering that portion of the war appropriation bill which provides funds for the army for the fiscal year beginning on April 1 of this year and ending on March 31 of next year. Hon. members who are interested will find the break-down of the army's portion of the war appropriation at page 1688 of Hansard. The total amount for the army is $997,000,000—in other words, practically half of the total amount provided in the war appropriation bill.

Mr. RALSTON: That is for what?

Mr. GREEN: For the army. Breaking that expenditure down again we find that almost exactly half the money for the army is to provide funds for Canadian formations and functions at present overseas, including increments. The amount under that heading is approximately $495,000,000. Then, over a quarter of the balance of the money for the army is for Canadian formations and functions to be sent overseas during the fiscal year 1942-43, the amount being slightly over $135,000,000. The balance of the army's appropriation is to be spent on formations in Canada.

It seems to me the committee would be well advised at this stage to try to get a broad picture of Canadian army activities both abroad and at home. First of all, we have our Canadian army in Great Britain. It is an army of which the Canadian people may well be very proud and one which, I am sure, will live up to and perhaps surpass—although that will be difficult—the traditions of the Canadian corps in the last war. That army in Great Britain can be sent anywhere; there are no strings on where the men can serve.

We have another army in Canada which cannot be sent anywhere. The one exception, I believe, is the fourth division which is preparing to go overseas. As the minister has just said, most of the units of this army contain home defence personnel, soldiers who have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act which was passed by this house in June, 1940. As hon. members know, this act provides that men called up cannot be required to serve outside of Canada. The act is chapter 13 of the statutes of 1940, and section 2 gives the governor in council the power of—> —requiring persons to place themselves, their services and their property at the disposal of His Majesty in the right of Canada, as may be deemed necessary or expedient for securing the public safety, the defence of Canada—

And so on, but there is another section, section 3, which contains a restriction and which reads:

> The powers conferred by the next preceding section may not be exercised for the purpose of requiring persons to serve in the military, naval or air forces outside of Canada and the territorial waters thereof.

The minister has just told us that there are 15,269 men, known as home defence personnel, who were called up under the act and accordingly are subject to the restriction contained in section 3. They are scattered throughout the various units of the army in Canada. As we all know, there are many more of this same class of soldier training in the training centres. Some weeks ago either the Minister of National Defence or the Prime Minister said that the seventh and eighth divisions, which are to be raised this year for the defence of the east and west coasts, would be composed largely of men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act. This means that these divisions cannot be used beyond the boundaries of Canada or the territorial waters thereof. If this restriction were removed our army in Canada, like our army in Great Britain, could be used anywhere.

In my opinion, and I cannot emphasize this too strongly, that is necessary for the army on the Pacific coast. They will probably have to go abroad sooner or later, either to the adjoining state of Washington on the mainland, or to some of the islands which form part of that state, or to Alaska or Siberia. They may have to cross the ocean to fight. Let us always remember that Canada must avenge Hong Kong, and we cannot do that on this side of the Pacific ocean. Hong Kong must be avenged across the Pacific, and so far as Canada is concerned that can be done only by troops who go from the Canadian Pacific coast.

This Canadian army may have to serve in Australia. It may be that fighting in Australia will be the best way to defend the Pacific coast of Canada, just as fighting in Great Britain or on the continent of Europe is considered by the government to be the best way to defend our Atlantic coast. The Prime Minister pointed out the wisdom of such a course in his radio address on the plebiscite on April 7, when he used these words:

> One thing is perfectly certain. If the enemy is not kept at bay on the oceans, and defeated beyond the waters of the Atlantic and the Pacific, the final battles of the world conflict will be fought in the waters and upon the soil of Canada and the United States.

I repeat that the Canadian army on the Pacific should be composed of men who can go anywhere. Then they could take their part in the attack on Japan which must eventually come. May I point out to the minister that Canada should be building, and building speedily, an "Army of the Pacific". This should be composed, not only of men who can be sent anywhere, but men who have been trained just as thoroughly as the troops in Great Britain. Men who have been completely trained should not be taken from this army, as has happened in recent months, to be replaced by men who are only partly trained. That sort of thing should stop. Once the men in this "Army of the Pacific" have been trained, they should be left there and not drawn away as drafts to be sent overseas or to some other part of Canada. This army should be equipped as completely as the Canadian army in Great Britain and it should be supported by an adequate air force and by units of the various types that are needed in modern warfare. This has not been done. There is nothing even remotely approaching a set-up of that kind provided for the "Army of the Pacific" in Canada.

In this war Canada has two fronts, the Atlantic front and the Pacific front. Let the Canadian government, this House of Commons and the Canadian people realize that clearly. If they do not, sooner or later disaster may strike this nation. On the Atlantic front Canada is preparing to fight an offensive war in or from Great Britain; on the Pacific front she is preparing to fight, not an offensive but a defensive war. She is preparing merely to hold on, to fight a holding war. The Prime Minister in his radio speech, from which I quoted a few minutes ago, summed up the effect of such a policy quite clearly with these words:

> We cannot defend our country and save our homes and families by waiting at home for the enemy to attack us. Every country that has stood behind its own defences in this war has sooner or later been attacked. To remain on the defensive is the surest way to bring the war to Canada.

Yet that is exactly the policy that is being followed by this government so far as the "Army of the Pacific" is concerned. On the other hand, the United States is fighting an offensive war on the Pacific. Troops are being sent abroad to various centres where they may meet the enemy far from American soil. If Canada pursues her present policy, and if the Japanese should attempt an invasion of this continent, the result may be that Canada's portion of the Pacific coast will be chosen for the attack. I point out these facts to the minister and to the hon. members because they merit the most careful consideration.

Let me ask hon. members to look again at the broad picture. What is parliament going to do about this situation of having units made up of men some of whom can be sent out of Canada and some of whom cannot?—a situation where one man in a company can say, "I do not have to go outside of Canada," while the man beside him has to go. That is, from a military point of view, and I am quite sure the minister will agree with me, placing a great handicap on our commanding officers and also on the troops themselves. What is parliament going to do about that situation? What is this House of Commons going to do about it? What are the members of this house going to do about it?

This week, only five days ago, the Canadian people freed our hands. That can be clearly seen in an advertisement which appeared in the Ottawa Journal of April 25 asking for a "yes" vote. At the bottom of the advertisement we find these words, "Free Canada for all-out war. Vote yes." Now the Canadian people have spoken and our course is perfectly clear. It is, I suggest, to free our own hands at once; and free them without further delay, because if we do not act soon it will be impossible to amend the National Resources Mobilization Act before the fall. Action should be taken now, without further delay, to remove the restriction which we ourselves imposed in section 3 of the National Resources Mobilization Act. If we take that action we shall show the Canadian people—and the Canadian people are watching us very closely at this time and are much concerned over the sort of leadership the Canadian House of Commons is going to give—we shall show the Canadian people that this House of Commons means business, that the plebiscite was not just a sham and that we intend to keep faith with them.

I say further that our course is clear also in this, that we must do more leading and less following behind, less running along behind our people in the grim business of waging relentless war. The Canadian people have been ahead of parliament and ahead of the government on most occasions from the very beginning of the war. That should be stopped now. We have in this House of Commons a grand opportunity to lead them, and I hope that the Canadian members of parliament will seize that opportunity and give courageous leadership, not only at this time and under these special circumstances, but also throughout the remainder of this grave but challenging period.

Mr. RALSTON: What the hon. member is saying so far as a Pacific army is concerned is, I think, what he has been advocating for some time. I have tried to assure the house and certainly the people of the Pacific coast that I have very much in mind the defence of that coast, in connection with which most active and effective measures are being taken. My hon. friend also said that we have not anything like a Pacific army now.

Mr. GREEN: I know the minister does not want to misquote me. Perhaps he did not follow me closely. What I said was this: I was advocating the building up an "Army of the Pacific" which could be used abroad, perhaps not as big as our army in Great Britain but an army that would be able to fight on its own, fight by itself. I said that we had not in British Columbia anything even remotely approaching such an army at the present time, and principally because the units are composed of men who cannot be sent beyond the boundaries of Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: Then my hon. friend was making two points. One point was that he was asking for the defence of the Pacific coast, and he was saying that there were two fronts in Canada. I know that he does recognize that, but sometimes when he has spoken I have wondered whether he did so, because he has been very strong in connection with the Pacific coast but seldom mentions the Atlantic.

Mr. GREEN: I do not like to have a statement like that made, because on every occasion when I have spoken in this house with regard to the defence of Canada, while I have pressed the needs of the Pacific coast—naturally as I represent a Pacific coast riding—just as firmly and as definitely as I could I have always referred to the needs of the east coast as well. If the members from the minister's own province have not gumption enough to get up and urge that steps be taken to improve the defence of the Atlantic coast, I do not think it helps very much to accuse somebody else who speaks of the needs of the Pacific coast of being unfair to Canada. The onus is just the other way. I say, give the Atlantic coast everything they need, and I have pleaded for that, not as strongly perhaps as I might have for the needs of the Pacific coast because I do not know all the facts. I do not appreciate the minister or any member getting up here and making accusations against me in that way. What he should be doing is speaking to the members of his own party who come from Nova Scotia, for example, and asking them why they do not get up and press the needs of the Atlantic coast. They are the people who should know them.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is simply setting up a straw man to knock him down again. I made no accusation against him. I said, and the members of the committee will bear me out, that there have been times in this house when my hon. friend has not seemed to realize that there were two fronts, but only one.

Mr. GREEN: I object to that. The minister should withdraw that because his statement is incorrect. If he can quote anything from Hansard to show that I have ever taken that stand I am prepared to let it go. But if not, I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. RALSTON: It is twenty minutes to six o'clock, and while I hope my hon. friend will refresh his memory by looking up Hansard, I will withdraw my statement and say nothing more about it.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is the one who should look up Hansard.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend was suggesting two things. He suggested an army of the Pacific and said that there was nothing like that now, and the reason there is nothing like that now, he says, is that there is no power to send men beyond the boundaries of Canada.

Mr. GREEN: That is one reason.

Mr. RALSTON: Is there any other reason that my hon. friend suggests why there is not an army of the Pacific, in practice if not in name?

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the minister would have been better off if he had been listening a little more closely as I spoke. I suggested that he should build up an "Army of the Pacific" with the idea that it would be able to strike out. I suggested that it should consist not only of men who could be sent anywhere but also of trained men, men who had received as thorough a training as our Canadian army in Britain. I said further that the practice should be stopped, if it is not already stopped, of taking away from the Pacific men who have been trained. Certainly within the last few months trained men have been taken away from there and sent elsewhere. I further suggested that such army should be equipped just as completely as our army in Great Britain, and that it should be adequately supported by the air force and the other arms of the service. The minister knows that it is not built up on that basis at all at the present time.

Mr. RALSTON: I still think that my hon. friend's fundamental objection to the measures we are taking on the Pacific was the fact that the troops were not in a position to be ordered abroad. I can assure my hon. friend that in the other respects every attention is being given and every effort is being made to form an army of the Pacific, not in name but in effect. I do not know of anything which is going forward with greater acceleration and more energy and vigour than that very thing of providing additional troops on the Pacific coast, and additional establishments for them, and training the men as fast as they can be trained. I can also assure my hon. friend that we are equipping them to the fullest extent we can provide, having regard to all the necessities with respect to equipment in active theatres.

Mr. GREEN: Is that army being built up as a striking force which could be used to strike, say, in Alaska, if necessary, or in Siberia? Is it the intention of the department to build up an army of that type, or is the department merely building up an army to hold the coast?

Mr. RALSTON: The department is not going to state its intentions with regard to what it is going to do with the army. What it is doing is building up two divisions, the seventh and eighth, and my hon. friend knows as well as anybody else the way divisions are built up. You have to start with the divisions themselves and carry on training and equipment in the normal way. What these divisions will be used for afterwards or where they may best be disposed are matters which will have to be dealt with as the circumstances arise. A large proportion of those two divisions are being provided and established near or adjacent to the Pacific coast.

With regard to the other matter, his question is, what will happen as a result of the plebiscite? That is really what my hon. friend was after.

Mr. GREEN: I meant exactly what I said. The minister need not say what I was trying to aim at. If he can understand English he knows what I said. There were no hidden motives or anything of that type. He need not try to drape them around me.

Mr. POULIOT: He answered my hon. friend.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend need not be short about it. The situation is that that is the effect of what my hon. friend was saying.

Mr. GREEN: That is the minister's interpretation.

Mr. RALSTON: I can only say, with regard to sending men out of the country, the Prime Minister has already indicated that, as far as going to the Aleutian islands or to Washington is concerned, there would be no hestitation in using at any time the provisions of the War Measures Act for that purpose, if occasion arises. I do not think that that is what was in my hon. friend's mind. I think he had in mind an expeditionary force: although he speaks of an "Army of the Pacific", it is an expeditionary force he is thinking of.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The minister is trying to put words in my mouth.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I will say, I suggest that that is what he has in mind.

Mr. GREEN: I did not make any suggestion at all. I wish the minister would leave my speech as it is and not try to twist it around.

Mr. RALSTON: I say, I suggest that what he has in mind is an expeditionary force. That matter will be dealt with and taken care of when the time comes. The situation at the present time is this. The hon. member speaks of trained men being taken away. Men are coming from these units and going overseas, and men who come from training centres are taking their place. That is the situation with regard to units on the Pacific coast now—

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. RALSTON: If the hon. member will let me finish the sentence; I say, my hon. friend suggests that that is not the way it is done. I only say that in the last war battalion after battalion after battalion was broken up in Canada and used for reinforcements. What we are doing here is maintaining the battalion and sending trained men to take the place of the men who are going overseas. I have been through that experience in the last war. It is not a figment of the imagination.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has missed the point.

Mr. RALSTON: I have tried to make another one, anyway.

Mr. GREEN: That is what I object to. He is trying to make two or three other ones. The point I was trying to make was that there should be set up an army of the Pacific, just as we have an army in Great Britain. I think it is unwise, when you have sent men into British Columbia, for this "Army of the Pacific", and they have finally become trained, to take them away from their units and send them—I don't know where, but I know and the minister knows that that has been done in the last few weeks, and raw recruits sent in, when the position is such that there might be an attack on that coast at any time.

Mr. RALSTON: In the first place, the men who were taken away, if I understand the situation correctly, were men who were going overseas—

Mr. GREEN: I don't know. They may have been taken east for instruction.

Mr. RALSTON: —and the raw recruits, as my hon. friend calls them, were men from the training centres who had had four months' training. There may have been some raw recruits among them, I do not know, but generally they were men who came from the training centres. Surely my hon. friend does not mean to lay it down as a military proposition that you must maintain the same units in the same job all the time. If you have men who are fit for general service, who have enlisted for general service, and who want to go overseas, and you have men to take their places, there is no reason why you should not use the man-power of Canada for that purpose. It is still an "Army of the Pacific" to use my hon. friend's expression. They serve and they are trained; they are armed, and they are prepared to carry on—

Mr. GREEN: May I put it this way—

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend permit me to finish the sentence? The only trouble in my hon. friend's mind is that they cannot be sent beyond the bounds of Canada. So far as the Aleutian islands and Washington are concerned the Prime Minister has indicated that he is prepared to send them any time it is necessary. With regard to sending them as an expeditionary force to Australia, or to Japan, that is another matter, which has to do more with the result of the plebiscite.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. GREEN: With regard to this question of taking away trained men, consider this example. Suppose a regiment of artillery is sent into the Pacific area only partly trained; the training is completed and that unit is ready to fight, and then say half the regiment are taken away, sent I do not know where, and replaced by green men without that training. I submit to the minister that, in view of the danger of attack on the coast, that is not a very wise thing to do. That sums up my complaint—the taking away of men, once they are trained and prepared to fight, and replacing them by green men. The comparison with the last war is not a fair one, because at that time the fighting was all done in Europe. This time the fighting may be done in Canada.

Mr. RALSTON: All I will say to my hon. friend is, with regard to the illustration he gives, that taking away half the men at one time and replacing them with green men, certainly would not be wise. But I do not think that his hypothesis is correct, on either ground—

Mr. GREEN: My proportion may be wrong.

Mr. RALSTON: —either that they were green men or that half were taken away. I believe the practice is to release not more than ten per cent of the strength at one time and substitute them with men from training centres.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With regard to this question which has arisen—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): With due respect to the leader of the opposition, I saw the hon. member for Témiscouata.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I have been on my feet three times.

Mr. POULIOT: I regret I must state that I rose two or three times before the hon. gentleman. The answer to part of the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South is to be found in Hansard of April 23, at page 1905. It is a quotation from a statement by Major-General Browne. Here is what the hon. member said:

> I think General Browne gave the picture quite clearly when he was quoted as saying at that time, "The reserve force may have to fight and it must be ready to fight as soon as possible," he said. "After all, there is no more war overseas than there is here now, and we may have some here sooner than they have, in view of the threats to our coast."

This is the declaration of an experienced soldier, and we find it on the lips of my hon. friend. It is to the effect that this country is threatened. The hon. member quoted a speech of our revered leader to the same effect, and all ministers have spoken the same way. The Minister of Justice said that Japan and Germany had their eyes on Canada, and even an admiral has stated that before long submarines were expected to come into the St. Lawrence river. I am not revealing any secret. All those statements can be found in public records, either in Hansard or in the press of the country. The question that we are discussing now is high above the heads of the Minister of National Defence, his colleagues and all of us. I am greatly surprised that the present discussion is not being carried on in camera. I am all for complete information to be given by ministers, but I find that information such as that which has been given this afternoon publicly by the minister—I do not complain about information being given, because I want to have information—is not such as should be given publicly. It has been stated by our Minister of National Defence this afternoon that the number of troops in our home guard in Canada is 15,000, if I heard rightly, and that is information which might be very valuable to the enemy. I am the last one to refuse information to the press if it is not as dangerous as this, if it is information that would not be used against us by the enemy.

I want to be clearly understood. Like the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), I want complete information; but I repeat, that information should be given in camera without any strangers in the gallery. It should be given for the benefit of hon. members who have a right to know what is the policy of the government. What I say now I do not say for the purpose of suggesting to the minister that he should refuse any information about the conduct of the war, about our home forces, about our forces overseas, or about munitions or anything like that. What I suggest is that there are things printed in the press that should not be so printed. I do not accuse members of the press gallery or owners of their newspapers. They take what is given to them, and they do well to take it when it is publicly given. But in view of the very difficult time through which we are passing it is important that we meet together, without any party consideration, to get all possible available information, and to keep it for ourselves, simply making any suggestions which we may see fit to offer to the Minister of National Defence.

Here is where I disagree with the hon. member for Vancouver South. He is all for the defence of British Columbia, and in that regard I agree with him. I know that he is broadminded enough to concede that members from other parts of the country want those parts of the country defended as well as British Columbia.

Mr. GREEN: Certainly.

Mr. POULIOT: I know that. But this is the point on which I do not agree with him. He suggested some time ago that some troops should be sent to Australia as a token of friendship. We have the greatest possible admiration for the wonderful people of Australia, but what is their trouble? Why did they call on the United States to send them men? It was because the Anzacs were in all parts of the world except in their own country. That is why they had to call on the United States for help; and as the hon. member for Vancouver South complains that the defence of his great province is not now what it should be, that is one more reason for not sending any human token to Australia in these times.

My second objection to what he said is this. He said that, in view of the answer which was given by the Canadian people in the plebiscite, section 3 of the Mobilization Act should be amended so as to send our men anywhere, wherever they are needed. I disagree with him completely. I would have no objection to conscription for service overseas if we had such a supply of men as to ensure our complete home defence first. Then we could send the overflow outside. But the answer "yes" to the plebiscite is not so much an answer "yes" to conscription overseas, as has been suggested by some hon. members. I say that for this reason. I have met English-speaking members of this house, for whom I have the greatest respect, as I have for all hon. members, and they have told me that they were positively opposed to conscription, and their electors also, and that they voted "yes" just because they were told that conscription would not be imposed if they voted "yes."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who told them that?

Mr. POULIOT: I will mention one, Senator Gouin, who said that over the radio, and he was introduced by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton). He said, "If you vote 'yes' in the plebiscite, the plebiscite is to keep conscription away"—and it is reported on the last page of Le Canada. I do not agree with him on that, but this was said over the radio, and the senator was introduced by a member of this house who was strongly in favour of "yes." These things should be known to the country.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The senator was introducing the member?

Mr. POULIOT: No; the member was introducing the senator over the radio, and that appears in the headlines in Le Canada. I have other quotations like that, and it is well known by all French members who read Le Canada. The suggestion I have made to the government is twofold: first, to improve our means of communication throughout this country, so as to facilitate the transport of troops from one point to another in case of emergency; and, second, to have mobile units. One hon. gentleman said that our army was more mobile than any other. That is true. No soldiers are left here; they have all gone away; it is a mobile army. My idea is that this country should be defended first. It must be defended precisely for the reasons given by our military leaders, the leaders of the army as well as of the navy, by the Prime Minister, and by all his colleagues. I find it most illogical to say that this country is threatened, when at the same time we have no men to defend it. It is more important to have men to defend the country, when the country is the arsenal of the empire; and this is one more reason why our enemies have had their eyes on this land.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at six p.m.

Monday, May 4, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth) moved:

That the first report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on May 1, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING—CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Wood Mountain) moved:

That the first report of the special committee on vocational training, presented to the house on May 1, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk).

SMITHERS, B.C., AIRPORT

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. From whom was the land purchased in connection with the airport near Smithers, British Columbia?

2. What price was paid for such land?

Mr. HOWE:

1. After investigation and study of a number of possible sites for an airfield in the Prince Rupert area, the department, on the advice of its air officials, expropriated a portion of the farm property of Mr. Olaf Hanson, M.P., covering the east half of the southeast quarter of section 14, and the east half of the northeast quarter of section 11, containing approximately 155 acres; also arranged with the provincial government of British Columbia to place at the disposal of the dominion, by order in council for the same purpose, adjacent property consisting of the east half of the southeast quarter of section 11, the west half of section 12, and the southwest quarter of section 13, township 1A, containing approximately 320 acres.

The land thus expropriated was held to have the following advantages: It was sufficiently inland to be within the favourable weather area; it presented suitable flying approaches; it was close to the railroad and the main road; telephone, telegraph and power were available, also water supply from a lake adjoining the site. Topographical features also were such that it was possible to lay down the runway into the prevailing winds which are not of the high velocity encountered on the coast.

2. The consideration in respect of the provincial crown property will be nominal. No payment has as yet been made for the Hanson property.

NATIONAL SALVAGE DIRECTOR

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. Is Mr. Charles LaFerle's announcement, made in Toronto, of his appointment as national salvage director, correct?

2. If so, (a) what was his former employment; (b) with whom was he employed; (c) upon whose recommendation was his appointment made; (d) what salary or other emoluments did he receive?

3. Has Mr. William Knightley been national salvage director?

4. When was he appointed?

5. Upon whose recommendation was his appointment made?

6. What was his former employment?

7. Who were his former employers?

8. What salary or other emoluments did he receive in this office?

9. If a change has been made, upon whose recommendation and for what reasons?

Mr. THORSON:

1. Yes; Mr. LaFerle's appointment as National Salvage Director was made by order in council under date of April 30, 1942.

2. (a) Transportation Manager; (b) Robert Simpson Company, Limited, Toronto; (c) Hon. Mr. Justice T. C. Davis, associate deputy minister of the department; (d) no information.

3. No formal appointment as such was made, but Mr. Knightley, while on loan to the Department of National War Services from the Department of Transport, has been in charge of the salvage division of the department.

4. He began such duties in February, 1941.

5. He assumed such duties on the recommendation of Hon. Mr. Justice T. C. Davis, associate deputy minister of the department.

6. Supervisor of stores and plant.

7. Department of Transport, Ottawa.

8. Salary of $3,720 per annum.

9. The recommendation for Mr. LaFerle's appointment originated with Hon. Mr. Justice T. C. Davis, associate deputy minister. Because of the growing importance and rapid expansion of the salvage division, greater emphasis has to be placed on the organization of machinery for the collection of salvage of all kinds. It was felt that the appointment of a man of Mr. LaFerle's experience was necessary to organize effectively such machinery throughout Canada. Mr. Knightley continues as associate director with no change in salary.

ELECTRICAL OR RADIO PATENT RIGHTS

Mr. ESLING:

1. Is the government considering the appropriation for war purposes of radio patents controlled by Thermionics Limited or by any other radio company or individual owning or controlling electrical or radio patent rights?

2. Has the government entered into any contract with any Canadian company or individual for the purchase or use of any electrical or radio patents for war purposes?

3. If so, what are the names of the companies or individuals?

4. What do the patents cover and what are the terms of the transaction?

Mr. HOWE:

1. All radio patents, some nine hundred in number, owned or controlled by Canadian manufacturers of radio equipment have been placed at the disposal of the government for the duration of the war, compensation to be such as the Commissioner of Patents may determine.

2. No, except as above.

3. Answered by 2.

4. Answered by 2.

MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY—TRANSFER OF OFFICES FROM OTTAWA

Mr. ISNOR:

1. Have the head offices of any branches of the Department of Munitions and Supply been moved from Ottawa to other cities?

2. If so, what are the names of such branches and to what places have they been transferred?

3. What are the names of parties in charge of offices and the salaries of such persons?

4. What number of additional employees are required because of changes?

5. What was the total cost of making such changes?

6. What was the purpose?

7. Were any such changes made or regional offices set up in the maritime provinces? If so, where?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes, one only.

2. (a) The controller of construction.

(b) Transferred from Ottawa to Toronto.

3. (a) C. Blake Jackson, controller of construction.

(b) $7,200 per annum.

4. None.

5. Not yet known—approximately $1,000.

6. (a) It is anticipated that this move will facilitate the handling of an increased volume of applications with respect to construction projects and products arising out of the extension of the powers of the controller of construction effected earlier this year.

(b) To release office space in Ottawa.

(c) C. Blake Jackson is administrator of building products, under the wartime prices and trade board, with offices in Toronto, as well as controller of construction. This move enables Mr. Jackson to carry on his dual duties more satisfactorily.

7. (a) The oil controller has established regional control offices in Charlottetown, P.E.I., Halifax, N.S., and Saint John, N.B.

(b) The transit controller has established a regional director of transit control, with offices in Halifax, N.S.

The oil controller and the transit controller are using space in Halifax secured from the wartime prices and trade board regional price and supply office.

(c) The deputy controller of ship repairs has his office in Halifax, N.S.

(d) The timber controller has an assistant, with office in Saint John, N.B.

(e) Industry and sub-contract co-ordination branch has a regional office in Saint John, N.B.

(f) General purchasing branch has district purchasing offices in Halifax, N.S., and Saint John, N.B.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—EXPLOSION AT WATERLOO, QUE., CHEMICAL PLANT

Mr. LECLERC:

1. Is the government aware that an explosion occurred recently at the works of the International Flare and Signal Company at Waterloo, Quebec, causing seven or eight deaths?

2. Has the government awarded any war contracts to this company?

3. If so, (a) what is the minimum salary or wages paid; (b) are employees injured in accidents occurring in war industries entitled to workmen's compensation?

Mr. MITCHELL:

1. The explosion referred to occurred actually in the MacDonald Chemical Company plant which is a concern under the same ownership as the International Flare and Signal Company, and is adjacent to the latter plant. The government is aware of the explosion and the regrettable loss of life and injuries sustained by employees and the matter is under investigation at the present time.

2. Yes.

3. (a) Employers are required to conform to wage regulations specified in P.C. 7679, which provides for minimum wages of 35 cents per hour for adult males and 25 cents per hour for adult females; (b) Employees in war industries are entitled to workmen's compensation benefits.

MILITARY SERVICE—CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Mr. WINKLER:

1. By provinces, how many applicants have asked for postponement of military service on the grounds of conscientious objection to military service?

2. By provinces, how many such requests were granted?

Mr. THORSON:

Provinces	1. Applicants who asked for postponement of military service on the grounds of conscientious objection	2. Applicants who have been granted postponement of military service on the grounds of conscientious objection

DEHYDRATION OF VEGETABLES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. What progress is being made with the dehydration of vegetables plan as outlined in order in council P.C. 9228/41?

2. What plants have been equipped to do this work and where are they located?

3. Have any plants been equipped in the potato-raising sections of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island?

4. How much of the money appropriated has been expended to date?

5. What quantity of each vegetable has been dehydrated and what was the market price of each?

6. What was the cost per pound to dehydrate these vegetables?

7. What market was found for the dehydrated vegetables and at what price per pound were they sold for each different vegetable?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. The project for dehydration of vegetables under order in council P.C. 9228/41 is completed.

2. The following established dehydration plants received some special extra equipment in order to process the vegetables according to specifications prescribed by the Department of Agriculture: The United Fruit Companies of Nova Scotia Limited, Kentville, N.S., factory at Aylesford, N.S.; Berwick Fruit Products Limited, Berwick, N.S.; R. B. Graham, manufacturer of dehydrated vegetables and fruits, Belleville, Ontario; Gordon Beardmore and Company Limited, Oakville, Ontario; Bulmans Limited, Vernon, B.C.

3. No.

4. Expended to April 29, 1942: Equipment, $21,109.96; raw materials and processing, $98,513.30.

5. Quantity of each vegetable dehydrated and market price:

	Amount Processed Tons	Average Price Paid per ton
Potatoes	1,100	$26 to $44
Turnips	690	15
Carrots	300	25
Cabbage	205	25

6. Vegetables were dehydrated under terms of a target contract, with ceiling price, actual cost will not be known until the completion of government audit being conducted in accordance with agreements with processors.

7. The armed forces in Canada and abroad:

RESERVE AIRPORT, SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. GILLIS:

1. Who obtained the construction contract for the erection of buildings at the reserve airport, Sydney, Nova Scotia, during the winter and spring of 1940 and 1941?
2. Was the contract let by tender?
3. Was the lowest tender accepted?
4. If not, for what reason?
5. What was the price of the lowest tender?
6. What was the final cost of the job?
7. Who was awarded the construction work at Point Edward Sydney, Nova Scotia?
8. Was this awarded on a cost-plus basis and at how much per cent?
9. If so, why were tenders not called?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Fundy Construction Company of Halifax, Nova Scotia.
2. Yes.
3. Yes.
4. Answered by 3.
5. $445,178,
6. The final cost has not yet been determined. It is expected to be approximately $808,000, which included necessary additions to the original contract.
7. Dominion Construction Company, Toronto, Canada.
8. The contract was awarded on the basis of cost plus a fixed fee to the contractor.
9. The plans had to be developed as the work progressed and it was therefore considered impractical to call for tenders.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE—QU'APPELLE RIVER DAMS

Mr. PERLEY:

1. How many dams were constructed, under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, during 1939, 1940 and 1941, on the Qu'Appelle river between Lumsden, Saskatchewan and the Manitoba boundary?
2. At what points?
3. What was the cost of each?
4. Were tenders called in each case?
5. Who was the contractor in each case?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Two.
2. Crooked lake and Round lake.
3. Crooked lake, $20,805; Round lake, $18,625.
4. Yes. One contract covered both dams.
5. P. South, Regina, Sask.

SHIPMENT OF EGGS TO BRITAIN

Mr. BRUNELLE:

1. For purposes of export, what is the fixed quota for the production of eggs in each of the provinces of Canada?
2. How many contracts for export have been awarded for all Canada for evaporated eggs?
3. In connection with the egg exportation contracts, how have they been divided among the several provinces?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. There are no fixed quotas for the production of eggs for export from each province.
2. Two contracts have been entered into for the export of shell eggs to Great Britain in 1942; one for 23,100,000 dozen and the second for 15,000,000 dozen. Of this quantity, 4,110,000 dozen had been exported in the shell up to February 7, when the ministry of food requested that the remainder be dried and shipped to Britain in that form. Since then an additional contract for 2,300,000 lbs. of dried eggs has been completed.
3. There has been no effort to divide the export contracts among different provinces. The contracts are sufficiently large to take all available eggs from all provinces. Quantities delivered or contracted from each province to the end of April are:

	Dozen
British Columbia	775,140
Alberta	3,228,210
Saskatchewan	3,523,320
Manitoba	3,148,920
Ontario	10,378,080
Quebec	561,390
New Brunswick	18,000
Nova Scotia	—

PLEBISCITE—QUEBEC COUNTIES

Mr. PARENT:

1. How many electors, men and women, were there on the voters' lists for the plebiscite on April 27 last, in the following counties: (a) Maisonneuve-Rosemont, (b) Mercier, (c) Mount Royal, (d) Outremont, (e) Ste. Anne, (f) St. Antoine-Westmount, (g) St. Denis, (h) St. Henri, (i) St. James, (j) St. Lawrence-St. George, (k) St. Mary, (l) Cartier, (m) Hochelaga, (n) Jacques-Cartier, (o) Laurier, (p) Verdun?
2. How many voters of both sexes were omitted from the lists in each of these counties and voted after having taken the oath in order to ascertain their right to vote in the polls of the said divisions?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. Information not yet available.
2. This information is given only in a poll book which forms part of plebiscite documents. Form 42 of the ordinary voter plebiscite regulations prescribed that such documents are only subject to inspection in certain cases.

ADMISSION TO CANADA OF CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Mr. POULIOT:

1. Since the beginning of the war, were any conscientious objectors admitted to Canada?
2. If so, how many?

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Information not available.
2. Answered by No. 1.

DOUKHOBORS, MENNONITES AND CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS

Mr. POULIOT:

What is the number of (1) Doukhobors, (2) Mennonites, (3) conscientious objectors, (a) in each province, (b) in each constituency?

Mr. THORSON: This question cannot be answered because it is not possible to identify the categories of persons. If the hon. member will redraft his question, it can be considered, but in the meantime I ask that it be dropped.

Question dropped.

MILITARY SERVICE—AGES 18 TO 30—NUMBERS MOBILIZED, REJECTED OR EXEMPT

Mr. JEAN:

1. According to the latest statistics what is the number in each province, of (a) young men of 18, 19 and 20 years of age; (b) young men of 21, 22, 23 and 24 years; (c) young men of 25, 26, 27, 28, 29 and 30 years?
2. What is the number in each province of those actually mobilized for active service in each category?
3. What is the number, by provinces, of those who have been declared incapable of military service?
4. What is the number, by provinces, of young men between 18 and 30 years of age who are exempt from military service under the law or by reason of their beliefs?

Mr. RALSTON: This question should pass as an order for return, but I do not think the statistics asked for in paragraph 4 are available.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Why is it not possible to get information of that kind? You could get it by military districts.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member is asking for the number of men exempt from military service under the law or by reason of their beliefs. I understood at first that he was referring to postponements, but possibly that is not so, in which event it can be answered.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As the law now stands it seems to me that that can be answered. I assume the reference to beliefs would refer to conscientious objectors.

Mr. RALSTON: That must be covered by law too.

[Mr. McLarty.]

Mr. POULIOT: This does not come under the Minister of National Defence; it comes under the Minister of National War Services.

Mr. THORSON: I would ask that this question stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Question stands.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CANADIAN ARMY—PERMANENT FORCE

Mr. STOKES:

1. How many officers of the permanent force of the Canadian army are now serving in Canada, and how many are serving overseas?
2. What is the name of each officer of the permanent force of the Canadian army?
3. What rank was held and what pay and allowances and/or salary was received by each such officer in the fiscal year prior to the outbreak of war?
4. What rank does each such officer now hold and what is the total pay and allowances and/or salary of each such person at the present time?

Mr. RALSTON: This question will be passed as an order for return, but I want to tell the mover that it will take some time to get the information. The information with regard to pay and allowances of those who are overseas will have to be got from England.

CANADIAN FORCES—MEMBERS OF PENTECOSTAL OR FULL GOSPEL CHURCH

Mr. STOKES:

How many members of the Pentecostal or Full Gospel church are in (a) the army, (b) the air force, (c) the navy?

GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES IN RECEIPT OF NET REMUNERATION IRRESPECTIVE OF INCOME TAX RATE

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. Is any officer or employee of this government or any government-owned corporation, or other emanation of the crown, in receipt of any salary, remuneration or other emolument, as to which the recipient is guaranteed a net amount irrespective of the rate of personal income tax, or is any such recipient the holder of a contractual right or undertaking given by the payor whereby the amount received is dependent on the rate of personal income tax?
2. If so, what are the names of such officers or employees?
3. How much does each receive annually?
4. How much is the tax assumed indirectly by the payor in each case on the income paid to such individual for the calendar year 1941?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CLOSING OF WINNIPEG GRAIN EXCHANGE

Mr. FAIR:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Canadian wheat board or the Department of Trade and Commerce or any other department of government and the British cereals import board or any department of the British government, dealing with the closing of the Winnipeg grain exchange.

Mr. CRERAR: My colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) is not in the house to-day but he has asked me to make the following statement regarding this motion.

The requests from the British cereals import board to keep the Winnipeg grain exchange open have always been embodied in cables which the wheat board have received from the United Kingdom. In every message there are matters relating to other government business, and it is therefore not advisable to table the entire communications.

If my hon. friend will turn to page 2360, volume 3, of the 1940 debates of the House of Commons, he will find a complete cablegram from the deputy director of the cereals import board to Mr. George McIvor, from which I quote in part:

This branch of the ministry of food is desirous that the Winnipeg futures market be kept open.

The balance of the message can be found in Hansard. And again on page 3682 of the Hansard of 1941, I read a quotation from another cable as follows:

Cereals of course must be assured that the market remains open.

The British authorities have consistently maintained this position. Further than this, it is not in the public interest to table any documents. With this information, I think the motion might be dropped.

Mr. FAIR: This matter has raised considerable doubt in the minds of people throughout Canada. The British government closed the exchange in England immediately after the war started and the people are wondering why the Canadian grain exchange must be kept open. Personally I believe that if the Minister of Mines and Resources were to open up his heart in the interests of the farmers who sent him here originally, he would give us a whole lot of information—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FAIR: —as to the reasons for this exchange being open.

Mr. CRERAR: I have stated already that it is not considered in the public interest to bring down these communications. I have been long enough in this house that I do not need to have any instructions from the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair). When the government states that it is not in the public interest to bring down these documents I think that should be accepted by the house. If the hon. member for Battle River will reflect, he will realize that there are two parties to these decisions and to these cables. This government is not in the habit of bringing down communications of that kind when other government authorities are concerned.

Motion dropped.

BRITISH WHEAT PURCHASES, 1939-42

Mr. FAIR:

For a return showing the price paid by the British cereals import board or any department of the British government for wheat purchased from the Canadian wheat board during the crop years 1939-40, 1940-41 and 1941-42 to date.

Mr. CRERAR: The objection raised to the previous motion will apply to this motion. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) has asked me to make the following statement.

In reply to the hon. member for Battle River, I wish to state that one of the terms of the sales contract between the Canadian wheat board and the British cereals import board is that the price will not be disclosed on this side. They have been asked to consider a departure from this undertaking, but are unwilling to allow us to disclose the price. We are bound to abide by their decision. On these grounds I would ask that this motion be dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This simply means that the Canadian people are not to be told anything about what their own agency is doing with respect to the sale of wheat so far as price is concerned. Notwithstanding the intimation that the buyer does not want these prices revealed, I respectfully dissent from that view. I think the people of Canada, and particularly the wheat producers of Canada, should know what the wheat board is getting for the wheat produced. The price paid to the wheat producers is the residual.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, might I suggest that the answers that are now being given are a great reflection on our own power to govern ourselves. Surely this parliament as a body should not be dictated to by any body outside.

Mr. CRERAR: If I may be permitted, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is taking a wholly wrong view.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I am not.

Mr. CRERAR: This is a transaction between a government board in Canada and a government board in Great Britain for the purchase of wheat. If the other party to the agreement do not wish, for reasons which they consider good, to have the information disclosed, I think we should respect that view. There is no question of any injustice being done to the farmer. The worst that could happen would be the criticism that perhaps we were not getting a large enough price for the wheat, but under the terms of the wheat board act, if the total amount realized exceeds the advance that has been paid by the wheat board the balance goes to the farmer. There is no question about that.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the farmers have the right to know what they are getting.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): We know what we are getting for our bacon; we know what we are getting for our cheese; why should we not know what we are getting for our wheat?

Mr. CRERAR: I will bring the matter to the attention of my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he may inquire from the British cereals import board whether they are willing to have the price disclosed. Otherwise I think it should not be disclosed.

Motion stands.

NATIONAL WAR LABOUR BOARD—WAGE AND BONUS ADJUSTMENT DECISIONS

Mr. COLDWELL:

For a copy of the national war labour board's decision regarding wage and bonus adjustments and the reasons therefor, in the case of: (a) the application of the employees of the Martin Transport Company through their union, the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway Employees; (b) the application of the employees of the Dominion Coal Company and other coal companies in Nova Scotia through their union, district 26 of the United Mine Workers of America.

TORONTO COAL TRADE

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

For a copy of all correspondence, during the years, 1939, 1940, 1941 and to date in 1942, exchanged between, (a) W. A. Gunn and Mr. Ilsley, regarding cannel coal; (b) Mr. Roebuck, M.P., and Mr. Ilsley regarding Toronto coal trade; (c) Mr. Conant, Attorney General for Ontario, and Mr. Ilsley, regarding Toronto coal trade; (d) Mr. J. F. Ogston, manager of the Ferguson Fuels Limited, and the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board; (e) wartime prices and trade board and the fuel administrator and the Toronto retail fuel dealers' association, together with letters written by individual Toronto coal dealers to the wartime prices and trade board and the fuel administrator; (f) W. A. Gunn and Mr. Ralston and Mr. Ilsley regarding a 10 per cent import tax on coal covering the 1940 season; (g) the Toronto Retail Fuel Dealers' Association and the Toronto trade and industry commission.

Also a copy of the brief presented to the manager of the Combines Act by Senator McGuire, on behalf of the Toronto Retail Fuel Dealers' Association.

Mr. ILSLEY: I submit that this motion should not pass without certain reservations. In the first place, some of the communications asked for will likely apply to the private business of those writing. If the motion should pass, and I have no objection generally speaking to its passing, it should be subject to the reservation that if it does not appear to be in the public interest to make public communications which relate to private business, those communications will not be produced. Secondly, the communications which passed between the Toronto retail fuel dealers' association and the Toronto trade and industry commission, if any, are not I assume in the possession of this government. Finally, I am not sure what official is meant by "manager of the Combines Act." Subject to these reservations I have no objection to the motion passing.

Mr. COLDWELL: There are quite a number of reservations. I submit that when a business or corporation is doing business with the government, the submissions they make and the business they do become public business and that therefore the communications referred to in the motion are in the nature of public documents and ought to be tabled. I submit that for the consideration of the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: My view about that is this. There can be no objection whatever to bringing down communications between Mr. Gunn and myself, although I do not know what they were, nor am I sure that there were any, but I am quite sure he would be acting on behalf of a body of opinion in writing such letters, and naturally my letters in reply would not be privileged. The same remark would apply, I assume, to the communications between Mr. Roebuck and myself, if they were not marked confidential or private. I have no recollection of any such communications. The same remark would also apply to communications between the attorney general of Ontario and myself. But when we come to the communications between Mr. Ogston, whom I do not know, and the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, I assume that Mr. Ogston might be revealing in complete form the details of his private business and therefore they would not be made public. There comes a limit beyond which communications should not be produced—the type of communication, for instance, that passes between the Department of National Revenue and taxpayers. They are not regarded as public documents or as documents which should be produced in the house.

With regard to the rest of the resolution it would appear to me that any communications between the wartime prices and trade board and the fuel administrator and the Toronto Retail Fuel Dealers' Association would be properly producible. But when it comes to letters written by individual coal dealers in Toronto, if there are any such, if a coal dealer stated the volume of his business and dealt with his personal problems in a letter I doubt whether it should be produced. Some discretion would have to be exercised by the minister as to whether the documents should be made public. I would not like the motion to pass without these reservations being made. Subject to these reservations, everything that can be produced will be brought down.

AMIENS, SASK., POSTMASTERSHIP

Mrs. NIELSEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other communications exchanged during the last six months, between the government and any individual regarding the post office at Amiens, Saskatchewan, and the appointment of a new postmaster in that office.

NO. 40 SERVICE FLYING TRAINING SCHOOL

Mr. HANSELL:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, agreements and other documents exchanged during the past year between the government or any department thereof, and any person or persons, regarding the changing of the name of No. 40 service flying training school from Kircaldy to Vulcan.

OTTAWA CAR AND AIRCRAFT

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, agreements, evidence and other documents in the possession of the Department of Munitions and Supply, dated since the beginning of the present war, regarding the Ottawa Car and Aircraft Manufacturing Company of Ottawa.

DEFENCE OF CANADA REGULATIONS

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER AND REVIEW REGULATIONS AND AMENDMENTS THERETO

Hon. LOUIS S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice) moved:

That a select committee of this house, consisting of the following members: Messrs. Bence, Bertrand (Laurier), Black (Yukon), Claxton, Dupuis, Hansell, Hazen, MacInnis, McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River), Martin, Maybank, Michaud, O'Neill, Ross (Calgary), Slaght, be appointed to consider and review the defence of Canada regulations (consolidation), 1941, and amendments thereto; with power to send for persons, papers and records; to examine witnesses under oath; and to report their opinions and observations from time to time to the house.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this would seem to me to be an appropriate time for our new colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to address this house on a formal occasion, and I invite him to do so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He will finish the debate if he does so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, he has moved a motion without saying anything; he has the right to wind up afterwards; and as he did not rise, I thought it was incumbent upon me to extend this invitation.

This committee which has been set up annually in this parliament has served, I think, a very useful function. I am told, by those who have had the privilege of acting upon it, that it has been freer from partisan considerations than any other committee which has been operating in this parliament. This is all to the good, because it is dealing with a problem which has, I should hope, nothing to do with party.

We have had from time to time one or two debates on the reports of this committee, and they have been instructive and illuminating. I am not unaware of the fact that public opinion has changed from time to time with respect to the deliberations of this committee and the recommendations which it has made to parliament and which have been crystallized by changes in the regulations. In the early stages of the war everybody was to be interned. Later a more liberal view prevailed. The late minister of justice had his own ideas and opinions, and I am wondering what the position of the new minister is with regard to this very important problem —one which no doubt is constantly before him.

I should like to know in particular what his attitude is towards that body of public opinion, if I may so term it, the communist party of Canada. I understand that certain communications have passed between an official of that party, which is now barred and is probably operating under another name, and the minister himself; in fact I have seen a copy of an open statement which was made to the minister. I should like to know what the present attitude of the department is with relation to the communist party, which at the present time is declared to be an illegal body in Canada, but which to-day, if one can believe the protestations that appear in the public press and the communications which reach us in manner I know not just how, is for an all-out war effort. Has that had any effect upon the minds of the minister and his advisers, or does something lie behind it? I am not making any allegations or statements; I am looking for information. I think we have the right to know, since this motion has been put to the house, what is the policy of the government in relation to the important question of the defence of Canada regulations. Are they to be ameliorated or are they to be stiffened? What lead will the minister give to the committee, or is the committee to be left with a free hand, as has been the case in days gone by when recommendations have been made by the committee? It would be interesting to know, so far as it is possible to express it here, the policy of the government in regard to this matter.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to know that a committee is to be set up again to review the defence of Canada regulations and to consider the administration of the regulations. I regret exceedingly that I am not able to serve on the committee this year. I believe the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was quite correct in his statement that probably in no committee has there been less political partisanship than in the defence of Canada committee. From time to time when we divided it was frequently along the lines of, shall I say, a liberal interpretation of the regulations, versus one which was not so liberal and the liberal interpretation seemed to cut clear across party lines in the committee.

I think it is wise that the house should review each session the operations under regulations such as these, which do infringe upon normal peace-time rights of the citizens of this country. During the past two and a half years, since the war broke out and these regulations have been in effect, there has been a great deal of criticism both of the regulations and—sometimes—of the manner in which they have been administered. From time to time the committee, after full and free discussion, recommended modifications of certain of the regulations, and I am glad to know that all the modifications recommended last year were subsequently implemented by the government, so that the consolidated regulations as they now stand are in effect approved, to a very large extent, by the committees which have worked upon them.

There are still some defects which ought to be remedied. I have never been quite satisfied with regulation 21, although under the procedure adopted now under No. 22, regulation 21 becomes less objectionable. I think I may say, as one who up to about ten months ago had received voluminous protests against section 21, that since then I have received very few. Yet I feel that section 21 and the administration thereunder should be carefully reviewed this year by the committee.

We have in Canada, as the leader of the opposition intimated a few moments ago, a large number of people in civilian concentration camps, classified as prisoners of war, who were picked up because it was suspected that they held ideas subversive of Canada's war effort. They of course fell into two groups. There were the ones referred to by the leader of the opposition a few moments ago, those who were accused of communistic attachments; and there was a large group of Italians who were suspected of fascist tendencies. As the leader of the opposition quite properly pointed out, at the outbreak of hostilities there was a demand that very large numbers of people should be interned immediately, and I think it is not untrue to say that many of the people who were picked up at that time and placed in concentration or internment camps were placed there on very flimsy evidence. I have noted, therefore, with a good deal of interest and satisfaction, that the present Minister of Justice this year has had reviewed many of these cases, and some of these people have been liberated. But perhaps we are still too narrow in our view in that regard, and many of the people who were accused, for example, of communistic affiliations, because of their attitude towards the war before Russia entered the war, are now anxious and willing to assist in every way possible to carry forward our war effort.

As the house knows, I have very little confidence in people who more or less place another country ahead of their own, and whose ideas are governed entirely by events which take place elsewhere. Nethertheless I think it is quite proper to say that these cases should be reviewed and that those who are genuinely opposed to the fascist and Hitler ideas, as I believe that all these people really are, should receive consideration and should be allowed to resume their normal lives as a part of the community. I do not think it is wise or good, I do not think it is conducive to the maintenance of morale in this country, that people should be incarcerated because of views they held two years ago which have changed drastically in the past ten or twelve months.

There are one or two other matters in connection with these regulations to which

I wish to refer. A number of papers have been banned from time to time. Against the banning of these papers there has been no adequate appeal, and I am at a loss to understand just what the policy of the government is in regard to periodicals published outside and within this country. I have been receiving free for the past eight or ten months, ever since, I believe, the first issue appeared, a publication known as the Voice of Austria. I noticed only to-day that this was published in Ottawa; I thought it was still published in New York. When I was in Great Britain last October I met the secretary of the Free-Austrian movement of Great Britain, the council of democratic Austrians in that country. To show that it is a respectable organization I will read the list of patrons: The Most Rev. the Lord Archbishop of York, now Archbishop of Canterbury; the Rt. Rev. the Lord Bishop of Chichester; the Chief Rabbi; the Rt. Hon. Lord Hailey, G.C.S.L., G.C.I.E.; Sir William H. Bragg, O.M., K.B.E., F.R.S.; Comdr. O. S. Locker Lampson, C.M.G., D.S.O., M.P.; Maj. V. Cazalet, M.C., M.P.; Mrs. M. Corbett-Ashby; Mrs. D. F. Buxton. The chairman of the council is Professor W. Schiff, and the secretary, Miss E. Kolmer. I had a communication from Miss Kolmer, writing as secretary of the council of Austrians of Great Britain, which reached me after I left London, and I think it would be well for me to place the letter on the record because it will give the background to what I shall have to say in a moment. I quote:

Austrian Centre,
124, 126, 132, Westbourne Terrace,
W.2
28th November, 1941.

Mr. Coldwell, M.P.,
House of Commons.
Ottawa. Canada.
Dear Mr. Coldwell:

You will remember our talk on Austrian matters when I saw you in London. I wonder whether you have seen the Voice of Austria which is being published in the U.S.A. I am sending you herewith some extracts from this paper which I think are about to do great harm to the Austrian cause, because they alienate Czechs, Yugoslavs and any of our neighbour nations with whom we hope to live in peace, friendship and closest collaboration. We would be most grateful for anything you can do to make known our views on this subject.

I have before me a statement of the Free Austrian Movement giving their views regarding post-war Europe.

No national socialism for us, reformed or not, brown or of some other shade, neither with Hitler nor with Thiessen, nor with any of our home-grown Quislings. But we cannot decide to-day what Austria will look like after the war and which form of relationship towards other nations she will choose. There are many possibilities, and it is not our business to decide on one now, and to try to impose it on the Austrian people later on. The only thing we can work for now is to give our country the chance to be free and independent again and to enable the Austrian people to decide their future. There are many divergent views about the country we are going to build after the war, but we rather welcome this variety. The more ideas are advanced on planning the future the more likely that we will find the best way in the end.

I point that out in contrast to the Voice of Austria to which I have referred and which is published in this country. Let me now read to the house a paragraph from the publication, published in Ottawa. The edition I have in my hand came to my desk this morning.

Mr. MARTIN: What was the last statement quoted from?

Mr. COLDWELL: The last statement was from the press bulletin of the Council of Austrians in Great Britain issued last October, and I want to contrast it with the point of view which is expressed in this other expensively printed periodical.

Indeed, the foreign minister of Czechoslovakia and after Masaryk's premature death her president, had a very influential voice in Europe for twenty years. Many important decisions were based on his advice. It would perhaps be unjust to judge him by the final result. But there was something wrong in the fact that the leader of a small race—the Czechs number 7 million—directed the fate of a continent which is inhabited by more than 400 million people. This could not find a happy ending. It roused too many animosities. When Czechoslovakia was founded, the Czech spokesmen promised that they would copy the example of Switzerland. In foreign affairs this would have meant caution and reticence. Swiss statesmen were silent between the two wars, often more silent than we should have desired since they could have acted as a rich source of political wisdom. The leader of the Czechs had his finger in every pie. Old Austria-Hungary's foreign policy had been too active for a mixed community but she had had her duties as a great power. Czechoslovakia, not less mixed, made the same mistake without being obliged to.

Since, as we have shown, the fiction of the Czechoslovak nation—

Note that—"the fiction of the Czechoslovak nation." I venture to say that there is no people on earth to whom we owe a greater obligation than to the people of Czechoslovakia. There are no people to whom we owe a greater measure of restitution than to those people who were thrown overboard in order to preserve a few months of uneasy peace in 1938. Yet we have a refugee of enemy nationality coming to this country and daring to write in the terms which I have just quoted. To continue:

Since, as we have shown, the fiction of the Czechoslovak nation was the root of those errors, it can be hoped that the abandonment of the pretence by Dr. Benes will inaugurate a new attitude towards the other races in the Danubian basin.

I am not going to read all the numerous extracts I have from the same periodical. It was published in New York; I have read it for the past eight months, and I had noted some of these statements. Again and again it came to the defence of Mussolini and of the fascists of Italy. I believe that this country should open its doors to refugees who have suffered from oppression on the continent of Europe, but if they do come we should expect them to play the game with our allies, and particularly with Czechoslovakia.

Mr. TURGEON: What is the date of that issue?

Mr. COLDWELL: May, 1942. The article is found on page 3, entitled "A Fiction Abandoned."

The second article I want to refer to in this same issue is entitled "A Grievous Failure." It refers throughout sarcastically to the man who to-day is the deputy prime minister of Great Britain, a great figure in the cause of the united nations. It pokes fun at his idealism. No man in the English-speaking world is imbued with a greater sense of Christian idealism than Sir Stafford Cripps. Under the defence of Canada regulations we have the right to look into statements of this kind. I do not know why the writer left New York. Perhaps there were objections to articles of the kind appearing in this magazine in the United States—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the name of the author?

Mr. COLDWELL: Doctor Franz Klein. Incidentally he is still of enemy nationality. It seems a strange thing to me that we allow people of enemy nationality to come into this country and to write sarcastically of men responsible for the conduct of the cause of the united nations and to stir up strife among people of our allies in our own country. When I was in western Canada a short time ago I learnt that Czechs took exception to the kind of thing that was being published in this periodical, although I did not realize that it was now being published in Canada. I do not know upon what grounds we can keep our own citizens in concentration camps, and refugee friends of our cause who were picked up and sent to this country from England at the time of Dunkirk, who have been given a clean bill of health by the British authorities after investigation of their cases, and yet allow people to come in freely and stir up strife in our country by publishing their objectionable ideas in papers issued in Ottawa. There is something wrong about that.

Let me refer to another case of the same sort, that of Otto Strasser. He lives in Montreal. He is still a nazi, as nazi as Otto Strasser ever was. He helped found the nazi party—

An hon. MEMBER: Along with his brother.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, his brother was liquidated by Hitler, and he hates Hitler because he was unable to undermine Hitler. He comes to this country, lives here and freely writes articles in newspapers; yet on the very flimsiest evidence our own people and friendly refugees are detained in internment camps. I do not know how many of the latter have been liberated and sent back to England in the last eighteen months, but I know that hundreds who were in civilian internment camps here were taken back and are now working in munitions factories and even serving in the armed forces.

And we may have still in these internment camps men who have been given a clean bill of health by the British investigators. I want to bring this to the attention of the house on this occasion, and to the attention of the committee particularly; for while we ought, regardless of race, religion or nationality, to give refuge to those who suffer from oppression and persecution, yet I think that when such people come to this country they should at least refrain from sarcastic references to or criticism of the great leaders of the united nations; nor should they be allowed to stir up nationalistic animosities in this country.

I am not going to say anything in detail at this time about the defence of Canada regulations. They and the operations under them will be looked into by the committee. I think the time has come, however, when the members of the committee ought to go thoroughly into certain cases of people interned, and the committee ought to insist on being given access to the files in order that they may come to a proper conclusion regarding these cases. The attitude has always been taken that the committee was not permitted to view these files. I think that in some instances the files should be examined by the committee. I am not on the committee this year, so that perhaps I can say that quite freely. The committee should look into certain cases which have been reviewed, turned down, reviewed and turned down again.

I welcome the establishment of the committee. I think it is wise that at each session during the war such a committee should be set up to carry on the work for which the committee is designed.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): It is pleasing to us to see that this committee is again going to be set up. We believe that since the committee last sat there have been changes in the defence of Canada regulations and in the interpretations placed upon those regulations and in the status of a great many people and organizations and periodicals which have been dealt with under those regulations. It seems to me that this committee should review with the most searching and objective care the whole question of organizations which we have declared illegal in Canada, and of the periodicals which we have banned both within and without Canada, and of the people whom we have consigned to internment camps on the basis of the defence of Canada regulations.

I am more than a little concerned and perturbed by reports which reach me from time to time. I am anxious lest we do a grave injustice to a number of people in Canada, and lest we thereby impair our war effort. Certain it is that when men have been punished for offences which to their fellows appear negligible, all those who know such people continue to be aggrieved and unhappy; and there spreads from those people an influence of deterioration in the morale of the country. This is not in the interests of Canada's maximum war effort.

I therefore welcome the appointment of the committee, and would urge that it study with the greatest care every aspect of the defence of Canada regulations, and their application to organizations in Canada, to periodicals which have been and are published in Canada, and to individuals who to-day are in our internment camps.

Mr. A. W. ROEBUCK (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, in the first place let me welcome to the heavy task of administering the defence of Canada regulations our new Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). I have had something to do with internees, and with those who have been asking for a more liberal and, I think, a stricter administration of the regulations—stricter from the point of view of British justice. I have been impressed by the serious way in which the new minister has devoted himself to the difficult problems involved. I am sure I do not envy him his task. The whole subject is one of grave concern not only to himself and myself, but to all those who have some knowledge of British justice and procedure, and who are determined that we shall not establish in Canada the gestapo methods of Europe, that we shall be just and kind but at the same time shall protect Canada against anticipated acts of sabotage and treason.

The subject is full of great difficulty, because the principles applied to the administration of criminal law are not applicable here. A man is interned under the defence of Canada regulations as a preventive rather than a punitive measure. The intention is not that of punishing an individual for something he has done; it is to prevent his doing that which it is anticipated he will or even may do, contrary to the best interests of the state. And so the general principles of trial, including the reading of a charge and the hearing of evidence, do not quite apply. Those who have been calling for open trials of men charged under the regulations probably have not thought through the real problem before us. It has occurred to me at times that were some of the objectors placed in positions of responsibility and informed that some person might do something contrary to the interest of the state, they would, perhaps, take a different attitude. It is not likely that they would wait until some alien enemy had blown up a factory before taking action to restrain him. It is more likely that even the most radical critic of the regulations would restrain the offender before the act was committed, rather than charge him with the offence after the damage had been accomplished.

Yet, while this is so, I have never been entirely satisfied either with the regulations or with their administration. I think section 21 is far too general and sweeping. I should like to see the committee apply itself to defining the offences, if offences they are, under which a man may be interned. It may be a difficult task, but it is not an impossible one. It seems to me there should be greater particularity as to the grounds upon which internment may be ordered. The general principles upon which those in authority act can be set out with a great deal of clearness, and the committee should work to that end.

It seems to me that a man should never be interned for something for which he may be charged. Someone who has used foolish language in a bar room debate, or something of that kind, as sometimes happens, should not be picked up by the police and just spirited away. He has committed an offence and should be tried in open court. There have been occasions when, confronted with those two courses of action, the department has chosen internment rather than trial; and I suggest to the department it would be far better to put a man on trial when trial is possible. The evidence should be brought out in public and the public satisfied as to the justice of the decision; and the man should be put away in gaol rather than placed in an internment camp.

I believe too the public has been disturbed on one or two occasions when trial has been resorted to, a conviction has not been secured and immediately following acquittal a man has been picked up and interned.

The great difficulty with internment is the mystery surrounding the procedure, the lack of publicity allowed, and the fact that no one knows with any degree of certainty the grounds upon which a man has been deprived of his liberty. He is picked up silently, spirited away, and that is the last of him. One may write the department and learn that the case has been reviewed but that for the moment the authorities do not think it necessary to give any further information. That is the substance of what one is told.

It may be difficult indeed to say why some men who have been interned quite properly have been so interned. Nevertheless the secrecy surrounding the administration of the regulation is not in the public interest when it can possibly be avoided. Where possible in my opinion statements should be made and given publicity, explaining why certain men are placed behind barbed wire and kept there. It is most important that the public mind be not disturbed in this connection, and that there be not spread among ordinary people suspicions of injustice or the presence of ulterior motives.

I think that our administration could be improved. At the present moment the Minister of Justice retains the last say. Perhaps that is necessary, but if it is, it is necessary only in a few cases. The tribunals have been too few; they have been overworked. I have thought that they should be manned by the highest judicial officers whom we can find in the Dominion of Canada, men who bear the highest reputation and who carry the confidence of the people of Canada in the highest degree. The tribunals cannot act entirely in public; they must act at least in part in secret. The reasons for their decisions cannot always be explained and published, and the citizens of Canada are expected to accept their decisions and to rely upon their good faith.

So I say that our tribunals should be increased in number, and I believe that recently more men have been acting on the tribunals. I urge upon the department that every precaution be taken to secure for these tribunals men of the highest possible reputation. Having done this, I think it would be in the interests of the department, certainly to the comfort of the minister and the peace of mind of those, who like myself, are concerned, and to the general confidence of the people of Canada, if decisions of the tribunals were taken as final, except in extraordinary cases where reasons can be given for the minister refusing to accept the recommendations of the tribunals.

It is not good enough to say that some evidence must be secret. I should think that a judge can be counted upon to keep secrets of state just as well as a policeman. Reasons of state which should influence the results of a hearing can be communicated to a judge just as safely as they can be communicated to a minister of the crown. I have no doubt that in both cases the secrecy would be respected. Therefore I should like to see done the things I have enumerated: provide stronger tribunals; provide more tribunals; place greater confidence in the tribunals; and have the decisions of the tribunals made final.

I should like to see this committee inquire into a number of key cases, such as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has suggested. They could be picked out by chance, and then the committee could make a report on them to this house. I have been interested in a number of cases, but I have never been able to get to the bottom of them because I could not get all the evidence. But this committee should be able to get the evidence. If its authority is not now sufficient, I suggest to the committee that they ask for added authority and that they apply their minds to a number of cases, particularly where it is suggested that ulterior motives have influenced the action taken by the police or the department.

It has been stated that men have been picked up because they were bootleggers. If a man is a bootlegger, if he has defied the laws of the country, we do not have the same confidence in him as we would had he a good reputation. If a good reputation stands a man in good stead in time of trouble, then a bad reputation is likely to stand him in bad stead. When you find that a man with a bad reputation has been picked up and you do not know all the facts, you are likely to attribute his incarceration to his bad reputation, and that may be unjust to the department.

I have known of cases where the police, after failing to get convictions, have succeeded in imprisoning men under these regulations. I would like to see the committee make a few inquiries as to whether such suspicions are justified or unjustified. I would like to see the department relieve itself of responsibility in individual cases. The imprisoning of men is not properly a ministerial responsibility; it is a judicial responsibility. I do not see why ministers of justice want to keep these decisions in their own hands; they should get rid of them. Keep supervision, if you like; but ministers should rid themselves of the task of making the individual decisions. Let that be done by the tribunals. I cannot see any real reason, either in the practical administration of the act or because of principles of justice, for making any great difference between an alien enemy and a naturalized or native Canadian citizen. At the present time, those who are citizens may have their cases reviewed by the tribunals, but those who have not achieved British citizenship have no right to go beyond the decision of the police as confirmed by the department. A non-citizen may have lived in this country for many years; he may have acted as a citizen for years, but when he is picked up under this act by the police he has no appeal. The only thing he can do is to argue with some officer in the department, who usually refers him to the mounted police.

I know that you can find a grave distinction between a British subject and a non-British citizen, particularly if the latter is an alien enemy; technically, an alien enemy has no rights in this country, but that is not so morally. Such a man is a human being; he may have a wife and children; he may have behind him a long record of good citizenship. I do not see any reason for making this marked distinction, which is purely technical, between a man who has achieved nationality and a man who has not. I can see no reason why an alien enemy should not be treated as we would treat him in the courts. We make no distinction there; in theory every man is innocent until he is proven guilty. We should be ashamed to draw a distinction in the courts between a British subject and a foreigner living in this country. I should like to see the committee study this feature and see if it is not possible to give to the non-citizen the same rights of appeal, the same review of evidence and the same impartial decision by judicial officers that is given to our own citizens.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I desire to congratulate my good friend the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck) upon the judicious remarks that he has made. He speaks from a lengthy experience at the bar, as former attorney general for his province, and with a particular knowledge of his subject, and therefore what he has said must be considered in due course.

The aim of the defence regulations is evidently to prevent subversive propaganda during the war. It is essential that order be maintained within this country in these difficult times. But the fact that we are at war does not change in the slightest degree the principle of law that a man shall be considered innocent until he is found guilty, and therefore a man must not be considered an unworthy Canadian citizen simply because he has a name that is difficult to pronounce. People of various racial origins have come to this country to make Canada their own country. It is their country of choice, and at heart they are good Canadians. There is more broad-mindedness in the United States than in Canada with regard to such people. Anyone who looks at the names of the advisers to the President of the United States must realize that at Washington the racial origin of a man makes no difference whatever provided he proves to be a worthy citizen of the United States.

Now I want to say a word on behalf of the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), in his defence, strange as it may seem. About a year ago the hon. gentleman mentioned a very ordinary fact, a fact known to all of us, that there were young men from other dominions training in Canada under the empire air training scheme. To mention that was not a sin; it was not even a misdemeanour. But as it happened, there was an order or an instruction prohibiting the mentioning of that fact. This order or instruction had been issued by the information bureau or the censor's office in the regulations that it sends out to the newspapers, and as the hon. gentleman had infringed one of those regulations—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Had what?

Mr. POULIOT: I will not say infringed. I will just say that he mentioned that fact. I do not blame him for doing so. I am speaking in his defence; my hon. friend will see how it ends. I will start again to make myself clear. The information bureau or the censor's office sends regulations or instructions to all the newspapers of Canada. They are numbered, 1, 2, 3, 4, and so on; and regulation or instruction No. 64, if my memory serves me—it might have been 62, 63, 64, or 65—was to the effect that no one must say anything in public about the personnel of the empire air training scheme.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I rise to a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. No such directive was ever issued that no newspaper should give currency to such a report. I deny that either directly or indirectly did I at any time receive from any source anywhere any directive from the censor or anybody else in authority in this country with reference to that matter.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank the hon. gentleman for what he has said, because it gives more weight to my argument. Of course, I did not say that the order or instruction was sent to him. They are sent to every newspaper in the country, and there was certainly an order of the kind. The hon. gentleman simply said something that might have been said by anybody in the country without offence to anybody and without injury to anybody or to the progress of the war. But just because he said that, it was stated by a minister of the crown that Hitler was the leader of the opposition's latest recruit. I repeated that myself, and I confess I did wrong to say a thing like that about the hon. gentleman because he simply mentioned a fact that was known to all of us, and by so doing, of course, he was not recruiting Hitler into the Tory party. Nobody can now be blamed for doing the same thing the hon. gentleman did because this particular order was afterwards cancelled. So that there is no guilt about it. But my conclusion is this, that we must not lack a sense of proportion in our interpretation of the defence regulations.

I regret that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) is leaving the chamber because I was just going to say something about him. I think he completely lacked a sense of proportion when he suggested that we should worship a man like Sir Stafford Cripps. I do not think he is worse than anyone else; but why should anyone worship anyone else in this world? Such an attitude prevents criticism. I would tell the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that the brightest lady journalist of America, a lady whose pen is much sharper than that of Dorothy Thompson, Miss Judith Robinson, has expressed her views about Sir Stafford Cripps in all fairness, and she pokes a little bit of fun at him. That is no offence, any more than it was an offence for the leader of the opposition to say what he did about the empire air training scheme. Miss Judith Robinson wrote in the News of Toronto, of March 14:

> Enthusiasts for change-any-place-but-Ottawa are doing a lot to drown Sir Stafford Cripps' real virtues in pails of gush over attributes he hasn't and never has had. The new leader of the British House of Commons is not a "winning personality." He has a face like a stage undertaker's and a manner like a high church curate's. He is not a great speaker. He is repetitive and addicted to second-hand phrases. He is not, despite a snob-souled local press's blurbs, "an aristocrat." He is the son of a wealthy man whose father made money in shipping.
> Sir Stafford would be frank to admit that no English business men ever pursued profit further from the aristocratic ideal of noblesse oblige, or from ordinary human compassion for that matter, than did the big shipmasters of the nineteenth century.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

He would admit it because honesty is a virtue he possesses in his own right, not his ancestors'. He has other virtues that should prove useful to England at this hour; an unswerving purpose, a logical mind, cold judgment and a great lack of pity for incompetents, however well-paid and influential. Canadian sentimentalists who have been cooing—

That is fine.

—over Sir Stafford "the labour aristocrat", might spend their time better trying to guess whose fault it is that Ottawa is as short of Crippses as it is short of Churchills.

Mr. COLDWELL: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Does he not think there is a difference between poking fun at ourselves, or having a member of the family poke fun at us, and having a guest poke fun at us?

Mr. POULIOT: I am a little hard of hearing. If my hon. friend will repeat what he said I shall be thankful to him.

Mr. COLDWELL: I ask my hon. friend if he did not think there was a difference between having a member of our own family poke fun at another member of the family and having an uninvited guest poke fun at a member of the family? I think there is a big difference there.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not a matter of guests; it is a matter of judgment on a man who plays an important role in politics at the present time. But because a politician is not a member of our House of Commons does not mean that we have not a right to pass judgment on his qualifications. Besides that, I wonder what has happened to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar; for a certain time he has been burning incense under the noses of people who are too far away to smell the perfume.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is very good.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking of perfume, I hold in my hand that reputable paper, the New York Times, Monday, October 27, 1941. It is a good paper and full of information. Here, on page 3, I see an item which has passed both the British and United States censors and has reached the newsroom of the Times and its readers:

> London, Oct. 26 (U.P.)—Viscount Halifax, British Ambassador to the United States, came in to-day for another drubbing for a recent speech in which he said that Britain was in no position to invade the continent.
> "His very name stinks in my nostrils," Robert Gegood, former chairman of the Northern Ireland Labour party, said at a conference in Belfast. He spoke in support of a resolution demanding Lord Halifax's resignation.

That is from London. It is too bad that the perfume of the incense was not effective on that occasion. But we can gather a great lesson; it is that as a rule people attach no more importance than they should to things like that—mere expressions of opinion about a man. No one shall suffer in his person because he says what he thinks of anybody except the royal family, for whom we all have great respect. We have, and we must have, freedom of opinion and freedom of speech. This, we are told, is what we are fighting for. We are fighting for democracy, we are fighting for free speech. I recall that an eminent member of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group used to advocate freedom of speech and claim the right to it, but it was freedom of speech for himself, not for others. My conception of freedom of speech is that which I expressed once in this chamber when the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) was speaking and was interrupted by the chairman of the committee of the whole. I said that my idea of liberalism, my idea of liberty and of democracy was that he should say all he had to say provided that I had the right to answer him and say afterwards all I had to say. That is true freedom of speech. Freedom of speech cannot be onesided, we must have it on both sides. Moreover, there is nothing so constructive as good criticism. Nobody here pretends that he is infallible. Last week the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) admitted that he did not pretend that everything in his department was perfect. That was a common sense admission, and I laud the minister for it. Therefore, if all is not perfect, if there is room for improvement, freedom of criticism is necessary. But the distinction must be made, first, as to the intent of the one who expresses his views, and secondly, regarding the effect of what is said. Those two considerations must be weighed before judgment is reached in the case of any individual. Well, now, when we are fighting for the liberty of all of us, it is essential that the moves of any in this country who would prevent such an aim shall be stopped. That, I concede, is in the public interest. But it would not be in the public interest to make no distinction between what would be helpful and what would be harmful.

In conclusion, may I say that there should be, particularly in time of war, the widest freedom of speech, at least in this house. We should follow the really great parliamentary traditions of Westminster, where members of parliament and members of the House of Lords are not afraid to express themselves freely for the benefit of the community. The defence regulations have a particular purpose, namely to set rules regarding the press of this country. Might I remind the house why the press was so influential in days gone by? It was so because especially in London at first, and then in France and in other countries, people who had no time to study political matters at length relied on the free expression of views of a man who was seeing things objectively, without prejudice or partisanship. That was the success of the London Times, and in those days newspapers were not as big as they are to-day. They were not controlled by people who paid high rates for advertising in their columns. The man in the street, the common citizen, relied on the editor for an objective and honest expression of views and objective comments on the situation of the day. It would be very useful if the same thing were done now and if the newspapers went back to the files of the London Times and even of the Canadian newspapers of forty and fifty years ago to find a model for the editorial page of to-day.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): There is one feature of this motion which should be explained to the house by the minister, and that is that the powers being given to the committee have been restricted this year as compared with the powers given to the committee of last year. Hon. members will find the motion appointing last year's committee in the Votes and Proceedings for February 20, 1941. That motion provided that the committee to be appointed should consider and review the defence of Canada regulations (consolidation) 1940 and amendments thereto and—this is the part that has been cut out this year—the law relating to naturalization, and to review as well the law relating to deportation. The report of the committee will be found in the Votes and Proceedings of June 4. That part which dealt with naturalization and deportation reads:

> Your committee has received some evidence and has investigated these two important subjects in part only and, notwithstanding the fact that your committee has held a great many meetings, including on occasions two meetings a day, the limited time at our command has made it impossible to devote the time to these subjects which they require in order to enable a proper report to be made to the house.
> Your committee therefore respectfully begs to recommend that at the next session of the house the law relating to naturalization and deportation and matters incidental thereto be the subject matter of a reference to a committee of the house.

A similar recommendation was made by the committee which sat in 1940, so that for two successive years we have had a recommendation from the defence of Canada regulations committee that naturalization and deportation be considered; yet we find that, in the notice of motion which is before us to-day, the power to consider these subjects is not included. It may very well be that the government plans to set up another committee, and if that is so I have no objection to the wording of the present motion. On the other hand, it may be that the government is dropping these two questions, and that I think would be a great mistake, because at this time particularly they are of the greatest importance to the nation, and should be most carefully considered either by the committee which is being set up now or by another special committee. And they should be considered at this session of the house. I would ask the minister therefore to explain just what the government intends to do with regard to these subjects, and I would urge him most earnestly either to amend this notice of motion so as to give this committee power to consider these two subjects, as well as the defence of Canada regulations, or to recommend to the ministry that they set up a committee to deal with these two subjects alone.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): I desire to ally myself with the suggestion by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), that if the setting up of another committee to deal with the two topics of naturalization and deportation is not contemplated, the minister might consider amending this resolution so as to include that power in the present committee.

I want to join with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) who both recorded the fact that the work of this committee last year—and I think they would include the previous years—has proceeded in a splendid and non-partisan spirit; and without detracting at all from the work of each and every member, because they were all wholesomely engaged in the public interest, I think perhaps the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and the member for Vancouver South contributed in very large measure to the happy condition under which the work of that committee proceeded.

As a member of that committee I do not want to intrude on the house at this stage any views with regard to what the committee should do. Things change so fast in these days that I believe we should bide our time and hear, as we always do, what is to be said with regard to conditions as they exist at the time the committee is sitting. I do want to pay a tribute to the work done by the late minister of justice in administering the most difficult and embarrassing duties that fell upon him while he presided over that department. The late minister, when war broke in September, 1939, was plunged into a series of duties entirely new to his office. He had literally hundreds upon hundreds of cases to review because of the fact that alien enemies of German descent were picked up by our mounted police in hundreds all across Canada. Later, when war broke with Italy on June 10, and in the following year, he was again faced with an overwhelming task because of the Italian racial origin enemy aliens who were again picked up in twenty-four and forty-eight hours all across Canada. He did not have the protection that amendments made at the suggestion of this committee had brought into being, and which exist at the present moment. While of course mistakes may have been made—and who could administer that serious duty without finding errors creeping in?—Canada is deeply indebted to the late minister of justice, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe, who did not spare himself in the administration of that difficult and disagreeable but most important task.

Having said this may I pay a much deserved tribute to the present Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) who finds on his shoulders this tremendous burden. I believe in the short time he has been charged with this duty he has brought to bear all the high qualities which he was expected to display in his very important office. And none the less are the people of Canada indebted to the present minister for the very splendid manner in which he has performed this duty.

Without attempting to make a case one way or the other may I warn the house not to be too expectant that the results of the deliberations of this committee this year will bring about some of the changes suggested in the utmost good faith by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck). As I understand, he wants to see the Minister of Justice freed from the burden of making individual decisions. If we should make that change we should entirely reverse the principle involved both in the defence of the realm regulations that have prevailed in Britain since the war broke out and in the defence of Canada regulations. The hon. member for Trinity also suggested that men should never be interned for something with which they might be charged in the criminal courts. I suggest to him that again there may be disappointment. The reason the defence of Canada regulations ignore the ordinary precepts observed in the administration of the criminal law in peace time is that they are brought into being because we are at war, and because we cannot afford to wait until a man has performed a criminal act, thereby furnishing the evidence upon which he can be convicted in a court of justice. The whole scheme both of the British and of the Canadian regulations is to prevent a man of evil character and evil record, once you fix him with those qualities, from being at large so that it is possible for him to blow up the Welland canal or the Revelstoke tunnel in war time. That is the spirit of the regulation, and that is why we must ask forbearance and understanding from people if the committee this year should see fit to continue that principle rather than do away with it.

I think it is proper at this stage to point out why we should not abandon either of those principles. In this war both Britain and Canada have been singularly free from any serious acts of sabotage crippling our war effort. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and myself, with some of our colleagues, a few months ago had the privilege of discussing this subject with Mr. Herbert Morrison, the British Secretary of State, who under the British Defence of the Realm Act administers the duties that here we place upon the Minister of Justice. I regret for this reason, if for no other, that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is not to be on the committee this year. Mr. Morrison in a very few minutes gave us his view as to why during war time it was necessary and desirable to continue to vest in one man the power of final decision, rather than to leave it to be determined by a trial in the courts, as to whether a man was so dangerous that he ought to be interned. Mr. Morrison told us that he wished he had never had to perform that duty, that practically every week somebody in the press or from the public platform attacked him viciously and personally in respect to what was contended to be a case of injustice. But while regretting that he was charged with the duty, he made it very clear to us that he thought the success of the police in preventing all acts of sabotage or destruction in Britain was due largely to the defence of the realm regulations just in the form in which they stood. Hon. members will recall that there has been no single case of sabotage of any consequence in Canada, after nearly three years of war, and that these regulations have been in effect practically from the first week of the war. Hon. members will not forget that in the last war, when we had no such highly organized internal secret service force as the mounted police were at the beginning of this war, in the first year very serious acts of sabotage were attempted, and some carried out—all engineered with the help of German money from New York; for instance, the attempt to blow up the Vanceboro bridge; to blow up the Welland canal; the attempt—which succeeded—to blow up the overall factory at Walkerville; the attempt to blow up the Windsor armouries, to blow up the Revelstoke tunnel. All these were attempts which nearly succeeded, whereas under our present system the defence of Canada regulations and the alertness of the splendid force under the Minister of Justice have saved us from any of these possible disasters in the conduct of this war.

I have spoken for longer than I had intended. I believe that as things change so fast we could well spend some time on the problem of the banning of the communist party. In approaching that subject the house may feel that the committee should bear in mind that the communist party as such and our ally Russia are not just one and the same thing. There is a fallacious belief that such is the fact, but it is not.

The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) said that in the administration of these regulations we must never abandon the principle that a man is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty. I am afraid my hon. friend has never studied the regulations. Both the British regulations and ours do not recognize that well-established principle of British law which is observed in the administration of the criminal courts. Instead we go upon the theory that with responsible officials and a minister of high standing charged with the duty, a man who has not been proven guilty before any court may be and ought to be put behind the palisades before he gets a chance to do a wrong the consequences of which may be irreparable and may go to the very root of the success of the country in winning the war

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, since there is in my constituency in Toronto a very considerable Italian community, and since I have known some of those people for the last twenty-five years I should like to say a word or two with respect to the committee now to be set up. Perhaps I ought not to say anything, because this may be a matter upon which lawyers are more able to pass judgment than would be a layman. But since Italy entered the war to fight against us I have seen a great deal of distress in my part of the city. I do not know whether any of the acts committed against the Italian citizens have been deserved, but I am sure that quite a number have suffered through no fault of their own.

In the last war the Italian community in Toronto sent a considerable number of soldiers overseas to fight alongside Canadian soldiers. Many of those Italians came back badly wounded; quite a number were killed in action, and to-day many of them belong to that branch of the legion which operates in my end of the city. I believe, however, that some of those citizens have suffered rather unfairly during the present war. A case I have in mind, which I shall outline to the house, is one of a class which I should hope some of the regulations might cover. If so, I should wish that such regulations might be reviewed by the committee.

The young man I have in mind is now thirty to thirty-five years of age. At the time of the great war he was a lad of only four or five years. His father had been a United States citizen before the great war, but shortly before the outbreak of that war he came to Canada bringing his young children with him. They have lived in Toronto ever since as good, law-abiding citizens. Shortly after Italy entered this war the young man in question, in company with a number of others, was at once set upon by, I presume, the police. This one in particular consulted a solicitor in down-town Toronto to find out if he must submit to attacks by the police. He had been told by them that he was not a British citizen. The fact is that he was born in the United States.

Following his seeing a solicitor he came to see me, and as a result of his visit I wrote the Department of Justice, setting out full particulars. I did not ask for redress, stating in my letter nothing but the bare facts. The department replied with a very friendly letter stating that since the boy's father was a naturalized British citizen who had come here prior to the great war, the children were British citizens too and exempt from police check, so long as they were law-abiding citizens. I sent that letter to the young man. Following that, it is said that his solicitor sent him a bill for $175. That solicitor had done no more than I had.

Mr. ROEBUCK: He could have the solicitor's bill taxed.

An hon. MEMBER: What did you charge?

Mr. MacNICOL: I do things free; I do not charge anything for anything I do.

I do not believe any person of non-English origin should be subjected to such treatment simply because he is not of British origin.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I think my hon. friend misunderstood my interruption. I pointed out that the person in question could have the solicitor's bill taxed if it is too high.

An hon. MEMBER: Meaning what?

Mr. ROEBUCK: "Meaning what?" an hon. member to my right asks. We have an office connected with the courts of Ontario whose duty it is to review solicitors' bills. If my hon. friend would submit that bill to the taxing officer, the right amount would be substituted.

Mr. MacNICOL: I shall send a copy of to-day's Hansard to the gentleman in question, and he may take the bill and Hansard to the taxing officer to see if he can get redress. After Italy went into the war Italians in Toronto were generally more or less—I will not say persecuted, but many of them were.

Mr. ROEBUCK: "Persecuted" is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: I suppose they preferred to grin and bear anything inflicted upon them rather than protest, and I believe that was the condition in this instance.

Quite a number of Italians in my constituency have enlisted and have gone overseas to serve in the present war. I have in mind the father of a family of six or eight children, two of whom are in the army. That father, however, has been picked up and placed in an internment camp. I have not written the Minister of Justice about him, because I do not know whether a layman may properly report matters of that kind. The fact is, however, that the father has been interned for some time. On a number of occasions his wife has been to see me, and I have seen her hair change from jet black to gray, from worrying about her husband, the head of the house, who has been placed in the internment camp.

If internment regulations are to be reviewed I should hope that some regulations might be made whereby a man might have an opportunity to present his case before a legal tribunal. I do not know anything about law or courts; I am not a lawyer. But under present regulations such people do not appear to have a chance. The man I have in mind has been in the camp ever since Italy entered the war, despite the fact that he has two sons in the army. So far as I know the family has always been loyal, and I should hope that regulations affecting such people might be applied with a certain amount of sympathy and British fair play.

Certainly I would be opposed to the release of anyone who should be interned. I agree with the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) when he said in effect that an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure. If any person of any non-British nationality is known to be a person of dangerous proclivities, then I say that such person is better in a camp than out of it. But with respect to the ordinary humble citizen who could not under any circumstances be considered dangerous, and particularly a citizen who has been here for thirty or forty years, I say that such person ought not to suffer unnecessarily. On the other hand, for those who are guilty I have no sympathy.

Mr. T. C. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) has already covered most of the representations hon. members in this group wish to make, and I do not purpose repeating what he has said. I rise merely to endorse his observations.

There is, however, one organization I would refer to the special committee, if it is going to consider questions affecting organizations which have been declared illegal. I refer to the organization generally known as Jehovah's Witnesses. I believe I have discussed this matter before in the last two years. No satisfactory statement has thus far come from the treasury benches as to why the organization has been declared illegal. I do not know how many of those responsible for the administration of the regulations have read the literature of the organization. In those years when I had more time for diversified reading I read many of the books published by the organization, as well as those published by other sects. While I disagree most heartily with their point of view, not only on religious matters but also on social matters, I have never been able to satisfy myself that any of the doctrines which they preach are of such a nature as to be subversive of Canada's war effort.

Mr. MARTIN: It discourages them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): My hon. friend says that it discourages them. At the present time there is one sect which is preaching that before this war is over we shall be joined with Hitler in a war against the U.S.S.R. I do not agree with them, and I do not suppose that the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) agrees with them, but there is no talk about banning that organization. That would be absurd. There is a religious organization in Canada which is opposed to the bearing of arms, and which teaches that belief. That is not particularly encouraging to our war effort, but no one in this house would suggest that an organization like that should be banned. It is most difficult to define what is meant by discouraging the war effort. It is different to say that a certain point of view discourages the war effort from saying that a certain doctrine is subversive of the war effort.

For the last two or three years I have made up a file from clippings from newspapers in Canada giving accounts of arrests of and fines imposed against various people connected with this so-called Jehovah's Witnesses organization, and this file has grown at an alarming rate. I quote one from Campbellton, New Brunswick, as follows:

> Two Montreal women, Mrs. Francis Bower and Mrs. Loretta Appleby, were found guilty of a breach of the defence of Canada regulations by Sitting Magistrate J. N. Bugold in police court to-day. He ordered that the two accused each pay a fine of $300 and costs, or in default of payment that they serve a term of six months in jail. The two took the jail terms.

There was a case in my own community where a business man was charged on two counts, one that he was a member of an illegal organization known as Jehovah's Witnesses—there was no proof of that except that he had been associated with them some time before, but he contended that he had had no contact with them since—and, second, that he had said in conversation that in his opinion Canada was not a Christian country, but a country with Christian people in it. I have heard that statement made from scores of pulpits of different Protestant denominations. It is merely expressing a difference in point of view as to what is meant by a Christian country. This man was fined, I think $200. Fortunately he was able to pay it and did not have to take the gaol sentence. That sort of thing encourages the kind of people who like to run around telling tales or reporting to the police that they had heard in conversation that some one else had heard some one else say such a thing. In this particular case they had the evidence of only one woman, but that was considered sufficient to substantiate a charge being made against a responsible citizen of Canada. That is not good for the morale of this country. We should not do anything that will encourage tale-bearing and informing.

I have under my hand a piece of literature published by that organization entitled "Consolation, a Journal of Fact, Hope and Courage." This is published in Brooklyn, New York, but it is banned in Canada under the defence of Canada regulations. I am told that this is allowed to circulate in Great Britain, Australia and the United States. I do not know why it is banned here. I have read it through, and while I do not agree with ninety-nine per cent of what it says, I cannot understand why it has been banned. It is most intolerant of other religious groups, and it refers in the most virulent terms to the profession to which I belong. I have no reason to hold any brief for the points of view expressed in a periodical of this sort, but I cannot find anything in it that I can conscientiously say is subversive of Canada's war effort. The fact that it is intolerant, the fact that it finds fault with people who hold views different from the views expressed therein, is not sufficient to warrant its being banned in Canada or to warrant the people who publish it being subject to a fine or imprisonment.

We are following a serious tack when we allow this sort of thing to go on. We are going to make martyrs out of certain groups of people. There are people who want nothing so much as to be made martyrs. What is being done is to drive them underground, give some of them the halo of martyrdom and permit many of them to protest that they are suffering for their faith and are being persecuted by those who belong to other religious organizations and other churches in Canada. I urge upon the committee and upon the minister that if they are going to examine the question of illegal organizations, we ought to have a more satisfactory and more comprehensive statement as to why this organization has been banned than we have had up to now.

It has almost become platitudinous to refer to President Roosevelt's four freedoms. We keep on telling the people in the democratic countries that we are fighting for the four freedoms, one of which is the freedom to worship God in the manner in which we choose. It seems to me that it is going to be increasingly difficult to convince the world that we are seeking to get religious freedom for the people of Europe when we deny it to the people of Canada. This itself, in its own way, is an encroachment upon religious freedom. Whether we agree or disagree—I imagine that the great majority of us disagree —with the points of view expressed by that religious sect, I think we do ourselves an injustice and our cause an injustice by continuing to declare them an illegal organization when there is no specific evidence to prove that their efforts and their beliefs are subversive of Canada's war effort.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the subject under discussion has been considered most thoroughly, but because of the reference made by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (Mr. Coldwell) to one or two matters, I feel that as a member of this committee I should say something at this time. I fully support the plea made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) that consideration should be given to the naturalization laws of Canada and the method by which new citizens are admitted to Canadian nationality. There is great need to consider this matter, either through the agency of this particular committee or through a special committee which may be set up. The naturalization laws of Canada are in a most deplorable state. I refer not only to the methods by which citizens are naturalized, but to the laws themselves. They present a most ridiculous situation.

We have a situation where people in our country are, to use a technical phrase, "heimathlos"—"without a home"—who have no nationality at all or who have a nationality in one part of the commonwealth, and although residing in Canada have no nationality whatsoever according to the laws of Canada. This situation should be remedied at the earliest possible moment.

There is another matter I should like to impress upon the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent). In this connection he has given indications of dispatch. I agree with what the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) has said, that when a nation is at war one cannot stop to question at the outset whether or not a particular person should be interned on the basis of suspicion, or on the basis of a very slight rumour, or upon the slightest evidence for that matter. But one thing cannot be justified, and it is one thing for which there is occasion for criticism. When a man is interned, whether it be upon complaints or upon slight evidence, there can be no justification for keeping him interned month after month without a hearing. Even since the advent of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), and with the setting up of additional committees, there are cases still where the dispatch does not satisfy me. One instance I know of is where a man had been interned. He was readily given his freedom after some urgency was indicated, when it was pointed out that his wife was dying. As a matter of fact, the man was let out the day after his wife died, and no evidence at all had been found against him. In that case the reason for the delay was that the reporter had been assigned to another job outside the government service and had not transcribed the evidence. Because of the dilatoriness of that particular reporter, a man who had been in this country for forty-two years, a man who could not read or write, remained interned—a man who had been found to be innocent. That cannot be justified, and for the reason that I am going to mention.

The house may recall that several months ago I put on the order paper a question concerning one Otto Strasser. The Prime Minister in replying to that question suggested that I might in view of the circumstances seek an interview with the under-secretary of state for external affairs, Mr. Norman Robertson, and examine the file in connection with this man. I have seen the file, and I think any hon. member who has had that opportunity, which I am sure is open to any member of this house, will realize that I am restricted in discussing this matter in so far as saying how Otto Strasser got into this country and that sort of thing.

Mr. Otto Strasser was one of the founders of the nazi party. His brother, Gregor, associated with him, played a very important part in the early days of the Brown Shirt movement in Germany, particularly in northern Germany, and while there is other evidence in the books written by Otto Strasser that he does not like Hitler, and has no love for Goering or Goebbels, his writings since his break with Hitler, writings while he was in Europe and since he has been in Canada, do not satisfy me that he is not of the view still that Germany can be restored to her former status, first by removing Hitler, and then by setting up in principle some kind of state which the philosophers of the nazi movement contemplated, and which theoretically Hitler may be assumed to support.

I do not want to do an injustice to any man. I have heard Mr. Otto Strasser speak in my own city of Windsor. I have heard him condemn Hitler. I have heard him tell the people of that city that Hitler was a menace and that those immediately associated with him were a menace. I have heard him say that the only way in which Germany could be beaten was by a distribution of pamphlets. He certainly circumscribed the possibilities of an offensive against Germany. I am not saying that there are not reasons why Otto Strasser should not find an asylum in this country. I am not commenting on that for the reason I have mentioned in reference to the departmental file, but I am saying that his writings do indicate where his sympathies lie in so far as the character of the state he would set up is concerned. Yet we have no hesitation in interning men who are citizens of this country. In many instances that is justifiable, no doubt, but I find it very difficult to see how we can carry out certain forms of internment and yet give asylum to a man who helped to set up in being the national socialist system of which Hitler is the exponent—and give the man an asylum without any restraint upon his movements.

It is significant that Mr. Otto Strasser was denied the right of entering the United States. He was refused a visa for reasons that are best known to the state department of the United States, reasons which I think should be considered in discussing this matter.

Mr. Otto Strasser has written to me and complained about my point of view. I suspect that he will write to me to-morrow after he reads what I have said to-day. That is perhaps his privilege. To show me his position he sent me one of his books. I have read that book and, after reading it, I still have found no reason for changing the point of view I have to-day in regard to that gentleman.

One final thought, Mr. Speaker. I should have liked to hear the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party say here to-day that the committee had considered the question of the internment of labour leaders. As a member of that committee, I would certainly not support the internment of any man on the mere ground that he was an organizer of labour. I would not support the internment of any man simply because he was trying to encourage the principle of collective bargaining in any part of this country. But I must say that the committee is not aware nor should the house be led to believe that men have been interned simply because they were labour leaders. That is not fair to labour; it is not fair to the administration; it is not fair to the members of this house; and I think when the Minister of Justice speaks he ought to make clear, as I am sure he will, that no man has been interned in this country simply because he was an organizer of labour, but that there were ancillary reasons for his internment.

I welcome the opportunity of serving once again on this committee, and I know that I shall, along with the other members of the committee, try to give this matter the careful consideration which it requires and deserves.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the address of the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Martin), I, as a member of the committee on the defence of Canada regulations at the first session of this parliament, want to join with my hon. friend in saying that at no time during the period I was a member of that committee did anything come before it which in any way suggested that any man had been interned in Canada by reason alone of his activities as a labour leader, or that any man had been interned who ought not to have been interned in the interests of the safety of the state at the time of his internment.

While I entirely agree that in the declaration of principles for which this empire now contends the freedoms occupy a very large and important position, nevertheless I think all of us recognize that in the interests of the safety of the state those rights of which British citizenship ordinarily consists must be sacrificed. The safety of the state must be paramount.

I congratulate the new Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) upon the way in which he has proceeded with the administration of these difficult regulations. Those of us who have been connected for many years with the Canadian Bar Association knew, when he was appointed Minister of Justice, that he would carry on his high office in the best British and Canadian traditions. In the administration of the regulations he has removed one of the most serious objections thereto; in that, having set up an advisory committee to investigate whether a person should continue to be interned, he has accepted the recommendations of the committee and in every case has discharged those against whom the committee found no guilt.

The matter raised by the hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) with regard to the banning of religious institutions, and in particular Jehovah's Witnesses, could very well be met if an amendment were made to the regulations providing the banned organizations with the right of appeal, giving them an opportunity of showing that they are in fact not illegal and that their activities are not nor have been subversive of the war effort. If that were done, I believe the only serious objection which remains against the administration of the defence of Canada regulations would be removed.

There is, however, another matter which is in fact the reason why I rose to make these few remarks. There is one man whose internment and release should, I believe, be explained by the minister. One thing we do not want any of the people to believe is that, in the administration of these regulations, wealth or position shall count for aught. I refer to the case of James Franceschini, the well-known contractor of the city of Toronto, who was interned shortly after the outbreak of war between Italy and the British empire. I believe the time has come when the minister should explain to the house and to the country the situation with respect to this man, about whom there has been so much speculation and concerning whose release there has been so much discussion. I think it is only fair to ask the minister to answer this question: was James Franceschini guiltless? Was a grave mistake made in his internment or in keeping him in internment for a period of almost one year? I would point out that no satisfactory explanation was given by the Department of Justice when he was released. It was stated that he was released on the ground of ill-health, and that therefore clemency was extended to him. All members and former members of the committee are agreed that it has been necessary in all parts of the empire to remove some of the ordinary rights of British citizenship—rights to which the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) referred and for whose abrogation he advanced cogent arguments—and to disregard certain well-known principles of the criminal law. Since when did it become justifiable to release because of ill-health, if he was not guiltless, a man who was interned in order to prevent him from carrying on wrongful activities against the state? Ill health is not an explanation; it is an excuse. If Franceschini was innocent it is only fair to him that the government should publicly admit it, as the government of Great Britain has invariably done at Westminster when it has made a mistake. If he was guilty, where is the justification for releasing an interned man in time of war on the ground of ill health?

I might add in this connection that on April 20 a sessional paper, a return to an order made by this house in regard to Mr. Franceschini, was brought down. I had asked certain questions, including these:

2. During the period of his internment, who had control of his property and assets?

3. Was he at the time of his internment interested as shareholder, officer, or otherwise in any companies? If so, what companies?

4. During the period of his internment, (a) did any of the said companies . . . have contracts . . .? . . . (c) if so, give particulars of the location and of the amounts of each of the said contracts. . . .

Finally:

6. Did the government purchase any of the said companies or other assets . . .?

Here is a strange situation: a man interned who is a majority shareholder in certain companies and a minority shareholder in others, and yet during the period of his internment his companies were being operated by the directors under the control of the custodian of enemy property. Dufferin Construction Company Limited, Dufferin Sales Company Limited and subsidiary companies, a large number, some fifteen or eighteen, in which he was interested, were operating during the period of his incarceration. No doubt, when he was released, the profits earned during the time that he was in custody were returned to him, although as to this question the return says that the authorities are unable to say.

When he was finally discharged, after his companies had received from the government contracts running into the millions, the government purchased from him the shipbuilding company in which he was interested. During the period of his internment Dufferin Paving and Crushed Stone Company Limited, in which he was a shareholder, had a contract for the construction of ground services at Hagersville, Ontario, in the amount of $134,496, and Dufferin Paving Company Limited had a contract for paving roads, et cetera, at Swift Current for $34,530. During his internment contracts were entered into with Dufferin Shipbuilding Company Limited, controlled in whole or in part by him, to the extent of several million dollars as follows: October 23, 1940, mine-sweeping vessels, $1,316,852; April 9, 1941, supply of four mine-sweeping vessels, $2,699,568; June 2, 1941, mine-sweepers, $2,530,817. Finally, when he was released the government cancelled outstanding contracts by agreement and purchased the outstanding shares of the capital stock of Dufferin Shipbuilding Company for $975,000. Why an enemy of the country, if he was an enemy, while he remained interned should have been able to carry on his business affairs under the custodian of alien enemy property and then on his discharge receive the profits requires an explanation. The minister may come before the house and the country and explain that a mistake was made and that this man was innocent. I am of opinion that it will be very difficult for the government otherwise to explain the matter satisfactorily. It may be noted that the only ground for his release given at the time of his discharge was his serious illness.

In conclusion, let me say that I had the honour to belong to the defence of Canada regulations committee during the first session. As has been stated by the hon. member for Parry Sound whose distinguished career as a lawyer added lustre to the committee, and also by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), if ever there was a committee of this parliament that was a model for others it is this one. Members of the committee worked together without any considerations of party or party benefit, with one end and one end only, namely, the assistance of this country at this time. While mistakes no doubt have been made; while improvements in the regulations have had to be incorporated from time to time in the original regulations, the record to date has been one that justifies the existence and continuance of this committee.

I join with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) in asking that the committee be given an opportunity as well to look into the matter of naturalization and deportation. If I understood rightly, at the present time aliens who are British subjects and are interned for wrongdoing, cannot be deported at the conclusion of hostilities, and recommendations should be made with regard thereto at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): More than two months ago a deputation from the civil liberties' association met the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent), and other ministers of the crown and made certain recommendations with regard to the enforcement of the defence of Canada regulations. We have asked repeatedly for a report from the minister regarding the consideration which these representations have received and the extent to which they have been followed. That report was promised to us over the Prime Minister's signature before the Easter recess.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: And has been ready for the last six weeks for presentation at any time the hon. member chose to ask for it.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Then we may expect from the minister a report when he is speaking to this motion.

In the second place, I would call the attention of the minister and members of the committee to three widespread suspicions which I have found all across Ontario with regard to the defence of Canada regulations. There is a widespread suspicion that communists are being interned because they are communists. It is in the interests of our war effort that every possible measure be taken to remove that suspicion from the public mind. If I were a communist; if I were more interested in the spread of communism than in our war effort, I would desire nothing more than to see communist leaders interned, whereby they become public heroes and their cause becomes popular with their people and with others.

The second suspicion that I have found, notwithstanding statements made here this afternoon, is that men have been interned because of their work in labour organizations. We have already had the assurance of members of the committee that no person has been interned on these grounds.

Mr. MITCHELL: When the hon. member speaks of labour organizations, to what does he refer?

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: I am referring to activity in labour organizations.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a pretty broad term.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Or union activity, if you wish to narrow the term. That suspicion should be removed. It is a remarkable coincidence that so many of those persons who have been interned have been at the same time very active in trade unionism, and I am quite sure that that widespread suspicion is a deterrent to our war effort to-day.

A third suspicion abroad which this committee should remove is that the present administration is much too favourable to those of nazi and fascist tendencies or mentality. Two examples have been called to our attention this afternoon. There is a widespread feeling that a great many who are interested in the spread of nazism and fascism are being, if not aided and abetted, at least overlooked by the authorities, while those who are active in the spread of genuine democracy, which will establish the four freedoms that we hear so much about, are being picked up and interned. I do not think for a moment that we should be so desirous of being democratic as to permit the use of democratic principles for the destruction of democracy itself; but if the defence of Canada regulations are there to promote our war effort, they are defeating their purpose in these three respects at least.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I shall not ask your permission, Mr. Speaker, to avail myself of the kind invitation of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) to make any formal address to the house at this time on this subject. I think it is one of the subjects connected with the fact that we are at war and that we should get on with the work we have to do with perhaps as little talking about it as is compatible with a proper performance of the undertaking itself. There are, however, a few things which I should like to touch upon with regard to remarks that have been offered by hon. members in the course of the debate this afternoon.

First of all I wish to thank all the hon. members who have participated in the debate for the very helpful suggestions that have been made, which I am sure will receive the careful consideration of this committee as soon as it gets down to the work it is appointed to perform. With respect to the three suspicions mentioned by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) as being in the mind of the public at large with regard to the manner in which the defence of Canada regulations are administered, I should like to say that almost at once a report was prepared on the representations of the Civil Liberties' Association of Toronto, and I have had it in my envelope here for several weeks to be brought before the house at any time an inquiry about it might be made. I may add that for several days, as soon as other perhaps more vital issues were disposed of, I have been considering asking for an opportunity to make a statement to the house, but have refrained from doing so because the representatives of that league have asked for another conference with me about it and I am to meet them at ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The question having been raised, I should like to say to the hon. member for York South that these representations were seven in number. The first was that a statement of policy be made to the effect that regulation 21 will not be applied in cases where there is merely trade union activity or participation in a strike, and that an amendment to that effect, such as is contained in paragraph 1 of regulation 7, be made to regulation 21. I proposed to answer, and I do now answer, that it has not been and is not now the policy to detain a person because of trade union activities or participation in a strike; and that an amendment to regulation 21 along the lines suggested has now been made and will, I hope, ensure that this policy will continue to be carried into effect.

The second representation was that regulation 21 should be revised as in the United Kingdom to point more precisely to the class of action intended to be dealt with by the regulation. This matter was fully discussed before the special committee of the house in 1940 and again in 1941, and the present wording of the regulation was maintained on the report of that committee. We have felt that it was desirable to have the investigation of this year's committee before venturing to make any change in the phraseology of the regulation.

The third representation was that consideration be given in each particular case as to whether procedure should be by way of action in the courts rather than by internment, and that a person who had been acquitted by the courts should not thereafter be interned. This procedure is already being followed wherever it is found that there is evidence which would justify us in believing that a conviction for the offence would be obtained under the regulation. Where a person has been acquitted by the courts on a charge laid, detention has not been and is not being effected unless there are other grounds than those connected with the charge investigated by the court. As has already been stated in the house, wherever detention or internment is contemplated a summary of the grounds is drawn up and submitted to a committee, and no internment has been ordered for several months unless there was a report from this committee, which is an interdepartmental committee on which the Department of Justice is not represented. That has been the practice for several months. The order provides that the internee, immediately upon arrest, shall be detained in the local gaol, not sent to an internment camp, until he has had an opportunity of stating whether he objects to internment, or the thirty days' delay has expired. If he objects to internment he is not sent to a concentration camp until one of these advisory boards has tried the issue. Hon. members know now that at the opening of the session and every four weeks while the house is in session a report of the number of cases dealt with under section 21 is required to be filed, and it has been my good fortune to be able to report to this house that not one recommendation of an advisory board has been disregarded.

The fourth representation was that a recognized representative of the trade unions be appointed as a member of the advisory committees under regulation 22, and that one other member be a person who has held high judicial office. A new advisory committee has recently been appointed, because we found there were a large number of cases still to be dealt with. Hon. members may believe that I feel just as keenly as any one of them how unfortunate it is to detain anyone who should not be interned, and I have felt that it was most urgent that these cases be considered with as great expedition as is consistent with a fair hearing and a proper decision. A new committee has recently been appointed to help expedite the work of hearing these appeals as it were, of considering the cases of those who are still interned, and it was our good fortune to be able to secure the services of a representative member of the trade unions to serve on this additional committee.

With respect to that part of the recommendation that one member of the committee be a person who has held high judicial office, the chairmen of the three committees now in operation are: one a county court judge, one a former county court judge, and the third a member of the magistrate's court of the province of Quebec.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister say that is a high judicial office?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They do not measure up.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: No, these are not gentlemen who have occupied high judicial office. But so far we have found that the way in which they have performed their duties has been very satisfactory. The situation with respect to high judicial office throughout several of the provinces is such that it would be difficult to get the services of such men for these committees unless we increase the numbers of members of the courts. There are already members of some of our high courts serving in various capacities in war activities, and if we were to require more of our high court judges to serve in this work it would be essential to increase the number of appointees. It is an unforutnate fact that several members of our courts in several of the provinces are in poor health. If we took from those performing the ordinary judicial functions at the present time greater numbers than are now engaged upon war activities here, additional appointments would have to be made, and it has not seemed that the services being performed by the committees presided over by the gentlemen who now preside over them are not in fact satisfactory.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: Mr. Speaker, the fifth representation made by this Civil Liberties' Association was that on hearings before advisory committees the Department of Justice should be represented by counsel of high standing. This was given careful consideration, and in view of the fact that many of the persons who are detained are not able to have counsel representing them it is not considered desirable that counsel should represent the crown. Further it is considered that such procedure would probably cause undue delay. A large number of these cases have still to be considered, and we are trying to expedite them as much as possible.

The sixth representation was that fuller disclosure of the facts with regard to cases of detention should be made to parliament in greater detail than at present. The provisions of the third subsection of regulation 21 requiring information to be furnished to parliament are similar to those in force in the United Kingdom, and they require that the Minister of Justice shall at the beginning of each session of parliament, and every four weeks thereafter during each session, make reports to parliament showing the action taken under those regulations, which reports shall show the number of persons detained under orders made pursuant to the regulation, and the number of cases, if any, in which the Minister of Justice declined to follow the advice of any advisory committee which may be appointed under regulation 22. These reports are being filed in due course. If, as a result of the investigation of this special committee, it is thought desirable that fuller information should be supplied to parliament, and if the committee, after considering all the factors involved, considers it to be in the public interest that these reports should disclose more about the individual cases, the recommendations of the committee will be given careful consideration, not only by me but by council. I have no doubt that the desires of parliament in that regard will be promptly and fully met.

There was a further representation that regulations 39 and 39A be amended so that prohibited statements be defined as statements amounting to a systematic publication of matter calculated to foment opposition to the successful prosecution of the war. Regulations 39 and 39A were considered and revised in accordance with the recommendations of the special committee of 1940-41; and it is not considered that, pending the report of the new committee, the present is an opportune time to relax these regulations.

The third suspicion mentioned by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy), as being one of those which to a certain extent might undermine the confidence of the public in the administration of the regulations, was that some nazi adherents, two of whom were mentioned in the course of the debate this afternoon, have not yet been interfered with. This is a matter that is well worth careful consideration and I wish to assure the house that we are seriously concerned over what should be done to prevent any damage to the war effort upon which we are engaged. If after examination it is found that there are at large in this country people whose activities are thought to be detrimental to the prosecution of the war effort, proper measures will be adopted in that regard.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) discussed some of the statements made in a return to the house concerning one James Franceschini. I must confess that I have not had an opportunity of examining a large part of the material to which reference was made by the hon. member, because the administration of the affairs of this interned person was under the control of the custodian. The manner in which this interned person's affairs were administered can be the object of inquiry. Possibly that matter does not fall within the purview of the jurisdiction given to this special committee—although I am not suggesting that if it sees fit the special committee should not inquire into the matter—but the inquiry would have to be directed to officers of the custodian's branch rather than to officers of the Department of Justice.

As to the release of Mr. Franceschini I was informed some time ago by counsel acting for him that it was proposed to make an inquiry from me as to how that had come about. At that time I had prepared a draft answer which, I believe, might be made to that inquiry. Perhaps I might communicate to the house what had been determined at that time. This draft, which is under date of April 15, states:

> With reference to your inquiry respecting James Franceschini I may say that the information in the possession of the police warranted, in my view, the original detention of Franceschini. Subsequently however and after fuller information had been obtained the late Minister of Justice ordered his unconditional release on the ground that it was not considered that he would be likely to be a danger to the state, owing to the serious state of his health.
> From the information presently available and the circumstances existing to-day I think that if this case were now being reviewed by an advisory committee it would be reasonable to believe that such committee would be apt to recommend release. Such a recommendation would be consistent with other recommendations in cases in which the evidence is somewhat similar.

I did go through the file pretty carefully, and we prepared this statement. I may say that the information in possession of the police in my view warranted the orginal detention of Franceschini. I also came to the conclusion that if he had not been unconditionally released when he was, and if his case were now being reviewed by an advisory committee, it is my belief that that committee would recommend release. That would appear to be consistent with what has been done in other cases where the evidence is somewhat similar.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Did a committee not recommend his release?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There had been an original inquiry by one of the former committees, consisting of one person; and a report had been made. The then minister of justice, on that report and the information before him, had decided to order a continuation of detention. That, I think, is as far as it is proper for me to go. There must be someone to assume the responsibility in the house for detention orders, and the continuation of detention where it has been continued; and it is my submission that it is in the interest of the public that that responsibility should rest upon someone who is answerable to this house.

As I said this afternoon it has been my good fortune to be able to accept every recommendation that has been put before me; but I felt in each instance that I was taking a responsibility for which I was answerable to the house, and that that was the way in which these regulations should be administered.

There is no suggestion that in the detention of an individual there is punishment. It is merely prevention. It is only in such cases where the person responsible can come before the house and say that in his opinion it would be dangerous for the safety of the state in this crisis to have the person concerned at large.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is no such thing as clemency then?

Mr. ST. LAURENT: There is no such thing as clemency; there cannot be any such thing as clemency. In the case of Franceschini, if the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has that in mind, I think the expression used at the time he was released that it was on compassionate grounds is an unfortunate expression, and one that was not in accord with the real finding. The real finding was that because of the condition of the man's health at that time it was not felt that his being at large would endanger the safety of the state.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister would allow me I should like to say that there is a distinction between clemency and compassion. Compassionate grounds might apply to the state of a man's health. We need to be charitable about these matters, and judicial too.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The information, which I think has been most carefully controlled, is that this man's health was such that without surgical intervention his life was a matter of days. That being the condition of his health, it was considered at that time that releasing him would not in any way endanger the safety of the state. No grounds have developed since which in my opinion would justify reinternment. Had release not been made at that time and had the case come before the advisory board, I feel that the advisory board would have been apt to recommend release. Had I been the one to receive such a recommendation, I would have approved it at once and ordered release.

The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) referred to a case where a man had been detained for some considerable time because the reporter had been engaged upon other business and his notes had not been submitted to the advisory committee. I agree with the hon. member in voicing strong condemnation of anything of that kind, and I wish to assure him that in so far as I can exercise supervision over these matters, such things will not occur. We do appreciate that there are probably still some internees who will be released when their cases are considered by the advisory committees. It is both in the public interest and in justice to such internees that their cases be reached and dealt with as expeditiously as possible.

The hon. member for Weyburn (Mr. Douglas) adverted to the fact that under the regulations Jehovah's Witnesses are declared to be an illegal organization. I must confess that I have not had an opportunity of examining the facts relative to these declarations of illegality contained in regulation 39C, but I trust the house will agree with me when I say that so long as the regulation remains the law of the country, it is the duty of the Minister of Justice to see that it is applied. If there are any features of the regulations which should be varied, until such time as they are varied the Minister of Justice cannot take it upon himself to refrain from applying them in the terms in which they have been set out. These matters can be examined and reviewed and recommendations made by this special committee, and the recommendations of the special committee will most certainly receive the careful consideration of his excellency in council. But until such time as the regulations are modified, I feel that it is my duty to apply them as fairly and as completely as the terms require.

There was a suggestion from the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) that, by reason of his being a layman, he felt that he should not interfere in any way with the application of the regulations. I beg to assure the hon. member that we are only too pleased at all times to receive information upon which we can rely for the purpose of dealing with these cases. Any representation that the hon. member for Davenport or the member for any other constituency may see fit to submit at any time will receive careful consideration. We shall be grateful for information coming from sources upon which we can rely.

Mr. POULIOT: Hear, hear.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I extend the same invitation to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot). Any suggestions he may make will receive the most careful consideration.

The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) noted that this resolution does not, as did the resolution last year, provide for the examination by the committee of matters relating to naturalization and deportation. It will be noticed that the resolution setting up the special committee last year was introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and he probably felt no qualms in asking for the investigation of matters which might concern more than one department.

This year I am asking the house to appoint a special committee to investigate matters relating to the Department of Justice. Naturalization and deportation may to a certain extent be connected with and dealt with by the regulations, and I suggest that if these matters are to be examined and a report submitted, the report will receive the consideration of my hon. friend who presides over the department within which these matters come.

Mr. GREEN: The Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty) is in his place at the moment, and the matter of naturalization comes under his department. I feel quite confident that he would have no objection to having this resolution amended to include naturalization and deportation. After all, the committee is not to investigate the Department of Justice; it is to investigate these particular subjects, and I urge upon the minister that he agree to having the motion amended to cover these two matters. They have already been considered to a certain extent by a committee, the personnel of which was almost identical with that of the committee which is to function this year.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: I certainly would have no objection to the committee examining any subjects. Although my experience here is quite limited, may I suggest that possibly the committee itself might ask for further powers to deal with these subjects if it feels that it is convenient to deal with them in connection with the other matters. If such a suggestion comes from the committee, I can assure the hon. member that I would be the last to raise any objection.

Several interesting suggestions were made by the hon. member for Trinity (Mr. Roebuck), of which I took careful note and which, no doubt, will receive the consideration of the committee. For instance, the hon. member suggested that the terms of regulation 21 were too sweeping, that there should be greater particularity. I understand that this matter received the attention of the committee which sat in 1940 and in 1941, and I have no doubt that it will be one of the main topics for consideration of the committee which is to sit this year. The hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) dealt with some of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Trinity. I submit that the composition of the committee is such that we who are not members may feel assured that these matters will receive the consideration they deserve in the interests of the public.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) also put forward the suggestion that the committee should review with care the whole question of the banning of organizations and publications as well as the internment of persons. I take it that the hon. member did not mean that it should be the duty of the committee to examine the case of each one of those who are interned. That would certainly be a very great convenience for the Department of Justice, but it would be an undertaking which I am afraid the time of the committee would not allow it to perform.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would suggest that it would not be within the purview of the reference to the committee.

Mr. ST. LAURENT: The reference is broad, and we did consider whether there should be the insertion of any other words in the resolution, but certainly not for the purpose of recommending an order with respect to any individuals. The first part of the hon. member's suggestion would, however, come well within the purview of the reference because these organizations and these publications are specifically set out in the regulations; and, having jurisdiction to review the regulations, the committee would have jurisdiction to review the main portion of the hon. member's suggestion. But I did not understand that the hon. member meant that the committee should make a special recommendation in respect of each of the individuals interned but that rather it was a matter of general policy that was going to be reviewed.

I share with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) his regrets that he is not to be a member of the committee this year, because I have read the reports and I do appreciate that his presence on the committee in past years has been of very great assistance; but I hope that even if he is not a member of the committee, he will find opportunity to come before it and to give those who may be sitting upon it the benefit of such suggestions as he may feel are proper.

There remains the invitation of the hon. leader of the opposition that the Minister of Justice tell the house what is his attitude and what is the attitude of the government toward the communist party. The policy of the government has not yet been determined, and I do not think it would be proper for the government or for one of its members, when it has proposed the appointment of a special committee to investigate the matter, to publish in advance of the findings of the committee what its policy was going to be. The government will no doubt want to give very careful consideration to the recommendations which the committee will see fit to make.

As to the attitude of the Minister of Justice, I cannot go further than to say that his attitude is to apply the regulations as they exist and as they will exist from time to time. My duty, I take it, is to apply these regulations and not to remake them. If they are to be remade, they will be remade by his excellency in council, after the best consideration in the power of all the members of the government has been given to the recommendations which we hope to receive from the committee. When the policy has been determined I think I may have the privilege of stating it to the house on an occasion when that policy will be debatable. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that I am closing this debate and that when I sit down you will put the question. I do not think it would be proper for me therefore to attempt to make any statement now that would not be open to discussion by the house, but when the policy has been formulated I hope to have the opportunity, as I said, of announcing it to the house on an occasion when it will be the subject of debate.

Motion agreed to.

"THE NEW CANADIAN"

INQUIRY AS TO VANCOUVER NEWSPAPER PUBLISHED IN JAPANESE AND ENGLISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether it is true that a paper is being published in Vancouver under the name of The New Canadian, and published in Japanese and in English, and whether any steps are being taken to check up on it?

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): Will my hon. friend allow me to treat his question as a notice? I have not the information available at the moment, but I shall be glad to obtain it and give an answer very soon.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, May 1, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1943, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. MacNICOL: Yesterday I was in the station at London, Ontario, when a soldier came in who had received a wire from his home in Halifax that his mother or father—I forget which—had died. He purchased a ticket from London to Halifax, and I observed he had to pay for it $36.60, as I remember. I asked the young man, "Do you have to pay your own way back to Halifax?" He said, "Yes, I do." In circumstances like that where a Halifax soldier is sent to train far away from home, as far as London in the province of Ontario, surely to goodness there must be some regulation whereby he would not have to pay $36.60 out of the small monthly sum a private receives to return home to Halifax on the decease of one of his parents. Is there no regulation covering such a case?

Mr. RALSTON: He would pay one-way fare for the return ticket.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know he paid $36.60. I do not know whether that was return fare or not.

Mr. RALSTON: When they are on leave, they pay one-way fare. There is also a special regulation which provides for payment of one-third of the one-way fare.

Mr. MacNICOL: But there were special circumstances in this case. He was training so far away from home. He might just as well have been training in Nova Scotia as coming all the way to Ontario to be trained. But that appears to be the system all across Canada. Surely under those special circumstances, where the soldier had to return home because of the death of one of his parents, there should be some assistance granted to help him get back home, a free trip or some minimum fare so that he would not have to pay such a large amount as $36.60.

Mr. RALSTON: The big fare to which my hon. friend refers was on account of the distance. The regulation is that all soldiers on leave get at least one-way fare; that is, they do not have to pay their return fare.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I should like to read a letter appearing in the Guelph Daily Mercury of Thursday, April 30, 1942. This letter is from a definite identified unit in England, but the soldiers' names are not given. The letter reads:

Editor Guelph Daily Mercury,
Sir:

We, the men of the 16-43rd Battery of Guelph, have been reading in an issue of the Mercury, which we were glad to receive, a little late, but better late than never, that the present soldiers of 40-day fame, are being dressed up like Little Lord Fauntleroys, in a dress uniform, somewhat like that worn by our officers, while we poor chaps find it hard to even get a second pair of issue pants to our battle-dress.

We would like to find out why there is such a scarcity of pants for us while the recruits are able to be dressed in such a manner. We would like very much the cooperation of the Guelph Daily Mercury by publishing this letter and letting the people know how we are being dressed as compared with the soldiers back home.

So if you would be so kind as to find out why we can't get any more clothes from home, we certainly will be very much obliged to you and your paper for the kind assistance in this matter. So let us know at your earliest possible convenience. Our return address is:

The Boys of "C" Troop
16th Battery
12th Field Regt.,
England, March 25,
R.C.A. Canadian Army Overseas.

I should be glad if the minister is now in a position to give an answer.

Mr. RALSTON: This is the first complaint I have ever heard of or received with regard to dress or clothing in England. Within the last two weeks I received word from General McNaughton with particular regard to the quality of the battle-dress issued over there, which is Canadian made; two suits of battle-dress are allowed. I do not understand what the young men say about the difficulty of getting a second pair of trousers. I am quite satisfied that—I was going to say, something has slipped down—

Mr. REID: Give them kilts.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure that this must be the odd case. I shall certainly look into it and shall even ask England about C Troop, 16th Battery, R.C.A.

Mr. MacINNIS: During the rather long time that the Department of National Defence has been under review, I do not believe I have said anything. Most of the matters I would have raised and the questions I would have asked were raised or asked by someone else, and I was satisfied with the minister's replies.

However, just before the house adjourned on Friday last the hon. member for Vancouver South raised two points in this discussion which went beyond a mere asking for information and dealt with questions of military policy. When the minister suggested that the hon. member seemed to think only of one of Canada's coasts as being in danger, the hon. member remarked that he represented a Vancouver or a coast constituency and felt that, because of that, he should be more concerned with the west coast. I also represent a west coast constituency, but I would not wish to have it supposed that, because I have not stressed defence matters, I am not concerned with the defence of either coast or with Canada's whole war effort. I do not want the hon. member for Vancouver South to feel that I am criticizing him if I disagree with him. I realize that he has far more experience with military affairs than I have. But he raised a question of general policy. What he said was this, as reported in Hansard, page 2066.

It seems to me the committee would be well advised at this stage to try to get a broad picture of Canadian army activities both abroad and at home.

While I may not know very much about the details of military operations, I think I have about as much grasp as the average person of what the broad principles are, and I must admit that what the hon. member for Vancouver South said on Friday disturbed me greatly.

First he mentioned that we must avenge Hong Kong. I think that is a bad approach to Canada's war effort. Then he said that we must build up an army of the Pacific which would be able to fight on its own, fight by itself. It seems to me that that does not fit into the strategy of this war, because there is nothing clearer than that Canada cannot fight on her own.

Mr. GREEN: On a question of privilege, I am sure the hon. member for Vancouver East would not misrepresent me intentionally. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. What I meant was that there should be a complete army—not that it should fight by itself, but that it should be an army rather than a group of detachments to defend the coast.

Mr. MacINNIS: I mentioned when I began that I hoped the hon. member for Vancouver South would not interpret my remarks as a criticism in the sense in which criticism in this chamber is generally regarded. But the words which I quoted are definitely the words he used; he mentioned an army which would be able to fight on its own, fight by itself.

I think I have previously pointed out the enormous amount of equipment which would be required if Canada were to lead an offensive war on the Pacific, and what I said at that time holds good to-day. No matter what impression may be made locally by what an hon. member may say, we should keep the general situation clearly in mind. We should make it clear—and I think it needs to be made clear in Canada, because of the feeling in some parts of the country—that we are engaged in a world war, a war in which practically the whole world is fighting the axis powers. That fact is as important in its application to one of Canada's coasts as it is to the other.

We can no more make a war all on our own or put a force of our own in the eastern theatre of war than we can on the west. We must fight this war in conjunction with our allies or not fight at all. That demands, in my opinion, a unified strategy and a united command.

If it does not mean that, then our Pacific war council does not mean anything. I think it would create a wrong impression in the minds of our people if we were to suggest that we could put an army of our own in the field against the Japanese.

As I have said, I have taken very little part in this discussion, not because I did not have some idea of what our west coast defences are, but because I felt it would not be very helpful to expose the weaknesses of our west coast defences by giving publicity to it in this house. Again, I realize that the government is faced with a great shortage of war material. It has been said in this discussion time and again that our men in training do not have a sufficient number of rifles and other necessary equipment. Criticism of that kind is really the easiest thing in the world to engage in, but I never felt inclined to indulge in it because I realize that the government is faced with a shortage of material and that if existing material is to be allocated to the best advantage it should go to the fighting units rather than to units in training. I know very little about these matters, but it seems to me that while you may be able to train a man without first-class equipment, you certainly cannot put him into the field and expect him to fight without such equipment. I have felt that the government had no other choice than to use the equipment available where it could be employed to best advantage.

After the hon. member for Vancouver South had finished, the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) spoke on the necessity or the desirability of Canada keeping her men at home. He said that the place to defend Canada is in Canada. I take it that most members agree that Canada is being defended to-day, but she is not being defended on the shores of the St. Lawrence or on the east or the west coast. Every Russian soldier who died on the battle-fields of Russia during last winter died, in my opinion, in the defence of Canada. Possibly he did not know that he was dying in the defence of Canada; nevertheless the circumstances are such that he did die in the defence of Canada. Either that or we are assuming that Hitler and his nazis are no threat to the north American continent or to Canada's place therein. Canada is being defended to-day in the mud and heat of Burma, in the North sea, on the Atlantic and on the Pacific. If Canada is not being defended in those places, if the enemy is not defeated in those places, in those far-away places, then it seems to me it will be very difficult, indeed it is highly improbable, that we shall be able to defeat the nazis when they land on Canada's shores. This is something that our isolationists should be told. Isolationism died, so far as the north American continent is concerned, even for the most dyed-in-the-wool isolationists, at Pearl Harbour. Evidently the significance of that fact has not reached some people in Canada even to this day.

In all kindness I suggest to the hon. member for Vancouver South that we are not going to create great enthusiasm for the war in Canada by saying that Hong Kong must be avenged. Hong Kong was a terrible disaster; it may have been more than that. But Hong Kong was only one of a great many incidents in this war; and when I say this war, I am assuming that this war started before September 1939. Nanking was another incident more horrible than Hong Kong. Yet it did not disturb us, and it is because these things did not disturb us that we are not going to raise a great deal of enthusiasm in the young men in our armed forces with the idea of revenge. I remember reading a statement by Wellington Koo made to the assembly of the League of Nations in 1937. He was pleading China's case before the league, asking for the assistance of the nations who were then members of the league. He said that in a very short time the sky would be black with chickens coming home to roost. Well, Hong Kong was just one of the brood coming home to roost.

To me, the issue in this war is not revenge. There are two issues that we must keep always and continuously before us. The first is to destroy completely and forever the conception that might is right, that force is the ultimate arbiter in international affairs. That is the nazi conception of international affairs, and that is why the nations of the world reluctantly had to take up the fight with nazi Germany. The second issue in the war is to bring the rule of law into the world, to maintain for everyone social, political and economic security and freedom. If we do not keep these things in mind; if we do not by deed as well as by word show that we are fighting for these things, we shall not get very far with appeals to hate or to revenge.

The other matter to which the hon. member for Vancouver South referred on Friday, compulsory military service for overseas: I am not sure that this is the proper time to discuss it. The question will have to be discussed, but I think it should be discussed at some other time rather than in connection with this resolution. While I agree with the hon. member that it is desirable that that question should be decided, particularly as far as the western hemisphere is concerned, nevertheless I believe that the greatest question facing this country is still the question of production, and that until our production reaches the point where we can supply not only all our fighting forces but also the men in training, the question of compulsory service is not of such great importance.

Mr. POTTIER: I wish to make a few remarks in connection with a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver South on Friday last, as reported on page 2068 of Hansard. His statement reads as follows:

> If the members from the minister's own province have not gumption enough to get up and urge that steps be taken to improve the defence of the Atlantic coast, I do not think it helps very much to accuse somebody else who speaks of the needs of the Pacific coast of being unfair to Canada. The onus is just the other way. I say, give the Atlantic coast everything they need, and I have pleaded for that, not as strongly perhaps as I might have for the needs of the Pacific coast because I do not know all the facts. I do not appreciate the minister or any member getting up here and making accusations against me in that way.

I am suggesting to the hon. member that that statement, particularly in conjunction with the use of the word "gumption", is objectionable, and quite frankly that is the reason why I am on my feet at this time. His statement is unfair, and I urge upon the hon. member in fairness to the members from the maritimes that he withdraw that statement. I do not think any hon. member from the maritimes would use a term like that about any other hon. member or a group of members from the Pacific coast.

Mr. HOMUTH: What would they say?

Mr. POTTIER: They would say, "Treat the two coasts in the same manner." That is all we on the Atlantic coast have ever asked for. We on the Atlantic coast have not asked for anything that is not coming to us, and such expressions as that used by the hon. member for Vancouver South are unfortunate and give a wrong impression. At the present time we are more in the war zone than the Pacific coast. We have submarines off our shores; we have sinkings in sight of land—

An hon. MEMBER: East is East and West is West.

Mr. GREEN: If the hon. member feels badly about that word, I am only too glad to withdraw it.

Mr. POTTIER: Thank you.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. GREEN: It would be unfortunate if there should develop a contest between hon. members from the far east and those from the far west with regard to what defences they get. As a matter of fact both of us have a hard enough time getting proper defences. I was, however, attacked the other day for supposedly thinking only of the western coast. I thought it was a most unfair statement to have made against me; it was on that account that I made the explanation I did. But I have no wish at all to hurt the feelings of any hon. members from Nova Scotia.

Mr. RALSTON: All I want to say is, I think my hon. friend can search what I have said from end to end and he will find no attack of any kind on him. What I said was that I was glad to recognize that there are two coasts and that sometimes I thought he had not given the same attention to that fact that he might have given.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think that is a very complimentary statement.

Mr. RALSTON: There was no suggestion of an attack. I read Hansard afterwards, and I think neither he nor any other hon. member will find any suggestion of the kind.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I have refrained from making any speeches in this debate because I am sure the minister does not need them. I will, however, make one suggestion to him in order to facilitate peace. I suggest that he have a condensed report of some of the strategic points brought forward by some of the armchair generals sent to Hitler and the latter will at once call the war off. It will be noticed that there has been a remarkable reluctance on the part of some hon. ex-soldier members to speak during this discussion. I am sorry that hon. members from the maritimes take offence at the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South; if he had had the pleasure I had the other night of partaking of a delightful lobster supper with hon. members from the maritimes, he would have made no such suggestion.

As to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), I am not congratulating the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson); I leave that to the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot); but the hon. member for Peel said something the other day that as a returned man I should like to endorse and that, in my opinion, 99 per cent of the private members endorse, namely, that neither the minister nor any other member of the government has yet offered a reasonable explanation for not granting the cost of living bonus in some form to soldiers' dependents. I can give the minister one suggestion as to where he could find the money to do that; if we abolished that museum of political inactivity known as the other place, it would pay quite a bit of the cost.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But look at all those people who want to go there.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Well, I am not a lawyer.

There is another thing which I should like to endorse and which if we as returned men did not endorse we would be derelict in our duty. No member of the government has given any reasonable excuse why at least for embarkation leave we cannot give free passage to every soldier in Canada.

I am not going to try to tell the minister how to defend the Pacific coast or the Atlantic, because I am not a military strategist. I have seen a collection of most gallant gentlemen round here for many days, who should be getting on with the war, instead of listening to speeches. A second reason is that I do not yet know what the coast defences are, and I do not think any private member here does.

Perhaps for the first time, but I hope not for the last time, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Vancouver East upon an excellent speech to-night. Generally I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South more than with the hon. member for Vancouver East, because there is a little south-east Vancouver war in our country. I do not think any private member can tell what the strategy should be for defending the Pacific coast, but I should like to ask the minister a couple of questions in that connection. I am not satisfied with the stand his staff has taken, as I understand it. Perhaps he will correct me if I am wrong; but, as I understand, his staff are perfectly satisfied that we have proper provision, in the event of attack on the Pacific coast, for taking reinforcements to the coast, either man-power or munitions, or the possible necessity of evacuation from Pacific coast cities. I am sure the minister has not been correctly advised through his staff; I presume the staff are aware—if not, they should be; there are enough of them—that we have no alternative highway or railway to get supplies in to the coast or people out from the Pacific coast in the event of attack. I am sure the minister has not been advised by his staff that the partial evacuation from Hastings park is now stretched along the trans-Canada highway in boxcars where bombs could be dropped by the most amateur Japanese saboteurs, putting either of the railways out of action.

Mr. MITCHELL: How can they get the bombs?

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I do not think you want me to point out the dates that powder was issued to Japanese in British Columbia, since Pearl Harbour, and neither you nor I know where that powder went. I will not say that this applies to the Canadian Pacific railway, but I do know that at one point immediately adjacent to the tracks of the Canadian National Railways in the Fraser valley there are two bridges, one for the Canadian Pacific and the other for the Canadian National. They crisscross the river at the identical spot. Any member from British Columbia knows where that point is, but I am sorry that some of the government and the staff do not know where it is. The trans-Canada highway also passes through there. One box of powder would put those three arteries out of action, and that is the only way there is to get in supplies from our arsenals in Quebec and Ontario and the interior of British Columbia. There would be no way to evacuate the people from the lower mainland of British Columbia, and no way to protect the air fields.

I am sorry that the minister did not know this. I do not claim to be a military strategist; but every person about ten years of age in British Columbia knows it. I do not wish to say what the Pacific defences are; I do not know. But I have a certain amount of common sense; and I know when you have Japanese, the most dastardly enemies we have, including Hitler, right alongside railway tracks, you have a dangerous condition. Our governor general went past there a short time ago, and the Japanese could have thrown a bomb from their car right into his private car, by reaching from one car to the other. Under such conditions we do not have a satisfactory defence on the Pacific coast, so far as the Japanese are concerned.

I should like to know what steps the Department of National Defence are taking to provide both an outlet from and an inlet to the Pacific coast from our arsenals—because the minister knows only too well where they are in British Columbia and elsewhere. I do not wish to be criticizing all the time—although I may have something to say to-morrow in connection with a criticism along another line. But I do say there has been too much time wasted. As one hon. member said the other day, probably he was wasting time; probably

I am wasting time to-night. But I certainly must tell the minister something his staff does not know. I must point out where our trans-Canada highway and our railways can be put out of action by one box of powder by the most dastardly enemy we have to-day, and no alternate route is being provided.

I am very much interested in the free transportation of soldiers. I am interested in this fact, as a supporter of the government, that in so far as I see the matter they have not as yet made any attempt to explain why we can pay a cost of living bonus to some of the higher paid civil servants, and cannot pay it to a mother with four children whose husband is at war. That has never yet been justified by the government, so far as I am aware.

There is another point I should like to make, as an old soldier—probably not a very good one, but nevertheless a soldier. I think I do know something about this, because I know the necessity for discipline. I would strongly urge upon the minister, not so much in his branch of national defence, but in another branch whose expenditures will come before us in a few days, that it is not conducive to discipline to have a bunch of fine young men continuously compelled by the law, as laid down in the King's Rules Regulations and Orders to salute a bunch of senior officers who have never been out of Canada, who never will go out of Canada, who are still pushing pens and always will be pushing pens. If the soldiers in this day and age knew how to adjust it as we did in the last war, they would adjust it in exactly the same way as we privates and non-commissioned officers did. We just ignored them, and would not salute them at all. I want to tell the minister and his staff that no good front-line officer, such as I served with, wants to be saluted. He is not parading around Ottawa at some cease-fire job.

But I am not interested in that point as much as in the other one. I am more interested in coast defence, in a fact which cannot be contradicted by anyone, namely that to-day it is possible for the Japanese to put both trans-Canada railways and the trans-Canada highway out of action with one handful of powder. Apparently no effort is being made by the staff to cover that; and apparently no effort is being made to provide an alternative route either into or out of the Pacific coast, in the event of attack, when that route could be provided for a very small sum of money.

Mr. RALSTON: First with regard to dependents' allowances and transportation, I think we had a lengthy discussion of these matters, and I have noted all that has been said. I would say again, however, in connection with dependents' allowances that whether or not my hon. friend and the committee are satisfied with it, my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in November announced a policy which was intended to cover that very situation. There was provision for a board of trustees whereby emergent, special cases and cases of need of any kind would be looked after. He announced, I believe, that it was far better, instead of making uniform uppings of all allowances, to provide for cases where need arose.

I have not before me to-night figures as to dependents' allowances paid in other places. But I do assure my hon. friend and the committee that our allowances are substantially above any others. I am not saying that they should not be higher still, but I do think that the matter has not been overlooked at all, in respect of the possible necessity for increases, on account of increased cost of living. I have, however, taken the matter under consideration and, as I promised the committee the other day, every attention will be given to it.

With respect to the other point mentioned by my hon. friend, I know the Department of National Defence covers a great many activities. But I do say to my hon. friend that the Department of National Defence does not cover, and does not take on as its responsibility, the evacuation of Japanese from British Columbia, or the guarding of the roads. That is simply impossible. The Department of National Defence is endeavouring to conduct and to prepare for military operations, and to defend against enemy armed forces. What my hon. friend is referring to is civil defence in Canada. Of course I will take note immediately of what he has said because, indirectly, it does affect defence. My hon. friend will understand that we have across Canada in many, many places points which are vulnerable, as has already been indicated. But they are not guarded, and cannot be successfully guarded by soldiers. It would not be a proper thing to do to use up our armed forces for that purpose. Those are police jobs, which are under civilian authorities, and should be controlled by them.

If my hon. friend had read an article some time ago written by J. Edgar Hoover of the federal bureau of investigation in the United States, he would have seen described the best delimitation one possibly could find of the duties of military and civilian authorities in connection with this matter of sabotage, and enemy action of that kind. It was there indicated that the federal bureau of investigation—not the secretary of state for war—undertook those tasks. They were undertaken not as a federal responsibility, but for the purpose of assisting those who owned plants, or civil authorities who had to do with roads, highways, bridges and things of that kind in order to see that they were guarded.

It is obvious that those places cannot be guarded by having a man walking up and down with a rifle, with bayonet attached, slung over his shoulder. Saboteurs do not come out in the open in that way. If you guarded a bridge in that way you would be more likely to find the saboteur under it than at the entrance to the bridge. All these are police jobs, and I mention it only to indicate to my hon. friend why, from a practical point of view, it is not the job of the Department of National Defence, or of a war department, to look after those matters. It is a civilian job.

Having said that, I wish to say secondly that I am not responsible, and I will admit no responsibility, nor is my staff responsible for the evacuation of the Japanese from British Columbia. There again I am vitally interested, because my hon. friend is quite right that I want to see to it that avenues to and from British Columbia are kept open in order that reinforcements and munitions may be moved in there, and in the most rapid manner. Our plans are with regard to the distribution of troops so that that can be done. I can only say to my hon. friend that I know nothing about the exact local conditions to which he refers, but I shall certainly bring the matter to the attention of my colleagues who have that problem in hand. If there is any necessity for guards or any necessity to move these Japanese from the place in which they are, I shall do my very best toward seeing that it is done. Let me say to him that, as I understand it, these Japanese are in the process of being moved from British Columbia. I understand that the reason why they are in these boxcars at the present time is because accommodation is not ready for them at the place to which they are to go. They are not going to stay there forever by any means. Just as quickly as accommodation is ready, they will be moved.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I think words have been imputed to me that I did not say. I do not blame the Minister of National Defence for this; but I do suggest, to use his own words, that any inlet into the province of British Columbia or the Pacific coast is a matter of national defence. I am not suggesting for one minute that the Department of National Defence should police these bridges or roads—

Mr. RALSTON: Or cars.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Or cars. What I am saying is that the Department of National Defence should not permit boxcar after boxcar loaded with Japanese to be left along the main inlet, in fact the only inlet to the Pacific coast defences. I am not saying that the Department of National Defence should do police duty, but I think that department should see that the civilian department responsible should move them off the main highway.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to say to my hon. friend in justice to my staff that I thought he was quite unfair when he suggested that the staff of the Department of National Defence were letting us down in that respect. The staff of the Department of National Defence are as vigilant as they can be in connection with the work they have to do, and many jobs have been placed on their shoulders from time to time. When a matter of this kind is brought to my attention, I shall see that it is brought to the attention of the proper minister.

Mr. WHITE: There are two or three matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and perhaps I can mention them all at once. The first point is in connection with reinforcements for the army overseas. In bringing up this matter I realize fully that the minister may be rather reluctant to make a statement or to give information on this subject; but at the same time he is no doubt aware, as are all hon. members, that during the past few months several hundred or perhaps several thousand officers, non-commissioned officers and men have returned to Canada from England. I think I am safe in saying that probably all hon. members must have heard the various reports—perhaps they are only rumours—as to the number of available reinforcements with the units and the holding companies in England. Various articles by different people have appeared in the press, and I would refer the minister to the Ottawa Citizen of Tuesday, April 28, which contains an article on this matter. I shall quote briefly from it, as follows:

> In a series of editorial articles, the Globe and Mail has suggested that many units of the Canadian corps overseas are lacking a proper supply of trained reinforcements. The same opinion was voiced by a man who was a distinguished staff officer in the last war in a recent issue of the Ottawa Journal.

And again:

> Captain David Croll, former mayor of Windsor, and a minister in the Ontario cabinet, has publicly declared on the floor of the Ontario legislature that the Canadian army needs reinforcements, and needs them badly.

And again:

> Colonel Ralston, the Minister of National Defence, met these criticisms with a blanket denial, and said that all the reinforcements requested by the corps commander had been supplied.

In the blue book of April, 1942, at page 14, it is stated that there are approximately 300,000 men in the active army, approximately half of whom are outside the country. If that statement is correct—and I believe it is—there would be in Canada somewhere around 150,000 men who have enlisted in the active forces and who are available to be sent overseas. Within the last two months I believe that a request has been made for a large number of reinforcements to proceed overseas. Could the minister tell the committee if the department was able to fill the quota, because I understand that the number asked for was not sent? I believe that in order to send as many as possible, training centres, district headquarters and other headquarters were cleaned out of men who were stenographers, clerks, storemen or men holding positions of that kind, who, because of their enlistment in the active force, had to proceed on draft.

I realize it is difficult to ask the minister to give actual numbers, but I think the committee should have some information as to whether or not there are sufficient trained active force men in Canada to make up any quota that might be required for overseas service. Perhaps the minister would also tell the committee if in his opinion and in the opinion of his staff officers there are to-day in England, either with the units or with the holding companies, sufficient reinforcements to guard against any emergency that might arise.

The minister has stated the new recruit requirements necessary for the present year for both active and reserve armies. In regard to the men required for the active army in the present year would the minister tell the committee the method by which the quota is established for each district. I understand that in the past the quota has been based upon the population of the district or upon the strength of the reserve army in the military district or upon the basis of voluntary enlistments in the past. Perhaps the minister can tell the committee later on just what he has in mind in setting the quota for each military district for men for the active force.

In regard to the number of men needed for the reserve army, which I understand will be some 50,000, and who are called out under the National Resources Mobilization Act, would the minister tell the committee what he proposes to do after the men in the age limit up to thirty years are exhausted? Is it the intention to extend the age limit to thirty-five years, or is it the intention to call married men up to thirty years who have no children?

[Mr. White.]

In regard to men called up for the reserve forces, I wonder whether this matter has been brought to the attention of the minister. After these men finish their training at the advanced training centres and are allotted to units, in many instances they are not allotted to units from the province in which they resided prior to enlistment.

Mr. RALSTON: Is that overseas?

Mr. WHITE: No, I am referring to the men in the reserve army. For instance, I understand there is a regiment in northern Ontario which has attached to it some 300 men from another province. I realize that it is sometimes difficult to attach men to units from their own province; but with Canada stretching over several thousand miles of territory and the present strain upon our transportation facilities, I submit that if troops were attached to units in their own province, not only would the transportation situation be improved but a great deal of the agitation and deputations and representations made to the minister for free transportation or further reduced fares would be done away with.

I should also like to bring to the minister's attention the case of boys who are to-day under seventeen and eighteen years of age. I understand that they cannot enlist in the active forces, and that under the restricted employment order the selective service officer cannot give these boys a permit to work in restricted trades. This works a distinct hardship upon boys who are unfortunate enough to be around seventeen and eighteen. If they cannot be accepted into the active army I think it is only fair that they should be given every opportunity to do war work or anything else. I do not want to suggest to the minister that the present regulations are a method of forcing them into the army—

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is speaking of boys of seventeen and eighteen?

Mr. WHITE: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Was my hon. friend right when he said that the selective service officer cannot give a permit to boys of seventeen to work in restricted trades?

Mr. WHITE: That is what I understand.

Mr. HOMUTH: Boys seventeen and over.

Mr. WHITE: Yes, and I understood the minister to say that a lad could not join the army until he was eighteen and a half years of age.

Mr. RALSTON: He can enlist at eighteen for trade training.

Mr. HOMUTH: But not in the fighting forces.

Mr. RALSTON: He cannot be sent overseas until he is nineteen.

Mr. WHITE: A boy would need certain educational qualifications to go into a trade.

Mr. RALSTON: He would not require any educational advantages which the ordinary boy of sixteen or seventeen would not normally have, just the ordinary school education.

Mr. WHITE: I hope the minister will consider that point because I feel that the regulations work a decided hardship on these young boys.

Some days ago when the minister was speaking about the reserve force units he promised to give a break-down of the number of men in the reserve, which he put at somewhere around 70,000. I asked for a break-down of these men into machine gun, rifle, artillery and other units. The break-down has not yet been given; but in the blue book of April of this year the number in the reserve forces is given at roughly 140,000 men. I have also a return brought down by the Minister of National Defence dated April 20, which I shall have to use because the break-down has not been given, which sets out the expenditure on the reserve forces for 1940-41 and 1941-42. It shows pay and allowances for the reserve army in 1940-41 at roughly $4,200,000, and for 1941-42, at $2,400,000, or just about one-half the amount spent in the previous year. This would indicate that there was just about one-half the number in the reserve army in 1941-42 as in 1940-41.

A day or so ago the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) brought to the attention of the minister the fact that non-commissioned officers had to revert to the rank of private before proceeding overseas on draft. I realize, of course, that there are two sides to the picture, that the officer commanding the unit in England probably wants to promote his own men who have served in the ranks. On the other hand, these non-commissioned officers have served in Canada for many months and have qualified, and naturally they do not wish to lose the increased pay which they receive as non-commissioned officers. I hope, before the committee rises, the minister will make some announcement as to whether they must continue to revert to the rank of private before proceeding overseas.

A few days ago the question of the educational standard required for obtaining a commission came up, and the minister stated that the recognized standard was junior matriculation. At that time I rather took from the minister's remarks that he thought I was objecting that people with educational qualifications below this standard had received commissions. I was endeavouring to point out just the opposite, that there to-day are hundreds of deserving men and non-commissioned officers who are quite capable of obtaining a commission who do not possess the educational standard of junior matriculation. In my unit there are two men who never attended high school, but who went over to England in 1939 as sergeants, and after about a year in England were recommended for a commission. They qualified at one of the schools in England and turned out to be two of the best officers in the unit. One of these men has been returned to Canada and is now giving instruction in the most advanced type of 1942 training. There must be hundreds of others in the same position. Would the minister tell the committee whether arrangements have been made whereby the standard of junior matriculation will not be set up to bar men and non-commissioned officers who have the other qualifications necessary to become officers?

Just before the house adjourned for the Easter recess the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) referred to the condition of many recruiting offices. I do not want to mention any particular recruiting offices, but I should like to join with the hon. member for Calgary West in what he said with regard to their general condition.

Mr. RALSTON: This situation has been corrected. It has been changed altogether.

Mr. WHITE: I was going to say that some of these recruiting offices are in a very dirty condition. I would also point out that many recruits are not taken into the army on the day they apply to enlist. To tell a recruit, "come back to-morrow", or "come back this afternoon", is wrong. If you talk to many of these recruits you will find that few of them have money; if they have, it is very little, and the matter of two or three extra meals or a night's lodging is of considerable importance. Nothing is more discouraging to a young boy who has the courage and determination to want to enlist than to be told by an orderly room sergeant, perhaps in a gruff and abrupt manner, "you will have to come back to-morrow; the medical officer cannot take anybody else to-day". I am very glad to hear the minister say that this condition has been remedied.

A few days ago, when I asked the minister about the syllabus used at Camp Borden, he agreed to put it on Hansard, and it is printed on page 1891. I am not complaining about the syllabus; it is perfectly all right; but I mentioned at the time that it might be only a paper syllabus, because it shows, at the advanced training centre, that the recruit fires a rifle 55 rounds, a machine gun 120 rounds, and an anti-tank rifle 32 rounds. On the day the minister was speaking about this matter, he stated, I believe, that he was not sure whether the recruit actually fired the number of rounds set out in the syllabus; but he spoke to the assistant chief of the general staff, who was present, and then stated that he was assured that the men did fire these rounds. I notice in looking over Hansard of Friday of last week that the minister stated that the recruit did not have a Lee-Enfield rifle on which to take musketry, but he remarked to the committee that in his opinion the recruit could be trained on the Ross or some other kind of rifle. I would point out to the minister that the only time the recruit has a Lee-Enfield rifle in his hand is when he lies down on a ground sheet at a range to fire his first group of practising.

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend talking now about basic or advanced?

Mr. WHITE: This is the advanced training centre. At the basic training centre he fires just a rifle. I should like the minister to have inquiries made at Camp Borden and to give the committee an assurance that every recruit who goes through Camp Borden advanced training centre actually fires the number of rounds on a rifle, machine gun and anti-tank rifle as shown in the syllabus which the minister put on Hansard at page 1890.

We have had one example of men proceeding from Canada overseas without being properly trained. I understand it was expected at the time the boys who went to Hong Kong were sent there that they would have time to continue and complete their training. At present, any recruit proceeding to England may find himself in action the day after his arrival. I do not think it is asking too much to request the minister to give this committee an assurance that every recruit who goes through any of our training schools does fire the actual number of rounds as shown on the syllabus. The minister, as an old soldier, knows that the firing of a rifle, a machine gun, an anti-tank gun or any other weapon is probably the most important part of the training.

I do not want to bring up again the question of allowances, because the minister has dealt with it quite fully, but there is just one question I should like to put to him. At the time the allowance board set up the rate of pay for the private soldier and the allowance to his wife, an advance was made in the soldier's pay from $1.10 to $1.30. What yardstick was used in setting the pay at $1.30, and the wife's allowance at $30 a month?

A few days ago the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) asked the minister with regard to the troops on leave who travel from the coast to the centre of Ontario, whether an allowance was made for the time spent in travelling. I am told that no allowance is made. The minister promised to ascertain the facts. If they are as I believe them to be, will he and his department give the matter consideration? I believe the minister will be the first to admit that a boy who lives in Ontario and has to travel there from the coast should not be penalized by having several days taken off his leave.

Finally, I would ask the minister if his department is considering a change in the type of steel hat worn by the private soldier. I have seen illustrations of new types of hats worn by the soldiers of the United States, Germany, France, and Japan.

Mr. RALSTON: I tried to make a note of each question as asked by my hon. friend and at the same time to listen to the next question he was putting, and I hope I have them all.

He asked first with regard to reinforcements. Naturally one must be arbitrary, because it is impossible to predict what will happen, but a scale was arrived at by Canadian military headquarters and the corps commander in consultation with the war office. The numbers of troops called for by that scale are overseas at the present time. My hon. friend will understand that I cannot give him the figures —he will not expect me to—but I can assure him and the committee that the troops provided for at full scale as laid down by the corps commander, and by Canadian military headquarters in consultation with the war office are overseas at the present time.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister mind telling the committee the various types of reinforcements, what he means by ancillary reinforcements, what he means by holding companies, reinforcements with the unit, or any other ones?

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I do not understand my hon. friend. Reinforcements are kept in what we called "holding units" in England, but the name has now been changed to "reinforcement units." There are reinforcement units for the infantry, the artillery, the machine gun battalions, signals and so forth. Some units have reinforcements of several arms, and reinforcements go to the various reinforcement units and from there to the active units as they are required. A very large reorganization has taken place in connection with the whole system of reinforcement units. As a matter of fact, the establishment of reinforcement units themselves, and the staff for their administration, have been very greatly enlarged in the last few months particularly because of the fact that we are preparing for the new organization which is taking place to provide for a more rapid assimilation of these men and for the better training of them so that they may be available that much more quickly and may be in better shape for the units to which they go.

Mr. STIRLING: Many hundreds are brought back for instructional purposes?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. That is with regard to the reinforcements. Three or four weeks ago I made a statement which was correct, and I am only repeating to-night what I said then.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am interested in this question of reinforcements, and that is about the only topic which I wish to discuss with the minister to-night. There has been a series of articles running in the press of one of the western provinces; and while I am not vouching for the accuracy of the figures there given, they are based in part at least upon a statement made by the minister on February 10 last and upon statements appearing in the little coloured books that come from the Department of National War Services. The minister will recall that on February 10, as reported at page 449 of Hansard, he made this statement:

> In the army to date over 295,000 men have been enlisted and its actual strength is over 255,000.

The difference is accounted for by wastage. Peace-time wastage has been about 40,000 men, and I must say I think that is a large figure having regard to the fact that these men have not been under fire. But I am not disputing the accuracy of that or the reason for it. Later on, as reported at page 451 the minister said:

> It should be remembered that apart from the fourth division and the brigade groups of the sixth division, we have in Canada over 90,000 active service personnel in training centres and elsewhere.

Therefore, according to the minister's figures, there were in the active army overseas a certain number, and by process of deduction I estimate the figure at 135,000. I will not ask the minister to give exact figures; I would not attempt to quote these figures were it not for the fact that he made reference to them, and reference is also made to them in the leaflets "Canada At War." The figures are 135,000 men overseas, and 120,000 in Canada. The figures given by the minister are about the same figures as given by the government publications. The last one I have had occasion to examine is now a little obsolete—February 1, 1942—in which this statement appears:

> The Canadian active army is composed of more than 265,000 men, about half of whom are serving outside of Canada.

A certain number of these men outside Canada were at certain strategic points not in the United Kingdom. I have no means of knowing just how many were in the colonies, but let us say as an estimate—and perhaps I am not very far wrong—that these number 5,000 men. That may not be accurate, I do not know. As I say, I have no means of knowing.

Mr. RALSTON: How many did my hon. friend say?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am estimating that 5,000 were not in the United Kingdom. That would leave 130,000 in Britain. What is the disposition of these 130,000 men in Britain? According to the same report, or one number of this series of reports, it is stated:

> Canada now has in Britain the first, second, third and fifth (armoured) divisions, a tank brigade and a large force of ancillary troops.

That gives a running picture of the troops over there.

> In every division there is a postal unit, a provost company, a field hygiene section, dental detachments, a salvage unit, a mobile bath, and other services to care for the needs of 17,000 men. Behind are a host of corps and army troops numbering at least half the strength of the divisions themselves.

Thus it would appear to me—and I make this calculation myself—that in the four divisions and tank brigades we have approximately 70,000 men, and in the corps and army troops 35,000, or a total of 105,000 men; and the ancillary troops, are, as I apprehend, not connected with the fighting services at all. They are such as the forestry corps, engineer units engaged in tunneling and road building, very large headquarters staffs in London, pay and postal services, and I have seen that estimated at 12,500. These figures are only approximate. They may be away out of line with the truth. I do not know, and I have not taken the trouble to have the figures verified by headquarters, nor have I asked the minister to give them. If, however, I am anywhere near right, it leaves a very small number of men in the holding units for reinforcement purposes in England.

I am not going to ask the minister to give them. He has stated to-night that according to a formula which has been set down—I think I heard him say by a war office corps commander—a certain quota for reinforcements for England, for the fighting forces, had been established and was being lived up to. That is reassuring, but I should like to know whether that quota is based on peace-time activity or war-time activity. That is the vital point which we should know. The minister knows that from 20 to 50 per cent of an army may be wiped out in a single action.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, no, not an army.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, a corps.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or a division, then, may be wiped out in a single action. The casualties may be very large. I should like to know whether the quota which the minister says has been established is anything like the quota which was in existence in 1918. As I understand the history of that war, we had 100,000 men in the active army on the field in France. We had 100,000 in reserve in the rear and 100,000 men in England as reinforcements. Have we anything like that position to-day? That is the gist of the question which I ask the minister for the purpose of getting information—and I will invite him to go as far as he can without divulging what he may consider a military secret, because if I have asked too much I drop the question immediately. I want him to understand that my question is not for the purpose of causing embarrassment but in order to have a reassurance. The question is this: Is the quota of reinforcement personnel in England, in connection with these holding units, based on peace-time wastage or on anticipated war wastage? If it is based on peace-time wastage, I have no doubt it would be ample; but my anxiety is this: If the Canadian corps goes into action in 1942—and it is quite possible it will go into action in 1942—have we personnel in England, trained men, in sufficient numbers to take care of probable battle wastage?

I want to know first if the quota is based on a peace-time position or on probable wastage after the Canadian corps has been in action. I have some grave doubts, but I do not know; I am asking for information. I say frankly, if the minister cannot give me that information publicly, do not give it, for I do not want to embarrass the authorities. But I think the people of Canada and the people who have sons and husbands overseas would like to have some assurance from the minister that the quota is ample for reinforcements in case there are battle casualties.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to express my appreciation of my hon. friend's approach to the matter; I accept what he says 100 per cent, and I want to go just as far as I can. I have no reservations to make in my mind, but I have reservations to make as to numbers. I know nothing about the number required at any one time; I know the quota is based on such and such a percentage for infantry, such and such a percentage for artillery, and such and such percentages for different arms of the service. That is, experience shows that there are different rates of casualties for different arms of the service. I have just noted here a formula which I think is correct. This is not any cut-and-dried formula, but is based on an approximation by those who, I believe, are competent, the best approximation they can make of what would likely be needed under conditions which can reasonably be anticipated.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Does that mean battle conditions?

Mr. RALSTON: Whatever conditions they anticipate; I presume that they took into account the possibilities and probabilities, and that that quota is ample for the purpose. I am talking about those overseas.

In addition, my hon. friend will understand that, as I mentioned the other night, we have in training centres in Canada active reinforcements of over 40,000 as well. I cannot go further than that, but I can tell my hon. friend that the quota and the basis on which it is figured are made by people whom I believe to be competent, in whom I have confidence, and that is the quota we are endeavouring to live up to. I have here the figures of those who have gone over, and they are somewhat in excess of the actual figures laid down. But that is nothing one way or the other because it is an arbitrary figure.

My hon. friend mentioned the last war. It is difficult to make comparisons, but I looked up some figures and I find that at the end of the war, November, 1918, there were in France 153,431; reinforcements, 12,214, and reinforcements immediately available in England, 3,323, or practically 10 per cent immediately available. But there were potential reinforcements in France in considerably larger numbers; I have not the figure before me.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is meant by "potential" reinforcements.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not know; I suppose men in hospital.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Men behind the lines anyway.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend must remember that if there is a holocaust or anything of that kind, a lot of men in England have been used for the formation of new units; a number of these are base and line of communication units, and if an emergency should occur, they can be used. But there is the situation in regard to reinforcements, and it has been brought to that state by constant attention. As a matter of fact, the adjutant-general has been giving as much attention to that as to anything he has been doing since he has occupied the post. We are determined that that quota shall be kept up, and if the quota is raised we will go to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course we are all in agreement that this is one of the most important things to which the staff can give attention, the reinforcement of the men likely to be in action.

Mr. RALSTON: There is no doubt about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I feel relieved to a degree by the assurance given by the minister, even though he cannot give me the actual percentages or figures in relation to the reinforcements overseas. I suppose he gives that on the basis of representations made by his staff, in whom he has confidence, and who of course have no object whatever in misleading him.

I think it would be well to give publicity to this discussion. I am glad I brought it out, because I think it will be reassuring to the people of Canada. If it should happen that this percentage of reinforcements is not sufficiently large, of course it is the task of the staff to raise it.

Mr. RALSTON: We shall just have to bring it up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope the officials in making this quota have not been unduly influenced by the fact that the Canadian corps in England has not yet been in action. Surely we must look to the time when a second front is opened in Europe, or whatever eventuality may happen. We must anticipate the time when there will be battle casualties, and the wastage of 1,500 while the troops are not active will have no relation to the wastage in battle.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the second question asked by my hon. friend was with regard to how the quotas were made up and sent to the different districts. Was that for the active army?

Mr. WHITE: For the active army, by military districts according to population.

Mr. RALSTON: There was a table given last November in which the adjutant-general made a statement as to just how these quotas were made up, and I think that applies to-day. I have not asked the adjutant-general except just across the table here to-night, and he tells me it does.

Mr. HOMUTH: That was not on the basis of population.

Mr. RALSTON: No, three things: population, the militia activity in the particular district, that is both the number of active units that have been raised and the reserve units as well; and the recruiting record of the district.

Mr. HOMUTH: Prior enlistment.

Mr. WHITE: I have that table, and I just wanted to know if that would be followed.

Mr. RALSTON: Can my hon. friend give me the reference to it?

Mr. WHITE: I have not Hansard here.

Mr. RALSTON: I was going to show it to the adjutant-general. It was made up by one of the young men in his office.

Mr. BOUCHER: While the minister is on that subject could he give the committee any insight as to the scheme of priorities to be embarked on in the future, namely what classes he is calling?

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I cannot give the statement to-night. The question of the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough was what is proposed to be done when the present age limit up to thirty is exhausted, whether we would go to thirty-five in single men or take married men without children. That matter has not been discussed, it is one primarily for national war services, although my department is interested. It will be discussed soon. I can only say that announcement will be made by the Minister of National War Services in due course. If there are any suggestions I should be glad to hear them.

Mr. WHITE: If the minister wants 10,000 men, does he just ask the Minister of National War Services to have that number called up, or has the minister anything to do with the way in which those men are selected and called?

Mr. RALSTON: I think I can say I have not anything whatever to do with the method or way in which they are called up. I make a request of the Minister of National War Services in which I say that I hereby make a requisition for blank men for military training service on the blank of blank, details of which are set out in the annexed schedule.

Then in the schedule I say that I want so many men at the basic training centres at X, Y and Z; the number required of English-speaking, and the number required of French-speaking; so many at such other training centre, and so on, and so on. Each training centre is itemized. That is to say, a distribution is made between the training centres. But there is no statement whatsoever as to the age groups which are to be called.

Mr. HOMUTH: That is up to the Department of National War Services?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, entirely.

Mr. GREEN: Has the army nothing to say about the age groups which it is to get into the forces?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. GREEN: Should the army not have some opinion?

Mr. RALSTON: The army has an opinion, in this way, that a proclamation is made on the recommendation of the Minister of National War Services that men are to be called up, up to such and such an age. Within the ambit of that proclamation the Minister of National War Services calls them up.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister say the numbers of men available in the different age groups? Has the government figures on that?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure it has, but I do not have them with me. That information is gathered together in two places, namely, the Department of National War Services and, now particularly, by the director of national selective service.

Mr. WHITE: Will the number of men who are going to be called in the next few months greatly exceed the number called in the past year? The return I have, dated April 20, 1942, indicates that there had been only 44,846 called. If there are not going to be more than that called in the next year, you will certainly not exhaust the age limit from twenty-one to thirty.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend must not be sure about that. I am advised, just as my hon. friend is advised, that it will not be long before we shall exhaust the age groups. Up to what date is the hon. member referring?

[Mr. White.]

Mr. WHITE: This is dated April 20, 1942.

Mr. RALSTON: The last call is what date?

Mr. WHITE: It does not say.

Mr. RALSTON: I think it would be April, as my hon. friend knows. Generally speaking, what we are planning for is to train 15,000 or more men a month—that is, 180,000 a year. That is, those who are general service men, and those called under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. BOUCHER: The minister said there was going to be selection by lot; when does that come into effect?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot say. I believe that is another announcement which was made by the Minister of National War Services. That announcement was made at the time the proclamation was passed extending the age limit to thirty. I do not know when it is going into effect.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The Prime Minister announced it in his statement to the house.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister referred to the calling up of 180,000 a year for general service, and in the home defence. In what ratios would they be called—fifty-fifty?

Mr. RALSTON: No; as a matter of fact, I am making an absolute minimum of 5,000 a month under the National Resources Mobilization Act. There will always be enough to fill up the 15,000. But suppose there are 12,000 enlisted for general service in the month, I would still call the 5,000 under the National Resources Mobilization Act. I want the committee to understand that we are limited there only by training facilities and instructors. There are not unlimited training and instruction facilities. We are extending our training centres by 50 per cent. In fact we are doing more than that, and in some instances we are going back to the custom at the time of the last war. That is to say, we are taking a unit which is partly trained and sending men to it to train with that unit, after having them paraded at the basic training centre, in order that we may have more training facilities. As a matter of fact, some of the men called are going to special training centres which will have units to take charge of the training.

I am mentioning that only to indicate that we are allowing some flexibility in the matter of training accommodation in order to see to it that all the general service men who are enlisted are trained, and that we have the minimum of 5,000 men, and whatever more are needed to bring us up to the 15,000 a month.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It will be in ratio of two to one, for the general service.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, it would be, if it came to 10,000.

Another point with which I have great sympathy is the one raised by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough with respect to the allocation of personnel called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, to units from the territory or province from which they come. I found that situation out west, and there was a great deal of complaint. One Pacific coast unit in particular was feeling badly because the men from the middle west had been sent to it. It was simply a case where there were not sufficient men in that particular area at that time, and that unit had to be filled up, with the result that those men were sent in. That was the unit to whose commanding officer I said, "You are saying that we must have an all-out war effort, but you have a unit here which needs men. Those men are available. It does not seem to me that you should simply turn down these men because they do not happen to be from your particular area, or the area from which your unit comes." I said I sympathized with him sincerely, but at the same time we got through in the last war, and we did not turn our noses up at men from the west in the battalion I knew something about. We did not turn up our noses at men from the Pacific coast, the middle west, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Winnipeg or anywhere else. I am afraid we shall have to take the same attitude to some extent in this war. Let me say, however, that every possible effort is being made to see to it that men are alloted to units from their particular territories, just as far as that can be done. Sometimes operational reasons make it necessary that units be filled with men from other places.

With regard to the men of seventeen and eighteen years, I believe that is really a question for the Department of National War Services rather than for my department. I have said that as far as I am concerned men can enlist at eighteen for trade training. What my hon. friend is suggesting—and as a matter of fact I had forgotten it—is that the regulations which provide that men of seventeen and eighteen must have permits before they can enter restricted occupations, should be changed. I shall be glad to take that matter up with the Minister of National War Services, and see if it can be done. I am in sympathy with it. The ages of seventeen and eighteen are not, I think, on those regulations for the purpose of forcing men to enlist. At eighteen if a man can enlist in a trade it seems a pity to have him go into a non-essential civilian occupation.

Mr. HOMUTH: Under the man-power bill many industries which are employed 100 per cent on essential war work—I have in mind the textile industry, the shoe industry and many others—are classified as non-essential. I realize that the thought behind it is to drive men out of industry and into the army, and to fill their places with women. There is no denying that that is the object behind it. But here are thousands and thousands of boys who will be coming out of the high schools within the next few weeks. They cannot be employed in the industries in which they are so much needed. Those industries are classified as non-essential, whereas they are just as essential as many others. As I have said, the object is to drive men out and to replace them with women.

There is no reason whatever why these seventeen-year old boys should not be able to go into those industries which are working on war work and which are classed as non-essential under the act. They could go in for three or four months and do a very important job. To-day the only thing they can do under the act is to go on farms—the majority of them would be useless—or go into a munitions plant or a plant classified as an essential industry. Most of these boys would be useless in such plants because the type of men required are trained mechanics such as lathe men, machinists and so forth. These seventeen-year old boys are placed out on a limb, and yet these industries which are essential to the war but which are not classified as essential are denied the right to hire them. The industry of which I know the most is the textile industry, and the man-power handicap there has created a serious situation. We could overcome much of this if we had an opportunity of hiring these boys during the summer months, but we cannot; the only boys we can hire are those under seventeen years of age. It would be an easy matter to have an order in council passed to permit industries engaged in war work but classified as non-essential to employ these boys. It is only a matter of two or three weeks before they will be coming out of school and I think such provision should be made.

Mr. RALSTON: What I have said I meant, that is that I shall bring the matter to the attention of my colleague, the Minister of National War Services. I appreciate the last sentence of my hon. friend's remarks, to the effect that this matter should be dealt with at once.

In connection with the request for a breakdown of the reserve army, with the permission of the committee I will not place this on Hansard but send a memorandum to the hon. member who has requested it.

With regard to the pay and allowances of the reserve units and the number in the reserve army, I may tell my hon. friend that last year the pay and allowances were limited to 50 per cent of the strength. I am not suggesting that as the reason for the difference in the pay and allowances paid in 1940-1941 and in 1941-42. Some one asked whether there had been any increase in the reserve army, that is, the reserve army apart from the supernumeraries. I said there were about 80,000, but on February 14, the last date on which weekly returns were returned, the exact number was 78,322. The strength on March 31, excluding supernumeraries again, was 91,370, the increase being principally on account of National Resources Mobilization Act men posted directly to the unit—not as supernumeraries. Since that time enlistments have been considerable. Another month has elapsed, and I am sorry that I have not the figures up to date.

Mr. WHITE: Does the minister agree that this system of 50 per cent pay and allowances for the reserve force units should be continued? They have now to pool their pay. If a man gets full pay he receives only 60 cents. I am sure the minister will agree with me that there is no reason under the sun why these reserve force units should be expected to pool their pay. At the end of the training season, instead of a man's pay working out at $1.30, it works out at only 75 or 80 cents. Is that system going to be continued?

Mr. RALSTON: I gave the officers commanding the reserve units on the Pacific coast the assurance that I give the committee now that the present plan for the payment of the reserve army up to strength will be continued. There will not be a cut to 50 per cent.

Mr. WHITE: Every man will get his full pay?

Mr. RALSTON: Unless he pools his pay, and that is a matter for the man. As far as we are concerned, we will pay the men who go to camp.

My hon. friend raised another point which has been raised before, with reference to non-commissioned officers having to revert when they go overseas. My hon. friend has stated as clearly as he could, and better than I can, the reasons why this is done. The obvious reason is that there are men in England who have been working their heads off to obtain promotion, and they feel it is not quite fair that a man should come over with stripes and perhaps take a place in their unit senior to them. My hon. friend asked me to make an announcement, but I am sorry that I cannot. The matter is under active consideration by the adjutant-general in consultation with the overseas authorities. General McNaughton, when he was over here, and the chief of the general staff had a talk with regard to it, because it affects officers as well as men. I certainly will keep it in mind and endeavour to work out some possible solution. That is the most I can say.

With regard to the standard of education required for officers, I agree with my hon. friend that there are cases—he has given instances—where an officer who is not able to meet the standard of education does just as fine, or perhaps a better job than those who can meet it. The requirement for an officer is junior matriculation or some equivalent examination. I have asked the adjutant-general whether any exceptions have been made, but he cannot tell me of any. I will see if there is any possibility of making provisions for special cases. As I have said before, however, the hard cases make bad law. Once you let down the bars you are in difficulty. I do not mean that just with reference to headquarters, because we can stand the headaches if it is the proper thing to do, but you are likely to get into a lot of difficulty and have to face charges of discrimination if you begin to make exceptions.

With regard to recruiting offices, my hon. friend will find me more emphatic than he has been with regard to the necessity of the first place the prospective soldier goes into not being dirty, and being in good shape. I have asked the civilian director of recruiting, Colonel Mess, and the adjutant-general, to keep this in mind. I may say that we have erected in Canada some special recruiting offices of standard design. These will be attractive, and I assure the committee they will not be expensive. They will make up for the odd holes and corners which have had to be used in the past in some instances as recruiting offices. I agree that where possible the medical examination should take place where a man offers himself for recruiting so that he can get through in the one day. If that can be done, it is all to the good. To have an attractive recruiting office and an attentive man in charge is like having a good looking girl at a switchboard as the first person a person sees when he goes into an office. My hon. friend has spoken of the gruff manner of recruiting sergeants, and I know that there are exceptions in which that does take place.

Mr. WHITE: Where the recruit has to come back to enlist the next day, does the minister not think some provision should be made for his messing and staying overnight? In the city of Ottawa many boys are told to come back the next day. Where are they going to get their supper?

Mr. RALSTON: I find that in the ordinary case they do get their supper and get looked after, but I must say that it is not official. I would think as a general principle—perhaps I am going too far without thinking it over—that where it is due not to the fault of the man but to pressure of work that he cannot be taken care of the same day, some provision should be made for looking after him. I must say that, to be frank.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister also suggest to his recruiting officers that they should be very careful not to make statements to the men that are not absolutely true? I have at least six cases—too many to be accidental—where the men have assured me that the recruiting officer told them they were subject to certain conditions, and afterwards they found out that it was not so. I was told afterwards that the recruiting officer had no business to make such a statement. I think they should be warned to be careful in what they say and not state the conditions differently from what will ultimately obtain.

Mr. RALSTON: That very point has been emphasized in an order that has been sent out. Somebody may say: "Oh, yes, but the orders are not looked at." Let me say that it was emphasized at the last meeting of the district recruiting officers which was held only a short time ago. It is a fundamental matter, and my hon. friend is perfectly right. There is danger, particularly with an inexperienced recruiting officer anxious to get recruits, that he will become a salesman instead of an adviser. It seems to me that if a man cannot go to a recruiting officer, ask for advice and rely on the information he is given, the recruiting officer has failed in his job. I certainly will see that that point is kept before the recruiting officers. I think the officers we have now pretty well understand it and are living up to it.

Mr. LOCKHART: Would the minister make sure that the recruiting officers differentiate, in speaking to the recruits, between the dependent's allowance for a mother and the dependent's allowance for a wife? The recruiting officers fail to make that distinction, and it causes confusion and disappointment.

Mr. NEILL: Hear, hear. That is what I was referring to.

Mr. CHURCH: I do not know anything that has caused so much confusion among the students attending high schools, collegiate institutes and technical schools in Toronto as the recent rules and regulations made in respect of young people, sixteen, seventeen and eighteen years of age entering restricted occupations in industry and war plants and joining the army. As you know, Mr. Chairman, some of the larger secondary schools of Toronto and of the county of York have as many as fifteen hundred to two thousand day students, while the night classes of the Toronto technical school and the northern vocational school have some 8,000 students. Those of that age are the type of student who want to enlist as soon as they can. They want to help. I was sorry that the minister, owing to hard work, has been unable to come to Toronto and see the work they are doing in these secondary schools, but I know he cannot be everywhere at the same time. In the past month I have seen magnificent parades of the cadet corps of some of the secondary schools in the Toronto district including some of the county of York. The cadet movement has always been the boon of the militia units. I have never seen anything like the parade they put on about half-past eleven or a quarter to twelve in the morning in some schools, marching around the streets near their schools to help to educate the people to a total war effort.

There is a great deal of confusion over the recent regulation as to those of sixteen, seventeen and eighteen in regard to restricted trades and getting into industry. I was talking to the principals of three collegiate institutes about the new orders in council this last week-end and have been receiving letters from citizens on the subject. I know that some of the war industries in the Toronto district are refusing to take on young people of these ages from the high schools because of the regulation with respect to persons from seventeen to forty-five years of age. It handicaps these industries in taking young people on, although they want to because they are good workers in holidays. We have a large number of large and small war industries in the Toronto district and many of the students of these ages at our high schools and collegiates would like to work in them in the summer as in the past so that they can go to university. These young people are the backbone of recruiting before and during the war for the reserve army. I spoke on their behalf in the last house, when the minister's predecessor was here, in 1936, 1937, 1938, 1939, when many of our young people were riding the rods in the summer looking for work. That is the type of youth that has gone to the war without any compulsion. The oldest regiments in Toronto are filled with youths of that type, sixteen, seventeen and eighteen years of age. Some units pick a particular school; some others form a cadet corps.

I am sorry that this regulation in regard to restricted industries was passed affecting those seventeen and eighteen years of age, and those from seventeen to forty-five. The high schools are nearing the end of the term, and many will be closing about the first of June, or earlier than usual. Many of the young people attending them want to make a little money this summer in order to go to university. I know some of them at North Toronto collegiate, a few at Lawrence Park collegiate, and others at Parkdale collegiate, Malvern, Riverdale and Humberside, and all the other collegiates. I started on the board of education, and I still take a great deal of interest in those attending school and in education work. Some of the fathers of these young people want their boys to go in the army, would rather see them in the army because, owing to the new regulations, they cannot, if of the age of seventeen, get work in the summer. Three youths near where I live in Eglinton riding are affected by these regulations, and rather than take a chance on getting work in the summer they joined the manning pool in the Royal Canadian Air Force last week. I saw them walking on the street yesterday in air force uniforms.

It is a great mistake to handicap our youth of these ages with all these regulations. If we had taken the right methods some years ago—it is not the fault of the present minister that the young people who rode the rods a few years ago did not get a fair deal from parliament—and had adopted an apprenticeship system such as I urged in 1936 and 1937, these young people would have signed up for three years as apprentices with military training and had lodging, pocket money, drill, clothing, and would have been learning some trade in key industries of many kinds. As a result, when the war broke out, we would have had 25,000 skilled mechanics available in the air force alone for service. That was the policy for which I worked hard for three or four years before the war. Some such policy has now been adopted in part in conjunction with the provinces, and that work is going on at Galt and other places of vocational training, in relation to the war, as I advocated prior to the war on many occasions.

To-day there is so much confusion over the regulations that nobody seems to understand them or how they will be applied to the high schools. I have read the regulations; they are most conflicting and confusing, and scare war industries from giving work to those of seventeen years of age, and I cannot advise anybody regarding them. Some young people from our collegiates in Toronto have tried to get into the plants at Toronto and others into small arms plants. Some young people working in drug stores, boys of fourteen to sixteen, who earned $4 a week after school, have been let out. I do not know where it is going to end. Why penalize these youths whose fathers are at the war? These regulations are not fair and proper. I know the minister has taken a great deal of interest in education and cadet services, and I hope he will see that something is done for the youth of our country to clarify these rules which at present may bear heavily on the population of our secondary schools. Some of these of sixteen or seventeen years of age want to go to Toronto university, or to the school of science, but if they cannot work in war plants and make a little money in the summer they cannot go to the university. The various boards of education should have been consulted before any such regulations were passed. Some school boards before the war abolished the cadet movement in the schools, although the government has done a great deal of good work to restore it. I know the present Minister of National Defence would not have struck out the cadet vote when it came before the house four or five years ago, if he had been here because he knows what the militia owe to it. A great many of our young people of seventeen and eighteen are joining the air force as a result of this army rule. They are splendid young people, as anyone can see by the parades such as I saw in Toronto the other day.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has just reinforced what has already been said on this point. At the moment I cannot say more to the committee than that it had not been borne in forcibly on my mind that this regulation did affect the seventeen-year olds. As I say, it was not in my department, but I was a member of the government which passed the regulation and take full responsibility for it. I realize also that if any change is to be made, it must be made at once, in view of the young people coming out of the schools. I am not justified in raising any hopes, but I certainly will see that it is discussed with the Minister of Labour, the Minister of National War Services, and the director of national selective service, because I appreciate what has been said and the interest which these young people have in the matter.

The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough mentioned the syllabus, particularly the firing syllabus, at Camp Borden. My instruction is that it is not a paper syllabus and that these rounds are fired. I rather gathered from what he said that he had some information that they were not being fired. As a matter of fact, the chief of the general staff has been at Camp Borden this week, going through all these training centres—by the way, with Brigadier Weeks, in charge of training. I shall certainly see to it that the objective is met, and that the number of rounds are fired—I do not say the exact number of fifty-six or thirty-two, but what are necessary in order to make these men familiar with their weapons.

My hon. friend said something to the effect, if I understood him aright, that the only time a man had a Lee-Enfield in his hand was when he fired. That is not so, at the advanced training centres.

Mr. WHITE: I remember that a week or two ago I asked the minister about the number of rifles at Camp Borden, and I think he then admitted there were not sufficient for each man. I know that every soldier there does not have a Lee-Enfield. They have a great many Ross rifles that do not have bolts.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member is talking about a basic training centre?

Mr. WHITE: Does the minister mean that every recruit in an advanced training centre has a Lee-Enfield rifle?

Mr. RALSTON: No, I did not say "everyone," but I know there are a very considerable number, and I am quite satisfied that it is not only just in firing that the man at the advanced training centre has an opportunity of handling the rifle.

Mr. WHITE: Is the recruit taught his musketry on a Lee-Enfield rifle?

Mr. RALSTON: Is the hon. member talking about basic?

Mr. WHITE: We will take the advanced. I think the minister said there were no Lee-Enfields on basic.

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, there are plenty of Lee-Enfields on basic. I was disputing with the hon. friend for York West the other day with regard to Ross rifles. He was suggesting that there are a great number of Ross rifles at basic training centres. I find that at perhaps one-fourth of the basic training centres there are Ross rifles, but at the rest there are Lee-Enfields, that is the ·30s. There are enough at a great many of the basic training centres to give training to practically every man. The Lee-Enfield is used in all but about nine of the thirty-seven training centres.

Mr. STIRLING: But besides that, there are Springfields in a number of them, are there not?

Mr. RALSTON: I called them Lee-Enfields; I meant the Springfields. The ·30 rifle is a Springfield. I understand that these rifles are at all of the basic training centres excepting nine. My hon. friend asked me if I said that there is a rifle for each man. There is not a rifle for each man at the advanced training centres, and my hon. friend will realize that probably it is not necessary that there should be. But I should be happy to show him these figures, and I am sure he would be quite reassured to learn how many rifles there are. I am sure there are plenty to enable every man to have not only an opportunity to handle them when firing but to handle them at regular musketry work.

Mr. MAYHEW: There are a few matters upon which I should like to get some information which would be of some encouragement to the people of British Columbia, particularly those on Vancouver island.

The minister during the Easter recess spent a week on the coast—and I assure the committee it was a very busy week—visiting the different army quarters, conferring with the officers and the staff. I am sure there was not very much that he left out. Nevertheless I want to bring a couple of points to his attention.

We on the Pacific coast are satisfied that in the four-man command which has been set up we have four excellent men. We have confidence in their judgment, and we believe that they are attentive to their duties. We should like to feel, however, that the recommendations which are made by the men in the field are carried out as far as it is possible for Ottawa to do so. Occasionally we hear from a man who has recently been discharged—those who are still in the army do not complain to one like myself—that if Ottawa would carry out the recommendations given by the senior officers on the coast we would have much better protection.

I know that the protection upon the Pacific coast has greatly increased since December.

I am sure the minister was well satisfied with it by contrast with what existed there just a few months before. He has assured us that the two coasts will get full consideration as far as it is possible to furnish them with supplies of both men and material. He is not a man to make statements which he does not intend to carry out, and in that regard we are, I think, generally satisfied. We hope that supplies will increase considerably as the national production increases.

We are particularly pleased with the announcement he has made as far as the reserve army is concerned. Up to a short time ago that force was not very welcome; it did not get much encouragement unless it was producing recruits for the active army. During the Easter recess I asked the general officer commanding if he would give me a list of the units and the number of men of which each unit was short. This he did, and I undertook to see some of the civilians in Vancouver island between Victoria and Nanaimo to ask them if they would make it their job to see that these units were filled up. Invariably the statement made to me was, "Give us a definite job to do. Let us know what it is. If they will agree to give us supplies, we will see that every unit is filled, and more too." In one place where they had only a platoon, when I asked them if they would see that it was filled up, they said, "Yes. Get away from the idea that we are a recruiting centre, and we will not only fill up this platoon but give you a company from this one point."

It is said by some that the industrial people were not quite prepared to get behind the reserve army because it interfered with the operations in their plants. That is hardly a fair statement. The manufacturers in British Columbia are prepared to assist in seeing that their men go to the camp even if it does disturb their operations considerably, but there is one handicap in that. Once they start recruiting in a plant, nearly all the men want to go to the one unit, which means that out of 100 or 200 men you are apt to have twenty or twenty-five men going at one time to the camp, and that is a serious drawback. If there were some way of dividing up so that the men would go to the camps at different times, it would relieve that situation considerably.

The situation I want to speak of concerns our police. In British Columbia we have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the provincial police and the municipal police. They work very well in peace time, but what is going to happen when a strain falls on the police force in case of a raid or under some unusual circumstances? Who will actually control the police force at that time? There should be one head, and the question should be settled now instead of waiting until the condition actually arises to decide who is to take the lead. The principle of one command is recognized, and there should be definitely one command as far as the police force in British Columbia is concerned.

Again, we have another group of voluntary men on the island known as the rangers. Recently they have recruited, and they have now a strength of about 6,000 men who are ready to step in behind the regular army, the reserve army, under the British Columbia command. These men are centred around the forest rangers camp, the wardens and the loggers, and they are men who know every road and trail across the island and who can be very valuable in case of attack. I wonder what support this government is giving to these men who call themselves rangers? What support will the government give them to make sure that they are a useful adjunct to the defence of Vancouver island? It will be noticed I am not worrying about the other part of Vancouver. They do not need to worry; the Japs will never get past us. We are trying to build up a protective force. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) smiles.

Mr. GREEN: I hope the hon. member is right.

Mr. MAYHEW: I think they should be given some encouragement. We have, in addition to that, a situation which I think is more serious than almost anything else. I refer to the danger of forest fires. If the enemy come, they can sweep over the island from north to south, drop leaflets, and set the whole island on fire, and it will take more help than we have in all our forces to fight such a fire, to say nothing of defending the island itself when that occurs. There is only one other source from which we can draw our supply, namely from the ordinary civilians, and I think something should be done now, envisaging the worst that might happen to us—not simply what may happen, but what is very likely to happen. I suggest that the last man on Vancouver island should be called or at least should be available for the purpose of fire-fighting. I make that suggestion to the government, or whoever is responsible for it. Here again there is the danger of not knowing just who is to assume the responsibility in case the need arises. Forest fires we have every year more or less, but if one should occur in the volume that might be expected from the enemy, it will take every man to fight it. There should be some one to say, "Your businesses are closed up; you must only provide protection enough for that. The rest of you must go and fight the fire. There is transportation to be taken care of and there is equipment for the men who go to do the work." Where is that direction to come from? Who is to give the instructions? Who is to provide the food? We have no field kitchens. Who will provide hospital care? There are not sufficient ambulances. There are many things that have to be taken into consideration, and that should be organized now. If this government is not responsible, then the responsibility should fall upon some one person. I know that in case of a forest fire the provincial government has the right to call out every man in the province to fight it, but is the provincial government going to assume that responsibility if the fire is the act of an enemy? I call the attention of hon. members to these matters not to alarm the people at home but to point out that this is a possibility which should be prepared for now, and that we should not wait until the time actually comes when action is needed. We must not take the attitude, "You first, my dear Alphonse; after you, my dear Gaston." It must be the responsibility definitely of someone now to make these necessary arrangements; for who is there who will say that it is not going to happen? If we can get some assurances on this point, it will be a great relief to the people on the island.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the hon. member look upon it as a four months' menace—June, July, August and September?

Mr. MAYHEW: June, July, August and September.

Mr. STIRLING: A four months' menace.

Mr. MAYHEW: Yes.

Mr. POULIOT: Has the minister some information to give regarding E 615180, a soldier who had six months' leave from the Department of National War Services at the beginning of April but was never notified of it, and instead of that was sent to Nanaimo, British Columbia?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the last report, but what I find is that the soldier was recommended for postponement, that the postponement was approved at national defence headquarters, that the approval went to the district, and that the young man was in a unit which, as I remember, was ordered to the west. He was sent in the unit to the west, but there was a mistake of some sort or another which I am having investigated. The recommendation was not held up. It was accepted as recommended.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. RALSTON: If I may be permitted, I am giving my hon. friend all the information I have from memory, and I shall probably have to report tomorrow fully what occurred.

I want to go on to deal with one or two other points, if my hon. friend will permit me. I wish to finish two other points made by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough. One was regarding pay and allowances. He asked what yardstick was used whereby pay in this war was fixed at $1.30 whereas it was $1.10 in the last war. I am sorry I cannot tell my hon. friend. As far as the purchasing power of the dollar is concerned, that probably was higher in 1914 than in 1939. Why the increase was made to $1.30, I cannot tell at the moment.

With regard to troops on leave he asked that some consideration be given to the fact that troops travelling a long distance have their leave cut into by the time taken in travelling. I am advised that no official allowance on account of distance is made to troops going on ordinary leave, but there is frequently an unofficial allowance made by the officer commanding the unit, who perhaps lets a man go on Friday night and gives him the week-end extra to his leave.

With regard to embarkation leave, two clear days at home are provided for and expected.

With regard to steel helmets, that matter has had and is having particular attention. My hon. friend will understand that it is something we cannot change until we are sure we have a better pattern. Patterns are being examined in Great Britain as well as here, and as soon as something is arrived at under proper tests which seems better, we certainly shall do our part in seeing that consideration is given to its adoption. The question of material of course enters into the manufacture of large numbers of these articles.

Mr. WHITE: When I asked the minister about the yardstick used in raising the rate of pay from $1.10 to $1.30, the point is that last November the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in his statement said the question of this increased pay for the soldiers and cost of living bonus was under consideration. I take it from what the minister said that it is still under consideration. I would think that the first thing we should know is how they arrived at the $1.30 and the $35 a month, on what standard it was based; that would be the first thing in deciding whether or not there should be an increase. Perhaps before the minister is finished with the committee he could give some further information on that point.

Mr. RALSTON: All I can say is that both the pay and the allowances were the subject of study by a committee supposed to be familiar with the matter, from the point of view not only of finance but of the services as well and some outside agencies, and the regulations were just completed, as I remember, shortly before the war broke out. The basis on which the differences were arrived at I am not in a position to say. But I understood my friend to say that the Minister of Finance last November intimated that the cost of living bonus for dependents was under consideration. I think the Minister of Finance is of opinion that the result of that consideration was given when he announced the appointment of the dependents' allowance board of trustees and the special provisions there. I have indicated that those questions are never closed as far as consideration is concerned, and it is I who am saying that matter is under consideration in view of representations made. However, this consideration is not a continuation of the consideration given by the Minister of Finance. I think he considered it was dealt with when the conclusion was arrived at which he announced on that occasion.

Mr. WHITE: Would the minister care to give his own opinion on the question of increased allowance and cost of living bonus? Would he tell us what he thinks as an old soldier?

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I would not care to. My hon. friend will understand it is a government matter.

Mr. WHITE: But I have heard the minister speak about his own old battalion. Would he not tell us his views as an old soldier?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not going to give any opinions without prejudice to-night.

The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) mentioned several matters in regard to the Pacific coast. I think I have said all I can about that. I appreciate his remarks about my having been out there. I certainly felt that the trip was worth while from the point of view of learning more of the job, as well as meeting many citizens whom it was a pleasure to meet and from whom I got a great deal of information and, if I may say so, some advice. My hon. friend intimated that I was satisfied. Perhaps he did me an injustice there. I did not say I was satisfied; I said the situation was better than I expected, but not as good as I desired. A good deal has been done since that time as to plans for the defence of the Pacific coast. The statement made here to-night, particularly with regard to anti-aircraft protection, brings to my mind that a great deal has been done and is being done in that respect, quite apart from the disposition of large numbers of troops at what we regard as strategic points.

The hon. member mentioned the reserve army. I appreciate what he as an employer says about the interest employers are taking in that organization. Without them it cannot succeed; with them it can be made a great success. I do not know of any employer who sets a better example than my hon. friend, if he will permit me to say so, in the way of interest in matters of that kind.

He has spoken about having the attendance at camps staggered. He did not use that expression, but he suggested that we have it so that all men who are employees in one industry would not have to go at one time. That is a matter now under study by the district officers commanding; it has to be arranged by them, and I shall see that General Alexander has his attention called to it from headquarters, as no doubt it has been by those who are interested in the reserve units out there. I am sure some way could be arranged so that the largest possible number of men can be got to camp.

With regard to voluntary groups and the organization on the Pacific coast the hon. member embarks on another field. I want to repeat what I said earlier in the evening, that the Department of National Defence can only take on so much. I do not want to evade responsibility. There may be some responsibility on the government, particularly in connection with the matter of fire fighing battalions to which the hon. member gave most attention. That matter is under consideration at the present time; but it is not the Department of National Defence that has to do with it; it is a civilian undertaking, and must be done, I think, under civilian auspices. Without attempting to "pass the buck," I know the Minister of Pensions and National Health has the matter actively under consideration in connection with air raid precautions.

With respect to the unification or coordination of civilian efforts on the Pacific coast, there again it is a matter for civilian authorities and not the military, although I tried to do my share by seeing that General Alexander was given full authority under defence of Canada regulation 32 to act for me in connection with any matters in which the Minister of National Defence is given authority. I agree with my hon. friend thoroughly that there must be organization, there must be coordination, there must be one head, to be ready for an emergency. But I believe there can be got together, if there is not already, and as a matter of fact I think there was among the civilian bodies out there a definite organization which knows what there is to be done and what to do if an emergency comes. I can assure my hon. friend that the general officer commanding in chief of the Pacific command has authority, interest, sympathy and, I am sure, has the cooperative spirit to have the army do its full share in connection with any emergency of that kind.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at three o'clock.

WAR EXPENDITURES

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. ALPHONSE FOURNIER (Hull) presented the first report of the special committee on war expenditures, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

JUDGES ACT

JUDGES TO BE BOUND BY DECISION OF COURT OF FINAL APPEAL

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 67, to amend the Judges Act.

He said: Judges appointed under this bill are to be bound by the court of final appeal.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CENSORSHIP

CENTRALIZATION AND COORDINATION—APPOINTMENT OF DIRECTOR

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at an earlier part of the session there was considerable discussion in the house with respect to censorship and its more effective control. I wish to inform hon. members that as a result of the government's decision to provide for greater centralization and coordination between the various branches of censorship, the office of director of censorship has been created. I am pleased to announce that Colonel O. M. Biggar has been appointed to fill this new and important position. Under the arrangement previously existing, each branch of censorship was under a different minister with a separate staff. The chief postal censor was responsible to the Postmaster General; the chief telegraph, cable and telephone censor was responsible to the Minister of National Defence; the press censors to the Secretary of State, and the radio broadcasting censor to the Minister of National War Services. A degree of integration existed, inasmuch as there was a censorship coordination committee of which the Minister of National War Services was chairman, but with the increased scope and growing intensity of the war this has proved to be inadequate.

In future, all divisions of censorship will be placed under the Minister of National War Services. The director of censorship will be the administrative head of the new organization and will be responsible to the Minister of National War Services. The present chief officers of each of the branches of censorship will become assistant directors in respect of their particular fields.

As a result of this reorganization a consistent policy for all aspects of censorship will be more readily maintained. Overlapping in effort will be removed. From the point of view of preventing leakage of information valuable to the enemy, and for the purpose of securing information for intelligence purposes, it is expected that the centralized system will be more effective. The central authority will also be valuable in relations with the United Kingdom and United States censorship authorities, each of which is under unified control.

Censorship plays a vital part in the war effort. Its conduct requires, in the highest degree, judgment, skill and devotion to duty. I should like to say that the government is highly appreciative of Colonel Biggar's acceptance of the arduous and responsible duties which he has been asked and has undertaken to perform. Colonel Biggar will continue to act as chairman of the Canadian section of the permanent joint board on defence.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is Colonel Biggar still acting on the joint defence council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes he is, and will continue to act.

Mr. COLDWELL: The Prime Minister does not think the work is too arduous for one individual?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have discussed that with Colonel Biggar and I am sure that he will be able to fill both positions.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the appointment is satisfactory; I am not complaining about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who are to be the assistant directors? I know of two, but are there not more than two?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The various ministers could answer for themselves.

Mr. RALSTON: Major Yuill is telegraph and telephone censor.

Mr. MULOCK: Mr. Jolliffe is chief postal censor.

Mr. THORSON: Colonel Landry is radio broadcasting censor.

Mr. McLARTY: The press censors are Mr. Eggleston and Mr. Charpentier.

THE MINISTRY

REPRESENTATION OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the appointment of a minister from the province of Quebec, in order to give that province its proper representation in the cabinet, still being considered by the Prime Minister?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend asked me that same question a few days ago, and I now give him the same answer.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, May 4, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1943, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. RALSTON: Last night the question came up as to whether students of seventeen and eighteen years of age could not be permitted to take employment through the summer holidays notwithstanding the provisions of the order in council which requires a permit before they enter restricted occupations. I have procured from the director of national selective service the explanatory notes which have been issued by him for use by the selective service officers throughout the dominion, and I find from that, and am also told by his office that: in respect to students seeking employment during the summer holidays, the policy to be followed will be that of giving permits limited to the duration of the school, college or university holidays. If these young men are needed for munitions work they should be directed to such work rather than be allowed to enter a restricted occupation by permit. A permit should not be given to a student who normally follows agricultural pursuits—for example, a farmer's son—if he is needed on the farm. If the refusal of a permit to a student would mean that he would be prevented from securing employment the permit should be issued.

I take it that, in effect, the students of seventeen who were mentioned last night are automatically, if I may put it that way, granted a permit if they apply for it for the purpose of taking employment in the summer vacation.

Mr. BENCE: I should like to ask the minister some questions with respect to the two orders in council which have been passed governing the reconditioning of men. The first order in council, P.C. 2229, relates solely to those called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and the second one, P.C. 2291, refers only to men who are called up for active service. As I understand P.C. 2229, the order in council with respect to the calling up of men, it consists of two parts. The first part provides that men who have been called up under the regulations and have not been notified to report because of some physical condition which does not require remedial treatment may now be forced to report if the provision of glasses, dental treatment or nutritional improvement is all that is required. The second part of the order in council provides that where the physical condition is due to some condition that requires active remedial treatment in hospital, the men may be notified to report to the Department of Pensions and National Health and then be afforded the opportunity of taking the necessary treatment to correct existing defects.

In connection with the first part of the order in council I should like the minister to explain what is meant by the provision of glasses. There are widely different reasons for the wearing of glasses or what are more correctly called correctional lenses. Some people are helpless without these correctional lenses, while others can get along very well without them for a comparatively short time, and some for a longer time. I should like to have an explanation as to the degree of correction that is intended to be covered by the regulations under this order in council, P.C. 2229. I have this in mind. I understand that if a man's eyesight is defective up to a certain point he is refused enlistment for active service. I should like to know whether the regulations to which I have referred cover such a case, and whether they cover all cases in which the provision of glasses would bring a man's vision back to normal. A man may be put in category C, for instance, or some other category such as C1—I do not know exactly which one—because his vision is defective without glasses, whereas with glasses he might have the normal vision required for category A men. Would these cases come under the provisions of the order in council? If so, why is not the same provision made with respect to men enlisting for active service? In view of the fact that these men are being called up, and that by virtue of the plebiscite vote there is a possibility of their being sent to any theatre of war, I should like to know whether men who are suffering from defective vision will be included among those who will be sent on active service to any theatre of war.

I would urge upon the minister that he reconsider the whole question of categorization in respect of all men who are now being refused enlistment for active service because of defective vision, if the provision of glasses would bring their vision up to normal. I urge that for this reason. I understand that in the last war the vision standard required was not as high as it is to-day, and it seems to me that before this war is over the requirements will have to be lowered with regard to the degree of vision that a man must possess without glasses. If there is any real possibility of that, I submit to the minister that the change should be made now; otherwise men are put in the embarrassing position of not being able to enlist for active service to-day who when the war has gone on for some time will be eligible for such enlistment. If these men are eventually going to be able to enlist for active service I suggest that the requirements be lowered to enable them to do so now.

Furthermore it is provided by P.C. 2229 that men needing glasses or dental treatment or nutritional improvement may be called out. But the order in council says nothing about providing them with glasses or dental treatment. Is it intended that the men who are called up under this order will receive the glasses or dental treatment required?

I should also like to know something in connection with the second part of the order in council, which provides that where the physical condition of the man requires active remedial treatment in hospital, and the medical authorities certify that he is sufficiently mendable to permit of his being within a reasonable time placed in a medical category in which he would be acceptable for military service, he may be notified to report to the Department of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend give me the reference? I think he is reading from the orders in council appearing on the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. BENCE: Yes, I am referring to P.C. 2229, which appears at page 14 of the Votes and Proceedings, of March 24.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the orders in council under my hand. That is why I asked for the reference.

Mr. BENCE: In connection with the second part of that order in council, is that a purely voluntary proposition on the part of the man who is notified to report to the Department of Pensions and National Health, or are any compulsory features involved in it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So far as operations are concerned it is voluntary in both cases.

Mr. BENCE: Under both orders in council?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is so far as our department is concerned.

Mr. BENCE: In connection with the whole matter of medical standards generally, would the minister briefly describe the difference between the medical standard set for enlistment in the active army and that set for men who are called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and the extent to which the qualifications for the various medical categories have been altered since the beginning of the war? I mean, wherein are there differences between the standards with respect to men who qualified under medical category A at the beginning of the war, and those applicable at the present time? Is there any difference? Have the standards been lowered with respect to various matters, eyesight being one of them?

Mr. RALSTON: I remember that in answer to the hon. member for Parkdale I made a statement with regard to certain changes which were made—I think in two respects at least. One was with regard to sight and the other was with regard to hearing. The two changes are reported in Hansard, and if I get an opportunity to look it up I will refer my hon. friend to them.

Mr. BENCE: In connection with order in council P.C. 2291, respecting the reconditioning of men who have volunteered for active service, what is the satisfactory undertaking in writing in suitable form which is referred to in section 1, subsection (e) of the regulations, and what provision is made in the event that the man refuses, after giving such an undertaking, to take the necessary attestation to go on active service?

Also, has the department a record with regard to the men who have been discharged from the army since the beginning of the war, to the number of 40,000—I have not the exact figure, but I believe it is in excess of that—and whom it reasonably hopes to recondition under the provisions of P.C. 2291? Also, how many men have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act to whom the provisions of order in council 2229, respecting their reconditioning, would apply? Also will the minister tell us when the provisions of those two orders in council came into effect or are to come into effect?

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will let me interrupt him here, he is asking me about two orders in council which were passed on the recommendation of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, with my full concurrence and with the collaboration of the Department of National Defence. The orders in council are in effect now. The officers of both departments are busily engaged, and have been since the announcement was made, in working out the procedure with regard to both those orders in council and making the regulations. Hon. members will understand that we have to work out the procedure. In the first place we have to come to an agreement as to what disabilities, generally speaking, are "mendable", to use the expression which appears in the order in council. That has to be done between the doctors of the Department of Pensions and National Health and the army doctors, in order that the army board which is examining the particular individual may know whether it is worth while to refer that man to the Department of Pensions and National Health to be mended. The procedure is being worked out also with regard to the possibility of having on that board a doctor from the Department of Pensions and National Health. The next thing is the matter of the concentration of these men, where they are to go; and I understand quite a number of details have to be worked out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the scheme functioning yet?

Mr. RALSTON: It is functioning to this extent: in cases which are apparent, the Department of Pensions and National Health is taking them over, but I would not say that any large number have been received so far because the regulations have not been completed.

On another point which my hon. friend asked about, namely, the form of undertaking for voluntary enlistment, I have just asked the adjutant general, and he tells me that this is a part of the regulations and that the regluations are under discussion between the two departments.

Mr. BENCE: Before the minister goes on, I have just one more question, and it has relation to the point he is covering now. How far and in what form are these regulations being publicized?

Mr. RALSTON: They have been tabled here; that was done at the time the Prime Minister made the statement on man-power. I do not know what steps are being taken by the two departments to publicize them, but of course that would be part of the plan which is being worked out.

Mr. BENCE: I was thinking how important it was in connection with recruiting stations, advertising, the putting out of posters, and things like that.

Mr. RALSTON: Of course the way to publicize them is to have the medical board fully informed as to what rights a man has.

Mr. BENCE: A man might be suffering from hernia, for example, and if it was publicized that he could receive treatment, probably he would make himself available immediately.

Mr. MacINNIS: May I ask a question in connection with these two orders in council?

Mr. BENCE: I wonder if I might have answers to my questions.

Mr. RALSTON: I will do the best I can with the very limited information I have at my disposal. My hon. friend is asking about technical matters with regard to medicine. I do not profess to be an expert, and I have not one of the medical officers here at the moment.

My hon. friend asked first, I think, whether the same provision was made for treatment of minor defects for active service men as for the home defence men. The answer is yes. That is to say, there are certain things in the way of provision of glasses, dental treatment and matters of the kind which are afforded for both the active service men and the home defence men.

My hon. friend asked what is meant by the provision of glasses. All I can say is this: the regulations with regard to the physical eligibility of men for service and the standard which has to be reached in connection with the different categories are all set out in a routine order which I had here the other day and which was referred to by the hon. member for Parkdale. As I understand it, the provision is that for eligibility, at least for category A, a man has to be what they call 20/20, which is practically perfect vision, with glasses, if necessary.

There is a certain deterioration or defectiveness allowed for, provided it can be cured with glasses. That degree of defectiveness I shall have to get exactly by referring to the routine order which will be here in a few minutes. It is asked whether it is intended that they should receive dental treatment. The answer is yes. There will be comparatively minor treatment such as will be necessary to put the men in shape to be properly categorized. The question was asked whether the right to be mended was voluntary on the part of the man called for service. The answer is yes. My hon. friend asked the number of men to whom reconditioning would apply, that is to say the number of men who have been called up for service and rejected in the past and to whom reconditioning will apply. I cannot give the faintest idea of that at this stage. It will require examination of the medical boards with regard to those who have been rejected in order to see the cause of rejection.

Mr. BENCE: Can a man be called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act who has a greater degree of defective vision than one who can enlist for active service?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think so, but I will not say without having definite knowledge from the medical officer. If the man is in category A he is in category A whether for home defence or for active service.

Mr. BENCE: Provision is made for such a man to have glasses which would correct his vision and make him subject to call, whereas the man who applied for active service might have perfect vision with glasses but might be put in category C or E with glasses off. I want to know if there is a distinction.

Mr. RALSTON: That was the first question I answered. There is no distinction. The same mending for these preliminary defects is available to men both for active service and for home defence.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The same standard prevails.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. My hon. friend asked one other question which I do not recall.

Mr. BENCE: I asked several questions with reference to the number of men who the department estimates might be available as a result of reconditioning orders. I asked whether they had any record in respect of men discharged from the army, and the minister answered with regard to men called up.

Mr. RALSTON: I have not the record, and I do not know whether there are any records extant which would give that—that is, records which have been collated. The Minister of Pensions and National Health has the collation of the cases of discharge, but I doubt whether they are sufficiently detailed to indicate the degree of defectiveness so as to enable one to ascertain whether the men would come under the mendable clauses or not.

Mr. MacINNIS: As has been pointed out by the member for Saskatoon City, order in council P.C. 2229 makes provision for the reconditioning of persons called under the National Resources Mobilization Act of 1940 and who are found unfit. Order in council P.C. 2291 makes provision for reconditioning of persons who have volunteered for active service and have been rejected for slight physical reasons. Is it intended to extend these services to persons in civil life or to persons who may be required for work in war services? The problem of the availability of sufficient workers is one that is becoming of increasing difficulty. The Minister of Munitions in a committee the other day said that he could place at the moment 6,000 men if he had them, 1,000 at Sudbury and 5,000 at Arvida. I have seen certain official communications in reference to the employment situation in British Columbia, particularly in the logging camps, which lead me to believe that the situation is getting acute there. There are many men and women in Canada who, because of physical conditions which could be corrected by better nutrition or dental services or by medical attention, and who could play a useful part in the economic life of the country, in our war industries and in civilian industries as well, are not to-day taking their share of the burden of work, and this is a direct loss to the country. It also accentuates the fact that we put far more emphasis on the fact of having people fit for military service than on the importance of having people fit to perform ordinary civilian services. I think that some member of the government ought to be able to answer this question. As the situation is at the moment, it is retarding the actual and potential war effort of the country.

Mr. RALSTON: As my hon. friend has anticipated, that is a matter which is not in my department, but the Minister of Pensions and National Health is here and he might give what information he can.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): All I can say is that the department has been giving for some time attention to what might be termed a national fitness measure along the lines suggested by the member for Vancouver East. The two orders in council to which he has referred apply only to those who have enlisted, have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, or have volunteered for active service, and naturally they must be quite limited in application. The member for Saskatoon City asked about the percentage which could be made mendable by this process. It would not be large, between 10 and 15 per cent, even as regards minor defects. As regards major defects, which would come under the Department of Pensions and National Health, it would not be more than 2 or 3 per cent, according to the estimate of medical officers. With regard to the larger measure which has been envisaged, and which would be for the use of the country to train men in habits of physical fitness, it is now being considered, but I cannot announce a definite policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a large order. What is considered to be a major defect? I do not want to get down to individual cases, but I have in mind a man in the air force with a hernia. I have written to the minister about this case. Is a small hernia a major defect? The public ought to know, and the soldiers themselves should know just what the plan encompasses.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There are different conditions of hernia—I am not speaking as a medical man. In the great war operations were frequently carried out and the hernia condition remedied, following which the men went overseas, stayed some years and rendered excellent service. In this war medical opinion is against major operations for hernia. That is the prevailing opinion of medical advisers in our department at least.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of the number of men being called up and the fact that the Minister of Munitions and Supply the other evening spoke of the shortage of men, I wish to refer to a matter which I think has not been given sufficient attention by this committee. It involves all three defence departments and the Department of Munitions and Supply also. If my recollection serves me correctly the hon. member for St. John-Albert (Mr. Hazen) raised it last week. It is in connection with delinquency among children, arising from the fact that many men are overseas or in the army and many mothers are working. What forcibly brought it to my notice was a statement in the May issue of the Canadian Forum to the effect that a partial survey made by the Toronto board of education shows that in the public schools in the industrial areas of Toronto in more than 20 per cent of the families the mother was working and not home at noon. The statement went on to indicate that this condition was leading to considerable delinquency among children, and the social service agencies such as we have are quite unable to deal with the problem piecemeal. If the state needs, as I think it may, the services of mothers in connection with the war effort, then it is the responsibility of the state to see to it that their families are properly cared for.

When our party was in Great Britain—there are several members of that party in the house this afternoon—we were struck by the arrangements made over there to cope with this situation. For example, in Stoke-on-Trent we visited the large community kitchen and the feeding centres from which meals were served to families whose mothers were working or where the wage was not sufficient to provide proper and adequate food. We saw the crèches, and the playrooms in the air raid shelters where children could be taken care of while their mothers were away from them, sometimes on account of the raids and sometimes on account of working conditions.

It strikes me that this is not a question for the local municipality; it is a question for the dominion as a whole and ought to be provided for by this government and this parliament. Sometimes a new war industry comes into an area and no prior information is given by any of the departments as to the extent to which a problem of this sort will be created in the community concerned. It seems to me that the local authority should be taken into the government's confidence as to the type of worker required, whether women will be employed and whether families will have to be looked after. Adequate grants should be made by this parliament to the local authority, educational or social service as the case may be, in order that proper care may be provided for the children of the community—I mean care in crèches for the infants, in nursery schools for pre-kindergarten age children, and so on—and steps should be taken to ensure that the children at noon get proper and adequate food.

We learned that in the British schools every child in attendance is given a daily milk ration. They are terribly short of milk but it is carefully rationed so that the invalid, the expectant mother and the child may get it, as well as the school children. The ration in the schools is small, only one-third of a pint; if the parents can afford it, they pay a half-penny, one cent, but if they cannot pay they get it free.

If we are building a better order in this country, as we ought to be, and laying the foundations for that order now, as we ought to do even in the midst of war, then one of our first cares should be for the children of the workers in industry and the children of the men who are serving in the armed forces. I believe that this involves not only one department but all the defence departments, the Department of Munitions and Supply, and I think the Department of Pensions and National Health. I urge that consideration be given to this problem at once, in order that we may not continue to lag behind. It irritates me when I look over the social legislation of certain other English-speaking countries and compare it with what we have in Canada; I realize that as a nation we lag continually behind some of the more progressive peoples of the world.

In regard to dependents' allowances, an excellent letter reached me before this discussion began in the house. It is from a former school teacher. It is well written, and I propose to read the parts of it which bear upon the problem we are discussing, because I think it expresses the situation better than I could myself. I quote:

In June, 1940, my husband joined the Canadian army as a private. Each of us considered it his duty and privilege to do so. At the time, living as I did in Alberta, my allowance and that of my two children seemed adequate. Gradually however as we began to need coats, medicine and so on it seemed like we just could not get along. I hired a girl and went back to my profession of teaching school.

We had been separated about a year when I decided to go to my husband. After all he was still in Canada, and if many other husbands stayed out of the armed forces to be with their families should we not have the chance to be together as much as possible? My two little girls wanted to be with their daddy if possible and he was very lonely for us.

So in August, 1941, we came to London (Ontario). It became apparent immediately that we could not get along unless I worked. I took my children to a day nursery and got employment in an office. After two months of this I became ill and had to quit work. Then we realized we were to have another baby.

Well, I needed medical care, my children needed clothes, and we got neither. I went to a doctor for five months. He prescribed medicine and a diet which I could not by any means get. He advised dental care and eyeglasses—both impossible. And so, discouraged, he sent me a bill for his services. I took that to mean that he wanted no more to do with my case so I quit going to him, or anyone.

My children could not appear on the street all winter because we could not buy them coats. They cannot go out now because they haven't presentable shoes. I cannot appear on the street now because I have not been able to buy one garment to meet the requirements of my condition.

I have had to cut the children's milk allowance in half—and I don't get any when a quart a day has been prescribed. This is the first winter they have not taken cod liver oil. Their allowance of oranges and tomato juice has been diminished.

I am not a spendthrift, no one could be more saving than I in cooking, buying clothes, et cetera. At present I am knitting summer coats which will cost $5 for both. I'd have to pay at least $7 each if I bought them. I mend and mend and make over clothing.

I haven't anything for layette, and baby is due in July. We have to live in the poorest homes we have ever had. Our civilian friends have profitable employment, are living well. To try to help out I am taking care of a twenty months' old boy in addition to my other work. I do our laundry in the bathtub and dishpan. Here is a sample budget:

$30.00—rent.
4.50—hydro and gas (in cold weather fuel extra).
1.00—reading material.
1.30—insurance (children).
4.50—milk.
35.00—groceries, soap, etc.

$76.30

My allowance is $79. Can anyone tell me where our clothes are coming from? And my hospital and doctor care? And layette? And ice for the refrigerator this summer? And medicine? And a toy or amusement once in a while for the children? And care for them when I am not able to do it? It's a problem too difficult for me to solve and I never did have much difficulty with mathematics.

This is a point to which I wish to direct particular attention, because I do not believe a case of this type has come before the house so far.

My husband is a sergeant—without pay. He is more conscientious than many with pay.

I take it that means a sergeant's pay.

He's a top ranking mechanic at the trades school, was chosen recently because of his ability, along with eleven others of high marks, for draft. Still has his sergeant's rank—but no pay. No trade's pay either. But he pays sergeant's fees—lives a sergeant's life—on a private's pay. Don't take my word on his ability; I'll refer you to—

I shall leave out the name of the officer and give it to the minister later.

—or other officials here. And he is not a man to spend money on himself either. But his ambition to become a good soldier must be dampened when he thinks of us here at home.

My husband has no knowledge of this letter. I hope that it will in no way interfere with his chances of advancement, if he has any. He has the ambition, the ability and the incentive to get ahead. All he needs is a mind free of worry and a few of the "breaks."

I think that puts the case better than I could put it. I would ask the minister, if there are any cases of this kind—and I presume there are, since this is an intelligent, well written letter—of men in this position, doing tradesmen's work, with the rank of sergeant but the pay of a private, and with the families receiving the allowance of a private, to take steps to see that justice is done.

I should like also to add my voice to what has been said in this house already, asking that something be done to give the dependents of men serving in the armed forces an additional bonus or additional pay to meet the increased cost of living. It does seem invidious that we should provide—and quite properly—that men in industry should receive the cost of living bonus, and not provide that bonus for the dependents of our soldiers, sailors and airmen, for the aged or for the pensioners of the last war, who so frequently to-day languish in semi-poverty. I am urging that we do something to meet this situation. After all, these people in the lower income brackets certainly deserve a cost of living bonus more than some of our own high-salaried officials who are in receipt of a cost of living bonus from this government. Certainly we should do justice by those who are serving us in industry and in the forces.

Mr. McIVOR: I have a word or two to say, Mr. Chairman, because I believe one or two things should be emphasized. When boys are taken into the army, or when they volunteer for service, parents wonder just what their surroundings will be and what temptations they will have to meet. I should like to express my appreciation of the work that has been done by the Department of National Defence in looking after the welfare of our men in all directions. A man may be well looked after materially and physically but there may be that one thing lacking that would make him miss becoming a real soldier. I should like to pay tribute to the work that has been done by the chaplain service in the army, the navy and the air force. The best men have been chosen, not one-day-a-week men but young men who are ready and willing at all times to give service. This is not only true of the chaplains; it is true also of the Y.M.C.A., of the Salvation Army and of all the other religious organizations represented.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Many parents are also anxious about the wet canteen. My position in this matter is well known, but I hope I may never be guilty of talking about anything in this house about which I know little or nothing. I have some data with regard to a canteen in one of our training camps, which I should like to give the committee. In this canteen the men consume five bottles of milk for every bottle of beer that is sold. I think every mother and every mother's son in Canada should be proud of that. On a recent occasion in this same canteen, when the troops were confined to barracks, they drank sixty-two bottles of beer and over three hundred bottles of milk; and there were 337 men in that draft. Again, over a recent Saturday afternoon and Sunday, when 171 men were in barracks, milk outsold beer by a very high percentage. It will be remembered that one hon. member rose in his place in this house and said that in one barracks they had a wet canteen, but when the dry canteen was opened the wet canteen was put out of business. To those who fear the bogey of the wet canteen, who think that when our soldiers sign up or are called up they are going to the bow-wows, I say I am convinced that from the chaplain service right down to the canteens our soldiers are surrounded by things that will help them to work and become real fighting men.

There is another point I should like to mention. Our men in England, in every branch, prefer to serve under Canadian rather than English officers. I pay my tribute to the Englishmen. After Dunkirk they were out of almost everything; they fought on, without guns and equipment, but notwithstanding that, our soldiers prefer to serve under Canadian officers.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Last night when the leader of the opposition inquired about reserves the minister gave a comparison which, while he did not say it would be applicable to conditions to-day, I think might be misleading. He said that in 1918 about 10 per cent were composed of reserves. From his own experience he will realize that that was during the time of the final drive when we had nearly everything in the drive. He will know that in 1916 or 1917 the reserves were many times 10 per cent. I am not suggesting that he should give the actual figures of the reserves in the old country or in any theatre of war, but I do not think we should leave the public of this country self-satisfied about the matter of reserves. I am quite sure that the actual figure at this stage would be well over 10 per cent.

I should like to ask the minister some questions about our women's army. I have an article which appeared in the Star, written by Austin Cross, which reads:

"The object of the C.W.A.C." said Major-General Letson, "is to replace every able-bodied man in category A with a woman, and thus far, we have succeeded in doing this with 1,900 women. We aim to let a woman take a man's place wherever we can, and by so doing, conserve the man-power resources of Canada."

Early in the interview, the general emphasized the fact that women were available for service anywhere, and already a detachment of eleven was at the Canadian legation in Washington.

I have another article dated May 1 which appeared in the Daily Province, written by Torchy Anderson, which reads:

Possibility that Canadian women who enlist in the rapidly-growing Canadian women's army corps, may emulate their British sisters manning mixed batteries for anti-aircraft defence, was admitted officially this morning.

In the discussion of the corps, Major-General H. F. G. Letson, M.C., adjutant-general, said that it is quite possible that volunteers of the corps may be trained in anti-aircraft work.

The minister made some reference to this corps in the house some time ago, as reported on page 1913 of Hansard of this year. He referred to the dietetic service, which included cooking and waiting on tables, and certain clerical work. I think many hon. members are in the same position as I. I have received many communications from young women in all parts of the country and of various educational standards inquiring as to what branch of the service they could enlist in. Could the minister not enlarge on his previous statement and give us something concrete as to what he expects this women's army to be able to undertake? Perhaps he could tell us also the minimum and maximum ages which will govern their being taken into the service, what educational standards will be required, and what type of work they can usefully perform in order to relieve fit men for service.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar made a statement about public health matters and quite properly suggested that the army were interested, the navy, the air force, munitions and supply and the public generally. I gathered that he was including these departments as part of the public and not as service departments. I shall not take up the time of the committee to deal with this because I do not profess to be able to do so in any detail. I shall bring the matter to the attention of the government. I do not think my hon. friend was quite fair in his reference to what has been done in Canada. I am talking not about the government but about the Canadian public generally and what it has done in the matter of public health and various types of social legislation. I do not think we lag behind a great deal in this respect. The hon. member referred to Stoke-on-Trent where there was a local organization. Canada is a federation and matters of health are under the provinces as well as the dominion; there is a division of jurisdiction. I think the last few years have seen a remarkable degree, not only of coordination—that word is pretty well worn out—but of cooperation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And improvement.

Mr. RALSTON: As well as improvement in this matter of public health. There are measures in force to-day in the provinces and the dominion that would never have been thought of ten years ago. I do not mean that we are by any means satisfied, but I would not want it to go out to the country that we are altogether lagging behind in the matter of public health.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think the minister must have missed my point. It was that the federal government should assume some responsibility for the financing of these things.

Mr. RALSTON: Of course the federal government has assumed considerable responsibility in that respect. In reference to the case which my hon. friend cited as outlined in the letter he read from the wife of a soldier, he was simply pointing out the argument that has been made a number of times during this debate, that dependents' allowances are not sufficient. At the risk of repetition I would indicate that that is exactly the sort of case that I have had in mind. I believe this particular case has been brought up before.

Mr. COLDWELL: I do not think so.

Mr. RALSTON: It sounded familiar to me. It is exactly the sort of case that the Minister of Finance was endeavouring to deal with in his announcement last November. If the dependents' board of trustees, in whom I have considerable confidence and who have certainly been taking an interest in their work by adopting the method, not of going through departmental officials but of going through citizens who know the cases intimately in their communities, does not work out, the system will have to be changed.

With regard to the army part of it, my hon. friend mentioned the fact that this man was a soldier without pay. I can only think of the situation being that he must have been a tradesman, receiving more pay as a tradesman than he would have received as a sergeant.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister will recall that the letter stated that he was not getting tradesman's pay either.

Mr. RALSTON: I am quite free to admit that there has been great difficulty in the service with regard to tradesmen's pay. There are certain tradesmen's positions in the establishments of the various units and those who occupy these positions get tradesmen's pay. The rule has been that they do not get tradesmen's pay until they are filling tradesmen's positions.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has not the trouble been that the men were induced to enlist in the belief that they were going into a trade? Perhaps they were promised by the enlisting officer that they would get tradesmen's pay, and then when they got in there there was no job. I have had cases of that kind.

Mr. RALSTON: I am bound to say that the recruiting officers and the literature with regard to recruiting have emphasized the matter of tradesmen's occupations and trades opportunities. But we have now put into effect a system with regard to tradesmen's pay which I think will cover the situation. As a matter of fact this was effective April 1. A man will be entitled to tradesmen's pay on the completion of his basic training, subject to the provisions of the next three subsections. He must be filling a vacancy in the appropriate rank and trade in the war establishment of his unit. If, while in receipt of tradesmen's rates, he is promoted and thereby ceases to occupy a tradesmen's vacancy, he may continue to draw such tradesmen's rates until he is promoted to a higher rank that will entitle him to a regimental rate equal to or higher than the tradesmen's rates of which he was in receipt prior to such promotion. The next provision is that he shall be entitled to tradesmen's rates while absent from his normal duties on leave, on a course of instruction, or because of sickness caused by wounds or injuries. When he is qualified to draw tradesmen's rates, he may draw such rates while being held as an unposted reinforcement within quotas to be determined under the authority of the adjutant-general. That last provision is important. In other words, the adjutant-general may prescribe the percentage it may be.

I hesitate to name the percentage, but it may be a percentage 25 or 50 per cent above the establishment to the extent of which men who are qualified as tradesmen may receive tradesmen's pay notwithstanding that they are in excess of the establishment. That provision has been the subject of a great deal of examination by various branches of the department, each one of which has tradesmen. We heard the member for New Westminster the other night asking that bandsmen be given tradesmen's pay. There are also cooks and clerks frequently getting tradesmen's pay. The list is almost unlimited. I sometimes think that the infantry soldier who is learning the rifle, the two-inch mortar, the Bren gun, the machine gun, the tommy gun, and some of those who drive carriers are probably just about as highly skilled tradesmen as any of them.

With regard to the case itself, I suppose it is old now, but may I ask my hon. friend how long ago the letter was written?

Mr. COLDWELL: On April 27.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like very much to get the name.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall be very glad to give it to the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall certainly have it looked into.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Would the minister make a statement about the Canadian Women's Army Corps?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. The present strength of the corps is between 2,200 and 2,300. Recruitment is going on satisfactorily. The age limits are eighteen to forty-five. The educational qualifications are grade eight or higher. The service is general service—that is, service anywhere. The young ladies are called privates, sergeants or corporals, just as in the army. Speaking of them in the mass, the volunteers are used particularly in the four general subdivisions, two of which were mentioned by my hon. friend. When I mention dietetics, I mean cooking; I mean as dietitians, waitresses and everything else that has to do with the production of food in the camps or training centres or other establishments wherever they may be. That is one general class. The second general class is clerical—stenographic work, secretarial, accountancy, and so on. The third general class is in the auxiliary services, in canteens and places of the kind, where a large number of them can be employed. The fourth general class is in connection with motor vehicles, mechanized transport and classifications of the kind.

I have been very much impressed with the work which the corps has already done. The numbers are not large. We felt that to give proper training we should have a central training school. We have had training in the districts where the original volunteers were taken on, but we felt there should be some uniform standard. We did not have the same length of time that we have for training the officers in the male branch of the army, and we were fortunate enough to make arrangements with McGill university under which we took over a large portion of Macdonald college, and there at this minute there is a class, and has been since April 27, of over 300 of the corps. We are having them all take a course there. I had a talk the other day with the district officer commanding military district No. 4. He had visited the school and is tremendously impressed by it, and particularly by the quality of the young ladies who are giving instruction. He even suggested that they might be used for instructional purposes in connection with other branches of the army as well, in view of the great aptitude they showed for that kind of work.

As I mentioned to the committee the other night, the difficulty has been accommodation. I think I can safely say that in five different districts in the dominion the quarters are now practically completed, and now that we are ready to house the members of the Canadian Women's Army Corps they will be taking on their duties in some of the lines I have mentioned. District No. 1, I recall—that is the district of which London is headquarters—has been particularly enthusiastic with regard to the work which these women have done. They are working in quite a number of the basic training centres. At Camp Borden there are practically none of the Canadian Women's Army Corps as yet, but there again it is a matter of accommodation. We are having temporary accommodation arranged for, and we expect to have a substantial number of the women's corps there. In Ottawa we have just acquired a place where we can house a hundred members of the corps. They have, of course, been working here for some time. They have been on subsistence, but we feel that it is highly desirable, from the point of view of esprit de corps and the general spirit which association together produces, to have them all together, and that is being done. I have great hopes of the corps and great satisfaction in the work that has already been done. The enlistments as of April 11 were 72 officers and 2,188 other ranks.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Can the minister give an estimate of the probable strength over a given period of time?

Mr. RALSTON: The adjutant-general tells me that his requisition is for roughly 5,000. I hate to mention big figures but I do think the figure can be increased away beyond that. I know they can be trained, and I am sure they can be utilized. Without making any forecast, what is in my mind is a strength of possibly 15,000 at least.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That information is very useful. What about the training of these young women for anti-aircraft work?

Mr. RALSTON: As to training in handling weapons or munitions, here again I am mentioning something that was given to me quite unofficially, and I am not sure that it is proper for me to mention it here. When I was on the Pacific coast an officer in charge of the searchlight battery mentioned to me that he believed that the members of the Canadian Women's Army Corps would be able to do that sort of work admirably. They are certainly equipped to do it. They have the standard of education, and their aptitude indicates that they would be able to do it. There again it is a matter of accommodation, and it is somewhat more difficult for the corps than for the army.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Are they not being used in England in prediction work?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, in connection with coastal defence.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is the term of enlistment?

Mr. RALSTON: For the duration.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Last year during a recruiting parade in Toronto an accident occurred. The parade was coming along Queen street, and near the city hall a man ran out between two army vehicles and was knocked down by a trooper on a motorcycle. The man had no business to be running between the vehicles, of course, but as a result the trooper's motorcycle got out of control, ran into the crowd and pinned several people against a hydrant. One woman in particular was very badly hurt. Although she has had a great deal of medical care, she is still in the hospital. This is just one of a number of incidents. I took the matter up with Ottawa, and there was no difficulty as regards the Department of National Defence, but they consulted the Department of Justice and got an opinion to the effect that there was no liability. Probably there is not, but I imagine that if it had been a civil case and a question of insurance had been involved, there would have been legal action of some kind, a settlement would have been made, and the woman would have got something. In this case she has nothing at all. She was an innocent bystander, as were other people who were injured. If the parade had not taken place there would have been no accident. If the man who ran out had been of some substance she would have had recourse against him, but under the circumstances she has none, and the crown will not give her a chance to sue. It seems to me there should be some way by which this poor woman, as well as the other people who were injured, could be compensated. The parade took place there, and it seems to me that there is some liability. I should like to know what the minister has to say.

Mr. RALSTON: I appreciate the hon. member's consideration. He has not even brought the case to my personal attention; evidently he has exhausted departmental procedure in connection with it.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: I should like to toy with the legal end of it, but I know that that is not the important thing. My hon. friend suggested that if the parade had not taken place there would not have been an accident and therefore the crown is liable.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): No, I did not suggest that the crown was liable.

Mr. RALSTON: I thought that my hon. friend was suggesting it. If I remember my law, it is not, as I understand it, the causa sine qua non but the causa causans which decides whether or not the defence is liable; and the parade was not the cause of the accident—not the proximate cause of the accident—in that sense.

My hon. friend suggests that in a civil case there would have been a trial and the lady would have got something. I can say to him, if this will do him any good and do the lady any good—for the crown does not want to avoid any liability—that I shall certainly take the matter up with my colleague the Minister of Justice and ascertain if it is not possible to grant her a fiat so that she may have her day in court and an opportunity just as she would have in a civil case. That may be of some help. The only alternative is payment ex gratia. Invitations of that kind in my department are pretty frequent, and I have to have some general rule. I do not believe that, on the statement of the case which is made by my hon. friend, it can possibly be considered on that ground. However, I assume that my hon. friend will send me the name of the person—probably my secretary has it now—and I shall look into the case to see if anything more can be done.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

Mr. CHURCH: The matter which has been mentioned this afternoon of hospitalization and the care of the soldier and his dependents, and also the dependency money, has been before the house since the fall of 1939. I then raised this question, which is still on the order paper and under the rule of anticipation has never been dealt with, and there is a private bill about this and other matters.

The question of hospitalization is a most important one, and the matters which have been raised here are directly related to the subject matter of the resolution which I brought in immediately after the war started, namely a proper system of national insurance of the soldier and his dependents. The policy which I proposed, and which the Minister of Finance refused last year and the year before to adopt, was an insurance policy like the one they have at Washington—I had the document here and read it to the house—to take care of hospitalization, sickness, unemployment for two years after the war, and rehabilitation of the soldier and his family.

What have we now? We have this work centred very largely in the municipalities. Large numbers of men have enlisted, and what provision are we making for them in these respects? Anything that is not in the draft estimates has to be covered by the resolution covering the $2,000,000,000. It is an involved resolution, because it covers hundreds of items and a multitude of sins and errors which have been committed since the war began.

The subject of hospitalization involves soldiers who, having enlisted and trained for three months, may go overseas and then be sent home. Who looks after them? Judging from the cases which have been brought to my attention, I understand they have to go from one authority to another, with the result that they cannot pay their rent; sometimes they cannot get the money due them, and the bailiff puts them out. I know many cases of suffering under these circumstances. The province cuts them off relief and will give them no further help. The result, as I see it Toronto, which has one of the finest health departments on the continent, is that the city is forced to look after some of these men or let them go out on the streets and shift for themselves. I admit that the present Minister of National Defence has made a great improvement.

The other matter to which I wish to refer is that in my opinion we have the wrong system of considering the question at present before us. It is unfair to require a minister to sit here for two or three weeks, as he must do under our present antiquated system of procedure. We are doing the same thing as they did in the time of the Napoleonic wars; there is a resolution first, a bill, and all that kind of thing going on in a circle. If we had the British system, by which, during the first forty-five minutes each day that parliament meets in war time, hon. members can rise and ask the very questions which are being asked here this afternoon, hundreds of questions could be answered, avoiding unnecessary long debates and saving months of time which are wasted by us in debating war policy under an old system. Whether it be this or any other government that is in power, I sympathize with any minister who has to be here for weeks and attend to departmental affairs as well and carry on, and I apologize sometimes myself for asking on urgent matters. But I say this, representing a soldier city, that we should have a new system. I raised this point last year and the year before. To-day we are sitting from three to six and from eight to eleven. Surely the British policy of setting aside forty-five minutes each day for answering war questions would be a great improvement on the present practice and curtail weeks of debate. I receive the British Hansard daily from the old country, and I am surprised at the questions which are asked on the orders of the day. In nearly every case the minister has had notice and the answer is often read. That is true even with respect to such questions as the one which was raised this afternoon by the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. The minister has his answer ready; he can rise in his place and say why Mrs. A or B or C or D did not get her dependency money, or why her soldier husband was not admitted to hospital, or did not get his pay, or questions about soldiers' parcels not delivered in enemy countries. Supplementary questions are allowed as well.

I must say that the system in the minister's department is such that the letters I write about hospitalization or departmental matters are answered the next day or so. I believe I write to the department as much as any hon. member, because a great many people write to me. I am sorry they do, because I do not want all that work, but our officials endeavour to help the private member and his constituents, and our civil service do it well.

I have one other question to ask, and I shall occupy only a few moments, because it is hard to raise important questions of policy regarding the war in the haphazard way which is followed in this house, one hon. member after another rising and asking such questions as occur to him on a variety of different topics. For that reason I did not like to interfere last evening with the train of thought of various hon. members on certain features of the debate. However, the minister made a radio speech on Sunday evening. In my opinion it was a very good radio speech. I speak only as a private member. I believe it is my duty to give the government independent support as long as they are trying to carry on a total war, and I intend to do so irrespective of politics. I believe that every hon. gentleman on this side of this chamber is trying to do the same thing. I am sure they are.

I believe it would be an advantage if the minister would devote some time to disseminating news on the radio himself in this way, because to-day the radio is of great importance. I say this without disparaging the splendid work of the press, which have rendered splendid service in connection with the war, but I believe the minister should explain over the radio the position of the soldier and his dependents in this matter of hospitalization, pay and better conditions for the soldier's care.

I have tried to get some into the hospital, but you cannot do it unless you sign a contract. There is a great deal of suffering, and federal power will have to do something more about this matter in the future than it has so far done, because after all the soldier's wife and his children are civilians. Parliament will have to go into the whole question of public health for civilians and soldiers. It is one of the greatest problems before us, but for many years past it has been made a football here. This is a comparatively rich country; the health of the Canadian people is a matter of first importance to all of us, and the first duty of a government is the care of its people. We have all been surprised at the criticism that has appeared in newspapers throughout the empire about the decadence of our race, the number of people who have been found unfit for active service, and the fact that the civilian population has been finding it exceedingly difficult to stand up against the battle of nerves or ready to serve in the war. I urge parliament to take the necessary steps to help the municipalities in this direction of caring for soldiers and civilians. The minister speaks very well over the radio—I heard him on Sunday night—and he and other members of the government might very well give their assistance in this matter. The hon. member who is at the moment in the chair (Mr. McCann) is an authority on the subject of health which I am discussing, and he and other hon. members could give valuable assistance.

I suggest that something be done to educate the people through the radio, and another means of eliciting information would be in connection with the forty-five minute rule applied here only with regard to questions and supplementary questions on the war. I believe that we have power now, but if we have not, then I suggest the rules should be changed in this regard. I am glad to see that I am getting some support in this matter, not only in connection with insurance, but in connection with the training of soldiers, the better treatment of our men, better fares, the high cost of living, dependents' allowances and so on. I have had a bill dealing with these matters since 1939 and also with the difficulties in the camps throughout Canada, because at the present time the troops cannot get home on embarkation leave for a reasonable holiday with their people. They must waste two-thirds of their leave getting up and down so that they have just a day or so to spend at home. That is one of the things that hurt recruiting. There was a resolution on the order paper in regard to this whole subject from 1939 on in my name, and I wish to thank the minister for putting on Hansard recently certain information which I had been hoping to get two years ago of the rates of pay. If this information had been put on Hansard last June when I had the return, it would have saved a good many questions which have been raised in the last three weeks; but the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) at that time rose in his place and objected to my putting anything of the sort on Hansard or having it in Votes and Proceedings. The Minister of National Defence was kind enough to put the table on Hansard on Tuesday last and members were surprised to read its contents.

Another important return was tabled yesterday in regard to the rates of all ranks of army women's pay. That also should be put on Hansard. I would ask the minister to be kind enough to have it appear in Hansard. I cannot do it in committee, but I suggest it is a document which every member of parliament should read. With regard to the new regulations which were brought down last November and changes made having to do with the amendment in connection with dependency money, a number of boards were set up last November. There were thirteen districts and one emergency branch in No. 2 district, Toronto, operating. There were in Toronto only 328 applications and all they paid out was $4,064.46. What good is that? What is the use of $4,000 in a large city in which there are so many soldiers? The minister has not been unfriendly to this question of dependency bonus. We see hundreds of people getting a civilian bonus in the civil service in Canada to-day.

I regret that the Minister of Finance is not here at the moment because there are a few things I should like to say to him. I have a great deal of respect for him, but I must say that in my opinion he has not had, in many respects, that training for the position which he should have, as I said the other day. What I have to say about ministers I say to their faces. I believe there is a great deal of suffering for want of this soldier bonus he opposed. In the riding I represent, in the district south of Gerrard street, the only time we see some people happy there is when somebody has a campaign fund on at Christmas for the help of the poor and needy. Some of the houses there are not fit for human habitation. Many of them have been condemned and changes ordered and the people have no money and no new place to go or houses. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) this afternoon read a very nice letter, which is only one of a great many letters of the same sort which I receive from soldiers' wives all over the country, complaining that they cannot live on the money they have, especially at this time when rents and food and necessities have risen to such a degree. The fact is that they have no new houses or homes, and I hope that something will be done in the coming budget to take care of dependency money and housing as well for these people.

As regards cadet services, it is very difficult to get anything said or done about this matter. In the old days the cadet services were under the control of the school boards and the boards of education, and I think it was a great mistake to take them away from these bodies. The army still has its association with the school boards, but so far as the other services are concerned this is not the case. I know a great many principals who say that when private organizations come to a collegiate institute asking for 25 students or so, the rest of the students feel that they are discriminated against. All cannot get into some private organization for military purposes. There is at the present time among the students of the collegiate institutes, an invidious distinction which should not be allowed to exist. There should be equality of treatment. It would have been far better if in connection with the three services the school boards and the boards of education had been left in control as in other days and grants made to them.

With regard to women's services, I am glad to see the improvement which has been made.

Reference has been made to the audit department, and I have no complaints in this regard, but last session I asked the minister whether the auditor-general had power. I understand that every department has a separate audit system of its own and the whole business is involved and complicated. I fail to see any coordination. I am not criticizing the army, but I do criticize the dead-hand of the treasury that does not control all of these expenditures for the war and veto some of them. The audit system does not control them adequately. A new appointment has been announced in connection with censorship, and I suggest that it might be well to censor occasionally some of this gentleman's remarks, as for instance certain utterances in New York about the defence board. I am for the censor plan of the last war.

Another matter that in my opinion calls for some remedy is the position of certain men in the publicity branches of the department. I do not see why a man who simply writes up news and publicity, a liaison officer, non-military so far, should be wearing a uniform when he is not a soldier. It is all right if he is in fact a soldier; but if anyone has not had any military training and is not actually a soldier, but is engaged in such work, then I suggest he might wear an armlet and a civilian suit. Certainly he should not allow people to think he is a soldier when he is not and has never had any military career.

What are Canada's objectives and strategy for 1942? I do not know. It seems to me, as I have been reading Hansard in the past few days, that there are priorities at the Pacific coast and in the maritimes, and that we have established with our limited defences priorities for some provinces and not for others. I believe that some statement along that line should be made. There should also be a national system teaching every citizen on the Pacific coast and in the maritimes to handle a rifle. The minister made a reply last session about that and went to considerable pains to see if something could not be done, especially in the Pacific province. I admit the minister went into it and gave an elaborate reply, but we have not the rifles for the civilian population. The Finns in Finland were ready for the enemy; they had shock troops and by guerilla war they kept the enemy at bay for months by skilled training in rifle affairs. In the schools of Ontario 50,000 are to be given military drill by the department of education this year at the expense of the school boards, and no doubt they will have miniature rifles. The people of this country will have to wake up and adopt a national policy of rifle education along that line before it is too late.

There is another matter which arose during the depression, and in connection with which the present minister has not been unsympathetic. I refer to the large number of young people who were cast into prison for riding the rods looking for a job and other minor matters. Many of these young fellows escaped sentences as vagrants but others were sent down for two years to penal institutions under this parliament. If a proper survey were made, a good many of those who are in for what may be called secondary offences might be admitted to the army. I know some oppose it. I know a commanding officer, one of the finest in France, who got into trouble in a financial way and was sent down. I wrote the new Minister of Justice in February about the matter; he was sympathetic and was going to get a survey made. We should have a survey and get the facts and train men for war or home defence or overseas service as was done in the great war.

I believe also that recruiting would be helped very much if the minister would allow men of the services a day off on such occasions as the 17th of March, the Holy Name parade, the 12th of July, St. George's day—and I see my good Scots friend on the front bench so I may add St. Andrew's day. On that great day November 30, 1941, there were 20,000 present at Varsity stadium for the Winnipeg-Ottawa final game. In the Holy Name parade there were a good many soldiers in uniform. It is a good advertisement for recruiting. I am not prepared to say anything about the 12th of July because, being an Irishman, I am too modest, but I hope some recognition will be given by the different services to the patriotic festivals I have named, for one day, or a day and a half, as was done in the great war with camps near cities.

While the plebiscite cannot be discussed here, the result of the voting was a demand for greater efficiency in our war effort, on land, in the air and on the sea. Parliament should act at once and get value for this two billion dollar vote and programme for war in 1942. The people should have more knowledge about our war effort. Criticism is not as bad here as it is in England or Washington. I disagree with the hon. member for Vancouver South we are not in a position yet to do anything out in the Pacific. We have lost command of the sea; we have made some improvements in the defence bases there, and got commandos and vast improvement.

I admit it is good, but until we regain command of the sea we cannot send an expeditionary force to the far east. This country must wake up to the fact that the war is not going to be won by the navy, any more than the war with Napoleon; it is not going to be won altogether by the air force, although the work they are doing is very material, never equalled, and wonderful. Sooner or later this country will have to contribute its quota to a peninsular war on the continent of Europe and also one in the far east, and I hope the day is not far distant when we may be ready for it, because to take the offensive, to attack, is the best defence. What defence have the people of Canada in case of a surprise attack? We do not know yet. What defence have we for the aerodromes in British Columbia? There is a unified command; the minister gave some idea of that, but it all comes back to the point that we must make up for lost time. The fact that our defences were allowed to become so inadequate is not the fault of anyone at present in the house or in the government; the people of this country and their parliament were almost a unit for disarmament, pacifism and dependence on America for defence. What precautions have we against surprise attacks? The minister made some suggestions about that. Have we priorities? No doubt we have the policy of "first come, first served," but when you want a yard of defence and there is only half a yard to go around, you have to have priority for some section of the country at the two coasts.

It must be apparent to everyone that all this weakness in our defences was known long ago. We know the trouble we have had in the far east, and the defence of the far east was the defence of Canada. How did it come about that there was a colonial conference in 1937 and Canada said, "We have no commitments, parliament will decide," and all that kind of thing? But parliament did not decide. Mr. Menzies, former prime minister of Australia, was present in this chamber not so long ago and gave his opinion as to the defence of Canada, and our empire on the Pacific; our defence in the far east is the defence of Canada just as the defence of Britain is the defence of Canada. A large part of the money provided under this resolution will sooner or later have to do with it and attack abroad not at home. It is something we have to face. It is the most important question for the people of this country. The enemy is at the front door, the back door, the side door and every door. Sooner or later we shall have to wake up to the fact that we may be invaded at all our doors, and something should be done to give us the facts about that situation.

It has come out that Australia and New Zealand have announced that they were notified by Great Britain of the weakness of Britain in the Pacific. So was Canada. It could not be expected that it would be done any other way, Canada knew and did nothing. I remember when the government in 1937 and 1938 brought down the present policy about defence, on which this resolution is based. What were the cardinal principles? The cardinal principle given then of our defence was first for home defence, but our only real home defence is in Britain, the Mediterranean, Libya and the far east. That is primary, it is not secondary; if we fail over there, it is all over with us here at home a few days later. The only other cardinal principle of our defence given in 1938 was to protect Canada's neutrality in case America was attacked by a foreign power, meaning Japan. Those are the two cardinal principles of our defence policy; there are only two. That was supported in this house by nearly all hon. members on both sides. What was the result? Well, I know what was said by eight or ten prominent speakers right here in 1937-38. They said, "Oh, we do not need to spend our money for defence now. We can reduce them and rely on the league and disarmament. The United States will protect our shores. British Columbia does not need any defences, nor do the maritime provinces; the United States are going to do it on both oceans." Then war came, and we cannot get ready in a day or a year to rearm.

Let me read a paragraph from a statement of Sir Keith Murdoch of Australia. He is arguing for the immediate need of a war cabinet to meet the Pacific disaster. He said:

> The entry of stout dominion minds into the war council, and of overseas service men and business men into the army, navy, air and supply councils has become of great importance for the two reasons that the dominions will not stand grave decisions going against them unless they are in those decisions, and that something must be done to improve the war management.

He is right, yet, Canada opposes it. The dominion prime ministers or their deputies can compose it.

Then we were told of the losses in the far east. Mr. Menzies, the distinguished former prime minister of Australia, who spoke to us in this chamber not so long ago, has since stated that as prime minister he was in possession of facts revealing the dangerous but inescapable weaknesses of our defences in the east. It is reasonable to suppose that

Mr. Fraser, Prime Minister of New Zealand, also had knowledge as to that state of affairs, and so did Canada, I charge. That cannot be denied; we refused to cooperate. Canada had this information long before the present minister came to office; Canada knew all about the weakness in the Pacific. As the Times has said, the essence of strategy at its highest level is the assessment of priorities as between the various theatres of war. After dangers have been foreseen, then weaknesses must be deliberately tolerated in some places in order that decisive strength may be concentrated elsewhere, because Britain and her empire were not ready to meet an armed foe. We must bear in mind the old adage that half a yard of cloth cannot be made to do what a yard will do.

I am sorry I had to bring up these matters at this time, but I think it of the utmost importance that we should face the facts before it is too late, and before there is a surprise attack on Canada, a coveted land. I suggest further that, as suggested, we should amend our rules in order to do away with lengthy debates of this kind. In the mother country for the first few days of the last war they followed the same practice we are following to-day, but then they got down to the procedure of question, answer and supplementary question. There has not been a question placed on the order paper during the last few weeks that could not have been answered satisfactorily on the orders of the day, with supplementary questions that would prevent weeks of debates.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to ask one or two questions. Are female medical officers taken into the service in order to check on applicants for the women's service corps? Has any consideration been given to appointing women medical officers to the dependents' allowance boards? Some mention has been made of the emergency board in connection with dependents' allowances. I understand that boards have been set up at various points throughout the country. Could the minister tell us in which districts those boards have been set up? Then there is one further question before I sit down. Are sulphanilamide tablets being given to the men on active service, for use in case of wounding? I understand that after the Pearl Harbour bombing the men who had sulphanilamide tablets were saved, while those who did not have them became casualties.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend asked about medical officers for the Canadian Women's Army Corps. No female medical officers have been appointed, but the matter is under consideration and a certain number will be appointed. Then as to question No. 2, in regard to the dependents' allowance board, I do not think any medical officers are appointed to those boards, or to the board of trustees.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would it not be a wise thing to do, with the number of women in the service corps increasing all the time? Would it not be wise to have female medical officers there?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend misunderstood me. I said we expected to appoint female medical officers for the examination and check-up of members of the Canadian Women's Army Corps. Then I thought my hon. friend also asked whether or not women medical officers could be appointed in connection with the dependents' allowance board of trustees.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Not the trustees; the board.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall inquire about that, but I have not in mind that the dependents' allowance boards have medical officers. There may be one medical officer who checks over the files, but I do not think examinations are made by the dependents' allowance board. With regard to sulphanilamide, that is not issued to the individual soldiers, but the medical officers are supplied with it, and the matter is receiving consideration now.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Where are the boards set up under the dependents' allowance?

Mr. RALSTON: I put that information on Hansard somewhere, and if my hon. friend does not mind I will send him the reference later.

Mr. BRUCE: I hesitate to prolong this debate, Mr. Chairman, because I consider that the minister has been very painstaking and patient in his answers to a great many questions. I have no intention of submitting any further questions, but I thought I might be able to add something to the debate in view of two or three matters which have come up this afternoon.

Reference was made to the practice as to operating on hernias. This question came up also during the last war, when I made an investigation of the medical services overseas in 1917 and reported my findings to the Minister of Militia. That report should be in the library. To-day I tried unsuccessfully to obtain a copy, although in the sessional papers I was able to obtain the interim report, made in reply to my report; so I shall have to look up another copy of my report in order to make sure that it is available in the library here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is available.

Mr. BRUCE: Our experience then confirmed what was said by the minister this afternoon as to the attitude now taken by his medical officers in regard to operations on hernias upon men serving in the army, at least during the period of their service. I suggested then, as I suggest now, that if a soldier is found to be suffering from hernia which could be relieved by an operation, the the operation should be performed by a surgical specialist. I do not believe it should be performed by the ordinary medical officer attached to a hospital or other army unit, because most of these officers are not experienced in this work. Even though a hernia is a tempting operation for young, inexperienced men to perform, one should remember that it may be attended with considerable difficulty and, if not performed in the most up-to-date manner, may result unfortunately or may be followed by a recurrence, in which event it would be better not to have been done at all. Modern methods have reduced the incidence of recurrence in operations on hernia by as much as 60 per cent or more. In other words there are at least 60 per cent fewer recurrences under modern methods of operating as compared with the ratio, say even twenty years ago.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand they never think of operating, so far as attempting to mend a man is concerned, on what they call a double hernia. Do they ever do that in order to fit a man for a medical category?

Mr. BRUCE: I think under appropriate modern surgery, by a skilled specialist in this type of work, the double operation might very well be undertaken, but of course it should never be performed by men who are not skilled in this work. You know that in the modern successful operation fascia is transplanted from the thigh to close the hernia; that is, the so-called living suture is used instead of the old method of catgut or silk. This method, which was devised by a Toronto surgeon, Doctor W. E. Gallie, a number of years ago, has stood up under the most severe tests; and when that method is used I think perhaps 90 per cent of the cases will result in a permanent cure and fit the man for any kind of laborious work, including service in the army.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer and which is dealt with in P.C. 2229, namely, dietetic and nutritional treatment. I placed some questions on the order paper recently in connection with the British government requiring some Canadian authority, which I presumed was the government, to have the flour sold them fortified by the use of synthetic vitamin B; that is by what is known as thiamin. The answer I received was that there was no information. This answer, I believe, was correct, because I understand that it is a matter between the millers and the British importing board.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. BRUCE: The miller is required to add ·2 grams of thiamin to every 280 pounds of flour. For a considerable period experiments have been conducted in flour mills in Canada in an attempt to find a method of retaining in the flour the essential vitamins of food of nutritional value, particularly the various forms of vitamin B. Thiamin, or what is known as vitamin B-1, is only one of eight or nine vitamins in the B group. Even though a synthetic vitamin is added to the flour it is not as good as retaining the vitamins present in the wheat. During the last year or so the millers, by a series of experiments, have evolved a method of retaining these important vitamins in the flour. I understand that all the large mills have now perfected a process by which they can retain these vitamins in the flour. Previously it could be retained only in the dark type of flour from which was made brown bread, but with the perfected process they can now produce a white flour containing all the essential vitamins which, in turn, will make a white loaf. Not only are they able to do that, but the loaf is indistinguishable in appearance and taste from the ordinary white loaf which has been in common use and demand for a long period of time.

We have had many illustrations of the need of increased nutritional values for our growing population. What we have in mind particularly is to see to it that our young boys receive food of the proper nutritional value so that when they go into the army they will be of the proper standard of fitness to enable them to be placed in category A. I have a few figures which I shall give in a moment. If these important and essential vitamins can be retained by the use of a process worked out by our millers and scientists, then why does not the government insist that the bread supplied, not only to our troops but to our civilians, shall be made from this type of flour?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. member means to make it compulsory?

Mr. BRUCE: Yes, I would make it compulsory. The large millers are using this process successfully, and if the smaller millers find that they have to compete with the larger millers, they would soon fall in line. I understand that it is not an expensive process, and that the present mills can be converted at very little cost. If our people are suffering from lack of nutrition, as was shown by the recruitments in the early period of this war, and I presume is still the case, then I suggest it is highly desirable that the government make it compulsory that our troops and our civilians alike have the benefit of this so-called vitamin B white flour Canada-approved.

I think it is a fact that of the first 50,000 recruits called up for compulsory military service, 40 per cent failed to make category A after being examined by their family physicians, while another 10 per cent were rejected when examined by the military medical boards. It might be interesting to mention here that statistically the twenty-two-year-old Canadian is found to be five foot six and three-fifths inches in height, and he weighs 144·6 pounds. The weight and height and physical well-being vary in different parts of Canada, and the best specimens of Canadian youth come from Prince Edward Island. Of the Prince Edward Islanders 80·16 per cent graded A. Perhaps the minister will appreciate that fact, since he represents a constituency in that province.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He is not a Prince Edward Islander; he is only a visitor.

Mr. BRUCE: The Sirois report drew attention to the wide and unnecessary variations in the health picture of Canada and to the tragic results of grossly inadequate public health services. This matter will be of interest to the minister of health. They were concerned about economic waste, whereas we are now concerned about the wastage of man-power needed for our industries and armed forces. I am glad to know that an interdepartmental committee is sitting in Ottawa to study this problem. Physical defects among recruits for our armed forces caused the federal government to set up this new nutrition branch to deal with the whole problem of health in war time, with special emphasis on the health of workers in industry. This is a move in the right direction, and I am sure it will produce valuable results.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the committee under Doctor Hunter.

Mr. BRUCE: I think it is under Doctor Pett.

Mr. RALSTON: There is a committee under Doctor Hunter of the university of Toronto.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The nutrition committee is under Doctor Pett.

Mr. BRUCE: I was not aware of the other committee. I should like to mention that in England 1,000 men who had been rejected by the army medical boards were taken to a camp provided by the army and fed a special diet for six months. At the end of this time 85 per cent were accepted by the army. I wonder if something of the kind could not be instituted in this country. Health depends more than we realize upon the B and C vitamins. We need milk, we need cereals, and we need green and yellow vegetables, citrus fruits and tomatoes. Vitamin A is also necessary for the eyes. The maligned potato is still a basis of a good diet.

Mr. RALSTON: Prince Edward Island once again.

Mr. BRUCE: This will please the leader of my party. I am hoping as a consequence that the sale of this product in his part of the country will be increased. It is interesting to note that peanut butter is high in calorific value. It is rich in carbohydrates and fats, and contains somewhat more protein than beef. It is among the best sources of vitamin B and is cheap.

Mr. REID: You would not leave out oatmeal, would you?

Mr. BRUCE: Oh, no, I mentioned cereals earlier in my remarks. A pint of vitamin D milk, whole-wheat peanut butter sandwiches, and a tomato or an orange make a nearly perfect lunch for a child. I hope these few remarks may be helpful to the minister and to the health department.

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Chairman, on March 27 I was directing to the house some remarks in regard to recruiting, a subject which was exercising my mind at the time and to which I have given some thought and study since. I have in the meantime made a few observations which I should like to give to the house.

Since returning to Ottawa I have observed something which I think has come under the observation of all members of the house. No later than half-past two this afternoon I passed the most centrally located recruiting station in the city of Ottawa, which, as you will recall, is in the Canadian National railway ticket office on Sparks street. A young man was sitting there being interviewed by a private or a corporal. I wondered at the time just what that young lad's feelings and emotions were as he sat beside the man in uniform in that office where ten or twelve clerks were engaged in their daily routine, where there were stenographers, and salesmen selling tickets, and about six people like myself in there buying tickets or making inquiries with regard to transportation. I thought to myself, this is not fair to Canadian youth: to have a young volunteer like this sitting alongside a soldier in uniform, subjected to the gaze of the indifferent and the curious, the interested and the uninterested, and even of those who might be scorning all he was doing at the moment when he was about to dedicate his life to his country. Our young Canadian deserves better of our country and of the cause for which we are fighting. I tried to picture myself in that young man's position twenty or twenty-five years ago, and I wondered what thoughts were passing through his mind as he sat there under the gaze of us all, and the agitation of mind and soul he had experienced possibly in the last twenty-four hours, when he was making up his mind. I imagine that he probably came there looking for advice, sympathy and help in making a momentous decision. A man who comes to volunteer at any of our recruiting offices is entitled at least, in my opinion, to the courtesy of privacy when he is about to make his decision.

Then my mind turned to the officer in charge of the recruiting office and I thought to myself, what is uppermost in his mind? Is he thinking in terms of the young man who has had the courage to come in and offer his life for his country? Or is he thinking in terms of the army and of his job of getting men for the army? I imagine the thought that was uppermost in the recruiting officer's mind was: "Here I have another recruit for the army." I am sure that his success or failure in the eyes of his superior officer depends upon the number of young or middle-aged men who enlist for the Canadian army in that particular recruiting station.

We have heard a lot about selective service. I wonder whether we are applying selective service even in our voluntary enlistment system to-day. That young man may have come from forty or fifty or maybe a hundred miles from Ottawa, where there was no local regiment in his town or village, no unit of the air force or of the navy. He may never have seen a ship at sea or a squadron of planes in the air and may have had little notion in which of the three armed forces he was best qualified to serve his country. It does seem to me that that man is entitled to the best advice and counsel that our country can afford. It should surely not be left to caprice or chance or even his whim or fancy which of the services he should join. Surely the paramount consideration should be that of public need and necessity. I am afraid that some of the dissatisfaction which exists in our army, navy and air force is due to the fact that men have gone into a particular service without proper advice as to where, by reason of their background, education, training, experience and ability, natural or acquired, they can individually best serve their country. I suggest that the fact that the young man whom I saw this afternoon happened to run into an army recruiting office makes it almost certain that he is now, while I am speaking, a member of his majesty's army. But I wonder whether that is the place where he can best serve his country. If by chance he had stepped into the navy recruiting office, I wonder whether he would not now be a member of the Canadian navy, or if peradventure he had gone into another recruiting office further down the street, I wonder whether he would not now be a member of his majesty's air force. Should such a serious decision as that be left to chance? Are we to look at this thing and allow his fate to be decided solely from the point of view of the needs of the army, or the aggressiveness of the air force regarding recruiting, or by the romantic appeal of the navy? Is chance to be the deciding factor as to which service the young man shall join?

I think we are pretty well convinced now that the time has gone by when men flock to the army in the large numbers witnessed at the outbreak of the war, when the more enthusiastic patriots and some of the unemployed were flocking to the colours. To-day the men offering are possibly more sober-minded or hesitant, thinking of their ties of home and of duty to loved ones who are dependent upon them.

One of the two outstanding things which have been accomplished in Canada in this war has been the creation of the personnel selection service, of which the minister spoke yesterday afternoon in answer to a member representing one of the Winnipeg seats. I was very much interested in what the minister said. That move is very much to be commended. But it does seem to me that the advice, experience and knowledge of these personnel experts, trained medical men and psychologists, could best be applied when the young man first comes forward to offer his services. That is the time he should get counsel and advice as to where, in the opinion of these men, he can best serve. I believe the minister remarked that possibly that branch had not been expanded to the extent he wished it to be, because of inability to get sufficient trained men. I wonder whether there is a personnel selection branch in the air force, and similarly for the navy. If not, surely there should be. But why three personnel selection branches? Why three different recruiting depots? Why not one recruiting depot at which Canadian manhood should apply and receive advice from those familiar with the wants and needs of our three services, and be directed into the branch which needs men and in which the particular individual can best serve his king and country? To me the present system of recruiting seems extravagant and shows a lack of cooperation which is reflected down through our three armed forces. It demonstrates failure to appreciate the requirements of the situation. We get the money to finance this war, not through the efforts of the soldiers, the sailors or the airmen, but by relying upon our civilian population and specifically upon men who are skilled in selling victory bonds and promoting the sale of war savings certificates. When it comes to the manufacture of munitions of war, whether they be guns or bullets, uniforms or shoes, we rely upon our trained civilian men, institutions and organizations to provide our armed services with these things. I suggest that the same practice, the same reasoning and the same logic should apply in so far as the recruitment and selection of our manpower are concerned.

In that connection I wish to refer to the work of another department of the army, upon which I think the minister is very much to be congratulated. It has demonstrated more eloquently than anything I can say, through practical results, the theory which I have enunciated regarding the obtaining of men.

In Alberta there are, I believe, at the present time working in cooperation with the army, over 345 civilian agencies. No longer do we have an officer in uniform with a retinue of subordinates travelling from point to point to await the arrival of prospective recruits. In each of these towns and cities the recruiting officer is a civilian, a man of character, reputation, standing and past experience in one of the armed services, and it is generally known or made known to the community that he is there to counsel and advise young men who are entertaining the notion or impressed with the duty of offering their services to their country. This system has worked out remarkably well, and I commend the minister and those associated with him for the success which has attended their efforts in my own province. I should like to inquire from him how it is working out elsewhere, and whether we cannot have more of that civilian recruiting. I am told, regarding one office in my own city, that a simple advertisement brought in twenty-five responses from tradesmen and mechanics who had seen the classified advertisement in the local papers requesting those interested to present themselves at the office of the assistant civilian director of recruiting services. The response and reaction were splendid, in this respect, that the mechanic, were he young or elderly, came to a private office, was met by a man in civilian clothes, sat down at the desk on terms of perfect freedom and equality with his interviewer, there was not the embarrassment of a private citizen talking to a man who was already in the army, and counsel and advice were given without regard to any particular branch of the service. I know that one man, a diesel expert working in a country garage, was sent to a place east of Calgary, where a diesel expert was urgently needed in the army. I know that another applicant, who had served his apprenticeship on the Clyde and was an experienced shipbuilder, was not sent to the army or the navy or the air force, but was advised that he could best serve his king and country in the shipbuilding yards at Vancouver. And so on down the line.

I should welcome a statement from the minister as to what, if any, cooperation or coordination there is, with respect to recruiting, between the three armed services. I wonder how many hon. members are familiar with the situation of the young man who has volunteered his services for the air force and, although a period of three to six months has intervened, has not been called and is still carrying on in civilian life. We were told some months ago that the Department of National Defence for Naval Services had at that time a waiting list of 4,000 or 5,000. Where is the need to-day? Is it certain that these 5,000 men waiting to be called to the navy, these 10,000 or 20,000 waiting to be called to the air force, can best serve their country in those services? Who knows? Has anybody examined these men having regard to their potential capacities and abilities, in order to ascertain whether some who have volunteered for the navy could not better serve their country in the tanks or in the artillery? What is it that decides where a man shall go? Is it the needs of the country, or his training, or experience and background; or merely his whim or preference; or is it, who "gets to him" first?

Another question in my mind is, what cooperation is there between the three armed forces in Canada in so far as their training is concerned? I have yet to hear of any place where the army and the air force are carrying out their training in cooperation with each other. That may have been done, but I was wondering, because I had not seen or heard that it had been done; and yet we are all aware that in every great battle fought so far in this war it has been the close cooperation or lack of it between the air force, the artillery and the infantry that has spelled success or failure as the case may be. I would welcome a statement from the minister, if he is at liberty to give one, as to the extent to which our two or three forces—because we have three now—are cooperating in training. What does the airman know about the ground tactics and operations of the infantryman. Is there any cooperation as between the navy and air force so far as training is concerned?

I should like to have a statement from the minister on another point, because I have had this thrown at me on two or three occasions, that once a man is in the navy he must perforce stay there regardless of his personal desires or training or ability, that he cannot go from the navy to the air force or from the air force to the infantry. I do not know whether that is well-founded or not, but only yesterday I received a letter from one of my constituents indicating that he was not permitted to transfer from one force to another. I would welcome a statement on this point.

Another question that has disturbed me a little is this. I should like to know if the minister is at liberty to tell us what, if any, has been the number of desertions from the Canadian army attendant upon departure from Canada for overseas, and what disposition, if any, is made of those who have deserted, if and when found. I should like to know whether or not desertion is a common practice or whether the department have knowledge of any extensive dismissals of persons from the army, the navy or the air force for any crime record or absence without leave, and whether such persons have gone to another district and reenlisted in one of the armed services. I am led to believe that there is a considerable number. Far be it from me to spread rumours, but I should like to know as a matter of fact what action is taken with regard to such persons.

There is one other question that is pertinent so far as the financing of the army and of the war effort is concerned. I should like to know with respect to the permanent staff whether they are still eligible for pensions. I believe that in the ordinary course of events they are entitled to pension after twenty-one years in the service. What happens to a man who is a sergeant or a corporal in the permanent staff and who since the outbreak of war, has become a major or a colonel—and I believe that has happened. Will he retire on pension at the colonel's rating, or will he retire at the status which he had at the time of the outbreak of war?

Mr. GILLIS: I agree with the member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) that the minister has been very patient and thorough in his answers to the committee on questions that have been brought to his attention. I wish to come back for a moment to the question of dependents' allowances in order to bring another category to his attention, because in my opinion this category is getting anything but justice. I refer now to the man who enlists and has a housekeeper. The reason why I bring this to the minister's attention is that I thoroughly discussed at least two cases with the allowance board, but I have not to date received any redress. I wish to submit one case in particular. The mother died in 1931, and the daughter at that time had to leave school, become the housekeeper and care for the rest of the family. The father enlisted fourteen or fifteen months ago. The family is receiving no income with the exception of the assigned pay of the father.

Mr. RALSTON: Is the daughter still keeping house?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes, and has been continuously since 1931. A younger brother at the present time is coming out of a sanatorium after undergoing treatment for tuberculosis, and on the 1st of May I received another letter asking whether something could not be done. This is not an isolated case. There are several of this kind, to my knowledge, and I presume there are a good many of them throughout the country. I have written to the minister to-day on the subject, and I leave this case specifically with him.

Mr. RALSTON: What reason did the board give for not making the allowance on account of the daughter who was in the position of housekeeper?

Mr. GILLIS: The only reason the dependent has received is that she does not come under the regulations within the meaning of "dependent", because she is a housekeeper, and is a daughter and not the wife of the man. That is the attitude they have taken right through the case.

Another thought I should like to leave with the minister is with regard to boys under age who enlist. I know that the regulations definitely state that no boy shall go overseas unless he is nineteen, but there are many boys who are enlisting by covering up their ages. The reason for that is that in some instances the parents cannot keep them at school in the higher grades. The books cost a lot of money. Moreover, they cannot get employment when they leave school; they go to a recruiting officer and say they are nineteen; after they have been in for six or eight months taking training and are ready to proceed overseas, the parents produce a certificate, and the boy is taken out of the army. The point I make is that the boy is relegated back to the streets. There is no employment for him, particularly in the part of the country from which I come, and I am aware of many cases of this kind. Has the department ever given any consideration to the establishment of a boys' brigade or battalion such as we had during the last war?

Instead of wasting the training that has been given, sending them back to the street whence they came, would it not be better to place them in a trade school and give them some training for employment in industry which would serve a purpose now and fit them for something after the war? Many of these boys are going overseas at that age, and I know that, as happened during the last war, many of them who went over are weeded out. A boy seventeen years of age is not much good on active service; he is too young. I have a case in point to-day, a letter received from a father who has one boy eighteen years of age in England. The second boy, who is only seventeen, has now gone over. The father made application to the Department of National Defence, and he encloses to me a letter signed for the Adjutant, Captain MacCallum, dated April 10, giving him the assurance that this boy would not proceed overseas until he was nineteen years of age.

Mr. RALSTON: That is the younger one?

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. The next thing he knows is he is informed that the boy is in England, regardless of the letter of the adjutant. The question of boys under age is something to which I think the department should give serious consideration.

Another category about which something should be done is that of men weeded out of the army. I have seen many discharge certificates where men and boys were discharged by reason of being underweight, with no particular disability. Another discharge certificate would read, "Does not come up to the required physical standards." Again no particular disability. With regard to most people discharged by reason of being underweight, this is due to lack of proper food. Instead of sending these people back to the street—certainly no industry wants a man in that physical condition—if a period of training and proper feeding were given in a camp, the chances are that within a few months they would meet the required physical standards.

I thought these three points were worth bringing to the attention of the minister because I know there are many cases such as I have described.

Mr. RALSTON: In reference to the eighteen-year old boy, if he is eighteen I am instructed that he is kept overseas unless his parents desire him to come home. As to the one seventeen years old, the general rule is to discharge him. I must say that unless he applies or makes it noticeable what his age is and if he wants to stay in the army, I do not think he is "turfed" to use the army expression. But a case of this kind where the adjutant of the battalion told him he would not be sent overseas is to my mind absolutely unexplainable. There obviously it was accepted that he was seventeen and therefore he should not have gone overseas. Has my hon. friend written me about that?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the nutritional cases, I am obliged to the committee for two or three instances becauses they all aid in discovering a general trend. I cannot understand the medical board discharging a man on the ground of underweight or that he does not come up to the required standard. I understand that discharges should be specific, indicating what the disability is. With regard to nutrition my hon. friend is perfectly right, and it was made clear in the statement by the Prime Minister in connection with man-power. He pointed out that it is and has been standard practice for the army to accept men for service who required only dental treatment, provision of glasses, or nutritional improvement, and they are to be given them. In the face of that statement of policy, I do not understand why a man is discharged for being underweight unless he has some functional or organic disability which means that he cannot be brought up to weight by proper nutrition. I shall certainly inquire into that case.

My hon. friend mentioned another case, the matter of dependents' allowances; I shall look into that. It sounds as if there should be an allowance for the daughter who is keeping house, and why it is not granted we shall have to find out from the dependents' allowance board. My hon. friend suggested that the regulations did not cover it, but I cannot believe that; I am satisfied they do cover the case of someone taking the place of the mother.

Mr. GILLIS: It has been a matter of correspondence with the department, the allowance board, for the last five or six months.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for Broadview mentioned that he would like to have put on Hansard the return with regard to pay and allowances and the emoluments of officers and members of the women's army. Since it is only part of the return I would ask permission of the committee to have this additional return put on the record. It is really a companion to the return I put on the other night at the hon. member's request. The return is as follows:

Supplementary Return to Order of the House of Commons No. 151
Dated 26th March, 1942—Mover, Mr. Church

1. What is the pay, sustenance allowances, and all other emoluments of officers and men of His Majesty's three forces?

I think it was the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards) who spoke of the matter of transfers. There is no right of transfer as between any of the arms of the service. That is, after a man is in as a member of one arm he cannot as of right ask transfer to some other. The procedure is that he applies to his commanding officer for transfer to the other service, and the considerations which influence the commanding officer in granting or refusing that request are obviously (1) how long the man has been training, how much time has been spent fitting him for the particular arm of the service in which he is, and (2) his usefulness in connection with that arm of the service. I think reasonable endeavour is made to meet his desires, but obviously if you had a man highly trained for a year or two as a signaller in a particular unit, the commanding officer would feel reluctant to let him go to some other arm of the service where perhaps that training would not be so valuable.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the position with respect to transfer to different branches of the same service, that is in the army; say transfer to the ordnance or the infantry? Does the man there have some option, or must he go where he is put? I know an instance of a man who understood he was going to the ordnance from the very beginning, but he was put into the artillery. He did not want to go there. He had a bent for the ordnance. I am not sure that the case has been settled yet. I have been trying to help him fulfil his desire, but I realize that there are two sides to the question. Possibly he is not fitted for the ordnance. Someone higher up would have to make the decision, but there ought to be some flexibility in a case like that.

Mr. RALSTON: Well, he does enlist for general service and he can be transferred from one branch of the army to another; that is the legal position. Certainly his desires are consulted. There are cases, many of them, and this may be one, in which the recruiting officer may have told him he would be taken into the ordnance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that is the fact in this case. That is the representation to me.

Mr. RALSTON: Legally it is a case where he can be sent from one branch of the army to the other.

The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked for a list of the places where advisory committees to the dependents' board of trustees had been set up. I have given him the reference, which is page 1932 of Hansard.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are they functioning?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Is there any provision whereby a man in the air force at a particular training centre, desiring to be transferred to another training centre giving the same sort of training, may have that change made?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend asks with regard to the air force, and I can answer only as to the army. In the army the man would be entitled to appear before his commanding officer and make the request, giving his reasons. That request would be considered, and the action taken would depend upon the exigencies of the service. The man has no right to a transfer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is sometimes given on compassionate grounds?

Mr. RALSTON: Sometimes that is done on compassionate grounds; families may be located at one place or another, and for the time being the man may be allowed to go to a certain camp or centre. I am speaking of the army, not the air force, about which my hon. friend really is asking. I must say that we cannot take into consideration very much the compassionate grounds of which my hon. friend speaks. Obviously, since there are now training centres all over Canada, men would like to go to the particular training centre nearest their homes. That cannot be done, and very often it is obviously desirable that they should go somewhere else, in order to gain experience away from home.

Mr. GRAYDON: Some months ago, according to an announcement in the press and, if my memory serves me aright, an announcement also in this house, provision was made for the issuing of discharge buttons, or at least buttons which would indicate that a person had been rejected after having applied for enlistment in the active service forces. I was wondering to what extent these rejection buttons had been issued and what were the regulations covering their distribution.

Mr. RALSTON: There are two buttons available. One is the discharge button; that is to say, a man who has enlisted for general service and who later has been discharged, receives one type of button. The other is the applicant for enlistment button. The adjutant-general cannot tell me the number issued so far, but they are available on application.

Mr. GRAYDON: In connection with these applications for enlistment, if a man enlists for any particular branch of the service and is rejected, is a button issued by virtue of that application, or does it have to be a general enlistment?

Mr. RALSTON: If he is rejected by the army, that is sufficient. He must have a rejection from the army before he gets the applicant for enlistment button.

Mr. GRAYDON: Could the minister also give the committee some information with respect to the army train which is going across Canada at the moment, as to how long it has been in operation, and as to the personnel accompanying that train across the country?

Mr. RALSTON: It started on February 3 and, as I remember it, went first to central Canada, then east, and then west. I think it is due back very soon now. As to the personnel, Lieutenant-Colonel McKenna is in command, and the staff were selected by him in conjunction with the recruiting branch, or the adjutant-general's branch. This personnel were changed in the various parts of the country to which the train went. When the train was in the west, personnel from the west were put on the train, and in central and eastern Canada personnel from those territories accompanied the train.

Mr. GRAYDON: Was the purpose of the train to stimulate recruiting?

Mr. RALSTON: To stimulate recruiting and interest in the army. It was simply taking the army to Canadians at a time when we could not have demonstrations which would bring Canadians to the army. As the hon. gentleman knows, from time to time people have asked for armoured demonstrations. We have had detachments go to various places and give these demonstrations, but that could not be done in the winter. So it was suggested that we should use the railway instead of using the roads. In addition, I believe one car was devoted to the victory loan campaign, and part of one car to the Red Cross as well.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like to ask a question as a matter of information, because I have received a great many wires and complaints about it. Who advised the stops that were made in British Columbia?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend that, but, as far as I know, I do not believe there was anyone in this house who did not advise stops. As a matter of fact, the adjutant-general tells me that a real endeavour was made to have stops at all places possible, where there might be interest shown. He says further that one factor which governed was the physical factor, that is, the length of the railway sidings at the various points, which decided whether or not the train could be accommodated there. So the railways had to be consulted in deciding where the stops should be made.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Would the minister be kind enough after the dinner recess, or at some other convenient time, to make a general statement in connection with the recommendations brought in last year with regard to an interdepartmental committee functioning as between the different branches of the service, and so on? I think the minister knows to what I refer.

Mr. BENCE: There are two points I should like to clear up. The first is whether or not men in category C1 are being called up under the national mobilization regulations. The second is in connection with the buttons that were referred to by the hon. member for Peel. My understanding is that men in categories D and E are given these buttons but that men in category C1 do not receive them, though C1 men are being turned down for active service. In view of that fact I should like the minister to explain why these men are not entitled to buttons.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend may not think it is a good reason, but the adjutant-general tells me that the man in category E is the only man who is almost definitely out. An E-category man may improve, but there is very little chance of it. There is much more chance that a C-category man may improve, and so far the button has not been issued to men in C category, because the time may come when they may be eligible for enlistment.

Mr. BENCE: By virtue of the medical qualifications being reduced?

Mr. RALSTON: By virtue of a change in their category. However, the matter is still under advisement.

Mr. BENCE: But that man is required to sign an undertaking that if the class in which he is placed eventually comes within the category of men eligible for active service, he will submit himself for further examination. So there is no reason why a C1 man should not be given a button.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is quite right, and it even goes further than that. As a matter of fact, the regulations under which the badges are issued provide that there is a right to recall the badge itself if subsequently the category in which the applicant is placed becomes a category which should be called up. As I indicated, however, the matter is still under advisement.

My hon. friend was good enough to send his other question to me. That was whether any men in the medical category C1 have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, as the regulations are administered. I think that is the question. Of course my hon. friend understands that under the general regulations any category could be called, but, as I understand the situation, under the instructions issued to the medical officers, at the present time the only men who are being sent in, who are being forwarded to the training centres after having been examined by the medical officer in the particular town, are men who have passed that medical officer as A. If they get into the training centre and, after being examined by the army officer, turn out to be B, but not lower, they are retained in the training centre. The specific answer to my hon. friend's question is that C category are not called in the sense that C category are returned home if, on examination by the local medical officer, they turn out to be in that category.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman, when the Prime Minister announced the new orders in council providing for the national selective service programme he stated that provision was being made for the calling up of aliens, and similar statements have appeared at different times in the press. For example, we find in "Canada's War Record" of May, 1942, this statement:

> Liability for military service is being extended to all residents in Canada whether citizens or not.

There have also been statements in the press to the effect that the calling up of men who are not British subjects would have to wait for the conclusion of international negotiations with the countries of which those aliens are citizens. Would the minister tell us when these aliens will be called up and in what way they will be used by the armed forces? It would also be interesting if the minister could tell us what groups of aliens are to be called up.

Mr. RALSTON: That matter has not been settled yet. It is in the hands of the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. GREEN: What is the situation with regard to Canadians in other countries? Why is it necessary for Canada to enter into an agreement with each of the governments concerned?

Mr. RALSTON: Because I think each government as a matter of international law reserves its rights with regard to other nationals in its own country. But my hon. friend is getting me beyond my depth, and I do not propose to go into that matter at any length. I can only say that the matter is under consideration and, I believe, under negotiation by the Department of External Affairs at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: In what way will these aliens be used by the Canadian armed forces? Will they be put, for example, into the armed forces, or are they to be used on road work, or has the government some other plan in mind regarding them? Surely the government must have had some plan in mind when it decided to call up these men.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the decision was to open negotiations with regard to calling the men up. I cannot forecast in what way they will be used. So far as I know they will probably be used in the same way as others who are called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. GREEN: Go right into the armed forces?

Mr. RALSTON: That is what I say, so far as I know. I have no reason for thinking otherwise, except that they might be used for any other purpose for which they could be called up under the act.

Mr. GREEN: What is the present situation with regard to United States citizens in our Canadian forces?

Mr. RALSTON: There are two phases to it, as my hon. friend knows. One phase is that United States citizens in Canada were given a certain option to go back to their own forces, if the option was exercised by a certain date, and that date has been extended. There was a reciprocal provision with regard to Canadians in the United States forces. The other matter, the calling up of aliens in Canada, is still under consideration by the Department of External Affairs, along with the other question which my hon. friend mentioned which has to do with all aliens.

Mr. GREEN: Press dispatches yesterday stated that representatives of the armed forces of the United States would land at Saint John on May 5, which is to-day, apparently to make arrangements for giving United States citizens who are serving in the Canadian forces an opportunity to transfer to United States forces. Can the minister tell us anything about that?

Mr. RALSTON: That is part of the agreement which has been or is being concluded between the United States and ourselves. The parties who are coming here are coming for the purpose of meeting, at various points across Canada, United States citizens in our own services who have elected to go to the United States, and arranging for their medical examination and details with regard to transportation and so forth.

Mr. GREEN: How many men in the Canadian forces will be affected?

Mr. RALSTON: No one has any figures on that so far as I know. I think I stated some time ago—it was just a general statement and was not made in connection with these negotiations—that there were from six to seven thousand United States citizens in the Canadian army. I also stated that including staff pilots there were—I am speaking from memory—at that time some 2,300 in the Canadian air force. That was some time ago, and I have no doubt that there are quite a number more who have joined the air force since.

Mr. BROOKS: Are not friendly aliens in Canada subject now to call by their own governments or by their governments in exile in other countries?

Mr. RALSTON: Oh, yes, they are subject to call under their own laws, but the Canadian government under international law does not necessarily assist in the enforcement of those laws.

Mr. BROOKS: But they are notified by their own government?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. GRAYDON: At an earlier stage of this debate I raised the question of easier transportation facilities for the men on active service and suggested that the minister might consider calling together a small committee of men in the ranks of the armed forces for the purpose of advising in connection with some of the matters to which I then referred. It is along that line I want to say a word further to-night. I am advised that in the newly organized United States army they have a system which I bring to the attention of the minister with some reluctance because it is not likely that he will pay any more attention to his civilian critics than we are justly entitled to but I hope this example may not be overlooked in the new disciplinary arrangements which the Canadian army has in mind. In an effort towards what is regarded as the democratization of the United States army, 3,000 questionnaires, each containing 118 questions, have been sent to a selected number of men in the ranks. In other words, these men have been asked to give essential opinions regarding several important aspects of the army's work. One of these questions asks how the services of the man in the armed forces may be made more efficient; another invites suggestions as to improvement of the army in efficiency, discipline and other respects. This approach to the troops may be said to follow out in a more comprehensive way the suggestion which I originally made of a select committee consisting of men in the ranks. Perhaps the reference of army matters to the "man underneath" is not so unorthodox a procedure as upon its face it may seem to be. In the formulation of future policies the minister might give some consideration to this suggestion which comes from the United States army itself. May I ask whether the department has any plans in mind which would lead to that objective?

Mr. RALSTON: As a matter of fact, we have an organization which was set up comparatively recently; we call it a special services directorate. It deals with just such matters as my hon. friend has mentioned—shall I say, matters of morale; that is part of it, on matters both inside and outside the army, suggestions either from civilians or from soldiers to improve the service of the individual, to employ his capacities more usefully, and also for the improvement of the army generally.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the machinery actually been set in operation?

Mr. RALSTON: No.

Mr. BROOKS: There has been a questionnaire.

Mr. RALSTON: When my hon. friend says "machinery", no questionnaires have been sent out along the lines he has suggested, but other steps have been taken to secure opinions and views with regard to such matters.

Mr. HAZEN: I wish to submit to the minister one or two questions which will not take long to ask but may take longer to answer. Are the fourth, sixth, seventh and eighth divisions up to strength? Is each of these divisions fully officered? Is each of them fully equipped? If any of them are not fully up to strength, fully officered or fully equipped, when does the minister expect to have them up to strength, fully officered and fully equipped? Who are the officers commanding these four divisions?

Mr. RALSTON: I thought the hon. member asked about the fourth, sixth and seventh.

Mr. HAZEN: The fourth, sixth, seventh and eighth—if they have been named. If they have not been named, does the minister expect that they will be named soon? Can he inform us also of the names of the officers of the brigades in those four divisions?

Mr. RALSTON: It will not take me long to answer the first question, with regard to the matter of strengths of the fourth, sixth, seventh and eighth divisions. I am sure my hon. friend will not expect me to give that information. The matter of the strengths of divisions and of units is not one on which I would make a public statement.

Mr. HAZEN: I did not ask for the numerical strength; I meant, were they up to strength? We know that they have an establishment.

Mr. RALSTON: It is the same thing. I do not think I should make a statement about that.

With regard to the names of the commanding officers. The name of the commanding officer of the fourth division is Major General F. L. Worthington, who was in command of the first army tank brigade in Britain, and who was brought back to command that division.

With regard to the officers commanding the sixth and seventh divisions, announcement will be made very soon. The eighth division is not far enough advanced in mobilization to name an officer commanding at the present time. Did my hon. friend ask another question?

Mr. STIRLING: Brigades.

Mr. HAZEN: I asked about the equipment.

Mr. RALSTON: The same consideration applies to the question of equipment. I would not make an answer with regard to the equipment of an individual division.

Mr. HAZEN: Well, the names of the officers commanding the brigades comprising the divisions.

Mr. RALSTON: The officers in command of the two armoured brigades of the fourth division are Brigadier Burns and Brigadier Thomas. Brigadier Hyde is in command of the support group of the fourth division.

With regard to the sixth division, Brigadier Leclaire, Brigadier Colquhoun and Brigadier Martin are the three officers commanding brigades. Brigade commanders for the seventh division have not yet been named.

Mr. NICHOLSON: One day last week I raised with the minister the question of the policy the government is following in connection with men who were on farms on the 23rd of March, when the Prime Minister announced the government's policy. I mentioned a number of cases. I have in mind one in particular where the man was on the farm until the 1st of April. I have received to-day a letter from the officer commanding in Regina to the effect that in view of the fact that this man's case was heard on the 27th of February, 1942, and he was granted postponement to April 1 and it was definitely marked "final; no action can be taken by this department". A letter dated May 1, from the young man informs me that they have 300 acres of land ready to seed and they have not been able to get any help. Could the minister make some statement in this connection in view of order in council 2251, which starts as follows:

> Whereas the Minister of National War Services and the Acting Minister of Labour report that there is a growing shortage of agricultural labour and that it is necessary for the effective prosecution of the war to take steps to stabilize employment in agriculture. . . .

Have these orders been relayed to the different officers concerned, and will the minister explain the relationship between his department and the Department of National War Services? The Department of National War Services informed me over the telephone that they have no further jurisdiction after a man has been called up by the army, and the officer in charge informs me that they have no jurisdiction because the Department of National War Services on February 27, before this order was passed, had reached certain conclusions. Could the minister make a statement as to whether some definite policy can be announced?

Mr. RALSTON: Did I understand that some decision had been made by the board on February 27, granting postponement or the reverse?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Until the 1st of April, but he was called on the 1st of April.

Mr. RALSTON: What is the situation now? Is there a further application for postponement?

Mr. NICHOLSON: Yes. The man has made his application to the officer commanding. The officer reports that a decision was reached on this date in February and that they cannot do anything about it. The man is still in the army, although he was actually on the farm on March 23 when the Prime Minister announced the policy that was to apply to all men then engaged in agriculture.

Mr. RALSTON: One hesitates to deal with facts that are a little complicated; but it sounded to me as if the man, when he was called for the 1st of April, should have appeared before the board and asked for postponement on the ground that he was engaged in agriculture on March 23. He should have made his claim then. The rule is that if he does, and shows that he was wholly or partly engaged in agriculture at that time, the burden is on someone else, I suppose the army authorities or the Department of National War Services, itself, to show that he was still, even though wholly or mainly engaged in agriculture, not essential thereto. I do not know why he has not made that application. Perhaps he has. If he has not made that application and has gone into the service he may still apply to the commanding officer, who will refer the application to the board through the district officer commanding. My hon. friend refers to a particular case and I shall ascertain what has been done. This is one of those cases that would appear to bridge over the time of the zero date when men were frozen in agricultural pursuits. If the man is in the army and my hon. friend will send me his name I will endeavour to see what has been done about the matter. What the army has done is to agree to accept the recommendation of the boards which have been constituted under the National War Services Act in connection with applications of this kind, subject to military exigencies, as my hon. friend will understand.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish the minister would elaborate this matter. There has been a good deal of confusion with reference to it. I do not know that his department is as much responsible as the Department of National War Services, but my time during the Easter recess was almost entirely taken up with this problem. Nearly 1,000 men in Saskatchewan were due to begin training on April 9, but were on farms on March 23. I got in touch with the Department of National War Services, as many others did, and we were told that these men should report because their call came prior to March 23 and that therefore they had to report, but that if they reported they could make application to be allowed at least to go home for spring seeding. Most of the men got in touch with me and I passed that advice on. I told them that they must report and then make application for leave to go home for spring seeding.

That, however, has raised another problem, and I wish the minister would make a clarifying statement either now or later in the session. As soon as it was announced that some provision was to be made to give soldiers leave for spring seeding, scores of farmers wrote asking me and, I have no doubt, other hon. members as well, what steps they should take to have their boys given leave to come home for spring seeding, and this came particularly from men up in years farming large tracts of land. I did not feel personally that I ought to take the time of the minister or of his deputy, both of whom have a great many other things to do, by referring individual cases to them. What I did was to point out to these men the procedure which their sons must follow. I told them that they should apply to the commanding officer and that the application would be forwarded to the Department of National War Services and be decided upon. In many cases that worked satisfactorily. Some of these men have been given leave to go home and put in the crop, but I am now receiving letters in which soldiers say that when they go to the commanding officer they are told that he knows nothing of such a provision; that it must be a rumour, and therefore nothing is done about it. In some cases the application is accepted reluctantly and the men hear no more about the matter. Such communications come in every day. I hesitate to take up the time of the minister with these individual cases, but the matter is pressing so far as these people are concerned.

The other day I had a letter from the secretary of a municipality giving a list of elderly men in his municipality who will not be able to put in a crop this year if they cannot get help, and they cannot get help in the surrounding communities. The boys have not been able to get leave for seeding. This is what happens. If a young man happens to belong to a unit where the commanding officer understands the situation and is sympathetic, the boy gets leave, in some cases, for six weeks. The hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) mentioned a young man who had been given six months leave, but there are few such cases. On a neighbouring farm, however, there happens to be another man whose son also made application and he has never heard anything about the matter. It is difficult to explain to two farmers why one gets six weeks, or six months as the case may be, and the other no leave. I imagine the difference is in the commanding officers, but the people on the farms do not think so. They think one man must have more influence than the other.

Mr. RALSTON: It must be the government.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes. I wish the minister would make a clarifying statement with regard to applications for leave. If the commanding officers clearly understand that provision has been made that the application must be forwarded immediately to the war services board, individual cases will, I believe, be dealt with. Could the minister make such a clarifying statement either to the committee or to the commanding officers across the country?

Mr. CHURCH: If Hitler comes he will give us all leave to be slaves.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is under a misapprehension when he speaks of a provision having been made. The only provision which has been made is the provision that when an application is made for compassionate leave—not for seeding, but for leave under special circumstances—the commanding officer makes a recommendation, whatever it may be, and passes it on to the district officer commanding, who sends it to the board, and when the board makes a recommendation the regulations require that that recommendation shall be accepted, unless the exigencies of the service are such as to make it inadvisable to do so. But that is not leave for seeding. That is where the misapprehension arises. I tried to make it clear the other night that the army cannot spare a man for seeding, any more than can the air force or the navy, and that we should not be asked to take on two jobs. These units are being mobilized as rapidly as they can be; there is urgent need for them, particularly in some parts of the country, and we feel that we cannot agree to any policy which means the wholesale release of men who are in the middle of training to go back for seeding.

If there are individual cases of hardship, cases in which compassionate leave should be granted and which the boards think are proper cases, they are considered by the board. When my hon. friend says the commanding officer knew of no such provision, I think he must mean that the commanding officer knew of no such provision for granting leave for seeding, because I think all commanding officers know that we have delegated to the boards under the Department of National War Services the discretion in connection with proper cases of application for compassionate leave. That is probably not very satisfying to my hon. friends, and particularly to those who are writing and who apparently have the idea that there is actual provision for leave for seeding, but that is only in connection with depots and some home guard establishments, and I do not think it applies to any of the units to which my hon. friend refers, or to the training centres.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): They apply particularly to young men in training under the National Resources Mobilization Act, a great many of whom have been in for but a short time. When I say "provision for seeding" I must not be misunderstood. I am aware that no general provision was made to allow any soldier to go home for seeding, but I think there was some provision that if a man could show that he was absolutely required at home and that those at home could not carry on the spring operations without him, some consideration would be given.

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think those considerations were mentioned. It was purely a procedural order in council that was passed. The idea was to get away from the idea that the army made the full decision; that is, to give people opportunity to make a special case under special circumstances, but I do not think it had reference to seeding or putting in a crop or agricultural operations alone. I think it had reference to compassionate leave.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Along the same line, in case of applications for postponement coming before the commanding officer, does the decision whether or not a case shall be presented to the war services board rest entirely in the discretion of the commanding officer, or is he obliged to present it to the board?

Mr. RALSTON: He sends it with his recommendation, which may be that it be not granted, but he should send it forward to be decided by the board. Often I can conceive of cases in which the board has facilities for making inquiry very much superior to those which the commanding officer has, and it is very much more accustomed to hearing applications of this kind. I can understand one commanding officer may be pretty lenient and another pretty stiff in matters of this kind.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I am sorry that committees are sitting to-night at the same time as this session, but the minister was kind enough to suggest before the dinner recess that he would make a statement as to what progress had been made on recommendations which had come to his attention during the last ten months, and particularly in the November session, having to do with the setting up of the interdepartmental committee and several other economies. I understand the minister will make one comprehensive statement covering some forty recommendations.

Mr. BROOKS: If I might revert to the matter which we were just discussing, I have had some practical experience with it, and I might say that if individual members of this house are having plenty of correspondence, the commanding officers are also having their share of trouble in this connection. Possibly the newspapers are as much to blame as anyone. What we call part 3 orders are not always interpreted as they should be. There is a general impression that there should have been an exodus from the training centres and the army to the farms. As the minister has explained, there is an application for leave from the soldier himself. This application has to be accompanied by letters from two disinterested persons. They make a statutory declaration as to the facts, which is sent to the district officer commanding by the commanding officer of the unit with his recommendation. But I think the difficulty arises in connection with the A recruits and the R recruits. With the R recruits this provision applies, but with the active it does not, and I would imagine that the trouble to which the hon. member for Weyburn refers is probably due to men in the depots who are active service men coming to the training centres and not coming under the same regulations as the R recruits. They came in just about the time, March 23 to April 9. I know we had considerable difficulty; the men from the depots could not understand why they were not given the same consideration as the men who had been called up under the National War Services Act. A good deal of confusion has occurred on that account.

There are a good many applications in my training centre, and I judge the same is true all over the dominion. The men seem to think that all they need do is make application and their application should be granted. But it is supposed to be granted only on compassionate grounds and not as a matter of right.

Mr. POULIOT: I hope the minister will be able to give me some information about the young man I mentioned the other day who had six months leave given to him by the national war services board and who could not go back to his father's farm but instead was sent to Nanaimo.

I find this heading in the Montreal Gazette of March 27, "Compulsory trainees are nucleus of new coast defence divisions". In the Montreal Standard of March 28 there is a picture of the Minister of National Defence in an article entitled "Home Army". On May 2, I read in the Ottawa Journal a dispatch sent from somewhere in British Columbia by mail entitled "Popular French-Canadian unit now in Pacific defence zone. Regiment entrusted with important operational role on coast". What those young French-Canadians are doing on the coast is entirely different from what the Mennonites are doing there. The young French-Canadians are fighting for their country while the Mennonites are earning a dollar an hour working in the shipyards.

One thing of which I have to complain to the minister is that letters which are sent to soldiers or trainees in the army addressed to what was the right address a few days or a few weeks ago are not forwarded as they should be to the men where they are; they are sent back to the sender. I have many cases like that. In one instance it was sent to the first camp where the man went and afterwards it was sent back to me. I have here another envelope addressed to a soldier who was at Farnham. It is marked, "No Record; return to sender." He was forwarded somewhere else, either in British Columbia or even in Nova Scotia. The county of Témiscouata does its share in defending both coasts now. I have here another envelope that was addressed to a soldier at Coteau barracks at Three Rivers. I know the man is at Debert camp, in Nova Scotia; I heard that from his father, but the envelope has been returned to me from Coteau barracks instead of being forwarded to the man in Nova Scotia. There is no excuse for that. Soldiers are always glad to receive letters, and they should get their mail properly. It is done for civilians; I do not know why it is not done for soldiers and trainees in the army. There is no justification for it. I have here a letter I wrote to a soldier at Valcartier, in which I enclosed a copy of a letter I had received from the Department of National Defence. That letter also was returned. I have here the envelope; it was addressed to the soldier, giving his name and number, at Valcartier camp.

The situation is most unsatisfactory; it seems as though soldiers are not any better off than those in concentration camps. Of course there must be a reason for it. The reason is to keep them away from home, to have another excuse for not giving them an opportunity to go back to the farms during the season of the year they are most needed. There is another man from my county, the son of a settler, who is at York island, British Columbia. These men do not object at all to defending their country, but a distinction should be made between trainees and soldiers. We have no defence at all in our part of the country. When the minister found that the defences in British Columbia were unsatisfactory he took some boys from Témiscouata and sent them there, and he did the same thing for the defence of Nova Scotia. Of course they are good men, but that is no reason for dealing with them as they have been dealt with. I bring this matter not only to the attention of the minister but also before this committee. I hope that when a wrong is revealed, that wrong will be redressed and those guilty of committing it will not be deified.

Here is another matter. The other day I was told that I had taken too long in mentioning the numerous branches of the Department of National Defence. It is not my fault that they are so numerous; I tried to be as brief as possible. I wanted to know what was the purpose of each branch and what was the cost of it, but I received no answer. The answer was given over the radio, at the expense of the Canadian people. Instead of giving the information here in the committee, so that it might be recorded in Hansard, the minister went on the air once more, and in a broadcast addressed to "Fellow Canadians" he said:

> Now on my shoulders rests the responsibility for seeing that the men and women for the army are raised, and clothed, and housed, and fed, and paid, and kept in good health, and equipped, and transported, and trained, and used where and how and when they can best be used to help to win this war.

That was on his own responsibility. Then in the following paragraph he said that those who had the responsibility for it would speak over the air again to give further news and more explanations. In the first place it was the minister who had the responsibility, he said, but then he went to to say that those who were really doing the work would explain what was being done.

I want to mention just a few facts to-day concerning my French-speaking compatriots of the province of Quebec and what they have done in the army. I had an opportunity to summarize, some time last summer, in an article published in the best weekly in Canada, Le Saint Laurent of Rivière du Loup, what has been done by French-Canadians since the beginning of the war. That article was translated and published in other newspapers, including the Ottawa Citizen. Two months after statistics were sent to a number of officials in the Department of National Defence with regard to French-Canadians—of course I waited for two months—I published this article to show my Canadian fellow citizens that the province of Quebec and French-speaking Canadians at large throughout this country were doing their share in this war, as they did in the last war. That article appeared on July 31 last, and part of it was reprinted in the Ottawa Citizen of September 3. Some figures are given and some facts stated. The translation goes on to say:

> A Tory organ, referring to the subject of voluntary enlistment in Quebec, has recently suggested that "the time has come to make known the figures of enlistment by provinces." Will it not be fairer to make the comparisons between the war effort of the French-speaking Canadians and that of the English-speaking Canadians?
> In the first place, the evidence of true history is there to prove that in 1914-1918 there was not a single unit without French-Canadians. They numbered 3,000 in the first contingent; but at that time General Sam Hughes refused to allow them to form a regiment.
> It is true that the second contingent contained the immortal 22nd Regiment, made up exclusively of French-Canadians; but there were also a great many French-Canadians in the English regiments of Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, particularly in the Tenth of Calgary (now the Calgary Highlanders), of which R. B. Bennett was the honorary colonel. Our compatriots, however, were given no credit for this because there were no French-Canadian officers in those regiments.
>
> In two English regiments, the R.M.R. (Royal Montreal Regiment) and the 87th (Canadian Grenadier Guards), there was respectively a company composed of French-Canadian officers and men. In two other regiments of our province the proportion of French-Canadians was very high; but they were all rankers. There were no French-Canadian officers in the Royal Highlanders of Canada or the Victoria Rifles. In the latter regiment French-Canadians formed at least one-half of the strength and it was, apparently, as a posthumous homage to a considerable number of them that the regiment's flags were lodged in the Church of Notre Dame in Montreal.
> We must hope that the errors of the past will not be repeated indefinitely.
> It must not be forgotten that in the present war the Maisonneuve Regiment was the first to mobilize, among all Canadian regiments.
> A comparison between the total enlistments up to last spring (1941)—one year and a half after the start of the war—and those of twenty-five years ago, for the same period of the great war, shows that throughout Canada the figure was 18 per cent below that of the former period, while for this present war the enlistments in Quebec province have increased by 58 per cent.
> The number of voluntary enlistments in our province is already at the present time greater by 15,000 than the total for the whole duration of the last war. Quebec military district has the honour of ranking fourth in the recent volunteer recruiting campaign, being surpassed only by Saint John, N.B., Halifax, N.S., and Winnipeg. It made a better showing than the three military districts of Ontario and those of Saskatchewan and Alberta, even of British Columbia. Quebec's percentage of the quota allotted was 122 per cent; at London, Ontario, the rating was 73 per cent, and at Victoria, B.C., 61 per cent.

Small wonder, then, that after a rapid inspection of the military camps, air fields and war industries of Quebec province, the British high commissioner to Canada, Right Honourable Malcolm MacDonald, should have said: "In the first place I congratulate Quebec in going over the top in the recruitment of men for the active service."

. . . . LeDevoir, over the signature of Emile Benoist, a former president of the press gallery, commented as follows on this intolerable situation:

"For month after month, ever since the war began, French newspapers, not only in Quebec but in the other provinces, too, have called for the recruiting of French-Canadian regiments outside Quebec province. Nothing was done about it. On the contrary, we have seen Quebec regiments, which we have always considered to be French-Canadian regiments, become mixed units to which Anglo-Canadian as well as French-Canadian officers are posted. This was the case, notably, for the Sherbrooke regiment and for the tank regiment of Three Rivers. We have even seen a Jew appointed to the command of one of these regiments, that of Sherbrooke. This same Jewish officer is to-day in command of one of the military camps in the Montreal district. Did the same thing happen in Ontario, for instance? Certainly not. Can you hear, not the noise, but the riotous uproar that would lift the roof in the Toronto hamlet if a Jew were appointed to the command of the Highlanders in that city?"

. . . . The conclusion is inescapable: It is high time to publish bilingual military manuals, to train French-Canadian officers in numbers commensurate with the proportion of French-Canadian soldiers, to open wide to them the doors of the military schools instead of merely leaving them slightly ajar, to entrust them with positions of command at the head of their compatriots even outside our own province, to preserve for French-Canadian regiments their French-Canadian character, to acknowledge the patriotism of all those French-Canadians who have enlisted in regiments other than those of Quebec province by giving them, besides officers of their own race, the legitimate hope of deserved promotion, of forming a French-Canadian brigade instead of trying to break up French-Canadian regiments, finally to allow to every French-Canadian fighter, in the army, the air force or the navy, the satisfaction of being treated as an equal by his English-speaking comrades in the three services, so that there will be no inferior race that is shouldered with all the risks and no superior race to garner all the benefits, all the gold braid and all the glory.

The reports were made and sent in by the various officers either at the end of May or at the beginning of June of last year, and the article I have just read was published on July 31. Two months later, or four months after the reports had been issued by officers who knew their business and who were not French-Canadians, the lamented Mr. Lapointe delivered a lecture in Quebec in the presence of His Excellency the Governor General, Her Royal Highness Princess Alice, and many other distinguished guests. He said that there would be some improvement for French-Canadians, that the manuals would be translated and that there would be more opportunity for promotion afforded to French-speaking officers. He said that there would be an opportunity for French-Canadians to get training as officers in Brockville under the direction of French-speaking Canadians from abroad and especially the officer, Colonel Blais. In that lecture the late Mr. Lapointe said that it was common knowledge that French-Canadians did not have the opportunity for promotion to which they were entitled according to their numbers in the army.

On the same occasion that Mr. Lapointe spoke, on September 25, Brigadier Vanier of Quebec said that he was happy to see these reforms in favour of French-Canadians in the army put into effect. The great mistake made by the Department of National Defence at the outset was not to mobilize the old French-Canadian regiments. The only door that was open to French-speaking Canadians who wanted to enlist was the door of the recruiting offices of the Black Watch and other English regiments. The French-Canadians did not get credit for enlisting in these regiments. I wrote to the Department of National Defence in January of this year and mentioned what Mr. Lapointe had said and what had appeared previously in the article. They told me that some regiments had been mobilized, and then in a paper dated March 30 I saw that four regiments had been mobilized.

In Montreal, on the slopes of Mount Royal, I think on Queen Mary road or somewhere around there, is a new armoury. On both sides of the entrance there were last summer posters for the Black Watch. These were bilingual, one side being in English and the other side in French, and they invited French-Canadians to join this English regiment. I saw these with my own eyes. Those who wanted to enlist passed there and they perhaps thought that it was their only opportunity to get into the army. They enlisted, but they did not get credit as French-Canadians for doing so.

In any country the minority has to suffer the slurs and attacks of those who want to use the majority for their own aims. In all countries of the world the minorities have had to suffer because some of those who want to govern try to paint them black just as much as they can in order to give a false impression to the majority. This causes hatred and disunity, but it is what happens. My French-Canadian compatriots have been slandered and libelled because they have not been given the credit that was due to them for what they have done in this war.

Here is a clipping, for instance, from that great maritime paper the Telegraph-Journal of Saint John. It prints a letter which was sent to the paper and which reads in part as follows:

> To-night, in the Capitol theatre of Saint John, in this city which saw last summer at least one regiment of Quebec boys on their way to Hong Kong, the coats of arms of Canada and each one of all provinces of the dominion were shown in succession to a numerous public. Each of them drew a long and well deserved applause, warm cheers—except Quebec which was greeted with an eloquent silence and even an isolated but no less eloquent whoop. And I felt sorry for those poor Quebec boys, Hong Kong heroes, who voluntarily gave so much and were forgotten so soon.
> Twice I have seen the same subject presented to the audiences during the evening; twice I have witnessed the same results. I still cannot believe that so much blood heroically shed for our common survival and so much sorrow bravely accepted failed to win so little as a twenty-four hour praise and remembrance.
> If I know well the citizens of Saint John, what I have seen and heard in this circumstance was not representative of their true feelings. Jervis Bay will never be forgotten here, and this is to the honour of this city. Why should the Quebec boys who have been known here and fell heroically in Hong Kong be not equally honoured? Why such tragic oblivion?
> Saint John, December 25, 1941.

The letter was dated Christmas day, but there was not the Christmas spirit in evidence at that theatre.

I have here a clipping from the same paper under date of March 7, 1942, and it gives a tabulation of enlistments in the armed services in Canada by provinces. It is headed, "Maritimes in forefront of Canada as source of fighting man-power." It goes on to give Canadian enlistments to December 31, 1941, and there is a footnote reading:

> Quebec's enlistment unit should be divided between recruits of French racial origin and other racial origins, for which official figures are not available.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but we want to know the number of French Canadians who have enlisted in all regiments in this country, not only in French-Canadian regiments but in all regiments in all provinces, so that French Canadians will not be blamed when they do not deserve it. We are ready to take any blame that we deserve, but we do not want our compatriots to be left under unjust suspicion. By the way, what French Canadians have done in this war has been very highly commended, and it is too bad that these commendations have not always received the publicity they deserved.

What kind of propaganda do we find going on now in many of the newspapers? On the front page of the Montreal Standard of Saturday last, there is an article headed, "Canada losing a great friend"—"Our biggest failure." The article, by A. D. Dunton, is introduced in this way:

> This article is the first of a series written by the editor of the Standard after returning from a trip to the United States to investigate American opinion on Canada. Here he states the seriousness of the problem.
> Following articles will explain what must be done to tell our story to Americans.

It is unfortunate that the great American people are not better informed than they now are of what Canada has done since the beginning of this war. They should be told. "We are losing a great friend." Why? Just because the information bureau at the service of this government is not worthy of being kept. Not long ago, on April 15, on his way to Washington to meet Mr. Roosevelt the Prime Minister of this country expressed his views on this matter in an interview which appeared in the press, headed "Injustice to Quebec on war effort deplored by Mackenzie King here." That interview appeared in the Montreal Gazette and was given as the Prime Minister was passing through Montreal.

The Montreal Standard has published very good articles about this war. One appeared in its issue of April 18, entitled "How to sell Canada to the States". It says:

> "If you had more than 1,000,000 men serving overseas right now and lots more in training, would you think that the United States is properly in the war?" I asked. "Sure", said Harold. "That's a lot of men."
> "Well, in proportion to Canada's population that is the number we have overseas," I said.
> This conversation was transplanted from a New York apartment to the pages of our next week's magazine section.

That is the sort of thing that should be told. In my humble view, in proportion to population we have the equivalent of more than a million Canadian soldiers in England compared with the United States' effort in sending men overseas. In other words, our proportion of men sent overseas is very much higher than that of the United States.

What did Mayor LaGuardia say of Canada's effort, speaking in New York on April 9? In the Toronto Star of April 9, an article appeared on the front page, headed "Canada effort equal to that of 100,000,000—Mayor La Guardia declares Canadians are doing swell job." I should like to see this article sent by the dominion government to be published as an advertisement in all the newspapers of the United States so as to destroy prejudice and hatred and especially to dissipate ignorance as to Canada's war effort.

Here is a clipping from L'Etoile of Lowell, Massachusetts, of April 29, 1942, reading:

I will translate it:

Strange to say, the province of Quebec, which has voted three to one against conscription has until now given more volunteers for overseas than the province of Ontario, which voted five to one in favour of conscription.

Some very interesting information was given out by the Department of National War Services on April 4 showing the number of men who had enlisted voluntarily in Canada by provinces, and this information was published in all the newspapers of the country. The number enlisted in Quebec was 2,109, and in Ontario, 2,116. The article goes on to say:

Major-General LaFleche stated that since October, 1940, a total of 120,305 men called up by national war services had reported to the military training centres and had been found physically fit for training. The men came from provinces as follows:

Prince Edward Island	1,013
Nova Scotia	4,718
New Brunswick	4,567
Quebec	38,433
Ontario	37,252
Manitoba	8,331
Saskatchewan	9,424
Alberta	9,024
British Columbia	7,543
Total	120,305

Of the above, 35,881 were trained by French-speaking officers and instructors, which was a great progress on what had happened before. The number of men requisitioned by the Department of National Defence was 35,740. The surplus of 1,692 men was accounted for as follows: Nova Scotia, 119; New Brunswick, 225; Quebec, 1,146; Manitoba, 14; Saskatchewan, 285; Prince Edward Island supplied the exact number of men called for; Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia were respectively 53, 40 and 24 men short.

Mr. RALSTON: What are those figures?

Mr. POULIOT: What I have here is a publication of the Department of National Defence, and it was issued to the press.

Mr. RALSTON: The Department of National War Services.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. POULIOT: I presume, whether it came from the Department of National War Services or from the Department of National Defence, it must be accurate.

Mr. RALSTON: It was a press release issued by the Department of National War Services with regard to the number of men required to report. It did not suggest that they had enlisted.

Mr. POULIOT: This document was very well analysed by Mr. Gérard Filion, a well-known and brilliant Canadian journalist, when he spoke at a meeting at Tetreaultville on April 15. He said:

(Translation) We are ahead of the other provinces and yet we are being ridiculed.

This is evidenced by the fact that no other Canadian province has subscribed to the victory loans to the same extent as Quebec. Quebec has more soldiers in training notwithstanding the fact that Ontario has a comparatively larger population. The voluntary system of enlistment is no longer successful in the remainder of Canada; only in the province of Quebec are its results satisfactory. Every month men are called for training. Ontario is constantly lagging, while we always supply more than our quota of men.

As regards voluntary enlistments for overseas service, the maritime provinces have supplied about 200 men over their quota. Quebec has supplied 1,146 over its quota. And the district of London, Ontario, the hotbed of orangeism, was 20 per cent short.

I entirely agree with him, except with regard to London, Ontario, being a centre of Orangeism.

Recently we had a visit of an army train. The publication which relates to it and which was distributed among those who went there is printed only in English. Something insulting was done by one of the fellows on the train. When it was at Quebec city, and when he was asked for information in French and was told that the gentleman who was speaking was addressing him in French, that officer was told that he did not hear any foreign language. This was in the press, that when the train went to Quebec a good French-Canadian visited the train and asked in French for information, and that fellow—probably a bloke—said, "Well, I speak no foreign language. Speak English, or otherwise you are not entitled to an answer."

Mr. RALSTON: Is my hon. friend stating what someone told him? Is this what the gentleman informed him?

Mr. POULIOT: It is in the paper.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not talking about the paper.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just pure hearsay.

Mr. RALSTON: I am asking, does the hon. member know the gentleman who was spoken to in that way by the officer?

Mr. POULIOT: It was in all the papers of Quebec, and I will send a clipping—

Mr. RALSTON: I am not talking about papers. I am interested to know if the hon. member knew the gentleman, if he had any information himself.

Mr. POULIOT: I cannot be everywhere at the same time.

Mr. RALSTON: I asked my hon. friend just one question, that is all.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes, it is all right; but I wonder whether the minister will make an investigation to know who speaks like that to French-Canadians to provoke them. I have already mentioned in this chamber the case of a lady who received a visit one day from soldiers who came to arrest her husband who was supposed to be a deserter, while he was in England serving with his majesty's forces.

Mr. RALSTON: Would my hon. friend mind letting me see the newspaper clipping? All I am asking for is the name of the gentleman who was spoken to in that way. If he will give me the name of the officer or non-commissioned officer, or any information about the matter, he may be sure I shall investigate it.

Mr. POULIOT: I have another clipping from Le Soleil. I will give it to the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: I will just point out that apparently there is no mention of either the name of the gentleman who was spoken to or the person who spoke to him.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Just pure gossip.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend says that just because it is stated in the newspaper, that makes it true.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, no.

Mr. RALSTON: If my hon. friend will give me any particulars of the gentleman who says he was spoken to in that way, I shall be very glad to have an investigation made in the most thorough possible manner.

Mr. POULIOT: On the other hand, when I reported the case of a man who was put in gaol because he had spoken French, the minister took advantage of the fact that there was an airport of the same name as the military camp there and he gave an answer relating to the military camp when I was speaking of the airport.

Mr. RALSTON: We may as well settle this now. I gave my hon. friend the fullest information; in fact I went further than I need have gone. My hon. friend did not take the trouble to find out what camp it was. He immediately assumed that it had to do with the Department of National Defence, and proceeded to make a charge about it. He found that it was not the army; that it was the air force, and he thinks I should have investigated the air force before I made any reply. I disclaimed that responsibility at the time, and I do so again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the assumption that this debate is not going on, I desire to ask the minister one or two questions. Possibly we have heard enough of the kind of stuff that has been put on the record to-night. So I desire to direct the minister's attention to a situation with respect to recruiting which I think deserves some explanation from him.

A young man enlisting for active service overseas may, after a lapse of time, and his conduct being exemplary, apply to his commanding officer for leave to marry, and if the conditions are fulfilled he may get the consent of his commanding officer and he may marry, with the result that his wife gets dependent's allowance. A young man called up for training under the National Resources Mobilization Act may not marry, under the regulations, even with the consent of his commanding officer; and when he applies to his commanding officer, I believe, invariably the man is told what the position is, that so long as he has not enlisted for overseas service he may not marry. I have only to state the two positions for hon. gentlemen to understand the significance of the leverage on the young man in the training centre to enlist for overseas service. I cannot imagine any condition that would be more conducive to forcing men into enlistment for overseas service than desiring to marry and being prevented from doing so by the regulations of the department. I put it to the minister—and I do not want to generate any heat about the matter—that the situation which I have portrayed, and I believe accurately, is to say the least not creditable to this country. It is the back-door approach again to compulsory enlistment.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Does the hon. gentleman not believe in conscription?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but let us be man-fashioned about it, and enter by the front-door and not by the back-door route.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Why talk about "total war," then?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am talking about a condition, and I am appealing to the minister to correct what I believe to be an improper position on the part of the military authorities. I can understand no more compelling reason to induce a man to enlist than that he shall be granted the right to marry, or I can understand no more discreditable position for a government department to take than to refuse permission to marry, other things being equal, unless he signs for foreign service on the dotted line. I do not think I am putting that case unfairly or too strongly. I suggest to the minister that it is a position which ought to be corrected. Undoubtedly these young soldiers should have the right to marry. In England they are encouraged to marry. I am told that there are 400 marriages a month among Canadians in England. That is all to the good, and we shall get some new blood in the country in the times that are to come, I hope. But marriage or no marriage, it should not be conditioned on a man's willingness to serve overseas or his unwillingness to do so.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: He is no good if he will not serve.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Please allow me to make my statement. I suggest to the minister that it is a position of which this country should not be proud, a position of which the department should not be proud. It is a position which the department should correct. Either a man is entitled to the right to marry on the merits of his own position, or he is not. He is entitled to marry or not to marry, irrespective of his willingness or unwillingness to serve overseas in the active army. I object to the position that has been taken. I do not think it is a proper position; I do not think it is a dignified position for this country to occupy. I have termed other positions the back-door route. I will withdraw that, and say that this is an indirect route to compulsion, to compulsory service, conscription. If we are going to have conscription let us have it, but let us have it by the proper methods. I ask the minister first of all if I have not correctly stated the position; I ask him, does he think it is a proper position, if so; and if he does not think it is a proper position, then I ask him to have it corrected.

[Mr. Cruickshank.]

Mr. RALSTON: Let me say to my hon. friend that I never heard of such a regulation or provision or instruction, implied or expressed. I have in front of me the—Rights and obligations of the R recruit.

While an R recruit is attached to the training centre and until the normal time at which he should have arrived at his destination, the R recruit, except as otherwise provided in these regulations, shall have all rights, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, to pay and, if eligible therefor, dependents' allowance, provided, however, that if he reported to the basic training centre prior to July 1, 1941, and married subsequent to the time of his so reporting, he will be eligible to claim dependents' allowance in respect of such marriage and from the date thereof only on receiving the consent of his commanding officer to such marriage and on becoming a member H.D. of the Canadian army immediately on his ceasing to be attached to the training centre.

If my hon. friend knows of any instructions issued, which intimate to any commanding officer that he shall not give consent to marry unless a man enlists for active service, I should like to know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I will not give the minister the case. I refuse to do so in the interests of the man himself. I will not do it because the man will be a marked man always.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend said that he was not going to generate heat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I won't.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to find out whether or not this is an isolated case or whether it is the rule. I am stating that I have never heard of such a thing. I am absolutely sure that no such instruction has been issued, and I say I am sure of that because I cannot imagine such an instruction being issued. The adjutant-general is here and he says that he has never heard of such an instruction. There may be an isolated case.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The young man may possibly marry without the consent of his commanding officer, but he may not get the dependents' allowance without the consent of his commanding officer.

Mr. RALSTON: That is so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If he was taken into the draft after a certain date.

Mr. RALSTON: That is right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But if he will go active he will get the separation allowance; he will get the dependents' allowance. That is the condition of which I complain. There is a differentiation between the man who is willing to go active and the man who will not go active.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Exactly the same condition applies to the air force.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): These are all on active service. They all have to get the consent of the commanding officer or they do not get the dependents' allowance. The young man in the reserve army, if that is the proper term, cannot get that dependents' allowance unless he goes active. That is what I am told is the practice. I will ask the minister to have an examination to see if the thesis I have attempted to lay down is correct. If so, I am going to ask him to have the position corrected, because there should not be a distinction between the two.

Mr. RALSTON: I say to my hon. friend that my instructions are—because he has used strong language—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. RALSTON: What he has said he has founded upon a statement of fact which I am questioning seriously. I have in my hand the regulations for the reserve army, special, which have to do with these recruits, and it is provided that the recruit is entitled to dependents' allowance; that is the home defence man. He is entitled to dependents' allowance when he marries with the consent of the commanding officer, and I am instructed that exactly the same provisions apply to the active man—that he does not get the dependents' allowance unless he gets the consent of his commanding officer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The man who is active will get the consent; the man who is not active will not get it.

Mr. RALSTON: I challenge my hon. friend to produce a case in which a young man has been refused consent because of the fact that he was on home defence, and told that he had to enlist and go active.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not going to give the case because that man will be a marked man.

Mr. RALSTON: Before my hon. friend made a statement of that kind he should have submitted the case to me. He has indulged in considerable rhetoric to-night on the basis of a statement of facts which I say I challenge in the most positive way from instructions which I have received. Exactly the same treatment, under the regulations, is laid down for both active and home defence men. Neither can get the dependents' allowance if he marries without the consent of the commanding officer.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise as a peacemaker. I rise in order to afford the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. Minister of National Defence an opportunity to make love to each other as they do every time I speak. There is a saying that history repeats itself. We will go back twenty-five years. I will not say what has happened in the meantime, but I have in my hand a book, the "Life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier," by Oscar Douglas Skelton, and at page 546 of volume II I see that the first shock to the sanguine supporters of the conscription act of 1917 came when it was found that of 404,000 of the first-class of unmarried men, from twenty to thirty-four, who had registered by the end of 1917, 380,000 had claimed exemption.

It states:

The next shock came with the announcement that there were 118,000 claims for exemption from Ontario as against 115,000 from Quebec (out of 125,000 and 117,000 registrants). Local tribunals, particularly in Quebec, were charged with being farcically lax; on the other hand the military representatives appealed nearly every exemption in Quebec, but allowed 90,000 in Ontario to go unopposed.

That is what happened during the last war. I have now the Montreal Standard of April 18 saying:

Enlistments increase with French-Canadians swelling army units.

While results of the plebiscite on April 27 are awaited, officials of the army recruiting depot at 1121 St. James street west disclose that recruiting has been picking up since the first of the month. The daily rate of enlistments has not only been increasing, but the percentage of French to English-speaking recruits has also been rising steadily.

During the month of January the average daily numbers of enlistments in all branches of the army was about 46; during February, when the question of the plebiscite was first raised, the daily average dropped to 36, and during March to 33.

The ratio of French-speaking recruits to English has steadily increased. In January it was approximately 6 to 5, in February about 5 to 3, and in March about 5 to 2.

There is one thing I regret deeply; it is that in all places where young boys go to enlist there is no picture of the commander in chief of the Canadian army, His Majesty the King. I wrote to the Department of National Defence asking if they were placing in those recruiting offices pictures of their majesties, and especially of the commander in chief of our army, His Majesty the King, and the answer was, "No; if they want any picture of the kind they have to pay for it." I think it would be much more useful to place pictures of their majesties in recruiting offices than to send copies of speeches regarding the plebiscite, which was a waste of paper. It would have been better to use that paper to print a picture of the commander in chief of the army and give it a place of honour in our recruiting centres.

On January 1 the New York Times said that the United States army had promoted 575 to the rank of colonel. It was a great promotion on account of the new year. But now the picture is not so good as it should be regarding French-speaking officers in the army. Take, for instance, what happened in Hong Kong; how many were French-Canadians? There was a large number of French-Canadians there. We have no news of them, no more news now of those who are prisoners at Hong Kong than we have of the probe that took place not long ago. The number of French-Canadian officers was so small that they took men who had not a drop of French blood in their veins and put them down as officers just to show one or two more.

Mr. DUPUIS: Two officers from my riding were French-Canadians, both sons of Mr. Pierre D'Avignon, from Marieville.

Mr. POULIOT: There may be two, but there was only one there.

Mr. DUPUIS: Perhaps there was one from Témiscouata.

Mr. POULIOT: Oh, yes, and his name was Lapointe, a soldier, not an officer; we have no officers from our district. I am sorry that the leader of the opposition has vanished, like the prophet of old in his chariot of fire. Every time I have something to say that would be good for him to learn, he disappears.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Maybe if the hon. gentleman had something to say my leader would stay.

Mr. POULIOT: My hon. friend should keep quiet, in preparing such wonderful speeches as he does, when he compares his deskmate to Cicero and Demosthenes and others of the world's great orators—

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am not an orator like my hon. friend, but when I speak in the house I have something to say.

The CHAIRMAN: Let us come back to the question before the committee.

Mr. POULIOT: Just to please the hon. member for St. Paul's, I have here in my hand an editorial from a good paper although it is Tory, the Toronto Telegram, of March 25, 1942. It is headed "Secret proceedings of inquiry must be given in full to the nation". That is the Hong Kong inquiry. We want some information. We are entitled to have complete information about that and about everything, but everything is hidden. We have a right to get complete information about the usefulness of every branch of the Department of National Defence, as we have a right to know who was guilty in connection with the Hong Kong expedition. But we shall never have it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would point out that the matter referred to is sub judice, and it is not in order to discuss matters that have been referred to the royal commission. I understand that a great deal of leeway is allowed in this committee, and some remarks have already been made on that subject, but I think that in the future conduct of this debate no further reference should be made to the royal commission or the subject matter of its inquiry.

Mr. POULIOT: Coming back to November 12 when the minister was away, the estimates of the department were in the hands of his colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air. I asked him a direct question:

> There was something else I read, this time not in the Toronto Telegram but in the Ottawa Journal of September 24, stating that a census of the religious beliefs of the troops was being taken. I do not see how it is possible to do that when it is not possible to learn how many French Canadians have enlisted in a certain regiment. All that information should be available.
> Mr. Power: It is on the attestation card. The man states to what religion he subscribes, and usually it is on his identification disc as well.
> Mr. Pouliot: That is fine, but I should like to know the number of French Canadians who are serving in regiments such as the Black Watch, the highlanders and so on.
> Mr. Power: I believe that information can be obtained.
> Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

That is from Hansard of November 12, 1941, page 4695.

Since that I have got nothing in the way of information about the number of French-Canadians in the whole country who have enlisted in all regiments. That is what I want to know. If the figure is good, that is well; if the figure is bad, we are ready to take our medicine, but we want to know and we have a right to know. The amount of this estimate is $997,000,000. Is it not possible to take from this amount $100 or $200 to check the payrolls of all regiments in the treasury office and see the number of French names which appear thereon? Of course there might be a very small proportion, a fraction of one per cent, of English-speaking men who have French names, as was the case with one officer at Hong Kong. But that would work both ways. There are some men with English names who do not speak English at all, while there are other men with French names who do not speak French, and the proportion in each case would be about the same. What I want to know is the number of French-Canadians who have enlisted in the army, and I have asked the minister for that information. I have already made that request, and if it is impossible to get an answer I think that is wrong and unfair, not only to the province of Quebec but to French-Canadians throughout the whole country. Why is it refused to us? We are entitled to that information.

Mr. RALSTON: It is not refused at all. I have told the committee; I have told the house and I have told the hon. member that the racial origin does not appear on the attestation papers. The idea now propounded by the hon. member, that of examining the names and taking those names to represent nationalities, would not give an accurate result, I do not propose to guess about a subject of this kind, and then have it said later that the figures were not correct. I say that to the hon. member. The only way to do it would be to take a census of each battalion and ascertain from the men themselves their racial origin; and at this stage of the war I have not regarded it as necessary to do that. I had an estimate prepared as to the time that would take, and I think even my hon. friend would be amazed to learn the time that would be required to have that done. One can see that you would have to go through all the battalions and inquire as to the racial origin of every man. That is why it has not been done; it has not been refused at all.

Mr. POULIOT: It is not done, but it is not refused. I may be making some progress there. But it is not impossible to get in touch with the men. The official in charge of the plebiscite got in touch with the men not long ago to ask them a silly question. Is it not much more important to know the racial origin of a man in the army? We must have it for the French-Canadians; we have a right to it. The minister questions the accuracy of taking the names. He knows, or he should know, that the proportion of English-speaking Canadians with French names is about the same as that of French-speaking Canadians with English names.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend may know that; I do not.

Mr. POULIOT: Well, let the minister learn that.

Mr. RALSTON: I would not take it from my hon. friend.

Mr. POULIOT: What I say is right. When the minister tried to give me the lie, it was all right, but never for more than twenty-four hours.

Mr. RALSTON: I ask my hon. friend to withdraw that. I did not suggest giving him the lie.

Mr. POULIOT: Is that unparliamentary, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes. I think the correction of the minister takes care of the situation. The hon. gentleman said the minister had given him the lie. The minister says, "I did not give you the lie," and the statement of the minister stands.

Mr. POULIOT: I thank you, sir, and I congratulate you upon your ruling, which is true to the old British traditions. The other day I quoted what was said, not by a civilian but by a most distinguished soldier, General Browne, about the possibility of the invasion of this country. I repeat it for the benefit of my dear friend the leader of the opposition, who has just come down from heaven, to use a euphemism. This was also quoted by the hon. member for Vancouver South, as reported at page 1905 of Hansard, when he said:

> I think General Browne gave the picture quite clearly when he was quoted as saying at that time:
> "The reserve force may have to fight and it must be ready to fight as soon as possible," he said.
> "After all, there is no more war overseas than there is here now, and we may have some here sooner than they have, in view of the threats to our coast."

That was the opinion of a general. Here is the opinion of a civilian, which has been enlarged upon in an editorial appearing in the Ottawa Citizen of September 3, 1941:

> Jean Francois Pouliot, member for Témiscouata, wrote with characteristic vigour in Le Saint Laurent (Rivière du Loup) on "The French-Canadian War Effort." The doughty champion of French-Canada's article is reprinted in part elsewhere on this page to-day.

That was what I read just a few moments ago, before the hon. member for York-Sunbury thundered so vigorously.

> Perhaps there is need to keep the English-speaking people of Canada better informed on French-Canada's contribution to the war effort. It would compare favourably in the war industries as well as in the number of enlisted men. It would at least help to offset a prevalent opinion that French-Canada is responsible for preventing a total war policy as it should long ago have been adopted by the government of this country.

A more effective answer than comparative statistics, however, would be articulate leadership from an outstanding French-Canadian in favour of complete national service in Canada. Even for home defence, without insisting that every enlisted man should be liable for military service overseas, national service has to come in Canada. The present opportunist policy will almost certainly otherwise result in chaos.

It is to the credit of Jean Francois Pouliot that he is demanding a more comprehensive policy of home defence. He has urged the construction of military highways through strategic territory east of Quebec where the lines of communication are at present very slender. As a Canadian, however, the member for Témiscouata is too modest.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. POULIOT: I should not have read that.

He could speak on the need of more effective defence measures in British Columbia, Nova Scotia and elsewhere as well as on the St. Lawrence river front. This form of leadership would put French-Canada's position in a new light. It would help to show that there is true Canadian vision as national in outlook in the Laurentian country as it is in Toronto, Calgary or Vancouver.

This is something to think about. The other day I quoted a statement by the Minister of National War Services, appearing in the Ottawa Journal of Friday, April 3, 1942, to the effect that the Canadian army was the most mobile of all the allied armies. Most mobile, yes; because an all-out war has been advocated and our army is going out of this country, so that we have nothing left here. All-out war—all outside Canada.

A member of this house, the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton), made an address in Williamstown, Massachusetts, and this was referred to in the well known paper, the New York Times, of March 22, 1942. The headline is:

Asserts criticism has war time limit.
Brooke Claxton, at Williams conference, calls excess detraction "pure poison."
Canada's efforts cited.

I have no objection down to there, but this is what I do object to:

We cannot afford to fight in North America, dominion parliamentarian warns.

Imagine! If the enemy comes here, we must surrender at once. That is what he said; that is what is reported in the largest paper on this continent, perhaps the largest paper in the whole world. We cannot afford to fight! Is that not an invitation to the enemy? It is here in the New York Times. The five-minute rule should have been applied to his speech.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. MUTCH: Read it all.

Mr. POULIOT: I will send it over to my hon. friend and he can read it. My time is valuable. I asked the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) on February 16 if he could give any guarantee that this country would not be attacked before the end of this war. He replied that he could not give such a guarantee without major reflection, and of course the guarantee was not given. It could not be given. My idea of defence is the proper protection of the shores of this country. No Canadian, no member of this house should be allowed to go outside this country and say that it is impossible to fight to repel an invader who is bold enough to come here. The enemy who dares to attack Canada can be repelled only if we have an army here. Otherwise we shall not be able to repel an army which is well-equipped. You cannot do that with your fists, even if you are a champion prize-fighter. We must have a trained and well-equipped army.

The figures we have been given lead us to believe that this country is not defended as it should be. Unless we have some more information about it, I will not cease to insist upon having proper defence in Canada in order to protect our people, our country and our homes. On March 3 the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) stated in a broadcast that our enemies had their eyes set on our country. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) said the same thing on March 6 in Toronto; he stated that we were exposed to attacks from the enemy. On March 9 the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) stated in the house here that it would be a miracle if we won this war. On March 13 the Minister of Justice warned us that the nazis eye Canada. Captain Maurice Burke, at the conference of the association of children's aid societies, said "it cannot happen here" is held too prevalently. He said it was undermining belief reflected among men and women all over Canada. We are not concerned about that!

What did the Prime Minister of Australia do? On March 14, Mr. Curtin made a stirring appeal. He said that his country was the last bastion between the west coast of America and the Japanese. The Toronto Telegram of March 25 said that the U-boats may try raiding the St. Lawrence in the summer. I made reference to this dispatch not long ago, but now I hold in my hand the page from the Evening Telegram of March 25. The interview in question covers a whole column. It is headed:

Three services defending maritimes ready for visits by Hun craft, is assurance.

That was what was said by Vice-Admiral P. W. Nelles, chief of the naval staff and Rear-Admiral G. C. Jones, in command at Halifax. Then here is a report in the New York Times of April 6 of this year, not so long ago:

Some ports lag in preparations against raid peril.
Few coastal centres ready, but most are found ahead in some precautions.
Many cities lack sirens.
Joint fire-fighting tools are not widespread and not many shelters are built.

That was on the first page of the New York Times. Then Mr. Godbout, the distinguished premier of Quebec, stated on February 20 that Quebec was in imminent peril of possible attacks. Then the Hon. Doctor Manion, former leader of the Conservative party, said on April 13 that A.R.P. is the duty of all. Here are the headlines:

National director declares every individual and municipality must act.
Coast work praised.
B.C. and maritimes "in splendid shape" he asserts after dominion-wide inspection trips.

That was on Monday, but the paper of Saturday contained a picture of the first siren that had been installed in Quebec city. A.R.P. work there apparently was not so good. I think the people do their best, but they have no protection whatever from the Department of National Defence. Here is what happened in Australia. The Citizen of March 27, 1942, contained this headline:

Australian troops return for defence of continent.
All imperial forces government intended to recall for home defence now safely back at stations.

The Anzacs were in every part of the world, and when the motherland was attacked they had to send an S.O.S. to the United States. Home defence for India was urged. Who would have believed a year ago that the Japs would have reached India now? The Burma road was considered safe, but now it is in the hands of the Japs. It is not enough to say that we never thought it would happen, and then make a glorious retreat. I will tell something else to the Minister of National Defence. He should not put in the heads of soldiers, whether they are going to enlist or whether they are already in the army, the idea of sacrifice. Sacrifice is for the civilian, but our soldiers should have in their heads, their hearts and their minds the idea, not of sacrifice but of victory. This should be the inspiration of all our soldiers, and it is the duty of the Minister of National Defence to guide them in that direction.

More and more men are being called to the colours all the time, but we see very few of them. Of the hundreds of thousands of trained men that Canada has, there are only, according to the statement made by the minister the other day, 15,000 trainees at present in Canada to defend our shores.

Mr. RALSTON: Nothing I said would give the slightest ground for a statement like that.

Mr. POULIOT: Then what were the 15,000 for?

Mr. RALSTON: I said it was home defence members of the Canadian army. As a matter of fact, only 10,000 of them were in the units. About 5,000 were in the training centres and the depots. That has nothing to do with the other matter at all.

Mr. POULIOT: Does the minister not consider the trainees as fully trained soldiers—young trainees like those sent to Hong Kong, without sufficient training, according to his own admission?

Mr. RALSTON: I have not interrupted before, but I think it is about time for me to ask you, Mr. Chairman, to give your ruling as to whether or not the Hong Kong inquiry is to be the subject of debate in this house before the report is presented.

The CHAIRMAN: I have already called the attention of the hon. gentleman and of members of the committee to the fact that the Hong Kong incident cannot be discussed either in committee or in the house before the report of the commission has been received.

Mr. POULIOT: On January 8, the Ottawa Journal said, "Increase quota of men called," and on April 1, the Montreal Gazette said, "Call-up of B men for home army is under consideration by Ottawa."

Then, on April 2, the Montreal Gazette had an article headed "Ralston 'not wholly satisfied' with Pacific coast defences." This again has appeared in the press and, since it has not been denied, I presume it is a correct report of what the Minister of National Defence said at Nanaimo, British Columbia.

Mr. RALSTON: I said it last night in the house.

Mr. POULIOT: But I was not here, and so I am quoting from the press. I enjoy very much listening to the hon. minister, and when I hear him make a statement I never forget it.

This is worth underlining. On April 1 the Minister of National Defence was "not wholly satisfied" with Pacific coast defences, but the very next day, on April 2, his colleague, the Minister of National Defence for Air, who accompanied him, tried to correct the bad impression that had been left by the interview given by the Minister of National Defence, and this is what the minister for air said. I quote the headline—"Power reports coast defences much improved." They were improved overnight!

Further, to correct the impression that had been left by himself, the Minister of National Defence gave an interview, which is headed "Ralston impressed by competence of coastal defenders." He had not been impressed by the Pacific coast defence, but he was impressed by the coastal defenders, who were probably men from Témiscouata. They made a great impression on him.

Then, on April 2, as reported in the Citizen of April 3, the minister for air said, according to the headlines, "pilots not needed in Britain now—asserts so many overseas, no more wanted at present—foresees Canadian defence expansion." Then the Minister of National Defence again plunged into this matter of Pacific coast defence. At Winnipeg the Minister of National Defence gave another interview:

> Ralston gives men warning on joining reserve army—may find themselves ordered to join up if they fail to do so voluntarily, defence minister says.

That was the heading of a Canadian Press dispatch from Winnipeg, dated April 6. The Minister of National Defence then went to Halifax to inspect our defences.

I have another clipping here, dated Victoria, B.C., April 1, headed: "May conscript men for reserve army—Ralston." That is what the Minister of National Defence said at Victoria, and he repeated this at Winnipeg on his way back to Ottawa.

Here is another clipping dated March 27, headed:

> Married men of 30-35 may join reserve army, defence minister says—new order being issued permits those in these age categories to enlist. Previously recruits for reserve army had been limited to youths under 19 and men between 35 and 50 years. Colonel Ralston states it will cost nearly 600 millions to maintain army overseas in next fiscal year.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: If the hon. member will permit a question to clear up a doubt in my mind, am I to understand that he does not entirely approve the Minister of National Defence?

Mr. POULIOT: I hold the same views with regard to the Minister of National Defence as my hon. friend the member for Fraser Valley does.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: Then let me express mine for the rest of the evening.

Mr. POULIOT: Since the minister does not seem to know our views, I have to tell him what they are.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question of the minister.

Mr. ROEBUCK: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: A question of privilege is in order at any time.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I want to call the attention of the hon. member for Témiscouata to something that he mentioned in the early part of his speech. He was denouncing racial intolerance in his rounded style, and of course he knows that I agree with him in any denunciation, no matter how vigorous it may be, of racial, religious or any other type of intolerance. The hon. member for Témiscouata spoke of some Jewish gentleman holding an officer's position in the province of Quebec and he asked: "What would be said were a similar condition to exist in the province of Ontario."

Mr. ROSS (Souris): What is the question of privilege?

Mr. ROEBUCK: I think it is a question of privilege. At any rate it is one of indulgence, if not of privilege, and my hon. friend across the aisle waived his right to proceed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): The Chairman said I must.

Mr. ROEBUCK: I am not saying that you must.

The CHAIRMAN: The Chairman must consider the facts as he sees them. The hon. member for Souris sat down, I understand to allow the hon. member for Trinity to proceed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Only after the hon. member for Trinity had said that he was rising to a question of privilege. We want to know what the question of privilege is. The hon. member for Souris did not waive his right to allow the hon. member for Trinity to make a speech.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that the remarks which the hon. member for Trinity is proceeding to make are of the nature of a question of privilege in respect to the remarks that have been made pertaining to racial prejudice.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But he must state what his question of privilege is.

Mr. ROEBUCK: It is with respect to my own province, Mr. Chairman, and with respect to my own constituency. My hon. friend intimated that there would be objection to a Jewish officer in the army in my province, and I think I am right in claiming privilege in order to set that right. There is where the privilege lies.

I want to point out to this committee that there are at least two Jewish officers from Ontario whom I can name, because they are in public life. One is, now, Captain Croll, from the provincial legislature; and the other is Lieutenant Factor, from this house. I want to state emphatically that I have never heard in Ontario or in the city of Toronto any objection based on those facts.

I do not want to claim for my Ontario compatriots greater virtue than they possess. I like to give them more credit, perhaps, than is their due, rather than less; I like to err on the side of too much rather than too little credit.

It is true that we have classes in Ontario. I do not doubt that Catholics like Catholics better than they like Protestants; that Protestants perhaps like Protestants better than they like Catholics, and the two may like themselves better than they like the Jews; Jews may like themselves better than they do some other class. That is natural. But I think it should not go abroad that there is any distinction in the position of officers in the army, as between these various classes of religion or race. I am satisfied that whatever intolerance you may meet with from individuals—and sometimes things occur in organizations such as the army which are regrettable; I have heard of them—the great masses of the people of our province would disapprove in the strongest terms any distinction being made as between the members of these classes. Our people are prepared to accord to Jew and Gentile, Protestant and Catholic alike, the credit which is coming to them for their ability and service, and the promotion which they may win in the army or anywhere else, quite irrespective of racial prejudice. I am sure that the hon. member for Témiscouata will be glad to hear me say that, and I hope that he will agree with me.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I appreciate all that has been said by the hon. member for Trinity. We have listened to my good friend the hon. member for Témiscouata for two periods of forty minutes within a period of an hour and a half this evening, and I confess I think that in some respects he did his people an injustice. Many times in this chamber I have refrained from saying something which might foster racial misunderstanding in this country. He has given the results of quotas filled and percentages by provinces, and I believe that in so doing he placed the actual facts in a false light, because quotas are not based on a population or per capita basis in this country; I think that is true. I have here a return given on December 31, 1941, on a percentage basis of voluntary enlistments for the active army, the air force and the navy. The percentages by provinces are as follows:

	Per cent
Alberta	5·0
Saskatchewan	3·7
Manitoba	5·7
Ontario	4·6
Quebec	2·3
British Columbia	5·7
New Brunswick	5·4
Nova Scotia	6·0

I believe that those figures are based on the actual numbers who have volunteered for service in all of the armed forces. I listened some time ago to an explanation by the Minister of National Defence for Air of how these quotas were set up. I am satisfied that they are not set up on a per capita basis or according to the population of the various districts or provinces. Would the Minister of National Defence now explain just how those quotas are established? I believe he will say that they are not established according to population, and he might give us an explanation as to the basis upon which they are set up. I believe the public throughout the dominion would welcome this information at the present time.

Mr. RALSTON: I may say to my hon. friend that I was asked the same question last evening, and I stated at that time the general principles on which the quotas were based. They are also set out in a return which must be somewhere near the return from which my hon. friend has quoted.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): They are not based on population.

Mr. RALSTON: They are based on population and on activity in the particular district in connection with the active and non-permanent militia, and on recruiting records.

Mr. McCANN: The hon. member for Témiscouata has run the gamut of the most imaginative and exhaustive catechism which one can conceive of, but he has left one or two questions on which I should like a little enlightenment, and to which he did not refer.

One has to do with a call which is being made in military district No. 3. It appears that men from twenty-one to thirty years of age are being called there for military service, whereas in other military districts more thickly populated the call is for men from twenty-one to twenty-five. I can understand that probably the reason for that is that the quota in some of these districts would not be filled if the age limitation were not broadened to some extent. But there has been what is, I think, a legitimate complaint on the part of a number of men in the age groups from twenty-seven to thirty years who have been married since July, 1940, and who are now raising young families, but who for military purposes are not regarded as married, that they should be called from a particular district when young unmarried men of the same ages in other districts are not called. That, I think, is a reasonable complaint. I have had a large number of protestations in that particular regard.

Another matter, entirely different, on which I wish to say a few words has to do with the medical services of the armed forces. This afternoon, when the hon. member for Parkdale was speaking, he had something to say with reference to the rehabilitation of men in the armed services who suffered from certain disabilities. He made particular reference to those who suffered from hernia, and he gave it as his personal opinion that such men could not be rehabilitated, or at least that they were not being rehabilitated, and that if they were going to be operated on, it would be necessary for them to have expert surgical intervention. If I understood the minister correctly, he stated that that was the opinion of the medical staff. Am I right?

Mr. RALSTON: I believe the Minister of Pensions and National Health said that. I do not think I did.

Mr. McCANN: I must take exception to his statement. I do not concur in that opinion.

Mr. RALSTON: I think the only intervention I made in that connection was to ask the hon. member's opinion with regard to double hernia, whether that could be cured. I do not think I expressed that opinion on behalf of the officers of the department.

Mr. McCANN: That observation with reference to double hernia was made, if my memory serves me aright, subsequently to the other observation. I say that I do not concur in that opinion, and while the hon. member for Parkdale is generally regarded as having been one of Canada's best surgeons, and he made a report on the war services for the war of 1914-18, I feel that he does not express the modern opinion of the medical and surgical fraternity in Canada when he makes a statement to that effect. There is no country in the world that has higher standards of medical services and medical education than we have in Canada. That is pretty generally accepted, and the proof of that is that of our hospitals, whether they be large institutions or the smaller ones in the smaller industrial communities, a great number have been given the approval of the American hospital association. That is perhaps the last word of commendation there is on this continent.

I want to revert to what I was speaking about with reference to what the hon. member for Parkdale said, having to do with operations for hernia. Every day from one end of this country to the other that operation is being performed by thousands of young Canadian surgeons who are rehabilitating men back into our industrial and agricultural life. That is proof that it can be done equally well by the medical services in our armed forces, because the medical services in the forces are exactly the same men, with very few exceptions, who had been in civil practice prior to the war. Having said something to the effect that our standard of proficiency, both in our institutions and as regards our medical and surgical men, ranks with the highest in any country in the world, it appears to me that when that service is translated into the armed forces, whether that be in the army, the navy or the air force, we have a let-down. There is a drop in that standard and those very same men who have been in civilian life practising are spoken of disparagingly and are as not as well regarded as they were in civil practice.

We have three medical services, one for the armed forces, one for the navy and one for the air force. I am of opinion that the three services are not necessary. There is duplication of service; there is duplication of expense in connection with hospitalization. However, I am not going to labour that point. That, as a matter of policy, has been established and this would be the wrong time to change it. I did make suggestions along that line at the beginning of the war and they were not accepted. The three services have now been established and I am of opinion that perhaps it would be a serious interruption in our medical services if the policy were changed at this time. Not only is it expensive from the point of view of dollars and cents, but it is a very expensive service from the point of view of our man-power. Already to date about 2,000 medical men have been taken from the civilian services and put into the armed forces, all of them on a voluntary basis, men who rank among the very highest in the medical profession in Canada. Within the last few days a call has gone out from the medical staff asking for another 600 men. I am sure there will be a call very soon, if our forces are to be augmented, for more medical men for the navy and the air force. It is estimated that in all it will take another 800 men. That being the case, it would mean 2,800 men in the medical services.

We have about 11,000 medical men in Canada for a population of 11,000,000. These men are being asked to enlist. Our medical men are troubled. They are asking themselves whether they could perform a greater service by going into some of the medical services in the armed forces or by staying at home and continuing in their civil practice. There are communities in Canada, not in the cities I will admit, where medical men have to service as many as from four to five thousand people. Then there is the fact that we have in industry in this country approximately 700,000 people. If our industrial production is to be what we would have it; if it is as important as we are led to believe, then the men in industrial and agricultural life in Canada are equally entitled to medical service with those in the armed forces. Therefore it becomes a question whether these men should enlist in the armed services, or should remain at home and carry on their civilian duties.

I had something to say with reference to a let-down. The standard does not appear to be as high as in civil life. There must be some reason for that, and the only reason I can see is that there is poor distribution of the men who are in the service. There could be a better allocation of the work which the medical men have to carry on. We believe that every man in the armed forces when ill should have the advantage of the best and most skilled medical and surgical treatment and should be treated just as well as if he were a civilian. I sometimes wonder if the men are given that treatment, if they are given all the protection which the medical services can give them, or if some of the regulations or the concepts of those who are on the permanent staff are as up-to-date as they should be.

May I refer to two or three particular matters in regard to which I have some doubt as to whether or not they are being carried into effect; and I can assure the minister that, with reference to some of them, I think our policy should be to carry out certain preventive measures. Let me refer particularly to the Wassermann test. According to my understanding, that is a matter of choice to those who are in the services, whether or not they shall be given that test. In my judgment the Wassermann test should be given every man who goes into the armed services. It should be given to him also upon discharge from the army. Let me call this very interesting information to the attention of the committee. The number of syphilis cases reported in Ontario last year showed an increase of 66 per cent over the 1940. We medical men understand—

Mr. RALSTON: That is in Ontario.

Mr. McCANN: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Not in the army.

Mr. McCANN: No, not in the army. This is, in my judgment, a serious matter. If we had a 66 per cent increase in the number of cases of syphilis in Ontario in 1941 and a proportionate increase during 1940, then since the war started there has been a marked increase. It is generally regarded that in war time there is likely to be an increase in these social diseases; that is taken for granted. One can readily imagine the reasons. But knowing the facts as we do, our medical services in the armed forces should take every precaution that these men are protected both by preventive measures and by good social measures from contracting the disease, or, if they have contracted it, it should be diagnosed by means of the Wassermann test, and they can undergo treatment while in the army without losing any appreciable time.

All our armed services in all branches should be given protection against diphtheria. That is a very simple matter. A great number of the younger men in the forces have been protected by inoculation earlier in life. In Ontario we are proud that diphtheria has been almost entirely eradicated. That is due to the fact that the practice of toxoiding has been carried into effect. In England they had 63,000 cases of diphtheria last year. We are sending over 150,000 young men to England where diphtheria is prevalent and where they are not given the protection which they could be and should be given before they leave this country.

There is another matter along the same lines which I should like to mention. Every man in the armed forces should be typed as to his blood. That could easily be recorded on his identification disc. The way that would work out is this. If a man meets with a serious accident or has a serious illness, it may be necessary to give him a blood transfusion. He can be given a blood transfusion successfully only by being given blood of his own type. If he is brought to an operating room, if he has fallen from an aeroplane or has been hit by a truck or a tank and is in a desperate condition, that is no time to type his blood; but if you have his disc there and it shows he is type No. 2, it will not take long to have blood donors at the hospital who will give a transfusion and thus probably save his life.

With reference to typhoid and tetanus I believe the troops are being given inoculation and preventive injections which will fortify them against these diseases.

I make these suggestions to the department because I think these men are entitled to the very best service which can possibly be given them. If they were in civilian life they could of their own free will go and have these services, or if they were being brought up in ordinary family life they would likely be provided with them by their parents or at the schools which they attend.

With reference to the men in the medical services I think some of the reasons why they are not generally regarded as of the same standard as in civil medical work is the fact that there is not the allowance made for them to express their own individuality; the regulations are not flexible enough with regard to letting a man use his own judgment in a number of cases.

There is bound to be in this country a shortage of medical men. The government has recognized that by the policy it has adopted of assisting young men who are studying medicine to secure their education. The government is to be commended for its foresight and good judgment in adopting that policy. They recognize that there is likely to be a shortage. I suggest that that shortage in some instances could be overcome by utilizing the services of women both as X-ray technicians and as workers in laboratories. There are many women who have taken courses in these lines of medical service, and they could supplant a number of medical doctors who are urgently needed for other lines of work.

I respectfully bring these suggestions to the minister's attention, not that I expect an answer from him now, but that he may pass them on to his permanent medical staff for their consideration. What I am interested in is by no means an attack on persons, but rather upon system and policy. I think the policy with reference to the medical services in all our forces can be brought up to date and assurance given to the men in all the services and to their people that they will get the very best medical and surgical attention it is possible to give them.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to thank the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) for his very constructive comments in connection with the medical services of the department. As he anticipates, I do not feel capable of following him in the various technical matters that he has brought up. Dealing first with his suggestion with regard to the Wassermann test, as he knows the subcommittee of the war expenditures committee made a recommendation regarding that matter about the end of last year. All I can say is that there does seem to be some difference of opinion among technical men about the adoption of it as a routine matter. I myself have had a number of discussions about it, and the adjutant general is I know, taking it up again. A report at this time would have to indicate that the test had not been adopted as routine in connection with the medical services for certain reasons which were given before the special committee last spring when the officers of the medical services were before them, but it is again receiving active consideration from the officers of the department. I am not sure whether my hon. friend was a member of that committee.

With regard to diphtheria treatment I did not notice anything in the report. I do not think that matter was discussed before the committee to which I refer; at least no report was made on it, but I have noted what my hon. friend said.

With regard to the typing of blood, even to a layman it sounds like absolute common sense that a man's blood should be typed at a time when it is easy to do it, and the simple matter of having it registered on his identification disc seems to make a complete chain of procedure in any case of emergency.

The point about the distribution of medical men has of course been forcibly brought home to me in connection with the proposals put forward for the assistance of medical students. It was then one came to realize just what my hon. friend says, that at least there are not going to be too many medical men in Canada, and probably there is going to be a shortage. The matter of distribution has received and is receiving attention, or perhaps I should say the matter of redistribution, as far as the medical services themselves are concerned. We realize that we can increase the supply of medical men not only by getting more into the service but by perhaps readjusting the services and duties of those we have, and that is being done.

At the same time we have in mind some plans with regard to helping to solve the problem which my hon. friend mentions, namely the problem which faces a great many medical men as to where their duty really lies and where they can be of greatest service to the community. In view of the fact that the directorate of national selective service has been set up, I have taken the position—I think this is the first time I have stated it publicly, but I think it is absolutely sound—that we in the army are, if I may put it crudely, simply the customers for a certain supply of technical personnel. That is not confined to medical men alone; it has to do with engineers, with some chemists and with some scientists. This directorate of national selective service, which has under it the bureau of wartime technical personnel, is able in the first place to state where the supply is, because it would have full records with regard to that matter—that is, the supply of medical men as well as the supply of other technical personnel—and at the same time it is able to receive requisitions from the army, navy, air force and any other branch of the service that needs technical men, and is able to make a distribution and to give advice which it is impossible for one particular service to give to these medical men. They know what the supply is; they know what the demand is, and those two can be put together. That bureau, it seems to me, is the place where the medical men should be assisted to solve their problem in connection with their duty to their community. I have already communicated that view to the president of one university, in regard to a conference which is to be held here very soon with respect to another technical profession. I have said that I did not think it was the place of the army to attempt to do that, but rather that we should present our requisitions to the director of national selective service and ask him to advise us in the light of the supply and demand.

One point, the one with which my hon. friend began, is new to me; that is, with regard to the calling up of a certain higher age group in military district No. 3, compared with the other districts. That, of course, comes under national war services. I cannot explain to my hon. friend why men of the group from twenty-one to thirty should be called up in military district No. 3, while the group from twenty-one to twenty-five are called up in the other districts. Probably the reason he gives is the correct one, namely that a shortage has developed in the lower age groups in the particular district. I can only say to him that I will bring the matter to the attention of my colleague the Minister of National War Services. As I explained to the committee last night, I ask for a certain number of men; I do not ask for them by ages, and he supplies the number of men by issuing a proclamation calling up whatever age group may be necessary.

Mr. McCANN: The anomaly of the situation is that the reason why they are calling up men of the group from twenty-one to thirty in military district No. 3 is that recruiting has been so successful that there is a shortage of younger men there. That rather reacts against them.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know in my district we have had a large number of married men over twenty-five years of age called up.

Mr. RALSTON: The hon. member for Témiscouata mentioned several points. I am sure he will not expect me to go at length into a speech which rambled over a great deal of territory, but I want to refer to one or two salient points. I am not sure that I shall convince him with regard to the good disposition of the Department of National Defence toward French-Canadians. I can say, however, that I would hope to be able to convince the committee and the country.

First let me refer to the individual case to which he referred; that is, the case of the young man who was granted leave of absence for six months. The committee will remember that yesterday I indicated that the application was recommended by the national war service board. It was forwarded to the district officer commanding of military district No. 5, who recommended it; it was forwarded to headquarters, and headquarters approved it. That was all in order. But the regiment to which the young man belonged moved west, and the young man himself moved with the regiment. The district staff officer communicated by telephone with the district staff officer on the west coast, and he stated that the officer in command of the regiment advised him—that is, the western staff officer—that at the time notification to leave was received the result of a medical board was pending. Instead of transferring the man to No. 5 district depot, which is the district depot at Quebec, they took him with the regiment to Nanaimo, notwithstanding the board that was pending. My hon. friend may know the officer commanding the regiment. After arrival at Nanaimo, during the confusion of getting settled the matter of the medical board was overlooked. It came to notice a few days later, and at some later time the medical board was held. I do not know whether my hon. friend will be relieved or otherwise to learn that a telegram has been received from the general officer commanding in chief, Pacific command, advising that this young man is being discharged, category E, and that no action was necessary on the question of leave. That was the result of two long distance telephone conferences with the west coast.

My hon. friend referred to the matter of letters to soldiers. I can only say that I will take up that point. The hon. gentleman has sent me three envelopes. I can assure him—though I think he knows it without my assuring him—that there is no intention in the world to keep these men away from communication with their homes or to deprive them of their right to receive mail, the same as anyone else. There may have been carelessness; it may not have been realized that these young men were in these camps; apparently they were away by the time the letters arrived. I agree that there should be some proper system of forwarding mail; I am sure there is such a system in force, and I will see that these matters are looked into.

Then the hon. gentleman referred to my humble effort on the radio, and said something to the effect that I said I had the responsibility and then said that someone else, the people who actually had the responsibility, would give the facts. What I said was that I had the responsibility for the department, but that I would ask the people of this country to listen to the men who actually did the work. That is what I hope will be done in the course of the next few Sunday evenings.

I want to say a word to the committee with reference to what the department has done and is doing in regard to the matter of seeing to it that French-Canadian representation is properly maintained, and I make no apology at all for it. The hon. member for Trinity said something to the effect that race should not play any part in connection with military appointments. I agree with him; that is to say, that efficiency must not suffer. At the same time, however, I say, as I have said previously in this house, that I think it is a matter of national responsibility that we see to it that as far as possible, in connection with appointments in the army and in connection with commands, proper representation is maintained with respect to our French-Canadian fellow citizens. I want to say to my hon. friend that whether he believes it or not, if there has been any libelling or slandering done, as he complains, it has not been done by the Department of National Defence. I want to tell him that I think the most thorough measures have been inaugurated in order to see to it that every possible encouragement, assistance and support is given to French-Canadians who come into the army and give their services. I want to pay tribute to the men who have come in and to the officers who have helped in that respect. It just happens that two of the three staff officers who are sitting before me to-night are bilingual. That only just happens. At the same time there are at national defence headquarters at the present time nearly fifty French-Canadian officers.

Let me say to my hon. friend that in connection with the Department of National Defence we have taken measures which we thought were appropriate and useful in order to make sure that French-Canadian representation was properly maintained. My hon. friend referred to a speech which was made by the late Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe some time ago in that connection. I want to bring to the attention of the committee two or three of the measures which have been taken and which we think have been of assistance in this respect.

We have organized a bilingual junior leaders school at Megantic, Quebec. The total capacity of this school is set at 210. The quota which has been provided for French Canadians at that school is beyond anything that has been supplied. I am not saying anything against the fact that the full quota has not been supplied; I only want to say that the quota has been just as generous as it could be in order to ensure that plenty of opportunities were given for instruction. This school was organized for the purpose of teaching English-speaking and French-speaking candidates the principles of leadership and enabling them to overcome any language handicap they might have.

With regard to training centres we have seen to it that there are French-speaking instructional staffs at the training centres in eastern Ontario and in Quebec. I think the proportion of these instructors is fully up to the number of men in the training centres. In the officers' training centre the proportion of French-speaking instructors is even higher.

My hon. friend referred to mobilization and contended that there had not been proper representation. Let me say to him that in the army programme for the present year there is provision for the formation of the following French-speaking units:

One regiment medium artillery
One engineer battalion
Five field batteries
One search-light battery
Five infantry battalions
One R.C.A.S.C. unit
One field ambulance
One general hospital
One provost company
One Canadian forestry corps company.

In addition, there is a bilingual infantry battalion, the Sherbrooke Fusiliers, being incorporated into the fourth armoured division.

One French-speaking battalion will form part of the second army tank brigade. I have here a list of the French-speaking units in Canada and overseas, and a splendid representation it is.

With regard to French-Canadian officers, we have made special provision in order that young French-Canadians may have an opportunity of overcoming any handicap which may exist in connection with their entering the school at Brockville. There were not enough French-Canadian officers in the reserve units who were coming forward. It is well known that our French-Canadian friends were not interested in the militia units to the same extent as men in some of the other districts. This has been so for years. There is no complaint, and there is no reflection whatever because this is a matter of a man's own choice. The result was that French-Canadian officers were not too plentiful. With this in mind we have made special provision for French-Canadian officers by having civilian committees set up—this is all covered in a return which was brought down in the house—in different centres which select young men who are of the calibre that they consider would make good officers. They ask these young men if they would care to come in and take training. A special training school was set up in St. Jerome, Quebec, where these men received thirty days basic training. If they qualify and appear to justify promotion, they are given another month as cadets preparatory to their going to the Brockville school. We expect to have something like 100 men a month going from the St. Jerome school to Brockville. I had the pleasure of being in St. Jerome a week ago last Saturday, and I was extremely pleased with the way they are taking hold and the manner in which this system is working out. It was provided for the purpose of seeing that there was no discouragement of French-Canadian recruiting because of a lack of officers. It was established for the purpose of encouraging French-Canadian officers to feel that when they go to school at Brockville or somewhere else where the atmosphere is English, they will not be under a handicap.

But we do not leave it at that. At Brockville we have a full French-Canadian instructional staff; there is also an English staff, so that these young men are able to receive instruction in their own language and can talk over their problems with instructors who speak their own language. The director of trades training advises that there is an adequate bilingual instructional staff at the army trades school in Hamilton. With regard to French-Canadian representation on Royal Military College courses, except for the junior war staff course, for which the majority of candidates have been selected overseas, it is the practice to allot vacancies up to one-third of the total attendance of these courses to French-Canadian officers.

I may say with regard to the officers training centre at Brockville that the objective toward which we are working is to provide a quota of up to 125 French-speaking candidates in each month. With regard to staffs and command, the departmental selection committees are constantly—I can say this from personal knowledge—on the look-out for opportunities to recommend the appointment of French-Canadian officers, not only at national defence headquarters but at the appropriate district headquarters. As a matter of fact, I have a complete list of the French-Canadian officers who are appointed at headquarters.

In addition, I have in my hand a list of probably fifty training manuals, pamphlets, regulations and instructional books of different kinds of which French translations have been made by a special French translation bureau which we have at headquarters. I say this because I think it should be said in justice to the officers of the department. I do not think anything from the point of view of our national life is given more careful consideration than this matter of seeing to it that the difficulties which are bound to be found by French Canadians coming into what is predominantly an English army are overcome. I can quite understand that it would be the same for those of us who are English if we had to go into an army which was predominantly French. We would find some difficulty and sometimes would feel a bit lonesome. We would like more than anything else to have an opportunity to talk over our problems with someone of our own race. That is exactly the situation in which officers on national defence try to put themselves in an endeavour to help our fellow French Canadians in their desire to assist in the war.

I mention these matters in detail in order to indicate to the committee that the matter is one which has not escaped our attention by any means. My hon. friend made some remarks about publicity in the United States. He speaks of the poor publicity which is given. There again we endeavour to see to it that there is a proper representation of French Canadians in connection with publicity. At the present moment at national defence headquarters there are three French-speaking men under the director of public relations. In military district No. 4 there is one in charge of publicity; in military district No. 5 there is one in charge of publicity, and in military district No. 4 there is also a bilingual photographer. In addition to that, overseas there is a French-Canadian officer at Canadian military headquarters. These are in addition to the several French Canadians occupying editorial positions in the department of public relations in Ottawa. Then in Montreal there is a French-Canadian gentleman who represents the department of public relations. I mention this to show that publicity is done in French as well as in English. We endeavour to see that proper representation is given. I do not want it to go out from this committee that there is discrimination of any kind. The simple fact is that there are no better friends of our French-Canadian compatriots, our fellow Canadians, than the officers at national defence headquarters, and it is constantly our endeavour to see to it that their effort in connection with this war is recognized, appreciated, encouraged and supported.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I asked the minister a question this afternoon with reference to an accident that occurred during a parade in Toronto, and the minister said that the only way in which anything could be done for the lady who was injured was by way of compassionate allowance. I will give the minister the lady's name. It is Mrs. Nellie Burke, 175 McPherson avenue, Toronto. I would ask the minister to look into the case and see if a compassionate allowance cannot be granted to this lady.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
