The first paragraph of the resolution deals with the billion dollar belated gift, as it is called, to the mother country. The second paragraph refers to the $700,000,000 Great Britain has now spent on war in many ways in Canada, and provides an exchange rate for refunding at $4.45 to the pound sterling. This sum is to be without interest until the end of the war. The third paragraph gives the governor in council power to purchase some unmatured securities and for the repatriation and refunding of these securities. A guarantee is given, and in my view this is a most commendable form of financial aid to the mother country. The fourth paragraph deals with the financing of the billion dollar gift, and makes provision for the payment of any expenditures on interest.

In his speech the minister referred to that paragraph in the speech from the throne which states:

> You will also be asked, as an integral part of Canada's direct war effort, to approve a contribution to Britain of vast quantities of munitions, foodstuffs and supplies.

In the second paragraph of the resolution the means have been provided. The sum of $700,000,000 for war purposes owed in Canada is mentioned and the rate is given and this debt taken care of. There is a further stipulation that there shall be no interest until after the termination of the war, and this debt also, I hope, will in time be cancelled as a second gift—it is long overdue.

I was keenly interested in the question raised the other night by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) with respect to the failure of the government of the day to give the country proper information respecting the public war expenditures and the public accounts. That information has been given in the mother country in detail daily to parliament. Over there they have a committee on national expenditures. It meets during the greater part of the year, and through its efforts all expenditures are coordinated, and a huge reduction in capital and maintenance charges made, and a check on every cent spent.

I said back in 1938 that Canada should establish food reservoirs then in the old country to take care of our exportable wheat surplus, something which would have given the mother country, when war broke out, a great advantage and reservoirs there for Canadian canned goods, cheese and other foods and textiles. However, nothing was done about my suggestion, frequently made before the war. The other day my leader referred to what the Hon. H. A. Wallace, Vice-President of the United States, and former secretary of agriculture, had to say in connection with pooling allied food reserves.

The history of courage in this war has been gloriously rewritten on land, on sea and in the air by the wonderful youth of Canada, on active service the world over and on the seven seas, many of whom raced to England to enlist. If we look at the cause and effect in connection with this resolution, we see at once a need for greater coordination and cooperation with Great Britain in new methods of production and man-power to aid her. A billion dollars is said to be a large sum of money, but when in finance you get away up in the sky and in the clouds in figures like that they become so staggering that the larger the sum the less likelihood there is that it will be well spent or that there will be any drastic control over it.

We are entitled to more real information. We are entitled to know the long-range war policy of the government, because since the war started Canada has been given less information than has any other dominion. Certainly we are given less information than are the people of Great Britain. Democracy in Canada cannot be saved by refusing to face facts and by refusing to tell the people the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth about our war effort. As I said here on March 21, 1939, before the war, if the people of Canada and the other dominions are not given the facts; if they are allowed to know only as much as their rulers will permit them to know, then those people are embarking on a course fraught with a financial condition leading in some instances, as it will in Canada, to bankruptcy.

I believe in the wisdom of telling the people the great danger and peril at our very door and gate. In future let us tell them the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth about the whole war and about the danger on the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, and the real facts, building up from the worst of these facts.

Yesterday some reference was made to our sister industrial province of Quebec. I believe one of the desires and the will of the people of Canada from coast to coast is that sooner or later, before the war is over, that great country of France may rise again and be restored to her place for freedom in all history. She was our great ally in the last war, and 4,000 sons of Toronto, who helped to defend her in the last war, are buried there, sleeping their last sleep until the resurrection morning. I hope enough support will be given against the axis powers to restore that great land to the glory it enjoyed in the past history of the world as one of the great democracies.

We in Canada should be a united country from coast to coast. Wolfe and Montcalm lie buried together at Quebec, and the inscription on their monument attests the unity of the races in this country, as described in the motto on their memorials on the Plains of Abraham. Britain and France in the last war fought for a better world and for a better fate than has befallen them. I have always believed in the principles of confederation since I have been in this house—of the old Cornish battle cry of "each for all and all for each." There is no use in our thinking that this is going to be an easy victory. We have no divine right to victory. This is going to be a most difficult, hard and heavy task and we should face that fact before it is too late. Facts are facts, and we should take our lessons from the past. So far we have lost the war and almost every battle; we have had no successes except some in Libya, and one or two others.

The money to be voted by this resolution will help in a small way to restore confidence in the mother country as to what the dominions are doing to aid her in her hour of greatest peril. One thing that makes the vast expenditures under this resolution necessary is the fact that after the great war Great Britain and France, the two great democracies, threw away their defences. Not only did they throw away their defences, they threw away their friends. These two leading nations listened to the pacifists and those who pleaded that there should be friendship for Germany, that country which has put 20,000,000 men, by beastly war and savage mechanism, under the sod of Europe in the last three generations. These two great nations, Britain and France, disarmed at great cost, thus causing this war, and now this resolution is necessary in order to help the mother country to save the world and civilization. If the truth were told, Munich was necessary. As I said in the house last year, Munich was necessary because the two great democracies, Great Britain and France, were obliged to buy an armistice on terms which were humiliating because together or singly, Britain and France were in a helpless state and even they were no match for the greatest aggressor of all history, Germany.

That was not Hitler's fault. I suggest that it was the fault of Great Britain because she listened to the babble of the pacifists and decided to disarm, urged on to do so by Canada and the United States. I should like to give all praise to the Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Churchill, who spoke in this chamber only a little over three months ago, with you, sir, presiding so ably. As he said himself the other day, he considers himself a servant of the House of Commons, a child of the House of Commons. If he is a child of the House of Commons, then he is a child who is beloved and respected the world over for what he has done in this emergency after Dunkirk, although he is being blamed to-day because there have been some reverses, as war always brings. History shows that the great Prime Minister Pitt and Napoleon also had reverses. You must expect reverses if you go to war, but Britain and her brave and faithful allies will yet smash the axis powers.

However, something should be done by the government of the day on a greater production effort in Canada. Lord Beaverbrook is to come to Washington shortly. As I said the other day, he is a native of Maple, Ontario, although he lived in the maritime provinces nearly all the time he spent in this country. He is a great Canadian, and I think his services and those of Viscount Bennett should be used by this dominion at home and abroad in a total war effort. When Lord Beaverbrook comes to Washington he should be consulted by the Department of Munitions and Supply and come to Ottawa to help us about our production. I think I am fair enough to admit that the government should be given a great deal of credit for what they have done since the war started, especially as they did not believe in war or armaments and all that kind of thing. They believed, with the pacifists, in the League of Nations, disarmament, the Monroe doctrine, the Kellogg and Locarno pacts, collective security and all those pacifist things. It cannot be expected that we would be able to develop an army in a year or so. While our production has been fairly good, it should be three times as large as it is and we shall not have a total war effort until that point is reached.

We are told that our production is to improve, but it may be too late. Hitler seeks to capture the future with what he is doing at the present time. We hope to win the war, but do the opposite by talking of what we will do in 1943. If we are going to do anything about production, we shall have to improve things all along the line. I ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) to bring down a white paper to show us what has been done in the way of production so far, and the long range policy one is out in Britain. We are told that our war production is two or three times as large as that of the last war, but that kind of thing does not mean anything. I submit that the services of Lord Beaverbrook should be sought in this vaster production effort. He should be asked to come to Canada to give us the benefit of his experience. I hope the government will invite him to come here when he arrives in Washington—he was to be here with Mr. Churchill but was sick—and I have no doubt that he will be ready to give this country every assistance.

Shipbuilding should be our first priority. As I pointed out here, two years before the war started, Great Britain had 2,000 fewer ships than she had in 1914, and yet there were 5,000,000 more mouths to feed. Great Britain must import 94 per cent of her foodstuffs and nearly all her raw materials. We made a mistake in the imperial conference of 1937 by not joining New Zealand and Australia in a vast, gigantic empire shipbuilding policy. In 1936, 1937, 1938 and 1939 I urged an empire shipbuilding policy and the opening up of all our old shipbuilding plants to build ships to carry necessary food, munitions, wheat and other supplies to the old land.

I believe that our production has been tremendously increased since the last war. Mr. Churchill told the British House of Commons that Great Britain's production was twice that of the United States. The United States to-day is somewhat in the position of Great Britain after Dunkirk. They were not ready, they were not prepared. Great Britain is doing a wonderful work; her production is going ahead by leaps and bounds. Mr. Churchill has said that England's production is four times greater than it was in 1917.

We are told that ours is twice what it was in the war of 1914. We might as well say, for all the good it will do, that it is a hundred times greater than it was during the Boer war, or a thousand times greater than it was during the battle of Hastings.

Before the war started I contended that there were too many in this house with the Geneva type of mind. Pretty nearly all those on the government benches were of that type of mind, as were nearly all the members of nearly all the parties here. They all believed in such shams as the league, and collective security, which is only collective security for the world with an armed Britain. The Minister of Finance and the minister with the high sounding title, the Minister of National War Services, went over to see the Geneva sittings as Canada's delegates, before the war, and they came back thoroughly imbued with the Geneva idea and lack of vision not to have seen the folly of it all. We thought we could do without an army and a navy and retain our freedom, but how under the rise of Hitler in Germany from 1935 was civilization to be maintained without being armed? Take the example of the great disaster in the Pacific. We let Australia down by not supporting her at the imperial conference of 1937. We should have made a grant to the Singapore base for Pacific protection and adopted the Jellicoe report which called for a vast empire shipbuilding policy, for a naval policy, for the training of 5,000 cadets for the navy in Canada and a naval college, and for the building up of a merchant marine, all urged in 1937 by me. In answer to all the pacifists in and out of this house, I say now to them, quoting from Jeremiah, chapter 37, verse 19:

> Where are now your prophets which prophesied unto you, saying, The king of Babylon shall not come against you, nor against this land?

As we see how close the axis powers now are to our front door on the Atlantic and Pacific, and the war came in September, 1939.

I am not one of those who both in and out of this house preached such pacifism. Hon. gentlemen before the war were entitled to their pacifist views, and while I have criticized pacifism, the whole world was imbued with that idea for years before the war, and especially the democracies, one of which, France, it is too bad to say, went down and out. But I would say this, that if I was one of those who had changed their views on pacifism after the war broke out, I would far rather have come to the House of Commons and sat on the penitent bench and said that such views brought the world to this terror and disaster, and that I had made a grave mistake. I would not now go around Canada, posing as a super-patriot as some of them have been doing. It has taken two months for us to have one word of discussion in the house on our war effort in connection with this resolution to provide money and munitions and food for the mother country. It was the pacifists who caused the war; there is no doubt about that. But for them we would never have had this war and the dislocation and awful disaster of the whole world, and dear knows, no one knows as yet who is going to win the war—nobody knows that fact yet. We had the idea preached to the youth of Canada in schools, state colleges and universities that the profession of arms was demoralizing. The pacifists held that war was wrong, that it was wrong to take life in the defence of one's country; but as a matter of fact they in their taxes were prepared to pay others to join the army and go out and fight when war came and do that very killing act. They did not propose to go to war themselves—oh, no. When war came they would stay home and preach pacifism and say, "now, soldiers, get to the war". Ruskin, himself a man of peace, has spoken about war, and its results in this passage from "The Crown of Wild Olive":

> When I tell you that war is the foundation of all arts, I mean that it is the foundation of all the high virtues and faculties of men. It is very strange to me to discover this; and very dreadful, but I saw it to be quite an undeniable fact. The common notion that peace and the virtues of civil life flourish together, I found to be wholly untenable. Peace and the vices of civil life only flourish together. We talk of peace and learning, and of peace and plenty, and of peace and civilization, but I found those were not the words which the muse of history coupled together; that on her lips the words were—peace and sensuality—peace and selfishness—peace and death. I found, in brief, that all great nations learned their truth of word, and strength of thought in war; that they were nourished in war and wasted by peace; trained by war and betrayed by peace, in a word, that they were born in war and expired in peace.

War in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, will never be abolished in any country of the world until men learn to do their duty to their neighbours much better than they have done in the past. When they do that, war will cease.

There is nothing said in this resolution about two or three matters I want to mention, and one is shipping. How are we going to get these supplies and munitions across the Atlantic ocean? Our great shipping losses have been outlined by Mr. Churchill in the British House of Commons. It is deplorable that the British empire should have suffered the loss of these empire bases off Ireland. It has resulted in the loss of the lives of our brave soldiers and seamen and an awful tonnage. If we had not had these bases in the last war we should have lost that war, and in view of their importance I urge upon the government that something be done to acquire them now or force their acquisition at once.

We are spending nearly $4,000,000 a day on the war, and yet there is hardly one item of war expenditure in the public accounts. Part of that $4,000,000 is being spent by all the various outside bureaucratic control boards and commissions. Does the auditor general audit the accounts of each of these boards in detail? No. Then what check or audit is there upon them, and by whom, as they spend money like water, uncontrolled. Will the government consider the appointment of a select committee of the house on national expenditure, as they have done in Britain? The committee in Britain has done a great deal of good. But the committee on war expenditure here, on which $25,000 was spent, did not find out anything because the first motion they passed was that they should not inquire into past expenditures. They reported here and their report is in the archives. Sooner or later the House of Commons will have to see that they recover at once control over every cent of these huge expenditures.

This resolution also shows the necessity for an empire war cabinet. The war is now all over the Pacific, north and south. Japan is roaming around 15,000 miles there and has the absolute command of the sea. She has submarines which can cross the Pacific without refueling. If you had a million men, as Mr. Churchill said, you could do nothing at all in the Pacific because Japan is moving around all these islands in the Pacific, north and south, and around Australia like a circus and nobody knows which will be attacked next. So I urge upon the government that something be done about a war cabinet to get a united war control and union and empire cooperation at once.

In England a civil war was fought for nearly one hundred years before parliament acquired control of public expenditures, but in this country we lost that control as soon as the war started. These outside boards and commissions can spend what money they like. A bureaucratic form of government has been set up and some 25,000 orders in council have been passed—and parliament meeting here exercises no control over public expenditure. You can hardly find an item in the public accounts that relates to the war. Parliamentary control is a myth. The public accounts committee should be meeting, and should be broadened into a committee on national expenditure as they have in England, which has saved the taxpayers millions of pounds by coordinating expenditures. Such a committee should go into details of all ministers' expenditures such, for instance, as the rates of pay of soldiers. They are most inequitable, and that question should certainly come before such a committee at once, and rates of pay be adjusted. In Great Britain the audit committee has effected great economies, and it would be a great help to the Minister of Finance here to have such a committee examine into government expenditure and apply the big stick of retrenchment. In my opinion the minister is taking too much money out of the taxpayers' pockets, and a large amount is going to be expended under this resolution in refunding operations. Half of the war expenditure does not help beat Hitler at all. Most of the expenditures under the other $2,000,000,000 resolution have already been made and all we can do is to conduct a post mortem on the one or two larger resolutions. We just sit here like a lot of coroners or undertakers inquiring into what has been done in the past, expenditures made over which we had no control and cannot reduce a dollar. Bureaucrats have issued countless orders and spent a huge amount of money to be provided by the taxpayers without parliament having any control over the expenditure or even knowing one iota about them. It is a farce. In my opinion this House of Commons will be open to criticism by history and it will be held up as a reproach to Canada and to this parliament that we sat here and exercised no control over expenditure whatever, if we do not at once take action along that line to force a showdown on it.

Let us not be unmindful of our great heritage as the senior dominion. We have neglected to take the simple precaution of training the youth of Canada to defend their country on land and sea and in the air, which is the first principle of preservation of any democratic country.

I charge the lack of support in 1937 of these things to the account of the government. At the imperial conference the government did nothing in behalf of the tie that binds Canada to the rest of the empire, namely the British navy and merchant marine. We did nothing to promote the building of ships or the putting of the merchant marine on a proper basis.

The authors of the empire trade agreements in 1930-32 conferred a great benefit on this country. Britain has always been our best customer. Other customers come and go but she stays on forever. I have read Hansard since the war started, and, except for the text of this one resolution now before the chair, I have yet to discover in it an iota of praise to the mother country for all she has done for us. She has saved us in Canada from the axis powers and has enabled the vast majority of our youth to proceed with their daily avocations and indulge in their amusements and soprts as though there was no war at all. I am not objecting to their doing so, but their first duty is to their country, and they will live to regret what they are doing. What I object to is that our country is not half appreciative enough to the motherland for the British fleet and the Royal Air Force, but for which we would have been invaded long ago, and the enemy would have come up the St. Lawrence, through the maritimes, the central provinces, the prairies and the west and arrived on the Pacific coast. Not only Canada, but all America owes Britain a debt of gratitude that they can never repay. It is too bad that the Anglophobia so frequently expressed from outside in the press and on the radio is still as before the war, allowed to continue and function. Nothing has done more to kill recruiting.

By this vote we can thank the mother country for giving us, before and during this war, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of thought, freedom from fear, from famine and from battle, and also from the immediate murder and sudden death which the axis powers would have caused us. We do not half show our appreciation of all this. If Canadians would only stop, halt, listen and think, they would know that but for Britain we would have endured, for nearly two and a half years past, the mechanized hordes of the axis powers with all their savagery, brutality and tyranny. They would have swept through Canada and enslaved us, and we would have had to endure the same treatment as the small countries and larger ones of Europe—the concentration camps, the loudspeaker, the spies, the tramping of feet, the sergeant-major, the gestapo, the whips, the spirit of barbarism, brutality and savagery. But for Britain we on this continent would have been compelled to endure these experiences long ago, while Canada fails to awake and has a policy of everything as usual.

In my opinion there have been too many big stick methods in connection with the government's effort. They use a lot of controllers. The air we breathe is about the only thing that is not under control. These controllers are continually making speeches and radio addresses threatening the tightening of belts, employing other big-stick material, and fastening upon us three or four times as many regulations as they have in Great Britain.

As I understand it, all of us in this house are outright in favour of the war; but I do not think it is fair for any group in this chamber or outside it to use the war for the purpose of discussing their socialistic proposals on domestic questions—the function of money, the basis of credit and that kind of thing.

[Mr. Church.]

Surely we can wait until the war is over before taking up these matters. Personally I believe in certain economic conservative principles; I do not favour socialist leadership or the creation of a great national payroll, nor do I believe, with the present peril confronting us, the prosecution of the war should be used to put over all sorts of socialist doctrines, to change the functions of money and alter the basis of trade although I believe in sound money brought up to date for changed conditions. I believe in the right to hold private property. I believe that, even after war, the principle of private ownership will prevail—a principle so strongly held in the days of Macdonald and Laurier, when everybody owned some private property; it might have been only a cow, a small mill, a little store, a small farm or a little shop or industry of some kind. We have been slow to see how all this is passing away in Canada and how the people are becoming proletarians. But I strongly favour the postponement of discussions on these matters until after the war. The right of a small, independent business man to hold private property is derived from nature, not from man, and the state has no right to abolish it, but only to regulate its use. Parliament should abolish half these bureaucrats and not competitive business.

I believe that the Conservative party derives its strongest support from the working classes. We have received the votes of working men and trades unionists, because we believe in protecting industry, the farmer, and labour, and in preserving our own work for our own workmen, our own markets for our own products.

I suggest that a bill be introduced in this house similar to one which passed the British House of Commons on February 17 of this year, to restore pre-war trade practices so that business will know where it stands and can function as formerly. It seems to me that our present policy in Canada now is, "never were there so many who knew so little about so much." That is bureaucratic control for you. That is the principle on which these boards and their controllers are acting. We should beware of this hidden agency of aggression before it is too late; it is one of the things we are fighting against in this war, and the extension of this system not only adds to the burdens of the minister in financing the war but will handicap him when it is over, and ruin all competitive business, great and small, with so many artificial barriers and burdens.

It is a staggering reflection that, for all the blue books and statements relating to parliamentary government and returns, and our public accounts, nobody knows from day to day how many bureaucrats are carried on the public payrolls or what they are costing the country. When hon. members ask questions they cannot obtain such information, because the figures are not there, and the treasury cannot give them because they don't know as it is done over their heads. The figures given here to-day are wrong for to-morrow. It is too bad that so much money has been spent over the heads of the taxpayers and their representatives in the House of Commons, who have no say or control.

In conclusion, I suggest that a committee on public accounts should be appointed. I should like to see a levelling up of existing inequalities in the pay of our fighting men on land, on the sea and in the air. I believe that if all hon. members had copies of the rates of pay and allowances and realized the inequalities which are shown in them, there would be a sensation. I hope something will be done to remedy this state of things, and force an immediate inquiry into the pay and allowances of our officers and especially the rank and file of our men and also the women's army.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): In rising to make a few observations, I think that the house will agree, after hearing the speech of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) this afternoon, that he was yesterday put by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in an unfair light. The leader of the opposition took certain isolated sentences from a speech made by the minister in the city of Quebec and did not relate those observations to the context or to what the minister had in mind. This proposal cannot be looked upon in a narrow sense. It is one which requires a good bit of explanation, particularly in certain sections of Canada—not only in one—and that is exactly what the Minister of Fisheries was trying to do—to indicate, in quarters where there has already been expressed some opposition to this measure, the reasons for it. I think that, having in mind that there was really a common interest between the minister and the leader of the opposition, on reflection the latter might be prepared to regard the minister's contribution as one that deserves commendation, and not the censure which he gave it. Because the fact is that in many parts of Canada the man on the street, as well as the magnates of finance, have expressed some doubt about the wisdom of this proposal, largely because it has not been viewed in its proper perspective.

What is the proposal which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has sought to embody in this resolution? It is to provide Britain with an opportunity of meeting her scarcity or shortage of Canadian dollars by supplying, without charge or obligation, munitions of war, raw materials and foodstuffs up to the value of $1,000,000,000. As the leader of the opposition said yesterday, there is involved no transfer of money but simply a transfer of goods. How anyone, in the light of the situation in the world to-day, when our smugness of a former day must be dissipated, could oppose this measure, I say frankly I fail to understand—not simply because this is a gift to Britain, not simply because we are giving financial assistance to Britain in a common cause, though that in itself would be a reason for supporting it, but because in view of our experience during the last twenty years, this, since the occurrence of the present war, is the first real statesmanlike endeavour to meet the whole problem of international debt and international obligation.

Every member of this house will recall the period between 1921 and 1928 when the debtor nations found themselves in the ridiculous position of paying back their debts with money which they acquired by way of loans from their creditors; how Germany was able to pay her reparations, thanks to huge extensions of credit by the United States, her main creditor; how Britain, who received moneys by way of reparations from Germany, was able to pay part of her obligation to the United States out of money which she received from Germany, which in turn had come from the United States. That ridiculous tripartite arrangement provoked every man who had given any serious thought to these problems to consider the necessity of putting the whole problem of international debt in its proper perspective. The exclusive policy of certain countries in the period between 1921 and 1928, which refused to have these obligations paid in terms of goods and services, let alone in terms of currency, created a situation which led to that dismal period between 1930 and 1935.

I for one am therefore prepared to support this proposal on two grounds: First, because if we are going to win this war it will be necessary for all of us to look upon this matter in the light of a common obligation, in the light of the need of pooling our resources and the abandonment of our national and sectional interests; secondly, because the Minister of Finance in this proposal has given leadership not only to our own country but to all the nations of the world and in particular to those who will hold a creditor position when the war is over. That is one aspect of the problem. It seems to me, however, that the problem has another serious aspect. This is assistance to Britain; but Britain is not our only ally. The war has now reached many fronts, and if we are truly the arsenal of democracy, sharing that position with Britain and the United States, there comes into mind the whole question of priorities in war production and its distribution. Is this aid to go to only one quarter? Is everything we produce to go to Britain alone? Is it simply to go to Britain and Russia? How can we, in view of the fact that we are a Pacific power as well as an Atlantic power, ignore our obligations to our sister dominion, Australia, who at this time is faced with perhaps a nearer danger than any other country in the world?

We know what the news is in the press to-day. I do not comment on its merits because I do not know what the merits are, except that I think someone in this house should refer to it. We have the cry from Australia as expressed in one of the leading publications of that country, in the Sydney Daily Telegraph of yesterday:

> Whoever is responsible for the allocation of Canada's war output has lost his sense of values. Nobody has suggested that Australia should be given priority. Britain must have the best share of all production; Russia, India, Egypt and China must have a good share. But the flow of production should be dictated by the urgency of the situation in the various war theatres. . . . A London Times statement, that the Pacific battle is a race between American reinforcements to Australia and the Japanese advance ignores the fact that Canada is also a Pacific country. Australians simply will not understand why a Pacific country and a sister dominion should be sending nineteen times more war material to Egypt than to Australia. You would imagine that Canada would put first things first. The United States is wholeheartedly committed to making Australia a major base for operations against Japan. She is doing so because she knows that the west coast of America would be wide open to attack if Australia fell. The west coast means Canada. Australia's defeat would mean the end of the British empire in the Pacific. That is why Canada's export figures for February do not make sense.

That is Australia. To that observation the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is reported as saying that the allocation of materials which go from this country and from the United States is supervised by Britain herself. I have no quarrel with that. A war is not run from a barber shop or even from the House of Commons, but I do say it is important that there should be some expression of opinion which would give some encouragement to Australia, that this country is determined, in so far as it can, to effect the distribution of the materials of war produced in Canada, consistent with what those in charge regard as in the best interests of our cause.

Yesterday the leader of the opposition related this whole problem of international obligations after the war to the kind of world that we were going to have after the war was over, and there resulted in consequence the observation of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell), in this house, that we had to take account of the future in the light first of all of our mistakes in the past and of what was, he said, the undoubted demand of the vast majority of citizens throughout the world at the present time. He was opposed to the system of free enterprise. He regarded the future as envisaging, if it was to have any sort of order at all, something on a socialistic basis, and the leader of the opposition urged that we should have a system of free enterprise. Then one speaker from the Social Credit party attacked the government because the chairman of the reconstruction committee had expressed the view that the purpose for which we are fighting was to preserve the gold standard, or something of that sort. It is important for someone on this side to express an individual view at any rate, and that I propose to try to do.

In the first place, I think, throwing aside party differences—and that is what I seek to do to-day—and looking at the world from the point of view of the exigencies that will present themselves, we must all be prepared to admit that we are in a transition. I am not so sure that I could accept the doctrinaire attitude of the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, and have a readymade formula for everything that might arise. Nor am I prepared to accept the view of the leader of the opposition that in the world to come we can go on in the laissez-faire manner that we followed in the nineteenth and the early part of the twentieth century. General Smuts, who may be regarded as having some special qualification to speak on these matters, said, in 1941:

> Intercourse between the nations will be free, and commerce, economics and finance will be freed from all hampering restrictions and obstructions. As between man and man there shall be social justice; as between nation and nation, there shall be a rule of law, the absence of force and violence, and the maintenance of peace.

Then there was the significant statement of the British foreign secretary, made one month later when commenting on a statement along similar lines by Mr. Cordell Hull. He said:

> Institutions and arrangements of international finance must be so set up that they lend aid to essential enterprise and continuous development of all countries and permit payment through the process of trade consonant with the welfare of all countries.

Just to make the record complete, the Prime Minister of this country, speaking at the lord mayor's luncheon in his honour, said:

> A new world order cannot be worked out at some given moment and reduced to writing at a conference table. It is not a matter of parchments and of seals. That was one of the mistaken beliefs at the end of the last war.

The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), I think it was, criticized the government because of the observations of Doctor James, chairman of the reconstruction committee. I think along with that criticism should be taken the observations of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), who, speaking in Toronto in October, 1941, along the line taken by Smuts, Eden and our own Prime Minister, said:

> We shall have to develop a kind of government and a kind of economic system that rules out unemployment. No other can survive. Security for the masses . . . must be the first essential of our post-war world.

So when the hon. gentleman talks about this government trying to defend a system that shows so much evidence of imperfection, he is hardly indicting this government fairly or, I was almost going to say, honourably.

What about the future? This whole problem with which we are dealing to-day, trying to adjust the difficulties of debtor and creditor nations in the light of events and circumstances that will, it is hoped, improve the economic condition of the world, will not be met by labels. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say that the world of to-morrow will be socialistic. I must say that I envy them the ability to be comfortable as to the complete adequacy of the point of view which they espouse. But the world of to-morrow possibly will be neither fully capitalistic nor fully socialistic. Surely the system of controls we set up during the period of depression, and elaborated upon during the war, is here to stay, at least for a long time.

I am not saying that the hon. gentleman opposite espouses the doctrine of communism, but I cannot think that communism any longer will have a large group of followers who will support the view that that philosophy is an alternative to war or imperialism. No; if we are to avoid disaster after the war; if we are to avoid the disturbance of national and international economics, strict supervision by the war-time control method over raw materials, foreign trade, foreign exchange, shipping and so on will have to be maintained, along the line of the arrangements that now prevail between the United Kingdom and the United States, and between the United States and Canada. If, for instance, Canada and the United States are able to cooperate during the war in the matter of control of shipping, exports and imports, raw material supply and the use of balance of payments, it should not be impossible to maintain this type of collaboration after the cease-fire signal is given.

Yesterday the leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, commenting on what he said was the lack of appreciation of this problem by the leader of the opposition—and I thought he was a little unfair in that regard—said the time had come when we had to plan our internal economy, when we had to plan the economies of all nations on an international basis. But we in Canada have done that very thing. Our system of price controls; our system of controlling wages, together with the other types of control that we have set up in this country, I venture to suggest represent almost as complete a form of planned economy as one could get in any part of the world. But the great danger is that if you allow that type of planning to proceed on a basis of absolute rigidity, without allowing for some competition between a measure of collectivism and a system of free enterprise, for instance, you will have the very sort of evils which have resulted from totalitarianism itself. So what is required with regard to this whole problem is, I think, not a doctrinaire attitude; not a definite conviction that we have the formula that will solve all these problems; but, first, a recognition that the old order is gone; second, a recognition that laissez-faire capitalism will no longer play the role it has assumed in other days, and that these problems must be dealt with realistically, not on the basis of an idealism which may be desired but which, I venture to suggest, cannot readily be achieved.

To summarize, in so far as guaranteeing a measure of social security is concerned, I would say this. Many of the forms of administrative controls which have become part of the job of government will have to be maintained. Thus far these controls have embraced national economies alone. They will have to receive a wider application. The system of licensing, of banning of imports and exports; the regulation of exchange rates—all these are among the methods by which these controls have operated; and the greater the control, the greater and more extensive the planning. As I have said, the Canadian price and wage control policy; the control of production; the control of raw and material supplies, and other controls, have given us the type of planning which hon. gentlemen opposite have been urging for years; but now that it is here they refuse to recognize it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Planning in whose interests?

Mr. GILLIS: Nice planning at Kirkland Lake by the labour department.

Mr. MARTIN: I have tried to deal with this matter as objectively as possible, but I do not want what I have said to be misinterpreted. With regard to what my hon. friend has said about management and labour, there is no point in not disclosing my views on that matter. I have no hesitation at all in saying that collective bargaining is the proper technique by which problems of management and labour should be dealt with. I would go even further than the government has gone in recognizing the desirability of making effective, even by compulsion, a system of collective bargaining. I say that in order that hon. gentlemen may not in Hansard, for others to read, give the impression that I have overlooked the importance of that problem.

The policy of control; the policy with regard to the intervention of the state in these matters, undoubtedly is one that at least charts the course by which the whole problem suggested by this resolution introduced by the Minister of Finance will be dealt with.

There is nothing further to add, except to say this, that it seems to me there is an obligation on the part of members of this house to look upon the proposal in its true light. We are making a gift, true, but a gift which will enure to our benefit just as much as it will to that of the recipients. Second, it is a forward act in respect of the whole problem of debt adjustment which will face the world when this conflict is over.

I say we must be realistic. I know my own views in these matters have undergone definite changes. But the world is in flames; we can no longer be satisfied with sectional or national interest. Our resources must become the resources of our allies if we are going to bring together that kind of control, for instance, envisaged yesterday in Great Britain by Sir William Beveridge. That is the spirit in which this resolution should be faced. For one, I look upon the day that is to come not as a day of judgment but as a day of opportunity.

Mr. J. J. KINLEY (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this resolution because of its great importance. I think as a member of the House of Commons I should express my opinion and hope that the people I represent especially will take an enthusiastic view of the resolution because of its generosity, its magnitude and the fact that it is an innovation in international finance.

I regret that the voice of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) did not ring as true as I thought it might in praise of this resolution. He digressed to speak about something that happened in a by-election campaign in Quebec, and he accused the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud) of making remarks not appropriate in war time.

I have read what appears in Hansard of yesterday, and it seems to me that one cannot put any serious war-time meaning on what the minister said. His was an argument respecting economics, and pointing out that Canada would be able to pay her debts. As I have looked at the minister's statement, the thought has occurred to me that he has put up the kind of case one might expect from a person holding Tory doctrines, because if hon. members will read his statement carefully they will find it follows the practice of the Conservative party, in so far as it says, in effect, "We will import nothing that can be produced in this country, and in that way we shall have economic nationalism."

It seems to me a pity that by our discussion we are detracting from the lustre of this gift to Great Britain, and we are denying to the people of Canada the full satisfaction and feeling that it is a generous gift. It is an expression of good-will, and a giving of our substance in great measure, at a time when it surely is needed and, we are assured, greatly appreciated.

We know it is appreciated because on January 27, there appears in Hansard a statement made by the Right Hon. Winston Churchill in the House of Commons in London, where he said:

> Having crossed the Atlantic it was plainly my duty to visit the great Dominion of Canada. The house will have read with admiration and deep interest the speech made by the Prime Minister of Canada yesterday on Canada's great and growing contribution to the common cause in men, in money and in materials. A notable part of the contribution is the financial offer which the Canadian government have made to this country. The sum involved is one billion Canadian dollars, about £225,000,000. I know the house will wish me to convey to the government of Canada our lively appreciation of their kind and most generous offer, inequalled in its scale in the whole history of the British empire, and it is a convincing proof of the determination of Canada to make her maximum contribution to the successful prosecution of the war.

I do not think we need approach this gift or this resolution under the shadow of shame, as was suggested in the house yesterday. In his speech the leader of the opposition is reported at page 1425 of Hansard to have used these words:

> We have accepted help and protection of inestimable value without, to our shame be it said, ever contributing a single dollar or a single man. That was before the war.

I do not think Great Britain figures that we owe them or that Canada in any sense is a liability. But it seems to me that there are many people in Canada who still think in terms of Westminster. Their vision of home is still outside Canada, and they seem to rely so much on distant thought. I say this advisedly at this time, because I think that for the harmony and best effort of this country we should be militant Canadians, thinking first in terms of our country, and with our government here as a trusted leader of this country.

To exemplify this, it will be recalled that on several occasions in the house questions were raised as to whether the Vichy minister should be in Canada. If the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had said, "Well, the government has given this matter consideration, and we have felt that in the interest of the country and in the interest of our war effort this man should remain here", it would have excited discussion on the part of hon. members opposite. But when he replies, "Mr. Churchill says this is the proper thing to do", it is accepted without discussion. I do not believe Canadian opinion or action should be unduly controlled from any outside source. While extremely anxious to assist, to cooperate and to conform, as much as we possibly can, we must retain our self-respect, and regard our own government as our leaders. They in turn must accept responsibility in their own right before parliament and the people of Canada, and thus exert the best Canadian influence as a free and equal partner in the British commonwealth of nations.

It has been said that this vote is the people's money and not the money of the government. It seems that that is hardly worth saying. I do not see how the government could give any money, except what it gets from the people. The source of government strength and power is from the people, and the money comes from taxation of the people. There are some in the house who think that perhaps the government could create money, but I would assure my hon. friend that that money would not be accepted as payment in outside countries, at least, at any value that would be of very much use in this war. I should like to remind this house that Canada is strong financially. Canada has not yet invoked lease-lend aid from the United States. Canada still pays her bills.

Now for a moment I should like to look at this resolution to see how extensive and how far-reaching it is; I want to show what a wonderful gesture it is on the part of Canada. It reads:

> 1. That sums not exceeding one thousand million dollars ($1,000,000,000) be granted to his majesty towards defraying the expenditures that may be incurred during the present war for the purpose of enabling the government of the United Kingdom to purchase in Canada aircraft, tanks, mechanical transport vehicles, guns, ammunition and other munitions of war, foodstuffs, raw materials and any other commodities and supplies essential to the conduct of the war and the maintenance of the people of the United Kingdom, and to assist in enabling the government of the United Kingdom to defray other expenditures incurred in Canada for war purposes.

A resolution can be worded in involved and scientific language, but to reduce this paragraph to simple terms, it simply means that we are giving Great Britain a gift of $1,000,000,000, which money is to be used for the purchase of agricultural supplies, manufactured articles and other commodities produced in Canada for the purpose of carrying on the war. I believe the people of Canada understand this clearly. However, the impression is that this is just a gift of $1,000,000,000 when the fact is that the resolution is much more extensive. It goes on to say:

> 2. That the Minister of Finance may be empowered to accept from the government of the United Kingdom an obligation of the said government in such form and subject to such terms and conditions as the governor in council may determine for a sum of seven hundred million dollars ($700,000,000) in exchange for an equivalent amount, at an exchange rate of $4.45 to the pound sterling, of deposits in pounds sterling held in banks in the United Kingdom, the said obligation of the government of the United Kingdom not to bear interest until the termination of the war.

This is to be a loan without interest and there will be no terminating date until the end of the war. There will be no obligation to be met and no interest until the end of the war. We are empowered to accept certain obligations of the United Kingdom, let us assume that they give us a note. Who would be the best endorser to have on that note? There is only one endorser that would be any good—victory. Unless this country is victorious, unless democracy wins, this would not be a loan, it would simply be money spent for the cause.

The leaders of the opposition parties have taken their turns at prophesying. They have been telling us what is going to happen in the future. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party (Mr. Coldwell) told us about the social evil that was going on and that in the end we would likely have state socialism. What a time this is to tell that to the people! Imagine telling people in travail, people who are in anguish under their burdens, that there is something radically wrong with their country! It seems to me it is like telling a man who is about to enter the ring to fight that he is all wrong. It seems to me we should wait until the war is over before we try to cause dissension or disturbance among our people who do not believe alike on many of these questions that are brought up at the present time.

I am not fearful of the future as long as we have an intelligent and well thought out programme. I am willing to trust the Canadian people in the future as I have trusted them in the past. I know our country was a good country in the past; I know it is a better country now, and I know it will be far better in the future. The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation thinks he has solved the problem when he says that state socialism is coming.

Mr. COLDWELL: Who said that?

Mr. KINLEY: I said that my hon. friend said that.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. KINLEY: The hon. member said to call it state socialism, if you liked.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I did not.

Mr. KINLEY: I think that is what the hon. member meant. The leader of the opposition says that we must hold on to the past to a certain extent. I think we should hold on to what is good, but I think the party he represents are holding on too much to the past. I recall years ago, when reciprocity was proposed in this country, a very prominent gentleman made a speech which left an impression upon my mind as a boy. He said that the fishermen's bounty would be imperilled if they did not vote against reciprocity. I remember someone telling me that that was symbolical of the Conservative party, that they always told you that you were going to lose something unless you voted for Conservative principles. I do not believe in the philosophy of either my hon. friend to my extreme left or the leader of the opposition. I know that Liberalism is a marching force, always advancing, never satisfied and never arriving. That is the way the world has progressed in the past, and that is the way the world will progress in the future. People will go on; they will get better; they will never be satisfied, and they will never arrive at the place where they think it best to sit and rest.

I believe that when the war is over, the people will demand certain things. We are told that this is a land of freedom, but that we shall have to put that freedom on the shelf for the period of the war. We are told that we are being governed by order in council, and there is criticism because that is being done in war time. I do not think any orders in council have been passed that have hurt this country very much. If they did, the government quickly took notice of them. I think we shall actually be benefited by the restrictions that are being put in force. Adversity never killed a nation, but luxury and ease are the things that destroy nations. I believe the people will come out of this war stronger and better, more stream-lined, better able to face the future than they ever were before.

I think one thing the people will ask for after this war is individual freedom. They will want to go back to the old magna charta. They will want a return of the liberty of the subject and freedom of action which were infringed upon for the purposes of this war. The liberty of the subject is the most precious treasure in the hands of a free people. The people will want to be freed from many restrictions. They will want to have liberty of action and freedom of effort. I believe that will be the clarion call of the people of this country; that will be the call put forward when this war is over.

I hear a great deal about the capitalistic system. I do not think the capitalistic system is perfect; but it functions, and it functions at a serious time in the history of the world. I also think it is being cleansed. True, it is being cleansed by war, but the fact remains, notwithstanding the talk against it, that the capitalistic system has served its purpose for hundreds of years.

An hon. MEMBER: How?

Mr. KINLEY: I do not think it is the use of the capitalistic system that has done any harm, but its abuse, I believe, has done some harm. I have, however, not yet seen anything proposed by my hon. friends to my left which I would be willing to adopt in the place of a proper capitalistic system in this country.

We also hear a great deal about capital and labour. I have had to do with both capital and labour in a small degree in my time, having been associated with both, and in my long experience in the legislature of Nova Scotia and since I came here I have heard a lot about the problems of capital and labour. I do not think capital and labour should be divided into two distinct opposing camps. I think they should be in the same camp together. I think our cooperative effort should not be a class cooperative effort but a cooperative effort by capital and labour, capital representing the savings of the past, and labour representing the efforts of the present. I would not say to this house that we should adopt some socialistic scheme or present some theory as to what capital and labour should do. I would suggest something practicable. I would go to the statute books of Canada and look up the Companies' Act, governing the operation of companies, and I would say that by that law you should elect your directors, part by capital and part by labour. The Prime Minister of this country enunciated that theory many years ago in his book "Industry and Humanity", in which he said there were three parties interested in all industry—the community, capital and labour. Let the community be interested to the extent of making the laws governing business, and let capital and labour be interested together, sitting round a common table in their own right, each doing its part in cooperating to carry on industry, and each having its share. Then all parties will know what is going on, and all will have their rights. None will be exploited either by the leaders of capitalism on the one hand or by the leaders of the trades unions on the other. The majority representing both labour and capital, I believe, would be willing to accept and try that plan, and it would represent a splendid step forward in industry for the future.

I interjected when the leader of the opposition was speaking yesterday on temperance on which subject he made some rather good remarks. I suggested: "Don't you think that is right?" when he said that the governments of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick had restricted the sale of liquor. I regard drink as one of the big enemies. I believe that we cannot drink our way to victory. In the congested parts of Canada there is too much drinking among certain classes but I think we can depend upon the Cromwell qualities of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) to see to it that our war effort is kept as clean as possible. Conditions on the train on which I was travelling six months ago were not so good, but the last several times I have been to the maritime provinces I confess that conditions were greatly improved. I think the members of this house might even set the example of turning down our glasses until the end of the war. That would be a challenge to all our people in Canada. It would save our bodies and save our money, and would undoubtedly be in the best interests of our war effort.

Mr. McIVOR: If I may ask the hon. member a question, to give a lead to the members of the house, will he turn his own glass down?

Mr. KINLEY: I will, but I do not think I need to.

With regard to our future I still believe in the driving force of private initiative. I believe it is proper and right that there should be the incentive of fair personal gain in business and that we should resolve to accept those common obligations which fall upon the whole people of this country.

In closing, may I recall for the benefit of us all, a verse that struck me from Lowell's "The Present Crisis" which the Prime Minister quoted at the beginning of the war, and which could be applied and is being thought of all over this country:

> Careless seems the great Avenger; history's pages but record
> One death-grapple in the darkness 'twixt old systems and the Word;
> Truth forever on the scaffold, Wrong forever on the throne,—
> Yet that scaffold sways the future, and, behind the dim unknown,
> Standeth God within the shadow, keeping watch above his own.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two-Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, while protests reach us from all parts of Canada against this anti-national and anti-Canadian measure, the government is ready to give Great Britain an enormous sum of money, a step which is detrimental to Canada's defence. I have no words properly to describe this bill, which is the most nefarious, the most imperialistic and the most damaging of any ever submitted to this house.

I fail to understand why, in these hard times, when Australia is grievously threatened, we should neglect our country's defence and sacrifice a billion dollars worth of our natural resources. Instead of denying ourselves to such an extent, let us save what there is still time to save in Canada: our homes, families, parishes, cities, which are all living cells of our country. At this tremendously serious hour of our national life, will the Canadian parliament thoughtlessly endorse a policy which is bound to spell our ruin? Where are our gallant airmen, our best-trained soldiers, our courageous sailors? Where are our shells, our tanks, our guns and our machine guns? Overseas is not the proper place to keep our munitions, our armies and our material and human resources. They should be accumulated here, at home, on our own shores. The defence of Canada should be our first and foremost concern. We shall never cease to contend that our own defence is our first responsibility. Our country, our children, our homes, our families, our villages and cities, these make up the sacred inheritance for which we shall fight our enemies on every inch of ground, even unto the supreme sacrifice, the laying down of our lives.

On September 9, 1939, with the support of the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), I fought with all my strength against our participation in the present conflict. Always supported by my hon. and worthy colleague, I then moved a motion of want of confidence and an amendment to the address, in which I opposed Canadian participation in foreign wars.

Mr. DUPUIS: I suppose this is why the hon. member suggests, in his party's platform, that our soldiers be paid $4 a day.

Mr. LACOMBE: I am willing to do it when it is a question of defending our own country and I may say to the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) that we should be generous to our soldiers who do not get an adequate pay compared to industrial war workers. They are forfeiting their future and laying down their lives for their country and therefore they are entitled at least to a reasonable remuneration. I hope this is the last time the hon. member interrupts me.

Mr. DUPUIS: In 1939, you were referring to the defence of Canada?

Mr. LACOMBE: I have always been favourable to the defence of our own country; but I have always opposed militia and defence appropriations as long as our legislation remained unamended, because I foresaw the abyss into which we are sinking further every day.

The government requests parliament to vote a thousand million dollars for England. Another thousand million dollars after all the billions sent overseas in the form of food, munitions of war, troop transports, aeroplanes, ships, guns and tanks! In what a disastrous imperialistic policy our government, still so full of promise only recently, has now become entangled! How loathsome is this violation of sacred pledges and solemn promises! What has become of the programme of moderate, voluntary and free participation heretofore advocated? It has been torn and thrown into the laps of the war-mongers who prosper on the flesh and blood of our sons.

[Mr. Lacombe.]

Mr. DUPUIS: It is still voluntary and free.

Mr. LACOMBE: What a disgusting reversal of policy the plebiscite exemplifies!

Mr. DUPUIS: What about the reversal of policy on the part of the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains?

Mr. LACOMBE: How sorry the plight of our dear country and its people who see agriculture dying slowly but surely in Chambly-Rouville and everywhere—agriculture which is our first line of defence! What a strange idea of patriotism has a government which sacrifices the natural and human resources of the country upon the altar of military and financial imperialism! No, things must not, they cannot come to such a pass, and the hon. member who is constantly interrupting me will soon share my views on the matter.

Mr. DUPUIS: What about the imperialism of the Canadian party with the oath it demands?

Mr. LACOMBE: As was said by our gracious queen herself, God save Canada! God preserve our country from the effects of this anti-national and anti-Canadian bill. God preserve it from a measure steeped in imperialism! Those who vote this staggering sum shall have to answer before their country for a frightful error as well as for the deadly consequences of a deed which future generations and history will denounce. We have made enough sacrifices, Mr. Speaker. We have made too many. The government have neglected the defence of Canada in favour of an unprecedented and unbounded participation.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the hon. member permit me a question?

Mr. LACOMBE: Certainly.

Mr. DUPUIS: While delivering his speech, will he make us the favour of reading the resolution itself?

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I am not bound to read the resolution, and I do not need the help of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville in delivering my speech.

Alongside the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his colleagues, I have, during twenty years of public life, condemned as strongly as I could our participation in the last war. To-day, in the interests of our national defence, I say that this measure weakens and even dishonours Canada. I assert with all the energy at my command that it should at once be withdrawn or repudiated by a majority of the members of parliament.

(Text) Mr. Speaker, I quote from the newspaper, the Canadian Tribune, of March 21, 1942, the following infamous article, with the headline, "Who are the Enemies of National Unity?" This article was sent to me by a good Canadian citizen, Mr. Joseph O'Connor, who lives at 43 Gledhill avenue, Toronto. He wrote me as follows:

Dear Mr. Lacombe:

As a long-standing admirer of your truly Canadian viewpoint as expressed in the House of Commons, I would like to draw your attention to the enclosed scurrilous clipping taken from the Canadian Tribune of March 21. This appeared in an article headed, "Who are the Enemies of National Unity?"

This article reads in part as follows:

Firstly, that the plebiscite, besides offering a marvellous opportunity to the great democratic forces to make it a mighty demonstration for total war national unity, also offers to the pro-fascist and the quisling "home fronters" the protection and the immunity they need to carry on their vicious agitation. Thus, in Quebec, the Bouchard-Bourassa-Lacombe gang, who quite reasonably may be considered to have plans for a spurious "French-Canadian freedom" approaching that of U Saw's for Burma or Bose's for India,—

The article continues—and I want to ask the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis) to listen to this very important part:

In fact, it is quite clear that Mackenzie King's reliance on the Quebec M.P.'s to maintain his party government causes him to tolerate and give comfort to the isolationist views of the Lapointe group—for while Ernest Lapointe has passed away his spirit still marches on under the flag of Vichy and Mr. Cardin is the flag-bearer in the cabinet.

What a shame, Mr. Speaker! What a lie! As far as the Canadian party is concerned, I will draw the attention of the house to paragraph 20 of its manifesto:

Finally, respectful of the laws of its country, faithful and loyal to His Majesty the King of Canada, the Canadian party, in these difficult times, appeals to all who believe in the survival of Canada by the defence of our country in the first place, by the protection of our coasts, of our open cities, of our men, women and children. It invites in its ranks Canadians of all races and creeds. At this critical moment, it is the supreme call which the country in danger delivers to its men, to its women, to its children, to its worthy soldiers who were born in its midst and who should grow and fight for the defence of the Canadian soil and the salvation of Canada in the first place. Now that the country is at war and engaged in the conflict, we must undergo the consequences and defend our Canadian territory before all. The Canadian party, loyal and faithful to His Majesty the King, has a passionate desire to see the victory of our arms and of our allies, not by compulsory military service for overseas, but by voluntary enlistment which, according to the very words of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Honourable Winston Churchill, produces "a magnificent war effort".

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORTS OF GOVERNMENT OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the unanimous consent of the house to revert to the order "motions" so that I may lay on the table the reports of the Canadian National Railways, in which members on all sides of the house are concerned. These reports are those of the Canadian National system, the Canadian National West Indies Steamships, the Canadian National Railways Security Trust, and also the report of George A. Touche and Company, auditors of the Canadian National Railways system.

The house having reverted to the order for motions:

Mr. CARDIN: I now table these reports.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will these reports be distributed to members immediately?

Mr. CARDIN: I understand they are already being distributed.

WAR APPROPRIATION

UNITED KINGDOM FINANCING—WAR SUPPLIES, FOOD AND LOAN WITHOUT INTEREST

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee on a resolution to provide for granting to his majesty sums not exceeding $1,000,000,000 to assist in enabling the government of the United Kingdom to defray expenditures incurred in Canada for war purposes, and to provide for a loan to the government of the United Kingdom of $700,000,000 without interest.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): By means of the bill which will be founded upon the resolution now before the house, Canada will purchase $1,000 million worth of goods of various kinds, equipment, raw materials, supplies of foodstuffs, and so on, for Great Britain. All parts of Canada are, I believe, agreed upon this and in favour of this gift, and my purpose in rising at this time is only to point out one thing. I wish to direct to the attention of the house the fact that the purchase price which is to be paid for these various commodities is with one exception, to be a cost-plus price. I must express regret at this time that the house has not more details with regard to the quantity of materials available and the respective unit costs of these commodities which we are going to purchase. To get Canada into the production of equipment and supplies we found it necessary last year to grant over $100,000,000 to assist various companies in getting into production.

Everyone who realizes that this war will be won or lost on the production lines of the industries of the different countries at war is in favour of the granting of these amounts. We had to get production at all costs, and apparently it is going to be at all costs. Canada was not ready to produce when the war broke out, and all this capital that was required to extend the facilities of production was needed. Canada had to change rapidly from peace-time to war-time production. The thing I want to point out is that practically in every instance costs of production were guaranteed to these companies. Not only were they guaranteed costs of production, but overhead, labour costs, costs of raw materials were taken into account. In practically every instance there were cost-plus contracts, which meant that those engaged in production received cost-plus profit.

It is unnecessary for me to refer to the strike which industry engaged in when it refused to carry out production until it received that consideration. The point is that hundreds of millions of bushels of wheat will be included in this gift, and this is one item in connection with which the producer will not receive even his cost. There is no question about cost-plus. Resolutions that have passed through the house indicate that the price of wheat per bushel will be 90 cents at Fort William, which means that the average farmer will get about 70 cents on the farm. Those who know anything about cost of production, those whose business it is to study and do research work in connection with production costs, agree that the cost is well over a dollar on the farm. It appears to me only logical that if we are to make this gift to Britain, we should do as is done in connection with other commodities that have been supplied, and cost should be guaranteed. Otherwise the farmers can only feel this about it: Canada is making a gift; all the taxpayers are paying their share towards that gift; but those who do the producing, so far as wheat is concerned, will not get their cost. The farmer will bear his share of taxation in the making of this gift; but as regards the one commodity in which he is concerned, and by means of which he is trying to make a livelihood, he is to receive only 70 cents a bushel on the farm for his wheat, whereas wheat costs from $1.10 to $1.20 a bushel to produce. This means that for every bushel of wheat included in the gift to Britain the farmer is making an additional contribution of from 40 to 50 cents.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Castleden.]

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess we were dealing with the subject of a gift of a $1,000 million to Great Britain. In that connection we were observing that since the gift was coming from all of Canada, and since all the people were sharing, through taxation, in the giving of that bounty to Great Britain at this time of need, all by whom the goods were produced should be treated alike. If the manufacturer of the equipment, the guns, the tanks, the motor transport equipment; if the processor of foodstuffs, the producer of armaments and so on were to be paid their cost-plus price for the goods which are to be bought by this billion dollars; if the natural resources and raw materials which are to be sent over are to be paid for on the same basis, then we pointed out that it was only just and fair that those producing the wheat, of which probably several hundred million bushels will be purchased, should receive at least the cost of their production. Those people are not asking for cost-plus contracts. They merely ask that in time of need they be paid their cost. It is not just that this discrimination should exist. The state should be as a man of honour. I would urge that in arriving at the price to be paid for the wheat that is to be included in this gift, those in authority should see to it that the producer gets a fair and just deal. Only in this way can some measure of fairness exist.

Mr. H. R. JACKMAN (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, since the fall of France the flow of munitions and foodstuffs to Great Britain has been going on in ever increasing amounts. It has now come to the point, however, where as a result of those shipments Great Britain is no longer able to pay with Canadian dollars. She has turned over to Canada $250,000,000 in gold, $400,000,000 in Canadian government and government-guaranteed securities and over $100,000,000 in securities and capital receipts. Indeed, Great Britain has searched so deeply for Canadian dollars that she has taken even the small estates, or interests in the estates, which have been left to people in Britain by their relatives in Canada, and given those people sterling in order that she might get the dollars to send to Canada.

In addition to those amounts, and in order to balance the accounts to a recent date, Canada now proposes to make a loan to Great Britain of $700,000,000. This loan will be offset by British-held, private Canadian securities. It will amount to a collateral loan.

This $700,000,000 will be loaned without interest as long as the war continues. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said, however, that this $700,000,000 in Canadian securities would give Great Britain a continuing interest in Canadian prosperity. That is hardly to be called a continuing interest, I suggest, for it simply amounts to pledging as collateral the $700,000,000 of Canadian securities against a loan of a similar amount. The point is most amply proved when the minister says that if any securities are withdrawn from this pledge, then the proceeds must go to the reduction of the dollar loan itself. In addition to that amount, a further $295,000,000 in Canadian government and government-guaranteed securities is now to be taken over by Canada from Great Britain. After that, Great Britain will have no Canadian dollar securities whatever.

It is, therefore, proposed to this house that in order not to interfere with or prejudice the carrying on of the fight against tyranny, Canada shall grant to Great Britain a contribution of $1,000,000,000 for the purchase of raw materials, foodstuffs and munitions of war in Canada.

I support this resolution as far as it goes. We must send to Great Britain all the essential war requirements that we can possibly ship to the other side. As the Minister of Finance so well said, outside this house:

> Finance, of course, is in second place—it is a matter of ways and means. Finance must serve as a smooth running mechanism to expedite rather than retard our progress in mobilizing our physical resources.

One aspect of this measure which appeals to me, and which I am sure will appeal to members of this house, is that it gives the lie once and for all to those carping critics who once said that Canada was insisting on the payment of cash on the barrel-head; that we were unlike the United States, and were not granting as favourable terms to Great Britain as did our great neighbour to the south. It is true that the provisions of the resolution make for a settlement up to the present time; but coinciding with this measure is a proposal to make a contribution of a billion dollars to Great Britain, which for the most part will look after her requirements from Canada for the coming year. This proposed measure goes further than the lease-lend act. Prior to the passing of the lease-lend legislation in the United States, that country took from Great Britain all her American investments. Indeed, they even took from Great Britain her branch plants in the United States. I do not for a moment suggest that this was the desire of the administration of the United States; but it was prior to the entry of that country into the war, and there were certain factions in the United States which had to be appeased, so this course of action had to be followed.

But we in Canada, notwithstanding our closer relationship, and the fact that we were a fighting partner in a common cause, have done almost as much. Whether or not it was a fair policy for us to have pursued, I do not care at this moment to say. Later on, I hope to develop considerations which may affect the judgment of this house. If there is critiscism to offer as to the dealings between Canada and Great Britain, and as to whether or not we have been sufficiently generous, I think the criticism has reference to the general standard of financial morality between partners fighting in a common cause, rather than reference to the actions of this country. Our actions cannot be viewed in quite the same light as those of the United States, because we have been a full-fledged partner from the very beginning of this conflict. This conflict has now proved to have been just as much that of the United States as it has been that of Canada. We can, I believe, assure ourselves that Canada's treatment has been at least as fair as that of the United States because we must also consider the fact that we have been a fighting partner from the beginning, and have had very heavy expenses to bear on that account. But we have arrived at the position now where Great Britain cannot pay Canada further amounts in Canadian dollars. She cannot pay for further shipments of goods from Canada to Great Britain. She has no Canadian dollars, and Canadian dollars are the only kind of currency acceptable to us. Sterling notes are of no use at the corner grocery store, and Great Britain has not any more Canadian dollars with which to pay us.

We must not forget, sir, that Great Britain made payments to Canada in Canadian dollars, even prior to the outbreak of the war, for armament orders she had placed in this country. She had even sent money over here for the building of armament plants. We are prone to criticize the war preparation of the United Nations for their meagreness, but let it not be forgotten that even in 1936 there were contracts placed by Great Britain for shells in Canada. On Saturday last a delegation of members from this house visited a shell-making plant, where shells were first made for British account as long ago as 1936; and those shells were paid for by Great Britain with Canadian dollars.

Our government, however, has very wisely said that since it is impossible for Great Britain to pay now, it is perhaps unwise for us to run up a large book debt from Great Britain to Canada. There may even be difficulty in the future in being able to collect if we did allow that debt to run up, because of her own staggering burden of war expenditures. It is also unwise to attempt collection because if in the future Great Britain has Canadian dollars through trading with Canada or with other countries with which to pay us, there will be Canadian wheat and other Canadian products which we shall want to sell to her. Also the bad effect of war debts after the last great war should provide a warning to all. The attempt of a creditor nation after that war to collect war debts led to the stifling of international trade, and the seeds of the depression of the nineteen-thirties were sown. It is better for us to wipe the slate clean of inter-allied war debts. It is less than mercy; it is hardly more than ordinary justice.

I do not wish to dilate here on the effect of this billion dollar credit to Great Britain on our own economy, but I should like to point out that this money is spent in Canada. It results in the speeding up of our industrial, our mining and, in some respects, our agricultural industries. These industries for the most part have reached levels which have never heretofore been reached in this country. Unemployment has been abolished, and while sacrifices have been many, the general ecoromic level of the masses of our people is higher than it has been in a decade.

Hon. members may wonder why it is that Great Britain cannot pay with Canadian dollars for further shipments of goods from this country. May I point out that Great Britain gets Canadian dollars only, first, from the sale of Canadian investments which she may have held prior to the war and, second, from the sale of British goods in this country which we are willing to purchase. We have taken all the Canadian dollar investments Great Britain has.

For some time Great Britain endeavoured to export goods not only to Canada but to the United States and to other countries, so that she would be able to pay for her necessary war imports. It was a valiant attempt, but it was impossible because of the exigencies of war. Finally that attempt had to be mainly abandoned. The pressure on her own industries making war materials and certain aspects of lease-lend regulations prevented the exporting by Great Britain of finished products which contained a like material to that which Great Britain received under lease-lend arrangements. So the slogan, "Britain delivers the goods," had to take a very secondary place.

[Mr. Jackman.]

May I point out, sir, just what the loss of trade channels and trade connections means to a little island of 46,000,000 inhabitants whose economic livelihood is vitally dependent upon foreign trade. That great asset of Great Britain is for the time being gone. All her energies, and particularly her industrial energies, are devoted to the manufacture of the weapons of war. She cannot export in order to raise funds with which to pay other united nations. If Great Britain is to make her fullest contribution to the joint cause, then we must help to provide the tools.

I am sure it is not the wish of any Canadian to contribute less than he can to the joint effort. Let me give here a comparison of our per capita contribution with that of Great Britain. Once again it is necessary to refer to dollars as a form of measurement. In Great Britain the per capita expenditure yearly amounts to $512. If one calculates that on a per family basis, he will get some idea of the kind of sacrifice that country is now going through. In Canada our per capita expenditure yearly is $261, almost precisely one-half. We in this country, therefore, are not sacrificing to help a partner who is not waging a full-out war effort.

Many Canadians—and I do not wish to labour this point, because there may be some who will differ from my point of view—feel that this billion dollar gift is only a partial discharge of a debt to Great Britain, a debt long overdue. I shall not mention here the expense to the taxpayer of Great Britain in years gone by in connection with the building of fortifications in Canada, going back to the time of the building of the citadel at Quebec, the general garrisoning of this country or, in more recent times, the protection afforded to Canada as the fifth trading nation in the world by the Royal Navy. It is enough to say that we are now engaged in a common struggle, with common and utmost sacrifice demanded from all.

May I present to the house another angle which we should bear in mind in discussing this measure. If the war had followed a different course from that which it has followed, it might have been that the Japanese would have obtained a foothold on our Pacific coast. There was nothing but the Royal Navy to prevent it. We should then have realized what a full-out war effort meant. We should have had havoc and devastation wrought upon our cities and our people. If Canada were battling the Japanese, then Great Britain would have kept the supply lines flowing from that country to Canada, rather than from the west to the east. We should have found British troops fighting at our side wherever the enemy was to be found. We should have been receiving supplies from Great Britain in untold quantity. The question would then have arisen: how can we pay for these supplies? If Great Britain had followed the same course as Canada, such investments as Canadians had in Great Britain would have been stripped from her. Then, instead of a gift of one billion dollars' worth of armaments, we should have had a gift from Great Britain of many billions of dollars worth of armaments. To-day Great Britain is spending over $23,000,000,000 a year on the war. The extent of our obligation could be measured thereby. This gift of ours will amount to just about one-twenty-third the total cost of the war this year to Great Britain.

I hope, therefore, that we can form some true perspective of what this contribution to Great Britain really is. It is only because Great Britain has held the enemy at bay that Canada has not been overrun and probably receiving much larger defence gifts from Great Britain. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said during the special session of 1939, as reported on page 22 of Hansard:

> There is no portion of the globe which any nation would be likely to covet more than this Dominion of Canada. There is no other portion of the earth's surface that contains such wealth as lies buried here. Nowhere are there such stretches of territory capable of feeding for generations to come not hundreds of thousands but millions of people.

If Great Britain and the other united nations had come to the rescue of Canada, as they surely would, how could we in Canada ever have repaid the debt? If we are to believe the suggestions made by many members from the Pacific coast, there is still not only a possibility but a probability that our coast will be invaded by the Japanese. Canada may yet become a battle ground against the Japanese. Then we shall be receiving aid from Great Britain if it is possible to get it here, and indeed it may be. It may well behoove us now to do unto others as we would have them do unto us.

Last November a delegation of six members of this parliament visited Great Britain. Everywhere they went they received the thanks of the British people for what Canada had done. Again the people of Britain will thank Canada for this generous contribution, because it is a generous expression of partnership in the struggle against tyranny. When we were there, I invariably said that we had not come to receive the thanks of the people of Great Britain but rather to extend to them our gratitude and our appreciation for fighting so bravely and so well and for holding the enemy at bay, an enemy which was poised for attack only twenty-four miles from the coast of Britain.

Behind this measure is the expectation that the people of Canada will provide one billion dollars' worth of war supplies to Great Britain and the fighting fronts, but this army of one billion dollars is only a yardstick. Once again, it measures only part of the labour, foodstuffs, raw materials and tools of war which we shall send across the oceans. In addition, there is our own notable contribution to the navy, the army and the air force, both at home and abroad. The proceeds of this gift, however, will be carried by the sailors, soldiers and airmen of Great Britain one lap farther along the road—the most dangerous lap of all—until they are delivered on Hitler's doorstep. This time, to use a term every Canadian housewife understands, instead of c.o.d., or cash on delivery, it will be victory on delivery.

Mr. J. LEONARD O'BRIEN (Northumberland, N.B.): Mr. Speaker, since May, 1940, when I first took my seat in this house as the member for the constituency of Northumberland, New Brunswick, I have endeavoured to refrain from taking up much of the time of the house. One reason for this is that because of war conditions, virtually all discussion here pertained to war, and very little legislation which is closely associated with the civilian needs of the general public has passed through the house. I have also refrained from taking up the time of the house because of a feeling of futility and frustration, and I think this feeling must be uppermost in the minds of other members of this house. The membership of this house is virtually a board of directors of the Dominion of Canada, and the government is the management. Therefore, irrespective of party affiliations, when the smoke of battle has cleared away and we are assembled in this chamber to represent our constituencies, it is our duty to see that legislation which will be of benefit to the rank and file of the people of Canada is brought forward. As I said a moment ago, while the somewhat technical legislation which has passed through this house is undoubtedly quite necessary because of the war, it has, of necessity, been of an abstract nature, considering civilian affairs, certainly to anyone engaged in business and giving employment. Because of this atmosphere I have found it difficult to contribute anything, and I only did so if and when I believed that my contribution might be of some use. I am sorry to say that in view of the circumstances that developed, very little attention has been paid to the suggestions I have made, which perhaps is regrettable. I believe other members are in much the same position.

During the month of September it was my privilege to go to Great Britain by bomber with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and his party. As one must do in such circumstances, I had to leave the things of life in which I was interested, for taking off across the Atlantic in a bomber establishes a line of demarcation in one's life. What I saw in Great Britain certainly created a very deep impression. During one of the days when our official routine was not too pressing I visited Oxford, that old seat of learning, and I sat in the enclosed garden in Christ Church college. I knew that at that spot a delightful fantasy of childhood had been developed when a don, sitting in one of the upper windows, saw a child playing in the garden below and then and there conceived and wrote "Alice in Wonderland." I never believed that in real life I would experience the weird adventures of Alice in Wonderland, but I am afraid that since coming to this House of Commons I have been involuntarily an Alice in Wonderland, and I think most other hon. members have been also. Alice met strange creatures, the Mad Hatter, the March Hare and the Dormouse, chatting among themselves, apparently making sense to themselves, but to Alice it seemed sheer nonsense. So much of that which I see happening makes me believe that I am passing through the rather weird experience of Alice in Wonderland.

I come now to the resolution before the house. Its purpose and objective is so worthy that little argument is required in support of it. I have, however, somewhat of a personal pride in making reference to it. I hope that it is at long last an indication that the ever-present dollar sign is to be torn from the union jack. In November, 1939, approximately two months after the declaration of war, I was but a private citizen in New Brunswick; but knowing something of our trade relations with Britain through actual contact, I wrote to the then Minister of Finance and suggested that Canada would have to extend to Britain enormous credits because of the purchases Britain was required to make in Canada, and particularly because Canada was perhaps the only country within the empire not then hooked to sterling currency, which meant, of course, that every item purchased in Canada cost the people of Britain a premium. I shall not weary the house by reading into the record my letter to the then Minister of Finance, but I shall quote a paragraph or two of his reply to give the sense which I wished to convey. My letter to him was dated November 6, 1939, and the minister's reply was dated December 11, 1939. The first paragraph of his reply reads:

> I have just now been able to consider your long letter of November 6 in which you suggest that for the purpose of exports to the United Kingdom the exchange rate between the pound and the Canadian dollar should be taken as par, and that this government should advance the dollars involved and hold the sterling in London until it returns to par after the war.

Here is another interesting paragraph from that letter:

> In regard to the specific suggestion you make that we should advance the equivalent in Canadian dollars at par for pounds received by exporters and then hold these pounds until at some future date they are worth par, I must point out two great difficulties. First, to hold sterling in this way would involve in essence gambling on future exchanges and—

I want the house particularly to note this:

> —would expose the dominion to dangers of loss in case sterling did not return to power.

That was the attitude in December, 1939. The letter went on:

> Secondly, it would add greatly to our already heavy financial burdens to have to borrow Canadian dollars with which to pay the exporters under your suggested plan. Because the war will require all the funds we can spare, it would not be wise to divert money to the purpose you suggest, even though there were no danger of loss involved in it.

That letter, I rather believed, was to tell me that my idea was almost fantastic. Although I wrote on November 6, and the minister replied on December 11, 1939, I have here a clipping, a Canadian press dispatch from London, England, dated November 27, 1939, which reads in part:

> The Financial News to-day urged establishment of empire exchange control, emphasizing the need for uniformity in the entire system of exchange regulations throughout the empire.
> "Since self-governing dominions can hardly allow us to dictate how they should use sterling funds, it is clear that waste is avoidable only by the establishment of an imperial exchange committee to agree on a common policy," the paper said in an editorial. "This would have to concern itself with more than mere exchange regulations."

On this momentous occasion in the history of this parliament when we are at long last voting this money freely as our contribution toward beleaguered Britain, I feel some little satisfaction if not pride in having suggested to the government at that time, some two months after the war broke out, that such a policy should be inaugurated. It might lead one to believe that the government might, if it could and only would, listen to other members of the house, coming as we do from the Atlantic to the Pacific, who in some small way might make some contribution which would accrue to the benefit of Canada generally.

As I said a few minutes ago, it was my privilege to visit Great Britain last year. One does not go through such an experience, walk through bomb-smashed London and see countless thousands of human beings huddled beneath the surface of the earth in subways and bomb shelters, fearful of breathing the air above; one does not stand as we did on the white cliffs of Dover and peer dimly through the fog towards that unhappy land of France, without returning to Canada with a sense of the dreadful position in which we of this generation find ourselves. Nothing I saw in Britain surprised me, nothing shocked me. It was upon my return to Canada that I can truly say I was shocked and amazed. If I might add a personal note by way of emphasis, I should like to say that so deeply was I impressed with the gravity of the situation and the lethargy of Canada that on awakening every morning for some days, and passing from sleep to wakefulness, involuntarily the thought came into my mind how impossible it was apparently to make the people of Canada realize how grave the situation was. That condition went on for some little time until I analysed it.

I point that out to show that whilst I may have come home perhaps with the frame of mind of an alarmist, that state of mind was very real, nevertheless, and events since have, I think, justified it. I am fearful that in Canada there is a great lack of appreciation of the gravity of our danger. There is something most mysterious abroad in this land, yet the Canadian people are a pioneering people and have always been able to cope with great difficulties and always ready, when the occasion arises, to face the issue. But after travelling across Canada as I did last year, and meeting all sorts of people with very different ideas, and then going to Britain and returning, I must confess that I was amazed and greatly disturbed.

Just after the fall of Hong Kong and Singapore we were told that, immediately prior to the capitulation of these two strongholds, cocktail drinking was the order of the day. That, sir, is a shocking thing, if it is true. If it is not true, it may, I think, at least be taken figuratively. I submit that not only has there been cocktail drinking in Hong Kong and Singapore, there is cocktail drinking in Sydney, Halifax, Saint John, Moncton, the constituency of Northumberland, New Brunswick; Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Vancouver, and Victoria; and there is cocktail drinking in Ottawa, not, sir, alcoholic cocktails but rather mental cocktails. That, sir, is what Canada has been suffering from ever since the war broke out. These mental cocktails have been dished out here in Ottawa in the largest cocktail shaker, possibly in the world. The world is suffering the shocks of a terrible war, and I submit that the people of Canada have reached the point where they do not want any more mental cocktails; they want real, hard, satisfying food, in the guise of plain truth. They are entitled to it.

Before I close, may I remind the house that Tennyson said something about this state of mind when he wrote his "Lotos-Eaters". I would advise hon. members to read that piece of prophetic poetry:

> Let us alone. Time driveth onward fast,
> And in a little while our lips are dumb.
> Let us alone.

That has been the policy—let us alone.

> What pleasure can we have > To war with evil? Is there any peace
> In ever climbing up the climbing wave?
> All things have rest, and ripen toward the grave.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that our condition in Canada is exactly described in the lethargy of the lotos-eaters; we are all drinkers of mental cocktails.

Three hundred years before Christ a Greek philosopher wrote into one of his plays these words:

> And tell of Time, what gifts for thee he bears,
> What griefs and wonders in the winding years.

Countless years before the Greek philosopher wrote these words, other humans had asked themselves, consciously or subconsciously, the same question. Since Anno Domini I, countless human beings all over the world have asked this question and, even this very night, are asking themselves the same question.

Another great writer wrote into one of his plays these fateful words:

> To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow
> Creeps in this petty pace from day to day,
> To the last syllable of recorded time;
> And all our yesterdays have lighted fools
> The way to dusty death.

I suggest that hon. members ask themselves the question which was asked three centuries before Christ. It is as fresh and fateful to-day as it ever was. I would urge them to ask themselves that question at once. To-morrow may be too late.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have only a few words to say this evening; but may I begin by mentioning this, that never have I felt more pride in anybody than I have in my desk-mate (Mr. O'Brien) who has just taken his seat. The address he made this evening will stand out in the annals of parliamentary speeches in Canada; in its character and the manner of its delivery it is comparable with any of the orations of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Sir Robert Borden, and my leader. He made some reference to the Mad Hatter. As a matter of fact we have quite a number of mad hatters around the House of Commons. Indeed, if it were our fate to be here long enough, we might all be mad hatters before we got through, especially if we had to listen continually to "wheat, wheat, wheat."

The previous speaker also mentioned that we have in this House of Commons an impressive array of brain-power. To my mind one of the difficulties in this regard is that there is practically no outlet for the brains of the private member. Sometimes one is overcome with a sense of futility. But let it be remembered that there is one job we have to do to-day, and that is, get on with the war, put whatever efforts we have into it, and see that everything is done which can be done.

We hear much talk about democracy. We are not a democracy to-day in Canada. Everybody knows it. Parliament is overlooked all the time. What we really are is a socialistic bureaucracy; hon. gentlemen on the other side are the bosses, we are the people who follow in line, and that is all there is to it. That is all we can do. There is no democracy about it; our voices are disregarded.

Take, for instance, the way in which companies are formed by order in council. I shall not stop to make an enumeration of them; but let me ask, what would happen if I wanted to form a company? I would have to follow the regular procedure all the way down the line. Do you think I could go in and see my hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver Centre)—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Always.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): — and say, "Look here, can I get this company put through by order in council, just as a favour?" Not a chance in the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is not correct.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I speak, of course, with no thought of offence.

Coming to the next matter, I am frank to say that it makes me mad when I think of the appropriation referred to in this resolution for the benefit of Great Britain being called a gift. A gift! I believe every hon. member should be ashamed of the term. It is no more than the payment of a debt which is long, long overdue. Let us record it as such. Then, perhaps, the people of Great Britain will have more confidence in the people of Canada than they have had occasion to be in recent days.

I do not underrate what we are doing. Our war effort in a great many ways is marvellous. Our manufacturers are doing a wonderful job; our fighting men are among the best. But all we are doing is just giving those who are defending themselves and us the munitions to fight with, and if we did not have these fellows over there to do the fighting for us we would not only have to make these gifts, but have to find the extra men to fight as well.

On July 1, 1938, my honoured leader Mr. Bennett brought up in the House of Commons the matter of the request of the British government to train air pilots in this country. There was quite a debate. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said at that time that there were no commitments—that was that. Not only that, but he said that there had been no requests from the British government. Let me take the house back to July 1, 1938, when the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 4527 of Hansard:

> I can only repeat what I have said time and again, namely, that there are no commitments of any kind on the part of this government with respect to any war in which the United Kingdom may be engaged.

That is that. Again, the Prime Minister said, as reported at page 4529:

> My reference was with regard to the idea of having the imperial air force set up a flying school somewhere in Canada, to train their flying pilots; in short, a military station to be put down in Canada, owned, maintained and operated by the imperial government for imperial purposes.

What a change has taken place since then! If hon. gentlemen have read the words of Mr. Bevin in his book, they will recall that he says that at the imperial conference of 1937 each individual member of the commonwealth of nations pledged itself to look after its own defence but not to be involved in any war in which Great Britain might be involved. No, we did not pledge that; but at the same time Great Britain pledged herself to defend every single member of the commonwealth of nations if it should be attacked for any reason whatever. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that if the people of Great Britain had known about that at that time they would have stood for it? Is it not a very small thing that we are doing at the present time in this gift of a billion dollars—that is all it is. What does it amount to? It amounts to this—the repayment of a debt which we should have been paying for years, of about $50,000,000 a year over the last twenty years. That is all it amounts to—$85 for every person in Canada.

Is it enough? When we think of that billion dollars spent in this country, let us ask ourselves, what does it do. It creates work for our people in Canada. It is high time we did even more than we are doing so that the rest of the democracies will not think that Canada, as it has been so aptly put by some hon. members in this house, will benefit like nobody's business from the war. Let us make the situation clear, Mr. Speaker, so that the people of the democracies will know that Canada is not profiteering from this war.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): I do not intend to speak at great length, but the inspiration of the last two speeches we have heard is different from mine. Of course, it is a long time since I read the story of "Alice in Wonderland", and I cannot conceive how the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) could compare our hon. colleague (Mr. O'Brien), so far as speaking is concerned, with Sir John Macdonald, Cicero, Demosthenes, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). I respect the views of others, and although I would not follow the same path I admit that they are entitled to express such views, however extraordinary they may appear to anyone of ordinary understanding.

This is, of course, an important debate. As I said before, the discussion of war finance cannot be a matter of sentiment; it must be a matter of argument and reasoning, just the same as the conduct of the war itself. That great soldier, Marshal Foch, used to say that what was necessary in warfare was common sense. I suggest that what is necessary in war finance is common sense also. I make no pun on that.

My specialty is the reading of things that are very dull and that nobody else reads; but in making a comparison between certain things that are published at different times it is possible for one to know exactly what is going on, and the first document from which I shall quote is the pronunciamento of the 200 citizens of Toronto as published in the press of January 12 and 13, entitled "Total War Now". In this document it was stated:

> This is no time for a referendum. The responsibility rests squarely on parliament.

It continues:

> There is only one way to meet total war—by total effort—that is to mobilize all our manpower and material resources under a plan of universal compulsory selective service. Those who can serve best on the farms must work on the farms. Those who can serve best in the factories must work in the factories. And those best fitted to serve in the armed forces must be trained, equipped, and available for service in Canada or overseas anywhere at any time. That is the only way that our farms, our factories and our armed forces can wage total war. No half measures are consistent with national honour.

That document was an inspiration for another, an official document which was read by His Excellency the Governor General in the senate at the opening of this session, the speech from the throne. The inspiration for the speech from the throne was evidently the pronunciamento of the 200 people from Toronto, only with the difference that this document from Toronto does not mention a plebiscite, while a plebiscite is mentioned in the speech from the throne. Therefore there was a ransom for the plebiscite and the postponement of conscription; and in my humble view that ransom was precisely the gift of a billion dollars to Great Britain, which is the matter we are now discussing. In my humble view, sir, if there had been no pronunciamento by the 200 important men of Toronto, there would have been no plebiscite mentioned in the speech from the throne and we would not have an item of legislation such as this before us. Of course, sir, you may feel a little incredulous about it, but I am sure this is exactly what the historians will write fifty years from now.

Then, Mr. Speaker, statements of the utmost importance were made on January 26 by my revered leader, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Since they have been referred to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), I hope you will not object if I read about half a page of Hansard of that date. It may not be strictly within the rules, but it is the best possible exposé of the policy of the government, especially with regard to a grant of such magnitude to Great Britain. The first matter is the one mentioned in the second place by the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is familiar with the rules of the house, which do not permit of a quotation from any speech that has been delivered during the present session. Only the other day I had occasion to direct the attention of another hon. member to that rule, and I hope the hon. gentleman now speaking will observe it also.

Mr. POULIOT: I agree with you absolutely, sir, and I am in the hands of the house. But that was the only time the matter was referred to other than in the speech from the throne. Moreover, the amount of a billion dollars was not mentioned in the speech from the throne; it was first announced by the Prime Minister on the occasion to which I have referred. If I read this excerpt from the speech of the right hon. gentleman, theoretically I shall not be within the rules of the house as they now stand; I admit and confess that. On the other hand, it is the only way in which I can present my argument on the matter. However, sir, it is not necessary to quote the text. We may refer to a previous debate without quoting the text of the words that were used. I need not read them; I shut the book. I have enough respect for the Chair not to argue on the matter, but I said what I did in order to show Your Honour two things: in the first place, that I am more or less familiar with the rules of the house, and in the second place, that I have high respect for Your Honour.

What is the situation? It is that with a previous payment of $400,000,000 and a future payment of $265,000,000, we are supposed to clear up all our debts to Great Britain. That is the first point. The second point is that at the present time Canada has securities to the amount of $700,000,000 in Canadian money held in Great Britain; and Canada's proposal is that the proceeds of the sale of all such securities held by citizens of Great Britain and sold outside Great Britain are to be deducted from the total of $700,000,000; also that the proceeds of the repayment of all Canadian securities held in Great Britain shall be deducted from that amount, and the interest on it will not be paid during the war. In other words, to summarize the situation, we were told that after we pay $265,000,000 for the purchase of securities or bonds, we shall owe nothing to Great Britain, that all our debts will be paid. Then we shall see to it that the sum owing us will be reduced by the sale of our securities held in other lands, or I presume in this land, and also there is a gift of the interest on that amount of $700,000,000. What the rate of interest is I do not know; but if the rate is 5 per cent, that gift amounts to $35,000,000 per annum. Then, after that is done, we are to give ammunition, machinery, food and many kinds of products to Great Britain to the extent of a billion dollars—not a billion according to the English banking system, which would be a million times a million, but to the extent of $1,000,000,000 in value. I am not going to split hairs, as bankers do when they speak of certain technical banking matters. I want to know only one thing: is that policy economically sound?

Coming to the elaborate speech delivered by my good friend the Minister of Finance last night, I have to reconstruct and reconstitute part of his speech with the figures he gave to the house. I was reminded of the great time when my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) was Minister of Trade and Commerce in the Bennett government, at a time when we were compiling and comparing statistics. I pay him this tribute, that he was a very good Minister of Trade and Commerce, and had his leader been a better man he would have made a success of his department. But in England they are telling Mr. Bennett his facts so well that I shall not discuss him further now.

The Minister of Finance has mentioned Canadian exports to Great Britain per annum, and he gave the figures for 1940 and 1941. He did not, however, mention the imports for those two years. To find that figure I had to add together Canadian exports to the United Kingdom and other parts of the British empire during 1940 and 1941, and then subtract from that the deficit between our exports and imports in order to learn the value of the imports from the United Kingdom and other parts of the British empire to Canada in those years.

Of course the minister gave the figure for 1939. He stated that our imports in that year were valued at $188,000,000. In 1940, after that mathematical operation, it was found that our imports were valued at $249,000,000, or an increase of $61,000,000 over the preceding year; and in 1941 they were $279,000,000, or an increase of $91,000,000 over 1939. Those figures show some progress.

But there is another point to consider, one which I do not understand. I must say that I find it marvellous. I remember that some time after the completion of the first year of the war I read an article in one of the Ottawa papers to the effect that the difference in British exports to the whole world in the whole year was either $1,500,000 or $15,000,000. The meaning was that the year after the war shipments made by Great Britain to all countries of the world were only that much smaller than they had been in the previous year of peace.

The tariff has been changed to enable Great Britain to send us more manufactured goods. We are making more munitions in Canada. It is all right to make more munitions for our allies; I am all for it. But if munitions plants in Great Britain are in danger on account of bombardments, I suggest there is another risk to be considered, namely the risk of crossing the ocean. A much greater quantity of ammunition has been lost through the torpedoing of ships than through the bombardment of munitions factories in England. There is the risk of transportation, and there is the additional embarrassment of distance. I cannot understand why most of the munitions for Great Britain are not manufactured in Great Britain itself. Why are they manufactured so far away? Of course conditions are somewhat different for aeroplanes, although some are manufactured in England.

These are matters concerning which I am open-minded. I do not change my views simply because Mr. So-and-so has other views. I wish those who think differently to be good enough to reason with me, and to give me their argument as to why it is better for Great Britain to manufacture commercial goods in that country during the war and ship them overseas, and then have most of her munitions made in Canada and the United States, thereby running the risk of crossing the ocean. That is one point. I have been in England, and I know many English people. I have some good Scotch friends; I have some good English friends, and I have some good Irish and Welsh friends. I have the deepest admiration for the British people, but I wonder whether those who have the responsibility of governing over there now, with the exception perhaps of Mr. Churchill, are worthy of the British people. I made an exception of Mr. Churchill.

An hon. MEMBER: Who are you to judge?

Mr. MacNICOL: The Hon. Ernest Bevin is doing a good job.

Mr. POULIOT: That is the opinion of my hon. friend, and it is a respectable one.

An hon. MEMBER: What about Sir Stafford Cripps?

Mr. POULIOT: Stafford Cripps gave them hell—excuse me, sir—he spoke roughly. I have not been there for a few years; but Sir Stafford Cripps is there; Mr. Eden is there; Mr. Morrison is there, and even Mr. Bevin is there, to whom the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) referred. They have not been tender in their language to their fellow citizens. They have not used pink-tea expressions in order to tell them what they thought at times. Are we to kneel down in a humble way to express our admiration to any one? No. Moreover, it might not be tolerated in Britain. They have freedom of expression. I would remind the house of what was said by Mr. Gegood, a labour man from Northern Ireland, about Lord Halifax. His remarks passed the British censor; they passed the United States censor and were published in the New York Times. This has reference to the Rio Tinto incident which was discussed widely in the press of the world and especially that of the United States. I have here PM of February 17 which contains an article about this similar to the one which appeared in the New York Times. They refer to the way in which Sir Samuel Hoare and others acted. The article is entitled "Rio Tinto Output went to Axis", and the other headings are:

British Tory Scheme for Helping Franco.
Would Ship Him Mining Machinery Despite United Nations' Needs.

That was a dispatch from Mr. I. F. Stone, who is no isolationist. I wonder whether we shall not be misjudged in Great Britain if we pass legislation like this? Never in the history of the world have we seen a free nation, a nation not vanquished, paying tribute of this kind. It is the same amount that was paid by defeated France after the Franco-Prussian war. In French we call it "cinq milliards," because one franc is only one-fifth of a dollar. We are making a billion dollar gift. Either Britain is able to pay now, or she is not. If she is able to pay, I am sure that she will honour her obligations. If she is not able to pay now, she may give a promise of payment which, when the war is over, will enable Canada to discuss the settlement of all these matters, not as a nation whose benefactions are forgotten, but as a nation which is in certain respects a creditor nation.

The feeling in Canada is one of sacrifice, and financial legislation of this kind is not inspiring. We should not look upon this war as though we had lost it. I disagree fully with the statement made the other day by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) that if we win this war, it will be only by a miracle. My deep conviction is that that was an erroneous statement of a man who had been working too long hours that day. It should not be permissible for a minister of the crown of any country at war to state in parliament that the war will be won only by a miracle even if he adds that miracles may happen. Imagine the encouragement that was given to our enemies when they read that statement by a minister of the crown of Canada!

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You want to get your head out of the sand, too.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not understand my hon. friend, except when he is right. I will confess that I never understand him. He is too bright. I give him credit for that, and it is social credit; it is more than a $25 promise that was never kept. Although I am concerned and worried, I am not fearful about the result. My only fear is that the logical consequence of legislation of this kind will be that it will attain an altogether different purpose from that intended by its sponsor. You remember the Boston tea party. The Boston tea party was the cause of rupture between New England and old England. It was a matter of taxation. It is very dangerous to play with finance as some college professors do. My fear is that if we cannot meet our tremendous obligations of this kind, Canada will inevitably fall into the hands of the United States of America, and then my hon. friends who foresee in this legislation a bright future for Great Britain would be very sorry if it meant the turning over of Canada to the United States. We have a mission on this continent, we Canadians of all origins and of all faiths, provided that we stand together and provided that we first consider Canada as our country—and I want Canada to remain British. We are all ready to make sacrifices to help Great Britain, and I am sure that if the Canadian government continue their policy of giving all possible aid to Great Britain, but on the same conditions as before, with an acknowledgment of debt for what we have done, we shall be more respected by the British people over there. I know them well enough to say that. Furthermore, it would save a lot of difficulty when the time comes for us to dictate peace.

I am sure, sir, that you are not scandalized by my language because you know that, after the last war, by virtue of the Versailles treaty this country of ours did not get any of the enemy's possessions while all the other dominions were given colonies which had belonged to other nations. South Africa and Australia both got enemy territory. Here at the gate to our country, in the gulf of the St. Lawrence, lies the island of Newfoundland, and there is also Labrador, on which Canada is erecting immense defence works. Why did our government not discuss the matter with the British government and tell them: "We are ready to defend Newfoundland, we are ready to defend Labrador; we have sent men to the north to Greenland and to Iceland, and all we ask in return is to be given a preference over the United States in the possession of any British territory. That has been done by Australia, a country whose name is applauded every time it is mentioned. It has been done by the loyal citizens of South Africa; it has been done by the loyal citizens of New Zealand. Even over that little island of Nauru in the middle of the Pacific ocean from which most of the German fertilizer used to come, New Zealand or Australia has been given a mandate. So it was given to another British dominion. But we have got nothing. I hope that this government will show more pride when they discuss these matters with other nations.

I find it illogical to hear so much said about the statute of Westminster when there are perhaps one hundred thousand statutes of Westminster to be found in any parliamentary library. The statute of Westminster was supposed to give this dominion autonomous rights, and yet on the other hand we are doing everything that is asked for by one of our allies. We have to do all we can to help our allies in this war, but there is one thing we must not fail to consider. We must not destroy British citizenship in this country in the future by doing more than we can afford. We have no right to do that. The desire of the Canadian people is to remain under the British crown, as we are now, and when our soldiers deliberately and voluntarily go overseas they go there to defend the King of Canada. It is time, sir, to think of Canada as our own country, to consider first the interests of Canada, and therefore to see that legislation submitted to the house is submitted, not as a matter of sentiment, which is very dangerous, but purely as a matter of reason and patriotism.

Before closing, I have just one other reference to make. It is impossible to get complete trade statistics in Canada. You may see a big book, that is the "Canada Year Book." It is full of straw. The real information about trade is not in it. Here in my hand I hold a condensed statistical record of the trade of Canada. It was sent to me last summer, marked confidential. This is the first time that datum on trade was considered confidential. Of course, it may be said that it is not in the public interest during the war to inform the public about shipments of arms and munitions, and so forth. I agree, but the manufactured goods we receive from England are mostly commercial goods, and I cannot see why on earth it is impossible for us to secure full information on the matter.

When I said that we should not consider financial matters as if we were to lose the war, what I meant was this: It is impossible to think of destroying the fortunes of the citizens of Canada during war time so that they are all beggars after the war is over. We cannot afford to lose our trade during this war. We have the example of Great Britain. Great Britain continues her trade. There are advertisements in the press all the time to that effect: "Britain delivers the goods." Britain gives us a great example.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to inform the hon. gentleman that his time is up.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, when I first heard or read that the government contemplated contributing a billion dollars to the old country in the form of goods to carry on the war, I felt elated; and when the minister introduced his resolution I was proud of being a Canadian, because at last this country is taking a big and generous step toward assisting the old land, without expecting any return. I congratulate the minister upon bringing in this resolution. I might add that I am proud to represent a constituency in a city which contributed, in the recent war loan campaign, well on to one-fourth of the $900,000,000 which was raised, and I am no less proud to come from a riding which manufactures, perhaps to a larger extent than any other, munitions and equipment.

I am not going to take up much time. I believe that the shorter the speeches in a debate of this nature, the more credit we shall reflect upon ourselves and our country. The minister referred to the volume of trade between Canada and Great Britain and between Great Britain and Canada. Reading over his figures, I could not but feel that after the war we shall have to try to balance such figures as those, indicating as they do that Canada purchases so little from the old land in comparison with what they buy from us. I believe the minister said that in the year 1938 we bought from Great Britain $113,000,000 worth of goods and exported goods to her of the value of $331,000,000. That is not a fair balance of trade; and I trust that when the war is over, when we send our ships to the old country laden with materials produced in Canada, they will bring back a no less quantity of material produced in Great Britain. A fair exchange is always desirable; when it is lopsided it is always unsatisfactory. That is particularly the the case when during the same year we imported from our cousins to the south—of whom I want to speak in the kindest manner; to-day they are showing themselves to be brothers rather than cousins, by the way they are taking part in the great conflict in which we are so vitally interested—$424,000,000 worth of goods, and shipped them only $339,000,000.

The minister referred with pride—and I agree with him—to the vast quantity of munitions which we have sent to Great Britain. We have also forwarded large quantities to Egypt, South Africa and Australia. I have seen many train loads of war munitions, destined for these countries, shipped from my end of the city of Toronto. For that achievement Canada and Canadian manufacturers and the workmen in these factories deserve unstinted praise. I am told that one-half the shells which are being fired by the allies to-day, whether made in Canada, Great Britain, Egypt, South Africa or Australia, are made by machines that were built in Canada. That is a great tribute to Canadian ingenuity. I often regret that the government did not take to heart at the time something which, may I humbly mention, I said to them after my last trip to the old country and various European states, where I had gone particularly to make a survey of industry, and visited a great many factories. On more than one occasion I met British industrialists who were about to make large additions to their plants, anticipating as they did the war and the probable construction of new plants or additions for making munitions of war. Some wished that they could build those plants elsewhere, and I discussed with a number of them the desirability of putting up the additions in Canada. When I returned here I suggested that some arrangement might be made whereby they could erect their new plants in Canada and ship the plant equipment from and their products to the old country without duty charges either way. Not only would it have been of great value in the prosecution of the war, because branches moved to this country would not have been destroyed, but it would have been a great thing for Canada, and would have preserved to old country investors the value of whatever investments they made in building their plants here. But, as some other hon. members have pointed out, no suggestion by a private member is given any consideration at any time, particularly if he is on the opposition side.

Anyway, I am proud of what Canadian industrialists and Canadian workmen have done in producing munitions and shipping them to all parts of the empire.

In his speech yesterday the minister said, as reported in Hansard, page 1418:

> We cannot make the tanks, the anti-aircraft guns, the mechanized equipment of all sorts which we have supplied to our British allies, entirely out of our own domestic resources.

But we should have been in a position to make a larger percentage of these munitions in Canadian plants than we are doing. Not that we are not doing very well, but we could have been in a better position had the government—although I am not criticizing it—been seized with the great value of producing these things in Canada. I am sorry to say that the government in the past has shown itself too anxious to purchase various commodities, particularly manufactured equipment, outside Canada than in Canada. We should have been and could have been in a better position to produce more munitions and in greater variety than we are doing.

The iron and steel business is one with which I was associated. The minister has heard me say before that the government should make every effort to encourage the production of iron ore, of which, of the high grade and low grade, we have an inexhaustible supply. We could have done that because like Great Britain, and just as much as Germany almost, we anticipated the war. We saw it coming but were not just in a position to do our full share in the production of war munitions, which consist for the most part of mechanized equipment manufactured largely from steel and iron. I would ask what the government is doing right now to increase the production of iron and steel in Canada. Are we to-day doing on lake Superior what our cousins to the south are doing on lake Superior, clearing the ice from Michipicoten harbour so that Algoma iron can be loaded there and shipped to the steel mills of Sault Ste. Marie? I do not know what we are doing, but I know they are doing it in the United States. They have their ice-breakers on lake Superior breaking ice so that they can start what they predict will be the largest shipment of iron ore by lake transport in the world's history. They are planning to ship this year one hundred million tons of iron ore to the steel plants in eastern states. They are at it right now, and if we are not at it we should be. We ought to be up and doing. We ought to be prepared to expedite production, because, after all, the war cannot be won without the production of necessary mechanized war equipment. That is more necessary almost than anything else.

The same applies to other industries as well. I have said before, and I say again, that we have imported iron and steel products to too great a value. I have been fighting for years, ever since I have been here, for the development of the Canadian iron and steel industry to bring it to a much greater position than it holds to-day. I can hardly picture this country continuing to purchase such vast quantities in tonnage and in dollar value of iron and steel equipment from outside Canada, principally from the United States. I am not opposed to trading with the United States. Like everyone else I have a very warm feeling for our cousins to the south because of the way in which they have shown themselves as friends of ours and of the empire in the present conflict. But I am Canadian first, and I am for production in Canada. I am convinced that more could be done if the government had a proper conception of the industry, of the value of the iron and steel industry, or if there were more in the government who had a thorough knowledge of the industry in a practical way. I do not mean such knowledge as is acquired by walking through a factory. I am amused to hear tales as a result of walking through factories. It is as if I walked through a lawyer's office and called myself a lawyer in consequence, or if I posed as a doctor as a result of a visit to a doctor's office. The business of the production of iron and steel is something that a man learns after many years of hard knocks in that school and in the operation of plants and machinery.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been a great increase in steel making capacity with government assistance.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. MacNICOL: I have said that, but it could be a great deal larger, and I could have made it a great deal larger. I know where the raw material is, and I know how plants could be built and put into operation. The minister spoke of both iron and steel and that is why I am discussing the subject. He also spoke of coal and oil. Canada has within its borders, I am told—and I see this by statistics—one-fifth of the world's coal resources, at least the known resources; and yet we are importing well on to $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 worth of coal yearly. That money has to be sent out of the country. Would it not be better to use a considerable portion of that money in buying larger quantities of Nova Scotian coal, larger quantities of Alberta and Saskatchewan coal? We would keep the money in the country and would be debtors to one another and not to outsiders. I hope, therefore, that during this year, and as long as the war lasts, the government—and they will receive a good deal of commendation if they do this—will encourage buying coal in Canada from Canadian coal producers in much larger quantities.

I believe we are producing about one-half of the coal we use; but why should we not produce three-quarters of it and save that money for Canadians? The same thing applies to oil. Later on, I am going to make a speech on oil. I am one of those who believe that Canada should be an exporter instead of an importer of oil; yet in 1938 we imported approximately $50,000,000 worth of oil and its products, and this year I venture to say it will be nearer $75,000,000. I make this statement—and I am prepared to defend it against anyone who is willing to stand on a platform with me—that a large proportion of that oil could be produced in Canada, and it should be. I shall not say anything further on that point at the moment. When the minister referred to coal, iron and steel, and oil, it gave me an opportunity to say something about these commodities.

I am told, though I hope it is not true, that the government has in contemplation either abolishing or, at any rate, making inoperative the housing act which has rendered such excellent service in Canada during the last few years. If the housing act is repealed, a great number of people in my riding, and in other ridings as well, will be thrown out of work. It will affect carpenters and other tradesmen who are connected with building. The government wants the steel that enters into the production of equipment for munitions, but on the other hand men must have suitable habitations and their houses must be properly equipped. Let me give a case in point. Recently I had to buy for some of my buildings several ordinary 30-gallon galvanized iron boilers. It seemed as difficult to get these galvanized iron boilers as to move the Bank of Toronto from King and Bay streets to the corner of King and Yonge streets. I hope the government will take steps to see to it that the average householder, or the ordinary small builder putting up homes for our working men, is not handicapped through inability to get repairs or new equipment for houses which the common people, the ordinary householders, must live in. When I say the common people, I class myself as one of them.

There are two other items which I wish to discuss for a moment before I am through. Let me refer briefly to the first of these items, the Alaska highway. It seems to me the government has fallen down in making preparations to assist in building or to permit our United States cousins to build a very necessary military war road. I am all for it. The government knew—because it was contemplated for a quite a while—what the situation was with regard to that road; and what did they do to make it possible for contractors or others to send materials to Fort St. John?

As far as I know, little was done. There is only one bridge across the great Peace river, and that is at the town of Peace River. The banks along that river are high, averaging 900 feet in height. At the moment I am told that traffic going from Dawson Creek north to Fort St. John, some twenty-five miles away, more or less, has to go down off the plateau, be ferried over the river, and up onto the plateau again on the north side. Had the government been alive to what it must have known would come to pass, namely the construction of that road, surely the road could have been projected on from the terminus on the north side of the river to Rose Prairie, which is some twelve miles or more north of Fort St. John. The cost to the United States contractors is going to be heavy and, in addition, there will be great delay in having to ferry equipment across the river instead of having it cross by bridge. That is just an aside, something the government should have considered if it had looked ahead to what had to take place.

I shall conclude with one further reference, a matter to which my leader referred the other evening very briefly and which, I know, will be referred to a great deal more later on. I believe this matter was introduced last session by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), and supported at that time by myself. I want to protest just as strongly as I can against whoever is responsible for cutting out the printing of the public accounts as fully as formerly. In past years I, for one, carefully searched the public accounts, and on many occasions was able to obtain interesting and valuable information from the government by asking questions with regard to items I found therein. As published heretofore, I always looked upon the public accounts as the watchdog of the Canadian treasury, because many hon. members searched those accounts very carefully.

I should like to mention only one item to show what this means. Some years ago a yacht was purchased by the government. I am not speaking of this in a political way. It is immaterial whether it was the present government or the past government; this is what often prevails—perhaps too frequently—and what can be discovered by searching the public accounts. This yacht was purchased in 1934 for $1,510. Between 1934 and 1939, inclusive, the public accounts revealed that repairs to that yacht had cost this country $6,884.32, or more than four times the original cost; that gasoline and oil to operate the yacht, only during the summer and only for occasional use, had cost $2,215. It is items such as this that members of parliament like to dig into, in order to urge the government to cut out waste. This is my closing word, that in whatever the government does during this war, when the public are so willing to contribute money generously and on the other hand are so anxious that every dollar be spent legitimately and without waste, it is imperative that members of parliament be given every opportunity to scrutinize every expenditure made by the government.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make just a few observations in connection with the resolution under discussion. I must say that I do not see how anyone could oppose a measure that would provide a billion dollars' worth of credit to the people of Great Britain, who for over two years have experienced the hardship and suffering of war. They are a people with great fortitude and, I believe, great faith in the other nations of the British commonwealth. It is only right and proper that we should come to their assistance in times like these, by measures such as those proposed by this resolution.

I do not speak to this resolution as an expert on monetary technique. I do not consider myself such. I am like many others, a mere student, one who has a desire to learn. As I think of this measure in that way, I may get something of a cue from the minister's speech in introducing this resolution in the house, as it appears at page 1421 of Hansard for March 18. He said:

In essence, the proposals are simple and straightforward; but because of the number and nature of the various transactions involved, and perhaps also because they deal in part with matters of exchange, which is a mystery to many persons, the details and perhaps the bill itself may appear complicated to many members of the house.

I was particularly interested in that remark, because I think we have reason to realize that this matter of money, not only internally but externally, as it is related to transactions between one country and another, is sadly misunderstood. It is a subject that does seem to be mysterious; it is a subject that somehow or another has been kept in the dark for a good many years. I recall on one occasion talking to a certain gentleman who, I think, would be regarded as an intellectual; at least he had graduated from a university and had taken some post-graduate work. In talking to him on the subject of money, I asked if he would answer one question; that was, where money came from, how it came into existence. He replied, "Well, of course, if I have a field of wheat out here, that is money." I said, "Do you mean that dollar bills grow on the ends of the stalks?" "Oh," he said, "no, no, no, no, no." Then I said "Well, what do you mean? I asked you where money came from." The only answer he had was, "Well, well, well, well, well." I have asked more than one person the same question, and I have discovered that some people who are quite intellectual and bright have not understood and have not solved some of the rudiments of this matter known as finance or money.

I was coming east on the train not so long ago and happened to be in the same seat with a man from—well, I will not say where he was from, but he voted for one of the ministers on the government side of the house. When he learned who I was, of course we talked a little bit about politics, and I discovered he was a very good Liberal. He went out of the coach, returned a few minutes later, sat down and said, "Well, Mr. Hansell, tell me: Where is Mr. Aberhart going to get his money from?" So I said to him, "Well, now, Mr. So-and-so, if you will tell me where Mr. Ilsley gets his from, I think I would be in a better position to tell you where Mr. Aberhart would get his." Well, he began to stumble and stew and sweat a little bit, and spit a little bit, and then I began to explain a very few simple things to him. I said, "You see, Mr. So-and-so, it is not social credit you do not understand; it is not Mr. Aberhart's money you do not understand; it is Mr. Ilsley's money you do not understand."

I am quite certain there may be very similar conceptions with respect to a resolution such as this—and, mark you, I have prefaced my remarks to-night with a commendation of the government's action in granting to Great Britain this gift of a billion dollars. I think this gift should be made. I am in favour of the resolution. But there are some things upon which perhaps some light should be thrown. The minister has said that this is a gift to Great Britain. I wish to compliment him upon his speech in introducing the measure, because it was a good speech. It is couched in nice language; it is clever, and I do not think he misses the mark. But sometimes there is a great danger when one deals in generalities. Sometimes people are past masters of that. I am not accusing the minister on that score, but I must say that when he talks about this gift to Great Britain he uses these words, as they are reported at page 1421 of Hansard:

> In order to prevent the further rapid accumulation of sterling balances, the government believed that the best course to follow was to make an outright gift to Britain of the foodstuffs, raw materials, planes, tanks, guns and other war supplies which we would send to her, up to the value of $1,000 million.

That is a very carefully worded statement. Then, further down the page we find this:

> . . . I have referred to earlier as the Canadian dollar deficit of the sterling area. This deficit of course arises almost entirely from Britain's requirements for foodstuffs, raw materials, munitions and other war supplies purchased here, so that the proposed gift will, in effect,—

That is a very clever phrase.

> —take the form of these war supplies.

The gift is spoken of in general terms, and I believe the people assume that it is in reality a gift of foodstuffs, guns, tanks, aeroplanes and war munitions to the British people. What I am asking is this: If it is a gift to the British people of foodstuffs, and so forth, and so on, will the British people receive those foodstuffs free of charge? That is a question which perhaps has not dawned upon many people. The fact of the matter is that the British people will not get those foodstuffs without paying for them.

When I make that statement there may appear to be some confusion of terms. Let me put it in another way: We shall suppose that this billion dollars' worth of goods is sent to Great Britain in 1942. They are all stamped "Made in Canada, 1942". On every can we shall suppose the words, "Made in Canada, 1942", are placed; on every side of bacon, "Produced in Canada, 1942"; on every sack of flour, "Milled in Canada in 1942". This, we say, is a gift to Great Britain.

I have a mother and father living in Great Britain. Am I to expect that my mother and father will receive as a gift so many sacks of flour, so many sides of bacon, so many cans of foodstuffs, so much clothing?

Mr. GRANT: No.

Mr. HANSELL: My hon. friend over here says no. Then, how is it a gift? That is a question which should be answered. I believe I know the answer, and if my answer is not correct the minister can correct it—for I confessed a while ago that I am only a student, perhaps only an infant, in the study of these matters. There is much that I do not know, and sometimes the mystery seems to me to become a little darker, the further I get into it.

I should like the minister to throw some light on that. We say it is a gift of foodstuffs; and yet when the British people come to get it, they have to pay so much in pounds, shillings, or pence, or whatever the price may be. The fact of the matter is that this billion dollar gift has to be financed from somewhere. Our farmers are going to raise hogs to produce bacon. They are going to grow wheat. They are going to produce the foodstuffs to be canned and sent over there. I use foodstuffs only as an illustration. They are not going to do that for nothing; they are going to be paid for them. The British people who buy those things in their own localities are also going to pay for them.

Mr. McCANN: What about giving it to the army?

Mr. HANSELL: It does not make any difference, technically. I am only using this as an illustration. If it is given to the army, then the British government pays for it, which means that in the end the people have to pay. My hon. friend is only a student.

Mr. GRANT: The British government does not pay for it at all.

Mr. HANSELL: Here is an hon. member who says that the British government does not pay for it. Two Liberals disagree. Perhaps my hon. friend over here has not reached the stage of being a student. Let us go on. The fact of the matter is that we are raising in Canada by way of loan a total of one billion dollars from our own institutions. That billion dollars will pay our farmers, our manufacturers or whoever produced the goods. They are shipped to Great Britain and Great Britain is not charged for them. But the British people pay for them just the same. The result is that the British government has one billion dollars more in their treasury.

Mr. McCANN: That is what constitutes the gift.

Mr. HANSELL: That is what constitutes the gift, and I have nothing to say against it. I am not opposing that. I am simply pointing out that we are raising a billion dollars here to pay our farmers and our manufacturers; we are going into debt to the extent of one billion dollars. The point is that we have taken one billion dollars' worth of debt that Great Britain would otherwise have owed us, and we have converted it into internal debt in Canada which the Canadian people here owe to the banks or whoever create the credit.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let me correct that right now. Do not let that idea get abroad at all. The internal debt of Canada will be no larger as a result of this transaction than it otherwise would be. If we were to sell this to Great Britain and take sterling in pay for it, we would have to borrow the billion dollars that my hon. friend speaks about from the Canadian people and take the money and pay the Canadian producers for the goods. But in that event we would send the goods to Great Britain and we would take sterling in return for them. So we are not converting a debt from Great Britain into an internal debt in Canada which otherwise would not exist. The internal debt in Canada will not be one dollar larger because we are doing this, nor will the taxes in Canada be one dollar greater than if we were not doing this. I ask my hon. friend to make that clear. I think he understands what I am saying. I want him to make that clear before he goes any further. We are not transferring international debt from Great Britain into internal debt in Canada and thereby saddling our people with a billion dollars of debt which otherwise would not exist. That is not so at all.

Mr. HANSELL: I thank the minister for correcting me where I was perhaps wrong in my technical language. I think, however, I am right in saying that there will be no billion dollars of British collateral standing against this?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. HANSELL: Our debt will be increased, but it would have been anyway if we had shipped the goods.

Mr. JACKMAN: The fulfilment of a total war creates a debt.

Mr. HANSELL: I am being instructed from all directions by the Conservative party.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You may learn something yet.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not think they have corrected anything I have said, although the minister corrected my technical errors. I go a step further and perhaps the minister will correct my technical language here if I am in error. I have not spoken a great deal about the technicalities of our money philosophy because there are other men more capable of doing that. I usually spend my time in speaking on other bills and relieve these men so that they can devote their time to the monetary technique. But I have had to meet these things because of my position in this small party. You meet men every day who ask about these technical subjects.

The point I want to make now is in reference to the prices that will be paid for these goods which are being produced in Canada. Some of these goods will be raised at a loss, especially those produced by the agricultural industry. I do not know how that can be remedied, but I am sure that this billion dollars' worth of credit will not be created at a loss. That is something that is worth considering. These farmers who will be raising these foodstuffs have taxes to pay and other things to buy into the bargain. As they put in their crops or as they attempt to raise their hogs they find they need a line of credit. I have nothing against these institutions. We do not talk against the banks. People get queer, screwy ideas about what we talk about. We have to have money and we have to have credit; the thing is that our banking institutions are doing for us what the government perhaps could do for themselves.

These farmers go to the purveyors of credit and say that they would like to borrow some money in order to produce these goods which are eventually going to Great Britain. They get their loans, but they will have to pay interest. The banking institutions are not going to lose money on these loans. Interest rates will be 4, 5, 6 or 7 per cent; I do not know how much they will want to charge the farmers. So these farmers raise their hogs, wheat or other products and, when they are sold, they find that if they get any profit, it is just a bare profit. I doubt if there is any profit when costs of operation are taken into account. Anyway the financial institutions have advanced the loan and are paid their interest. But they also create the billion dollars and they get interest on that, too. What I am saying is that there should be some responsibility placed upon the financial institutions with respect to this gift to Great Britain. This credit is created at the stroke of a pen; let us make no mistake about that. So I say that they should bear some responsibility with respect to the billion dollar gift to Great Britain.

Mr. JACKMAN: What would you suggest?

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. HANSELL: That is all right; but as a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, the negative in any debate is not to suggest.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but—

Mr. HANSELL: It is all right to say, "yes, but."

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but this is positive.

Mr. HANSELL: We have been here since 1936 and have been propounding and suggesting all along. People have laughed at and ridiculed our suggestions, but we find that eventually the government goes behind a corner and gets into a huddle and says: "I guess we shall have to do this," do in part what we have been suggesting, because circumstances sometimes force them to do that very thing. We are not seeking to tell the government how to run the country. But we do wish to point out certain things where we think we can be of assistance. I am not opposing this measure.

Reverting to what I was saying about financial institutions bearing some responsibility in this matter, may I refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) this afternoon. He complimented the Minister of Finance and the government, and rightly so, I think, upon giving by this measure what he said was leadership to the world, to those who will hold a primary creditor position after the war. I have no criticism to make of that statement. I think the government is giving some lead in one respect. All that the hon. member for Essex East meant by giving leadership was giving leadership in the cancellation, shall we say, of certain debts owed to Canada by other nations, which might have to be done in any event after the war. That is all right. But where the government is giving more of a lead to other nations is in another part of this resolution, in clause 2, where the government is permitting the $700 million part of the British debt to remain at a standstill, without interest, for the duration of the war. I commend the government for that action. I should like to go so far as to say that perhaps that is what should be done with all foreign obligations throughout all the democratic countries which are fighting together in this war.

There is, however, one matter I would bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance in connection with clause 4 of the resolution, where provision is being made for the borrowing of one billion dollars. On that we are going to pay interest. Would it not be feasible to propose that since this billion dollars of increased debt in Canada is created by our own financial institutions, it should at least be created free of interest? We are taking the responsibility of allowing $700 million of British debt to stand without interest to the British people for the duration, but we are asking our own people to pay interest on the billion dollar debt that we are creating for the purpose of giving a billion dollars' worth of goods to Britain. It seems to me, therefore, that the logical thing to suggest is to delete the words "and interest" from that clause. I do not see why the minister will not do that. I feel that I or somebody else should propose an amendment accordingly to clause 4, perhaps when we are in committee. The minister might do it himself, but I do not think he will.

I do not know what interest will be charged on this one billion dollars, but if the rate were 2 per cent, the interest would amount to $20 million a year. Therefore the Canadian people are going to be, not only in debt to the tune of one billion dollars but, if the rate is 2 per cent, in debt, too, for an additional $20 million of interest every year, and, if the interest is compounded, it will be even more. Why could our own financial institutions in Canada not say: "We will service this at one-half of one per cent, or whatever it may take, and we will create the money without interest." I am not saying, without debt.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If I may ask a question, if I pay $10,000 a year life insurance premium to the Canada Life and they lend it to the government, what is going to happen to the profits on that $10,000 which I invest in a Canada Life policy? I am to shoulder the burden, not the institution.

Mr. NOSEWORTHY: Why should you get any profit on your $10,000?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the hon. member never hear of the sanctity of a contract made before the war?

Mr. HANSELL: I do not want other gentlemen to take up all of my time, but I would answer the leader of the opposition in this way. Perhaps I have been dealing with this billion dollars as a billion dollars of created credit. It may not all be created; I realize that. All I say is that interest should not be charged upon the credit that is created. My hon. friend, even though he be the leader of the opposition, makes no distinction at all between the investment of money which the insurance companies already have and the creation of fresh credit with the stroke of a pen by the purveyors of credit, by those institutions to which parliament has given the right to create credit. There is all the difference in the world between the two. I do not create any money; my hon. friend does not create any money, nor does any insurance company or any mortgage company. But the banks do create money; that is their function, and I say that when credit is created for the purpose of servicing a gift to Britain it should be created free of interest charges. Surely that is not asking too much.

I wish to deal with just one other phase of the speech made by the hon. member for Essex East this afternoon. He did not conclude his speech without referring to what the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) had said in respect to the seven-man committee of the government which is now working on post-war reconstruction. In referring to that he said that the hon. member for Acadia was entirely unfair to bring into his speech the fact that Doctor James, the principal of McGill university, who heads the seven-man committee, was of a gold mentality, had been advising the government, and perhaps as an adviser to the government had been advising them along lines that he himself supports—this same gentleman having been sent by the government to Great Britain to consult on post-war reconstruction. The member for Essex East said that the hon. member for Acadia was unfair, and he asked why the hon. member for Acadia did not bring in, for instance, the remarks which the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) made in Toronto.

I should like to deal with that for just a moment, because I assert that there is no essential difference between the remarks made by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, at Toronto or at any other time, and any remarks which Doctor James has made, in connection with post-war reconstruction. Or I will put it in this way: There is not a single, solitary sentence which the Minister of Pensions and National Health has ever uttered on this subject which Doctor James could not support wholeheartedly; he could say "amen" to anything the minister said. It seems to me that the hon. member for Essex East was unfair in the observation he made. Doctor James, as chairman of the seven-man committee on post-war construction, is an adviser to the government. I might say in passing that I am still waiting for the minister to say what is the policy of the government in respect to post-war reconstruction. He has not said anything yet. Bringing down bills for soldier reestablishment is not the thing for which this country is primarily looking. It is good in its place; we have nothing to say against such measures; but we are looking for something more.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Looking for $25 a month.

Mr. HANSELL: You know, it is the strangest thing in the world—

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That a man will wake out of his sleep to make such remarks.

Mr. HANSELL: I ask my hon. friend, is there anything so mysterious about being able to pay the people of Canada $25 a month? He seems to think there is.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): Why don't you pay it?

Mr. HANSELL: Let me tell my hon. friend over there who pounds his desk when he speaks, that the government of Canada are spending enough money to-day for things to blow into the air, to pay every adult citizen in Canada a dividend of $75 a month.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh!

Mr. HANSELL: Well, figure it out for yourself.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is too much arithmetic for them.

Mr. GARDINER: We are spending that money to keep them from getting blown into the air.

Mr. HANSELL: I am saying that is what they are doing. They are getting the money to blow into the air. To say that they could not get the same amount of money to feed the people is so illogical that I think the hon. member must have been awakened, not only out of sleep but out of a dream. I suggest to him that he go back to sleep and finish his dream. Perhaps he will dream how that can be done.

Mr. HANSON (Skeena): If I pound my desk more than I speak, the reason is that I know my limitations, and I believe in not taking up time by talking nonsense.

Mr. HANSELL: I was referring to the hon. member for Skeena as the one who apparently woke out of his sleep.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The one was pounding his ear and the other was pounding his desk.

Mr. HANSELL: I do not mind these interruptions. I must say that Hansard reads a little better when there is not a solid mass of type to read.

I have here an article entitled "To-day and To-morrow", which is an address broadcast from Ottawa by the Minister of Pensions and National Health; it was published in the Labour Review of October, 1941. The minister was talking of things as they exist to-day and things as they must exist after the war. I am going to read a few excerpts for the benefit of the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that his time is up.

Mr. HANSELL: I have nearly finished, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman can continue only with the unanimous consent of the house. Has he the unanimous consent of the house?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have had to do this before, and it is a disagreeable thing to do, but I must say that it is all out of proportion for lengthy speeches to be made at times like these on a debate such as this. I think that the forty-minute rule ought to be observed by everyone.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member's time is up.

Mr. HANSELL: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I regret that the minister made that last remark. We can discuss the resolution in its committee stage, and I am quite willing to accommodate the minister. I must say, however, that other hon. members have wasted more time than I did. I shall discuss the question later.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as it is so near eleven o'clock, I wonder whether we may call it eleven o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With unanimous consent it can be done, but I do not assume that the hon. gentleman has unanimous consent.

Mr. BLACKMORE: All right, Mr. Speaker. In the first place, members of my group and of the organization I represent throughout Canada will favour this gift of a billion dollars; but the cost of this gift is far too great. To judge from the puerile remarks which four or five hon. members have been throwing about the chamber with respect to "twenty-five dollars", I suppose they will never come to realize that this cost is too high until the first thousand years after they are dead; but the cost of this gift is far too great. The minister is making the Canadian people pay double this billion dollars. A good many persons, even in this chamber, do not realize it.

In the first place, the Canadian people, in blood and sweat and tears and struggle and effort, are paying the billion dollars. When they produce the beef and the cheese and the wheat they are paying the billion dollars. That is the first thought. The minister himself, in the first days of the parliament, when war was declared, made some statements which indicated that he saw what was going to be the true nature of the effort of Canada. I refer to Hansard of September 12, 1939, page 138, where the minister says:

> Whatever such offsets may be, it is important to emphasize that, as I have already said, the real costs of war must come out of current production, out of the goods and services produced during the war.

The Canadian people, in producing those goods, either have paid that cost or are going to pay it in goods. Therefore they pay it once. Then on top of that they are called on to pay for it again, financially, in the form of a debt. The minister will correct me if I am wrong here; I am anxious to get this exactly right. He will tell me this: Is Canada going to be a billion dollars further in debt because she makes this gift to Britain?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Then how is Canada going to buy the goods she is giving to Britain?

Mr. ILSLEY: Everyone wants Canada to buy the goods anyway. It would be unthinkable not to produce the goods and buy the goods and supply them to Britain. Every person in this country wants Canada to continue to do that, and if Canada does that, Canada will be in debt for the money with which to pay for the goods, to the extent that they are to be paid for out of borrowed money. Therefore this transaction does not increase the indebtedness of the government to the Canadian people by one dollar.

Mr. BLACKMORE: But this fact is very essential, that the Canadian people have paid for this billion dollars' worth of goods, or will pay for them—

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —either with money raised by taxation or with money raised by borrowing?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is the point. It means that the Canadian people have paid financially for these goods which we are to give away. That is the important point. It means that we are a billion dollars further in debt by reason of the transaction.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, not by any means.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, if the country is to buy a billion dollars' worth of goods and raise the money with which to pay for them, surely the country has incurred an obligation by reason of the purchase of those goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not by reason of this transaction, though. They would have made the goods and the government would have bought the goods in any event. This transaction has nothing to do with that. It is not by virtue of this transaction that the government is buying the goods. This country is putting forward its maximum war effort, producing all the goods it can for carrying on the war. This does not increase the war effort of Canada. If it did, it would be a good thing, but it does not because we are doing our maximum, the most we can, anyway. This transaction does not increase the production of the Canadian people or the amount that the government of Canada pays the Canadian people. They would have paid that without this transaction. They would have paid just as much without this transaction. The only effect of the transaction is that it alters the post-war settlement; we shall not be owed as much by Great Britain afterwards as we would be without this transaction.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The simple fact of the matter is that the Canadian government has added to its obligations a billion dollars by the time it has given these goods to Great Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: By the time they got the goods, by the time the goods were produced, they would have added that much—not as a result of this transaction at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If the Canadian government lets Great Britain have $100,000,000 worth of wheat, the Canadian government raises $100,000,000 and buys wheat, which means that the Canadian government adds to its indebtedness.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not by virtue of giving the wheat. They are buying the wheat anyway. They are buying the wheat and whether they give it away or sell it, or whatever they do with it, it is not the terms on which the wheat is disposed of that make any difference whatever in the obligation of the Canadian government to the Canadian people—in the debt of the Canadian government. It makes no difference at all, not to the extent of a dollar.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not think there is any misunderstanding between the minister and me. The important fact for the Canadian people to get is that Canada as a government is paying in good Canadian money for the whole of this billion dollars, and she is raising the money with which to pay for the goods, either by taxation or by borrowing—

Mr. ILSLEY: Exactly.

Mr. BLACKMORE: —and in this case it is by borrowing.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is not by borrowing necessarily. It is by taxation and borrowing. No one can allocate our borrowing to this transaction. The hon. member who preceded the hon. member now speaking talked about it as if we were borrowing the whole amount for this. He might as well have said that we were raising it all by taxation. One cannot say it is borrowed money rather than taxes that goes to pay for these particular goods. As a matter of fact, our tax revenues will very greatly exceed this billion dollars, and one might very well say that we were not borrowing a dollar to go into this. One might as truthfully say that as to say that all the money going into this is money that is borrowed.

Mr. HANSELL: I did correct myself.

Mr. BLACKMORE: So the Canadian government is taxing one-half of the money it is now spending on everything—war and current expenses and loans and gifts—and it is raising the rest by borrowing?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is taxing a great deal more than half.

Mr. BLACKMORE: On over-all expenditures of government?

Mr. ILSLEY: It takes not very far from half if the assistance to Great Britain is included with our non-war expenditures and our war expenditures during the present fiscal year. But our tax revenues, our total revenues, which are a little higher than tax revenues—because they include post office revenues and certain miscellaneous revenues —are enough this year, or almost exactly enough, to cover our total direct war expenditure—not including our assistance to Britain, or non-war expenditures, but the total direct war expenditure of Canada, which has been met entirely, or is being met entirely, this year out of revenue.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We would be safe in saying, then, that practically one-half of this billion dollars is being raised by taxation, and one-half by borrowing. If we take it proportionately we are spending this year about $3,000,000,000 for all expenditures—well, say, $3,500,000,000—of which virtually one-half is to be raised by taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, roughly speaking.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall have an estimate of that in the budget.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Roughly speaking, that would be true?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know what our taxation will be.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I will go so far as to say that from the evidence adduced so far in the discussions in the house that is the general conclusion that we can draw—that we are raising by taxation one-half of the money it is costing us to carry on, and the other half is becoming a debt against the Canadian people.

On motion of Mr. Blackmore the debate was adjourned.

It being two minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Friday, March 20, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

HON. R. B. HANSON

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS TO THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I take the earliest opportunity to say publicly what I have just expressed in a few words personally to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). It is that, speaking on behalf of the members of all parties in this House of Commons we extend to him the warmest congratulations on another birthday anniversary, and our very sincere good wishes for many happy returns of the day. My hon. friend knows, I think, the regard in which he is held by all hon. members of the House of Commons. We are pleased indeed to see him occupying the position which he occupies at the moment, and I hope he may continue to occupy it for a long time to come.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May we, too, join in these kindly congratulations to the leader of the opposition for whom, in spite of an occasional disagreement, we all have very high regard and deep respect.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, our group has admired the way in which the leader of the opposition has fought a good fight. He started under great handicaps, and I believe he has made good up to the present time. We congratulate him, and wish him many years of success.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that the sentiments expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and by my fellow opposition leaders, if I may so term them, are altogether undeserved. No one, I am sure, realizes his limitations more than I do; none the less one would not be human if one were not touched by such expressions as have been uttered to-day by the Prime Minister and the other hon. gentlemen. Last year on a similar occasion I recall that I declared I would have no more birthdays. But, sir, circumstances over which I have no control have rendered that wish impossible of fulfilment. And if my succeeding birthdays are met as happily from all corners of this house, in whatever capacity I may serve this country, as has been the case to-day, I shall recant from the decision which I took last year and express the hope that I may have many more birthdays.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to congratulate the leader of the opposition also, and I hope that as a distinguished lawyer he will be very long the leader of the opposition in this country.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. LACOMBE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. FAUTEUX IN THE HOUSE ON MARCH 19

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Referring to the statement made yesterday in this house by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Fauteux), I formally declare that the candidate of the Canadian party at the by-election of February 9 last in the St. Mary riding has never offered his services to the Liberal party—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is not exercising his right on a question of privilege. As he has now stated, he is making a statement and offering opinions with regard to something which is not a question of privilege.

Mr. LACOMBE: I will only read the telegram which I received this morning—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Will the hon. member please resume his seat. The breach of privilege must be as against the hon. member, or against the privileges of the house. If the hon. member wishes to state to the house that there has been a breach of his privileges as a member, or that the privileges of the house have been abused, he is entitled to make that statement; but he is not entitled to make an argument with regard to something which has nothing to do with the privileges either of himself or of the house.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. Yesterday the Chair permitted the hon. member for St. Mary to make a statement to this house concerning the by-election in St. Mary. I want to answer that statement.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand the hon. member to say that the hon. member for St. Mary has made a statement on a question of privilege with regard to the by-election in that constituency. In my opinion what the hon. member now states cannot conceivably be a breach of the privileges of the hon. member now speaking, as a member, or a breach of the privileges of the house. Therefore I cannot allow the hon. member to make a statement of privilege on such a matter.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise on another point of order. Under rule 36 I am absolutely in order when I want to read a telegram which I received—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: —concerning this election, because my candidate—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: —has never offered his services to the Liberal party—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: —in the provincial elections.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have nothing to add to what I have said already. The hon. member is not stating a breach of privilege, either in relation to himself or to the house.

AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. W. G. WEIR (Macdonald) presented the second report of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

EXCHANGE OF NOTES RESPECTING TRANSFER OF UNITED STATES CITIZENS ENLISTED IN CANADA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I wish to lay upon the table of the house copies in English and French of an exchange of notes constituting an agreement between the Canadian and United States governments with respect to the transfer to the armed forces of the United States of certain United States citizens and former United States citizens now serving in the naval, military or air forces of Canada. The United States note, which is signed by the minister of the United States, Mr. J. Pierrepont Moffat, is dated March 18, and the reply by myself is dated to-day. I would suggest, if the house would consent, that the notes be printed in the Votes and Proceedings of to-day. Perhaps I might give the house just a brief statement of the substance of the notes.

There are now in the Canadian armed forces at home and abroad about 15,000 to 16,000 United States citizens; 9,000 to 10,000 in the army, 6,000 in the air force, and 42 in the navy. Technically they are not all actual citizens of the United States. Some of them enlisted in the Canadian forces during the first months of the war when we required an oath of allegiance and by taking the oath they lost their United States citizenship and became stateless, that is to say, citizens of no country. The present agreement, however, covers these former citizens. It treats them just as if they were still United States citizens. The agreement may be summarized as follows:

(a) All United States citizens in the Canadian forces and all former United States citizens who have lost their citizenship as the result of taking an oath of allegiance on enlistment in the Canadian forces will be given an opportunity to apply for transfer to the United States forces.

(b) Applications will be granted if the United States authorities are willing to accept the applicant, provided that the Canadian authorities are empowered to postpone transfer, if in their opinion, immediate transfer would prejudicially affect the common war effort.

(c) The United States will send boards to Canada to interview the applicants, and these boards will have power to enlist the applicants into the United States forces.

(d) Applications for transfer will be received up to April 20 from personnel serving in the Canadian forces in Canada; those serving in Newfoundland and Jamaica will, if necessary, be given a week or so longer to send in their applications.

(e) Personnel serving elsewhere may apply for transfers within fifteen days after notice of the right to apply has appeared in the orders of the unit with which they are serving; they will not ordinarily be transferred until they can be transferred to a United States unit serving in the area in which they are located.

(f) Representatives of Canada and of the United States will discuss with the authorities of Great Britain, the transfer to the United States forces of R.C.A.F. personnel now serving in the R.A.F. whose transfer might affect the efficiency of the R.A.F.

What the agreement does is to give every United States citizen in our forces an opportunity to transfer to the forces of his own country if he wants to. The only proviso is that the Canadian authorities may withhold permission for a transfer if immediate transfer would prejudicially affect the common war effort.

We shall be sorry to lose those United States citizens who transfer to their own forces. We do not, however, wish to stand in their way if they feel that they would sooner serve under the flag of their own country. Whether they are serving under our flag or under the United States flag, they are serving in the armed forces of the united nations and are contributing to the common victory.

The Americans in our forces came to us when their country was still at peace. They came because they knew that Hitler was as much the enemy of the United States as he was the enemy of Canada. We were grateful to them for enlisting in our forces—grateful because of the assistance which they freely gave us and grateful because they were living proofs—if proofs were needed—of the sympathy and support of their country for our cause. We shall always remain grateful to them. These sixteen thousand men were forerunners of the hundreds of thousands, the millions of their fellow citizens who are to-day enlisted in the struggle against the axis.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted just a word, I think every one will approve of what is contained in this exchange of notes, and I desire to echo the closing sentences of the Prime Minister. However, I am just wondering if consideration has been given to the legal technicalities of declaring a man repatriated by a mere exchange of diplomatic notes. As I understand the laws of the United States, when a man expatriates himself he has to be repatriated by law in a formal manner. I am just mentioning that because there should be no doubt hereafter as to the status of these United States nationals.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. LACOMBE

ADVERTISEMENT PUBLISHED IN THE NEWSPAPER "LA PRESSE"

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to an advertisement published at the expense of the dominion government in the great Montreal daily La Presse. The concluding words of that advertisement are as follows:

In my opinion, Hitler would vote "no"; Quisling would abstain from voting and the Canadians will vote "yes".

I ask the hon. the Minister of Justice to be kind enough to make a statement, so that we may know whether it is the dominion government's intention to continue such propaganda throughout the country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Motions.

Mr. LACOMBE: I want an answer, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. L. S. ST. LAURENT (Minister of Justice): I submit that it is not the privilege of any member at this stage to submit a question of this kind to a minister without notice.

Mr. THORSON: Moreover, the advertisement from which the hon. member has read has not been paid for by the government.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. I want an answer from the Minister of Justice concerning the public moneys of this country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: I want an answer.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member please resume his seat. I understand he is asking a question of the Minister of Justice. We have not yet exhausted routine proceedings. Any question may be asked on the orders of the day which is relevant and which is in order.

FURTHER SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1941-42

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1942, was presented by Hon. J. L. Ilsley (Minister of Finance), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

AUDITORS' MEMORANDUM REFERRED TO IN THEIR REPORT FOR CALENDAR YEAR 1941

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, which one of his colleagues may be good enough to bring to his attention.

Yesterday the minister laid on the table the annual report of the Canadian National Railway system and the report of the auditors, Messrs. George A. Touche and Company, to parliament for the year ended December 31, 1941, pursuant to the provisions of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, 1936, and the act of 1941, respecting the appointment of auditors for the national railways.

In the auditors' report, at page 3, reference is made to their memorandum to the board of directors dealing with internal matters, which it is stated will be dispatched to the minister in due course.

I desire to ask the minister (a) if he will table this memorandum when received; (b) when it may be expected to be brought down; and (c) why this memorandum is not tabled contemporaneously with the tabling of the report on the system and the auditors' report?

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): The matter will be brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport.

THE MINISTRY

REPRESENTATION OF THE PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct a question to the Prime Minister. As the Hon. Pierre Casgrain has been appointed a judge of the Superior Court of Quebec, and the Right Hon. Senator Dandurand and the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe have passed away, I would ask the Prime Minister whether it is his intention to give fair and just representation in his ministry to the province of Quebec.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to the hon. member that my intentions are all fair and just and will be towards every province in this country.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The answer of the Prime Minister does not satisfy the province of Quebec.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING. May I say to the hon. member that as a matter of courtesy I answered his question, although I might have taken exception to his asking it on the orders of the day and requested that it be placed on the order paper. I wish to say to him that having regard to the extent to which he has interrupted the proceedings of this house in the last couple of days, it is generally felt that he is beginning seriously to infringe upon the privileges of the house itself, and if he persists in rising and not obeying the orders of the Speaker I think steps will have to be taken whereby the Speaker's orders may be effectively carried out.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. According to standing order 41, the Prime Minister must withdraw his words absolutely.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

THE PLEBISCITE

ACTION TO ASSIST IN OBTAINING AFFIRMATIVE REPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, and I am hoping very much that you will be lenient and allow me to ask it because it concerns a matter of urgent public importance, the taking of the vote on the plebiscite.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that the hon. member has prefaced her question by the suggestion that it is not in order. I hope that she will not ask the Chair to consent to something that is out of order.

Mrs. NIELSEN: Your Honour did rule me out of order once before on a question of policy asked on the orders of the day, but this is a question of urgent public importance having to do with the plebiscite. In arranging my work in my particular riding I must have some knowledge of this particular matter now.

Mr. SPEAKER: I had occasion yesterday and the day before to rule out of order questions asked on the orders of the day dealing, I understand, with the same matter. As to urgency, the hon. member will have to show me that there is urgency before I can permit the question to be asked to-day. If the hon. member will place her question dealing with the plebiscite vote on the order paper it will be answered in due course.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): If I might be permitted, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member consulted me about her question, and it would appear to me to be a matter of urgent public importance, having regard to the fact that if she placed the question on the order paper she might not get an answer before Friday next. The Prime Minister has a copy of the question, I believe, and unless there is some particular objection to answering it, I suggest that some leniency, if that is the correct term, be exercised. The hon. member represents a far-distant constituency and seeks an opportunity to do something in connection with the taking of the vote on the plebiscite.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As the leader of the opposition makes a special plea on behalf of a lady on his birthday anniversary, I think perhaps I might be pardoned if I anticipate, Mr. Speaker, your favourable attitude towards my giving a brief reply to the question as I have received it.

I gather that the question relates to action that was taken by a citizens' committee in Winnipeg, where those present formed themselves into a voluntary association to assist in obtaining an affirmative reply from the electorate to the question to be asked in the plebiscite which will be submitted in the course of the next few weeks, and the hon. member wishes to know whether I approve of action of that character. I say not only that I approve of it but that it is in accord with what I myself suggested might be an effective way of ensuring an affirmative reply to the plebiscite.

I think the other question the hon. member desires to ask is whether it is the intention of myself and my colleagues to address the electorate over the radio with respect to the plebiscite. It is my intention to do so. I have also reason to believe that some of my colleagues may adopt a similar course. I hope that many means will be found of making perfectly clear to the electorate the desire of the government to see that an affirmative reply is given to the question to be asked in the plebiscite.

Mr. SPEAKER: The question has been put and the answer given to the house. I therefore cannot quarrel with it at the moment. But I would point out to the house that the question which was asked was certainly one which should have been placed upon the order paper, and I hope there will be no recurrence of this practice, in view of the ruling which I have already made.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): May I rise to a point of order? It seemed to me, having heard the reply, that there was a question of urgency in relation to this particular question, because hon. members wished to make their arrangements for the Easter holidays. May I respectfully suggest to Your Honour that perhaps the tightening up of the rule regarding these questions has been carried to as great an extreme as the latitude which the house took prior to this strict enforcement of the rule. I would ask that some latitude be given to hon. members asking questions which are, to them, of some urgency. Perhaps the matter might be taken into consideration, because I feel that in the last few days the rule has been enforced quite properly but rather too rigidly.

Mr. SPEAKER: After all, the chair is bound by the rules; and when the latitude of which the hon. member has spoken was given, it was used so much that on one day when we began at, I believe, five minutes past three, we did not finish till ten minutes to four, with questions which certainly should have been placed on the order paper. It is necessary therefore to invoke the strict interpretation of the rule. I have endeavoured to do so and will continue to do so with fairness, I hope, but I do think that the house during these recent days took advantage of the latitude which was allowed, and many questions were asked which properly should have been placed upon the order paper. I cannot agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that we should relax the interpretation which has been given. In the case before us, if I may say so, the question of urgency does not appeal to me in the same manner as it appealed to the hon. member. The vote will not be taken until the twenty-seventh day of April. This affords plenty of time to hon. members—and I myself would be in the same position—to advise their constituents with regard to the vote on the plebiscite. I must ask the house to interpret the rule as strictly as possible and conform to my ruling with regard to questions which they wish to put, and place them on the order paper.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

PROCEDURE WITH RESPECT TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): There was published in the Canadian Press this morning a statement made by the Hon. R. J. Manion explaining his attitude as chief of the national government party. I would like to ask—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: The rule applies over there, too.

Mr. SPEAKER: The rule must apply.

HIGHWAYS

INSTRUCTIONS TO PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS RESPECTING ROAD-BUILDING IN 1942

On the orders of the day.

Mr. F. D. SHAW (Red Deer): I wish to direct a question to the government. Have centuries, will be irretrievably lost. We simply definite instructions gone out to any or all provincial governments regarding restrictions on provincial road-building for 1942?

Mr. SPEAKER: That question should be placed upon the order paper.

PRIVILEGE—Mr. LACOMBE

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT IN "LE CANADA" ON MARCH 18, 1942

On the orders of the day:

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains): Before the orders of the day are called I want to raise a question of privilege. There was published in Le Canada of March 18, 1942, the following statement:

(Translation)

At that time also, the name of Mr. Alphonse Raymond, whom we need not introduce to our readers and whose dealings with Mr. Duplessis are well known, came before the Meighen convention in Laval-Two Mountains.

Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely untrue. Mr. Horace Michaud, a Montreal barrister, was my opponent in 1926.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. This question, I am informed, is in the same category as the one already asked. Therefore it must be placed on the order paper.

WAR APPROPRIATION

UNITED KINGDOM FINANCING—WAR SUPPLIES, FOOD AND LOAN WITHOUT INTEREST

The house resumed from Thursday, March 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee on a resolution to provide for granting to His Majesty sums not exceeding $1,000,000,000 to assist in enabling the government of the United Kingdom to defray expenditures incurred in Canada for war purposes, and to provide for a loan to the government of the United Kingdom of $700,000,000 without interest.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, last evening when the house rose we were discussing the matter of this billion dollar gift to Britain. I stated that my group and those whom I represent throughout the country would approve the gift. May I state once more that we have approved it without qualifications or reservations. We were misrepresented in some respects as to this matter by the press. We approve this gift without reservations and without qualifications; all well informed Canadians must approve it, in spite of the cost.

My contention was that the gift as it is to be made is costing the Dominion of Canada too much, more than it is necessary that it should. I am ready to do anything which can be done by Canada to assist Britain in any respect in the prosecution of this war. This is Canada's war, and unless we win the war everything which we value, everything which has been handed down to us through the centuries, will be irretrievably lost. We simply must win the war.

But it is folly for us to make any contribution cost us more than it needs to cost. Let us give our all, but let us do it in the most efficient and effective manner. It was purely on this point that I was raising an objection.

I said that the minister, with the policy which he is adopting at the present time, is making this gift cost the Canadian people twice. First they are paying it physically and then they are paying it financially. They are paying it financially in two respects: first, by taxation, which I assume will amount roughly to $500,000,000; second, by a debt which is being incurred, which will amount roughly also to $500,000,000. Thus the gift is being paid for both physically and financially, and I contend that it is unnecessary to pay for it in any other manner than physically.

I wish to be very careful in what I say; the minister will correct me if I am not exactly right; but from what the minister said it seemed perfectly clear to me that this taxation and this debt would have been levied and incurred by the Dominion of Canada whether the goods had been given to Britain or not. That is, the gift of the goods to Britain did not bring on the taxation or the debt; Canada was buying the goods and incurring the obligation anyway.

She merely gave the goods to Great Britain, so that the gift did not cause the debt or the taxation; it was simply in a sort of way incidental. I wish to comment briefly on this $500,000,000 debt. I believe we shall find that $500,000,000 is the amount of the perpetual debt which is being incurred by the dominion in connection with, if not as a result of, this gift to Great Britain—and let it be clearly understood that I am not opposing it because it is a gift to Great Britain; I am opposing it because the debt is there when, in my judgment, it does not need to be there. This $500,000,000 will never be paid by the dominion government. It will last for generations if our past performance is any guide as to what will happen in the future.

I understand that the rate of interest at the present time is roughly three per cent. If the minister himself and succeeding ministers so manage the affairs of Canada as to reduce the interest rate by skilful manipulation, I think we can safely assume that they will not reduce it below two per cent, which means that this transaction—perhaps I had better not use the word "transaction"—this incident is adding to the shoulders of the dominion an interest bill of $10,000,000 a year for generations and generations. It is very necessary that we face this fact squarely. It is an easy matter for us in this house to allow something like this to pass by and thereby to bring upon future generations tremendous burdens the irksomeness of which we do not even remotely conceive. If we incur for the people of Canada $10,000,000 as an annual interest burden, we shall make future generations pay this $500,000,000 debt over again inside forty years. In other words, your boys and my boys who have enlisted to go and fight this war will risk their young lives, their health and vigour, and will return and in their lifetime pay this debt over again.

Mr. ILSLEY: If it is possible to obtain the $500,000,000 without cost to the government or to the Canadian people, why will it not be equally possible to obtain the $10,000,000 a year without cost to the government or the people?

Mr. BLACKMORE: There will be no doubt of the validity of the minister's statement if the men in future generations have a vision surpassing that which is being exercised by the men in this house. But we have no assurance that they will have that vision any more than the present members have. After all, we are assuming the responsibility here. Why not square up to it and see if there is not some way of avoiding the debt?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think there is, but I was wondering why the hon. gentleman is worried about the $10,000,000 if there is a way of getting the $500,000,000 for nothing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would probably be well to discuss the possibility of getting the $500,000,000 without debt. Then the $10,000,000 would not need to bother us. I notice in this house a disposition to disregard new ideas. The world is full of talk of a new order, but what does a new order mean? It must mean a new way of doing things. Somewhere new ideas are to be found. Why not listen to every idea which is advanced and weigh it carefully? May I read a statement dealing with the last war. Hon. members will find the passage which I am going to read in the report of the royal commission on banking and currency in Canada in 1933. These particular words appear on page 22, paragraph 47:

> In the war session of August, 1914, parliament raised the partially covered issue to $50,000,000. Subsequently an issue of $16,000,000 was made against a deposit of railway securities guaranteed by the dominion government as well as an uncovered issue of $10,000,000 for governmental purposes. In 1917—

This has a particular bearing on what we are doing now.

—an emergency issue of $50,000,000 of dominion notes was made to finance war purchases in Canada by the British government. The notes were secured by imperial treasury bills.

The transaction which is there described is so nearly analogous to the proposals which my group are making to this country at the present time that any man who disregards these facts is assuming a responsibility for which he may be called upon to answer. It is obvious from what I have read that at least $50,000,000 was obtained by the dominion government in the last war without cost; $26,000,000 we are sure was obtained for the mere cost of printing that $26,000,000. It did not constitute a debt, and since that time no one has paid interest on the $26,000,000.

Before I read another passage which has an important bearing on this question, may I read a quotation from the March, 1942, letter of the Royal Bank of Canada to indicate to the minister and to hon. members that I am not the only one in this country who is greatly perturbed over our gathering debt. The quotation is:

> The lesson of the debt problem of the inter-war period of the twenties and thirties should not be forgotten. Perhaps no other single factor played as large a part in the economic dislocation and difficulties of the period as the ever-present irritation and burden of war debt payments.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course that is international debts they are speaking of.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That may be, but it would still have a bearing on internal debt, for certainly the internal debt of a country can be irksomely burdensome, too.

Let me now read a passage from page 15 of a book called "Currency, Credit and the Exchanges," which hon. members will find in the library, written by Doctor William A. Shaw, author of the Calendar of Treasury Books and Papers. Doctor Shaw is one of the best authorities on monetary matters in Britain. He is dealing with the Bradbury experiment which played so large a part in the British finances of the last war. This passage states:

> At the instigation of the treasury, therefore, the British legislature was consciously instituting a new form of currency. Whence was the idea of such a currency derived? In this matter it is necessary to distinguish. The innovation, whether deliberate or accidental, did not consist in the denomination.

That is the size of the bill.

> One pound notes were well enough known in England as well as in Scotland, for they were issued by the Bank of England from 1797 to 1825. The real innovation consisted in taking away from the banks the right of issue of this emergency currency. The issue of it was reserved to the state, and the banks were employed only as distributors. This measure amounted to the adoption for paper money circulation of the principle of metallic currency circulation, the principle that the right of minting and of issue is a sovereign right appertaining only to the state and that the banks are only convenient channels or media for distribution or sale of the currency. But although so patent and obvious when stated in the abstract in this way, the step was none the less revolutionary. It was the first enunciation in the modern world of the true principle of paper money issue, a principle towards which the legislature had been blindly groping its way for more than a century. Even to-day, after twelve years' experience of the treasury note, the fact of this enunciation is not appreciated either by the press or by the banking world. Yet it is of cardinal importance. The history of modern paper currency legislation is a record of the successive devices by which the state has attempted to control the action or the discretion of the banks in the matter of paper issue.

There were £354 million of Bradburys printed and issued by the treasury of Great Britain during the last war, and with that state money they financed the whole strain of the war and were well on their way to finance the peace when someone in a high place in Britain was, as Doctor Shaw points out in this book, persuaded to abandon this principle of such tremendous significance.

Debt is a very serious matter. It is easy to get into; it is impossible to get out of. It is going to be intolerable to bear. Is there a way of financing these great war transactions without debt? I maintain that there is, and that this parliament should be at work considering ways and means to that end.

The question will immediately be raised whether this is inflation. To show how chaotic is the thinking about inflation I am going to read a statement from the minister's own speech in the parliament which declared war. He said, as recorded on page 137 of Hansard of September 12, 1939:

> First of all let me emphasize that however we finance the cost of the war, whether by taxation or by borrowing or by inflation, we cannot escape its real costs.

The minister will correct me if I am wrong in assuming that his advisers who advised him in the preparation of that speech meant by "inflation" the creation of money such as I have indicated.

Two or three nights ago the minister, I understand, made an appeal to the Ontario farmers. In that appeal he urged them to exercise self-control to avoid inflation. Obviously the minister did not mean the same thing in his use of the term "inflation" in his speech to the Ontario farmers that he means in the statement I have just quoted.

Mr. ILSLEY: In the speech to which my hon. friend refers, my remarks about self-discipline, self-organization—not self-control—were not directed to the Ontario farmers specifically; they were used generally as applying to all of us throughout Canada, whether farmers or anyone else. What I said had no specific or direct relation to inflation; I dealt with that in another part of my address.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Last fall the minister, I understand, made a speech which I did not hear. I am not condemning the minister; I am approving. I want to say right here and now that in my judgment the minister, under the system which he is electing to use, is doing a magnificent job; I am not condemning him in any way. As I was saying, last fall he made a speech, so it is reported to me, in which he said that inflation can and must or will be controlled. That was just prior to the announcement of the price ceiling. That statement indicated quite clearly that by that time the minister had come to use the word "inflation" in its correct meaning. That is, inflation is a rise in the price level. The eager way in which the minister, Mr. Donald Gordon and a number of others are urging the people at the present time to increase production, as a means obviously of offsetting inflationary tendencies, again indicates that they are now thinking in terms of reason and common sense. Inflation does not mean the government issue of money. Inflation is an effect; it is a rise in prices which results from a scarcity of goods, or from deliberate manipulation by someone who is handling the goods.

To show how urgent is this question of inflation, within the last week President Roosevelt made an appeal to the people of the United States concerning the necessity for resisting tendencies toward inflation. By this he undoubtedly meant rises in price owing to scarcity. Once we clear out of our minds the fallacious notion that inflation means increasing government money, or printing government money, then we are on a basis upon which we can build soundly; and knowing this about inflation we can see immediately that the printing of the Bradburys was not inflation. The printing of the $26,000,000 was not inflation. They might have caused inflation if there was a scarcity of goods, or if someone manipulated the prices of goods, or if prices were not controlled, but they themselves were not inflation.

Granted that there is an inflationary tendency, what can be done to prevent inflation? I have already indicated one or two of the devices that may be used. The first one is evidently price control. It matters not how much money there is in circulation; if the government insist that prices shall not go up, there cannot be a rise in price. May I pause here to commend the minister once more upon the success which has attended the very difficult experiment of price control in Canada. The prices are not all as they should be; I am sure the minister would be one of the first to acknowledge that. Nevertheless the device appears to be working effectively, and it has great possibilities for the future. In our discussion the important thing is that this price control was necessary to prevent inflation, even though there was no government issue of money. The nearest approach to it was the money the government were borrowing from the Bank of Canada, amounting to something more than $700,000,000 up to the present time.

All right, then; once we have laid down in our minds this concept that government issue is not inflation, that inflation is a rise in price and that inflation can be controlled in some measure or in large measure by price control, then we have made another step forward. I said a few moments ago that a rise in price results from scarcity. There is no member of this house who does not know that. For example, would someone explain the reason for the high price of potatoes at the present time, when there is not a province in the Dominion of Canada which cannot produce potatoes in superabundance, far beyond its needs? Why is that? It is that for the time being there is a scarcity of potatoes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is the price high?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Unusually high, I understand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There have been starvation prices for the last three years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I was told that in the stores of Ottawa during the last week one had to pay three and a half cents a pound, if I remember correctly.

Mr. ISNOR: That is an increase, but it is not too high.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not saying it is too high, but it is high relatively. For the last number of years people have been buying potatoes for much less than that. However, I would rather not get into any discussion on this matter of potatoes, although I am much interested. Once more no one knows just what price should be given for potatoes. But I will say this, that in my constituency and in my province, if the government were to guarantee a dollar a hundred pounds for potatoes it would have so many potatoes it would not know what to do with them.

Mr. BRADETTE: Not every year.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes, every year. I know whereof I speak; I come from Alberta.

Mr. BRADETTE: I grow potatoes, and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Very well. The important thing, the matter we are discussing at the present time, is the cause of the rise in price; and the major cause of the rise in price is scarcity. If you are going to resist a rise in price, obviously the thing to do is just what the minister is now doing—get more production.

Mr. GILLIS: Would the hon. member permit a question while he is on the matter of inflation? Is it necessary to freeze wages to avoid inflation?

Mr. BLACKMORE: No. There are a good many things I shall not have time to discuss in this connection, but which I could discuss.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But they have been frozen, have they not?

Mr. GILLIS: Yes.

Mr. BLACKMORE: They have been frozen. There are ways of getting round the difficulty, and strangely enough the hon. member's question leads directly to the next thing I was going to say. When we were over in England we were told that the British government, during the last year, paid a hundred million pounds to keep prices down. The minister's own officials are doing something like that in respect of several commodities. They are absorbing the additional cost in order to keep the price from rising. The British government, let me repeat, has, according to information which I have received, paid a hundred million pounds during the past year to keep prices down. That constitutes a price discount, and is a social credit technique, part of the just-price mechanism. The result is that prices do not rise, and you do not have inflation. Then I was told that this year the British government is paying £25,000,000 in bonuses to primary producers, bonuses somewhat similar to the additional price we are giving for our wheat. That device is planned to increase production. While I am on the subject may I point out to the minister something on which I may elaborate a little more later on. If he wants production let him guarantee profits and guarantee markets and guarantee credit facilities, and he will have production to the limit of the country's resources.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is nothing wrong with that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is quite sound. That is a way to get production and prevent inflation.

There is one more device which the minister has used only sparingly thus far, namely, rationing. We were quite startled in England to get our ration cards, and quite disappointed with the small amounts we were able to buy, but the ration card effectively prevented inflation, because people simply could not spend their money for the commodity in question. Therefore there could not be a buying pressure on the price of the commodity resulting in a rise. All these things have a tremendously important bearing on the matter of state issue of money. If the devices which are now being used in Canada and Great Britain had been used in the last war, the calamitous rise in prices would have been prevented during that war as well as they have been during this one. It would not have mattered where the money came from, whether it was borrowed from the people or the bank of Montreal, or whether it was created and issued by the dominion government treasury under the Finance Act of 1914, as it then was.

So much for that question. I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence which I have adduced up to the present is such as to cause any man with an open mind, ready and willing to learn—as everyone ought to be in these terrible times—to reflect on whether or not some of these policies which Canadians have believed in and applied in the past were not grossly fallacious, and whether something new could not be introduced into our financial system.

This gift has another important aspect. Great as it is, proud as the Canadian people, generally speaking, are that it is as great as it is, it is not nearly as great as it could be. There will be need for another gift like this, a much greater one next year, and a still greater one the following year. If these gifts can be financed without financial cost—they cannot be made without material or physical cost—look at the tremendous difference that this fact will make to the whole outlook of the Canadian people. The question will be asked why I say that our gift should be greater. I say that simply because our production in Canada does not approximate our possible production. One monstrous fallacy which for some reason or another is being spread throughout the country at the present time is that this country is nearing its peak of production. In his speech the other night the minister indicated that he had been infected by the advice of someone and apparently had the idea that we were coming near to our maximum production. I read these words from page 1402 of Hansard:

> As last year, we have aimed at a war programme which will represent the country's utmost capacity, the maximum which we can carry out with the physical and economic resources at our disposal.

I wonder whether the minister, when he used the word "economic", had in mind the amount of money which we can borrow or tax from the people and considered that to be the governing factor. I cannot tell; but if he had in mind only the physical possibilities of this country, then let me tell him that we are far from having reached our maximum. As an illustration, I refer to sugar. Will anyone in this country say that we are anywhere near our maximum production of sugar? This country which could produce twice its total consumption every year, is actually producing only about 18 per cent of its consumption? That mere statement of fact brands the minister's statement as ridiculous.

Think of our gasoline possibilities, our fuel possibilities. Think of the McMurray tar sands. Think of the possibilities of manufacturing fuel alcohol from potatoes and wheat. These have not even been considered, and then we are told that we are nearing our maximum production. Think of our iron and steel possibilities. Think of the fruits, the vegetables, we could produce, far beyond what we are doing at the present time.

Let me give an illustration by reference to milk and its products. Hon. members will remember that when they were boys, almost every family in the smaller communities had two, three or four cows. The children milked the cows and the mother prepared the butter. What has happened to-day throughout Canada in that respect? A large number of our younger people are growing up without having ever touched a cow. Let the price factor become attractive; let certain other conditions be brought about as a result of which it will be profitable to raise cows and produce butter, milk and cream, and what will the mothers and children from end to end of this dominion be doing to supplement the meagre family income? They will be producing butter.

Mr. HOMUTH: The boards of health would not let them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is a point. In other words, the boards of health would be helping to lose the war. That is something that I think they would hardly like to contemplate. If we want to increase production we must utilize the tremendous spare time energy of the Canadian people, the spare time of our children and our men and women who are not fully employed, our office workers who have free time after work. The hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) has referred to the health regulations. I am in favour of such regulations; nevertheless we lacked them when we were boys and we grew up pretty well.

If prices of wheat, potatoes and other commodities are set at a point where there is a certain profit realizable in their production, the minister will be astonished at the results. He will not need to go on the air and waste his precious time—it is precious—urging the people to produce. He will have as hard a time keeping them from producing as he has keeping the western farmer from producing extra wheat. The productive capacities of this country have hardly been scratched.

Then there is the matter of wages, referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis). Our wage structure is altogether unsatisfactory. There is no justice, no logic in it, but there is gross mismanagement in it. It is producing an undesirable psychological attitude in the minds of men, for which Canada will have to pay before we have finished.

There is another aspect to this wage question and this price question. If the men who are earning wages in this dominion were paid more wages, the minister would get more money for his victory loans. If producers of wheat, fruit, vegetables, poultry and other primary commodities were getting better prices, he would obtain greater revenues. He would be able to raise more money. That ought to be obvious. The minister wishes to pay as we go. By concentrating on just rewards for the primary producers and the wage-earners of this land, the minister will greatly expand the revenue producing capacities of this country, and at the same time he will have an increased production which will serve as a safeguard against inflation.

There is another aspect to this gift which I should like to discuss briefly. I wish to say in commendation of the minister that in making this gift to Britain he has manifested magnificent leadership. I think the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) indicated that yesterday.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope the hon. member will recall that I made the first suggestion in this house about a gift to Britain.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall remember that to the credit of the leader of the opposition for years to come. As I say, this is magnificent leadership. First it shows how international debts can be cancelled. Since I think that is quite clear, I shall not labour that point. Second, it shows us how we can help Britain. When I was in England I was impressed by the fact that many English manufacturers were deeply perturbed because they saw in the rapid development of industrialization in the self-governing dominions a threat to Britain's markets after the war, and those markets were meagre enough before. They simply could not see how they were going to be able to make sufficient income in their country. I believe the day will come when this war is over when Canada, Australia, New Zealand, the United States and other countries which are interested in the preservation of the old land, so that she may be a benefit to our children as she has been to us, must arrange a system of lease-lend in perpetuity to provide the mother country with her required raw materials. This is a step toward that end. If we can only finance this transaction without debt or taxation to ourselves, no one in Canada who is aware of that fact would object at all, for the gift to Britain would be as good as a foreign market to us regardless of whether or not we were able to take back anything from Britain.

In this measure we have discovered a means of getting markets without having additional foreign trade. I have found in this house a sort of trade-mindedness. People are obsessed with the idea that they cannot live unless they trade. But, Mr. Speaker, this billion dollar gift to Britain proves beyond a doubt that Canada can exist without additional foreign trade, for the farmers who produced the wheat, the pork and the butter were paid just as if they had received payment from Britain herself in connection with this billion dollar gift; so also were the manufacturers and others who produced munitions paid, and paid in Canada. If this process could have been accomplished without additional debt and additional taxation, there would have been nothing in this proposal but a blessing. We should have discovered how to get markets without having additional foreign trade.

But it shows something else that is important. It shows how goods can be given away. One thing which, frankly, Mr. Speaker, annoyed me last night, was a childish tendency on the part of several members to make foolish remarks about $25 a month. I maintain that in this parliament we have reached the point where we should cease to make remarks of that sort about any such proposal as a distribution of goods. If goods can be given to Britain, they can be given to Canadians. Once they are given to Canadians, the principle is established that you can give your people goods.

Mr. DONNELLY: Would the hon. member tell the house how much goods he would give to Japan or Germany to-day on their paper, with nothing to back it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: The question is a very good one, although a little off the subject, but I shall not hesitate to answer it. The simple fact of the matter is—I almost hesitate to say this because it may not be in our best interests—that if we had had a device similar to this to help the have-not nations and render their position less impossible, we might not be engaged at the present time in destroying some of the finest races in the world and ourselves being destroyed. Never mind about the paper. You are not asking for paper from Britain. Has the hon. member forgotten that we are not getting any paper from Britain for this billion dollar gift? Then why should we worry about the quality of the paper from Japan or Germany we might receive in return for any distribution we may choose to make to them?

The hon. member's question brings me to another aspect of this question. In the new order which is to be established after this awful experience is over, some means must be discovered whereby the people who have bountiful resources will be able to contribute, without unbearable costs, to the sustenance of the people who have not bountiful resources. In other words, it must be made possible for the people who have not, to get support and assistance from the people who have, and this possibility is indicated by this fine new bit of leadership in this legislation.

To summarize—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. WILFRID LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in the discussion, having already expressed my opinion during the debate on the speech from the throne at which time I stated my opposition to any billion dollar gift to the British government.

I wish first to offer my sincere congratulations to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), who very clearly expressed his point of view. However, after listening to the general debate and to the explanations furnished this house, I have come to the conclusion that the proposed increase does but strengthen the argument I set forth during the discussion of the throne speech. In fact, Mr. Speaker, we propose to give to Britain, that is the exact term, a billion dollars, that is to authorize the British government to purchase in Canada a billion dollars' worth of supplies of all kinds, food, tanks, airplanes, and so on. Now the cost of this billion dollar gift, plus the seven hundred millions we are loaning Great Britain without interest, must necessarily be borne, that is as far as the billion dollars are concerned, by the people of Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, during the debate on this proposal, I noted that nationals of Great Britain hold about one billion, seven hundred million dollars' worth of Canadian securities, or in other words that we owe England approximately one billion, seven hundred million dollars that must be repaid some day. Why not simply have advanced this amount of one billion to her in exchange for British-held Canadian securities?

To my mind, such a transaction would have prevented this fantastic burdening of our budget and avoided us the necessity of including in it this year a payment of about $25 million which the Canadian people will have to effect. For we must not forget that $700 million are to be loaned interest free, and that $1,000,000,000 will be given outright. I could not let such a proposal be adopted without officially recording my opinion in the matter. The Canadian people are already experiencing a great deal of difficulty in meeting their present obligations. These obligations, born of the war, are becoming more onerous every day, yet the people have met them without flinching. They are doing their best to win the war, even to the extent of going without some of the necessaries of life. We all want to win this war, but I think the government should have refrained from placing this additional burden on the shoulders of our people, especially since we are giving to richer than ourselves. Indeed, it is a well-known fact that England herself recently loaned China $250 million. Canada is making an all-out effort and in our province the French-Canadian element is doing its large share. Unfortunately, and this is a point I would like to stress, the fact does not seem to be taken sufficiently into account in certain administrative quarters, although recruiting figures in the province of Quebec are as eloquent of our loyalty as those in any other province.

In the civil service, our fellow citizens of French-Canadian origin appear to be kept completely in the background. I have here before me a list published in February's edition of Canadian Business, entitled: "Who's Who in Wartime Prices and Trade Board." It is a rather long list of the officials of the wartime prices and trade board. It will be noted that out of 222 positions listed, there are only about 20 held by French-Canadians. This is less than 10 per cent, and yet the French element forms one-third of our total population. Whenever it is a matter of military enlistments, commentaries abound on our representation in the armed forces, yet when it is a question of handing out well-paid jobs, the boot is on the other foot.

Mr. Speaker, there is another matter I would like to broach in this brief address, and that is the question of friendly understanding in the country. Since we are discussing a measure concerning financial aid to Great Britain, it seems to me that just recognition should be given to the province of Quebec's tremendous effort in the financial field. Our province strongly supported the victory loan subscribing as generously as any other, and I would like to see the enthusiasm shown for the victory loan, this enthusiastic response to the government's appeal for funds in view of its war effort, more fully recognized by our army officers, especially in the higher brackets.

I have here Report No. 47, sent by the military intelligence section, Department of National Defence, Ottawa, to all district commanding officers as well as to other officers. It is entitled "Summary of Intelligence from Military Districts". Paragraph 13 includes a report from the intelligence officer of the fortress of Halifax, which reads as follows:

> Unit reports contain many references to H.D. personnel. The general feeling is one of disappointment in regard to the manpower policy. This tends to undermine that confidence which is essential to esprit de corps. General opinion is that the province of Quebec is responsible for non-enforcement of conscription. This belief, whether based on fact or fallacy, is producing disunity. French-speaking Canadians are regarded with some distrust, irrespective of how patriotic they may in reality be. This distrust originates in the prevalent belief that Quebec is hindering an all-out war effort, that Quebec people are unpatriotic or spineless. If these beliefs are without foundation, the people of Quebec are being done a great injustice; if they are founded on fact, then the rest of Canada is forced to suffer at the hands of a minority. Army personnel is puzzled because "platitudes do not explain circumstances".

The military intelligence section, Department of National Defence, draws the following conclusion from that paragraph:

> No matter how unfounded such views may be, the foregoing item is included to indicate the opinion of a section of the active army.

I wish to ask the government, and particularly the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) whether they intend to let such pernicious propaganda be carried on, at the expense of the country, against the French Canadians who have enlisted in the army.

In fact, those reports sent out by the intelligence service at Ottawa to all officers and district commanding officers are such as to arouse in the minds of those army officers hostile feelings towards the French Canadians who belong to the army. Because those reports are distributed by the government and form, as it were, the journal of all army officers, a secret journal perhaps, secretly distributed, but none the less a journal, I believe they are bound to arouse within the army feelings that make for antagonism on the part of officers against new recruits from our province. I demand that remedial action be taken immediately, and I wish to voice a formal protest against the mentality which exists in the Department of National Defence at Ottawa.

Before concluding I must say how much I regret that the following statements should have been made in an advertisement published by the Department of National Revenue. The plebiscite is discussed therein and as a conclusion to this advertisement entitled "As I See It":

> In a few weeks time, this country is holding a plebiscite, when our people will be free to answer "Yes" or "No" to a question, or not to vote at all.
> As I see it,—Hitler would vote "No". Quisling would not vote, Canadians will vote "Yes".

That is signed "Colin Gibson, Minister of National Revenue."

Well, Mr. Speaker, if a plebiscite is to be held throughout the country, as well as in the province of Quebec, it means that the government are asking the people to express their opinion. The people are quite free to vote "yes" or "no." Why should a government official tell them beforehand that if they vote "no" they will brand themselves as Hitler's followers? In Quebec as indeed in all other provinces, many people will probably vote "no." I submit that those who vote "no" are not followers of Hitler but people who, believing in the justice of the cause, want victory for the allies, for democracy and for this country. That is why they want to win the war. They wish above all to ensure the defence of our own territory which is now threatened and I am convinced that whatever decision the electors take when voting on the plebiscite will be in favour of the defence of Canada, our country. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that any man whose main ambition is to defend his country is not necessarily in league with our enemies. He is not necessarily a follower of Hitler; on the contrary he wants to ensure the defence of his country against any attack by Hitler and the Germans.

We have here in Canada vast areas of land as large as the whole of Europe itself; our coastlines are fully as long as those of that continent, yet we have only a very small population to ensure the defence of the country.

Australia made the mistake of sending her troops overseas and to-day she finds herself faced with direct attack by a rapidly advancing enemy. What is her position? She is obliged to recall troops serving in Libya or elsewhere, in order to organize her own defence. In view of the sacrifices we have already made, in view of the 500,000 men already under arms, a great many of whom are at present in Great Britain, helping in her defence, I believe that our first duty at the moment is to devote all our energies to the defence of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I contend that any man who terms a French Canadian or an English Canadian voting "no" in the plebiscite a supporter of Hitler, is not telling the truth, and that he is spreading propaganda designed to ensure an affirmative vote. This, I believe, is the worst possible form of propaganda. When the government asks to be released from their commitments, they are within their rights. When they ask the people to answer "yes," they are within their rights. But, Mr. Speaker, the very principle of the plebiscite is freedom of expression, without any prejudice to the opinion which may be expressed at the polls by those who will be called upon to do so, whatever their answer may be. If we want to preserve mutual understanding in this country, as I ardently wish, if we want to maintain national unity, as I profoundly hope, if we want to be united in a fruitful common endeavour capable of leading us to eventual victory, if such be our purpose, then let the people decide for themselves in peace and tranquillity according to the dictates of conscience, to their own sentiment, and I am convinced that such sentiment will be truly Canadian and one which, once the plebiscite is over, shall truly represent national sentiment in this country.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I rise to support the principle of this legislation. As I listened to the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) my thoughts ran back to the time some eleven years ago when it was my privilege to occupy the same seat that the hon. member now graces. The opinions I expressed when I had the privilege of introducing a resolution having to do with the expansion of empire trade, and the thoughts that ran through my mind when I gave expression to those opinions at that time, were in decided contrast to those which emanated from the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I was one of those who realized at that time—with all due deference to my leader (Mr. Hanson), who says that perhaps he was the first to originate this idea—that if we look through the history of mankind and of civilization we can come to but one conclusion, and that is the conclusion summed up in the hackneyed phrase that the greatest agency for good which we have known in modern times, which modern history has presented to us, has been that agency for good known as Britain and the British empire. We must preserve that agency if we want to preserve our way of life. That is patent; it is obvious on the very surface. Well, here is an opportunity for every one of us to rise in his place and support this billion dollar credit which is going to make it possible for us to help hold the position we now have.

It is quite sound to issue warnings such as came from the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Blackmore) to-day with regard to the cost. The cost must not be excessive, he says. Of course it must not be excessive; it must be right and fair in all industries. One piece of work which we have to do here is to see that it is. We know that the minister will surround the legislation with safeguards of all kinds; but if he does not, if the safeguards are not there, then our task as members of this house is to see that they are put into the legislation.

The hon. member for Yorkton (Mr. Castleden), speaking yesterday, quoted professors in regard to the cost of producing wheat, and he said that the farmers would probably get less than production costs. I doubt whether there is any merit in that, but we have our committee on agriculture which is studying the problem and we can make sure that they get their costs. I am doubtful whether Britain will want wheat in this billion dollar credit, or at any rate any sizeable quantity of wheat, so that perhaps the hon. member's worry in that regard will be rather unjustified. I do not think it will be as serious as he wants us to believe, from the speech he made yesterday. It is more important that we get to Britain the very best we have in planes and tanks, guns and munitions, supplies and foodstuffs.

This morning I received two letters from overseas postmarked field post office, February 28. In one letter it is stated that a young man named George Willis, who played centre-half for Western university, was in the channel show. His plane came back, and it was a pretty good plane; but the author of this letter says he is satisfied that Canada can produce better and bigger and safer planes for our boys. Let us therefore get this billion dollar credit through and supply them with better and bigger planes. He also says in the same letter that they are hearing about the plebiscite over there. My hon. friend who took his seat a moment ago also said something about that. In passing I would quote the opinion expressed in this letter, that they are extremenly perplexed about it. I wonder whether the emissaries that have gone to take the vote might not have served a better purpose had they been emissaries who would help in our general industrial picture. I say that because I think we should see to it that we get the right kind of supplies to Britain. I shall have more to say about that in a moment, but in order to keep the discussion straight I would answer some points raised by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) last night—and I couple him with the hon. member who has just taken his seat and my monosolo friend who represents the single-man party in the far corner of the house. Listening to their speeches I sometimes wonder what good they are doing the general cause. This letter says: "The last two nights Lord Haw-Haw has really been"—to use his own language—"razzing Mr. Churchill." Then further on:

> It seems too bad the way Haw-Haw rants Churchill. It reminds me somewhat of a debate I heard on one occasion in the House of Commons.

I thought when I read that that those who have decried statesmen in the United Kingdom and elsewhere the world over who are serving their country as best they know how, even as our men are trying to do to-day, and called them names—these hon. gentlemen, like the hon. member for Témiscouata, are the Haw-Haws of Canada at the present time. Words which emanate from them find their way into the minds of malcontents and dissatisfied people, with the result that in my opinion they are not doing any service to Canada. I heard it said within the last month, by one who had spent a good deal of his time in France, that one of the difficulties France had in the ten years before she fell was the expression by those who occupied seats in a chamber similar to this of views which did not make for unity in that country. I say to my hon. friends that the views they are now expressing are not making for unity in this country.

Think of our friends in Quebec province—when I say Quebec province I mean it in the sense of the geographical boundaries, and when I refer to the maritime provinces the same applies. I say to my hon. friends from Quebec province that we in Ontario have a great deal of admiration for them. The hon. member for Témiscouata last night referred to that committee for total war "from Toronto". Just keep the record straight; hon. members know that the two hundred who happened to meet in Toronto—Toronto is a meeting place; that is what the Indian word means—might just as well have met in Montreal. And when his opinion is reinforced by one I heard expressed by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay), that these people from the vicinity of Toronto have been in Canada for only five or ten or fifteen years and that they should go back and defend their country while the hon. member stays here and defends Canada—sentiments of that kind do not help towards unity in this country and do not help the cause which this bill is trying to further. We have had enough of that. The time has come when we should address ourselves to an all-out war effort in accordance with the legislation that is handed to us, and if we can add anything to it in a constructive way, it is our duty, as I see it, so to do.

I am hopeful that this legislation will help our Canadian position from this point of view. The United States-United Kingdom lease-lend legislation, as the minister well knows, had some restrictions with regard to exportable surpluses from the United Kingdom. I do not think the word "preference" was used, but the United States under the terms of that agreement had a first call on those exportable surpluses, with the result now that Canada in her effort to get essentiality certificates for some materials which are not manufactured or produced here in sufficient quantities finds that the United States priority or preference is taking those exportable surpluses. This legislation and this credit which we are granting now will in my opinion help the minister and help Canada to get a fair portion of these exportable surpluses and put us in a stronger position than formerly obtained.

I hope when the minister gets this bill into the committee that he will enlarge on that point. As he well knows, the empire trade agreements, of which he was a supporter and for which we give him credit, tended to allocate blocks of production among the different units of the empire. For instance, we allocated to his constituency the matter of apples—that is on the food side. But on the manufacturing side preferences were arranged in such a way that we in Canada did not push the production of certain commodities which perhaps it is not economical for us to produce, or which it was more economical for the United Kingdom, or Australia or the other signatories to the empire trade agreement to produce, with the result that trade has got into these grooves, in quotas or blocks. Now the United States-United Kingdom lease-lend act has taken priority over this quota arrangement, and Canada in turn in many lines of industry is not able to increase production quickly enough to take up the slack, the slack being the quota which she previously imported from the United Kingdom or Australia and which we were encouraged to import to help provide the United Kingdom with the Canadian dollars which she so badly needs. We thought we were doing our patriotic duty in that regard, and we were. But as I say, one of the brightest spots in this legislation is the fact that now we have this extra lever, as it were, to help us to get a fair proportion of the quotas which Canada was previously accustomed to receive.

These restrictions and inhibitions of one kind and another which face us from day to day also have some bearing on the supplies that we shall receive from Britain and on this particular bill. I was thinking of the gasoline restriction. Of course we have to have gasoline restriction; it really means rubber restriction. I was struck by what the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) had to say about one very large item of import which comes from the United Kingdom, namely, liquor. This parliament through its gasoline controller and rubber controller controls in a measure that trade, in harmony with the different provinces. I am of opinion that legislation could be devised to control the flow of liquor—"ration" is perhaps a better word—which might be made available to our people. What applies to that applies also to beer. Something of the kind is perhaps overdue at the present time. We have to beware of the juice which comes out of the swamp or the bottom of the corn silo; we have to see to it also that the pick and shovel man, the workman who is accustomed to a glass of beer, can have it if he wants it. But I question whether clerks and other white collar folk, male and female, should be allowed to have unlimited quantities of these commodities. I am firmly of opinion that our people are improving in that regard. Looking out of my window at the Chateau Laurier at one-thirty this morning I saw only one car on Connaught square or the driveway. Peacock Alley is deserted; the mezzanine floor is very quiet. Perhaps these places could be turned into accommodation for the dollar a year men. The cocktail party rooms are very quiet, and in my opinion we are getting better and better. Our people are getting away from the Alice in Wonderland idea which an hon. member mentioned last night; they are getting around more to the Joseph in Egypt idea, and I believe the minister and all the rest of us should encourage our people to be more provident and to put away something for the difficult days ahead.

That thought ran through my mind particularly this morning, when I heard over the radio that ceiling prices might be applied to maple products, maple syrup, maple sugar and so on. I recall being at the Smithfield market in London some two or three years before the war, and seeing a complete exhibit of Quebec maple products. I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that the maple products not only of Quebec but of all parts of Canada should be developed to the full this year. Every possible tree should be tapped; every possible pound of that product should be made. The price structure is such as to encourage that; and while no details were given over the radio, I hope those administering the price ceiling will make it sufficiently elastic so that every possible pound of these products may be made, so that this year we may again decorate the Smithfield market and all the other markets of the United Kingdom with these commodities.

We have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) who comes from the maritime provinces, as does my hon. leader (Mr. Hanson), the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley), who spoke last evening, and one or two other hon. members at present in the house. Referring to the maritimes as a geographical section of our country, it is simply too bad that the people of those provinces cannot produce enough meat products to feed themselves. They are producing only a little more than half what is required to meet their own requirements. We in Canada may have to go on rations if we hope to be able to send large quantities of some meat products to Britain under this measure. Even our friends in Quebec do not produce sufficient meat products to feed themselves. Ontario and western Canada have to send some of their surplus to feed that half of our people. We should be sending all our surplus to Britain under this legislation. I have forgotten how many million pounds of bacon and pork products we are going to be short in our shipments to Britain this year; and next year we will be short four times that amount. In the kindest possible way I say to our friends from east of Montreal: grow every possible pound of meat products you can produce, in order that you may at least come close to feeding yourselves in this regard.

Britain is delivering the goods to us, and is cutting down the home consumption of certain commodities in order to do so. I am going to make one further suggestion, which I think perhaps has some constructive merit. Most of us have had the privilege of packing boxes for shipment overseas; I think eleven pounds is the limit we are allowed to send. Very often we put in those boxes English biscuits, English marmalades, English pipes and tobaccos—this Storm King pipe, for example, is English—English Rolls razors and razor blades, English plum puddings, and tea packed in England. Undoubtedly many of these things were sent back to England, particularly at Christmas time. The Postmaster General will know the correct figure, but I am sure at least 400,000 parcels have been sent to our boys overseas; and at the low valuation of $5 each this would mean $2,000,000 worth of products. Well, if only one-quarter of that total consisted of English goods there would be a saving in shipping space back and forth equal to what would be required for half a million dollars' worth of merchandise. Surely it would not be a very big job to set up and control, perhaps through our high commissioner's office in England, a depot from which these delicacies —and they are delicacies, because the people of no other country know how to pack these particular articles—could be distributed. There could be a clearing station there, so that we in Canada could give Britain our Canadian dollars—and we are glad to do it—and an agency there could pack and ship the goods to our boys. England must deliver goods to us, but she could do so in this way, so that these candied fruits and other things that we send our boys could be delivered there. At the Chateau Laurier to-day I picked up a package of tobacco that came from England—

Mr. REID: Would not most of these articles have come to Canada prior to the war?

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): I was looking at the import figures, and they are still coming in very substantial measure. I could hardly catch what my hon. friend said, because of the Scotch burr in his voice. I am quite sure the Scotch goods are coming over in ever-increasing quantities, though I hope they are not being shipped back to our boys in the overseas parcels.

Then another thought occurred to me, to which I gave expression on a previous occasion, concerning the same problem that faced us in regard to producing sufficient of certain commodities to satisfy our own Canadian requirements. That had to do with people in England in the sixty to seventy year old bracket, who find themselves without vocations due to the fact that their plants have been bombed out, and there is no hope of being able to rebuild them until after the war. Many of these people have expert knowledge, not of running machines, for I am not thinking of mechanics, but of processes in different lines of industry such as the manufacture of soap, if you like, or something like that. At the same time similar industries in Canada are faced with a shortage of machinery and equipment. So that the possibility of transplanting entire industries to Canada, together with some of the older or handicapped men who might be spared, in my opinion is something to which we should give thought, and to which encouragement could be given under this legislation.

I want to warn our people about the complacency which seems to possess them. As the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) said, they seem to think that "it can't happen here." It can happen here, and we must stir up our people to greater activities in every line of endeavour. Even the people in our financial circles seem to take things for granted. I hold in my hand a card which a man presented to me in my office in 1938, the year before war was declared. He asked for his card back, but when I saw what was on it I retained it and I still have it. He carried with him an introduction from one of the banks of Canada backing him to the extent of $100,000 in any transaction that he might consummate. This cards reads as follows:

Dr. Ing. Ernst H. Bluman
Director der Vereinigte Stearinwerke G.M.B.H.
Hamburg, Germany, Tel. 34.6021/23.

That means that he was a director of the stearine manufacturing industries of Germany. His address on this continent was the hotel Gladstone, 114 East 52nd Street, New York city. This was just before the war, and yet this gentleman, who was a high ranking officer in the German army, was backed to the extent of $100,000 by one of our financial institutions. Perhaps I may explain that stearic acid comes from the manufacture of glycerine. One hundred pounds of stearine makes thirteen pounds of glycerine and eighty-seven pounds of stearic acid. I cannot help but think of the complacency of the head of that financial institution who just before the war was quite willing to introduce a German spy to industry in this country. It just shows that this complacency is not found just among our ordinary citizens; it seems to have entered into the whole fabric of the Canadian people. This illustration may not be the right sort to use, but it just shows how we are thinking.

In my opinion we are not doing nearly enough. Why not? Not only do those of us who sit on this side of the house find it difficult to find places to exercise our talents, if we have any; there does not seem to be any power emanating from this chamber which is ready to tap the people on the shoulder and tell them that they must do such and so. I think something my hon. leader said fits the occasion better than anything I can think of. We seem to be surrounded by a sense of frustration. During the sittings of the war expenditures committee last summer certain hon. members seemed to feel that at times they had a political duty to perform. That spirit was not apparent very much, but it was apparent too much. I see evidence in this chamber every day that hon. members think they have a political function to perform for their own particular party. They do not nail to the mast-head a really all-out war effort. If we are going to win through we must submerge our own narrow partisan viewpoints and give to Canada more and more of an all-out war effort. If we do that, others will follow our example; others will be encouraged to do likewise. The Right Honourable Winston Churchill referred to those who sit back, the slackers. The day has come when we must tap them on the shoulder and tell them what they must do.

I am satisfied that we are going to win through. I am optimistic about that. We must do away with any idea that this is a land of afternoon pink tea parties, or, as someone mentioned, a land of cocktail parties. There is no room here for pink tea Johnnies and others who attend such functions. We are in a very serious business. Therefore I entreat all members of the house, all the people of Canada, to knuckle down to a really all-out war effort.

It matters not if my grandparents came from England a hundred years ago and yours came from some other country four hundred years ago; we are equally Canadian. I implore my hon. friend, who I see has just come back into the chamber, not to talk about 1666. We will stand side by side with you, not only here in Canada to protect this country but in the first line of defence in the United Kingdom. I say to my hon. friend that the St. Lawrence river and the gulf of St. Lawrence will not always be packed with ice; there will come a bright, sunny day when something may slip up that river. Then you will be in difficulty and we will not be nearly as complacent about what our duty is with regard to Canada. The descendants of those who came here with Wolfe's highlanders and fought on the plains of Abraham, of those who came over on the steamship Hector many generations ago—their great grandparents are buried here. They are anxious to protect this land. They realize where the first line of defence is. What obtains in the east obtains to the same degree, if not more so, on the west coast.

Our first line of defence will not be just the west coast line, although it is a line of defence; it is likely to be back in the Rocky mountains. We must show a united front. I want to be able to answer this letter from overseas and tell the men over there not to be perplexed about what Canada is going to do. This perplexity comes from utterances such as those of the hon. member for Témiscouata. Let us all fight in the first line of defence so that civilization as we know it may survive and not be placed under the heel of the dictator.

Mr. SPEAKER: Shall the motion carry?

Mr. LaCROIX (Quebec-Montmorency): On division.

Motion agreed to on division and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There were certain things which during the course of my few remarks I suggested might be explained by the minister. I think I was under a misapprehension with respect to the nature of the $700,000,000 item. Upon reading the minister's remarks I should like to ascertain whether the sterling assembled in England amounting to $700,000,000 represents domestic securities of Canada which were issued in sterling currency and held by British nationals and vested in the British government under the treasury order referred to, or does it represent dominion or dominion guaranteed securities. These securities are being held as collateral for the obligations of the British government, which are to be expressed in terms of Canadian dollars. I should like to have this point made plain.

I think the minister should tell the house and the people of Canada just how it is proposed to spend this money—just how much will be in one category, how much will be in another, and under whose auspices the purchases are to be made. Are they to be on requisition of supplies from the British government, or are we to be on our own in procuring these supplies? I assume that some plan has been prepared. If not, a plan should be prepared, and we should be told not only in general but with some particularity the government's proposals for the expenditure of this money. It is a huge sum of money and, as has been correctly stated, it, or at least a substantial part of it, will be added to the debt of this country. Doubtless some of the money will be obtained by taxation. I may have something to say about that method of raising the money at a later stage, but not now, because I do not want to delay the committee. But having adopted the principle of this billion dollar gift, which, after all, is not a gift but the payment of an obligation, we should have from the minister some statement of how the money is to be allocated.

First I think we should have a statement of how the minister proposes to raise the money. I am not going to follow the suggestion made by the hon. member for Lethbridge, that the money should be raised by his particular brand of financing, but I do say we should know how much we are to borrow and how much we are to raise by taxation. Then how much does the minister estimate will flow back into the federal treasury and into provincial and municipal treasuries by way of taxation, because I anticipate that a very large portion of this money will come back into provincial and municipal treasuries and the greater portion reflow into the federal treasury.

I am at the moment thinking of the control of this expenditure. It is important that we be told what control there is to be of the expenditure. I am assuming that the government already has a plan and that the minister will reveal it here to-day or at some stage of the proceedings.

I am wondering whether there is going to be any politics in the expenditure of this money. I hope not; but having regard to what has occurred in days gone by—not so much now as in the earlier stages of the war—we should be told whether or not there is to be any politics in this expenditure. I do know that there has been injected into our spending the question of political expediency. I do not think there is nearly as much politics to-day in the expenditure of moneys voted by parliament for the war effort as there was in the earlier stages, but I am telling the house and the country that so far as the peace-time activities of the government are concerned, there is still a selected list and the government's peace-time expenditures are still being made on the basis of political friendship. There are still standing in the public offices of this country selected lists of persons who are to be asked to do thus and so for a consideration from the public treasury; and other people, just as in peace time, have no right even to be asked if they are willing to supply the goods.

With respect to foodstuffs, will the principle of public tender be invoked, and to what extent? I have just heard a startling rumour, and I am going to ask the minister if it is correct, that the Department of Finance is no longer giving information, after a contract is let, and after the contract is completed—contracts that may have been let under the tender system—and I ask the minister whether it is true that they will not now give information as to what the competitive bids were. I am afraid that rumour is only too well founded, but if it is not, the minister will correct me and make the position abundantly clear. If it is correct, the ordinary peace-time modus operandi of government expenditures has now gone by the board. We no longer have details of government expenditure appearing in the auditor general's report. That is abundantly clear to everyone who looks at the report. How much do you know from that report about the ordinary peace-time expenditures of this country? Certain large items appear, we know, but just how much do the Canadian people know of where the money is going.

I had a communication from a distinguished Canadian to-day with regard to the moneys that were raised in the recent victory loan campaign in a particular province which had done, I thought, exceptionally well. Now that the loan is over, I think the Canadian people are to be congratulated upon having responded in the magnificent way they did to the country's call—assuming that you approve this method of financing, which I think most of us do. But this distinguished Canadian said to me: "What are you doing to see that this money is properly expended and that we get one hundred cents of value for every dollar of it that is spent?" That was a question which caused me to pause and ask myself, what am I doing? I have some responsibility; you have some responsibility; and the responsibility is on the minister above everyone else because he is the watch dog of the treasury.

I think the Canadian people ought to have from the minister a statement of government policy, and one of the fundamental things the minister should tell us is that political partisanship, political favouritism, is barred in connection with the expenditure of the money that was raised by taxation and loans from the whole Canadian people. We have still got the party system in Canada. How can a government which carries on under that system divorce itself from all the curses that go with that system? That is the question I put to the Minister of Finance. How far has the government divested itself of that in war time? We know that in the first two months of the war our war effort was a moderate effort. I am not going to go back over that, but we know that after Dunkirk and the fall of France, about June, 1940, this government increased the tempo of Canada's war effort.

What was their criterion at that time as to finance and the expenditure of public money? The only criterion was the speed—how quickly could we get this thing done? I do not ask hon. members to take my word for it; I ask them to accept the words of the Minister of National Defence for Air, who from his place in this chamber made what was, I think, the most candid declaration I ever heard by a cabinet minister. He said that the chief thought behind the effort of the government, of his department in particular—and I think he was speaking more particularly of his department—was speed, and that they were not giving any consideration to the question of value received.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think he said that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, probably I am going just a little too far. But I know this—

Mr. HOMUTH: "Less consideration", he said.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On a comparative basis, that speed and nothing else was the motivating principle.

Mr. ILSLEY: He did not say "nothing else".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That was the underlying theme of the minister's statement. I have not his words in front of me; these thoughts just came to me when I was speaking. But is there anyone here who heard him who does not remember that that was the factor on which he laid stress; that that was the motivating factor of the government—of his department, at all events—to get speed, without particular regard, I will say, to the question of value received?

I want the minister to be as candid with this committee as it is possible for him to be. The Canadian people, I believe, trust the Minister of Finance; most of them think he has done a pretty good job. I think so. I am candid; I want to say that. The minister has an enormous burden on his shoulders. But he is the head of the treasury, responsible to the people of Canada. He is the man who asks them to furnish him with the money, and they look to him to see to it that they get value for their money. Are they getting it? Are the administrators of the armed forces showing an example to the people of Canada in preserving commodities which are scarce? I have a letter to-day with respect to this very question of gasoline rationing and the allied question of rubber saving, pointing out to me—what I know from personal observation—that in the army, in the administrative staffs at these various places, nobody walks: if they have to go two blocks they ride in an automobile which the government services with gasoline.

Mr. MacNICOL: And leave the engine running.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. In front of my own home in the city of Fredericton is a military hospital the use of which has been donated by connections of mine free of charge to the government. I have counted ten automobiles in front of that hospital in the winter time, several of them with the engines running. Nobody walks but the buck private.

Mr. GRAY: 'Twas ever thus.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a confession of defeat—to say that it was ever thus. Somebody must take hold of this situation.

Mr. GRAY: I am not condoning it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know. I agree; you and I are not condoning it. I cannot stop it, but I am asking the government to do something about it. To say that it was ever thus is the confession of a defeatist. Let us not be defeatist. Let us put our hands to the plough here to-day and say that waste—waste of the people's money, waste of scarce gasoline, wastage in every line—shall henceforth be taboo.

I had not intended to say anything like as much as I have said. But I want the minister to tell us how he proposes to spend this money—under what auspices, by what means —and give us a reassurance that it is not to be spent to build up the fortunes of the Liberal party.

In the days of peace we would never have thought of passing an appropriation for $10,000,000 for expenditure by order in council without having all kinds of guarantees of how it would be spent—by a public tender system and what not. But we have departed from the well-known paths of duty to the Canadian taxpayer with respect to the expenditure of public money, because of the pressure of war. My friend the hon. member for Davenport calls attention to what occurred in 1930 in this very chamber, when the prime minister of the day asked for an appropriation of $20,000,000 for relief. I see in front of me three hon. gentlemen who were sitting over here at the time. They will recall—and I am not complaining about this—how for thirty days or more that appropriation was held up, when there were people who had been denied relief and were actually hungry. I do not say that my hon. friends exceeded their duty. I always thought they went a little beyond what was necessary. But they were playing politics in a large degree at that time—

Mr. MacNICOL: Nothing else.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —and that was part of the game. The situation is different now for all of us, and I ask the Minister of Finance to give this committee a reassuring statement with respect to the principle for which I am trying to contend in a rather haphazard and discursive way.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

We support the principle of this measure. We do it with the best of good-will for the objective which the government has. Now reassure us that the people's money will be properly expended. Tell us how you propose to do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I will begin by dealing with the earlier points. The leader of the opposition asked me about the vesting of securities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a technical matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: All I can say is that the government and railway securities which we propose to repatriate are being vested, as it is called, in the British government; that operation will take place or be completed on the twenty-third day of this month, and we are very anxious to get the securities here as soon after that date as possible. That is one of the reasons why I asked the house to facilitate the passing of this bill before the Easter recess.

Of course there is another reason. The effective date of the beginning of this gift will be early in March, and to the extent of $70,000,000 or $80,000,000 this bill has the character of a supplementary appropriation. For that reason also I should like to have it passed by the house before the Easter recess.

With regard to the arrangements for the expenditure of the money, the ordering of goods from Canada by Great Britain will go on, so far as I know, in the coming year just as it has in the past.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Through the same agencies?

Mr. ILSLEY: Through the same agencies. The wheat board will continue to make sales of wheat through the agencies which they use, the agency of the British government which buys wheat.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In that connection, is there any information with respect to how much wheat they will take—

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —having regard to what is occurring in Great Britain? The minister knows, does he not, that the British government are accelerating by bonus and otherwise the production of more wheat in England. On the other hand they are cutting down the consumption of wheat flour in bread.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know how much wheat England will take. Something will depend on shipping conditions, among other factors; but no matter how much Great Britain stimulates the domestic production of wheat she will take a substantial quantity of wheat from Canada if it is possible for us to ship it. With regard to the main purchases by the United Kingdom in Canada, they are made through the agency of the Canadian Department of Munitions and Supply, which buys in Canada for the United Kingdom government, and that will continue in the future as in the past. There will be no change, so far as I know, or have heard, in the channels of supply of goods or in the arrangements for the ordering, the purchase and supply of goods to Great Britain. There will be a price on all these goods. They will be sold at prices as usual. The price of bacon will be fixed; I think I am correct in saying that it has been fixed for the year beginning the first of October, if I remember rightly. The price of cheese either has been or will be fixed; and the wheat board will make its sales of wheat having regard to the regular market considerations which affect the price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are those conditions to-day in regard to wheat?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not in my department and I would not care to go into that. I do not want to get on to wheat again if I can help it; but so far as arrangements are concerned, no new arrangements are contemplated. The hon. gentleman said something about the importance of getting value for the money that is spent by the Canadian government. Needless to say, I wholly agree with him in that, so much so that when I get the kind of letters that all of us receive, and which he gets, pointing out instances of what is or appears to be extravagance in governmental expenditures, I always take it up with the departments concerned, and in practically all cases there is a fairly satisfactory explanation. I do not want to get deflected into petty details at all, but as an example I might mention an incident that came to my notice not long ago which impressed me. A letter was received from the secretary of an organization in one of the western cities, a lady, who said that her organization had been promoting the sale of war savings certificates and one of the main obstacles they had to encounter was the feeling among the merchants of the city that the government had been extravagant in the furnishing of officers' quarters at a manning pool in the city; and some details were given which showed a rather luxurious scale of furnishing of the quarters, or so I thought. I took that up with the Department of National Defence for Air and I found that the expenditure by the government there had been, if I remember correctly, just under $3,000 and the expenditure of donated money had been about $6,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would it be excusable to squander donated money?

Mr. ILSLEY: The money was not donated to the government and the government had no control over it.

Mr. MacINNIS: It would be given to the officers.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; it was money given these men to buy chesterfields—

Mr. MacNICOL: They should not be allowed to do it in war time.

Mr. ILSLEY:—furniture, and so forth. These ladies who were trying to sell war savings certificates ran into the complaint everywhere they went, that the government had spent all this money, and I was able to clear that up. I gave that as an instance to show that in a great many cases which I have taken up with the spending departments the complaint has been susceptible of explanation and has been explained. I pointed out to my correspondents that in a huge war effort such as ours there will be a great many individuals in responsible positions whose performance will be far from perfection, and whose operations are not amenable to complete control, and that therefore there will be some money wasted. But all I can say is that I believe my colleagues do the best they can to keep as tight a rein as possible on expenditures. The great spending department is the Department of Munitions and Supply and I have a great deal of confidence in that department. The leader of the opposition asked if there were not patronage lists. He did not use that term but he described patronage lists pretty accurately in the language he used. So far as I am aware, there have been no patronage lists from the beginning of the war, and I do not think that is the case. If you will look at the personnel of the Department of Munitions and Supply I do not think—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not speaking of war expenditures at all but of ordinary peace-time expenditures.

Mr. ILSLEY: Taking ordinary peace-time expenditures—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Go to Fredericton and see where the experimental farm buy their requirements—from Mr. W. G. Clark, who is the lieutenant-governor of the province.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about non-war expenditures. As a matter of fact I have not felt any particular obligation to go into that question as Minister of Finance, in regard to non-war expenditures. I presume that the normal practices prevail, which might have been exceptionable in some instances. But on the whole there has been nothing to complain of. For the most part tenders were called for, the opposition criticized them in the house, and the government was called upon to produce papers, answer questions, and so forth. But one thing we have done which was not done in the last war—and I do not say this for the sake of making a party comparison. I say it in order to show that there has been an advance in public morale, in what the public will stand for, if I may put it that way. In war expenditures, in anything connected with the war, we have made from the beginning a strong point of the principle that there should not be any politics in it. We have had some little trouble with some of our people because they do not always agree with that. But so far as I am concerned, so far as my colleagues also are concerned, we have repeatedly taken the position that we cannot ask the people to put up huge sums of money for a war which is a war of all the people of the dominion and have any favouritism as between parties in the expenditure of that war money. And so far as I know there has not been any. There may be some instances that the hon. gentleman knows of that I do not. But as I recall it he has asked this question, and has gone so far as to make it more than a question; he has made it a statement once or twice in previous years, and I always thought the explanations he got from the Minister of National Defence and others were pretty satisfactory.

Mr. MacNICOL: I suppose the black eye said to have been handed out a few days ago—

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that.

Mr. MacNICOL: —when a certain gentleman called at a ministerial office, is evidence that it is not occurring in that department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister outline the system of treasury control? The Department of Munitions and Supply get a requisition, I understand, from the Department of National Defence for certain articles which they buy. What is the method of treasury control in relation thereto?

Mr. ILSLEY: The money is voted by parliament in the war appropriation. It is allocated to the Department of National Defence in accordance with the draft estimates submitted by that department and approved by the treasury board. The Department of National Defence requisitions the purchase by the Department of Munitions and Supply and that department makes the purchase. If the transaction is of any considerable size it is done by order in council. If it is under $15,000—I think that is the amount now; it used to be $5,000—the Department of Munitions and Supply simply make the purchase themselves without taking the matter to council. Periodically all purchases involving expenditures of under $15,000 are reported to council.

Purchases and contracts involving more than $15,000 are extremely numerous. I do not know how many thousands of them there are a month, but the number is large. They go before the governor in council, and as an internal arrangement a committee of the ministers known as the business committee of the cabinet passes on those orders in council before they go to the cabinet proper. It is impossible for a high degree of check to be undertaken by the business committee of the cabinet or by the cabinet itself. When I sat in that committee, which I did a good many months ago, I was always impressed by the great care which the Department of Munitions and Supply took in entering into any transaction to see that it was at least defensible. If there was anything wrong with the transaction it never appeared in what came before the business committee. It looked like a prudent and businesslike arrangement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): One would not expect them to present it to the treasury if there was anything wrong.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not believe there is much if anything wrong. I think that department has a great deal of business talent in it and no politics at all. If one looks into the political affiliations or party records of the senior officials, or the junior officials for that matter, of that department, he will find that they are not of the political complexion of the party now in power.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They must be all right, then. One thing more. There is a system of treasury control in connection with all these war expenditures. I am not sure just how it operates. These men are here, there and everywhere. I have heard of them being in factories—

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): —in connection with cost-plus contracts. What is that system?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the comptroller of the treasury, the finance department, Mr. McIntyre. No money is paid out unless there is authority for the payment and evidence which justifies him in paying the money, that is proper invoices, certificates and so on. He has his men everywhere all over Canada in every department. These, while they appear to be officers or are technically officers of the various departments, are really officers of the Department of Finance.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How are they appointed?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are appointed by the civil service commission for the most part—wholly I think. That staff of the comptroller of the treasury is a very large staff.

As to the cost accounting, there are certain contracts which are made on this basis by the Department of Munitions and Supply; a price is set—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A target.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are these target price contracts; that is a peculiar type of contract. Prices are set; tenders are not asked, but the supplier says, "That is what it is worth, I think". The department thinks that is what the service or the work is worth and the department agrees to pay so much. But it is usual to have in a contract where there are no tenders a provision that the books of the company may be examined and, if the profit is excessive, it may be reduced to a certain figure, perhaps a percentage of the cost or a percentage of something. Wherever there is ground for thinking that the profit is excessive, these accountants representing the Department of Finance go and examine the company's books, and in some instances reduce the price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has that actually happened?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have seen some of these contracts. I had specimen contracts delivered to me by the Department of Munitions and Supply, and as a lawyer I want to compliment the man who drew them. They were good. I happened to know of the young man who, I think, was charged with the responsibility of polishing up those contracts, if not of initiating the draftsmanship. He is the son of an old schoolmaster of mine, and I wish I had his ability as a draftsman, although I used to plume myself in days when I was practising actively that I could draw a contract. But these contracts always imply that there will be a profit. That is quite proper. As to what is the measure of the profit I do not know. Occasions have arisen, I think, when there was a question as to the size of the profit. What is the principle upon which the government goes to-day? Is the limitation 5 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister does not know I am not going to press it. By and large I think I agree with the minister that the contracts let by the Department of Munitions and Supply have been let without regard to politics. But I will say this—and the minister will hear more about it when he goes home—that with respect to allocating contracts to various parts of the country, our part has been overlooked entirely. His own friends in New Brunswick are complaining about it. The attorney-general of New Brunswick made a speech in the legislature on Thursday in which he deplored the fact that no war contracts had come to that province.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): It is six o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS (Danforth): Before you call it six o'clock, will the minister indicate whether he is going to be supported by some of the other ministers in getting this measure through the committee? What I have in mind is that some of the questions which some hon. members might like to ask relate to matters concerning other departments. Will the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) be in and the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), or is the Minister of Finance going to handle the legislation alone.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not think I would have to ask any other ministers to come in on this. I realized that all the ministers would have to be in, at one time or another, on the $2,000,000,000 measure, but this is the matter of a gift to Britain, and I did not think it would be the appropriate measure on which to go into all the war expenditures of the government. The leader of the opposition raised some question about it to-day, and I answered his questions as best I could. I should, however, like to get this resolution out of committee as soon as possible, and then introduce the bill and get on. There are several other measures on which hon. gentlemen can speak. I do not suppose I could get this out of committee to-night, could I, and make the bill available?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am agreeable, if no one else objects. I promised the minister I would help him through, and so far as I am concerned I am approving the resolution.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, for granting to his majesty aid for the purpose of financing United Kingdom war requirements in Canada and for national defence and security.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 6.05 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

JAMES S. WOODSWORTH

TRIBUTE TO THE MEMORY OF THE LATE LEADER OF THE COOPERATIVE COMMONWEALTH FEDERATION

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons of Canada has suffered another conspicuous loss in the passing of one who for many years took a prominent part in its proceedings.

James Shaver Woodsworth, whose death occurred on Saturday, was first returned to parliament as member for Winnipeg North Centre at the general elections of 1921. Mr. Woodsworth was returned at each subsequent general election. In all he was a member of the parliament of Canada for over twenty years. He came to parliament first as a representative of labour, and continued as a member of a small labour group until the formation, in 1932, of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. He was one of the founders of the federation, and became its president, and also its leader in the House of Commons.

Immediately following the general elections of 1940, Mr. Woodsworth suffered a serious impairment of health from which he never recovered. Though he made an appearance in this chamber in November of last year, it was only for a day or two. His health was such that he was unable to take any part in its proceedings.

In these years, when momentous changes are taking place in all parts of the world, and unprecedented events follow each other with unparalleled rapidity, the past tends to become quickly obliterated. New names, new issues, new situations, for the time being at least, obscure the old. Few names associated with the public life of Canada could better illustrate this truth than that of the late member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Woodsworth took no part in the proceedings of this House of Commons which was elected in the spring of 1940. Many present day members of the house would have difficulty in realizing that during the preceding twenty years there were few voices oftener heard in debate than his. There were, indeed, few opponents of the administration, regardless of its political complexion, who were more frequent, and at times more scathing, in their criticisms. One had to know Mr. Woodsworth personally and to be acquainted with the background of his political life, to appreciate him at his true worth. He was, when speaking in public, so constant in his criticisms, so downright in his denunciations, that it was difficult to realize how genuinely kindly, simple and sympathetic his real nature was. Not a few were all too readily inclined to describe him as a demagogue. To my mind, of men who have occupied seats in our parliament and have risen to position of leadership, Mr. Woodsworth was one of the most sincere and least self-seeking.

The truth is that Mr. Woodsworth remained to the end what he was from the outset, the missionary of a great cause. That cause was the well-being of his fellowmen. Social reform was the interest which lay nearest to his heart. To this interest, as a young man, he gave expression in different ways. He began his life work as a member of the Christian ministry. In this calling, he had succeeded his father who had been a Methodist minister. He prepared himself for the ministry by a course in arts at the university of Manitoba, and later by a course in theology at Victoria college, university of Toronto, and by post-graduate studies at Oxford. The knowledge thus acquired was subsequently supplemented by first-hand contacts with industrial conditions in England and Canada and by social research. Before and during his years in parliament, as preacher and teacher and writer, he sought to awaken the conscience of his fellow men to social injustices. In these injustices, he believed, lay the seeds of discontent and widespread disorder. Equally he strove, by advocating a wider tolerance and better understanding, to remove barriers of race and class and creed, and to establish more in the way of economic freedom and social equality.

In parliament, this spirit also manifested itself in the continuous advocacy and support of many measures of social reform. He believed in service as the highest of human motives, and exemplified his belief by his own untiring efforts on behalf of the cause he had so much at heart. He had come to feel that the widest opportunity for service and for the enjoyment of the fruits of service could be secured to the masses of men only by a radical change in the existing order of society. This led to an advocacy of socialistic measures and policies which made him a storm centre of some of the political controversy of the recent past. This controversy, as I have already suggested, served to obscure, and, I believe at times, to thwart his real purpose.

To nothing was Mr. Woodsworth more passionately opposed than to any form of militarism. He was an out-and-out pacifist. Regardless of the antagonism toward himself, which this attitude served to arouse, and the sacrifices it entailed, he held to it to the last.

Philosophically, he was doubtless right in the belief that, in the end, force accomplishes nothing positive; that it is a mistaken method of achieving enduring results. What he failed to see was that, while, in the long run, reason alone can hold the true supremacy, reason must be afforded the opportunity to prevail. All chance to apply reason to the solution of human problems may be forever lost if those who seek to conquer by the sword are not made to perish by the sword. I shall always believe that it was the mental conflict between the idealism of Mr. Woodsworth's hopes and beliefs, and the realism of the horrors of nazism and fascism, that crushed his spirit and broke his strength.

It is too soon to judge the place that Mr. Woodsworth's name will come to hold in the annals of this parliament and in the history of our country. I, for one, believe it will have a high and honoured place, not because of the political doctrines he espoused, and with which a part of his public life was so closely identified—though, even here, it may yet come to be said of him as of other social reformers, that he was ahead of his times—but because of his upright character and his fearless advocacy of the right as it was given him to see the right. His independence of thought and personal integrity, his sterling qualities of honesty and industry, his courageous championship of the causes to which, by conviction, he was wedded, won for him the admiration even of those to whom he was politically opposed.

Mr. Woodsworth has left a name which is greatly respected in our parliament and country. It will, I believe, be increasingly honoured with the passing of the years.

I should like to extend to my hon. friend the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the present leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, and to the members of his party the very sincere sympathy of all hon. members on this side of the house, and particularly may I express a word of sympathy on behalf of us all to the late member's son-in-law, the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and to Mrs. MacInnis. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all members of the House of Commons, to convey our sincere and deep sympathy to Mrs. Woodsworth and to the other members of her family in their great bereavement.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, once again the grim reaper has intervened and taken his harvest from among our membership. Once again we are reminded of what fleeting figures we are on this stage of public life.

In the death of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, a figure which attracted attention from coast to coast for more than two decades has passed into the great beyond.

I well recall my first view of Mr. Woodsworth in the first session of the fourteenth parliament in 1922, when we both took our seats in the house for the first time.

A year or two previously, shortly after the Winnipeg strike, I had visited that city and had heard various tales of Mr. Woodsworth's activities at that time. I was curious to see him in the flesh. He had been painted to me as a socialist, almost a communist, as an agitator, and a demagogue. I was curious to know what his course of action would be in this house, having regard to what I had heard as well as to what I knew of his education, his background and his family traditions, having had, as he did, a pioneer Wesleyan minister for a father, and a mother of united empire loyalist stock.

I had not long to wait. This house met on March 8. The debate on the motion on the address in reply began on the thirteenth and on the following day Mr. Woodsworth entered the debate. If hon. members care to review the record they will find that in that first speech he dealt with a great variety of national problems, running through the whole gamut of economic disturbances, unemployment, unemployment insurance, production, the defence department and the problems of reconstruction. I then formed the opinion that here was a man who was intensely in earnest; a man who had strong opinions and the ability to express them. To some he may have appeared as a fanatic. However that may be, I think no one ever doubted his sincerity and honesty of purpose.

Throughout the succeeding years, whether in the House of Commons or on the public platform, he pursued his purpose and supported his ideals. Down through those years he fought for the under-dog, for social amelioration and for social justice. And he lived long enough to witness the fruition of two of his cherished policies—old age pensions and unemployment insurance.

I like to think that in his later years he had mellowed and had softened his opinions. I recall our last conversation in November last. Although unable to take part in the business of the session he had come to Ottawa for a brief period, shattered in health and wearied with the struggle. I called upon him in his office, and we discussed many matters—the state of the nation, the war situation, his health, and the probability of his return to active participation in public life. I left him with a sincere feeling of respect. Here was a man who had gone through the fire of adversity, through a stormy public life, and who had emerged with a philosophy of life, unchanged in its objectives, but full of charity and with some understanding of the viewpoint of those from whom he had differed.

To his loved ones, to the members of his party in this house, particularly his son-in-law, the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), I offer on behalf of myself and those associated with me our sincere expressions of sympathy in the loss they have sustained.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, after the eloquent tributes which have been paid to-day to Mr. Woodsworth by the leaders of the two main parties, there remains little indeed for me to say. I shall merely attempt a sketch of Mr. Woodsworth as he appealed to me in the several years during which I was here in his company in this parliament.

I was impressed at all times with the surprising energy of the man and the courage which prompted him to plunge into the most painful positions and fight his way through—an industry which never seemed to fail, and a hope and faith which were constantly in evidence. I was surprised at the persistence which characterized him even when it looked as though there was no chance of achieving his objective. His sincerity no one could possibly doubt. In readiness and skill as a debater he had I think very few equals, if any, in this house during the time I have been here.

Mr. Woodsworth's life recalls to me some lines of Browning which have always delighted me. Perhaps I may be pardoned if I quote them:

> One who never turned his back but marched breast forward,
> Never doubted clouds would break,
> Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,
> Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better,
> Sleep to wake.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. Woodsworth was many times baffled but always rose to fight better, and now that he has gone asleep I think it is the wish and the hope and the faith of everyone here that he will wake to take up the struggle for humanity in another sphere.

To Mrs. Woodsworth and his children I would commend the fine character of a husband and father whose life can be to them a matter of rejoicing and a constant example and inspiration. To the members of his party bereaved of their leader I also express the sincerest sympathy.

Hon. J. T. THORSON (Minister of National War Services): Mr. Speaker, I desire to add my personal tribute to the memory of a great and courageous humanitarian.

Mrs. DORISE W. NIELSEN (North Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I should deem it an honour if you would allow me to express the feelings which I know are shared by so many Canadians.

A pioneer has passed on. In years gone by, when pioneers in new social thought were few, Mr. Woodsworth worked untiringly. Many were the old decayed trees of prejudice he felled, and much of the underbrush of fear and misunderstanding he cleared. He cultivated the minds of our people and planted the good seed.

In paying tribute, Mr. Speaker, to his memory I wish to convey to Mrs. Woodsworth the appreciation we have of the part she has played. Long years of love and devotion she has given, not only to her husband but to the ideals and ideas which he laboured to promote. Many an hour of companionship in her husband's company she courageously sacrificed, and because of her help, sympathy and understanding Mr. Woodsworth was able to give so much of his time and thought to the problems of the common people. No tribute to Mr. Woodsworth would be complete without a recognition of the part his wife has also played.

Many a year yet he might have spent with his wife and family had he not given so unstintingly of his health and strength in the cause so dear to his heart.

It is my sincere wish that the regret and sorrow which they and we feel at his passing may be lightened by the sure knowledge that in the fullness of time his labours will bear fruit. When the full light of a new society floods the world we shall remember the man who saw its first pale gleam and so consistently followed it.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): It is now almost thirty years, Mr. Speaker, since I first met the late Mr. Woodsworth. We were fellow townsmen of the city of Winnipeg. On the occasion on which I met him he was doing some work in connection with foreign settlements located in various parts of western Canada. I was impressed from the beginning by the earnestness of the man, the vision he possessed, and the thought he had as to how these newcomers to Canada should be assisted in becoming acquainted not only with Canadian institutions but with the whole picture of Canadian life.

I have followed his subsequent career with a great deal of interest. There were ocasions upon which I differed from him, but there was never for a moment any question in my mind of the sincerity, the integrity and the courage of the man. He was one who at all times had the courage of his convictions, and I am always ready to pay a tribute to a man possessed of these qualities of honesty, sincerity and courage. Men of this type are far too rare in the life of our country.

He has passed to the great beyond where, sooner or later, all must go, but he has left behind him a record of which his family may well be proud. He has rendered a service to this country, and, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, it may well be reported of him in the years to come that the policies he advocated were the forerunners of policies which yet may come to pass in this country.

I simply wish to join in this tribute of sincere admiration of his character, and to express my sympathy with all the members of his family.

Mr. LIGUORI LACOMBE (Laval-Two Mountains) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, parliament and the entire country mourn in the person of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, a man of wide culture, an ardent patriot and a renowned orator. The eloquence of this great Canadian which stirred and charmed the members of this house over a period of almost twenty years, stemmed from deep conviction as well as from extraordinary dialectic powers. May I be permitted to offer to the bereaved members of his family and particularly to the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), my heartfelt sympathy.

May I also express my deep sympathy to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. members of whom he remains the distinguished leader.

(Text) Mr. Woodsworth was a man of honour and courage and a great Canadian; and the country will never forget him.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, because I knew Mr. Woodsworth intimately since 1897, meeting him then at many athletic contests between rival colleges, and because we met together on many occasions and discussed ways and means for the betterment of the underprivileged, I invited him often to our church, at a time when such invitations were not always popular. He never betrayed a trust; he always acted like a Christian gentleman. While we were both in Ottawa he often called me in and we discussed things together. I shall not soon forget my visits to him in the hospital. As I was leaving the first time he said, "Your visit is refreshing; come back again, and do not leave without a word a prayer." I appreciated his words.

To me James Woodsworth was a practical Christian, because I believe the Christian programme is: feed the hungry, clothe the naked, visit the sick and go to those in prison. He practised those principles, and men are known by their conduct. He always struggled on behalf of the man who was underneath, and he did it without making anything out of it. I do not suppose he has left to his loved ones much of this world's goods; and believing that to be so, and having much in common with him, I would suggest to the government and to the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) that they consider seriously the provision of a pension for Mrs. Woodsworth.

I pay my tribute to him as a man of courage and conviction, one who was never afraid to champion the cause of the individual who was down.

Mr. RALPH MAYBANK (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I, as the only representative of the city of Winnipeg in the house at this moment, offer a short addition to the obituary references of those who have already spoken of J. S. Woodsworth.

His life for many years has been identified with my own city. Certain I am that I speak for all the people of that city in joining sincerely with others who have spoken to-day in an expression of sympathy to the wife and family of this deceased member. From my acquaintance with, and experience of J. S. Woodsworth, I would say that the last thing he would ever desire would be any mournful thought about his departing or any sad references to it. Nor would he want me to speak of him any differently to-day from the way in which I customarily spoke of him when he was alive. I fancy that he went out happy to meet his Pilot face to face and secure in the belief that he was going to do so.

I knew J. S. Woodsworth longer than most members of parliament. There are only one or two in this house who have known him longer.

My first meeting with him was such that I have borne him in kindly remembrance ever since. Somewhere in the neighbourhood of 1909, when I was able to return to school studies after labouring at odd jobs for six or seven years, he was engaged in social service —and it was service—on behalf of the Methodist church. I went to him, a stranger, to get some information about a debate on immigration policies. I shall not soon forget the thoughtful kindness he exhibited in endeavouring to help me. Long after the event about which I had consulted him had gone by, he kept the problem in mind, and sent bits of information to me as these came to him from time to time. I consequently always remembered him as a man who was earnestly and guilelessly interested in other people.

It has already been well said here to-day, and I have heard it said thousands of times in Jim Woodsworth's lifetime, that while one might sharply disagree with him, sharply disagree with his opinions, even to the point of being angry with him for holding and expressing such opinions, one could not fail to respect the man himself, both because of his sincerity and because of his tenacity in holding to his views.

Well, sir, we know that the wolf that is in the middle of the pack will soon be forgotten; it is the one on the edge of the pack, or leading the pack that impresses itself on the mind. Woodsworth was never in the middle of the pack.

Of all his attributes, I believe the principal one was his carelessness. Woodsworth was careless to an extent that would impel the majority of people to call him foolish. What I mean is that he was careless of what happened to him. He was unmindful of himself. Wrong he may have been sometimes, but any wrongness was of the head; it was never of the heart. He was not engaged in trying to carve out of life something of material benefit for himself. In this respect Jim Woodsworth was egregious; he towered up out of the pack. Consequently I predict that he will not soon be forgotten. If there were more people in the world, more in Canada, yes, more in this parliament actuated by motives as free from desire for material gain as was Jim Woodsworth, the world and Canada, yes, and this parliament itself, would be better off; because the more individuals are actuated by motives completely untinged with selfishness, the more likelihood there is of their actions conducing to the real progress of mankind.

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Seldom have we heard a finer tribute paid to one of our colleagues. I had known Mr. Woodsworth fairly well. He was in this house when I came in over seventeen years ago and he had always been very kind to me, as he was to any other colleague. He commanded universal respect not only in the city of Winnipeg where he lived, but throughout the country. He was always well informed on the problems that he discussed, particularly social matters, and as a debater he had a voice that carried very well. I shall remember him as a born gentleman, a gentleman of the old school, and those who had conversations with him will never forget the kindly glance in his eye when they spoke with him. He will be remembered for his integrity, his sincerity, his indomitable courage; and we shall all remember him as a great patriot who was Canadian at heart.

I join with the other speakers in conveying my deepest sympathy to Mrs. Woodsworth, to his children and to our esteemed colleague, the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis).

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): On behalf of the group which Mr. Woodsworth so ably led in this house, I desire to express to all who have spoken our deep appreciation of the kindly references that have been made to his life and to his work. I would say too that we appreciate all that has been said about his splendid helpmeet, Mrs. Woodsworth, who to-day is bereaved. Those of us who have known them through the years know that always in the background, standing sympathetically behind her husband, was the figure of a brave and good woman. And so we appreciate the kindly references that have been made to her.

For ourselves, we feel that we have lost a revered leader, a wise counsellor and a true friend. But as has already been said, his work will live and his influence will grow. I admired him for those sterling qualities which sprang from his pioneer background. He was a Canadian with roots deep in the soil of this country, and yet he was not narrow in any sense. A product of two of our Canadian universities, Manitoba and Toronto, and enjoying the additional advantage of having studied in the great university of Oxford, he brought to the problems of this country a very wide knowledge of social and economic conditions in many parts of the world.

His work for the new Canadians will not be forgotten. They were always very dear to him, and often in our conferences he would tell us what fine qualities the Ukrainians had, the Ruthenians, the Doukhobors; how he knew and understood them, and hoped that one day they might be integrated into the structure of Canadian fellowship. The great test for him personally came perhaps in the first great war, when he gave up what might have been a life of comparative ease because of his conviction that war was wrong; that the conscription of men against their will was quite wrong. And so he stepped out of the calling which he had chosen as his life's work. He went out to the Pacific coast where for a time he did the hard labour of a longshoreman to earn his daily bread and maintain his young family. Those of us who knew him know what a torture it must have been to that frail body—for frail he was—to undergo the toil of unloading heavy freight from the ships plying between the Pacific coast and the orient.

He became a member of parliament in 1921. He was a great teacher. As a teacher myself I have heard him speaking with groups of young people; that was the thing he liked best to do. Between sessions, if we visited him in his home in Winnipeg we would always find groups of young people gathered in his study talking things over with him. And if I may betray a secret, he had hoped that he might retire before the last election and devote the remaining years of his life to teaching young Canadians how to be of greater service to their country. But that was not permitted to him; and to-day we mourn his loss.

I know it is generally recognized throughout this house that he was sincere. Sincerity and courage in his convictions were at the very root and base of his character. As the Prime Minister has said, quite truly, at times he was scathing in his criticisms in this house of what he considered to be wrong, scathing sometimes in reference to people who occupied seats in this chamber; yet I have heard him on more than one occasion check those who in private conversation sought to belittle personally the present Prime Minister, the late leader of the opposition, and other hon. members of this house. He bore no personal animosity to anyone.

He had the characteristics of a prophet. I remember on one occasion I was on a platform with him and with Professor King Gordon, who had occupied the chair of Christian ethics at the Union theological college at McGill. We knew that some views that Mr. Woodsworth was expressing were unpopular with the audience. King Gordon leaned across to me and said, "There is only one person that I can remember of whom he reminds me, the ancient prophet Amos courageously denouncing the evils of the society of his day and generation." There was much of the scriptural prophet in J. S. Woodsworth.

His work will live. His influence will grow. The very name we bear, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, was a suggestion of J. S. Woodsworth. He hoped that he might be permitted to help lay the foundations of a new order in Canada in which men and women would cooperate for the common good; hence the name. And that I think he did. I am quite sure that none who were here when this house decided that Canada should enter the war will ever forget the tensity of the scene. If I may say so, he always appreciated the kindly reference of the Prime Minister when, during the debate on participation in the war, just before Mr. Woodsworth rose to speak, the right hon. gentleman prepared the difficult path for him by saying that no matter what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre might say or do, this house would understand that he did it in all sincerity. That speech was his last major effort in parliament.

His last two years of life were beclouded by war—war against which he had fought so hard, war which he hoped might never come again; and when it came it did in reality crush him.

I think those of us who knew him can find no better epitaph for him than the words of Alexander Pope:

> Statesman, yet friend to truth! of soul sincere,
> In action faithful, and in honour clear;
> Who broke no promise, served no private end,
> Who gained no title, and who lost no friend.

GANDER, NEWFOUNDLAND, CONSTRUCTION CONTRACT

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. Has the Atlas Construction Co. Limited a contract for construction work at Gander, Newfoundland?

2. If so, is it required to pay the Canadian rate of wages as approved by the Department of Labour?

3. Are the workmen required to pay the following Canadian taxes, (a) national defence tax, (b) income tax, (c) unemployment insurance tax?

4. Are the workmen protected against injury and do they receive compensation for injury?

5. What is the percentage or rate of compensation payable to such workmen when laid off work due to injury received in the course of their employment?

6. Does the government or any department thereof assist injured workmen by seeing that they are paid workmen's compensation as required in Canada?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes—there is a contract between Atlas Construction Company Limited and His Majesty the King in the right of Canada. The contract is on a cost-plus fee basis.

2. Yes—Form M. & S. 154 "Labour Conditions," approved by the Department of Labour, forms part of the contract.

3. All employees of the contractor who are residents of Canada are subject to (a) National defence tax; (b Income tax; (c) Unemployment insurance tax. Employees who are residents of Newfoundland are not subject to Canadian taxes.

4. All workmen employed on the work are protected against injury and receive compensation based on the compensation laws as laid down by the crown colony of Newfoundland.

5. Until recently, for total or partial disability, an employee was paid half his regular wage rate subject to a maximum of $10 per week. Employees under twenty years of age received 100 per cent of the wage rate subject to a $10 per week maximum. The insurance company protecting the Atlas Construction Company have recently been informed that the Act under the common law of Newfoundland states that the rate of payment for total or partial disability is 50 per cent of the weekly wage rate with no maximum. The company is therefore reviewing all past payments and is making adjustments accordingly.

In case of permanent disability, the employee has the right to accept compensation or to bring suit under the common law of Newfoundland.

6. Up to date there has been no necessity for intervention on the part of the government, as far as we are aware, to assist injured workmen in the collection of compensation.

*WARTIME HOUSING—HULL, QUE.

Mr. NICHOLSON:

Will the Minister of Munitions and Supply arrange for members of parliament interested in Wartime Housing to visit houses built by Wartime Housing in Hull before the Easter recess?

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I can answer this verbally. The answer, of course, is yes; and may I say that any member of the House of Commons who wishes to visit any work under the control of the Department of Munitions and Supply, whether it be a munitions plant, a housing project, or anything else, need only apply at my office for the necessary documents, which we shall be glad to provide.

FOREIGN EXCHANGE—VEGETABLES AND FRUITS

Mr. NICHOLSON:

How much foreign exchange was used by Canada during each of the months of November, December, 1941, January and February, 1942, for the purchase of, (a) vegetables, and (b) fruits?

Mr. ILSLEY: Without a great deal of work and expense, answers to these questions cannot be obtained from the records of the foreign exchange control board, and even then the answers would not be completely accurate. The board has believed it would not be justifiable to maintain and analyse its records in such a way as to provide data of the character asked for as this would involve duplication of the work of the dominion Bureau of Statistics to an extravagant degree.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated in the House of Commons on April 7, 1941, that "it has been decided as a matter of policy that the bureau of statistics will give no detailed information as to the countries of origin of imports for the duration of the war. It is felt that this information might be of value to the enemy in acquainting them with the sources of supply of certain materials. This decision is wholly in accord with the present practice of the United Kingdom."

ANTIMONY—RESHIPMENT TO ENEMY COUNTRIES

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

What steps have been taken to prevent the Canadian export of antimony to neutral countries from being reshipped to the axis powers?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): Before a permit is granted by the export permit branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the export of antimony or other strategic materials to neutral countries, a thorough investigation is undertaken as to the availability of the supply and the essentiality of the need. The government of the United Kingdom are also consulted through the Department of External Affairs. No permit will be granted for the export of antimony to a neutral country if there is any possibility of the product being re-exported to a country with which Canada is at war or to a territory under enemy occupation or control. Any shipment from a neutral country to a country with which Canada is at war or to a territory under enemy occupation or control or to another neutral country adjacent to such territories would only be permitted to pass through the naval blockade when covered by a navicert issued by the United Kingdom authorities.

2. (a) Yes, as secretary-treasurer; (b) No information.

3. The government has made no financial advances to Clark Ruse Aircraft, Limited. The government has made payments of $534,268.77 on account of production as of February 28, 1942.

Mr. HOWE: The answer is no.

PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is the government satisfied that the duty of searching hospitals and prison camps for Canadian internees in enemy and enemy-occupied countries is being carried out efficiently, and have the next of kin of all officers and men been informed of the fate of their relatives, as far as possible?

2. Are these searches being carried out by government agencies, or are they only undertaken by private organizations, and what are they?

3. What status has the Red Cross in enemy countries, and where and how do they function from in Germany, Italy and Japan?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: (As the situation with regard to information about Canadian prisoners of war and internees is most easily dealt with by separating the European and far eastern theatres of war, the answers are being given in two groups, the first referring to Germany and Italy including occupied territories and the second referring to Japan and Japanese occupied territories.)

Germany and Italy, including Occupied Territories:

1. Information regarding Canadian prisoners of war and civilian internees is not obtained, strictly speaking, through the "searching" of hospitals and internment camps. According to the provisions of the Geneva Convention relating to the treatment of prisoners of war (1929), which is adhered to by the belligerents on both sides, belligerents are required to notify each other as soon as possible of all internees or prisoners through the intermediary of an information bureau set up by each detaining power for this purpose (article 8). The information bureau transmits all such information immediately to the powers concerned through the protecting power and through a special central agency set up by the International Red Cross committee at Geneva (article 77). As far as combatant prisoners of war are concerned, these provisions are observed by both sides, and lists of Canadian prisoners are telegraphed to both Ottawa and London as soon as this information is received at Geneva. The Department of National Defence notifies the next of kin after the information has been checked.

Information obtained in this way is supplemented by the representatives of the protecting power who are allowed to visit all internment camps housing Canadians, whether combatants or civilian internees, and lists furnished by the protecting power have so far been the chief source of information regarding civilians. The Geneva Convention has, however, been extended reciprocally to cover civilians as well as combatants, and official lists of civilian internees are now being provided.

2. See answer to question No. 1.

3. National Red Cross organizations as a rule deal exclusively with problems arising out of the care of their own nationals. This is understood to be the case in Germany and Italy. Activities connected with the whereabouts or welfare of Canadian prisoners of war and internees in these countries are handled by the International Red Cross and its official delegates, who are also authorized to visit any camp.

Japan and Japanese-Occupied Territories:

1. Although Japan has not formally ratified the Geneva Convention, the Japanese government have stated that prisoners of war and internees will be treated in accordance with its provisions. A list of Canadian civilians interned in Japan has already been supplied both to the Argentine embassy at Tokyo and to the International Red Cross. Further lists of combatant prisoners are awaited.

2. See answers to questions No. 1 and No. 3.

3. With regard to the Japanese Red Cross, the situation is different from that in the other belligerent countries, in that it is understood that the Japanese Red Cross intends to take charge of some of the functions such as the distribution of parcels and comforts, which elsewhere are normally in the hands of the delegates of the International Red Cross.

SALVAGE—SCRAP METAL

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

Is all the scrap metal collected under the national salvage campaign used for war purposes or is some resold for private industrial use?

Mr. THORSON: Steel, iron, aluminum and high-grade copper are definitely designated to war and other essential industries by the steel controller and the metals controller of the Department of Munitions and Supply. Low-grade non-ferrous metals are utilized in accordance with the regular channels of trade.

WOMEN FARM WORKERS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Is a wage rate set for women farm workers?

2. If so, are the rates fixed for the different classes of agricultural workers?

Mr. MITCHELL: 1 and 2. No. The legislative authority rests with the provinces. In respect to the "farm service force plan" carried on in Ontario last year the expense of which was participated in by the dominion, the minimum wages were set at a growers' meeting prior to placements.

7. If not employed by the national film board, what is the nature of the work she is and has been performing in the studios and/or laboratory of the national film board, what is her official status in relation to those regularly employed on the staff of the national film board and what authority, if any, has she to give orders to or supervise the work of employees of the national film board?

8. If she was not carrying on the work she is doing in studios and/or laboratory of the national film board would it be necessary to employ someone else to perform this work?

9. How long has she been a resident of Canada?

Mr. McLARTY: It is provided by sections 126, 134 and 141 of the plebiscite instructions that the returning officer shall give notice in due course to candidates entitled to nominate enumerators and deputy returning officers.

Each returning officer is notified by these instructions and will doubtless arrange for the appointment of enumerators and deputy returning officers on the basis already stated to the house.

What did the government pay the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway respectively, for (a) transportation, (b) express, (c) freight, (d) telegrams, (e) any other services, in each of the four quarterly periods during the year 1941?

Mr. ILSLEY: To give the information sought in regard to transportation would entail an immense amount of work in examining the travelling claims. In the great majority of travelling claims no reference is made to which of the railways has been used. Subject to this qualification the question should be passed as an order for return.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CERTIFIED SEED POTATOES

Mr. HATFIELD:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal Department of Agriculture and the district representative, C. H. Godwin, Fredericton, New Brunswick, regarding the shipment and the issuing of certificates for Canadian certified seed potatoes during the year 1941.

Mr. GARDINER: I raised an objection previously to this motion, on the ground that this correspondence is between officials in the department. There is nothing in the file that I have any objection to showing the hon. member. I wonder if the house would permit this motion to be dropped, and at any time the hon. member can come and see what is in the file.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If there is nothing in the file that would be prejudicial to the public interest, why not pass this motion on the understanding that it would not be regarded as a precedent?

Mr. GARDINER: I will make the file available to the hon. member at any time, but we prefer not to have a precedent set.

Motion dropped.

COMMODITY PRICES STABILIZATION CORPORATION

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing—1. A list of the price ceiling subsidies issued, the estimated amount of same and on what articles, or in what trade and commerce.

2. A list of the members of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, a list of their chief officers, servants and agents, showing where they are located, the number thereof, together with their salaries and other allowances.

3. Estimated cost of one year of maintaining the ceiling prices staff herein, and the aggregate number of officials and total payroll.

4. The estimated cost per annum of the operation of this corporation.

5. The walks of business life that are not yet supervised or directed by any departments of state.

6. What training the members of this corporation and their chief officials have had in actual trade or commerce, or in a competitive business.

7. What minister of the crown is responsible to parliament for the work of this corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no objection to this motion passing with certain qualifications. It will not be possible to give some of the information asked for, such as certain estimates which are not questions of fact and which it would be impossible, I think, to make at this stage. Similarly, there is a question asked as to what training the members of the corporation have had. I do not think it would be possible to answer that definitely in response to a motion. I do not think the amounts of subsidies to individual firms should be disclosed, but I think the house should have information regarding the amounts of the subsidies to industries, the amounts of certain classes of subsidies.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On commodities.

Mr. ILSLEY: On commodities. With these qualifications, I shall be glad to agree to the passing of this motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member is not here, and I do not know his views. I can understand that the question with reference to estimates might be difficult to answer; yet an estimate must have been made for the first year, having regard to the expenditures that have been made. I can see no reason why the government should not make a statement in connection with the training of each man, because it is a matter which must have been considered. On the other point, as to what firms or individuals received money, probably the minister is right, but we ought to know exactly how much subsidy is being given in respect of each commodity. Perhaps the motion might stand until the hon. member is here.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Minister of Finance has said that while there is no objection to stating the total amount of the subsidies, there would be objection to stating the amount of subsidy paid to any individual firm or corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know whether we should allow that to pass without protest. If this is a government subsidy, surely parliament is entitled to know the amount of the subsidy and who received it. Otherwise parliament has no control over the matter at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They have not any now.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think this matter should be carefully scrutinized.

Mr. SPEAKER: In the meantime the motion will stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I ask the minister to reconsider this. I went a little the other way, but I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East that we ought to know who got this money. I ask the minister to think it over.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall give it consideration, but I will be prepared to argue the matter. There are considerations that have not occurred to hon. gentlemen.

Motion stands.

ATLANTIC COAST DEFENCE

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports, memoranda and all other documents addressed by Lt.-Col. Alan Cockeram, D.S.O., to the Minister of National Defence or anyone in the National Defence department, concerning the defence of the city of Halifax and of the Atlantic coast, from the beginning of the war.

Mr. RALSTON: I have received a note to the effect that there is no record in the files of the department of any such correspondence having been received at national defence headquarters, and that includes the office of the minister. It may be possible that there were some communications of this sort to the district. Therefore, I am prepared to let the motion pass in case there might be some correspondence of that kind with the district. I want this to be subject to the necessary reservation as to the non-production of any document which it would be against the interests of public security to disclose.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If there were any such correspondence, it would not be in the public interest to disclose it.

Mr. POULIOT: What does the hon. gentleman know about it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not know anything about it, but I think I know as much as the hon. gentleman.

MOBILIZATION OF INDIANS

Mr. POULIOT:

For a copy of the legal opinions given to the Department of National Defence relative to the mobilization of Indians.

Mr. RALSTON: I have made inquiries about this and I find that no opinion was given to the Department of National Defence with respect to this matter. But I have ascertained that there was sent to the Department of National Defence an opinion that was given to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Mackenzie King). I have consulted the Secretary of State for External Affairs and I am quite willing to have the motion pass, if it is understood that it refers to that document. Again, this will be subject to the provision as to whether it is a matter of public policy to produce an opinion from the Department of Justice to the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise to a question of privilege. This motion does not concern the Department of National Defence; it is directed to the Department of National War Services. It reads:

Copie des opinions légales données au ministère des services nationaux de guerre relativement à la mobilisation des Indiens.

Mr. RALSTON: It has reference to the Department of National Defence.

Mr. POULIOT: There is something wrong somewhere; it must be the translation.

Motion stands.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD—ASSISTANT FILM COMMISSIONER

Mr. McGREGOR:

For a copy of all correspondence, papers, letters, telegrams and other documents in posession of the civil service commission and exchanged between the national film board and the civil service commission relative to the establishment of the position of assistant film commissioner, national film board, and to the appointment of Ross McLean to the above noted position.

ST. JEROME, QUE., MILITARY CAMP

Mr. POULIOT (For Mr. Bertrand, Terrebonne):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, agreements and other documents exchanged between the government, the federal departments and any person or persons, with respect to the construction of the military training camp at St. Jerome, Quebec. Also a copy of all invoices and paysheets in connection with this construction.

Mr. RALSTON: I am going to ask that this motion be allowed to stand. I should like to speak to the hon. member himself about it. The house will see that this would require a tremendous amount of detail in the way of invoices, pay sheets and correspondence. I am sure the hon. member's desire for information can be satisfied with much less information than is called for here.

Motion stands.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

REFERENCE TO STATEMENT OF MR. HARRIS (DANFORTH) IN DEBATE ON MARCH 20

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris), whom I would call our Billy Sunday, in his weekly lecture, which is reported at page 1496 of Hansard, named certain hon. members, including the hon. member for Témiscouata. He coupled my name with the names of other hon. members, and then went on to say:

Listening to their speeches I sometimes wonder what good they are doing the general cause. This letter says: "The last two nights Lord Haw-Haw has really been"—to use his own language—"razzing Mr. Churchill."

I have not been razzing Mr. Churchill; I have been praising him, as appears on page 1471 of Hansard. We are fortunate in having in this house members who represent various professions. I asked one of my colleagues who is a medical doctor what would be the best cure—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I understand the hon. member is raising a question of privilege in connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris). Would the hon. member refer simply and solely to those remarks which he claims are a matter of privilege?

Mr. POULIOT: I was wondering when one was suffering from neurasthenia what would be the best remedy, and I was going to prescribe beef, iron and wine. I asked a doctor and he said that what would be best would be a rat killer. Then I asked another colleague who is a druggist what was the best kind of rat killer, and he told me a cat.

INCOME AND CORPORATION TAX

AGREEMENT WITH PROVINCES—COMPENSATION FOR VACATING TAX FIELDS AND ARRANGEMENTS FOR SUBSIDIES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with the provinces respecting the vacation by them of the personal income and corporation tax fields for the duration of the war and to provide compensation therefor, and fiscal need subsidies in the case of certain provinces, annually during the term of the agreement.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

I should like to propose to the house that by unanimous consent this resolution and the next one be adopted so that the bills based upon them may be given their first readings to-day. This would mean that I would have to change the form of the motion so that it would be a motion to go into committee, this day instead of at the next sitting. We cannot do that on either of these resolutions without the unanimous consent of the house. I do not see any reason, however, why that consent could not be given. My reason for asking this is that eight legislatures are in session and are considering the provincial legislation necessary to the authorization of these agreements. They are awaiting information as to the terms of the bills which will be introduced in this house.

The bills are prepared and can be introduced to-day. If this is done it will enable the legislatures in the provinces to see the bills, and thus they would be greatly assisted. I am told it would be particularly of assistance to two of the provinces, Ontario and New Brunswick, and would help to expedite or facilitate the passage of the bills in those legislatures.

Hon. members who wish to discuss the matter may in both instances do so on second reading. At that time the fullest opportunity will be afforded; anything can be said on second reading or in committee after second reading of the bills. These resolutions are necessary of course as a technical preliminary to the introduction of the bills. I would ask the consent of hon. members that we go into committee to-day on this resolution and the following one, report the resolutions immediately and have first readings of the bills. Of course if anyone objects, it cannot be done; but if no one objects there is no reason why it should not be done.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the minister had used more diligence these resolutions would have been on the order paper a long time ago. There is just one limitation to that statement, and that is that one of the provinces had not entered into the final arrangements. I would like to point out to the minister that the time of the house in the debate on the address was taken up by nearly a hundred hon. members opposite, and the regular business of parliament was thus impeded for nearly a month. They took up three times as much time as hon. members on this side of the house, and their speeches on the plebiscite occupy three times as much space as that occupied by hon. members on this side. And yet the impression has gone out that we, and other hon. members on this side of the house, have sought to hold up government business. It is not true, and this occasion gives me the opportunity to say so.

The request which the minister now makes is quite reasonable. The legislatures are in session and they want to know the terms of the bills. To that I have no objection. But in withholding our objection in this instance we do not for one moment propose to give up our rights, nor do we propose that this procedure shall be taken by the government as a precedent for the violation of the rules of the house.

The minister has said there is no reason why we cannot debate the matter on the second reading of the bill. There is something in what he says, but it has been my experience that in the committee stage, by cross-examination and intelligent questioning, hon. members often bring out certain aspects of a public question which do not appear on the face of the motion. It is a valuable privilege accorded to members of parliament, and it is of value especially to those who are not promoting the legislation but are simply seeking information. It is a privilege which I say hon. members ought not to give up except in most exceptional cases.

I know the minister is anxious to have these bills introduced—and of course he does not propose to proceed with them until after the Easter vacation. We shall have ample time during the vacation to study the proposed legislation, and see what is in it. These agreements are most complicated. As opportunity has offered I have attempted to master some of them, and I can say that they are highly technical. They are full of legalities which will require the study of hon. members.

I cannot possibly study nine different agreements. I am trying to confine myself to one or two, and I would hope that hon. members on both sides of the house, representing the various provinces, will take it upon themselves to get copies of these agreements and to study their effect upon their own provinces. After all we are not only citizens of Canada; we come from the various provinces, and I believe we should see how this matter affects our provinces.

I know the position with respect to New Brunswick, and it has not worked out according to plan. New Brunswick is giving up the income tax municipally—not provincially, because we have no provincial income tax. It is giving up corporation taxation, and the amount of taxes thus collected from us by the municipality is being transferred to the dominion treasury, and is being multiplied many times. I am not objecting to that, because this country is at war. But in New Brunswick we are being mulcted in new taxation to make up what is being transferred. I do not think anyone objects to the increase in rate of income tax we have to pay for federal war purposes. But I thought—and I think the country was led to believe—that the grants in aid made by the dominion to the provinces in lieu of the tax field vacated would be passed on in full to the municipalities. That, I believed, was the intention. What has happened? We are having new taxation in New Brunswick. It is taxation of a class or kind we never had before, taxation which under any name is additional taxation on real estate. And we will never be clear of it; I have made up my mind to that. After the field is vacated we shall have to pay the additional taxation, and I protest against that position.

So far as I am concerned I am quite agreeable to the minister doing what he wishes, subject to the reservations I have made.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, when a similar request was made a few days ago we acceded readily. But had we known that so many more bills were going to be brought before the House of Commons, and that so many more resolutions would have to be dealt with before the house rises, we certainly would have protested the long adjournment at Easter. It is, I suggest, a dangerous practice to allow to any extent the procedure which enables private members of parliament to scrutinize measures proposed by the government to pass away from us. I suggest that if we are to deal with very important measures, including the loan to Great Britain, the passage of the portion of the war appropriation which will be required immediately, and these resolutions, we should agree to sit the first three days of next week.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No.

Mr. COLDWELL: And to go into these matters, if they are sufficiently pressing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Members have made their arrangements.

Mr. COLDWELL: I certainly think that we as a House of Commons are making a great mistake if we readily agree to a procedure of this kind. As the leader of the opposition has said, earlier in the session there was a great deal of discussion of the plebiscite question; on the address, on the resolution, and on the bill itself. On the agricultural measures also we had a long debate, although may I remind the house that that was not because of any action on the part of the opposition. We had agreed that we would be satisfied with having the bills dissected in committee, but two or three hon. members on the government side of the house wished to speak, and therefore we exercised the same prerogative and the debate became prolonged.

I do not like the procedure proposed. We are going to agree to this under protest, but we hope that business at the end of the session or before a recess will not be brought to us in such a way that we shall be compelled to rush it though without what we consider to be proper and adequate consideration.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): I am sure that our group desires to cooperate as much as possible in expediting the orderly and quick dispatch of the business of this house; and so far as I am personally concerned, and I believe I speak for this group, we will help the minister with regard to this particular measure by consenting to the passing of this resolution. But we do it under the conditions that the minister has already stated, that there will be the fullest possible discussion of the measure at a subsequent sitting, either on second reading or when the bill is in committee. Very often we have found that we are circumscribed in our discussion, and often cut off when we wish to debate some very important phase of a bill or resolution.

While I am on my feet may I mention another point, although in no spirit of criticism. We were somewhat alarmed the other evening when a resolution was suddenly passed and the matter slipped into committee without the knowledge of any

hon. members in this corner. I do not know that it was anyone's fault in particular, except that the house was unusually noisy at the time. One or two of our group were prepared to speak on the resolution—I believe it was the one which now appears as number 10 on the order paper—before it went into committee, but the hour was late; there was a good deal of noise in the chamber, because we had just concluded another measure, and the item had gone into committee before we knew about it. May I suggest that the house should be a little more orderly at times when we are passing from one measure to another?

Occasionally I am rather annoyed at suggestions of government spokesmen that such and such a thing must be done because the thing is very urgent, that we must have the money for this, that and the other, and have it by a certain time—because there may be a recess, or because of some other possible contingency. It reminds me that not so long ago, when the war was on and a certain session of parliament was called, the session lasted only three hours. I was surprised that the government could run the war for a good many months afterwards without asking parliament for any money, and in the meanwhile win an election. It seems to me that after that experience the government has very little excuse for rushing anything through this house on the ground that it has to be put through or they will not be able to get the money.

Provided that we shall have the fullest opportunity of discussing this measure, our group are quite willing to cooperate with the minister in connection with this particular resolution.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The Yukon territory gave up the personal income and corporation tax field on the understanding that what they surrendered would be made up to them, as is being done in the case of the provinces. The resolution mentions simply the provinces; is it intended to include the Yukon?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, Mr. Speaker, the Yukon is not included in this legislation. I will, however, look into the question, and if it is desirable to amend the bill, that might be done later. But the bill as drawn does not include the Yukon.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): It should.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the reason for two bills? Is it because of the special grant to the maritime provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The second resolution is really part of the arrangement, but was not envisaged at the time the item was passed in the supplementary estimates last summer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the forty-five million dollars?

Mr. ILSLEY: The three maritime provinces were quite content to enter into this agreement provided that they had some assurance that their Duncan and White commission subsidies would be maintained. As that has always been the understanding since those commissions brought in their reports, and as there has been a vote every year, and as the matter has always been regarded as settled, the government saw no objection to introducing legislation providing that these awards would take effect again after the termination of these agreements. I suggest that, if the house is agreeable to this course of procedure, we go into committee on both resolutions at once and report them both out. It is all by consent, anyway, and it will facilitate business.

I move that the house go into committee of the whole now on the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with the provinces respecting the vacation by them of the personal income and corporation tax fields for the duration of the war and to provide compensation therefor, and fiscal need subsidies in the case of certain provinces, annually during the term of the agreement.

And also that the house go into committee of the whole now to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide statutory authority for the payment, as additional subsidies, to the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, of the amounts hitherto paid as special grants to the said provinces out of moneys voted annually by parliament, the said payments to be made annually after the termination of the agreements with the said provinces respecting the vacation by them of the personal income and corporation tax fields.

His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman—

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): I shall have to read the motion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Dispense.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is quite unnecessary to read the motion, quite unnecessary for the Chair even to put motions, because the rules have all gone into the discard. This is not the first time this session that the government has sought to take advantage of a squeeze play to throw the rules into the discard. In the instance which occurred last week, referred to by the member for Macleod, it is quite true that that item slipped through without hon. members knowing what was going on in the chamber, though so far as I was concerned I understood it. I wanted to help the minister out, as I do now, but I protest against ignoring the rules in this way. The rules are there; let us live up to them. The forty-minute rule was violated for weeks, and now His Honour the Speaker is enforcing it; but the government has given the worst possible example by bringing down this legislation in this way.

The minister said that there were eight legislatures in session dealing with the matter; one is in recess. As I understand it, most of the eight provinces have dealt with the matter. I understand it has gone through the New Brunswick legislature.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not my information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I am wrong. It has gone through in Nova Scotia, has it not? At all events, this matter has been held up, I believe—this is perhaps only a shrewd guess—because of the opposition of Ontario. I think that is true. But the legislation in the other eight provinces will not be changed in any degree because of failure of this resolution or of these two bills to get through. It has been due entirely to the opposition of Ontario, and there is no harm in letting that be known, if it is so. The minister is bound to put through this legislation with respect to the other eight provinces at any rate, because of the signed agreements. The position is closed so far as this parliament is concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is only one agreement signed, and that is with regard to British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The terms are agreed upon. I have read the correspondence with New Brunswick. They came back and came back and came back to get a little more, a little more, a little more. And the minister gave way little by little by little. They got a lot. They got so much that it has whetted their appetite and to-day we have the little province of New Brunswick, with less than 500,000 people, budgeting for double the amount of the budget of that province in 1935, seven years ago—this in war time with all these other taxes piling up on the people of the province in the form of increased income tax, national defence tax and every other kind of tax. The province of New Brunswick is budgeting for $11,000,000. At the same time the Minister of Finance calls on everyone to tighten his belt, to reduce expenditures. The two things do not add up or make sense at all, and I call upon the Prime Minister, I call upon members of the government if they have influence with their followers in New Brunswick to endeavour to induce the provincial government to let up on the poor taxpayer. We cannot live down there without any war industries. We have not received one-half of one per cent of the war contracts that have been awarded by the Department of Munitions and Supply, and it is just like pulling eye teeth to get anything now.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply has always taken the ground that we have no power in New Brunswick. Let me tell him something. In the county of Victoria there is a water-power development where, I am told, 15,000 horse-power is going to waste. If Canadian industry does not take that power, it will soon be under export to the state of Maine. That water power is available, 15,000, if that is the correct amount—and I have no means of checking. The information however must be easily available. If that water power were utilized we could have, on the upper stretches of the Saint John river, some important war industries, but we have nothing. They will not build wooden ships, and they can hardly get contracts for wooden boxes down there. They say the costs are too high. That is something I should like to have investigated. On the other hand the manufacturers of Ontario, who are making boxes for munitions, can go to New Brunswick and buy raw material and transport it clear up to Ontario and process the lumber and put it into the form of wooden boxes and get all kinds of contracts from this government. My hon. friend the member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) says they work faster and cheaper. I do not believe it. Man for man they are not a bit better than our men. I see the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) applauding. He knows I am right, and he knows, so far as his country is concerned, I am right too.

Let us be frank about this matter. There is something wrong about the layout, about distribution. We have always had it thrown at our heads that we have no cheap power in New Brunswick. If we could get the machinery to double the capacity of the government-owned plant at Minto mines, which the ministry of the Hon. J. B. M. Baxter established in New Brunswick, where they burn nothing but slack coal, we could produce power in that province cheaper than it can be produced by hydro in Ontario. The cost of distribution might be a little more, I do not know; but this talk about lack of power is just so much poppycock. Let me tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Munitions and Supply that the people of the country are sick, sore and tired of seeing so much industry centralized in the central provinces. There is a real grievance there and I call on the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) to support me; I call on my friends from Alberta. Where is the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Edwards)? He spoke about this matter last year. He discussed the centralization of industry and talked about water power on the Bow river. Not a yip out of one of them to-day.

Mr. TURGEON: The leader of the opposition complained about so many members speaking in debate. If we spoke on this matter to which he is referring would he complain?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not understand the hon. member's question. It was one of those catch questions intended to divert one. I do not pay attention to that kind of question. I am serious about this matter.

The people of New Brunswick are disappointed and disgusted. The provincial legislature debated this matter the other day, and it was pointed out how little we have. A gentleman in my community who made shells in the last war—he had of course disposed of his machinery and plant but he knew the technique, and was able to get skilled mechanics—thought he could do a patriotic thing as well as give employment in communities where there was not a single factory, by making shells. He sought a contract to make shells. He had arranged for the working capital and he thought he knew where he could get the new machines. It took him a solid year before he got started. When he did get into production I am bound to say the department helped him. I give them that credit, but it was on a small scale. This story can be repeated in many small communities in New Brunswick. I entreat the minister—I have scolded, I have tried to cajole, now I entreat him—to endeavour to do something in the distribution of these war industries, something must be done for the small provinces, for New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I do not know what could be done for Prince Edward Island, whether they could be given industrial employment or not. If the Prime Minister does not do something about it he is going to have another maritime question on his hands, another siege of maritime rights. I remember we had them here in the early twenties. I always admired the way the Prime Minister handled the delegation that came to Ottawa headed by little Johnny Murphy of Halifax. When the Prime Minister got through with him he just did not know where to go. The Prime Minister asked him where he was going if he went out of confederation, and he had no answer. I may have been a long time in offering my congratulations upon the manner in which the Prime Minister handled that delegation, but I do so now. I am glad there were no Conservatives leading that crusade.

I implore the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe)—metaphorically I am on my knees to him—to look into the situation in New Brunswick and see if he cannot do something. There is 15,000 horse-power going to waste on the Aroostook river in New Brunswick. I am sure the Maine people will be after that power. If it is once diverted, good-bye; we shall never get it back.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is there a power plant there?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is, and a good deal of that power is going across the line. It was promoted by international interests and they were entitled to some of that power, because the source of the Aroostook river is in Maine. It just happens that nature, or Lord Ashburton when making his famous treaty, had foresight enough to keep the power site in Canada, not in Maine.

I am only doing my duty to my province in calling attention to this local situation. I tell the minister that there are possibilities there; will he please look into the matter and see if something cannot be done, because the people are greatly dissatisfied.

Mr. HOWE: The Department of Munitions and Supply has not been neglectful of New Brunswick. I know of no instance in which an attempt to move industry into a province has met with as little success as it has in New Brunswick. One of my assistants was one of the first appointees of the war supply board; he has been with me ever since, and I charged him with the responsibility of seeing whether that section of the county could not be brought forward in the manufacture of munitions. But for example we find in Saint John a shipbuilding industry and a stevedoring industry of tremendous importance to the war. We have never yet been able to get the number of mechanics for the shipyard or the number of stevedores for that plant in the busy season to let them operate at anything like capacity. I can tell him that a company of which he is a director, or was until recently—I think he still is—undertook to build a chemical plant in the northern part of the province. We went full out in assisting that development; we wanted it. What happened? A company in the central provinces quoted a cheaper price on the chemicals, and the company I am speaking of decided not to go ahead with the war production.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister had better put it in this way, that the Central Canada company made the price so attractive by a price reduction that it would have been folly to go on with it. I was all for it; I tried to do all I could to help.

Mr. HOWE: I was all for it too. We needed the chemical, and I think that company should have gone through and helped out in the war situation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That company could not do it.

Mr. HOWE: In the matter of boxes, I should like to show my hon. friend the file and indicate to him the companies that quoted. We forced the box business there by paying higher prices than we do in the central provinces, and particularly in the west. We did that because that seemed to be one line of business at which New Brunswick should be able to do well. I think my hon. friend will find that anyone who wished to participate in the box business has a contract.

It is not easy to create industry in areas which do not have industry. In several communities in New Brunswick we have expanded small industries, and we are getting production out of them. There are a few towns along the bay of Chaleur from which we are getting production. But it is not the function of the Department of Munitions and Supply to create industry; it is this department's function to mobilize and expand industry, and that we are doing. It is very seldom that we start from zero and create a new industry anywhere; if we do, it is because there is no nucleus of such an industry in Canada. We develop and expand existing industries. We have attempted to develop industry in the maritimes. We find we have overdone it. At the present time we are moving out of one city in Nova Scotia a very considerable contract which we placed there a year and a half ago, for the reason that we have been able to get no production whatever. We have attempted to force that maritime situation just as far as we could. It is all very well to say there is some undeveloped horsepower—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say undeveloped. It is developed.

Mr. HOWE: Is there horse-power available there that you could buy over the counter?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not sure of that.

Mr. HOWE: We shall have to find that out. But in every part of Canada we have attempted to develop industry, and the more difficult the problem the greater has been our attempt. I do not know of any parts of the country which have received as much attention from our department as the prairie provinces and New Brunswick, because there a real problem was presented—first to find industries that could be set up, and second to organize the placing of industry in those areas. We have succeeded to a certain extent. The hon. member mentioned Calgary. I think Calgary has about all the industry to-day that it can absorb. He mentioned Regina. I think Regina has all it can absorb, more than it has ever had. He called upon certain other hon. members. We have not been neglectful; if the hon. member can produce anyone from his province who can take work and do it at anything like a reasonable price, or show us any industry that can be expanded, he need not beg us on bended knees, because we are looking for production and will be very glad to cooperate.

Mr. MICHAUD: Since the hon. leader of the opposition has opened up this question for the third time I think it my duty and right to support the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) in regard to what he says has already been done for New Brunswick in forcing war industries in that section of Canada. One must not overlook the fact that New Brunswick has a population of 450,000 people, spread over a fairly large area. There are no great centres of population. The largest city is Saint John, with 66,000; the next is Moncton, with 22,000; then Fredericton, the capital, with 10,000, and towns ranging from 3,000 to 8,000 or 9,000. In the second place, unfortunately the industries we had years ago have been either abandoned or moved to Quebec, or as we say in the maritimes, to upper Canada.

When war broke out and we went into the manufacture of munitions, the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) was good enough to ask the people of New Brunswick what they could contribute to the war effort by way of munitions. First he requisitioned the services of the best men who could be mobilized, to advise and help him. Between myself and the citizens of New Brunswick, whom I considered and still consider the most public spirited one could find, irrespective of their political affiliations or allegiance, we advised him to select certain persons. As has been stated already, the minister now has as his first adviser and righthand man in his department a gentleman from New Brunswick who is not serving for a dollar a year, or for his expenses, but who is giving his full time to the country altogether without charge. In addition there are in the minister's department three New Brunswickers who have been asked to find out what industries might be opened in that province.

It is said that we should have some large industries. Well, in order to establish large industries we would have to import skilled labour. The minister has already said that with the small industries now in full operation in New Brunswick there is no spare skilled labour. We would have to provide housing accommodation. We would have to provide machinery. The leader of the opposition has given us the example of a small undertaking in his own city, the capital of the province, in which case a year was required in order to get the necessary machinery.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I did not say that. It took the man a year to get a contract and get going.

Mr. MICHAUD: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, it did.

Mr. MICHAUD: The Minister of Munitions and Supply will corroborate me, I am sure, when I say that it did not take this man a year to get a contract. It took him a year to satisfy the department that he would be able to carry out a contract, that he would be able to find the necessary machinery with which to equip his plant. I must say that not only that individual but others in the province were given the same undertaking or promise and were also advanced the necessary capital with which to place themselves in a position to carry out government contracts. We have shipbuilding in Saint John; one plant there employs a thousand men, and it would employ more men if it could get them. We have small industries, small munitions plants, disseminated all over the province, which are doing just as much as those operating them feel they can handle. They have been advanced capital in order to place themselves in a position to deliver the goods and execute their contracts. I consider that it is better in the interests of New Brunswick to have five or six or seven small munitions plants disseminated all over the province than to have one large plant located at one centre. I know there are now five munitions plants operating in a small way, producing goods of a quality not only satisfactory but considered to be among the best by the inspectors and the department. With regard to boxes, it has been stated already that in order to get the manufacturers of New Brunswick to take contracts for shell boxes, special provision had to be made, and prices higher than would be paid in other parts of the country had to be allowed in order to enable these plants to take and execute contracts. To-day several contracts of this kind are being carried out in that province, and there would be more if there were more contractors to tender on this work.

With regard to the chemical plant which was mentioned by the minister, this was a project of great magnitude and importance, and we were all hoping that it would be located in New Brunswick. We thought it was work that would be suited to that part of the country. Every effort was made to have it constructed there, but at the last moment someone offered to supply the material elsewhere at a much lower cost to the public treasury than it could be supplied by the people whom we were trying to induce to go into the business. Thus we were faced with the fact that to locate the industry in New Brunswick would require a greater expenditure of public money for material than would be the case in another part of the country. Unfortunately, therefore, this proposition did not go through, and that industry was not located in New Brunswick. We also tried to secure another chemical industry of great magnitude for that province, but it was considered that the locality could not take care of such a large undertaking.

I agree that it is regrettable that there are not many more large war industries located in New Brunswick, but that is not the fault of the department or of the government. Unfortunately it is the result of local conditions which cannot be overcome. I submit that every plant available in New Brunswick to-day is working at full capacity, and much more work would be available if those operating the plants thought they could handle larger contracts of this kind. Therefore I submit that the leader of the opposition is not at all justified in trying to cast aspersions on the Minister of Munitions and Supply for not having given more attention to New Brunswick or for not having awarded the people of that province large war contracts.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not much more to say, but I did not think I was casting any aspersions on the minister personally. I was not doing that, and I do not intend what I said to be interpreted in that way. Notwithstanding what the Minister of Fisheries or the Minister of Munitions and Supply may say, the fact remains that there is very little industry in New Brunswick. There was a great deal more industry there in days gone by than there is to-day. It is the old question of geography. The Minister of National Defence is looking at me, and he knows, as I do, that one reason why there is not more industry in the maritime provinces is our geographical position, the long haul required in connection with interprovincial trade.

We have had a great struggle to maintain what industries we have. I know something about the cotton industry in New Brunswick. The raw material has to be hauled via Chicago and the central provinces to New Brunswick, and 90 per cent of the output of the mills must be hauled back and marketed where the buying power is. I happen to know something about the confectionery business, and I feel quite sure that if the factories in Halifax and St. Stephen were burned down, they would never be rebuilt. The consuming public simply is not there. The main body of the consuming body is in the central provinces, and I fear that as time goes on this condition will become worse.

Mr. REID: It will be worse after the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may be worse after the war. I am sorry the minister made reference to my personal connection with the company which was considering this chlorine proposition. I do not think the affairs of that company should be debated in parliament. I did everything I could to get the management to take up that proposition. The plans were all completed, but the supplying corporation came in with an offer which made it impossible from an economic point of view for the company to go any further. The matter had to be dropped because the capital investment could not be made to pay. As a matter of fact, it was represented to me that after the construction period was over, this plant would not maintain much steady employment. That was another factor. There is another angle to be considered; the supplying company must have been obtaining too much for their product.

I do not intend to debate this matter. The fact remains that public opinion in the province, no matter what its political type or character may be, is complaining, rightly or wrongly. This matter was the subject of a debate last week in the house of assembly, when the leaders of both parties brought up the matter. I know the provincial government of New Brunswick has been trying to do something about it. They have had some good men, and some not so good, come here. There is no substantial war industry in that province. They have never asked specially for the establishment in that province of some of these large government-owned industries, although I have always thought that since some of the products of these plants must of necessity go overseas, some of the plants should have been established in the maritime provinces rather than so far removed from the east coast, necessitating a long freight haul.

Mr. REID: You have not as many men idle as we have in British Columbia.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am sorry, but I do not know much about the situation in British Columbia. When I was in British Columbia last July things seemed to be humming. They have steel shipbuilding plants there, but of course there must be considerable change in the export trade from Vancouver due to the cessation of shipping on the Pacific. I have no doubt that there is a real problem there. I am just making a plea with respect to my own province, and if British Columbia finds herself in a worse plight, it is just too bad. I had a letter last week from a journeyman carpenter in Moncton, who told me that he had been employed on construction work at aerodromes and the like. He wanted to know what was going to be done to provide employment for the people of New Brunswick when this construction work was completed. I referred him to the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson), because he came from his constituency and I thought it was a good chance to put the matter up to him. I do not know what can be done about it.

Mr. REID: I should like to have an answer before I return home at Easter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Let us join forces; that is all I can suggest; let us have a coalition for the time being and do what we can. I hope the hon. member for New Westminster raises his voice in this connection. If he will speak for British Columbia, I will speak for New Brunswick. We are not satisfied at all. The minister has said that everyone who wanted a box contract, got one. I should like to tell him that a friend of mine, the president of a Liberal association of one of the counties of New Brunswick, has tendered many times.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: It would have been better if he had been a Tory.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Invariably the answer has been that his price is too high. I will give the minister his name in confidence because I do not want to give it here. He is a fine type of man, and I have been associated with him in one or two business enterprises. He is a good business man, and I cannot understand why he is not able to get down to the level of Ontario prices. There must be something wrong about the standard of wages in Ontario. I should be glad if the minister would have the timber controller or someone tell me why we cannot get more box contracts in New Brunswick. They are making shell boxes in Sackville, but it may be that they are better adapted to that work. The plant operated by the gentleman to whom I have reference is located in the Miramichi district, which has been one of the distressed areas for a long time.

Mr. MAYBANK: Before British Columbia and New Brunswick get together in a coalition I should like to interpose a wedge between them. I suppose if they do get together, there will not be anything left for the flat country from which I come. I noted that the last speaker lamented the fact that someone of Liberal persuasion could not get a contract. I think that is general throughout the country. I think every minister will say that the general complaint is that Liberals do not get the contracts. I am not the least bit concerned about whether a Liberal or a Tory gets a contract; all I want is to have the government bring about a better distribution of contracts than appears to obtain at the present time.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply says that it is not his business to distribute these contracts on any other basis than efficiency of production, and I agree entirely with him. I have spoken on this subject before. I remember the question came up in the house about six or eight months after the fall of France. I was able to say at that time that I thought the work of the Department of Munitions and Supply had been a series of splendid or brilliant improvisations. That is just about what it was. The department was forced to get things quickly, and to do so, turned to the area of centralized industry. Unquestionably that was the right thing to do. From the point of view of a department which is interested chiefly in getting out guns, ships and all kinds of equipment, I believe the attitude taken by the Minister of Munitions and Supply is not to be criticized.

On the other hand I do say that governments must consider the social consequences of the courses they may follow. There is certainly too great a concentration of works here in the east, in that portion recently described by one writer as "the wedge." He was referring to the district bounded by Montreal, North Bay and Windsor. Perhaps it might be called a triangle.

Now I hold in my hand a letter received either to-day or yesterday from the Industrial Development Board of Manitoba. I submit it is a reasonable letter, and I should like to place it on record as substantially expressing my own views with reference to this problem. The letter addressed to me, states:

> This board desires to direct your attention to the situation in Manitoba with respect to lack of war production, idle plants and idle men, many with industrial experience.
> Relief rolls which had decreased to a very considerable extent during 1941 are now on the increase, for example the number of families on relief in Winnipeg was 535 at the end of last October and has now increased to 710 and is growing every day.

Perhaps I should interject that it is usual in February and part of March for relief rolls to increase. That has been my experience in my constituency. Nevertheless that is a very heavy increase at this juncture of our national life. The letter continues:

> The Labour Gazette shows there were 8,790 persons unemployed in Winnipeg, and 9,599 unemployed in Manitoba at December 31 last. The Hon. Errick Willis stated at a recent meeting that there are 1,200 unemployed carpenters in Winnipeg, and that is typical of the conditions amongst skilled men in this province.

Endeavouring to be completely accurate, may I point out that when I was in Winnipeg recently I spoke with the business agents of certain trade unions. They did not place the figure at 1,200, as did Mr. Willis. Rather they said they believed there were between 600 and 700 unemployed at that time. The letter continues:

> Very few plants are in operation more than eight hours per day although capable of handling a wide variety of war requirements if given the opportunity.
> After two and a half years of war only a very few plants have been built or appreciably extended to take care of war contracts of any amount. They include the cordite plant near Transcona, MacDonald Bros. Aircraft in Winnipeg and St. James, Dominion Bridge Company, Winnipeg, and the Manitoba rolling mills at Selkirk.
> Although large numbers of our skilled workmen have gone east and west to fill positions in war industries in other provinces there still remain thousands on short time or without employment who naturally feel that they should be permitted to make their contribution toward the all-out war effort to which Canada and the empire is pledged. Apparently one of the reasons is that industry is far too concentrated in certain areas in the east while vast areas in the prairies are practically without war plants or war contracts. We are informed that Ontario produces 50 per cent of the manufactured goods made in Canada and Quebec 30 per cent, that is 80 per cent of Canada's manufacturing production is concentrated in two eastern provinces, leaving only 20 per cent for the other seven provinces. Manitoba ranks fourth in manufacturing production for Canada but produces only 4 per cent of the total for the dominion. Many communities in the east are so congested with new industries and expanded industries that they are competing for each other's labour and housing has become such a serious problem that War Housing Limited is required to build new homes in those congested districts by the thousands. In Manitoba we have plants which have had very little or no opportunity of manufacturing or subcontracting for war supplies and thousands of skilled workmen whose homes are in the vicinities of these plants should be engaged in production in two or three shifts per 24 hours.

The number of plants in this province operating more than one shift can be counted on one's fingers. Plants in the east are surfeited with war orders which they are months behind in filling. The machine shops of the large paper companies are surfeited with work for war contracts while our machine shops are relatively at a standstill.

Manitoba has well exceeded its proportion of the dominion government's various drives for money, such as the first and second victory loans and war savings certificates.

I read to-day in a Winnipeg paper that in the recent drive they exceeded their quota by 50 per cent. The letter continues:

In addition it has very well, in proportion to its population, supported the three armed services although very badly depleting many farming communities of necessary farm labour in doing so. We feel that the dominion government should see that this provincial area receives a fair share of the war industrial expansion and production, in spending these vast sums of money collected for war purposes.

We have had a number of officials from various departments of the government in Winnipeg during the past few months and have laid these matters before them with the necessary facts and figures. Mr. Sheils assured us just a few days ago that full data is on record in the departments at Ottawa, from which comparisons can be made and which give the facilities, labour, plants, and war production of various Canadian centres.

The next paragraph need not be read, because it simply points out that this letter is being sent to other persons. The final paragraph merely expresses the hope that it will be possible to work out some plan more advantageous to Manitoba.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I was not listening as closely as I might have been, but I did not hear the hon. member mention by whom the letter had been signed.

Mr. MAYBANK: I had not read the actual signature, but I did point out in the beginning that it came from the Industrial Development Board of Manitoba. It is over the signature of the chariman, who is Mr. J. N. T. Bulman.

[Mr. Maybank.]

I do not read this letter or speak in support of its statements in any spirit of blaming anyone. I do not believe the Department of Munitions and Supply can be expected to pay attention to anything except efficiency of production. That department can hardly be expected to place contracts with a view to their social implications. I do insist, however, that some department of government ought to pay attention to the social factor. Surely one need not argue that a large number of unemployed spells "waste"; there can be no getting away from that fact. The unemployment of machinery spells "waste", and waste is one of the things against which we are struggling.

It is true there are more industrial workers at work in Manitoba to-day than there were last year. Something has been done. But it is also true much more can and should be done by this government. It is possible to place work in the country with some regard to the social importance of its placement; and I submit that this should be done.

I do not wish to be in a position of endeavouring to gouge out something for the province of Manitoba. If it can be agreed that the condition of affairs as set out in the letter I have read represents what is fair and just, then I shall be satisfied. But it does not seem to me that such a condition does represent fair play; nor do I think it represents wisdom on the part of the government.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, would it be unreasonable to ask hon. members to defer this discussion to some other order of business? There are two resolutions before the house, and we are dealing with them by consent. Each relates to tax agreements with provinces. I have been hoping minute by minute that this discussion would not become unduly protracted, but present indications are that we are going to have somebody speaking from each province, and that perhaps several other hon. members will ask that more industries be sent to their provinces. Nothing to my mind could be further removed from the subject matter of the resolution than this type of speech. I would respectfully ask hon. members to make these speeches under a resolution or a motion of some kind where they would be in order, instead of to-day. This can go on indefinitely; it is the sort of debate which can continue for days and weeks, and my object will be frustrated entirely if I do not get these resolutions passed, for which I asked consent to proceed.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): Do I understand that we are out of order in discussing this particular matter now?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): I may state, following the statement of the Minister of Finance, that to speak at random on industries in different parts of the country would be out of order at this time. We allow a certain amount of latitude, but if the discussion becomes general it would certainly be out of order.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think this resolution affects our province very much, and I should like to take just a minute or two to substantiate what the hon. member for Winnipeg South has said.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, if this hon. member speaks, then I see no reason why all should not.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I am agreed.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am raising a point of order now.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): I should like to say something on this question, but I will defer it. There is, however, a matter with respect to the agreement as it applies to the maritime provinces; I refer particularly to Nova Scotia. Why is it nesessary to include the special grants under the Duncan and White commissions in the amounts payable to the different provinces? There is, for example, for Nova Scotia $1,300,000 which it has been receiving for a number of years. Why should these sums be added to the compensation being paid to these provinces at this time under the agreement? In order to have the agreement made acceptable to the maritime provinces, an undertaking is given by means of special legislation that the provinces will not be prejudiced thereby, but these sums will be made payable to the provinces subsequent to the termination of this agreement. Why is the amount not deducted from the amount now payable and made a matter of permanent legislation at this time?

Mr. ILSLEY: The amounts have been voted year after year by special grant, and all special grants, including these, to the provinces were discontinued. The maritime provinces took the ground that their special grants were in a little different position from the other special grants, and it was considered that the best way to recognize the principle and at the same time follow along the line on which we started was to pay the amounts under the agreements, amounts large enough to include the special grants, until the termination of the agreements, and then guarantee the continuance of them afterwards by this legislation. The dollar result is exactly the same, whether we do it this way or the hon. gentleman's way, but to do it this way fits in to what we did last year; it fits into the item which was passed in the supplementary estimates, and into the general scheme; and since it comes to the same thing financially, and since it gives the same assurance for the future, it would be awkward to change it now.

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland): It leaves the impression that the maritime provinces are receiving a very much larger sum than they are in reality.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of the New Brunswick agreement and the Nova Scotia agreement, there is a special item in the New Brunswick agreement of some $300,000 odd which is given for no apparent reason, that I can locate in the schedule. What is the reason for that extra $300,000? Is it on the ground of necessity?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, the fiscal need.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And was the minister aware that, at the same time as he was giving that $300,000 the government of New Brunswick were proposing to take out of the taxpayers additional sums by way of taxation beyond what they have been taking? The point of the whole thing is that the agreement is being defeated by provincial government policy. Instead of the taxpayers getting relief, they are paying a much larger sum here in federal income tax, and new taxation is being imposed on them provincially. For example, $250,000 is levied from the people under the guise of a tuberculosis tax; in reality it is a tax on the poor man's tobacco. Then there is this question of freezing the amount of the income tax and the corporation tax at the 1940 level, which is grossly unfair, having regard to the fact that more money is being spent in the province, and to the consequent increase which would come to the province and the municipalities from that increased flow. This is the cause of a good deal of trouble there. It is one of the reasons why we have some new municipal taxes, and it is something of which the minister should have taken account. Why was the figure frozen at the 1940 level? Why should there not have been some flexibility in that amount, so that the provinces would be reimbursed to the extent that they will suffer in any given year by reason of vacating the field, rather than that they should suffer only the loss on a given year which is below the maximum? The minister gets my point, I am sure?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perfectly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If this prodigious spending goes on, the loss of revenue in 1942 to the provinces or the municipalities will be still greater, and we shall have more taxes to carry on the public services.

I am bound to say that the municipalities are making a manful effort to keep down the assessment. That of the city of Fredericton is just $1,000 more than it was a year ago, and the city of Moncton has reduced its municipal assessment by something like $180,000—which is of course most commendable. But the province has raised its budget by half a million dollars, and we are in the unhappy position not only of finding ourselves paying an increased income tax, which we are glad to do, but of being doubled up in the municipal field. The whole thing is wrong, contrary to the spirit of the Sirois report, contrary to the intent of the original municipal agreements; and this government does nothing, as far as I can see, to prevent it. New Brunswick should be spending less as the demands for the federal treasury grow, and yet we are spending more.

I understand the premier of Nova Scotia made the statement that the agreement which they have signed or proposed to sign provides much less than they hoped to get. What was the spirit in which these people came here? Did they come here to ask for a great deal in the hope that they would get something more than had been offered? What was the demand made by Nova Scotia? I have not had time to go through the correspondence. I do not understand what that position is, but I think we are entitled to be enlightened, and this is the time for it—on the resolution stage.

Mr. REID: I understand that British Columbia has signed an agreement. Has the $750,000 given to that province in 1933 been wiped out?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is discontinued.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have no desire to hold up the resolution, but there must be some place where the representatives of the seven provinces that are being fleeced can express their feelings and demand of the government that something be done about the matter. There are seven provinces that are simply paying the shot. Money is being collected which they are gladly giving in the way of loans, and money is being spent largely in the two central provinces. We do not desire to do anything that would militate against the two central provinces, with whom we have no quarrel, but every province lives largely on the product of its industry. If money is to be collected from Alberta, or Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick, or any of the other seven provinces, with the result that industries and businesses in those provinces are unable to sell their goods, and then the money is spent in the two central provinces, there is being created a situation which is going to wreck the country. All I wish to do is to protest against the whole set-up. I am not satisfied that this is the place to do it, but since the leader of the opposition has raised the question, I agree with him.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It seems strange to me that this resolution has been brought in without a statement from the minister. Perhaps he intends to make a carefully prepared statement when he introduces the bill, and I hope that on that occasion he will give us a clear picture of what will be involved in relation to those provinces which are vacating the personal income tax and corporation tax fields, and will tell us what compensation they will receive. If copies of all agreements can be made available, and a statement given showing how the different provinces will be affected, what the quid pro quo will be, it will be very helpful. In fact, it would have been better to have had that statement when the resolution was being introduced. Had we had such a statement we would have been able to study the whole situation with regard to the agreements as they will affect the different provinces. However, if the minister intends to make a statement later, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. ILSLEY: To anyone reading the bill, it will convey a great deal of information. It will set out the amounts payable to each province, first, in compensation for the tax fields, and, second, by way of fiscal need subsidy. The agreements, as they had been drafted, were laid on the table of the house some weeks ago, and hon. gentlemen can get those and read them. I wish them joy reading those agreements, because they are very long and complicated; nevertheless, they do convey the information which hon. members are seeking. When I bring down the bill I shall make a detailed statement of the whole matter.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): By provinces?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I cannot remember having been engaged in a more comprehensive or intricate set of transactions and it has required an immense amount of work and time. It would defeat my purpose entirely and would be out of place for me to attempt to make a long and complex statement in connection with this resolution at the present time. I thought this would be regarded as a technical preliminary to the bill. The bill itself will start hon. members off and they can study the agreements. When I introduce the bill I shall make a careful statement on the whole matter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister should have made the statement at the very outset—that is the proper time—on the principle of the matter, and then an opportunity could have been given to ask questions. We will let it go this time, but not again.

Mr. REID: Have the agreements been tabled? If so, where can we see them? I have in mind particularly the one in connection with British Columbia.

Mr. ILSLEY: The one that has been signed has not been tabled; it was signed only on Friday. I will table that right away; there is no reason why it should not be placed on the table. The draft agreements were tabled some weeks ago.

Mr. GILLIS: Does the minister intend to bring this bill in before the recess?

Mr. ILSLEY: To-day. I want it given first reading to-day so that the legislatures can have a look at it. Two of them have made a request and one is anxious to see it.

Mr. GILLIS: When will the agreements be available?

Mr. ILSLEY: The draft agreements are already a part of the records of the house. The only completed agreement is the one with British Columbia, and at the request of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), I will table a copy of it tomorrow or the next day, as soon as it can be prepared, but before the recess at any rate. The other agreements will be tabled as and when they are completed.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will the debate on the bills take place before recess, or will the bills be simply introduced.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just introduced.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I notice that there is a matter before the legislature of Saskatchewan in the form of the second reading of a bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Has the agreement been completed with Saskatchewan?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the position so far as that province is concerned?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the government has introduced a bill authorizing it to enter into an agreement with the dominion.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16, to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements with the governments of the provinces of Canada respecting the vacation by the provinces of the personal income tax and corporation tax fields for the duration of the war, and Bill No. 17, to provide for the payment of additional subsidies to the maritime provinces.

Motion agreed to and bills read the first time.

CANADIAN ARMY

EFFECT UPON AGRICULTURE OF USE OF HORSES FOR TRANSPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. ROSS (Souris): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston), who I notice is not at the moment in his seat. The question is based on an article in the Ottawa Journal of March 21, 1942, under the headline "Canadian army forces to use horses for transport." Will the Minister of National Defence say whether or not this is correct? If it is, it would affect agriculture throughout Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think that question should be placed on the order paper.

WAR EXPENDITURES

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he has been able to complete arrangements for the appointment of the war expenditures committee.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): As a matter of fact I have not, but looking at my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) I think he and I shall be able to do so very soon.

PRIVILEGE—MR. MACKENZIE KING

REFERENCE TO ADVERTISEMENT PUBLISHED IN THE NEWSPAPER "LA PRESSE"

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): On a matter of privilege, on Friday last the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Lacombe)—I am sorry he is not in his seat at the present time—rose on a question of privilege in reference to an advertisement published in the newspaper La Presse. He spoke at page 1485 of Hansard, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. St. Laurent) to an advertisement published at the expense of the dominion government in the great Montreal daily La Presse. The concluding words of that advertisement are as follows.

And he gave the concluding words. I have before me the advertisement which appeared in La Presse to which the hon. member referred, and I notice he quoted the words near the end of the advertisement but refrained altogether from quoting the following words which appear equally on the face of the advertisement:

Cet espace est gracieusement offert, comme contribution à l'effort de guerre du Canada, par Hull Iron & Steel Foundries Limited.

Translating that I would say it means that:

This space has been donated as a contribution to the war effort of Canada by the Hull Iron and Steel Foundries Limited.

It is not an advertisement that is being paid for by the government of Canada—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Indirectly it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, neither directly nor indirectly. It is paid for by this company as a contribution to Canada's war effort, and I submit that the hon. member ought to have been, if he was not, fully cognizant of the statement which appears as I have read it, and should have communicated that fact to the house. As a matter of fact he should not have raised the question at all.

WAR APPROPRIATION

UNITED KINGDOM FINANCING—WAR SUPPLIES, FOOD AND LOAN WITHOUT INTEREST

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, for granting to his majesty aid for the purpose of financing United Kingdom war requirements in Canada and for national defence and security.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it possible under the wording of this bill, especially section 3, subsection 3, that all the billion dollars might be taken up by acquiring the sterling balances held by the foreign exchange control board? I do not know what the state of the account is but the way the bill reads, that could be done. It will be remembered that the billion dollar credit is in addition to the $700 million conversion—to use that for lack of a better term. The bill as drafted provides a blanket additional power and might be used to take up the whole billion dollar gift.

Perhaps the minister would prefer to deal with it section by section, but it goes to the principle of the measure, and this is the only time we can ask questions on the principle in committee.

Mr. ILSLEY: Whatever could be done under the bill, there is no doubt whatever as to what will be done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then why not say "will be" instead of "may be"? There should be some limitation, because this may not be a gift at all in a sense for the future. It is quite possible that if the foreign exchange control board had a billion dollars' worth of sterling, the government under this measure could acquire it all and there would not be anything more. This was loosely drafted.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is objecting to the word "may" throughout?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, it is a blanket power; it does not go to the objective as stated by the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the usual way to draw bills.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is no answer.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sure if I were to go to the justice department and ask them to spell it out, their advice would be, "No, leave it that way." I am stating what will be done. I will read this over critically, having the hon. gentleman's observations in mind; it is possible there would be power to do some queer things with this that nobody has any thought of doing. But I repeat what will be done. There is a considerable amount of sterling in the hands of the foreign exchange control board; it is perhaps not far from a billion dollars; but it is proposed to convert $700 million worth of it into a loan, and it is proposed to repatriate $295 million of securities, so that takes up $995 million worth of that sterling. Therefore there will be a small amount left, perhaps seventy or eighty million dollars' worth, that will be retired out of the billion dollar gift, leaving something over $200 million available to the United Kingdom for the purchase of goods and supplies in this country. That is the programme, and this bill empowers the government to carry out that programme. The only point as I understand it is that the hon. gentleman says that imperative words rather than empowering words should be put in this bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not the point. I understand the legal position very well.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): Order. We are now on clause 1, short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But it is the only clause under which the principle of the bill may be discussed. If you do not let us discuss it on that, we cannot discuss the principle at all in committee. Possibly it might be done on the preamble. The bill now before us does not carry out the government's proposals. It could switch the money. We have heard of this sort of thing being done before. I remember when moneys were voted to the Canadian National Railways prior to 1930 for capital expenditures for the railway and I do not know how many millions were put into the Prince boats. They were switched by the management with the consent of the Minister of Railways of that day, and parliament knew nothing about these ships until the contracts were let. I am not accusing the minister of bad faith, but there is concrete evidence of what has happened in the past as to what may be done. I do not know how much sterling the foreign exchange control board has at the moment; but if they had a billion dollars, this money could be used for that, and there would be no gift at all.

Mr. MARTIN: Is it subsection 3 about which the hon. gentleman is worried

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes; that is the pertinent section. This is a blanket power that will enable the government to do anything with this billion dollars.

Mr. ILSLEY: As I said, the point is that the hon. gentleman suggests an imperative word instead of an empowering word.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest a new set-up altogether, to cover the concrete proposals the minister gave parliament. The gentlemen who drew up this bill did not carry out the thesis of the minister when he addressed the house at the resolution stage, except in part. I think that is a fair statement. There need not be any gift at all, if they want to take up the sterling exchange owned at the present time by the foreign exchange control board.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not admit that for one moment, and the hon. gentleman has to prove it if he wants it to stick. He has made that assertion several times; he has repeated the statement but he has not backed it up by any argument. I have been trying to find out what he is basing it on, but I cannot. This is what I base my denial upon. On page 3 section 3 subsection 3, at lines 7, 8 and 9, the words "which are not required for the purposes of sections four and five of this act" are found. I understood the hon. gentleman to argue that because subsection 3 reads in this way—

> The minister may acquire from the foreign exchange control board all sterling balances held by the said board at the date of the commencement of this act . . . and may pay for the sterling balances so acquired out of the moneys appropriated by subsection one of this section. . . .

—under that the minister might take the whole billion dollars and pay for the sterling balances, leaving nothing for the gift.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the point.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is as I understand the hon. gentleman's argument. That argument leaves out of account the words which I skipped as I read the section, which were these:

> . . . which are not required for the purposes of sections 4 and 5 of this act and for the current operations of the said board. . . .

Therefore the power which is given in that connection is limited and cut down by the words "which are not required for the purposes of sections 4 and 5 of this act." The government cannot use any part of that billion dollars which is required for the purposes of sections 4 and 5 of the bill. Therefore I have to take out of that billion dollars, first of all, the $700,000,000. I have to apply sterling to that $700,000,000 first, before I take this billion dollars to purchase sterling.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Of course it is not imperative upon the government to act under either section 4 or section 5. Perhaps the minister is on sound ground when he says he can take only the balance. But supposing they only take part of what is provided under sections 4 and 5; there is nothing imperative on the minister to repatriate any of these securities. It may be good policy, and I have no doubt the minister will do it, but I am objecting to the way in which the scheme is drawn up. In drafting these measures why do you not appropriate first? You have put this in reverse. Why do you not appropriate the $700,000,000 first, then so much for repatriation, and say that the remainder shall be used in a certain way? I am asking this for information: is it quite clear that there is a billion dollars plus the $700,000,000 altogether?

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And the $295,000,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the whole thing would come to almost two billion dollars on that basis, would it not? That is what it would amount to, if you add the three amounts together?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am trying to clarify the situation. A billion dollars is provided for in section 3, subsection 1. Then subsection 3 says:

> The minister may acquire from the foreign exchange control board all sterling balances held by the said board at the date of the commencement of this act, which are not required for the purposes of sections 4 and 5. . . .

Is it clear that before he can take those sterling balances held by the board, he must provide for the $700,000,000? The $700,000,000 is in addition to the billion dollars, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So that makes $1,700 million, and in addition there is the $295,000,000, for repatriation. Those are to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund, subject to the proviso in the last part of section 5, subsection 1. I suppose I am stupid, but I just cannot see how much is going into the gift, when you take out the sterling.

Mr. MICHAUD: A billion dollars.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, it will be only part of the billion dollars; something has to be taken out for sterling already acquired for this account overseas. The $700,000,000 visualized in section 4 is over and above the billion dollars; I think that is quite clear, and that is what the minister stated in his opening speech. Then it is the remainder of the sterling balance, after the $700,000,000, that may be paid under section 3, subsection 3.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the $295,000,000 in securities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the position in dollars and cents? Perhaps that will illustrate it. How much sterling does the foreign exchange control board hold to-day, and is it likely to be increased during the period of this law? We will put it in that way.

Mr. ILSLEY: The board now has, I believe, $1,087,000,000 of sterling. That sterling will be retired, as I have said, by the proceeds of the $700,000,000 loan. That will retire $700,000,000 of it. The securities will have a value of about $295,000,000. That makes $995,000,000 of it. The balance will be retired out of the gift.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be seventy or eighty million?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will that be frozen at that figure; will there be any more accumulated by the foreign exchange control board which will be payable out of the billion dollars?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; not in the way in which it has been done in the past, at least, because there will be no occasion for it. The dollars will be supplied by the gift.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To the extent of the gift?

Mr. ILSLEY: Exactly. It will not be necessary for us to furnish dollars by the purchase of sterling. We will furnish dollars without purchasing sterling.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. TRIPP: Will foodstuffs include wheat?

Mr. ILSLEY: That matter would come under section 3 and we are still on section 1. I think we should confine our discussion to this section, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will renew his question when we reach section 3.

Mr. ISNOR: When we rose at 6 o'clock the leader of the opposition was inquiring from the Minister of Finance as to whether this bill involved an amount of two billion dollars, or whether it covered an amount of one billion dollars. I think the Minister of Finance should clear up this misunderstanding which I believe exists, not only in the mind of the leader of the opposition but in the minds of a great many people throughout the country. I think he would be paying a tribute to the people of Canada if he explained that this was a gift outright to Great Britain of one billion dollars. As I understand the financial background, by March 31, 1943, Great Britain will owe something like $2,500,000,000 for food, munitions and general supplies. Great Britain owed Canada $1,500,000,000, which has been paid with securities and cash, leaving an outstanding balance of $1,000,000,000. That is the picture as I see it. I believe there is confusion because of the manner in which the resolution was framed. In one part it refers to the gift of $1,000,000,000 which is a generous gesture, not on the part of the government but on the part of the people of Canada, as stated by the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. ILSLEY: The gift is $1,000,000,000, no more. The indebtedness of Great Britain to Canada, if sterling may be considered an indebtedness—and in one sense it is—up to the present is $1,087,000,000, as I said this afternoon. That indebtedness is not being cancelled except to the extent—this afternoon I said $70,000,000 or $80,000,000, but it may be $90,000,000—of $90,000,000 which will be subtracted from the $1,000,000,000 gift, so that the total gift will be just $1,000,000,000. This $700,000,000 is not an additional gift, any more than the $295,000,000 representing securities.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are converted.

Mr. ILSLEY: You are merely converting $700,000,000 of sterling indebtedness into a dollar indebtedness; and as regards the $295,000,000 more of sterling indebtedness, you are getting that paid by repatriating $295,000,000 worth of dominion and Canadian National Railways securities in Great Britain. The difference between $995,000,000 and $1,087,000,000 is $92,000,000, which will be represented by sterling in our hands. That sterling we return to Great Britain against the gift, charging it to the gift or subtracting that amount from the gift.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a cancellation to that extent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a cancellation to that extent, but it does not increase or decrease the gift; it simply means that the period which the gift covers began earlier this month instead of at the present time. It will run probably until early in 1943, and when the gift is exhausted it will remain to be determined what we shall do then. We may begin accumulating sterling, but that is a matter for later consideration.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How much of this billion dollars is it estimated will come back to the public treasury in taxation?

Mr. ILSLEY: No estimate has been made of that, and I do not think it would be possible to make one.

Mr. MacNICOL: What will the government do with the securities that are to be repatriated? Will they be kept in the government treasury or sold on the market?

Mr. ILSLEY: The securities will not be put on the market. I think the securities of the Canadian National Railways will be held by the government as a charge against the property of the system. The Dominion of Canada securities would be in our hands; we would owe ourselves.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The dominion securities would be cancelled, but the Canadian National securities would be held by the government as a charge against the railways.

Mr. ILSLEY: Right.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): At par exchange or $4.45?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not understand that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You are buying them back at $4.45; are you going to charge them against the railway at that rate?

Mr. ISNOR: As I understand it, the rate of $4.45 does not enter into the picture at all; it is the net cost or purchase price.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): When the railway comes to pay for the securities are you going to charge the full value, the cost to the government, or are you going to make a profit?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the actual market value of the Canadian National securities that are to be repatriated? I know they are guaranteed by the government, but what is the real value of these securities?

Mr. ILSLEY: It varies with the security. Does the hon. gentleman want to know whether it will be 90, 95 or 96?

Mr. MacNICOL: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: There are many issues of these securities and I have not a list before me. They are vested in the British government at the market price and we take them over from the British government at that price, plus interest for the time they are in the hands of the British government.

Mr. REID: I understand that in our debt structure are some old borrowings bearing interest at 3½ per cent, dating back many years and running twenty, thirty and forty years. These are payable in London, and I wonder whether some of them are being liquidated under this plan.

Mr. ILSLEY: Everything in the hands of residents of the United Kingdom is being repatriated; that is, dominion securities and Canadian National Railways securities. Those would be all kinds of Canadian National Railways guaranteed and unguaranteed securities, in the hands of the British public.

Mr. REID: These were not Canadian National Railways securities. These were borrowings which took place thirty or forty years ago, for which we have been paying 3½ per cent interest. They were not Canadian National Railways securities, and I am wondering whether they will be liquidated in this amount. They were borrowings by the dominion government.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are all being repatriated. All Canadian government and Canadian National Railways securities are being repatriated.

Mr. JACKMAN: Are those securities which we are repatriating dollar pay or sterling pay?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are both sterling and dollar—part of one and part of the other.

Mr. JACKMAN: Did the minister answer the question of the leader of the opposition with respect to the difference between $4.86⅔ and the amount mentioned here? This is an obligation on the debtor's books, in one instance on those of the Dominion of Canada and in the other, on those of the Canadian National Railways. The repurchase price is $4.45. Where does the difference of 10 per cent come in? Do we set it up as a profit? If we forget the gift end of the matter, there is really a profit on the transaction. When we became obligated the debt stood at a rate of $4.86⅔, and the rate here indicated is $4.45. With respect to the Canadian National Railways obligations there is a distinct profit of about 42 cents per pound sterling. We retire for $4.45 a debt for which we obligated ourselves to the extent of $4.86⅔.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether I understand the hon. member's question. Let me laboriously outline the transaction. As I understand it, at some earlier time the Canadian National Railways borrowed a number of pounds from persons in the United Kingdom. They owe that number of pounds back.

Mr. JACKMAN: That refers to sterling securities.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is that not what the hon. member is talking about?

Mr. JACKMAN: Dollar securities.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. member talking about sterling securities?

Mr. JACKMAN: I asked first whether the obligations we were retiring were sterling pay or dollar pay. The minister replied that there were some of each. If the Canadian National Railways have dollar obligations which they had incurred at $4.86⅔ and which they are now retiring at $4.45, obviously there is a profit of nearly 10 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the Canadian National Railways borrowed dollars in the old country, they got so many dollars, and they owe so many dollars in return, do they not? How does the question of exchange enter into the transaction at all?

Mr. JACKMAN: When we borrowed dollars from the old country they undoubtedly would stipulate that we pay them either in dollars or in sterling—and from their point of view, at that time it would be preferably in sterling.

Mr. ILSLEY: I started to talk about sterling, and the hon. member switched me to dollar pay. Let us take the dollar pay securities first.

Mr. JACKMAN: In dollar pay it would clear out; but in sterling pay it will be easier for us to do it now at $4.45 than at $4.86⅔. Therefore there is a profit.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what I was trying to analyse. Under sterling pay the Canadian National Railways would borrow so many pounds sterling, at some earlier date. That pound sterling when received by them, they probably converted into dollars, getting $4.86⅔ for each pound sterling. That would give them more dollars than they would be able to get to-day for that number of pounds sterling. But to-day they simply have to pay back their obligation in respect of so many pounds sterling.

Mr. JACKMAN: But we keep our books in dollars. The sterling obligation stands on the books of the Canadian National Railways at $4.86⅔ to every pound we owe. Now we are paying it back at $4.45; so obviously there is a profit of about 42 cents.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right. The Canadian National Railways require fewer dollars to buy the number of pounds required than they got per pound for the sterling which they borrowed some years ago. The railways make a profit there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a fair answer. But let me understand it. Government funds buy the sterling in the first place; we have advanced the money. You get your sterling against the loan to the British government. Then you make a bookkeeping entry and lend the money to the Canadian National Railways against these securities, do you not? Do they get these securities, or do you hold them?

In any event the point is that the railways will make a profit on the repatriation out of the public treasury. That is the core of the whole thing, is it not? I do not know that I just understand the mechanics of the transaction. It would be my understanding that the British government have assembled these securities in London from their own nationals, under a vesting order. We have an adverse balance. This is deposited in London banks to take care of the adverse balance. It is in sterling, over there in the banks. The government buys back, and pays out of the sterling accumulated over there. The government gets the securities in the first place, but really for the account of the national railways to whom we lend the money to take up these securities. They eventually get them at $4.45. That is the transaction, is it not?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And they get the profit?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Do we buy them from the British government at the market price? We will say we have a 5 per cent issue which is standing to-day at 110, or we may have a 4 per cent standing at 104, or something like that. I am just using rough figures. Do we pay the British government 110 for the securities they hold, on the basis of $4.45 exchange? Is that the idea of the transaction?

Mr. ILSLEY: We buy the securities at the market price, whatever that was, on January 26, and use the sterling we have to pay for them. The transactions the hon. member is talking about are the transactions between the government and the Canadian National Railways.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Interpretation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the meaning of section 2 (a) (ii)? This has reference to the long list of scheduled companies owned by the Canadian National Railways? The list appears in the revised statutes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some of those are held over there, are they?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Can the minister tell us what the allocation is, so that we will know what we are buying?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a long list.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is not absolutely necessary that I should have it. The minister might let me have a memorandum of it; I do not wish to have it on the record.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are securities of the Canadian National Railways, the Grand Trunk railway system, the Great Western—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All subsidiary companies.

Mr. ILSLEY:—and the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk Western, the St. John and Quebec, the Canadian Northern Ontario railway, the Canadian Northern Quebec railway, the Canadian Northern railway, the Quebec and Lake St. John, the Northern railway and other subsidiaries.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): With regard to Quebec and Lake St. John, they were to be taken over, except a part, by the dominion under arrangements which the province of New Brunswick made in the early thirties. They are, I believe, guaranteed in full by New Brunswick. Will the government still hold New Brunswick to that guarantee? It does not alter the transaction in that respect.

Mr. ILSLEY: The securities will remain alive.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The effect will be the same?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there any distinction between the companies referred to in section 2(a) (ii) and 2(a) (iv)? There must be a reason. I do not understand. I tried to puzzle that out from the statutes this afternoon before I came downstairs. The Canadian National Railways Act, section 2, paragraph (e) referred to in section 2(a) (iv) of this bill, gives a definition of Canadian National Railways. Is this an extension of the definition referred to in 2(a) and 2(a) (ii), or are they the same?

Mr. ILSLEY: The question is, whether any companies have been declared by the governor in council to be comprised in a system that is not included in the schedule?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is really the effect of the question.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not that information.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I would not hold up the bill. The question is not important.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask a question with reference to paragraph (b) of section 2, which reads:

(b) "Dominion of Canada securities" means stocks, securities, or obligations of, or guaranteed either as to interest or as to principal and interest, by the Dominion of Canada.

What are the stocks, if any, other than those that are of the Canadian National Railways or any subsidiaries of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. ILSLEY: Montreal harbour bonds and New Westminster bonds. Those are the only ones that are neither securities of the government nor securities of the railways.

Mr. MacNICOL: The ones the minister has just mentioned are securities of the government then?

Mr. ILSLEY: Those two types of securities I have mentioned are guaranteed by the Dominion of Canada. I thought that was what the hon. gentleman asked—if there were any issued by other than railways which are guaranteed by the dominion government. Those are the ones I mentioned.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What is meant by paragraph (e):

(e) "sterling balances" means deposits in pounds sterling in banks in the United Kingdom.

What deposits are meant? Deposits by whom?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are deposits to the credit of the foreign exchange control board or of the government of Canada in banks of the United Kingdom payable in sterling.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): For instance, there are some companies which have deposits in banks in the sterling bloc; but in certain cases the deposit is frozen; in other cases the only thing they can do with it is invest it in British securities. Does it mean those balances which are now controlled by the British government?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HAZEN: Also in connection with section 2 (e), is the definition complete enough?

(e) "sterling balances" means deposits in pounds sterling in banks in the United Kingdom.

The minister just said that these were deposits to the credit of either the dominion government or the foreign exchange control board. Should it not say so in the definition?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. Wherever it is used in the bill, that point is made clear.

Mr. HAZEN: Is it clear in the bill? I have not gone all through it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not run through the bill critically, but in section 3, subsection 3, reference is made to "sterling balances held by the said board", and in subsection 4 reference is made to "the amount of sterling balances required for the current operations of the foreign exchange control board". That last does not quite cover the point, but subsection 3 does. It is a typical use of the expression.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Minister may pay for the account of the government of the United Kingdom, $1,000,000,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In lines 36 and 37, section 3 reads:

The minister may, subject to regulations to be made by the governor in council with reference thereto. . . .

What are the nature and scope of the proposed regulations? Will the minister read them?

Mr. ILSLEY: Under section 3, subsection 2:

Payments or advances may be made under subsection 1 of this section from time to time upon the minister being satisfied that the amount thereof is necessary to make the said purchases and defray the said expenses.

The character of the evidence which will be regarded as necessary to satisfy the minister and, probably, procedure of one kind and another which one cannot just visualize now, will have to be laid down. It will have to be laid down by regulation. Therefore the payment of this is authorized subject to regulations to be made by the governor in council.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): In other words, the legislation merely lays down an enabling provision and leaves it to the governor in council to operate it in any way they like, subject to the succeeding clauses, which stipulate the purposes only of the bill. We ought to have these regulations in the bill rather than leave it to the governor in council. Of course it is now an old policy with this government to do everything by order in council. I think this ought to be in the bill, and those who are drafting the legislation should be prepared to tell us what the regulations are to be, their scope, and how the mechanics are to be operated.

I object to the principle of doing things by order in council. We have not objected enough. It may be that this is a war measure; it may be that the government think they could have done the whole thing by order in council under the War Measures Act. I do not agree, but they have been good enough to bring down a bill, which of course is very much better than the way in which they handled the summer-fallow last year, by estimate and regulation. After all, however, this leaves power in the hands of the governor in council to legislate, and the principle is objectionable. Having registered that protest I will say no more about it.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to see if I have a clear understanding of section 3. Let us assume that the bill has passed and that the British government now have a credit of one billion dollars in Canada. As they order any of the items mentioned in the section—tanks, guns and so on—they determine how much they want of each item, and whatever they determine they need, our government buys for them in Canada, making a free gift of the whole to the British government. Am I clear in that?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not clear from the legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not like to say yes unless I understand fully what the question is.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will try to put it a little more clearly.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member was pretty clear and I will try to deal with the question. The United Kingdom will continue, I anticipate, to order goods from Canada in the future as they have done in the past, and in some instances it may be that the goods will be bought by the dominion and given without a price being attached to them other than the price which was paid by the dominion government.

Mr. MacNICOL: What goods you buy you will buy on request orders from the British government?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. In other instances, though I cannot say that this is what will be done, I expect that the United Kingdom would themselves set the price in agreement with agencies of the dominion government, or the dominion government itself selling Canadian goods to the United Kingdom, except that no money would be collected for them. Some commodity would be sold at so much a unit and would be charged to the gift. It would be necessary to know the amount of the gift in order to determine when the period of the gift was exhausted.

Mr. MacNICOL: For instance, if the British government sends an order to the dominoin government, or through its agencies here, for, say 4·7 inch guns, one of the items mentioned, when these guns are shipped the price is charged against the credit of one billion dollars.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, that is right.

Mr. MacNICOL: What I am trying to get clear is this. It is a billion dollars of a free gift in goods?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: To help the British government fight the war.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. TUSTIN: Is the British government going to set the price on the goods?

Mr. ILSLEY: In agreement, I said, with the agency of the dominion government selling the goods.

Mr. STIRLING: They will do what they have been doing up to now.

Mr. ILSLEY: Exactly.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The British government will hardly look a gift horse in the mouth and ask what price tag you are putting on this machine or that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want any such idea to get abroad.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister's explanation is susceptible of that construction.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not expect the dominion government to put two prices on anything.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not suggest that. I said they would not look a gift horse, a free gift, in the mouth, and ask what price tag you were putting on anything in using up the billion dollars. I would not think they would, when they are getting it free, and I did not suggest that there would be two prices. What I think the government ought to do would be to charge against the billion dollar appropriation, the actual, proper cost of the goods in question, delivered to Britain. That is what I hope will be done, and it will be a gift in kind from the Canadian people to Britain. That is what ought to be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: That sounds simpler than it is. There are some articles as to which the cost cannot be ascertained.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Until completed.

Mr. ILSLEY: We anticipate that the transactions will go on just as they have done before. These are to be business transactions, the same as if we were seller and they were buyer; otherwise the transaction has no meaning. It makes a big difference with regard to the terminating date of the transaction.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree with that, but that is another matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: It makes a big difference if either party is to be loose about price.

Mr. TUSTIN: In the same paragraph reference is made to foodstuffs. In the past year or two there have been agreements between the dominion and British governments in regard to bacon and cheese, and the price that has been paid to the producer in Canada has been considerably above that paid by the British government. Is the same kind of agreement going to enter into this billion dollar transaction?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not correct. The price that has been paid for bacon is the price received by the British government. There was a bonus for a time but there is no longer any bonus. The price for bacon is 100 shillings per hundredweight, obtained from the United Kingdom and paid to the Canadian producer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Does that policy apply to wheat as well as to bacon and cheese?

Mr. ILSLEY: Does what apply?

Mr. COLDWELL: Is the price paid by Britain that which has been credited to the farmer by the wheat board.

Mr. ILSLEY: Absolutely; there is no doubt about that. The wheat board cannot do anything else.

Mr. COLDWELL: The wheat board is receiving only the price the farmers get?

Mr. ILSLEY: The wheat board sells the wheat for a certain price, and that price is dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the wheat board act. The wheat board could not do anything else; they could not subtract any part of it.

Mr. COLDWELL: There is a belief that the British government has been paying considerably more than the Fort William price of wheat, through the Canadian wheat board, and I am asking the question because of the manner in which another question was put by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox, who inquired about bacon and hogs. I was wondering whether the same policy carried right through.

Mr. ILSLEY: In regard to wheat, the whole practice of pooling must be considered. I do not want to say anything that may prove to be inaccurate, but I would certainly be greatly surprised if the wheat board had any profit on wheat. It may be that the wheat board would make some sales of wheat which would be higher than the initial price for that particular period. But if so, that goes into the board's operations against other losses on wheat. The question which year this wheat is sold in is material in determining whether there is a profit or a loss on a particular year's wheat. There has been a well recognized and established practice since about 1935 or 1936 by which the sales are considered to be out of the year in proportion to the holdings of the wheat at the beginning of the year.

But I do not know that that gets us very far ahead. The wheat board sells the wheat and takes the purchase price into its books. When the time comes when they can settle for a particular year they do so, and the farmers who produced the wheat in that year, if there is a profit on that year's wheat, collect money under their participation certificates. If there is a loss on that year, they do not get any money. There have not been many profits in recent years.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister say a few words regarding the general principle of this section as it applies to other allied nations? As I understand it, all the allied nations have undertaken an all-out war effort, to fight the enemy wherever he may be, whether on the shores of England, Australia or America. I think I heard the President of the United States say that the allied nations would pool their resources. If that is the situation, there should be no such thing as inter-allied payments; every nation should turn into the pool the total amount of its production for a common effort. Have there been any discussions in that regard? We are making this gift to Britain, and I think all the allied nations should be turning in their total production for the purpose of defeating the enemy, wherever found, without any question of payment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have not sufficient knowledge of those matters to give an answer which would be of value with regard to that.

Mr. QUELCH: Is this likely to be the beginning of such action on the part of other nations?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not say it is. The principle which the hon. member suggests is perhaps correct; but from our point of view here in Canada we are anxious to keep producing all we possibly can and producing smoothly and without delay in delivery, and one way by which we can ensure ourselves against delays is to keep in a position to get imports from the United States and be able to pay for them. For that reason we have to think about our exchange position, our exports to the United States and so on. If we were simply to say we will send the United States anything they want and the United States will send to us anything we want, it might have a prejudicial effect upon deliveries and, indirectly, upon production.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would have.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not so simple to get great pools and governmental agencies to act just whenever and as they should. Those are matters that require a great deal of arranging. Therefore, pending such time as arrangements are made, we have to go on buying and selling, and that is what we are doing.

Mr. QUELCH: Then, if it is not going to be possible to get the nations to contribute their production on a free basis and we are going to have to go on buying a certain proportion of the production of the United States, in view of the fact that the United States must be just as much interested in winning the war as we are they should be anxious that our production be on as effective a basis as possible. We have been told on several occasions that we are reaching or rapidly approaching our maximum production, on account of the shortage of skilled labour. We have at present, I understand, something in the neighbourhood of 32,000 skilled men, miners and mechanics, employed in the gold-mining industry. It is not helping the United States war effort in the slightest degree to receive that gold at the present time. They may intend to use it after the war, but it is of no use to their war effort now. If it is necessary for us to pay the United States in gold for the goods we are getting to-day, would it not be possible to hypothecate the production of gold in Canada for so many years after the war and release for the present that labour for use in war industry? That would benefit the United States just as much as ourselves. If, after the war, the United States still want that gold, there would be the possibility of putting all that labour to work in the gold mines after the war and providing employment, but for the time being that labour so necessary for the war effort would be released.

Mr. ILSLEY: The question of going out of the gold-mining business in Canada, is a separate one. I do not think it is sufficiently related to this bill to justify us in devoting attention to it now. It is a large question; I would hesitate to make any offhand observations on it, and I would consider it irrelevant to this bill.

Mr. QUELCH: But there is a definite connection. If the United States were turning their goods into the pool as we are, we would not have to turn over gold, and 32,000 men now occupied in mining the gold would be released for war work. Instead of mining it and sending it to be placed in the vaults at Fort Knox, the gold could remain where it is for the time being and that labour be released. Surely the minister is prepared to say why it is considered necessary to mine gold at a time like this. I understand that Russia has stopped the mining of gold for the duration of the war. I am not sure as to that, but I read it in the paper the other day. When we are trying to make an all-out war effort surely we should not carry on a non-essential industry. If the minister is not prepared to make a statement now, I hope that at some time during the session he will be prepared to justify the carrying on of the gold-mining industry.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister said something a short time ago about the British being consulted about or agreeing to the prices we arrange for the goods we ship to the old country and charge up to the billion dollar credit. Suppose we ship to Great Britain one hundred tanks and, to use an arbitrary figure, charge $50,000 each. The British government might say that price is too high, or they might say it is too low. I want to feel assured that the government will not pay for the tanks a dollar more than they have to pay.

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: If they did, it would not be a business transaction.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. MacNICOL: They will buy as cheaply as they can, and they will charge against the billion dollars as low a price as they buy the tanks at.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know just what the course of business is, but I think in the purchase of the tanks the British government gets the Department of Munitions and Supply to produce or buy the tanks, and they get them as cheaply as they can.

Mr. MacNICOL: The British government buy as cheaply as they can.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; I am pretty sure they do, and the Department of Munitions and Supply would get them made as cheaply as possible. They would make a business transaction with the people who produce them. And that will continue. It would make this thing ridiculous if we let the existence of this gift change the business practice that now prevails in the setting of prices and supplying of goods.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a change in law, because heretofore the Minister of Munitions and Supply has been merely the agent of the British government, and now he will be acting for our own government. Certainly there is a legal difference.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think so. He will continue to be the agent.

Mr. PERLEY: Coming back to the question of foodstuffs, I think the minister will agree that wheat comes under that category, and I think it should be included in this clause. The government have been supplying bacon, cheese and other commodities at agreed prices and, I think, financing the purchases for the British government. We have every reason to believe that in recent months, according to the monthly reports of the minister, wheat has been offered at St. Lawrence ports at considerably over 90 cents a bushel, and no doubt a good deal of it has been sold at that figure. I do not see why the government could not include wheat in this clause, since this really is to be a gift; and the government could finance the British purchases of wheat, as they finance purchases of other foodstuffs.

Mr. ILSLEY: The dominion government is not financing the purchase of foodstuffs in any other sense than this, that they are providing the United Kingdom with dollars with which to make their purchases generally in Canada, by buying sterling; that is all.

Mr. PERLEY: Is that not practically the same thing?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it is not financing in one sense at all.

Mr. PERLEY: Then what is the meaning of the word "foodstuffs" in this bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: "Foodstuffs" includes wheat, of course. I thought the hon. gentleman was saying it should include wheat.

Mr. PERLEY: I say it should.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does include wheat. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Tripp) brought up that question half an hour ago; he said he wanted to know if it included wheat, and I asked that he should let it go until we came to section 3. There is no necessity to add anything to the word "foodstuffs".

Mr. REID: Are there any Canadian National securities, or other Canadian securities, held in Eire? If so, would Eire be in a position to unload them on Great Britain, so that we in turn would repatriate them under this scheme?

Mr. ILSLEY: The British government has not power to take securities away from the residents of Eire and vest them with the British government.

Mr. REID: But suppose the residents of Eire wanted to do it voluntarily. In this bill you designate Great Britain and Northern Ireland. My question is whether those people in Eire holding Canadian securities could unload them on Great Britain, so that under this arrangement we in turn would repatriate them.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a question for the British government, I think; but in all probability the British government would not allow the importation of securities from Eire into the United Kingdom, since this would necessitate the export of British capital to Eire in return for the securities. Certainly that would not be permitted by the foreign exchange control authorities in Britain.

Mr. REID: But Eire may have debts owing to Great Britain, and one way of paying those debts would be by Canadian National or other Canadian securities, which we in turn might repatriate.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am afraid I cannot add anything to what I said. I do not know whether such transactions, even if possible, would be very probable.

Mr. REID: It would be interesting to know.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not at all sure that they would be prejudicial to us; we would be getting back our securities, anyway. I would have to think about that, to see whether there would be any harm in it.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is not the intention, as I understand, for us to interfere with ordinary business practice between the two countries; yet one cannot help but feel that the man who pays the piper usually calls the tune. Is there likely to be any disposition on the part of our government, acting through the Minister of Finance in this case, in authorizing advances or payments for British account, to dictate or suggest to the British government the type of goods or material they shall buy in this country, or is this a straight gift?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a straight gift, without strings. This arrangement is in pursuance of our policy announced a long time ago and concurred in by everyone, to supply the United Kingdom with all that the United Kingdom requires for the purpose of carrying on the war. If we interjected a commercial motive into it at this stage, it would be inconsistent with the whole spirit of this transaction and the whole spirit of our policy for some time past.

Mr. JACKMAN: It is not a commercial motive; but if we wanted to send tanks instead of aeroplanes, it would not be our intention to dictate to them what they should order from Canada so far as the spending of this billion dollars is concerned? It will be left exactly as it is now?

Mr. ILSLEY: We certainly would not dictate. On the other hand, of course, there is no doubt that our defence authorities would have views as to what ought to remain in Canada and what should go to the United Kingdom. They at least would be as entitled to those views as the United Kingdom government would be entitled to their views. But I think that is a different matter from what the hon. gentleman has in mind. That is not a case of dictating; it is a case of expressing an opinion as to where rifles should go, or where tanks or aeroplanes should go. If we needed them for the west coast, for example, perhaps we would not send them to Great Britain, or perhaps we would; I do not know. We would have views on that, however, and would not feel obligated to abandon our views.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Having regard to the experience of the past year in sending goods to Britain for which we hold certain sterling balances, which are now to be funded, how much of this billion dollars shall we have to send to the United States for materials entering into the manufacture of the goods we are giving to Britain? How much of the money is going to be lost to Canada in the sense that we have to buy from outside this country?

Mr. ILSLEY: No estimate of that has been made. If half of this money were spent for foodstuffs, that half would all be spent in Canada; there would be practically nothing imported from the United States in the line of foodstuffs. The same would apply to minerals, mined in Canada, though there might be something there in connection with imported machinery or something like that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am talking about tanks and aeroplanes, in connection with which we have to import large quantities of goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. We cannot tell. If we were to take one particular commodity or article, such as tanks or aeroplanes, an estimate could be made.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): None has been made?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps my colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply could tell hon. members what is the United States content of tanks, and what is the Canadian content.

Mr. JACKMAN: Subsection 4 of section 3 deals with the determination of the amount of sterling balances. That is of some importance. If the government should desire to hold many hundreds of millions of pounds worth of sterling, it would, of course, virtually extend the size of the gift. Does the minister care to express any view as to what the foreign exchange control board would want to hold in the way of sterling balances?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps two or three million pounds.

Mr. JACKMAN: Just a nominal amount?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. JACKMAN: And the date of coming into force of the act has some bearing on it also? I presume you want to bring it into force as soon as possible?

Mr. ILSLEY: Before the Easter recess.

Mr. HAZEN: I should like to call the attention of the minister to subsection 3 of section 3. This reads: "The minister may acquire from the foreign exchange control board all sterling balances," and then at line 10 it reads, "and may pay for the sterling balances so acquired," and so on. In section 4 we find the words "The minister may acquire from the foreign exchange control board", and in line 27 the words, "and pay therefor out of unappropriated moneys." It will be noticed there are two wordings used in those two sentences. We have, "may pay for the sterling balances so acquired," in line 10, and in line 27 we have, "pay therefor out of unappropriated moneys." Then in section 5 it is provided that the minister may purchase and so on, until we come to line 45 where it states, "and may pay for the same out of any unappropriated moneys." There you have another different wording. Had the draftsman of the bill any reason for making these slight changes? After the plebiscite bill had passed this house and was referred to another place, it came back here with a number of technical changes and alterations.

I just happened to notice these slight differences in wording, and I was wondering whether there was any particular reason for them.

Mr. ILSLEY: At the moment I do not see any reason for the difference in wording. I cannot see why you could not say "pay therefor".

Mr. HAZEN: The meaning seems to be about the same.

Mr. ILSLEY: First you have, "may pay for"; then you have, "pay therefor," and then you have, "may pay for."

Mr. HAZEN: The one is, "pay therefor," and the others are, "may pay for."

Mr. ILSLEY: "May" is used twice. I cannot think of any possible danger in leaving it that way.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Rate of acquisition of sterling balances.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Subsection 3 of this section reads:

> The governor in council may fix a date which shall be deemed to be the termination of the war for the purposes of this section.

In all other legislation this is fixed by the provisions of the War Measures Act. If this subsection should carry in its present form, you would have an anomalous position. The war might actually be over, not only de facto but de jure. I wonder whether that is done on purpose? If so, for what purpose? I would suggest that if it is not in contravention of some fixed principle or policy, there should be uniformity.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman is hardly right in saying that in all legislation the date is fixed by the War Measures Act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should have said in most legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I call to mind the War Exchange Conservation Act which contains a clause giving the governor in council power to proclaim the end of the war for the purposes of that act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That must have escaped me at the time or I would have called attention to it.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is perhaps some objection in relying upon a proclamation under the War Measures Act to fix the date of the termination of the war for other purposes. It may be desirable to continue the War Measures Act until a certain condition ceases to exist in the country. I think the end of the war for the purposes of the War Measures Act was 1920.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is defined in the War Measures Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is left to the governor in council to determine for the purposes of that act, and that may be too late or too early for the purposes of this measure. I went through this matter in negotiating with the provinces. The termination of the agreements with the provinces was designed to be the termination of the war, and at first it was thought we should put into these agreements the date fixed under the War Measures Act as the termination of the war. After much discussion and consideration it was decided not to do that, but to provide for a date which might be different from that date. There is no assurance that that date will coincide with the termination of hostilities. In fact, it does not have any relation to the termination of hostilities. If one puts in, "the termination of hostilities," that might prove to be a controversial date. It might be urged by one party to the agreement that hostilities have ended, and by others that some hostilities are still in progress. Therefore, there has to be power vested in some body to make a decision in the matter and fix a date. For our purposes we think this is the way to do it, to leave it to the governor in council to fix a date for the termination of the war for the purposes of the act.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is a convenient thing to do. I have sent out for a copy of the War Measures Act because I have not the text in front of me. I should like to point out to the minister that probably the reason is that when the war ceases under the War Measures Act, the changes in the British North America Act brought about by the War Measures Act, including the control of everything under which we are being regimented, stop immediately. The ordinary principles of the Canadian constitution then become operative, and price ceilings and all the rest of it go by the board. There is no doubt about that, and that may be the reason for this. I do not say it is, but I am pointing that out. These gentlemen who are talking about planned economy after the war had better put on their thinking caps and read a few cases on the constitution. They will then ascertain that after the war is over, there will be no more wartime prices and trade board; there will be no more controllers bobbing up and setting a ceiling on maple syrup to the habitants in the province of Quebec; there will be no more interference with the principles of the British North America Act with respect to property and civil rights; there will be no more freezing of wages by order in council.

Mr. GILLIS: I hope the hon. member is right, but I am doubtful.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am telling you, and I can give you some cases which you can read for yourself. If we are going to have this planned economy, which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) talks about, in the post-war days we shall have to have a new constitution in this country. I should like to see him get it, having regard to the fact that you would have to persuade not only this parliament—I am also talking for the benefit of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who, I see is taking down a few notes—but the nine provincial legislatures. I think you will find that is true, because they will not change the British North America Act, over there, on the other side, without the consent of the provinces. They will not take away from the provinces the powers conferred upon them by imperial acts of parliament with respect to property and civil rights, without the consent of the provinces. I will tell you that Quebec will fight it to the limit—and they will be right—because we would have centralized in the central government of Canada too much power. I would be content to see the centralization of currency, credit control and matters of that kind. But with respect to property and civil rights the subject is far safer under the present system than he would be with centralized control. I believe the people of Quebec will agree with me that they will be much safer under the present system than under one of centralized control.

This is a piece of free legal advice I am giving. It will not cost my hon. friends anything. And, if they want me to, I shall cite the cases to back up my opinion.

Mr. COLDWELL: If it does not cost anything, then I imagine from a lawyer's point of view it is not worth much.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It cost me a lot to learn.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not going to argue about the constitution to-night. Constitutions are made for men, not men for constitutions. When the people of this country decide; when all the provinces and the dominion decide that economic and social conditions make the amendment of the constitution necessary, the Dominion of Canada is going to amend her own constitution. Make no mistake about that. That will be done, when the time comes and it is found to be necessary.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But with the consent of the provinces.

Mr. COLDWELL: It will be done when it is necessary. Let me say this, that while some people think there is a safeguard in the fact that we are unable to amend our own constitution, and that it has to be amended by the imperial parliament, I am willing to wager that any request which came from Canada by way of a clear majority vote now would be approved by the imperial parliament almost without discussion. They would not wish to interfere with the expressed will of a majority of the Canadian people. That, in my opinion, is the situation as it stands to-day.

I had not intended to say that, but the leader of the opposition provoked me to it. What I did rise to say is that we are dealing with section 4 of the bill, and it appears that under that section a loan of $700,000,000 is to be made to Great Britain, without interest, for the duration of the war. I do not think anyone is going to disapprove the making of the loan under circumstances as they are to-day. But I am going to suggest that in making the loan the whole problem of the repatriation of the remaining securities now outstanding in Great Britain should be gone into, and that they might be regarded as tantamount to collateral against this loan to be dealt with, if you like, at the termination of the war.

I have been thinking a great deal about what was said the other day by the Minister of Finance with respect to the gift, the reasons for it, and the loan. I disagree entirely with the point of view that we should not contemplate repatriation of the remaining securities held in Great Britain, so that we might have them in our own dominion and, as I should like to see them, in the hands of the government, in order that we might have a greater control of industry—and particularly certain monopolistic industries—than we have to-day.

We shall need this when the war is over, if we are going to rehabilitate this country. I believe it would be to the advantage of the people of this country if in the making of such loans we could contemplate in the future that we could recover from any overseas investors the securities they now hold upon industries, and other enterprise, in Canada.

For example, we have the railways problem. I am not in favour of any unification or amalgamation such as has been suggested or of the handing over of our government road to any form of private management. But I do believe that probably the war will thrust upon us, during its progress, a greater measure of control over our whole transportation system.

I should like to see bus and truck services used to feed the railways, instead of to compete with them. I believe that would save both tires and gasoline, and after the war it would assist us in developing a real transportation system.

As I said the other afternoon there are in Great Britain, among other securities, some $596,600,000, par value, of Canadian Pacific Railway stock and debentures. I can see no reason at all why these stocks and bonds should not at least be regarded as collateral against this loan of $700,000,000. I do not subscribe to the point of view that we should endeavour to remain a debtor nation to Great Britain simply because some believe that that would enable us to export goods there in payment of the interest and dividends on our debt beyond the seas. To my mind, carried to its logical conclusion, such an argument implies that the man who owes the most should be the best off, because he would have to pay the most to a creditor, and that would mean that he would have to hand over more and more of the fruits of his labour.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask a question?

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: How would the hon. member take over the several millions of dollars worth of Canadian Pacific Railway securities? They belong to private investors.

Mr. COLDWELL: They belong to private investors, my hon. friend says. But the British government to-day is causing or compelling British investors to hand securities held in Great Britain over to the government when called upon to do so. We are going to repatriate another block of Canadian National bonds which were held by private individuals in Great Britain.

Mr. MacNICOL: We guaranteed them.

Mr. COLDWELL: It does not matter whether we guaranteed them or not. They are in the hands of private investors. They have securities and we have given a guarantee. But that does not place them in any other category, so far as the ownership of the bonds or stock goes in Great Britain; they are or have been privately owned. Everyone holding an overseas security must register it and, if called upon by the government, he must surrender it to the government. That is the well-defined plan or policy Britain has adopted, and Canadian Pacific Railway stocks are no exception.

Naturally the British government will pay the British investor in sterling funds—but that is being done in all cases. Canadian Pacific Railway stock is in no different position. It is up to the British government to make their own arrangements with their own people. It is up to us to make the best arrangements we can for the Canadian people. I am pointing out that with relation to stocks and bonds of this description—we will say securities of International Nickel, and some of the other larger corporations in this country—we are derelict in our duty if, in addition to making a gift of a billion dollars outright, which we have all supported, we make a loan and leave over there securities which might be repatriated to this country eventually, and which would relieve us of the payment of interest and dividends to any investors beyond the seas.

Of course, if these securities are resold in Canada, there may be some slight advantage. If they are resold to investors, we will say, in the United States, then there is little or no advantage in that regard, because you would just be changing one set of creditors in one country for another set of creditors in another country. But I want to emphasize that from my point of view—and I believe I am expressing the point of view of many people in this dominion—in the making of this loan we should proceed—as we are told trades in goods between Great Britain and this country are made—on sound business principles.

I suppose that the British purchaser insists that the goods he buys from Canada shall be bought at prices comparable with those of goods of the same type which he can get elsewhere. I think we should view the loan—not the gift; I make the distinction very clearly—from exactly the same business point of view, and we should as far as possible protect our own country and its future by asking at least that these securities be placed as collateral against this loan, so that, when we come to determine what shall be done at the termination of the war, we may, if it seems advantageous on both sides to do it, be in a position to repatriate bonds and stocks of Canadian corporations for the benefit of this country. I believe that is the business-like point of view to take. I know that if there is one group in the world who—quite properly—enter into transactions on a business-like basis, it is the British business man. I remember Mr. Bennett, when he was leader of the opposition in this house, talking about the imperial conference in 1932 and explaining that the British did not allow sentiment to interfere with their business transactions, even when negotiating empire trade agreements; and we, I think, having made a gift, should see to it, in making the loan, that it is made on a sound and proper business basis to protect this country in the days which follow the war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That just means the hon. gentleman's policy of nationalization of industry in Canada. We may as well face that situation fairly and squarely; and if we have another depression we shall have two railroads on our hands instead of one.

Mr. COLDWELL: I said a little earlier that there is a time and place to discuss the possibilities of nationalization of industry in the Dominion of Canada. This is neither the time nor the place, but if the leader of the opposition wants us to discuss it now, I am quite prepared to enter into a discussion with him, but I do not think this is either the time or the place. But when he says we desire to nationalize all industry in Canada he is saying that which is not correct. We have never suggested that. What we have suggested is that—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not say, all industry.

Mr. COLDWELL: —the monopolistic industries that are now exploiting the people of Canada and will continue to exploit them in the future ought to be taken over, organized nationally or cooperatively, and used to provide goods and services for the Canadian people instead of profits for those who have invested in them.

Mr. MacNICOL: Mr. Chairman, it is very easy to use those two expressions, "monopolistic" and "exploiting", but I have never been able to get a definition of either the one or the other from my hon. friends to the left.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. COLDWELL: Probably this discussion is out of order, but I would be very glad to define both terms for the hon. gentleman, although I suggest to him that if he will look up a good dictionary he will find them accurately defined.

Mr. MacNICOL: I know the dictionary meaning. What I want is the hon. member's meaning.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has made, if he will permit me to say so, a pretty good speech, but I just want to say, briefly, this. If we were to insist on the repatriation of private securities we would leave, I think, a justifiable feeling of resentment in Great Britain. The reason is this. Market values are low, or at least they are considerably lower than the holders of them think the securities are really worth, and will be worth later; and for us to take them over at the market value and insist on getting them back under present conditions would be regarded as unduly harsh, and would be, I think, unduly harsh.

With regard to the second proposal, that we stipulate that they be lodged as collateral, I merely want to point out that no part of the British empire, in loaning money to another part of the British empire, has stipulated for collateral securities. I do not think we should start, under conditions such as these. I say that particularly because I am satisfied that the present arrangement is as safe, or virtually as safe, for us as it would be if we asked that these stocks be put up. Of course, if we did it as part of a plan to get partnership in the industries in Canada, that would be understandable—

Mr. COLDWELL: That is what I had in mind.

Mr. ILSLEY: —and it would be a move toward, as the leader of the opposition says, nationalization of certain of our industries. At least, the government would be a partner in those industries and have its directors as members of the boards of those industries. I suppose that the operations of those industries would be brought before parliament, and there would be questions on the orders of the day and so on. If that were considered a desirable thing to do, an important thing to do, a matter of great importance to do, we could, by taking these harsh steps—steps which would be regarded as harsh in the circumstances—undertake to do it. But apart from these considerations, the fact that the United Kingdom has given us an obligation for $700,000,000 and is agreeing that, if any of these securities go abroad, the money which residents of the United Kingdom get for them is to be applied in reduction of our loan, and that, if any of these securities are redeemed, the price for which they are redeemed will be applied in reduction of this loan—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is, the vested securities?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, the un-vested securities; not the government or guaranteed securities, but the others, the ones which the hon. gentleman from Rosetown-Biggar is talking about. But I say, the fact that the United Kingdom is agreeing to all that and that the British government have a rigid and effective control of these securities is good enough, I think, from our point of view.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was not looking at it from just the point of view the minister has expressed at the moment. I wanted to bring this point forward, that in a discussion of this loan there should be an understanding that if we desired to follow this plan when the loan is due and payable, it may be followed. When I referred to collateral I did not mean exactly that; perhaps that might be a little harsh. The minister rather alarms me when he says that we have an undertaking from the British government, that, in respect of securities sold to residents of other countries, the amounts obtained will be credited to this loan. That indicates to me that we ought to do something to prevent these securities from getting into the hands of investors other than in Great Britain or Canada. I do not want to see this country dominated economically by the United States. I do not want any of these securities sold in New York to United States investors. I should like the British government to give some undertaking, perhaps in the form of hypothecation—the suggestion that they be put up as collateral may appear too harsh—that these securities, if moved at all from Great Britain, shall come to Canada and not go to the United States or some other country.

Mr. MARTIN: What about Canadian investments in other countries?

Mr. COLDWELL: If by business arrangement we can relieve ourselves of debt to the United States or any other country, then I believe it is good business to remove that debt and take ourselves out of the debtor class to any country.

Mr. HILL: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is suggesting that we penalize the holders of Canadian securities in England, because this loan is to the people as a whole, and such a method, whereby we would force the holders of Canadian securities in England to bear the entire brunt of the loan, would be penalizing the holders of Canadian securities there. What the hon. gentleman has suggested however is sound, I think, namely, that if these securities are to be sold by English holders, they should be sold to the Canadian government.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Purchase of securities.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What are the mechanics of the operation? The national railways are going to buy their own securities, and then they will sell their securities to the government of Canada. Is that it, or how is it to be worked?

Mr. ILSLEY: The transaction is to be this. We buy the securities; then we lend the Canadian National the money with which to redeem the securities, and we retain the securities in the meantime as security for repayment of the loan.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The Canadian National, as I understand it, are to issue debentures to the Bank of Canada or the government of Canada, as security for the loan. That is subsection 3. What actually is going to happen is this. The government of Canada will buy these securities from the government of Great Britain. Take one of these securities like 5 per cent, 40-year Canadian National 1969, which to-day may stand at a market price of 120. You buy it at that price. At what price will you sell that to the Canadian National? That is the 5 per cent debenture. The Canadian National will issue their debentures at 3 per cent, say, and those debentures will be held by the Bank of Canada. Why should the Canadian National buy their own debentures in, when those debentures could just as well be held by the government of Canada, as they are being held to-day, until maturity. What is the object?

Mr. ILSLEY: The purpose is to substitute a loan from the government to the railways for a loan from the public to the railways. That is the purpose of the whole transaction.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): But it does not seem to me that it does that. What is happening is this. The government are buying the security. Why do they not just hold the security? The government will take that 5 per cent security which they are holding and turn it in for a 3 per cent security which they will take as collateral for a loan from the railways and the railways cancel the 5 per cent security. It is only a matter of bookkeeping. I do not see why the government are going to sell these securities to the railways and not hold them themselves. It does not make sense to me.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the kind of thing that has been going on, provided for every year by our Canadian National financing acts, and the object of the transaction is as I have stated. I do not know that I can explain the matter further than that. Perhaps it could be taken up in the railway committee.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What we are doing from year to year is refinancing as far as the railways are concerned in relation to the public, and I see sense in that; but as regards trying to refinance as between the Canadian National and the government of Canada, I do not see any sense in it, because it is taking it out of one pocket and putting it in another. I do not see why you do not take a loan such as the one that goes to 1969 and let it go to maturity. There is no expense connected with it and the whole thing is a matter of bookkeeping. That is all there is to it. I do not see what the object is, and so far no explanation has been given me.

Mr. MacINNIS: In the exchange of securities between the Canadian government and the Canadian National Railways, would the transaction be solely as between the government and the railway company, or would any outside agency enter into the transaction?

Mr. ILSLEY: No outside agency would enter in.

Mr. MacNICOL: Subsection 6 reads:

> The governor in council may make regulations for cancelling and withdrawing from circulation or for reselling any of the Dominion of Canada securities. . . .

Or cancelling Canadian National securities. The latter are dominion government securities. I asked the minister some time ago whether repatriated securities would be resold and I understood him to say no; but this clause provides for reselling them. To whom would they be resold? Why would the government not retain them in their own possession?

Mr. ILSLEY: There might be a small amount of reselling, I am informed. Some of these securities are 3 per cent and they might be just suitable for selling instead of selling our own bonds. But the scope of those operations would be very limited. My former answer was, I think, substantially correct.

Mr. ISNOR: Sold to the Canadian public?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they might be to a small extent.

Mr. MacINNIS: I must confess to being very ignorant of this matter of high finance. I am wondering why, when these securities would be acquired by the Canadian government, they could not be cancelled. Would there be any loss accruing to anyone, or any gain, if they were cancelled?

Mr. ILSLEY: Some of the issues are secured by mortgages, and part of the securities are in the hands of other persons. If we were to cancel our part of the security, it would enhance unduly the value of the securities in the hands of others. That would be one reason. These are secured on all kinds of properties, different lines forming part of the Canadian National system.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They could be cancelled only if the debtors supplied the funds to buy their own bonds.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister said that some few securities might be sold. What type of securities have been sold?

Mr. ILSLEY: Canadian dollar securities of a reasonable term and a low coupon rate.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Loan authorized.

Mr. HANSELL: Speaking on this measure the other night in the resolution stage, I mentioned the fact that this billion dollar gift to Britain constitutes a billion dollar debt upon the Canadian people. There was some little argument as to how much of this would be obtained by loans and how much by taxation. The minister was not able to tell us, and I quite understand his position because I understand that the money is to come out of the consolidated revenue fund, whatever that is. I have never been able to satisfy myself what it is. Perhaps I think in pictures more than in words and figures, and I picture the consolidated revenue fund as a sort of pot into which all revenues go, and not only revenues but borrowed moneys; and out of that pot go the expenditures.

I realize that perhaps the minister cannot say that we shall raise so much money now for the purpose of this gift. We raise money for the purpose of carrying on the war, and I suppose one cannot say how much of this loan is going to this and how much to that. But the minister will recall that I did mention that the part of it which might be raised by way of loan should be raised without interest. In another section of the bill which has been passed without very much discussion we are to let $700,000,000 of debt go without interest for the duration of the war, which is a commendable thing. Yet here is a debt of $1,000,000,000 being imposed upon the people of Canada, a large proportion of which may involve an interest charge which we as the Canadian people will have to pay. I do not know how alarming it is, but this billion dollar debt amounts to nearly $100 per capita upon the people of Canada. If that is said quickly enough it does not sound so hard, but every one in this house, including the people in the galleries, is going to have levied against him or her at some time or another $100.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps I am wrong, but the billion dollars has to come from somewhere; whether it comes from taxation, or from debt incurred which will eventually mean taxation, I do not know; but it does figure out at about $100 per capita on all the people of Canada, that they will be called upon to pay either now, next year or a thousand years from now. That is the position. If a proportion of this is going to be raised by way of loan, particularly if any part comes from the Bank of Canada, could that not be lent to the government without interest? That, I believe, is a fair question, and I think considerable progress would be made in the fiscal policy of the country if something like that were brought about.

Mr. ILSLEY: The only way to get a loan without interest is by compulsion, and the whole issue of compulsory loans would have to be faced. Both sides of that question have been argued in other sessions. I have not brought myself to the place where I feel it would be wise to propose a system of compulsory loans in Canada. I do not think anything would be gained by going into that issue now.

But the point I should like to make clear is that the making of a gift to Britain instead of lending the money to Britain does not impose any further obligation on the Canadian people. The gift feature of it does not cost us $100 a head; it is the making of the equipment, the producing and forwarding of the goods that takes so much of the energies and resources of the Canadian people. Whether we give it or sell it or lend it to Great Britain, the effect on the Canadian people is exactly the same.

The other question, whether as part of our general policy we should obtain money by compulsory loans instead of voluntary loans, is an issue which is in no way related to this. This does not make the case any stronger or any weaker for compulsory loans versus voluntary loans. There would be no advantage as far as I can see in charging interest to Great Britain for the $700 million, because it would render their requirements for Canadian dollars that much greater and so exhaust the billion dollar gift that much sooner. And since it will probably be exhausted in the early part of 1943 anyway, it would to a certain extent affect the transaction if we were to do it. I do not think there really would be any advantage to us in shortening that period somewhat by charging interest on this money, which is the only effect it would have.

Mr. HANSELL: Perhaps the minister misunderstood me. I was not proposing that we should or should not charge Great Britain interest; but the fact remains that a portion of this billion dollars will have to be raised by way of loan from our banking institutions.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not agree with that.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, perhaps; I do not know, but I cannot see how that would not be so. But suppose part of it is raised in that way. I quite understand the minister's objection to compulsory loans; as a matter of fact, in my limited understanding of this whole monetary arrangement I personally do not believe in compulsory loans from the people. I do not believe that would serve the purpose, technically. But I am not suggesting compulsory loans when I suggest that if a portion of this billion dollars should be a fresh creation of credit from the banking institutions, that fresh creation of credit should be made without interest; and we would not be forcing that upon them at all. It seems to me we could do it through our own Bank of Canada, which I think could issue it free of interest. It would be money just the same, but the Canadian people would not be paying interest on part of this money which constitutes this gift to Britain.

Mr. ILSLEY: That just opens the other issue. I thought the hon. gentleman was advocating compulsory loans, but he is advocating the creation of credit. He is advocating financing by borrowing from the Bank of Canada to a greater extent than we are doing.

Mr. HANSELL: Free of interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is pretty well the policy of the hon. gentleman's party, as to the way we should be financing. That question is an old issue, which we have debated back and forth for a long time. I think it would be dangerous to go too far along that line and I have repeatedly given my reasons for that belief. It is the equivalent of the issue of currency to finance the war; it is simply saying to the bank, "Write up a credit for us and let us cheque on it." It is exactly the same as though we said to print so many notes, and that is dangerous if carried too far.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I asked the question I did in connection with the exchange of security because I do not want to see the Dominion of Canada lose money to the advantage of the railways by any such exchange. I should like to point out that to-day the proprietor's equity in the Canadian National Railways, which is interest free as far as the railways are concerned, is over $663,000,000. At the time that transaction took place this note was added at the bottom of the page, for the definite purpose of showing governments that we could not go on forever exploiting railways here and railways there. The footnote says:

The proprietor's equity is included in the net debt of Canada and is disclosed in the historical record of government assistance to railways as shown in the public accounts of Canada in connection with the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1937.

I just wanted to point out that I see no reason why the securities should be exchanged, and certainly I do not want to see the government of Canada put in any worse position for the benefit of the railways. They must stand on their own feet.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Subsection 2 of section 6 says "The principal raised by way of loan under this act", while subsection 1 says "The governor in council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed and negotiable", and so on. Does this have to be by way of loan, or will part of it come out of taxes, or out of the general fund? Is it all loan, or part taxes, or what?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 3 sets out the origin of this billion dollars. It comes from the consolidated revenue fund, and of course from time to time the consolidated revenue fund is replenished by taxes and loans. One cannot say what part of this will be the result of loans and what part will be the result of taxation.

Mr. FRASER: (Peterborough West): That was why I asked the question, because in the one case it says "may" and in the other case it says "raised".

Mr. ILSLEY: That is if any is "raised".

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It does not say that; it just says "raised by loan". It is definite there.

Mr. ILSLEY: It means any principal which may be raised by way of loan under this measure.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Then will what is raised be a loan from the banks, or from the insurance companies, or from the people? Will it be raised here as a domestic loan, or will it be raised in the United States, or does the minister know?

Mr. ILSLEY: This section simply gives the usual borrowing power to the governor in council, and the borrowing policy of the government will be determined from time to time. The hon. gentleman is familiar with that policy; it is to borrow at about 3 per cent interest, for ten or twelve years—that is the way in which the bulk of the money has been borrowed—and to borrow it from the Canadian public rather than from the banks. That is the backbone of our loan policy, and I have no reason to think that it should change.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A moment ago the question was raised as to the advisability of raising what money must be borrowed through the Bank of Canada, interest free, not so much as a forced loan but as a cooperative loan which the Bank of Canada would make to the dominion because it is the Bank of Canada and because it is the dominion, and because the two of them are serving the Canadian people. The minister did not make any definite pronouncement on the subject. It is a confused question, and one about which there is great diversity of opinion. I just wish to tell the minister now that when the two billion dollar war appropriation bill comes before the house we shall ask him for an explanation why it would not be advisable to raise that money in that way. We are refraining from discussing the matter on this bill because we wish to help the minister get this bill through, in order that some business may be cleared up before the Easter recess. But we do believe it is possible to obtain this money at very low interest rates, and possibly without interest at all, and we think it will be impossible for the minister to show us to the contrary.

There is one more thing it might be well for me to say here. I laid down in my speech on Friday what I think is a safe assumption, that this one billion dollar gift to Britain is going to mean probably $500,000,000 collected from the people of Canada in taxes and $500,000,000 to be borrowed by the government from either the people, the banks or other institutions, and upon which there will be at least 2 per cent interest practically in perpetuity. This will mean the virtual saddling of the Canadian people for ages, at least for generations, with $10,000,000 annually in interest charges. I think I am safe in making this assumption. This is all I have to say at the present time.

Section agreed to.

Mr. ROY: (Translation) Mr. Chairman, I cannot allow the second reading of this bill respecting—

The CHAIRMAN: We are not on the second reading of the bill. The house is in committee.

Bill reported.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, I cannot allow the third reading of this bill granting to Great Britain the gift of one billion dollars without recording my opposition to such a measure—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I rise to a point of order. A debate on the third reading is not in order at this stage because third reading cannot be proceeded with without unanimous consent, and I do not give unanimous consent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be the next sitting.

WAR APPROPRIATION

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to be called the Supplementary 1941 War Appropriation Act to provide inter alia,

1. That sums not exceeding $135,000,000 be granted to his majesty in addition to the sums granted by the War Appropriation Act, 1941, towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending March 31, 1942, for:—

(a) the security, defence, peace, order and welfare of Canada;

(b) the conduct of naval, military and air operations in or beyond Canada;

(c) promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and

(d) the carrying out of any measure deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

2. That the governor in council be empowered to reexpend, advance or loan moneys that may be received by way of refund or repayment of advances, loans or expenditures under the War Appropriation Act, 1939, the War Appropriation Act, 1940, the War Appropriation Act, 1941, and the Supplementary 1941 War Appropriation Act.

He said: My remarks in moving this resolution will be very short. What I am asking for is $135,000,000 supplementary war appropriation, being money required for the current fiscal year ended March 31. The amount voted by the house about a year ago was $1,300,000,000, and the requirements for war purposes, including provisions for contingencies of $3,268,200, will be $1,435,000,000. Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Could the minister give us the details of the items already voted? It would be most convenient if it could be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: They must be on Hansard of last year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the minister has not that information here, of course he cannot give it, but I think it should be placed on the record for purposes of comparison in order that we might see the increases in each case.

Mr. ILSLEY: The estimates that I presented last year added up to $1,450,000,000, and the expenditures, so far as we can see now, are less than that; that is, $1,435,000,000. True, the house voted only $1,300,000,000, but the list of proposed expenditures in the estimates last year will show a total slightly greater than this. I presume some departments will be larger and others smaller, but my recollection is that the information was placed on Hansard last year. When I came here with my request for $1,300,000,000 I believed I produced estimates which totalled $1,450,000,000, and those must appear on Hansard. I am not going to say anything more except that the usual time for discussion of the supplementary estimates of the expiring fiscal year is not on the measure for voting those supplementary estimates; it is on the appropriation for the estimates for the new year. This discussion would be on the $2,000,000,000 measure that is on the order paper, and it is then that the government would naturally account for what they had done in the year that was past, when they are requesting a vote for the coming year. I am just saying that because if we alter the practice by going into these exhaustively and fully, by bringing in all the ministers one by one, we would be instituting an innovation. In the interests of economy and time I would suggest that the ministers be questioned by hon. members at one time, and that they be asked about the figures I placed on Hansard to-night. That has been the practice. It was the practice last year—I am not sure about the year before. Nevertheless the accounting for our stewardship has been given when we have asked for new money.

I am putting these figures on Hansard to-night so that hon. members may see them, and because I must make a case for my request for an additional $135,000,000. I am making a prima facie case, but I am suggesting that the discussion in committee ought to be, as it was last year, on the bill for the new year. That is all I have to say.

Mr. HOWARD C. GREEN (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, if the suggestion of the minister is followed, namely that there should be no discussion on this measure, the result would be, I fear, that there would be no discussion of Canada's war effort until the house reassembles on April 20. In the present state of the nation, and more particularly in the present peril of the nation, considering what is happening beyond our boundaries, I do not think it is wise that the house should postpone discussion of Canada's war effort for another month. Anything may happen in that time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not suggesting that the hon. member postpone his speech on this matter, or that other hon. members postpone their speeches. If possible I should like to get this through before the end of the week. All I am suggesting is that in committee, when the ministers undergo what is virtually an examination by hon. members, that we ought not to go into expenditures of the last year on this bill, but that we ought to go into them on the next one. That does not interfere with the hon. member for Vancouver South or any other hon. member who wishes to make a speech on the bill when Mr. Speaker is in the chair—as I presume the hon. member proposes to do now.

Mr. GREEN: I do not think we should be confined to the making of speeches. My suggestion is that an opportunity should be given to hon. members to discuss across the floor of the chamber those matters having to do with the war effort.

Mr. MARTIN: The minister just said that.

Mr. GREEN: We shall be sitting here for another four days. Surely the whole of that time could be well spent in discussing Canada's war effort.

Mr. MARTIN: The minister said that.

Mr. GREEN: That, of course, depends on the government. I suggest that if the government does not wish to have all the ministers here at one time, it should make arrangements to have one of them here at a time and have his department discussed. Then, when that department has been completed, we could go on to another minister. That might have been done last year, and if it had, our discussions would have been far more easily followed, and far more business-like.

The resolution under debate to-night might be described as a declaration to the effect that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide an additional $135,000,000 for Canada's war effort during the current year which, as hon. members know, ends in eight days, on March 31, 1942. As the minister has just explained, that will make a total expenditure for war purposes during the current year of about $1,435,000,000. For the year 1942-43 war expenditures are to be over $2,200,000,000, if I understood the minister correctly when he spoke the other night. That is an increase for the coming fiscal year of approximately 50 per cent. In addition there is a billion dollars for aid to Great Britain.

Those are huge sums, but there will be little complaint from the people of Canada. Provided the money is fairly spent and that it is not wasted, they will approve the voting of these sums. To understand the reason for their approval one need only compare the present position with the position last year. In the twelve months which have intervened the war has become a world war. Russia has come in as an ally of the British nations. Japan has gone in with Germany and Italy. The United States, our great neighbour, has come in with us. So that now it is a case of the united nations against the axis powers, in a struggle to the death. That was well described by General McNaughton when he used these words in Montreal on February 6:

> This is a war in which the whole forces of science have been fixed by the enemy on one purpose alone, and that is our death.

"Our death"—that is the objective of the axis powers. Canadians know these facts and, as I have said, they will approve the raising of these moneys. They also know that beyond our eastern shores the British nations are still the bulwark against a nazi move to the west, and that they are preparing to strike out. They know that over there, in Great Britain, is our own Canadian army ready to go into action at a moment's notice.

On the other side beyond our western shores, our people know that Singapore is now in the hands of the enemy. Java is gone, and we hear Japan threatening our sister dominion of Australia. On March 11 the Japanese premier is reported to have used these words:

> The best and only way for Australia to take was shown by Premier Hideki Tojo when he declared that if the Australian people continued their present attitude "we will show no mercy in crushing them."

Australia is preparing desperately, and at the same time she is warning other nations, including Canada. She is giving a warning, as indicated in these words spoken by the Prime Minister of Australia about ten days ago:

> But I give you this warning. Australia is the last bastion between the west coast of America and the Japanese. If Australia goes, the Americas are wide open. It is said that the Japanese will by-pass Australia, and that they can be met and routed in India. I say to you that the saving of Australia is the saving of America's west coast. If you believe anything to the contrary, then you delude yourselves.

May I repeat those words: "If you believe anything to the contrary, then you delude yourselves."

At this point I urge upon the ministry that they send at least a token force to Australia. Canada is a Pacific nation, a nation on the Pacific. It may be that Canada's best defence on the Pacific will be by fighting in Australia. For that reason alone—for that selfish reason alone, if for no other—we should have troops standing beside the Australian troops. Furthermore we are a sister nation in the British commonwealth. We fought beside the Australians in the last war, and we have a brotherly feeling towards them in this one. Their young airmen have come here to take training. Surely Canada should not hang back. We should send at least a token force to Australia at the earliest possible moment.

Further than that, Australia is asking that a Pacific council be set up with headquarters in Washington; and the minister who came from Australia the other day suggested that Canada should have a member on that council. We have brought forward that suggestion in the house on two or three occasions, but as yet the ministry have not seen fit to act. I urge upon them that they endorse the plea of Australia for the setting up of a Pacific council in Washington, and that Canada ask for representation on that council.

I believe everyone here will agree that the Canadian people see this nation menaced directly at its gates on either ocean. They know and we know that 1942 is the critical year. There is yet no certainty that Canada will survive. I thought the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) put it very clearly when, in his radio address eleven or twelve days ago, he said:

> The present is the crucial year. Germany and Japan are staking everything on 1942.

He went on to say—and the house should mark every word of this utterance:

> The survival of every nation is at stake. Now, more than at any other time, the maximum force of the united nations must be brought into action.

No, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people do not object to the spending of two billion dollars in the next twelve months on the war effort. But—and there is a "but"—it is not enough for the ministry and for this parliament to raise and spend money. The Canadian people are asking—they are demanding, and quite properly so—that this ministry, and this parliament—it is not a matter for the ministry alone—should lead them boldly in waging war. We in the House of Commons are the elected representatives of the people. We cannot evade this responsibility, a responsibility so great and so challenging, because of the nation's peril, that it should be an inspiration to every hon. member.

What can we do to lead the Canadian people in waging war? First of all, I think, comes the attitude of mind. It always seems to me that the mental approach to these questions is of the utmost importance, and I suggest that we in this parliament can help, by the attitude we have in our minds, by realizing clearly and remembering constantly, not only for an hour now and an hour again, but constantly, that practically every day some young Canadian airman dies to help keep this nation free—that is a thing to be remembered by the members of this house—by realizing that to-day, not next month or next year, the Canadian army overseas may be locked in a death struggle with the nazis in Great Britain or be in the van of an invasion of the continent; by realizing that to-day, not next month, cities, towns and villages of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, and the St. Lawrence district of Quebec, may be bombed from the air or bombarded from the sea; that to-day or to-morrow Japanese invaders may be on Canada's Pacific coast, in my own province of British Columbia, tying up Canadian prisoners of war and bayoneting them to death, and raping and murdering our women as they did in Hong Kong.

We must realize these things ourselves and convince our people that they, too, must face these ugly facts. Mr. Speaker, the ministry and parliament and the Canadian people must plan and act accordingly. There are many things which can and must be done. Every ounce of our national strength must be directed to waging war. That is not so now, and I propose to give several examples.

First, there has been a great increase in the production and sale of non-war goods. A short time ago very interesting articles appeared under the hand of Grant Dexter, one of the leading members of the press gallery, in which he set out a list of non-war articles and showed how the amount spent on them increased from 1939 to 1941. I propose to give several of his figures in round numbers:

Item	Expended in 1939	Increased expenditure in 1941
Women's dresses, coats and suits.....	$21,750,000	$7,000,000
Men's and boys' clothing and furnishings.	27,100,000	6,500,000
Furniture	12,200,000	5,000,000
Home furnishings.....	15,500,000	5,400,000
Hardware and kitchen utensils	8,000,000	3,000,000

There has been a great increase in production of non-war articles which he sums up in these words:

> Thus we have stepped up the production of musical instruments, furniture, silk stockings, clothing, tobacco, beverages, glassware and heating appliances.

Another distressing aspect of this condition is that it has made a great increase in the number of people producing non-war articles, as he says:

> We have devoted man-power to these purposes. . . . Three hundred and thirty-nine thousand pairs of hands have gone to work since the war began at jobs which have small war significance.

I believe every hon. member knows that these things are going on in his or her constituency. It is a situation which should be checked at once. Action should be taken to direct much of this portion of our national strength to waging war. That would mean a release for war purposes of man and woman power, and of materials, money, and the equipment for manufacturing goods.

Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, said much the same thing when he spoke in Montreal late last week. He is quoted in the press as having said:

> We must be prepared to give up all our choices and preferences and accustom ourselves to a standard of living based on bare essentials, for only by so doing can we divert to war the maximum of our productive effort which is the prime requirement for total war.

But direction from the ministry is necessary, and it is not being given at this time. The Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), speaking in Montreal on December 13, shortly after Japan struck, used these words:

> These powers—

Referring to the powers given to the government under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

> —we propose to use in the emergency which confronts us and in an endeavour to see to it that every man and woman in this country carries on the work which will be of the greatest possible benefit to the state as a whole.

That was nearly four months ago, and it is about time that the government took the advice of the minister and got busy on the programme which he outlined at that time. If he had been in charge of carrying out the programme, something would have been done long since.

It would help if the ministry would ask those Canadians who are serving on the home front to buy on the basis of "How little do I need; what can I do without?" rather than on the present basis, which seems to be, "How much can I get and how long can I get this or that?" If the Canadian people are shown that every dollar spent on supplies not absolutely necessary may mean less war material produced or fewer men in the fighting forces, they will respond. The government from the start of the war have made the mistake of not asking the Canadian people for enough, not asking them to do as much as the people have been and are prepared to do.

That brings me to the fighting forces—man-power—and I am glad to see the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) in his seat. The position in respect of man-power is much the same. We are not using our available man-power. Although Japan struck over three months ago and Canada's position became infinitely more dangerous, the defence department has gone placidly on calling on the Department of National War Services for about the same number of men—no hurry apparently, no urgency, plenty of time to get men and give them training. Now we find this situation. I quote from a press dispatch by Mr. Carnegie of the Canadian Press on March 14:

> The supply of man-power to keep up the flow of compulsory service recruits to the training centres at the rate of 5,000 a month has diminished to such an extent that the age limit shortly will be advanced probably to 30 years, a government authority said to-day.

It is my understanding that no men are being called above the age of twenty-six. If that is not correct, I ask the minister to correct me. Meanwhile the Australians have made provision to call men for military service up to the age of sixty. Our ministry apparently expect that men from nineteen to thirty-five are to do the fighting in the active army. If that is so—and I do not think it will be denied—those men should be given training at once; they should be called up without further delay and given a chance to get proper training, which in the long run may mean the saving of the lives of many of them, and will certainly mean a stronger and more efficient fighting force. Instead of that, we are to have another survey or registration of some kind, which again will take weeks.

Something should be done now about the size of our active army. It should be increased. On February 10, speaking in this house, the Minister of National Defence said, as reported at page 451 of Hansard:

> It should be remembered that apart from the fourth division and the brigade groups of the sixth division, we have in Canada over 90,000 active service personnel in training centres and elsewhere.

Since then, I believe about 10,000 have enlisted, but—and here again there is a "but"—many, many thousands of these men are pinned down; they are engaged in some particular army work so that they cannot be moved about. For example there are men on the training centre staffs and men on the district depot staffs and on headquarters staffs, and many of the men in the veterans' guard, men in detachments on the home war establishments and attached to the air force, men in permanent hospitals, and thousands of coast defence troops. There are many more thousands who are reinforcements for overseas, with the result that there is a comparatively small number to form mobile forces in Canada. We should have larger mobile forces in Canada; for example, on the Pacific coast at the present time we should have a striking force. In the first place, that would be the best way to defend our coast, by building up a force that could be rushed from one part of the coast to another. It should not be a matter of a few hundred men here and there but a proper striking force. The time will come, I hope, when we shall be able to send a striking force out over the Pacific, and in the meantime men could be trained in British Columbia for that purpose.

The province of British Columbia should be treated as a war front, just as Great Britain is treated as a war front. I cannot understand, for example, why the rule which calls for younger men in command of the different units should not apply in British Columbia just as it applies in Great Britain. The forces on the Pacific coast under present conditions should be handled as though they were on a war front, which is actually the case.

Then we should do something now about our reserve force. It should be increased. This little government publication called "Canada at War", which comes out every month, says at page 8 of the supplement of February 1:

> At home, a special reorganization and regrouping is being planned for the reserve army, which consists of about 140,000 men.

Over one-third of these men, I believe, are recruits who were called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act for 30-day training. They are carried as supernumerary to establishment, which means that they are merely names on the walls of the different armouries across Canada. No doubt many of them have since enlisted in the fighting forces, and yet these men are shown as a portion of the Canadian reserve army. The result is that the Canadian people think they have 140,000 men in the reserve army, while actually they have very many under that number. Provision should be made so that the men who come within this classification can actually train with the other men in the reserve forces. If necessary, if the ministry cannot recruit the reserve army in any other way, let them call up men over thirty-five for the purpose.

They must give this reserve army some equipment. In my own province of British Columbia there has now been a brigade formed in the reserve army; the men who are joining up are joining up to fight, to be in a position to defend their homes, and if enthusiasm is to be maintained and the brigade is to become efficient, they must be given proper equipment. It must not be a case of sending them a field gun or two, a mortar or two, or a small amount of equipment with which they can merely train; they must have weapons with which to fight.

Then I suggest the time has come when we must organize a home guard in Canada. That is particularly true on our war front on the west coast and, I believe, also on the east coast. Certainly on the Pacific coast every able-bodied man should be in the home guard or in air raid precaution work or preparing in some way to take his part should there be an invasion of that coast. At the present time the government has extended the reserve army to some extent by forming small companies in a few centres on the Pacific coast. But it should go much further. Every able-bodied man in British Columbia should be trained and put in some position where he can take his part should the province be invaded.

Another thing that should be done at once or very shortly is that we should produce more equipment. The troops on duty in Canada are not fully equipped—I do not think the minister will deny that. These troops should be equipped, for example, with planes and tanks. The government boasts a great deal about shipping military equipment all over the world; every week some press dispatch is given out to tell of Canada shipping military equipment to all parts of the world. I do not quarrel with that, but the position is just this serious, that Canada must go one step further and produce enough equipment to arm her own troops at home, who may be called upon to defend this nation.

Finally, the ministry should make plans to help the Canadian people meet any eventuality. For example, have plans been made for the evacuation of women and children from either coast in the event of attack? If not, such plans should be made now while we have a chance to do it without great haste, and the leaders in the different communities should know those plans so that there will not be great confusion if trouble comes.

Another question is, is Canada to adopt a scorched-earth policy or is she not? That decision should not be left until the enemy is at our gates. We find Australia on March 10 putting through regulations which are described as follows:

> The government is empowered to order the civil evacuation of any area threatened by invasion and in cases where property and live stock cannot be removed their destruction may be ordered.
> The regulations also provide for demolition of buildings, public works, airports, railways, mines and reservoirs in such emergencies.

The ministers may smile; some may think this is funny. But may I impress upon them with all the power at my command that things like this should be planned now; there is no better way of instilling confidence in the Canadian people than to have plans prepared and thoroughly understood to meet eventualities of this type.

Each thing I have advocated could be and, I believe, should be done now. There has been too much delay. I can understand that the ministers are overburdened with work, under pressure every day and for long hours, with all kinds of things to do, but there has been much delay and there should be no more. We should get right down to business and start doing these things of the nature I have outlined. Delay is one of the greatest menaces to Canadian survival. I ask the ministry to tell us—and tell us before the Easter adjournment, not on April 20—and through this house tell the Canadian people what they propose to do about these things I have mentioned and other things of the same kind. I urge them and urge every member of this house to give this nation at once far more aggressive leadership in waging war.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Surely the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) will make some statement in reply to this. We want time to read the minister's statement. This resolution should not go through now without some statement by the minister. It is almost eleven o'clock. We should hear it to-morrow.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not going to take the time of the house now. I do not know what my hon. friend means. The ministry will make a statement in due course. I do not think there is any occasion for making a statement particularly in answer to a speech made at ten minutes to eleven.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not expect you to; move the adjournment of the debate. If you want to get this resolution through, you will have to make a reply. If there had not been so much chattering over there, perhaps the ministers would have heard what the hon. member said.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We heard every word of it.

On motion of Mr. White the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Crerar the house adjourned at 10:52 p.m.

MOBILIZATION OF MAN-POWER

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL GIVING EFFECT TO GOVERNMENT POLICY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it was announced last night that I would to-day make a statement concerning measures recently adopted giving additional effect to the government's policy with respect to the mobilization of man-power. In that connection I have in my hand a number of orders in council which have recently been passed with respect to the mobilization of man-power, and I should like to table them. The orders are in English and French. I might cite the various orders:

P.C. 2250, March 21, 1942, restricting the entry of men of military age into certain occupations.

P.C. 2252, March 21, 1942, amendments of national war services regulations, 1940 (recruits) (consolidation), 1941.

P.C. 2253, March 21, 1942, transfer of national registration functions, records, etc., from Department of National War Services to Department of Labour.

P.C. 2254, March 21, 1942, providing for the appointment of a Director and Associate Director of National Selective Service, and the establishment of a National Selective Service Advisory Board.

P.C. 2192, March 21, 1942, authorizing a proclamation for the calling out of additional classes for military training.

P.C. 2229, March 23, 1942, providing for the reconditioning of certain classes of physically unfit persons ("R") recruits.

P.C. 2291, March 23, 1942, providing for the reconditioning of other classes of physically unfit persons (active service personnel).

P.C. 2301, March 23, 1942, appointing E. M. Little, Esquire, Director of National Selective Service, and Paul Goulet, Esquire, Associate Director of National Selective Service.

P.C. 1445, March 2, 1942, authorizing the Minister of Labour to establish and maintain an inventory of employable persons.

P.C. 638, March 4, 1942, essential work (scientific and technical personnel) regulations, 1942.

P.C. 26/1840, March 10, 1942, providing for extension and improvement of training in personnel management, for the appointment of a director of personnel training, and for the appointment of personnel managers.

P.C. 1955, March 13, 1942, providing for the reregistration of persons under unemployment insurance.

These orders are important, and I imagine hon. members will wish to refer to them from time to time. If the house will give its consent I suggest that they be printed as an appendix to the Votes and Proceedings of to-day.

NATIONAL SELECTIVE SERVICE—MEANS OF EFFECTING INCREASED MOBILIZATION OF MAN-POWER

Mr. Speaker, the speech from the throne at the opening of the present session of parliament contained the following paragraph:

> The government's policy of national selective service will be extended, as generally and rapidly as may be necessary to effect the orderly and efficient employment of the men and women of Canada for the varied purposes of war. You will be advised of the means the government proposes to adopt to effect as complete as possible a mobilization of the material resources and man-power of the country in direct furtherance of a total national effort.

I propose in the statement I am now about to make to set forth means the government proposes to adopt to effect increased mobilization of the man-power of the country in direct furtherance of a total national effort, and to outline the measures themselves as already adopted.

Modern total war is not confined to the struggle between opposing armies and navies and air forces. It is a struggle between whole peoples, in which all of each nation's resources, both human and material, must be mobilized and brought into action. It is therefore a misconception to assume that the war-time man-power problem is merely a problem of raising men for the armed forces. This is only a part, and not necessarily the most difficult part, of the problem of mobilizing the man-power of a nation for modern war.

Man-power—and in that term I include woman-power—is required for many and varied tasks. In the first place, essential civilian services must be maintained as the foundation of community life on which the war effort rests. These essential tasks are a form of service just as truly as making munitions or serving in the armed forces. In order, however, to free younger men for direct war service, civilian tasks, as far as may be possible, should be performed by older men or by women.

The production of food, in war time, is one of the most essential civilian tasks. To the extent that food is produced for Britain, or other allied countries, or for Canada's own fighting men, it is a direct war service. If this aspect of Canada's total effort is not to suffer, the man-power required for food production must be kept available.

The man-power requirements for munitions production must also be filled. Some 600,000 workers are already engaged in the production of munitions. It is estimated that in the course of the next twelve months an additional 100,000 workers will be required.

In the armed forces our estimated requirements for the ensuing twelve months are a further 13,000 men for the navy, 90,000 to 100,000 for the active army, and 70,000 to 80,000 for the air force. These figures were given to parliament on February 10th by the Minister of National Defence. In addition, men will continue to be called up for military service within Canada; and this on a considerably increased scale.

When, on January 26th, I announced the war programme for the coming year, I stated that the men and women required to carry out the programme would be mobilized by an extension of the application of national selective service.

It might be helpful were I to repeat the definition I then gave of national selective service as understood by the government.

By national service is meant any form of service, either voluntary or compulsory, which contributes directly to Canada's war effort. By national selective service is meant the selection of men and women for the various forms of national service according to the method or methods calculated to produce the most satisfactory results.

In order to be selective, national service does not necessarily need to be compulsory. The selective aspect applies also to voluntary service. The army, for example, does not accept every man who offers to enlist. As a war measure, compulsion is only of value where it serves to ensure a greater total effort.

In speaking on the war programme in January, I made it clear that the extended application of compulsion to national selective service was a highly complicated matter, one which required very careful planning and organization. I also stated that, to carry out the proposed measures equitably and efficiently, the administrative machinery would necessarily be intricate and complicated.

Final responsibility for the allocation of man-power, as for all other phases of our war programme, necessarily rests with the war committee of the cabinet. The war committee determines, in all its aspects, the scope and extent of the war programme. The distribution of men and women among the various kinds of war service obviously depends upon the war programme. The objectives are set forth in the programme. National selective service is a method employed to help achieve these objectives.

To the problems of mobilizing man-power, the war committee has given close and continuous attention. Under the authority of the war committee, a special committee of the cabinet on man-power, presided over by the Minister of National War Services, has given detailed study to the problems involved. The recommendations of this committee have in turn been carefully considered by the whole cabinet.

I shall now set forth the procedures and measures which have been taken to organize and administer the government's policy of national selective service.

The primary responsibility for the extended scheme of national selective service has been placed upon the Minister of Labour. Under the Minister of Labour, the administrative responsibility for the direction and coordination of the policy has been vested in a director of national selective service and an associate director. Mr. Elliott M. Little has been appointed the Director of National Selective Service, and Mr. Paul Goulet, the Associate Director.

The responsibility for increasing the total man-power available for war service has been largely centred in the Department of Labour. It would not, however, be possible, even if it were desirable, to centralize in one department of government all the administrative responsibility for allocating man-power, and for directing men and women into the most useful form of service.

The other departments of government which share in greater or less degree in the tasks of making man-power available for war service and in the allocation of the available man-power are the departments of National War Services, Pensions and National Health, Munitions and Supply, Agriculture, and the three Defence departments. The interdepartmental committee on labour co-ordination, on which all these departments are represented, assists in coordinating the functions of the various departments, in so far as they relate to the mobilization of man-power. The committee has been strengthened by the addition of the employer and employee representatives on the executive of the national war labour board.

A national selective service advisory board has been established to advise on major questions of policy. This board includes, in addition to the members of the labour co-ordination committee, the full membership of the national war labour board and such other persons as the Minister of Labour may designate. This latter provision will ensure the representation on the board of the agricultural community and of women.

In the programme of national selective service, extensive use is being made of the facilities of the Employment Service of Canada. In each area covered by an employment and claims office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission the director of national selective service will shortly appoint a national selective service officer. The national selective service officers will have local charge of the administration of the selective service programme for their respective areas. They will be advised and assisted in their work by voluntary unpaid citizens' committees which will be set up in each of the areas.

A central registry has been established in the Department of Labour to aid in promptly finding the appropriate men and women needed at any particular time. The registry is based upon the unemployment insurance records, and the records of the 1940 national registration. To the registry will be added the records of such further surveys of man-power as may be made from time to time, with a view to building up a complete inventory of man-power available for war and essential civilian purposes. To consolidate records and to avoid duplication, the administrative responsibility for national registration has been transferred from the Department of National War Services to the Department of Labour.

Under the programme now adopted, the mobilization of industrial man-power will, in the main, be effected through the agency of the Employment Service of Canada. The armed forces will continue to recruit men for the active army, the navy and the air force by the present voluntary methods. The calling up of men for compulsory military training and service will continue to be the responsibility of the Department of National War Services.

Compulsion is now being applied in aspects of the mobilization of man-power, other than military service within Canada, to which it has been applied since October, 1940. It is recognized that no hard and fast compulsory regulations can be made which may not work injustices in individual cases. As a consequence, considerable discretion has been vested in the national war services boards to decide appeals from the compulsory or restrictive regulations of the government, and from the orders of the director of national selective service and the national selective service officers.

The right of appeal will be enjoyed, not only by employers; employees, farmers, farm labourers and others directly affected, but also by interested government departments. The duty of hearing civilian appeals will add greatly to the work of the national war services boards, now mainly concerned with the appeals of men called up for military service. In order to cope with the increased duties which will fall upon the boards, it may become necessary to increase their number and in some cases to divide their territorial jurisdictions.

The war-time mobilization of man-power has three important aspects:

1. Estimating the number of men and women required for the different kinds of war service.

2. Increasing the total man-power resources available for war purposes. In other words, making available for some part in the war effort the largest possible number of men and women.

3. Directing the available men and women into the most useful form of war service.

All of these tasks have to be carried on at one and the same time, and, in part at least, through the same channels.

The whole programme is interrelated and interdependent. I shall now give a brief outline of each of the measures, indicating, as far as possible, how each relates to and affects the other.

Estimating the number of men and women needed in the war effort, and the most effective distribution of the total among the armed services, war industry and essential civilian pursuits, is a difficult task. A constantly changing war necessitates constant changes in military and production plans. These changes, in turn, involve continuous revision of the estimates of man-power requirements, and the proposed allocation of man-power reserves. To this end, the director of national selective service has been given authority to obtain information from government departments, and empowered to secure from employers, by compulsion if necessary, full information, regarding prospective labour requirements, existing labour forces, wage scales and working conditions.

In the early months of the war, there were large reserves of available man-power for war service because of the unemployment and under-employment of many thousands of Canadians. If we except women who, for domestic or social reasons, have not desired or sought employment, we are now well past the stage where there is any considerable reserve of employable unemployed persons. Women, therefore, constitute the most important available reserve of man-power. It is, however, not so much by bringing women directly into the armed forces, though that is being done, that the total man-power available for war service can actually be increased; rather is this end accomplished by the substitution of women for men in essential civilian tasks, and in war industry.

Additional man-power is becoming potentially available for war service as an indirect result of the curtailment of civilian production. To the achievement of a maximum effort, it is vital that man-power thus released be shifted as speedily and efficiently as possible into some form of war service. The process of shifting man-power from civilian occupations into war service has, of course, gone on steadily since the outbreak of war. It has now been given more definite governmental direction and is being accelerated.

For more than a year, the Department of Labour, in cooperation with the provinces and industry, has been increasing the man-power available through training men and women for employment in war industries. During the past year, more than 60,000 trainees received instruction in about one hundred technical schools. Industries cooperating with the Department of Labour, and often on their own initiative, trained at least an equal number. Through the Department of Labour services, and directly in industry, greater provision is now being made for training and retraining men for essential war production; for diluting present working forces by employment of men of lesser skill for simpler operations; and for the constant up-grading, as a result of training and experience, of existing working forces.

The programme of increasing war-time man-power reserves has a threefold objective:

First, to increase the total male labour force available for war production.

Second, to make possible the replacement of able-bodied men of military age with older men, or men less fit physically for arduous tasks.

Third, to increase war-time man-power reserves by bringing women into industry. This is the most important single feature of the programme.

The first two objectives are being accelerated by governmental and industrial assistance. The assistance is similar in character, although on a smaller scale, to that being afforded for recruiting female labour.

The series of measures being undertaken to bring women into industries include:

1. Recruiting campaigns, planned and publicized to attract women into the needed work;

2. The provision of appropriate and adequate facilities for interviewing women applicants and for giving them advice and direction;

3. The establishment of competent job information and placement services, specializing in female labour;

4. Advances, where necessary, to meet trasnportation costs in getting women workers to places where work is available;

5. The provision of hostels or other satisfactory housing arrangements;

6. The provision of nurseries and other means of caring for children;

7. The provision, where needed, of medical and recreational facilities;

8. The provision in industry, as well as under direct governmental auspices, of training programmes, specifically designed for women;

9. Pressure upon employers who may be reluctant to engage female labour;

10. Changes in civil service and institutional restrictions on the employment of female, and, particularly, married female labour.

Some of these measures have already been applied over a considerable period of time. From now on, they will be more extensively applied.

An important phase of the man-power problem has to do with providing in war industries the necessary supervisory personnel. It has been found that, as war industries continue to expand, it is increasingly difficult to secure sufficient supervisors, personnel managers, and foremen, to direct the enlarged work forces. Many plants producing urgently needed war materials are now operating day and night, seven days in the week. Others that might be operating on the same basis are hampered by lack of supervisors.

A recent statement by Mr. Bevin on the importance of personnel factors in war production in Great Britain is equally applicable to Canada. It reads:

> In the layout of our war effort, sufficient attention was not paid to the personnel problem. . . . The longer the war goes on, the more necessary it becomes to pay greater regard to this personnel side of industry. The absence of a proper understanding of the problem has been one of our greatest handicaps in this great struggle. . . . Hence my additional plea for the personnel manager, who should be specially trained to have an equal position in industry with others members of the executive. Indeed, I am sure—and I would emphasize this—that our post-war position will be materially helped, and the future prospects of British industry enhanced, by a full appreciation of this important fact.

To assist our Canadian employers to meet their personnel problem, provision has been made by the government for training in personnel management. The universities have agreed to cooperate. Experienced personnel men will serve as instructors and sponsors. Trainees will be given practical instruction in the classroom, and on the job.

If the experience of this undertaking warrants, these facilities will be extended to foremen and other supervisors. It is hoped by this means greatly to reduce an important area of difficulty in war production. Moreover, better personnel policies and practice should minimize friction between management and men, improve morale, and thereby increase output.

The government is also undertaking an extended programme of reconditioning men to fit them physically for military service.

It is and has been standard practice for the army to accept men for service who require only dental treatment, provision of glasses, or nutritional improvement. After enlistment or enrolment, treatment is provided for these men as a matter of routine.

There are, however, men volunteering for the active army, or called up for training and service, who at present have to be rejected because of some condition other than those just mentioned, and which, though not a serious disability, is important enough to require more than routine treatment.

It has been decided that when disabilities of this class are mendable within a comparatively short time, free remedial treatment will be provided to restore the standard of physical fitness of these men. Such a policy is in the interests of the armed services and also of benefit to the health of the nation as a whole.

Free treatment will be available to those who volunteer and undertake in writing to enlist as soon as they are physically eligible, provided they are certified by a competent board to be cases in which the disability can be removed or mended by treatment so as to make them physically fit for enlistment within a specified reasonable period.

Free treatment will also be available to those who are called up for compulsory training and service provided it is similarly certified, as in the case of volunteers, that the disability is such that it can be removed or mended within a specified reasonable period. When the treatment is successfully completed, these men will be available for military training and service.

In giving treatment, the Departments of National Defence, Pensions and National Health, and National War Services, will cooperate.

The treatment, both for volunteers and for men called up for training and service, will be provided or arranged for by the Department of Pensions and National Health. In neither case will men undergoing treatment be accepted into the army unless, and until, the treatment has been successfully completed. In both cases, in addition to free treatment and, if necessary, hospitalization, men undergoing treatment will be paid an allowance for time actually and necessarily lost during the remedial period.

It should be added that free treatment on precisely the same terms as in the case of volunteers for the active army, will be provided for men who volunteer for the air force, and would now be rejected for physical unfitness.

Until recently, the most important form of direct compulsion in mobilizing men has been the compulsory military training and service of unmarried men and of widowers without children. This, of course, is being continued, although with certain changes in the selective procedure.

A proclamation is being issued making liable to call for military training and service all men born in the years from 1912 to 1921, who on July 15, 1940, were unmarried or widowers without children. In other words, the age limit for compulsory service has been raised from 24 to 30. It has also been decided to select the men to be called up for service by drawing lots over the whole field of those who are subject to the proclamation. As soon as the necessary administrative arrangements have been worked out for this plan of selection by lot, a detailed announcement will be made by the Minister of National War Services.

Liability for compulsory military service is, at present, confined to citizens of Canada. It has been decided to extend this liability to all residents of Canada, whether citizens or not, as far as may be expedient in the light of all the circumstances. As reciprocal arrangements and other international considerations are involved in the proposal, its details cannot be announced immediately.

The liability to compulsory military service will continue to be general for the age categories affected. The burden of demonstrating the case for postponements is unchanged, except in the case of persons wholly or mainly employed in agriculture on March 23, 1942, as defined in the amended national war services regulations.

One of the man-power problems with which the country is faced is the growing shortage of agricultural labour. Means, accordingly, have had to be devised to ensure that the supply of farm labour is not depleted. To that end, regulations have been enacted to stabilize employment in agriculture.

With three exceptions, the regulations provide that no male person wholly or mainly employed in agriculture on March 23, 1942, as defined by the regulations shall enter into any employment outside agriculture unless he has obtained written permission from the national selective service officer to enter such employment. They also provide that no person shall take into employment outside agriculture, any male person wholly or mainly employed in agriculture unless such male person has obtained such permission.

The three exceptions provided for are active service in the armed forces by voluntary enlistment, seasonal employment in a primary industry, and compulsory military training if it is established that the person concerned is not an essential worker in agriculture.

The exception of seasonal employment in other primary industries, which include lumbering, logging, forestry, fishing and trapping is, in reality, not an exception. In many parts of the country, agriculture and the primary pursuits specified are complementary aspects of what is, in effect, a single occupation.

The other specific exceptions both relate to service in the armed forces. Voluntary enlistment of farmers and agricultural workers in the active army, the navy and the air forces will continue to be encouraged. It is felt that the privilege of serving voluntarily in the armed forces should not be completely denied to a whole class of the community, however important may be the service its members are at present performing.

On the other hand, the growing scarcity of labour on the farms and the increasing importance of maintaining, and, indeed, of increasing food production, has been recognized. This has been accomplished by a fundamental alteration of the policy regarding compulsory military training and service where such service touches persons wholly or mainly employed in agriculture. Up to the present there has been a general obligation to serve, and the responsibility for proving a case for postponement of service has rested with the individual. Under the new regulations, farmers, farmers' sons and agricultural labourers will normally not be obliged to undertake compulsory military training and service. It is realized, however, that in a limited number of cases, men on the farms are not, in fact, essential agricultural workers. If it is established to the satisfaction of the national war services boards concerned that such persons are not essential workers in agriculture, they will continue to be called for service in the appropriate age groups.

This change of policy regarding compulsory military service applies only to those who were wholly or mainly employed in agriculture, on March 23, 1942, in accordance with the terms of the regulations. Persons who subsequent to that date may return to employment in agriculture, except from normal seasonal occupations, will continue to be liable for military service. In such cases, the earlier regulations regarding postponement will continue to apply.

Apart from the three specified exceptions to the rule that persons engaged in agriculture shall not enter into other employment, the regulations also empower the national selective service officer, having jurisdiction in the district in which a person resides, to give permission to farmers and agricultural workers to enter other employment. This provision has been included in the regulations so as to maintain a reasonable degree of flexibility in policy. It is recognized that there may be those engaged in agricultural pursuits, who, because of the limited character of their production or on other grounds, are not performing an essential war service. At the same time, such persons, because of age or physical condition, or for other reasons, may not be suitable for military service. Unless the way were left open for such persons to move into other fields of activity, great individual hardships might result, and valuable service in other fields be lost to the country.

It will, therefore, be open to farmers and others engaged in agricultural work, who desire to enter some other field of employment, to apply to the national selective service officer, having jurisdiction in the district in which they reside, for permission to change their employment. Detailed regulations to guide national selective service officers in determining whether such permission shall be granted or refused will be made and revised from time to time in the light of experience. Two governing factors will be taken into account in determining these regulations, namely, the maintenance of the necessary agricultural production in Canada, and the extent to which the applicant is essential to the maintenance of such production.

The policy of stabilizing employment in agriculture represents what, in effect, is a block allocation to agriculture of the persons best fitted for food production. It constitutes a form of large scale selection for national service which should go far to ensure the supply of man-power essential to the food production aspect of the national war effort.

Another step in the allocation of man-power recently taken, relates to the diversion of technicians to war service. It concerns persons normally engaged in the engineering profession as civil, mechanical, electrical, chemical, metallurgical or mining engineers; also production and industrial engineers, college teachers of engineering science, persons trained in any branch of the science of chemistry, research scientists and persons other than teachers holding university degrees in engineering, chemistry, physics, geology, mathematics, architecture, or in any natural science; also all technically qualified members of the Engineering Institute of Canada, the Canadian Institute of Chemistry, the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, the Royal Architectural Institute of Canada and of any provincial association of professional engineers, chemists or architects.

About a year ago, with the aid of the professional engineering societies, there was established in the Department of Labour a war-time bureau of technical personnel. The bureau has accumulated information on most of the professional engineers of the country. It has sought to make engineers available as needed in the armed services and in war industry. The time has come, when in the opinion of the government, all technical men should be shifted from non-essential activities to war or other essential services.

Under regulations at present in force, if, at the request of the Minister of Labour an engineer is willing to transfer to more essential work, his present employer is obliged to release him and to reinstate him when his undertaking on essential work is completed. Employers who hire or release technical employees are required to notify the bureau so that technical men as needed in the war effort may be quickly located. Contracts of employment for the services of technicians require the approval of the Minister of Labour.

This measure is restricted for the present to professional technicians. It may, however, become necessary as an essential war service, also to require skilled workmen in certain categories, to remain in their existing occupations in war industries, or to move from one war industry to another, or to remain in certain essential civilian occupations. Should such widespread control become necessary, every effort will be made to reduce its arbitrary aspects to a minimum, and to secure, from workmen and employers alike, the largest measure of voluntary cooperation.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

In order to increase the numbers of men available for service in the armed forces, in war industry, or in other essential occupations, regulations have been made which prohibit the entry into employment in a wide variety of occupations, of men who are of military age and physically fit. These occupations will be known in future as restricted occupations. The regulations include a schedule of the restricted occupations. The schedule comprises:

Bookkeepers, cashiers, stenographers, tyists, clerks, office appliance operators, messengers, salesmen and sales clerks, taxicab drivers.

Any occupation in wholesale or retail trade, advertising, and real estate.

Any occupation in, or directly associated with, entertainment, recreational or personal service, including but not restricted to theatres; film agencies; motion picture companies; clubs; bowling alleys; pool rooms; sports; barbering and hairdressing; domestic service; dyeing; cleaning and pressing; laundering; hotels and lodging houses; baths; restaurants; cafes and taverns; shoe shining, guide service, and funeral service.

Any occupation in the manufacture or production of

1. Biscuits, confectionery, cocoa.
2. Bread and bakery products.
3. Aerated and mineral waters and other beverages.
4. Liquors, wines, beer.
5. Rubber products.
6. Tobacco, cigars, cigarettes.
7. Leather and fur products.
8. Textile products.
9. Furniture and upholstering.
10. Photography.
11. Printing, publishing and engraving.
12. Radios, refrigerators, washing machines, and vacuum cleaners.
13. Jewellery and watchmaking.
14. Pottery and china.
15. Soaps, and toilet preparations and articles.
16. Mattresses.
17. Musical instruments.
18. Barber and beauty shop equipment.
19. Cameras and films.
20. Sporting goods.
21. Games, toys and novelties.

Any occupation in the repair of clothing, boots and shoes, furniture and household equipment, jewellery or watches, musical instruments.

It is provided that, on and after March 23, 1942, no male person shall accept employment, and no employer shall engage any male person in any of these restricted occupations, unless such person presents to the prospective employer a birth certificate or other incontrovertible evidence that his age is less than seventeen or more than forty-five years; or a certificate of honourable discharge from the armed forces; or evidence of rejection on grounds of physical unfitness for active service in the armed forces during the present war; or a permit from a national selective service officer authorizing him to accept such employment.

The conditions which govern the granting or refusing of permission by national selective service officers are to be made, and may be revised from time to time, by the Minister of Labour. Permits are necessarily subject to cancellation at any time.

The Minister of Labour is authorized to require employers to furnish reports about all persons engaged for or released from restricted occupations. The governor in council is empowered to amend the schedule of restricted occupations, by the deletion or addition of any occupation.

By applying the negative compulsion of restriction, where possible, in preference to the positive compulsion of allocation, the waste of man-power in unessential activities is prevented. At the same time, men and women are maintained in or directed into the form of service they prefer. It is obvious that the greater the measure of willingness that can be preserved, the more effective the service will be.

May I say, in conclusion, while the government has not hesitated and will not hesitate to apply compulsion where compulsion will serve to increase the total war effort, the government has no desire to add unduly —which means wastefully—to governmental machinery. It is essential that at a time of war, the services of men and women should not be consumed in unnecessary tasks. It is imperative that the services of all should be directed into war-time tasks. In those aspects of our war effort in which voluntary methods are working satisfactorily, voluntary selection, including a measure of choice by the individual of the appropriate field of service, has been and will be continued. The more expensive and complicated methods of compulsion have been employed only where it is felt that compulsory selection is necessary in order to increase efficiency in the prosecution of the war. Compulsion, however, will be applied without fear or favour wherever in the opinion of the government its use will aid in the achievement of a maximum war effort.

CANTEEN FUNDS

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO COLLECTION, CUSTODY, INVESTMENT AND CONTROL

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved:

Whereas it was deemed necessary after the war of 1914-18 to provide legislation for the disposal of canteen funds and the purposes for which such funds were to be utilized for the benefit of ex-servicemen and their dependents;

And whereas by order in council dated December 20, 1940, P.C. 7520 (as amended by P.C. 224 of January 13, 1941, P.C. 1087 of February 14, 1941, and P.C. 1959 of March 24, 1941), a committee was constituted to inquire into and make recommendations and report to the Minister of National Defence concerning the collection, custody, investment, control and utilization of moneys accruing from the profits of canteens, and certain other related matters as set out in the said orders in council; and whereas the said committee has reported to the Minister of National Defence under date the 30th August, 1941, and has made certain recommendations with regard to the matters referred to it as aforesaid;

And whereas a subcommittee of the general advisory committee on demobilization and rehabilitation, namely the subcommittee on the administration of special funds has made an investigation and an interim report with reference to the administration of canteen funds following the war of 1914-18, to which is added the comment of the subcommittee thereon and certain recommendations as to the use of canteen profits for the welfare of ex-members of the armed forces of Canada in the present war;

And whereas it is considered desirable in the public interest that the collection, custody and control of canteen funds and the purpose for which they are to be used should be examined, considered and reported on by a committee of the house;

Therefore be it resoved:—That a select committee of the house be appointed to inquire into the collection, custody, investment and control of such moneys as under existing regulations and agreements accrue out of the profits arising from the operation of canteens and other auxiliary services and institutes for the benefit of the armed forces of Canada during the present war; and as to whether certain portions of the profits arising from canteens other than the portions of profits for which provision is now made should be paid to the government of Canada; and the policy and method of management to be adopted in the utilization of the said funds for the benefit of those who have served in the Canadian armed forces and for the benefit of the dependents of such persons; and to report to the house their opinions, observations and recommendations thereon; and to recommend to the house the appropriate legislation to implement such recommendations as the committee may make.

That the committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Abbott, Adamson, Black (Yukon), Blanchette, Booth, Brooks, Bruce, Castleden, Chambers, Claxton, Cleaver, Cruickshank, Diefenbaker, Emmerson, Factor, Fauteux, Ferron, Gillis, Graham, Gray, Green, Hallé, Harris (Grey-Bruce), Hazen, Isnor, Jackman, Johnston (London), Jutras, Lapointe (Matapedia-Matane), Lapointe (Lotbinière), Macdonald (Kingston City), Macdonald (Halifax), Macdonald (Brantford City), MacKenzie (Neepawa), Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Macmillan, McCuaig, McLean (Simcoe East), Marshall, Massey, Mutch, Quelch, Ross (Middlesex East), Ross (Souris), Sanderson, Sinclair, Sylvestre, Tomlinson, Tremblay, Tucker, Turgeon, White, Whitman, Winkler, Wright, and that standing order 65 be suspended in relation thereto; that the committee shall have power to send for persons and records and report from time to time.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to offer two brief comments on this resolution. The first is that I believe the thanks of this house are due to the committee which was established by order in council to investigate the custody, control and investment of canteen funds, which committee was headed by a very distinguished and public-spirited Canadian, Mr. J. M. Macdonnell.

The other comment which I wish to make is to suggest that this is subject matter which might perhaps well be referred to the other chamber for investigation, having regard to the great number of special committees which are being set up in this house, and the strain upon some of our membership, especially those who are returned soldiers. At the moment I do not think there is any real necessity for this matter to be considered by a committee of this house, and in my view it would present an opportunity for members of the other chamber to engage in very useful work. I believe it is almost a national disgrace that the great talents and abilities of members of the other house are not being put to public service at this time. If there is any particular reason why this matter should be investigated by a committee of the house of course I shall not press this point; but I offer the suggestion to the minister and to the government for their serious consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The suggestion offered by my hon. friend has not been brought to my attention before. The committee suggested consists of all hon. members who served in the great war and who are on active service in the present war. It was felt that the two reports submitted to the government, one by the subcommittee of the general committee on demobilization and rehabilitation, the other by the committee headed by the gentleman to whom my hon. friend has referred—and I wish to support his commendation of the excellent work done by that committee—indicated that this work could be best done by members of this house.

We have frequently heard the comment from some of our members that sufficient work is not given them during the ordinary course of the session. I believe that a non-partisan committee, such as here suggested, is the best form of committee to deal with this important problem. Hon. members will recall that this matter came up in parliament after the last war, at which time about $2,500,000 was made available for disposition. Trustees were appointed in various provinces, and in some of those provinces there were unfortunate occurrences with regard to these funds.

It is therefore the desire of the government to place this matter before parliament and the house, and I have no doubt whatsoever that means could be found to ask hon. members of the other chamber to cooperate with this committee, if they so desire, in the work of the committee. I believe the resolution should commend itself to everyone in the house. To my mind it is most important to see to it that the benefits from these funds, which accrue in various ways—in the first place through dry canteens and wet canteens in this country—should accrue so far as possible to the men themselves, and that any investments to be made should be made for the benefit of those who are serving the country at the present time.

I shall be very glad to see if a method can be worked out by which cooperation with the other chamber can be secured, as has been suggested by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister referred to abuses. Were there any prosecutions following those abuses?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That would be a matter of provincial jurisdiction, because all the trustees were created by the provinces.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that this is the occasion on which to make suggestions, but I have two suggestions to make to the committee. The first is that the money accruing from canteen funds should be made available to help the men by reducing the cost of their going home on furlough, especially the last furlough before embarking for overseas. A good many of our men are sent, we will say, from western Canada to Nova Scotia, or to some other distant part of Canada, and they often find that before embarkation they are unable to pay their fares home. I therefore make the suggestion that this money be used for that purpose.

There is another point which to my mind deserves consideration. I heartily agree with the minister when he says that this money should be used in the interests of the men. One way in which it could be used for the benefit of the men would be to have it meet the cost of insurance.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of National Defence for Air): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the house of the difficulties that arose after the last war through the accumulation of canteen funds, when no one seemed to have any definite idea as to just what useful purpose these funds could serve. At the close of the last war there had been accumulated from canteens in Canada and overseas something like $2,500,000. As time went on, in the minds of returned soldiers this sum grew, like the proverbial snowball, into a sum that they thought might represent $100,000,000. There was not a meeting of ex-soldier organizations from which suggestions did not emanate as to the uses to which these funds should be put. Finally, after a great deal of controversy in this house, in the upper chamber and in the country, the matter was referred to what was known as the Ralston commission. My hon. friend who is now Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) toured the country to study the matter of canteen funds, as well as a large number of other matters affecting returned soldiers. Associated with him were Lieutenant-Colonel Dubuc and Colonel Walter McKeown. His report was hailed at that time as the magna charta of returned soldiers. Many features of it were translated into legislation, and among others was his recommendation with respect to canteen funds.

A feature of the recommendation was that the funds should be divided into provincial funds on the basis of the enlistments from each province. Canteen funds legislation was passed by this parliament, but it provided that canteen funds under the supervision of trustees should be set up in each province. In any event they were set up somehow, under the authority of the provincial government. Distribution was made in accordance with the views of the trustees. For instance I recall that in some provinces it was decided that the capital and interest would be spent. In others it was decided that only the interest would be spent. So far as I am aware the funds have been exhausted in most provinces, some through unwise investments and some otherwise.

The point I wish to make, however, is that we should now have a definite programme with respect to what is to be done with these moneys, in order to avoid all the troubles and difficulties which might arise after the war. It has been suggested—and I believe there is a good deal of merit in the suggestion—that there should be no accumulation of these funds. The difficulty there is of course that a large proportion of the funds are derived from auxiliary services canteens, and from the wet and dry canteens, and thus the question of competition with local stores arises. But the difference in prices may be only the matter of a fraction of a cent; the profit accrues through the volume handled.

Then it has been suggested that these moneys should be expended on the men themselves. This method, suggested by the hon. member who spoke a moment ago, is one which perhaps deserves the most consideration. The other suggestion is that the proceeds should be devoted to the encouragement of sports, the acquisition of books, the provision of men's recreational facilities, and so on. I do not wish to attempt to press my views on anyone, but I have a strong feeling that the accumulation of funds which will be only a cause of dissension after the war is perhaps undesirable, and that, after all, anything which could be done with these funds by way of relief or assistance could perhaps be done better by a central governmental authority.

There is another point which merits inquiry, and that is the number of such funds which are in process of accumulation at the present time. I have in mind the proceeds of funds derived from regimental institutes. In the Royal Canadian Air Force a very large fund is being accumulated in what is known as the Royal Canadian Air Force benevolent fund. This is a fund which, it is intended, shall accrue for the benefit of Royal Canadian Air Force men after the war. I believe it was originated in 1924, when we had only a very small permanent force. What should be considered is whether the moneys made out of the sums expended by persons who are in the war only for the duration, who were not in the permanent force and who are concerned only with doing their duty as citizens during the war, should go into a fund which in all probability will be of greater benefit to the men of the permanent force than to those who enlisted later. If it is to be distributed to all those who served only during the present war, where are we to get the distributing agency? Is it to be an agency composed of men who are in the army, the air force or the navy after the war, or is it to be a civilian agency?

The experience in the last war was that when a man got out of the army, the air force or any of the armed services he wanted to see as little as possible of those armed forces. Again, speaking without any authority and from a purely personal point of view, I am not quite sure that a benevolent fund such as that which we are building up in the Royal Canadian Air Force is the right kind of fund. All these are matters which require the sincere consideration of some body; whether it be composed of members of the Senate or of the House of Commons I am not prepared to argue. But the fact that the House of Commons is closer to the people from whom the profits which make these funds are derived leads me to the belief that perhaps the house would be the better body to inquire into these matters. Eventually we shall have to decide on some system and bring in legislation to deal with it.

It has been decided, if not by privy council, by the treasury branch in Britain, that canteen funds are public funds. There was a great deal of controversy at the end of the last war over who owned these funds which were made up of very small amounts contributed by a great number of people. The British treasury said they were public funds. In this country a great many people held other views. Certainly if they are public funds the House of Commons is the place to deal with the matter. I have no strong views on the question whether there should be a committee of this house, a committee of the other house or a joint committee, but I do submit that it is something we should get at, and get at immediately.

Before taking my seat I want to add a word of tribute to what has been said by the leader of the opposition in praise of Mr. James Macdonnell of Toronto and his associates, Mr. Plante and Mr. Watson Sellar, of Ottawa, for the work they did in digging into the great mass of information which we have on this matter and giving it careful study. I commend their report for study and inquiry by the committee.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I am glad to see this resolution introduced at this time and shall be glad to support it. I think it is a matter of sufficient importance to be considered and dealt with by this House of Commons.

As the two ministers who have just spoken have told the house, there was after the last war a canteen fund which amounted to a couple of million dollars. I had a good deal to do with the ultimate distribution of that fund, as the present Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) will recall. Enlistments in the last war from the Yukon were per capita as high as if not higher than in any province of the dominion, and when the canteen fund was ultimately distributed a fair proportion was placed at the disposal of the Yukon returned men. That fund was put into the hands of trustees, consisting of the comptroller of that territory and two trustworthy returned men, and has been wisely used to help reestablish returned men in civilian life. Loans have from time to time been made from the fund, and for the most part have been repaid. I am happy to be able to say that a considerable amount still remains in the fund for the use of the returned men who need it. I hope the canteen fund that will grow up from this war will be as well handled as the canteen fund of the last war was handled and is being handled in Yukon territory.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that the commission headed by Mr. Macdonnell was initiated by my colleague the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) while I was absent from Canada, and that is why he has been good enough to speak to the resolution. I want to add my very sincere word of appreciation of the excellent work done by Mr. Macdonnell, Mr. Sellar and Mr. Plante and of the time they took and the effort they put into getting this complicated subject into some sort of shape. In their report the house committee will find they have an excellent document upon which to work and make recommendations with respect to what I regard as a major matter of future policy which ought to be determined by a committee of the house and by the house itself.

Mr. ROSS W. GRAY (Lambton West): Speaking as one who served as a private soldier in the last war, I feel rather strongly on one aspect of this matter which was barely touched upon by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power). It should always be remembered that these canteen funds and similar funds are designed primarily for the comfort and convenience of the personnel they serve. It does seem to me that when this question comes before the committee it should be strongly urged that in the main the funds are accumulated from the private soldier, and that so far as possible they should be distributed to the private soldier, at cost. In my opinion there should not be a large accumulation of profits to be left over after this war as there was after the last war.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I should like to say a word, as I come from the province of Saskatchewan which suffered disgracefully from the mal-administration of the canteen funds. In my opinion those to whom this money belongs should have a greater voice in saying what should be done with it. I notice that there are on the proposed committee members who are on active service in this war. After all, this money does belong to those who are on active service, and I suggest that as soon as possible representatives be received from the returned organizations of soldiers of this war. In some parts of this dominion already such organizations are functioning. I suggest also that one of the greatest benefits that can accrue from use of such a fund is the establishment of educational scholarships and other educational benefits.

Motion agreed to.

POST-WAR RECONSTRUCTION

APPOINTMENT OF SELECT COMMITTEE ON RECONSTRUCTION AND REESTABLISHMENT

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved:

That a select committee of the house be appointed to study and report upon the general problems of reconstruction and reestablishment which may arise at the termination of the present war, and all questions pertaining thereto; with power to such select committee to appoint, from among the members of the committee, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary, to deal with specific phases of the problems aforementioned, with power to said select committee and to such subcommittees as may be formed therefrom, to call for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses under oath, and for such select committee to report from time to time to the house; and that the said committee shall consist of the following members: Messrs. Authier, Bertrand (Prescott), Black (Cumberland), Brunelle, Castleden, Dupuis, Eudes, Ferron, Fraser (Northumberland), Gershaw, Gillis, Gray, Harris (Danforth), Hill, Jean, Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre), Macmillan, MacNicol, McDonald (Pontiac), McKinnon (Kenora-Rainy River), McNiven, Marshall, Martin, Matthews, Maybank, Mitchell, Poirier, Purdy, Quelch, Ross (Middlesex East), Sanderson, Stirling, Turgeon, Tustin, White and that the provisions of standing order 65, limiting the number of members on special committees, be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Mr. Speaker, because of the urgency of dealing with other business before the Easter adjournment it is not my intention at the moment to discuss this resolution at length. I intend, however, to make a full and detailed statement before the select committee in regard to all that has been done by the government in connection with the committee on reconstruction since 1939, and I would hope that there would be an interim report from the committee this session which will be debatable by the house. I anticipate that the committee may not complete its work during the present session.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention to refer to this select committee Bill No. 5, providing for the reinstatement in civil employment of persons who enlist in his majesty's forces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): So far that has not been determined.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): When does the minister propose to make a full statement on reconstruction and rehabilitation?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is my intention to make a full and complete statement before the committee, and it will be distributed to every member of the house.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to delay this resolution unduly, but it raises one or two questions which I think it is well at least to mention at this stage.

We are told that the committee is to consider reconstruction and reestablishment. I take that to refer both to the internal and to the external conditions of the country, since Canada's relations with other nations are affected. I therefore conclude that the whole matter of providing that the citizens, including soldiers, shall enjoy freedom from want and freedom from fear will be involved in the problem to be studied by this committee. I should like to point out to the committee that, under the provisions which give them the right to call persons to testify, they should see to it that they call men who not only think they are able to explain but who are actually able to explain how freedom from want and freedom from fear can be guaranteed to the men who return from overseas.

If I might so far infringe upon the time of the house as to read a passage from one of the minister's speeches, I should like to single out a quotation which he used: I find it in the speech which he delivered on October 30, 1941, to the Association of Canadian Advertisers at a luncheon in Toronto. He quoted the following passage:

The citizen of a democracy should be guaranteed, as of right, enough food to maintain him in health. He should be assured of a minimum standard of shelter, clothing and fuel. He should be given full and equal opportunities of education. He should have leisure and facilities for enjoying it. He should be secure against the risks of unemployment, ill health, and old age. Above all, the presence of children should not be allowed to bring with it misery for the parents, deprivation for the children, and poverty for all.

The minister was quoting the words of one Mr. Crowther.

I wish to refer to one more quotation he made, which I think is important, too. This time he is quoting from a noted American thinker who has made a similar list of humanity's basic aspirations as follows:

1. The right to creative work and profitable and useful employment.
2. The right to an adequate standard of living measured by the productive capacity of a nation and the right to an equitable distribution of national income.
3. The right of the worker through collective bargaining with his fellow men and by other means to subsequently share in the management of the industry to which he has devoted his labour and his life.

4. The right to security against the hazards of unemployment, accident, illness and old age.

5. The right to the best service science can provide in the maintenance of health

6. The right to leisure and its effective use.

7. The right to education, considered as the central element of the good life.

These two passages came to my mind the other evening when several thoughtless ones were twitting the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) about "$25 a month". I wonder whether those who did that, some of whom are in the Liberal party, were aware that in large measure they had been committed to something far exceeding $25 a month, in the quotations which were cited with approval by their minister of pensions. I wish to commend the minister for his speech; I wish to commend him for the selection of quotations with which he enriched the speech, and I urge upon him and upon the government that they accept no equivocal statements whatsoever, that they utterly insist that want and fear be abolished.

The committee, if it examines witnesses who can tell how these things are to be brought about, and if it listens to them, will have conferred upon the people of Canada one of the greatest services conceivable at the present time. I would urge that the committee should not be satisfied with anything less; and may I point out to the committee before it starts that the system which is being used to-day in Canada will not and cannot guarantee these things.

Inasmuch as the whole question of reconstruction is mentioned, the committee should call witnesses and authorities and receive papers which will satisfy it that there is not in this dominion a group of men, cooperating with a similar group in the other self-governing dominions of the British empire and in the United States, who are seeking to destroy the sovereignty of this state and to bring this country into a union called "Federal Union" or "Union Now," or some other organization which will take away the sovereignty of this state and thereby destroy its ability independently to attack this problem of internal reconstruction. For if this state is to be in any way affected by the decisions of outside states in trying to grapple with its internal problems, I submit that the problem confronting Canada will be utterly hopeless.

I therefore commend to the committee two very serious questions: first, the one of insuring freedom from want and freedom from fear; second, the problem of ensuring that Canada shall maintain her sovereignty and shall not be inextricably bound up with any group of nations in such a way as to make an unutterably intolerable situation for this country.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): As I read the resolution, the minister is referring the subject matter to a select special committee for the purpose of reporting to the government on what should be the method of government policy. After all, the government has a responsibility, and I suggest that the course adopted by the minister is not the proper one. I have no doubt he has a policy; the fact has been indicated on more than one occasion; and I believe it is the duty of the government to communicate that policy to parliament, to give the lead to the country in a considered statement made to this house, not to send the subject matter to a special committee to make a policy for the government.

I had not thought that this matter would come up to-day. I supposed there were other important matters which would be discussed and entered upon at this time. It is quite evident that the committee cannot be more than set up in the remaining days of this week and that the whole subject matter will go over until after the recess. It seems evident from the extent of the subject matter to be discussed that the committee cannot reach final conclusions at this session, and that the inquiry will have to be resumed at subsequent sessions of parliament. My suggestion to the minister is that he withhold this motion until after the Easter recess; then make a statement of government policy in this house—where it should be made—and, with that as a lead, refer the matter to the committee.

After all, the government must have a policy on this question of reconstruction. That is the constitutional responsibility of the administration, and one which has always been recognized in days gone by. That is the position the government should take, and I suggest it is the course the minister should now follow.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I do not wish to discuss this resolution. My purpose is to commend the minister for bringing it forward and to express the hope that the committee will be able to deal effectively with the tremendously important questions involved. I wish however to associate myself with what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has just said. I think the minister should have made his statement to the house and not to the committee. Later this afternoon I shall have something to say on the question of how this house is being ignored by the government, and this is just another illustration.

I would call attention to the importance of the resolution. The committee is being appointed to study and report upon general problems of reconstruction and reestablishment which may arise at the termination of the present war, and all questions pertaining thereto. I am sure the minister and hon. members generally will agree that that is a colossal undertaking, because when the war is over, whenever that blessed time may come, we shall be faced with the disruption of the economic and social conditions within our own country. We shall be faced likewise with dislocation of trade as between countries, and we shall be faced with the condition that always follows war, namely, the unsettled state of mind generally and the unsettled political conditions not only within nations themselves but as between one nation and another. The committee will be faced with the question of charting Canada's course in the midst of these tremendous problems.

The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) referred to the danger of this country losing its sovereignty. A great many countries have already lost their sovereignty, and they have not lost it to any federation or federal union. They have lost their sovereignty because they did not see far enough in advance the necessity of cooperation between nations with a view to preventing such a result. If we are to be in a better world in the future than we are in at the present time it will be because the nations of the world are prepared to give up a certain amount of sovereignty in order that they may have security.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I suppose it is safe to assume that this is for civilian reconstruction and rehabilitation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. E. G. HANSELL (Macleod): For some time I have been waiting for some such action on the part of the government as seems to be embodied in the proposals which the present committee is to be set up to study. I recall that at the last part of the last session of parliament, in November—I believe, it was on the last day—I asked the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) when we might expect a report from the government on its plans for post-war reconstruction. As I remember, he answered the question by saying that some such report would be made at this session. I have been waiting patiently for that report to be brought down. I refer to what I believe would have been the report of the seven-man government reconstruction committee. As I have been patiently waiting the minister has brought down one or two bills with respect to civil reestablishment and a proposal for some land settlement scheme, but in these proposals I have not been able to detect any real or vital policy for a post-war reconstruction programme. The leader of the opposition has just said, and his words were well spoken, that the government should bring down to this house its policy on post-war reconstruction. Personally, I do not believe the government has any vital policy on reconstruction if all it has in mind is to find jobs for men after the war is over. To my mind that is no policy in connection with reconstruction; for if we are to have a type of reconstruction in Canada, as associated with other nations, for a world reconstruction, it must be the type of reconstruction that will learn war no more. Simply giving men jobs is not going to do away with the fundamental and underlying evils that breed war one generation after another.

I am not going to take time to go into all the details of what might be involved in these underlying evils. I simply say that giving men jobs is not going to solve the problem. It seems to me to be just like the attempt to bring back a sick patient to complete health and strength by calling in the doctor, trying to diagnose the case and then saying, "Now the best thing we can do to prolong the life of the patient is to change the bedclothes and put the patient in another bed so that he can rest more comfortably." That does not touch the cause of the disease. I suggest that there are movements going on in the world to-day which will take from us not only our sovereign rights but the freedoms for which we are now fighting. We have already heard of the proposals known as federal union or "Union Now." I suggest something which I believe the government and the house already know—that the proposals of "Union Now" are proposals to perpetuate that which has brought on war after war for generations. It was the thing that brought on the war of 1914; it is the thing that gave rise to dictatorships; it is the thing that brought on the present war, and it is the thing that will plunge the world into another war after this, if it is not completely rooted out.

Mr. MARTIN: Nonsense.

Mr. HANSELL: The hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) says, under his breath, "nonsense". If he is an exponent of the proposals of "Union Now"—

Mr. MARTIN: I did not say that.

Mr. HANSELL: Well, I thought I heard that. If he is a proponent of those proposals of "Union Now" he has a right to say so. But the committee should call in for examination men who do believe in such proposals and try to find out where those proposals will eventually lead this nation and the world.

Mr. MacNICOL: What proposals?

Mr. HANSELL: The proposals known as federal union or "Union Now". I am not going into all the details, but in substance they believe in a world currency based on gold; in an international police force, which is the maintenance of a standing army and navy under the control of one central power, and in a world judiciary. Put that trinity of evil together and what chance has a small nation to exercise its own God-given democratic rights?

Mrs. CASSELMAN: What chance has it now?

Mr. HANSELL: It has no chance now. We are fighting against a tremendous military power that is attempting eventually to rule the world. We want to defeat that power and maintain our own democratic rights. Underlying this there is another power just as vicious, a centralized power, seeking to rob us of our democratic rights. As the nazi power is attempting to do it by military force, the other power will attempt to do by an international banking conspiracy. That is the position, and while we may win on the one hand we may lose on the other.

All I am saying is that the committee should go into these matters in minutest detail. We have as chairman of the seven-man committee of the government a man who we have reason to believe is very nearly an exponent of the proposals of that same "Union Now". I refer to Doctor James, principal of McGill university, who on one occasion ran off to Washington and who I believe is now in England. When the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) last week brought that to the attention of the Minister of Pensions and National Health the minister said he could tell the house that Doctor James was not running this government. Those words were sweet music to my ears. Nevertheless Doctor James is chairman of that committee, and I say that the proposed committee of the house should have the right to call Doctor James to the stand, put him under oath and keep a record of what he says so that we can learn exactly what is going on behind the scenes.

Canada is in an excellent position to give leadership in connection with post-war reconstruction, and in particular to tell the world right now that we will not stand for this government or this country being taken back into a system based upon gold and controlled internationally. I say Canada is in an ideal position to do that, because in spite of criticism one way or another, Canada is playing a vital role in the present world conflict. We are supplying Great Britain with vast quantities of munitions and supplies, and we have reason to believe that we are of tremendous help to the United States of America. Just last night we gave second reading to a bill to give Great Britain one billion dollars this year with which to buy Canadian production. Canada therefore is playing an important part in the present world conflict and is in an excellent position to give leadership in this whole matter of world reconstruction.

There is another question I should like to deal with for a moment. I have forgotten the exact words used by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) as he rose just now, but in sum and substance I think he said that the danger is that the people do not see far enough ahead. That perhaps touches the crux of the whole situation with respect to movements that are taking place in the world, including Canada. I have always said, and I think hon. members will agree, that strong leadership is leadership that will lead and not follow. In order to lead, a leadership must inform the public so that an informed public will go step by step with them. But the fact is that things are put over on the public. I am fearful that in our post-war reconstruction the very thing I have protested against will again be imposed upon the public. I am anxious to see the present government and the government that will be in power when the war ends give outstanding leadership in the reconstruction of the post-war world. In order to do that they must have the people with them. In order to have the people with them the people must be informed. Facilities should be made available to inform the public on every phase of an issue. I am not going to say I should be satisfied with simply printing a report of the committee's proceedings; I suggest that the widest publicity be given to it, and equal publicity to every phase of post-war reconstruction, so that the people may be informed of the benefits of one thing and the dangers of another.

I had intended to speak on this matter at some length. The motion, however, was brought down rather suddenly. It was given the usual notice in the Votes and Proceedings, of course, but as the leader of the opposition has already said, if we had a little more time on this matter I think the house itself would have gone to some length in its discussion of post-war reconstruction. You see what is happening now. Here is a motion to set up a committee. If we want to talk on post-war reconstruction, we had better do it now. When this motion passes the committee is set up, and then everything will be done by the committee. Reports will be made to the house, but if my prognosis is correct a motion for concurrence in the reports of the committee will not be made, so that there will be no opportunity to discuss these matters unless we do so on some general topic. Do I understand that the minister has promised the house that time will be given for adequate discussion when the reports of the committee come up in the house?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Certainly.

Mr. HANSELL: That is music to my ears, too, Mr. Speaker, because it is my profound conviction that if the fundamental evils of our entire system are not corrected, we shall not solve our problems after the war is won.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I just want to support the view of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), that a full statement of what the government has already done, and perhaps what it has in mind, should be made before this committee is set up or this matter sent to the committee. I do not intend to prolong the debate; there is a great deal of important business to be done, but I do want to impress upon the minister my support of the suggestion of the leader of the opposition that before this committee is set up and this subject matter referred to it, the minister should make a full and complete statement to this house in order that we may know what has been done and thus be prepared to discuss the question later. I may add that to no other group in the house is the appointment of this committee a matter of greater satisfaction than it is to us, but we would appreciate a full statement by the minister before the reference to the committee of the subject matter of the resolution.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I notice, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Danforth is to be on this committee. I remember the magnitude of the problem along these lines, in connection with reconstruction and rehabilitation, that had to be faced at the end of the last war. I remember that those who at present occupy the treasury benches made very strong representations across Canada that sufficient was not being done, and later made many promises as to what would be done, for those who were returning from world war No. 1. So much was this propaganda spread across Canada that after the election of 1921 hon. gentlemen found themselves in power. Since that time I cannot remember having the honour and privilege of serving on any committee dealing with these questions until after a statement had been made to this house as to the detail of what the committee was being set up for, and what the ideas were in the mind of the minister in charge.

At the present time we have a very able minister in charge of this department, whose responsibility it is to keep up to the minute on every phase of this very important subject matter. No one in this chamber is better qualified than the minister to give a lead to hon. members as to what might or what ought to be done. I realize that we are anxious to approach this problem from a non-partisan point of view, but we must have some starting point. During the days when hon. gentlemen opposite occupied the benches which we at present occupy, I think perhaps not only the minister but also the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) will remember their anxiety that we should have responsible government in Canada by a responsible administration. To my mind the very essence of responsible government is that in connection with a matter of this kind the government charged with responsibility shall give the house its policy.

It may be said that the war is still going on, and that this policy cannot be properly enunciated now. That may be quite true, but we should like to know what has happened during the last ten years. Would it not be possible for the minister to bring us up to date as to what facilities will be available when the time comes? All this information is in the department, but in fairness to this house we should be told, before this committee is convened. The minister must give us some lead. Of course that will not be final, because the war is not over. It will be amended first by the members of this committee, when they have the benefit of the presentations that will be made by those appearing before them. But at least we should be brought up to date and should not be sent out into the wilderness without knowing where we are going or whether we are right or wrong. Then as one year follows another the policy can be further amended, following further declarations by the minister.

If the minister does not make a statement on these matters now I should say he has failed in his duty in connection with the introduction of this resolution. We are all anxious as to what will happen when this tragedy of war is over, with regard to those who will return. That is the first point. We are anxious too with regard to those who now find themselves in profitable employment, and we are concerned with those who are dependent upon the first two groups I have mentioned. If a statement is made by the minister now, the morale of Canadians in all three groups will be greatly strengthened. They will know that we are about to consider the matter, and they will know that a responsible minister has given some lead. But if we set up a committee and start on a fishing expedition as to what might be done, we may be submerged by all kinds of hare-brained ideas coming from all sections of the country, and we may fritter away our time looking into matters which no doubt already have come to the attention of the minister in his study of this reconstruction problem. On the other hand if we had the considered opinion of the government as to what might be done, and were assured that all the frills and fads were eliminated, we could give our attention to the very kernel of the problem. We could bring back an up-to-the-minute report, so that the country would know that this matter had had careful and sound consideration. In the other case we go before a committee and wander from one thought to another, or one subject to another without having governmental responsibility as a basis. I strongly urge upon the minister that he give consideration to the thought expressed by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and, as I gather, approved by hon. members sitting to our left.

Mr. BROOKE CLAXTON (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, next to the measures directly related to the carrying on of the war, this is, in my opinion, the most important measure to come before the house at this session. Like other hon. members, I had not expected it would be reached before the recess, but I take this opportunity of placing before the house as briefly as possible, without preparation, one or two views on the matter.

I wish to emphasize with all the strength of my being the importance of the resolution and of the work the committee will undertake. Next to winning the war, or to any measure directly connected with that undertaking, we could not spend our time in any more profitable way. I am glad that hon. members have refrained from saying, as some newspapers have said, "Let's get on with the war, and postpone any talk about post-war matters until the war is over." Unless we talk about post-war matters during the war, we may not have a post-war world. I would be the first to say that we ought not to spend a minute on this discussion if I thought that by continuing it we were postponing the making of a single shell. On the other hand I believe that discussion such as we are having to-day, and the work of the committee which will flow from it, will make us fight better. It will give us something more positive than we have yet had to fight for.

We can base the emotions which direct and charge us in fighting this war on hate, or we can base them on the hope that something better will come from victory. My belief is that our war effort will be far stronger and far better than the enemy's if we do not follow the line of hate, but rather choose the line of hope and work for the realization of that hope during as well as after the war. I believe that our people will fight better, that they will give their blood, and their sweat and their tears more freely if they believe that in consequence of what they are giving they will not return to periods of scarcity and unemployment, but have some reasonable expectation of attaining better conditions than we have known before.

This subject is being discussed everywhere throughout the world, both on our side and on that of the enemy. Hitler has laid out his plan of a new world order, and one of the great motivating forces impelling his armies, so far so successfully, is the hope that that new world order will be realized. Hitler has used the forces of propaganda and ideas to fight for him. We have better ideas than he has. We have a better system of government, and we have a better civilization; otherwise we would not be fighting at all. But in the past we have stopped short of making our ideals fight for us, as they should.

Everywhere among the allied nations I find that discussions of this kind are going on. I spent the week-end attending an exceedingly interesting conference at Williamstown, under the auspices of Williams college. To that conference men came from all parts of the eastern United States to discuss this subject. The consensus of those men, experts in their various fields, was that in order to have the united nations make their utmost effort it was necessary to clothe the bare bones of the declaration of those nations with something more positive than we yet have had. There was the feeling that the united nations must have common ideals for which they are fighting. Up to the present we have not made our union effective; we are fighting separate wars rather than one war. This is a global war. We are fighting Hitler and the forces of the axis powers everywhere, and one front is as important as another.

With respect to the post-war objective of the work of the committee I should like to say one or two words. I do not think anyone has yet realized the magnitude of the job which will face the government of the day that will deal with the post-war problem. If we stopped the war to-day we would have 10 per cent of our population directly engaged either in the active fighting forces or in the making of munitions. Would their work stop? Would they become unemployed? What machinery would be provided? What controls, what construction projects would be necessary to provide employment for that 10 per cent of the population, until our economy began to function properly again? This can be judged by a single figure. In 1942 the nations of the world will make 150,000 aeroplanes. In 1939, to supply the commercial airways of the entire world with normal replacements and additions, 250 planes were required. The difference between those figures is some indication of the magnitude of the post-war problem, from the point of view of employment of war workers alone.

Then, let us consider it from the point of view of the constitution of Canada. At the end of the last war two cases were decided by the privy council which held that the government's power under the War Measures Act ceased with the termination of hostilities. If those decisions were to be followed at the conclusion of this war, the government would not be able to do any of the things which ought to be done to carry on the life of the country with the controls and powers it exercises through the War Measures Act. So consideration should be given by the committee—and I hope later by the government—to the constitutional questions involved.

Perhaps we may decide—I hope so—to build half a million houses in Canada within five years after the war. We cannot have a housing project of that nature unless it is done as a national enterprise, and with nation-wide powers. So I suggest that here is a field of study which the committee might properly take up in the course of its work.

The problem of unemployment must somehow be licked. Everyone has known for years that the world can produce enough food and necessities for every man, woman and child—brown, black, white and red—on its surface. But we have not learned the technique of production and distribution well enough, particularly distribution. To-day the working forces of the world are at work. In Canada they see the full dinner-pail for everyone at a time when we are engaged in manufacturing things to be used for destruction. We see that happening in Canada at a time when we are reducing our external debt and giving to Britain more than twice as much as we ever sold her in any year before, and people are asking themselves: If that is possible in war, why not in peace? That question is going to be a very difficult one to answer unless the answer is: Yes, we can and we will do it. That is a simple question to the men overseas and the workmen in the factories of Canada. It is going to require complicated answers to show that it is not possible or that it should not be done. I suggest that we must strive to reach the stage after the war where there will be virtual full employment, or governments will go.

Everywhere we see under consideration plans, internal and external, to provide the maximum amount of employment. An exceedingly interesting book has just been issued by Alvin Hansen, the American economist, on precisely that subject. He believes that full employment can be obtained in the United States and that it would be the greatest contribution by the United States to post-war settlement. Measures to provide maximum employment are under consideration everywhere, but it is obvious that it cannot be done by any nation alone. That we have to cooperate is just as evident as that day follows night.

I am completely with my friend in the southeast corner when he said that freedom from want and freedom from fear are two objectives which must be realized, and I certainly agree with him in his remarks about the plan, "Union Now". On the other hand, I say that what we want has to be done by a combination of external and internal measures, springing from a realization for the first time by the nations of the world that they are interdependent and that the world is one, and by their beginning to tackle problems which they can face together but which they cannot face alone.

I suggest that if it is possible the proposed committee should secure the views of outstanding people from other countries. It is of the utmost importance that in this matter we make sure that our thinking in Canada takes account of the thinking in other parts of the world—in Britain, where there has been a great deal of work done, in the United States, and in the British dominions and the countries of the united nations. I suggest that that study can be carried on effectively only if it is carried on in close correspondence with our opposite numbers in other countries of the world so as to make sure that we are beginning to think about the same things at the same time and beginning to decide on similar lines of policy that must be followed if success is to be achieved.

Finally, may I say that in the plan of a post-war world or post-war reconstruction I do not think any blueprint can be laid out in detail now. What can be done is to see the nature of the problem, consider its magnitude, consider the kind of objectives that must be worked for and the kind of means that must be followed, and then gradually set up the machinery by which the transfer from a war to a peace economy is to be effected.

We are fighting in this war for survival. We are not fighting for anything else at the moment. We are fighting to defeat Hitler. Victory is a prerequisite to lfe. Life would not be worth while without it. But victory will not give us any more than a chance. Having achieved it, all it gives us is a new start. We shall have a chance of avoiding the mistakes we made after the last war. We have had twenty years of experience, of development in understanding, to guide us. But it will be hopeless if suddenly the war comes to an end and peace comes on us and catches us unprepared. It will produce nothing but chaos in our thinking and chaos in our organization. We may then have a call for a khaki election and for this and that. We shall fail to serve our best interests unless we are prepared and the people are prepared by thinking of these problems now. To have a khaki election might have results as disastrous as the khaki election in Britain after the last war and after the south African war, two elections which produced perhaps the two worst governments that country ever had.

The problem is imminent. We have been at war for two and a half years. I dare say that everyone in this chamber hopes, although it is not certain, that we may have victory within another two and a half years; but if we have done no more in the next two years than we have been able to do in the past to prepare for peace, victory and peace will catch us unprepared, and we shall then have to pay the penalty of our unpreparedness.

In order to make our utmost effort, Canada along with the united nations must have faith that, in consequence of that effort being made, we shall get, not only victory, but the chance to work for a better world than we have ever had before and the probability that we are going to get it. But to achieve this, the united nations and the peoples of each of the United Nations must share their views and ideas, create habits of thinking together, build confidence in each other and in their ability to carry out their purposes.

Our aim to defeat the enemy is only a stage. The need for a united will and united action goes far beyond victory. We must see that the four freedoms which President Roosevelt defined for the world belong to us and to our children, the children of Canada, and children everywhere in the world.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, I notice that I am a member of the proposed committee. But first I want to say that the busiest time I have in this house is when I am trying to decide whether something I have to say is relevant to the matter under discussion. Many times I have risen to say something which I have considered important and intended to state briefly, only to be declared out of order. Most of the discussion that has taken place here this afternoon I consider a waste of time, and being Scotch, I do not like a waste of time. The Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), following the discussions which have taken place on this subject in the house for the past two years and a half, has brought in a resolution to set up a committee to study the subject matter of those speeches. The committee that has been set up will, in my opinion, have very little to do with settling these questions, because my understanding is that there has already been a committee studying this problem for the past two years, and that the committee now being set up here under this resolution is merely instructed to study and report to the house on reconstruction and reestablishment after the war. The committee has no authority to do anything except gather information and pass that information on to another committee, which, in the final analysis, will decide what is going to be done about this problem. That is my understanding of the appointment of this committee, and I think we might very well adopt this resolution without further discussion, because frankly I am not hearing anything this afternoon that I have not been listening to for the past two years.

I rose particularly to ask the Minister of Pensions and National Health whether the committee which had been studying this problem for the past two and a half years has complete and final say in the matter of rehabilitation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Absolutely not. Their only function is to make recommendations in regard to procedure with reference to future policies to be adopted. They have no authority whatsoever.

Mr. GILLIS: And this select committee is to be appointed for the purpose of gathering information and passing it on to the smaller committee, which in turn will boil it down and make recommendations to the government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): May I explain to my hon. friend? Last year, at the request of many members of this house we had a committee on soldiers' rehabilitation, of which my hon. friend was a very able member. Immediately we met we called in to give evidence the committees which had been working under my direction for some twelve or fourteen months, so that the parliamentary committee of this house might be made thoroughly familiar with all the progress which had been made in the meantime by the interdepartmental committees which had been studying these various problems. I would imagine that exactly the same procedure would be followed in the present instance.

Mr. GILLIS: The only difference I see is that the committee on pensions drafted their own report. They boiled down the evidence submitted and tabled in the house their own report. My understanding of this committee is that they will not do that—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes. Certainly.

Mr. GILLIS: —that they will merely report to the cabinet committee.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No. They will report to this house.

Mr. GILLIS: I should like to have an understanding of this question of when one is in order and when not in order. I do not care if we discuss this question of rehabilitation for the next year. The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) warns us of what may happen if we do not do what we did after the last war. Let me say that if we do not do more than that, personally I do not want to be living in this country when the army that is overseas comes back.

I do not agree with the statement that hon. members are not getting enough work, and I have no wish to sit on a committee merely to make an addition to my work; that is not a sufficient reason. I have more work now than I can do. But I consider this is the most important job I can go on. As a member of that committee I am not going there to waste time. If any hon. member outside the committee has definite views on the subject and wishes to present them, I personally should be pleased to hear him, and will use what I learn to the best advantage.

The terms of reference in this resolution are very broad, and as far as I am concerned I am going to make full use of the latitude it allows.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Has this committee power to arrange for service clubs in the municipalities, manufacturers, and others, to list jobs which can be done after the war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. As a matter of fact, that work is now being done by one of the subcommittees.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I am very happy to see my name on the committee, because during the past few years I have been making an exhaustive study of this question, mostly in the direction of a survey of public resources. In the course of much travel I have found that vast resources in this country are tied up, and have been for many years, by interests of one kind or another. I have in mind a very large area said to contain hundreds of millions of tons of high-grade coal. Upon making inquiries why no coal was being mined, I was informed that the property belonged to a certain estate, which had held it for many years. I hope the time will come when this country will forbid the retention of unworked natural resources by private interests beyond a reasonable length of time. I do not believe that they should be permitted to profit to the extent of millions of dollars because other properties in the neighbourhood have been developed in the meanwhile. Another example which occurs to me is a site not many miles east of Ottawa, and well known to most hon. members, where from a million and a half to two million horse-power can be developed, should have been developed, and should now be in use for the production of munitions with which to fight this war; yet there are no signs of development. I hope the committee will not be precluded from recommending the development of such national resources. When the government of Canada or of any province gives such rights to private individuals, there should be inserted in the contract a time limit within which the resources shall be utilized; otherwise they shall revert to the crown.

Mr. NORMAN J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): May I also add a word, more in the form of an interrogation of the minister? It is evident, both from the minister's brief statement and from the information in the hands of hon. members, that considerable inquiry has been made into this problem, particularly during the past two years. The minister has said that he is going to make a statement to the committee and not to this house. May I ask him whether, with all the information which has been gleaned up to the present, the government is not now in a position to make some definite statement as to its policy of reconstruction after the war, so that when the committee retires at Easter all hon. members will be in a position to direct in some way the deliberations of the committee after the recess? I should like to know why that statement has to be deferred. Is it because the government has as yet no policy for reconstruction which it can submit to the house, and, instead of giving leadership, is looking for further light before enunciating some policy? I do not want the minister to assume that my criticism is biased by political considerations, but it is a fact that back home the people are asking the question; returned men of the last war, too, are asking the question, and we are, so to speak, wandering in the wilderness if we do not get something definite to work on. It seems to me that the government has had sufficient opportunity to give some light to the committee, and that other hon. members should have something which they can pass on during the Easter recess.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): I am in agreement with the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) when he says that he thinks a lot of this discussion should take place in committee; but, since this resolution is almost identical in substance with that of a motion which is on the order paper in my name, I would ask permission of the house to withdraw my motion at this time.

I would also draw to the attention of members of the committee that it has to deal with reconstruction, and its assignment to the study of reconstruction implies that something in the past has failed and that we are to build something new. Proposals to reestablish parts of an old system which have failed will not receive very kindly consideration.

As a member of this committee, I shall work with everything I can to contribute something, in the hope that it will prove of more value than some of the promises which have been passed out from this house in the past. I wish it good luck.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): As a member of the banking and commerce committee of 1939 I suggest to the house that there was at that time an interesting discussion in regard to banking in Canada, the mechanics of financing and so forth, and it might be useful if the banking committee were given some information with respect to the present-day financing of Canada so that the public might understand what is going on and what the prospects are for financing in the future. Information could be obtained by the banking committee which would be very useful to the reconstruction committee. I suggest that there might be some meetings of the banking committee, such as we had in 1939, and I would also commend to hon. members, as very interesting reading, the summary of the report of the banking committee of that day.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am rather surprised at the way in which this debate has developed this afternoon. Especially am I surprised at the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). Looking at Hansard of March 5 of the present session, I find that my hon. friend specifically asked this house to set up such a committee as is now being organized for the purposes which are outlined in the language of the resolution. A similar request came also from the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell).

Mr. COLDWELL: Not quite in the same form.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Probably not. It came, too, from several other members of the house. Hon. members will recall a resolution which appeared on the order paper in 1940, placed there by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), which was withdrawn with the unanimous consent of the house because of the tragic war episodes of those days.

I have refrained from taking up more of the time of the house this afternoon in describing in detail all the workings of the reconstruction committee of last year. I had an address ready which I could have given. I appreciate as strongly as any member of the house the importance of devoting attention to post-war reconstruction, but I agree with the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), who said last night that there is something more urgent just now in Canada than post-war problems, and that is guaranteeing that thing without which reconstruction will never be possible, namely, the winning of the war to ensure victory for our arms and our cause.

The first essential of reconstruction is the attainment of victory, because if we do not win the war, if we do not bend all our efforts and energies toward that end, we shall all be reconstructed by someone else. On the other hand, I agree that there is nothing, next to the winning of the war, which is more important than a planned and careful study of the problems of the aftermath. They are giving attention to this question in the United Kingdom and they are doing the same in the United States. I have been in touch with the organizations in those countries. We are exchanging correspondence with the committees concerned, and I venture to say that just as we are to-day the most advanced country in the world from the point of view of legislation which we have already passed with reference to our service men in the present war, so we have gone further in our studies with regard to reconstruction than they have done in the republic to the south of us, and certainly in the old country.

Four or five subcommittees have been formed by the committee, exactly as was done last year by the committee on the rehabilitation of soldiers, and about twenty major studies have been entered upon, some of which are completed, in regard to practically every phase of our economic life and structure in Canada. I would ask my hon. friends, did we not succeed very well last year when we called before the committee on pensions and soldier problems those men who had devoted month after month to the study of these problems. The committee itself had before it the most complete details with reference to every single suggestion that had been advanced. In its wisdom the committee made a report to parliament and 90 per cent of the report has been implemented by legislation since that time.

Surely, therefore, the proper procedure at this time is to refer the matter to a committee of this house, and the parliamentary committee can call in those six distinguished gentlemen, men representing every walk of life, who have been so kind as to give their time to the question. There is a subcommittee on post-war employment headed by the veteran labour leader, Tom Moore. There is a committee dealing with the point referred to by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) in connection with the conservation of resources. There is a committee dealing with public works in the dominion, under the chairmanship of the chief engineer in the department. There are, as I say, six subcommittees in all, and twenty different investigations are proceeding at the present time.

I suggest, therefore, that I took the wise course in asking as briefly as possible, in order to save the time of the house, so that the immediate and urgent problems which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has before him may be proceeded with, that this matter be referred at once to the committee. The committee will meet after the recess; there will be available for it complete direction in the line of its investigation, and there will be presented the first day of the committee, a complete programme which will occupy its members far longer than the present session. I suggest that the resolution pass immediately so that the Minister of Finance may proceed with the very urgent resolutions he has before the house.

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING

APPOINTMENT OF COMMITTEE ON ACCOUNTS AND ESTIMATES OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED TRANSPORTATION LINES

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Transport) moved:

That standing order No. 63 of the House of Commons, relating to the appointment of standing committees of the house, be amended by adding to the standing committees of the house, for the present session a standing committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government, to which will be referred accounts and estimates and bills relating thereto of the Canadian National Railways, the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, and Trans-Canada Air Lines for the present session, for consideration and report to the house; provided however that nothing in the resolution shall be construed to curtail in any way the full right of discussion in committee of supply; and that the said committee consist of: Messrs. Bercovitch, Jackman, Bradette, Hazen, Donnelly, Dubuc, Emmerson, Ferland, Gray, Shaw, Hanson (Skeena), Harris (Danforth), Howden, Howe, Lockhart, Nicholson, McCulloch, Maybank, Parent, Pouliot, Ross (Middlesex East), Sanderson, Sissons.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not looked at it, but I assume this resolution is in the usual form.

Mr. CARDIN: Exactly.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVILEGE—MR. HANSON

REFERENCE TO REMARKS OF MR. LACROIX (QUEBEC-MONTMORENCY) IN DEBATE ON MARCH 20

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask the Minister of National Defence a question on a matter of public importance, and also, I think, on the ground of privilege. During the debate on the United Kingdom financing resolution on Friday last, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix), as reported at page 1494 of Hansard, made reference to a certain report, No. 47, sent out by the military intelligence section of the Department of National Defence, entitled "Summary of Intelligence from Military Districts", and he read paragraph 13, which he stated included a report from the intelligence officer of the fortress of Halifax. My questions are:

1. Has the attention of the minister been called to this portion of the hon. member's speech?

2. Will the minister advise the house how the hon. member came into possession of what I assume to be a confidential military intelligence release?

3. What does the minister propose to do about the matter in the premises?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): The hon. member told me that he intended to ask about this matter. May I say categorically that my attention has been called to the report of the speech to which he refers.

Secondly, with regard to the matter of how it got into the hands of the hon. member I have not the faintest idea. I can only say that whoever gave it to the hon. member gave it without authority and in complete breach of duty, and that a most rigorous investigation is being conducted to ascertain who was responsible for the hon. member obtaining this copy. Further, I want to say that intelligence reports of this class are solely for the secret and confidential information of certain senior officers at National Defence headquarters and of district officers commanding. This particular class of report has, I understand, the most limited circulation of any reports of the Department of National Defence.

I note that the report of the speech refers to it as propaganda. Reports are not propaganda in any sense of the word; they are confidential reports on all sorts of conditions as the officer reporting sees them. Their weight, of course, depends on the capacity of the officer who happens to prepare them. As I have said, the report was given to the hon. member without authority and in breach of duty, but the responsibility for making it public and propaganda devolves entirely on the hon. member who submitted it to this house. As is plainly stated, it is simply a report indicating what the officer considered to be the views of a section—I emphasize that because that is the word used in the report—of the active army. In no sense is it intended to represent the views of the army, or of the minister, or of any officer of the department. Intelligence reports deal, as the house will understand, with all sorts of views which affect men's thinking, no matter how unfounded or inaccurate the views may be. All that the report does is indicate that these different viewpoints exist.

I call the attention of hon. members to the fact that no conclusion whatever is drawn, and, contrary to what the hon. member said in his speech, there is not the slightest reflection in the world against French-Canadians who enlist in the army.

The hon. member asks what is proposed to be done about the matter. I have just indicated that the most rigorous investigation is being conducted to find out who was responsible for the hon. member receiving this copy, and appropriate action will be taken according to the circumstances. I also want to say that at some appropriate time when the opportunity arises, I intend to tell the house what has been and is being done in the Department of National Defence to recognize, support and make just as effective as possible the war activities of French-speaking Canadians as far as the army is concerned.

IRRIGATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON LETHBRIDGE SOUTH-EASTERN WATER CONSERVATION PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I desire to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources. Will he tell the house whether the report of the special committee appointed to investigate the Lethbridge southeastern water conservation project and to report thereon on February 17, 1942, is yet in his hands. If so, when will the report be tabled? If not, why does he permit the delay?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend's question may stand as notice.

ALASKA HIGHWAY

ROUTE FROM EDMONTON TO FORT ST. JOHN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) asked me on one or two occasions about the route the Alaska highway is to take, and in particular how the road from Edmonton, on the south is to reach Fort St. John. The hon. member pointed out that there is only one bridge across the Peace river, that is at the town of Peace River, and he asked whether the road is to go over that bridge.

The answer is as follows: The Alaska highway proper, that is to say the road which is to be constructed as a result of the recommendation of the permanent joint board on defence, is to begin at Fort St. John, British Columbia, and follow the general line of the airports until it reaches the existing road system of Alaska. Existing roads in the country between Edmonton and Fort St. John provide a choice of two or three routes, depending on weather conditions, between Grouard, which is west of Lesser Slave lake, and Grande Prairie. One of these routes is that referred to by the hon. member, namely that through Peace river which utilizes the highway bridge at that point and crosses back to the south side of the river by ferry at Dunvegan.

We have no information as to which of the available roads between Grouard and Grande Prairie will be used by the United States authorities in the case of equipment or supplies which may be taken by road to Fort St. John.

From Grande Prairie to Fort St. John there is only one road available, and this crosses to the north side of the Peace river by ferry in the vicinity of Taylor.

It is reasonable to suppose that most of the supplies and equipment to be used on the construction of the highway will be sent as far as Dawson Creek by rail. Dawson Creek is fifty or fifty-five miles south of Fort St. John.

WAR APPROPRIATION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 15, for granting to his majesty aid for the purpose of financing United Kingdom war requirements in Canada and for national defence and security.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Before the bill is read the third time, I wish to say briefly that I hope the minister will consider some method of dealing with the securities of Canadian industries and so forth, held in Great Britain. As I said last night, I have given a good deal of thought to this matter and I believe it is of some importance to the country in the post-war period. Last night I suggested that these securities might be considered as collateral to the loan of $700,000,000. It was suggested to me that perhaps to enforce the taking up of these securities from the people who now own them might involve some hardship, and that, instead, an arrangement might be made whereby an understanding could be reached with the British government so that in the event of any of the securities now privately held in Great Britain coming into the market for resale, particularly markets abroad, Canada should have an option on all such securities. That might be less drastic than I proposed yesterday and on previous occasions, but I believe it would, to some degree at least, safeguard this dominion and prevent the resale of any of these Canadian securities now held by British investors or in Great Britain on, say the New York or some other market, and to that extent our interests would be protected.

I feel, as I said yesterday, that we have made a great gift to Great Britain to the extent of $1,000,000,000, and I do not think anyone would expect this country to make an additional loan of $700,000,000 and forego the opportunity of asking that any Canadian securities now held in Britain, offered for sale, should be first of all offered to the Canadian government so that we may safeguard our interest in that connection.

Mr. J. SASSEVILLE ROY (Gaspé): (Translation) Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the third reading of this bill for the purpose of granting Great Britain a gift of $1,000 million, I wish to record my opposition to the measure. This vast amount represents an average contribution of almost four millions and a quarter for each constituency in Canada. My electors have in no way authorized me to make such a gift. I followed very closely the discussions which have taken place here as well as those in committee. In all earnestness I have been unable to understand just how this financial aid of $1,000,000,000 would be more helpful to Great Britain in the form of a gift than in the form of a loan. Nor have I been able to understand what motive can inspire or explain the zeal manifested by some, a zeal which leads them to exhibit so false a patriotism. However, since this house has already accepted the principle, I suppose this assistance to Britain is as good as granted. Yet there is still time to amend its form. I therefore humbly propose to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) that this amount be loaned and not given outright to the United Kingdom. I trust that the minister will find this suggestion reasonable and that all members of this house will support it.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the third time and passed.

PRAIRIE FARM ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVISION RESPECTING DECLARATION OF EMERGENCY YEAR

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 14, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, 1939.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Declaration of emergency year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did not know this was coming on; it was not on the agenda given to us last evening.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I am mistaken; but members of the committee from this side are not in the house at the moment. I do not understand that there is any contention about the matter, but I should like to ask the minister whether there was any objection to this in the agriculture committee, and what is the position. I have not followed the proceedings of the committee; I have no opinion on the matter, not knowing very much about it, but perhaps the minister could make a brief statement as to what it is all about.

Mr. GARDINER: There was considerable discussion with regard to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, which is amended by this bill, after which the committee reported the bill without amendment. The main point of discussion was the question whether the provision now in the act to the effect that even after the 80-cent restriction on the government is removed, it still applies to the category that runs from eight to twelve bushels to the acre. In order to explain that, I may say that the act now provides that the government cannot declare a year an emergency year if the price of wheat is over 80 cents a bushel. We have removed that restriction; but the act also provides that when wheat is over 70 cents a bushel, so far as the category from eight to twelve bushels to the acre is concerned, for every cent wheat advances beyond 70 cents, 10 cents is taken off the amount paid. The total amount paid in that category is $1, so that when wheat reaches 80 cents that category goes out; and since we have increased the advance from 70 to 90 cents, this automatically puts that category out.

Most of the discussion in the committee was as to whether we should recommend back to the house that the government give consideration to amending that section of the act in order to put that category back in, and the committee decided, by a majority vote, not to make that recommendation. So the bill was returned to the house without amendment, as it now stands.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I think the effect of the discussion in committee has been well covered by the minister's explanation. The only real argument was as to whether the eight to twelve bushel group should be maintained in some manner because, as the minister said, when the price goes over 80 cents that group goes out. We had a thorough discussion of that point, from all angles. I for one thought it should be maintained only as an emergency measure. Others, from northern and central Saskatchewan, felt that it should be maintained at all costs. However, all sides of the argument were presented and the proposal was voted down by the committee, so I do not think there is anything contentious in the bill as it now stands.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I only want to express regret that the committee did not see fit, and the government have not seen fit, further to amend this act in order to permit people living in townships where the yield is from eight to twelve bushels per acre to obtain these benefits again this year. When the bill was in the second reading stage—

The CHAIRMAN: May I point out to the hon. member that in debate in committee he cannot go beyond the scope of the bill as it received second reading and was referred to committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I am not doing that, Mr. Chairman. I am only pointing out that during the course of the discussion of this and the other wheat legislation there has been considerable argument as between distributing farm income on a bushelage basis and distributing farm income on an acreage basis. The argument has been made repeatedly that the fairest way to distribute income is on the acreage basis; and one of the principal reasons advanced for not raising the price of wheat any higher is that it is supposed to be fairer to distribute income on the basis of acreage. I merely want to point out to the committee that those who believed in that point of view are the very people who, by their failure to include that provision in this bill, are preventing large numbers of people from benefiting under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I think the figures placed on Hansard during the discussion on second reading show that between thirty and thirty-five thousand people each year, of those receiving benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, came within the eight to twelve bushel category. They constituted about 63 per cent of the number receiving bonuses, but now those people will be excluded from the ambit of this legislation.

I think that is unfortunate; I think it argues against all the theories that have been advanced by those who have been claiming in the house for the past two weeks that the fairest way to distribute farm income is on an acreage basis. This legislation is doing just the opposite; it is reducing the distribution on an acreage basis and increasing the distribution on a bushelage basis.

When the matter was before the committee some of us moved an amendment that a recommendation be sent back from the committee asking this house to reconsider the bill and to amend the section in order to permit the eight to twelve bushel group to come in. Unfortunately that was voted down. If I remember correctly, the minister intimated that he was not prepared to recommend it to the cabinet in council. I think that is too bad, and much disappointment will be the result.

As has been said repeatedly, this piece of legislation has now become an established measure in dealing with the problem of crop failure in western Canada. It is the basis upon which ultimately it may be possible to build some type of crop insurance scheme. No one suggests that it is crop insurance; but it is a move in that direction, and by widening, extending and modifying the act, it may be possible to base a proper crop insurance scheme on this legislation. A great many people have come to look upon it as something upon which they could depend in those years when, for some cause beyond their control, they have not been able to get adequate crops. Now 63 per cent of those people will be excluded by virtue of the fact that the price of wheat is being established at 90 cents, and the government having failed to bring down an amendement to make the proviso, those people will not be shut out.

I wish merely to make my protest. I do not believe there is any use in labouring the point, or in holding up the bill. If the minister and the government are determined not to bring in the amendment, then all we can do is to do what we did in committee, namely ask the government to take the matter into consideration, with a view to bringing down an amendment next year. That would seem to be the proper procedure, if the government is not prepared to take action now. Just as to-day the price is fixed at 70 cents, and every time the price of wheat rises above 70 cents, the bonus of the 8- to 12-bushel group is reduced 10 cents an acre, it would have been equally fair to raise the price to 90 cents and to have said that every time the price of wheat rises one cent above 90 cents the bonus should be reduced 10 cents an acre. It seems to me that would have been fair and equitable as between the different groups suffering crop failure. If the government is not prepared to take this step now, I hope it will at least take the matter into consideration with a view to doing so at a later date.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, before the bill passes through committee I, too, wish to voice my disappointment with respect to the action taken in the committee on agriculture in ruling out the 8- to 12-bushel to the acre class. Some members in the committee felt that because the price of wheat was increased to 90 cents a bushel, there was no longer any need for those in the 8- to 12-bushel class receiving a bonus. I wish to point out once more, and to protest, that even though 90 cents a bushel, basis No. 1 northern Fort William, is being advanced, the farmers are not getting nearly the cost of growing their wheat, and I cannot see how the government—even though the committee on agriculture did decide against keeping in the 8- to 12-bushel class—is justified in ruling out that particular class.

I am not satisfied that the amendment should be left over until next year. In my opinion this is the year in which it should be passed, and the government should take action to put back into the legislation that clause which had been wiped out through the price being raised from 70 to 90 cents, basis No. 1 northern Fort William.

Mr. PERLEY: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to labour the question. I agree with what the hon. member for Weyburn has said. The matter was thoroughly discussed in committee. The minister heard the discussion there, and he made it plain that, after consulting with council, it had been decided not to go further. I regret that the 8- to 12-bushel class could not have been included. I trust the minister may take into consideration the suggestion made by the hon. member for Weyburn, so that next year there may be an amendment including the 8- to 12-bushel class, and a further amendment which would make the measure one more in the nature of insurance than it is now.

The minister has stated definitely what he proposes to do. The matter was thoroughly discussed in committee, and I shall say no more.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

WHEAT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ACREAGE REDUCTION AND CERTAIN PAYMENTS TO FARMERS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 12, respecting wheat acreage reduction.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon. Mr. Vien in the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: We are on Bill No. 12, clause 1, short title.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Mr. Chairman, this bill has been discussed in conjunction with Bills Nos. 11 and 14, and really one cannot be discussed apart from the others. What I have to say will take only a few minutes, and if it is not in order now I shall have to wait until the third reading.

The CHAIRMAN: I am governed by the rules of the house, which bind me as well as every other hon. member. We are on clause 1, short title, which reads:

This act may be cited as the Wheat Acreage Reduction Act, 1942.

Hon. members must obey the rules.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Perhaps I might be permitted to say on clause 1 what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN: Under the standing orders of the house the general principle of a bill cannot be discussed in committee. It must be discussed on the second reading. Standing order 58 is clear, that we shall take the bill clause by clause and limit the discussion to the substance of the clause before the chair. I know that the practice has developed of being a little lenient and allowing some latitude in discussing the principle on the short title of a bill, but it is against the rules. On clause 1, nothing but the short title is involved. I do not believe that it is within the four corners of standing order 58 to discuss the principle of the bill on the short title.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Mr. Chairman, ever since I have been here it has been the practice that when a bill has been returned to the house from a committee, especially with amendments made in committee, to allow the principle to be discussed on the short title. So far as this bill is concerned I do not see how we can discuss it at all when we have not seen the amendments. I have not even been favoured with a copy of the bill as amended.

The CHAIRMAN: I know that in a number of cases what the leader of the opposition has just said is true. The house has given unanimous consent to suspending its rules, but without a suspension of standing order 58 it is not permissible to discuss the principle in committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then, Mr. Chairman, I would ask for unanimous consent to discuss the principle of the bill on the short title.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think there can be any objection to having a general discussion at the moment as to what was proposed in committee and what was accepted by the committee. The suggestion has been made by the hon. member for Weyburn that it is difficult to discuss this bill apart from the other two bills. I have some doubt as to whether it would be wise to carry latitude that far. I think we should confine ourselves to this bill, and when the other bill comes before us it can be discussed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think the minister is right in his last observation. I do not think it would be in order to discuss the principle of a bill which is not before us, but I do think we should be able to discuss the principle of this bill on the short title with respect to (a) those portions of the bill which are being amended and (b) those portions attempted to be amended.

Mr. MARTIN: The leader of the opposition has just said that he did not receive a copy of the bill as amended. Of course, as leader of the opposition he is entitled to prior consideration. I have often thought that every hon. member should be given copies of bills as amended. It is difficult to discuss a bill without knowing what the amendments are. While I do not like to make this objection on a bill of the Minister of Agriculture, he is about as convenient a cushion to fall on as anybody else.

Mr. GARDINER: The question arose in the committee whether this bill should be reprinted, and I think the final suggestion was that the amendments were so limited that they might well be reported to the house. The first amendment, for example, just adds the word "flax" to the definition of "coarse grains". Under another amendment a new clause is submitted. By the way, the drafting in the committee was not acceptable to the joint law clerks, and they have submitted another drafting in words more acceptable to them but meaning what was intended. That is only one short section. Another amendment adds two words to one of the clauses. The amendments were not thought sufficient to justify the whole bill being reprinted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I agree if the changes are slight, but it might be well for the minister or the chairman of the committee to indicate the amendments and read the sections as amended so that they will be understood.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been the practice to reprint and distribute a bill when a number of amendments have been made by a committee; but where the amendments are negligible or few in number, it has been the practice for the chairman of the committee to read the amendments to each section as it is reached, and I propose to do that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is all right.

Mr. GARDINER: To help the members of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I might just read the amendments so that the bill as amended may be discussed intelligently. Paragraph (c) of section 2 is amended to add the word "flax" after the word "corn" so that the definition will read:

(c) "coarse grains" means barley, oats, corn, flax and peas.

Mr. HOMUTH: Why put flax before peas?

Mr. GARDINER: To save cutting out the "and" and putting it after "peas".

There is also an amendment to section 4. The committee had proposed to add a new subclause 3, but the amendment as submitted to the committee was withdrawn and the following submitted instead:

4. (3) Notwithstanding any law relating to bankruptcy or insolvency moneys payable under this act shall be deemed not to be property or assets of the bankrupt or insolvent person for the purposes of the said laws and shall not be subject to garnishment or attachment, nor be assignable either at law or in equity.

The intention there is that no one can have any legal claim on these moneys so long as they are in the hands of the government, that any legal claim for debt which there may be will have to be established after the individual is paid.

Mr. MacNICOL: It would be too late then, would it not?

Mr. GARDINER: Then on page 4 of the bill section 11 (a) has been amended to read:

(a) in respect of any information or return required under this act or regulations thereunder, wilfully submits false information or knowingly makes a false return thereto.

Then, subsection 2 has been amended to read:

No payment shall be made to any farmer who wilfully submits any false information to the minister or knowingly makes any false return.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That would be uniform.

Mr. GARDINER: Those are the only amendments.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Apropos of your ruling a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, may I ask, just for my own information, can section 1 be discussed?

The CHAIRMAN: Unless the hon. gentleman has the unanimous consent of the committee to suspend standing order 58, I cannot allow it. But if the hon. gentleman seeks and obtains unanimous consent, then the standing order is suspended.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think it would expedite the progress of the bill if my hon. friend would just carry on and discuss what he wants to discuss.

Mr. GARDINER: Agreed.

The CHAIRMAN: I take it that the hon. gentleman has the unanimous consent of the committee?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Agreed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): It would seem to me that there is an aspect of this legislation which has not recommended itself to many hon. members. During the debate which went on regarding wheat, there were objections from some parts of the chamber with regard to the extra payment that was going out to western agriculture by way of a 20-cent increase in the price of wheat. I should like to draw attention as we go into this bill to the fact that the total expenditure from the treasury as a result of that increase, assuming that the government takes delivery of all of the 280 million bushels of wheat, amounts to about $56 million. The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) said that it is unlikely that that amount of wheat will be delivered, and I believe he is right. But even assuming that 280 million bushels of wheat are delivered, that means a total increased outlay by the treasury of $56 million. There have been some complaints about that from some quarters of the house and some parts of Canada.

I think, when this bill is before the committee, and on the consideration of Bill No. 14, it should be drawn to the attention of the committee that there has been a considerable curtailment, by virtue of these two bills, of the amount which is being paid this year to western agriculture. In other words, while the government's payment on a bushelage basis to western farmers means an increase of $56 million, the curtailment on an acreage basis is considerable.

I would draw the attention of the committee to the fact that the prairie farm income bonus, which will be discontinued, was $20 million; that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, taking out the category 8 to 12 bushels, will mean that $7 million less is being paid out under that act this year than last year; that, under the bill which is now before the committee, the wheat acreage reduction measure, a new basis is being agreed upon for payment, that last year an established acreage was worked out upon which we paid on an average of the 1939 and 1940 wheat acreage, and in the agriculture committee of the house it was found that on the new basis, which is to be the 1940 basis, payment will be made this year on one million acres less than last year, which means another $2 million less. Also it will be found in this bill that the amount of money to be paid for summer-fallow is to be reduced from $4 an acre to $2 an acre. According to figures supplied by the minister, the number of acres upon which summer-fallow was paid last year was 5,493,200, or roughly five and a half million; and at $2 an acre that means $11 million.

I draw these facts to the attention of any who consider that there is reason for complaint concerning the legislation on the ground of excessive generosity to western Canada: $20 million are taken out by virtue of the withdrawal of the prairie farm income bonus, $7 million through taking out the 8- to 12-bushel class, $2 million by virtue of changing the basis to 1940, $11 million by virtue of reducing the allowance for summer-fallow from $4 to $2 per acre, making a total of $40 million.

When complaints are made about paying $56 million more in terms of wheat prices, I think those who have raised those objections should bear in mind that the legislation with which we are now dealing, and the legislation which was dealt with before supper, on the prairie farm income bonus, mean a reduction in the acreage payments to western Canada of around $40 million.

Mr. HOMUTH: But anyone would trade $40 million for $56 million, any day.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Correct. But I do wish to ask hon. gentlemen who have been objecting, saying, "We are giving $56 million to western Canada", to realize that we are giving them $56 million with one hand and taking away $40 million with the other, which is a very different thing from suggesting that we are giving them an outright present of $56 million.

Mr. McNEVIN: Who offered the objections?

Mr. MacNICOL: I have not heard anybody object.

Mr. McNEVIN: I do not recall any objection to the increase.

An hon. MEMBER: There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There were a number who objected.

An hon. MEMBER: Name them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): A number of hon. gentlemen spoke rather scathingly to the effect that western Canada was always asking for more and more. As a matter of fact, when I was on my feet stating that the farmers would not be satisfied with 90 cents a bushel, someone on the Liberal benches said that they would not be satisfied with anything.

Mr. HOMUTH: Yes, but that came from your happy friend across the street.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. GARDINER: The amendment is put in section 2, as I understand, when it comes back from committee.

The CHAIRMAN: We read the section as amended. I will draw the attention of the committee to the fact that paragraph (c) is amended by adding after the word "oats" the word "flax".

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Basic wheat acreage.

Mr. QUELCH: I do not like this section as it stands. I might point out that the agriculture committee did not like it either, and they moved that the section should be struck out and another substituted. Another section was drafted, and the Minister of Agriculture himself spoke in favour of the other section which was drawn up. He also pointed out that, since the new section would mean an increase in expenditures, it would have to be referred to the cabinet. This was done, and they refused to accept it.

There are many reasons why this section as it stands before us now is undesirable. In the first place, the government asked the farmers of western Canada to cooperate in 1940 by reducing their acreage. A very large number of farmers did cooperate and now, as a result of that cooperation, they are being penalized under this section. Section 3 reads:

> For the purposes of this act, the basic acreage in wheat on any farm in the area shall be the wheat acreage in 1940. . . .

Last year under the regulations we stated that the basic acreage would be dependent upon the 1939 and 1940 acreage; in other words, we said that if the average of 1939-40 wheat acreage was less than 60 per cent of the total cultivated acreage we would take the higher of the two. If we take the bill as it stands, the farmer's basic acreage is dependent upon the 1940 acreage alone and there will be a considerably smaller amount paid to the farmers.

The minister said that the definition we had last year had caused a great deal of delay in making the payment; that looking back over the 1939 records had occasioned a good deal of trouble, for the reason that many of the farmers had not kept records, and he blamed that largely for the delay. The point is, however, that we have now done all that work and that basic acreage has been established so that there can not be any delay this year from that cause. If we are now going to take the new basic acreage, it means that all the work we did last year will have been done for nothing. The suggestion the committee made was that, for the farmers who applied under the act last year, the basic acreage as established last year would be used, and for the farmers who did not make application last year, the new basic acreage would be used.

I would say to the government that as soon as it becomes known that we are taking the 1940 acreage as the basic acreage, there will be discontent throughout the west. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will be flooded with protests. Imagine what is being done! Many farmers in 1940 had only about twenty or thirty acres of wheat out of a total of 400 acres of cultivated land, and now the government is saying that that twenty or thirty acres shall constitute the basic acreage, although the total cultivated acreage may be 400 acres. Can any minister justify that? There is absolutely no justice in this section. Last year we discussed this whole question fully in the house for days and finally came to the conclusion that the only fair way to deal with the matter was to take the average of 1939 and 1940 and, where that average was less than 60 per cent, to take the higher. Even now at this late hour the government should reconsider their action. The Minister of Agriculture himself had endorsed the alternative section.

While we are on this section I might be allowed to say, so far as this measure is concerned, that we would have been better off if we had given the farmers $1 a bushel and increased the price, as we are doing, for oats, barley and flax. The farmers, under the present proposal, will not be satisfied. A dollar a bushel plus a sound crop insurance plan would have given satisfaction, and we could have eliminated this measure; but seeing that we are keeping it in operation I submit that we should do everything in our power to put it on an equitable basis. The minister himself knows that section 3 is not equitable, and it will cause a great deal of discontent in the west. I do not think a single member of the house heard any criticism from any farmer in regard to section 3 as it read last year. We spent a great deal of time in working it out and it was fair, but in order to save a few dollars the cabinet is now prepared to sacrifice the old section and put in this one, which is decidedly unjust.

Mr. GARDINER: In order to keep the record straight I would call attention to the fact that a vote was taken on this amendment in the committee, and, if I remember rightly, I voted for the legislation as it stands, which of course I would be expected to do.

Mr. QUELCH: Afterwards.

Mr. GARDINER: No; when the vote was taken in the committee on this.

Mr. QUELCH: The minister supported the amendment in the first place?

Mr. GARDINER: With regard to this particular section I voted for the clause as it now stands in the bill and as it was in the bill when brought before the committee. As a matter of fact, I presented the bill to the house and recommended that the house accept it, and I also did the same so far as the committee was concerned.

When the matter was under discussion in the committee two proposals were made. One was that we accept the acreage of 1940 as the basis from which the reduction would be made this year—that is, the actual acreage of 1940. That is the provision which is made in the bill. The other was that we accept the assumed acreage for 1940, which was provided by taking the average between 1939 and 1940. The discussion began with that, and I pointed out to the committee that the reason for putting this proposal in the bill was the great amount of criticism which came from all over western Canada during 1941 because of the delays in making payment, which delays were almost without exception due to the fact that we had the average of 1939 and 1940. That is to say, if we had simply taken the 1940 acreage and had it sworn to, that would have been a sworn statement of one year's crop and we would have had to consider only that one year. As it was, however, we asked the farmer to go back to 1939 and give his acreage for that year; and when he did so, in many cases, he made mistakes of 5 or 10 acres on the total crop acreage and, in some instances, 20 or 30 acres. Immediately the mistake was reported to the treasury, the treasury officials refused to pay the amount claimed until the reason for the mistake was established or until the figures were corrected.

Most of the criticism that came in during the summer was caused by the attempt to average. I did make the suggestion, as an alternative to the proposal made by certain members of the committee, that we might get over some of the difficulty which I had in mind if we were to make the 1940 average apply to the new applicants and leave the provisions, with regard to those who had been paid last year, as they were in the regulations of last year. I suggested that I would take that to council and have it discussed, and if council were satisfied to provide the additional expenditure made necessary by that provision, then the matter could be brought back to the committee and agreed to. I took it to council, but council did not agree to have the additional expenditure made. The section as it was in the bill when referred to the committee, has been brought back to the house.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In my opinion the recommendation of the committee should have been considered. As was pointed out in the committee, considerable work was done last year, and that work is now going to be lost in the coming year. More than that, those farmers who did not cooperate last year will be brought in under a different basis from that on which the others will stand. The committee were fairly unanimous that the recommendation should have been carried out in an amendment to section 3. Surely those people who did not cooperate last year should not be brought in now on a basis different from that on which the vast number stand, who really played ball last year. I suggest that the administration will have a good deal of extra work to do, and administration of the measure will cost more money. I regret that the minister has not seen fit to get the cabinet to agree to amend the section.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The members of the committee will recall that last year just before the Easter recess the minister brought down his regulations regarding wheat acreage reduction. Most of the western members took copies of the regulations west with them during the Easter recess to endeavour to explain them to their constituents. I think the experience of the minister was probably the same as that of other hon. members, that in almost every public meeting farmers came and pointed out with some indignation that they had acquiesced in the request to reduce wheat acreage, and they said "Now you are going to penalize those of us who acquiesced, and pay the man who did not follow the minister's suggestion." When we assembled after Easter most of the western members made representations to the minister asking if it were not possible to remove what looked like discrimination. The minister agreed and a new basis was worked out. I agree with the minister that probably it did mean a good deal of extra work and did produce administrative difficulties, and I would be the last to ask the minister to go through that again, trying to harmonize the wheat acreage of the two years. But that has now been established for all the farmers who came into this scheme.

This arrangement is going to be very confusing for these people. A certain wheat acreage has been established; this year when they apply for the bonus they are going to find that they are being paid on a totally different basis. They will be coming to members of parliament; they will be going to the offices in Regina or to see the supervisors, and we shall have the same thing we had last fall all over again. I am sorry for the minister's own sake and the sake of those who have to administer the legislation if it is not possible merely to send out notification to each of the farmers who came under this legislation last year saying, "Your basic wheat acreage is so much; that is established. The basis on which you were paid last year is the basis on which you will be paid this year. On any reduction below that figure you will be paid $2 an acre." But under this section the basis is changed, we shall have to go through it again for readjustment, which will make the legislation more difficult to administer.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Payments on acreage reduction.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There is an amendment to the amendment you have before you, Mr. Chairman. I move that the amendment before you be withdrawn and the following substituted therefor:

(3) Notwithstanding any law relating to bankruptcy or insolvency the moneys payable under this act shall be deemed not to be property or assets of the banker or insolvent person for the purposes of the said laws and shall not be subject to garnishment or attachment, nor be assignable either at law or in equity.

That is the phraseology of the Department of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN: In view of the fact that the bill as amended has not been reprinted, I would point out that the bill came back from the committee with a subsection 3 added to section 4 which subsection was as follows:

Every award payable under this act shall be exempt from the operation of any law relating to bankruptcy or insolvency or garnishment or attachment and shall not be assignable either at law or in equity.

The amendment moved by the minister is in substitution for this amendment offered by the committee which is to be withdrawn.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): As to the legal aspect, is this on the theory that once an award is made, it is vested in the individual applying and therefore could be attached or garnished? I would have supposed that as long as it remained in the hands of the crown, it might be assignable, but unless it actually vests in the claimant by reason of the award it would not pass to his trustee in bankruptcy. The idea I assume, is to keep this money from coming into the hands of the man's creditors?

Mr. GARDINER: In practice the intention of this legislation has been carried out during the past year; that is, we have not permitted anyone to claim these moneys from the government; we have not permitted the government to become a collector of debts for other people.

Mr. HANSON: (York-Sunbury): That is quite proper.

Mr. GARDINER: And we have paid the money direct. But that has not prevented our having many applications from persons asking the government to pay the money to them rather than to a person who is a debtor to them. Therefore the committee thought it best to have the position taken by the government stated in the legislation so that it would be known by all parties that no claim can be made, and consequently claims will not be made. There is a similar provision in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and it was with the intention of copying that provision that this amendment was moved in the committee and accepted. I have a statement here from the joint law clerks giving the reason for changing the wording.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I quite understand that.

Mr. GARDINER: It was thought that it did not have the effect intended. But this is largely for the purpose of making clear to the public that there is no use in anyone making application.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But this goes far beyond that.

Mr. HOMUTH: Supposing a farmer who has a large credit with the government goes into bankruptcy—

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: What farmer has any large credit with the government?

Mr. HOMUTH: Some have a good deal. What happens to that money owing to that farmer from the government?

Mr. GARDINER: What the government has been doing in connection with all this legislation is that where the particular farmer owes money to the government, the government keeps the money.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But what the hon. member is asking is, what would the government do with an award that actually had not been paid, to a man who goes into bankruptcy?

Mr. HOMUTH: Who gets the money if the farmer goes into bankruptcy?

Mr. GARDINER: He cannot, as I understand it. The law forbids it.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then why have the clause?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If a farmer in Saskatchewan can no longer go into bankruptcy—I am not sure whether or not that is true; the bankruptcy act provisions may have been taken away from him, but then there must be some provincial legislation which has been quiescent, which comes into operation—he must be able to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors under the provincial laws. All provinces have such provisions, put into the background, it is true, as long as bankruptcy occupies the field. But when that is out of the way, then there must be in Saskatchewan some law making possible an assignment whereby a man's assets may be equitably distributed among his creditors. In the case of bankruptcy or assignment, one under dominion legislation, the other under provincial legislation, that money cannot go to the legal representative. What becomes of it? Does the government retain it, or does it go to the insolvent or bankrupt as the case may be?

Mr. GARDINER: The intention is that this money is paid to the farmer, no matter what his obligations may be to anyone else.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then the minister confirms what was my opinion. We are incorporating in a government bill a drastic change in connection with the matter of bankruptcy. No other business in the country is treated in that way. When a man goes into bankruptcy all of his assets are totalled up and divided among his creditors. Apparently this man cannot go into bankruptcy; but if he cannot pay his creditors and the government owes him money, the minister has just said that money goes to the man and not to his creditors. Surely that is a principle which should not be put into a bill here. There is something radically wrong with the whole system if we are going to incorporate in bills like this radical changes in the matter of debtor and creditor, and that is what we are doing in this bill. I protest against it, because no other section of the country is being treated in that way. No other bankrupt and no other creditor are treated as we are now arranging to treat these semi-bankrupts and these creditors under this bill, and I am against it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The hon. member says that this is a principle which we should not incorporate in this legislation. I submit that the opposite principle which he is suggesting is one which we certainly ought not to introduce in any legislation. Surely the hon. member would not suggest that the legislation should be so framed that the government would become a debt collecting agency for any group of people in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no; but if a man owes money to his creditors, the money ought to be paid to him so that his creditors would have a chance to get at it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This is not a new principle with reference to debtor and creditor.

Mr. HOMUTH: Well, anyway, it is a vicious one.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Just let me finish; we shall see how vicious it is. Exactly the same provision is contained in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. As I understand it, the point in this legislation is that a man, having complied with certain conditions laid down by the government, is entitled to receive certain money. All the government is saying in this legislation is that the money shall be paid to that man; that the collection by his creditors of any money which may be owing them is a matter for personal action by them, and that the Department of Agriculture will not take a hand or any responsibility in deciding whether or not any of this money can be garnisheed or attached. That is exactly what it means.

Mr. HOMUTH: Oh, no. I just want to ask the hon. member this. If it means what he says, that is a different picture, but that is entirely different from what the minister told the committee just a few minutes ago. If the meaning is as the hon. gentleman has said, then I think it should be made clear in the bill; but according to the minister's statement the money cannot be attached, it does not go to the creditors, and is not liable to civil action.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I think what the minister said and what I have said amount to exactly the same thing.

Mr. HOMUTH: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The money which is accruing to the individual who has complied with the regulations cannot be attached and cannot be garnisheed. When the money has been paid to the individual, however, then it becomes a matter of arrangement between him and his creditors, with which the government has nothing to do.

Mr. HOMUTH: If you catch him in time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That depends on when you get him. It is not a new principle. I think the amendment which has been brought in by the minister is most commendable, and should be adopted.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of garnishee, you could never garnish money in the hands of the crown. A garnishee order never runs against the crown but only against individuals. Therefore it is unnecessary to make any provision in this measure. I understand the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is still in effect in Saskatchewan; the minister will know if that is correct.

Mr. GARDINER: That is correct.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act is in effect, then why, on principle, in a bona fide arrangement under that act, should not this money be made available, not to be attached in the hands of the crown, but available when the true position is ascertained? It seems to me that it is not only protection for the crown and the department that is being sought, for I should think that could be done by more apt words. I should think it is going to be pretty difficult for creditors to get any part of this money, and of course I think that is questionable legislation. I am just going to leave it at that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: By what manner or method are the cheques under this measure distributed? I intend to say a few words after I have received an answer to this question. Are they sent out from the central authority, or on occasion are they distributed by hand, by individuals in the department?

Mr. GARDINER: In practically all cases they are sent through the mail from the central office. Some cheques may have been handed to persons who have called for them and some may have been delivered to individuals in localities to which the officers were going. But the general practice is that the Department of Agriculture checks the applications that are received and passes those applications to the treasury, endorsed by the Department of Agriculture. Then, where there is no question about it, the treasury department makes the payment. If there is any question, they may refer the matter back to the inspection department to have further checks made, or they may make further checks themselves; but the payments are made by cheque by the treasury department.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Have any complaints been received by the Department of Agriculture or the Department of Finance that in certain instances in western Canada departmental officials, in distributing these cheques, have gone to the persons entitled to the cheques, secured their endorsements and applied part of the money covered by the cheques to the payment of private debts?

Mr. GARDINER: There has been one complaint to that effect, with regard to one official, and that complaint is under investigation at the moment. I understand that the complaint is not in accordance with the facts, but an investigation is being carried out to ascertain the situation. At the moment I am not in a position to state more than that, and would not under all the circumstances desire to mention any names.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: I can quite well understand that no names should be mentioned at this stage, but how many complaints were lodged against this individual? In how many instances was he alleged to have used his position as a civil servant to secure the payment of private debts, by causing individuals, recipients of these cheques, to endorse them over to him for the purpose of collecting money on account of the debts?

Mr. GARDINER: I think the complaint came from one lawyer, based on three or four affidavits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then that became a practice on the part of one individual?

Mr. GARDINER: That is suggested, but as yet we have not all the facts, and I should not like to even say it was done in the way it has been claimed.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Does the treasury board in Ottawa issue these cheques?

Mr. GARDINER: No; there is a branch representative of the comptroller of the treasury at Regina, who issues the cheques.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Just the one man?

Mr. GARDINER: Oh, no; there is a considerable staff there.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): I wonder whether the minister would explain further why certain officials should be given these cheques to deliver to people personally. To me this seems a very improper procedure for any government department to allow.

Mr. GARDINER: If the facts are as they were stated by the lawyer who wrote in, then it would be an improper practice, and we would, of course, require to discipline the official. We are checking up on the case, as a matter of fact; and if we find the facts are as they have been stated to be, then we shall have to take action which will bear proper relation to any wrong that may have been committed. But until we are certain of that, I should not like to discuss the matter further than we have.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the man been suspended in the meantime?

Mr. GARDINER: No; sufficient grounds have not, up to the moment, been established upon which to order suspension.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How did the cheques get into the hands of this individual, when the ordinary system is that they are sent out directly by the treasury department to the recipient? How did this individual get hold of the cheques and place himself in a position where, by intimidation, he could influence these people to endorse the cheques to him?

Mr. GARDINER: I think there is too much being inferred in the remarks being made. I do not know that there was any intimidation, or that the cheques were got in any way other than what might be considered a proper way. That is, if an individual wrote to me, and I was going home to that particular place, he might ask me to bring the cheque along with me. In other words, he would ask me to be the carrier of his mail, so to speak, and I might not object to doing it. If those are the circumstances, then I do not think anyone would consider there had been much of an offence committed. We are going into that part of it now, just to find out what the basis of the complaint is.

Mr. PERLEY: Why did the treasury branch hand the cheques out in that way?

Mr. GARDINER: In this particular case in hand, the persons concerned were all at the man's own home.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He took the cheques home, and then made a call.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: That answer is scarcely satisfactory. It still does not answer my question as to how it came about that this cheque got into this individual's hands, when he is an official in the department. How did he get these cheques? It is all very well to suggest that he may have carried the mail. Does the minister say there is even a suggestion that he ever carried the mail?

Mr. GARDINER: This particular man's mail; he may have been asked to take it; I do not know.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How would this man, carrying the mail, get possession of cheques sent out by the treasury department—or which should be sent out by the treasury department?

Mr. GARDINER: It is a very simple matter to write a letter to the treasury, when the two offices are operating in the same building. It is a very simple matter for that to happen in a case of that kind. I think, however, all of the facts will be made known in due course.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many instances were there?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to say, because it has not yet been investigated fully.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Whether it has been investigated or not, how many complaints have been made?

Mr. GARDINER: Just the one, as I have already answered. There is just the one, to my knowledge; that is, one complaint made by one lawyer.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Covering how many individuals?

Mr. GARDINER: Covering, as far as I remember, three individuals. The complaint is based, I think, on three affidavits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And against one official?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, one official.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Is that official still carrying on, while the investigation is proceeding?

Mr. GARDINER: He is still carrying on, until he has an opportunity to make an explanation.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: And still carrying the cheques?

Mr. ROWE: Do we understand the minister to say, with respect to the payment of this money, that no creditor can collect the money from a farmer? Does this mean that it is set aside, and that it cannot be collected by any creditor?

Mr. GARDINER: It cannot be attached while it is in the possession of the government. But after the cheque is issued, anyone could collect, of course, if he can find a way of doing so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): And if it has not been spent.

Mr. ROWE: So long as he summer-fallows in excess of what he summer-fallowed last year, can he summer-fallow his whole farm?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, he could summer-fallow his whole farm.

Mr. ROWE: And if he were insolvent, it would pay him to keep on summer-fallowing, would it not?

Mr. GARDINER: No, not very well. It would not pay him to keep on summer-fallowing at $2 an acre if he can grow twenty bushels to the acre, to sell at 90 cents.

Mr. NICHOLSON: With respect to section 5, I would point out that a year ago the minister's department advertised widely the regulations brought out. An important change has been made in connection with the basic period. What arrangements have been made this year to publicize the changes which have been introduced? Last year a number of people were unable to take advantage of the regulations because of not filing their applications in time. I can anticipate that because of confusion over changes there might be some difficulty this year. What plans have been made?

Mr. GARDINER: The question is as to what arrangements have been made to make the farmer acquainted with the changes in the legislation this year compared with that of last year. My answer is that advertisements are in the west to be placed in the hands of the local press in western Canada, and those advertisements are to appear immediately the bill passes this house. The advertisements give the farmers full information as to this year's policy. Then, announcements will be made over the radio, and addresses will be given to audiences throughout western Canada by officials of the provincial and federal departments. The information with regard to the whole matter will be in the hands of every municipal secretary in the three western provinces, as it was last year. I know of no reason why farmers should not be made acquainted with any changes made.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister will recall that last year many orders in council were passed after July. I have at least three of them in mind. The definition of "summer-fallow" was changed on November 27. While I am prepared to accept and support the bill, I think the minister should make it clear that a number of orders in council will not be passed in mid-summer changing any of the sections of the bill. He should make it clear to the farmers that this is final, and that there will no changes such as the one with respect to the definition of "summer-fallow", to which I have referred. Last year it was most confusing to have orders in council come out a month or so after the summer-fallowing had been completed.

Mr. GARDINER: I am afraid if changes had not been made in November, there would have been a great many complaints from farmers, and particularly from one or two hon. members I see in the house. An amendment was made to give just treatment to a certain group of farmers, most of whom, it is true, lived in the area along the boundary between Saskatchewan and Alberta. The method by which they do their summer-fallowing is somewhat different from the method followed in that section of the country in which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and I live. The methods followed in our section were those fully described in the first regulations which went out, but they were not the methods followed in the eastern part of Alberta, particularly in the central section, and in the western section of Saskatchewan.

The amendment to the regulations which went out in November made it possible for those people to collect by summer-fallowing in the way in which it is customary to summer-fallow in that area. I should imagine, if we make any mistakes in the regulations which go out this spring, which will be detrimental to the farmers in certain areas in the west and which do not carry out the spirit of the legislation, we shall be expected to amend the regulations, and make them conform to all the facts.

Mr. ROWE: It would seem that the farmer is paid $2 for those areas sown to grass. What happens if the grass does not grow? Does he still get the $2 because it was sown to grass?

Mr. GARDINER: If he takes it out of wheat this year and seeds it to grass—

Mr. ROWE: And the grass does not grow.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, we need not deal with that alone for the time being. Anything else may not grow, either.

Mr. ROWE: But you pay him, anyway?

Mr. GARDINER: If he seeds it to coarse grain, grass or rye, he receives $2 an acre.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the theory that it is wheat reduction?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Even if he summer-fallows it and does not put in anything, he still gets the $2 because he is taking it out of wheat. In addition if he does sow, and grows a crop the succeeding year, he gets an additional $2 in that year.

Mr. ROWE: He gets $2 for not sowing wheat and $2 for sowing grass.

Mr. HAZEN: I listened with a good deal of interest to the criticism made by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Homuth) in connection with these cheques. I do not know enough about the subject to express a definite opinion, but I would ask the minister this question: A tenant farmer farming land he does not own, and possessing no assets, engages a man to work for him. That man works for the farmer for some time and is not paid any wages. A cheque is coming to the tenant farmer. Has that workman any redress? Is there any way in which he can get his money? I ask this question because on one occasion I worked very hard for a threshing outfit in the west and never got my money.

Mr. GARDINER: That dispute would be settled now under the landlords and tenants act, or masters and servants act, which is provincial legislation, and not under any legislation passed here.

Section agreed to.

Sections 5 to 9 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10—Regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it the understanding of the minister that the regulations contemplated by section 10 are limited to the question of enforcement and administration of the measure and are in no sense to be made an extension of the principle of the measure as was the case under the summer-fallow provisions of last year? In other words these regulations are strictly limited to the enforcement and administration of the legislation and cannot go beyond that. Is that his understanding?

Mr. GARDINER: This bill as now drafted is practically 100 per cent the regulations of last year.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I understand that.

Mr. GARDINER: Last year the whole policy was put into effect by regulations. This year the only power we have with regard to regulations is the power given in this particular section, which provides:

The minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, make such regulations as may be deemed necessary for the efficient enforcement and administration of this act.

We shall not be able to change the principle of the bill by any regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is what I was calling attention to. It is a very limited power of regulation.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased indeed to congratulate the government upon its announcement this afternoon exempting the farmers from military training and I should like, through the Minister of Agriculture, to thank the government for its action on this very important national question.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Offences and penalties.

The CHAIRMAN: I draw the attention of the committee to the amendments as read by the minister. In line 24 "wilfully" is inserted before "submits" and in line 25 "knowingly" is inserted before "makes". In line 28 "wilfully" is added after "who" and in line 29 "knowingly" is inserted before "makes."

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Has the minister taken the opinion of his legal advisers on the effect of the insertion of the words "wilfully" and "knowingly" in these two paragraphs? I suggest to the minister that if he insists on the inclusion of these two words, he will probably never be able to get a conviction.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, I should like the hon. gentleman to elaborate that a little. It would be a very serious consequence, if so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is no reflection on anybody. I am not going to go into an elaborate discussion here of the theory of intent, but I know how difficult it is to prove it apart from the mere submission of a document. I am not going to object at all. I think it is a protection to the treasury. I simply point out that in the administration of justice, if you insert these words, it is going to be just that more difficult to get a conviction.

Mr. ILSLEY: I certainly did not intend to say anything on this bill, but the treasury officials who institute these prosecutions consider it of the utmost importance that they be able to get convictions in cases of true fraud, of which there have been some. I wish to make it perfectly clear that my understanding of the amendments to this section is that they do not change the section one bit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It makes it more difficult to prove the offence, that is all.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not have agreed to this amendment if I had thought it would enable persons to get away with fraudulent claims. I do not believe it does. I do not believe that a conviction should be secured for submitting false information unless it was knowingly submitted, and I would be surprised if any conviction was ever obtained in cases where an innocent mistake was made in giving information. I certainly hope that we have not ruined this section by putting in these words, because there will be the odd case of fraudulent claim, and it is of extreme importance, of importance I would think to everybody interested in the measure, that the fraudulent claimant be punished. The honest claimants, who are in the overwhelming majority, would themselves want the fraudulent claimant punished for the reputation of the community and of the legislation. I would not like the legal advice of the leader of the opposition to go out to a certain class of individuals, to the effect that they can now get away with anything because the words "knowingly" and "wilfully" are in the legislation.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister is imputing something I never suggested. I simply tell him as a practising lawyer that the inclusion of "wilfully" and "knowingly" in this clause is going to make it very difficult to get a conviction, and I am in the judgment of every practising lawyer in this house when I make that statement.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Officers and employees.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the minister think it will require as large a staff to administer this bill as he had last year? Last year everything was done by regulation under order in council. The principle of those regulations and orders in council are embodied in this bill. A lot of inspection has been done in the last year or two, and does the minister not think that the staff can now be reduced and a considerable saving effected this coming season in administering this bill as now drafted?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no permanent staff in connection with the administration either of this legislation or of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, excepting the staff in the offices, and a very few superintendents of districts covering the three prairie provinces. The other persons employed, that is the inspectors, are employed only for the time they are required. Some of them have employment for a few weeks, and some for as much as three or four months. I doubt if many have employment for any longer. Of course, those staffs are pretty well reduced at present. It depends entirely upon what we are required to do next summer as to how many men will be called back to work during the summer months. We have followed the practice of calling back those who have given the best service during the years preceding, and we have not called up new men unless we require men for additional work. The number that are on at present is very small. I have the figures here, and could look them up, but it would take some little time to go through the papers I have in front of me.

As we come into the summer months, and applications are made by the 31st of May, we shall be required to make certain inspections, and those inspections will be made. After the 1st of July, when inspections are made for payment and we pass them on to the treasury, there will be cases referred back to us and we may have to engage an additional number of men. The number we shall require will depend largely upon the number of mistakes that are made by farmers when they make their applications. I do not suppose anyone in the house would ask us to have the payments made, where mistakes have occurred, until those errors have been corrected. The more mistakes that are made, the more corrections will be necessary, and the more men will have to be sent out to make inspections. Therefore at the moment I am not in a position to say to what extent we can limit the number of men to be employed, but we will certainly restrict them to the lowest possible number to get the work done. Our costs, in spite of what has been said, have not been high. It has been asserted from time to time that there have been hundreds of inspectors out, one inspector inspecting the other, and so on. But our costs are low, as costs of this type are considered from place to place throughout Canada.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Were not a considerable number of mistakes made by the inspectors themselves in checking up on this work?

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, all persons are human, and one inspector may think that a piece of land is not properly summerfallowed while another man might say that it is. There may be a difference of opinion, and where there is, we usually have to send someone else to arbitrate as between those who differ. All these things cost money and take time.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: How many employees were there last year, and what was the total amount disbursed in the administration of this measure?

Mr. GARDINER: I had that information before the committee the other day. I am not sure that I have it here; I will see.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister said just now that the cost of administration was fairly low.

Mr. GARDINER: About 4 per cent.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I should like to point out that the cost of administration for this last year up to February 27, according to sessional paper 153A, was $785,800.42, and the cost of administration under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act—because the inspectors, I understand, are used interchangeably—for last year, also up to February 27, 1942, was $387,422.07, making a total, roughly, of something over $1,000,000. The amount expended under the wheat acreage reduction plan to the same date was, roughly, $26,500,000, and the amount spent in the same period under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was about $5,326,000. In other words, about $30,000,000 was paid out under these two bonuses, with an administration cost of a little over $1,000,000. I would hardly call that very low.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the summary of the staff as at February 28. I am sorry I have not before me full information for the entire year.

The staff for the three provinces consists of: one director; one assistant director; three superintendents—one for each province—one accountant; five supervisors in the office; nine inspectors working from the office; two clerks, grade IV; four clerks, grade III; thirty-two clerks and stenographers, grade II; twenty-eight clerks and stenographers, Grade IA; six clerks and stenographers, grade I; 532 clerks and stenographers, day basis, for the three provinces, taken on at different times; field staff: thirty-four supervisors, permanent employees, for the three provinces; seventy-four inspectors, making a total of one hundred and eight; or a grand total of 732 in the office and outside.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is that the number who are engaged at present, or the number hired during the whole year?

Mr. GARDINER: That is the number at the date of this return, which was February 28. The number of inspectors would be lower then than during the summer months. There would be more inspectors in the field in the summer; I believe the total number was somewhere between two and three hundred, but I have not the exact figures.

Mr. NICHOLSON: On what basis are these inspectors and supervisors paid?

Mr. GARDINER: The supervisors are paid on a monthly basis. I think the highest amount is $150 a month, or $1,800 a year. I should not like to speak from memory with regard to the others. The stenographers, also the clerks, are paid the regular rates which are paid in the civil service. The director, the assistant director and the superintendents are paid on the same basis as persons doing similar work elsewhere in the civil service.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Would it not be possible to reduce this staff very considerably? According to the information furnished by the hon. member for Weyburn, here is an expenditure of about 3½ per cent from the administration of these two acts. There are seventy-four inspectors in the winter time looking after summer-fallow, or wheat acreage reduction.

Mr. GARDINER: Well, now, that is not a fair statement. My hon. friend knows that.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What is the purpose of having those inspectors in the winter time? Why have them all the year round?

Mr. HOMUTH: To keep the snow off the summer-fallow!

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member for Lake Centre only needs to look at his own files, and so does every other member from western Canada, to get the answer to that. Not a day passes even now when I do not get a letter from some member of the house, and when a member misses a day I get letters from half a dozen secretaries of municipalities, or where they miss I get letters from many farmers.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: Because of delays.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, but the delays are brought about, in most instances, by mistakes made by individuals who are claiming money, and the treasury does not pay any of these accounts until the correct statements are made, or at least until the claims are proven to the treasury. That requires, of course, that any mistakes which are made be corrected. In the winter time we are checking many of these claims which have been made. We check with the operators of the elevators, the secretaries of municipalities and any other individual who may know anything at all about the business transactions of a man who is making a claim, and attempt during that period to establish his claim so that it can be paid.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): In this respect I understand that no matter how correct a claim which is filed may be, or how favourable the report made by the ordinary field inspector, any item of over $1,000 is not paid until a second inspection is made. If that is right, is the second inspection made by an official of the Department of Agriculture or by an official of the treasury branch.

Mr. GARDINER: I would not wish to answer that question by saying they are made one way or the other in all instances. In some instances a second or third inspection may be made by the treasury. I believe that in all instances the second inspection has been made by the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. ROSS (Souris): That is for payments over $1,000.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. NICHOLSON: The minister has not given me all the information I want. There have been many criticisms in my constituency about these inspectors doing too much travelling. Some are inspecting areas twenty, thirty or forty miles from where they live. I do not know whether it is well founded, but the complaint is made that they drive back and forth morning and night in order to build up mileage. The minister might give information as to the basis on which they are paid. I am thinking of the case of J. L. MacKay from Yorkton who was paid $690.33 as salary, $686.94 for travelling and $427.10 for subsistence. We have no hotels in that area where the rates are as high as they are at the Chateau Laurier or the Lord Elgin. One can live a long time in that country on $427. The travelling expenses appear to me to be too high. The minister might explain the basis on which the inspectors are paid for travelling and also the basis for subsistence. I do not think these allowances are in line with the price of wheat per bushel.

Mr. GARDINER: The payments are made on the same basis as is allowed in all departments of government. I believe, speaking from memory, the rate for driving a car is seven cents a mile, and then there is a certain allowance for daily keep of individuals.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is that more than they actually pay in hotels?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think so; it is not supposed to be. It will cover hotel bills —meals as well as lodging.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): How much per day?

Mr. GARDINER: It would be their actual costs. There may be some cases where an allowance is given to some of the higher officials, but those who do the work will have to put in vouchers for their expenses. As a matter of fact, the figures just stated are not very far away from the expense accounts we get generally throughout the whole service.

Mr. NICHOLSON: This is a field in which great economy could be effected. After checking a similar return a year ago, I asked the minister's department for an itemized statement in connection with the expenses of four or five men working in my own area and I was refused that information. I think the minister should tell us whether these men are paid so much a day or actual expenses. I am interested to know how some of these men come to be paying the hotel bills they are paying in this part of the province where hotel rates are very reasonable.

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest that the hon. member bring that matter up when my estimates are before the house and I shall have the facts before me. I do not have them here because I did not expect that these answers would be required. I had them in the committee the other day, and I tried to coax members to ask questions but they did not do so.

An hon. MEMBER: There was no Hansard there.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister says he coaxed members for questions the other day. I brought this very matter to his attention then. The minister will remember that I suggested that when he changed inspectors from one municipality to another, moving them year after year, it involved a lot of travelling and unnecessary expenses. Inspectors were changed in my district—Indian Head going to Wolseley and Wolseley going on. I know two of these men were deliberately driving forty miles and back getting mileage and living at home. In fact, I checked up on one fellow who was driving forty-six miles every night to Windthorst, and after I told the municipal secretary that I would take the matter up with the department in protest—I ventured the opinion that the Minister of Agriculture would not stand for it if he knew about it—he decided that he would pay a dollar for a room in the town and stay there nights instead of driving home. The minister could make a considerable saving in this regard. He has stated that the staff was 732 as at February 28. I think that is out of all reason. There is no organization or industry which, having an expenditure of $30,000,000 to make, would ever employ 732 men to do the work. I venture to say that if proper business methods were followed, this could be cut in half. The minister might give us the number of inspectors and the staff employed by the treasury branch in addition to these. They have a number of inspectors throughout the province inspecting different claims of $1,000 or more, and I presume they have quite a staff. What staff have they in addition to these?

Mr. GARDINER: The suggestion is made that 732 is a considerable staff. I would agree that if 732 persons were being employed throughout the whole year, they would probably constitute a considerable staff; but 532 of them are clerks and stenographers on a daily basis and are hired only for short periods. For example, last summer when people were urging that these payments be got out, the director went to the normal school. He could not get employees elsewhere in the numbers required, and he asked the principal of the normal school to recommend to him, from among those who were training as teachers, persons to work at night to get the payments out. This would mean that a very considerable proportion of the young people who were attending normal school at Regina at that time would be on the staff on particular days. This 532 is made up of people employed on a day-wage basis, many of them employed just a few days, some a few weeks and some a few months. I would think that none of those who were on a daily basis would be there for more than a very few months. Therefore that leaves 200 who might be looked upon as a somewhat permanent staff in the three provinces where they are checking up payments to 186,000 people; in other words, 186,000 applications have to be checked in that office.

Mr. PERLEY: They do not issue the cheques; the treasury department does that.

Mr. GARDINER: But that is the least part. The cheques, in fact, are made out by machine, but before the machine starts to work, all the information has to be gathered and checked by the staff. When the statements come in, any that appear on the face of them to have some mistake have to be sent out to inspectors and gone over again. Just a few weeks ago we were checking up on the unpaid applications and at that time there were somewhere about 40,000 of them. Each one of those accounts had been checked the second time. In order to get the corrections, they had to be gone over again either by telephone or letter; further information had to be obtained before payment could be made. These officials are working on those applications.

I might point out that in answer to a question asked in the committee a few days ago—by the way it was on the other bill the one passed before recess this afternoon, not this one—I pointed out that $33,000,000 had been paid out in three years under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and the cost of administration of that particular act for the three years had been $1,500,000. I submit that is not a high cost for the administration of payments of that kind, where all the farmers in a large section of western Canada are being paid under the terms of that legislation.

The same staffs are dealing with the payments under this legislation, but there is a distribution of the costs, and the $1,500,000 figure that I gave to the committee the other day had to do with the administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act alone. Some figures quoted a few days ago from a return brought down in the house indicated the division of cost as between this branch and the other branch of the service. From the figures I have seen I would assume that costs in this part of the service are lower than under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In discussing the administration of this bonus, much has been said by the minister at various times about mistakes made by the farmers, and naturally many are made. The minister himself has said that very few farmers keep books, and it is not easy to get the acreage. But a great many mistakes are also made by virtue of the fact that many of these appointees are not appointed because of their ability or experience in work of this kind. I do not say that unkindly, and I am not making a blanket charge about all the inspectors and supervisors. I think many of these men know their business, but I know that many do not. I know that some of them have had their reports sent back to them again and again because they were poorly written, because the men were not capable of gathering the information or of computing the basis upon which the bonus should be paid. If this bonus is going to be handled efficiently, I think it will have to be handled increasingly through the municipal officials, through the hail insurance officials, and through a trained staff rather than through some people who are—to use the best phrase—purely political appointees.

If I remember correctly, last year when the estimates were up for the payment of this bonus, someone on this side asked the minister how many inspectors it would require to supervise, and I think the minister said about one hundred. Later he said it might take more, that it might be 125. If my information is correct, at the peak last summer there were actually between 200 and 300. Could the minister explain that?

Mr. GARDINER: The statement last year was that it would take 100 to 125 in addition to the inspectors already employed under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I think that is about the way it worked out. When we had between 200 and 300 the greater number were men who would have been out in connection with Prairie Farm Assistance work.

As to the suggestion that we should use municipal men, we used municipal men altogether for the making of applications in connection with this legislation. A considerable part of the cost of administration goes to municipal secretaries. We pay the municipal secretary fifty cents for every claim made. With 186,000 claims it is apparent what goes to the municipal secretaries. I think it will also be agreed that many of the supervisors we have out are some of the best municipal men in Saskatchewan, and that is true of other provinces as well. The supervisor in the district covering Weyburn is Mr. Black, who has had, I think, as long a record as municipal secretary as any man in Saskatchewan, and a very creditable record. We have made an attempt to get men with experience in the two lines of activity mentioned by the hon. member, namely municipal work and hail insurance work.

We have, of course, tried to get men who at least believe in the policy and think it is doing some good to agriculture in western Canada. We believe that they will give better service than some others who might like employment but do not believe in the policy itself. We have had men—this may surprise my hon. friend—of our own political faith, apply for jobs on this work who were turned down because they do not believe in the policy; at least the reports are that when they are going about the country they have left the impression that they do not believe in the policy. I think hon. members will agree that if you have decided to put over a particular policy in an area, it is better to have men checking and inspecting on it who at least believe in it and are trying to get the best possible results from it. We have been doing that as far as possible.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister spoke of the peak. I suppose the peak would come some time in the fall. What is the total number of inspectors, field men, supervisors, under the three bonus acts—the prairie farm income, the wheat acreage reduction and the prairie farm assistance—and how are they distributed between the three? Does the figure of two or three hundred cover only the wheat acreage reduction? My impression is that the number for all three is much higher.

Mr. GARDINER: I am speaking from memory; I would rather the question be put when I have the books before me and definite figures, but the same inspectors do the work on all three.

WAR APPROPRIATION

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Monday, March 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee to consider a resolution to provide that sums not exceeding $135,000,000 be granted to his majesty for national defence and security.

Mr. LACOMBE: Louder, please. I want to hear something, as a member of parliament. I want to know what is going on. On many, many days I do not hear anything.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order. We can hear nothing, absolutely nothing, during many of the discussions in this House of Commons.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The house is now resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance that I leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of the whole on a certain proposed resolution for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, you are not leaving the chair before I rise to a point of order in this House of Commons. I was insulted by the Prime Minister last Friday, as a private member of this house.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order on this question.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: I will cite to you the Hon. Mr. Gladstone, in 1872—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: —who, when addressing the British House of Commons—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough (Mr. White) has the floor.

Mr. WHITE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. LACOMBE: I rise to a point of order, and I want a decision on this question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. LACOMBE: You do not want to give me fair play in this democracy.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must resume his seat. He is not in order in saying what he has just said. We are on a certain order of business, which must be proceeded with. The hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough has the floor and must not be interrupted; and the Chair must not be defied.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. You are absolutely out of order—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sit down.

Mr. LACOMBE: If you wish I will go out of the house, but you are being unfair on this question, absolutely unfair. You will remember this. If you read the 13th edition of May—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member must resume his seat. I have already said what is the business before the house, and if the hon. member continues to defy the Chair I shall have to name him. I hope he will not impose that unpleasant duty upon me, but the business of the house must be conducted in a decorous and proper manner. It is not being so conducted by the hon. member. I hope he will not cause me to name him and have him removed from the house.

Mr. LACOMBE: Mr. Speaker, it is not you; it is the government that is doing this.

Mr. G. S. WHITE (Hastings-Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, before the resolution now under discussion is advanced a stage, I should like to make a few brief remarks in connection with our war effort. First of all, I should like to associate myself with the remarks made last night by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) who expressed the hope that the few remaining days before the Easter adjournment would be devoted entirely to a discussion of our war effort. In my opinion it is most unfortunate that during this session, which is now in its third month, we should have spent so much time in the discussion of the speech from the throne, the plebiscite, the question of wheat and so on, while practically no time at all has been available for the discussion of Canada's war effort.

Naturally all hon. members were greatly interested in the statement made this afternoon by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), but it is unfortunate that it is nearly two years since the registration was taken, and only now is the government making any attempt to put into force a comprehensive and extensive man-power scheme. Every hon. member knows of many cases in his own riding in which available man-power is being wasted. In my riding, which is largely agricultural, I find that even to-day cheesemakers are being called up for military training. I submit that a qualified cheesemaker is a highly skilled man in connection with our war effort. During the past few weeks meetings have been held in many agricultural ridings in Ontario, under the auspices of the provincial agricultural representatives, at which they have given cheese and bacon producers pep talks, pointing out to them the urgent need of increasing the production of bacon, cheese, cream, butter and all other foodstuffs. I do not think it is necessary to give pep talks to the farmers of Ontario in order to get them to produce more, because they are only too anxious to bring about maximum production. They ask for only two things—a fair price and that they be given some assistance in the matter of farm help. The remarks of the Prime Minister to-day in regard to farm help will receive most careful examination.

I had intended to say something at this time about the situation in connection with appeals by farmers to district boards, but I shall reserve that for a later date, after I have studied the statement given to-day. The Prime Minister stated that there would be further appeals, and that probably the boards would have to be greatly extended. I do not know under what department it comes, but I should like to point out that at the present time the military district in which Ottawa is located, being military district No. 3, includes an area extending practically from the town of Bomanville well into the province of Quebec. In this area are many centres of population, such as Peterborough, Lindsay, Belleville, Kingston, Ottawa and part of Quebec. The headquarters of this board is located in the city of Kingston, and appeals to the board may be made in person or by letter.

The point I should like to stress is that in future, when there will be many more appeals heard, would it not be better to have these boards visit the various counties in each military district two, three or four times a year, sitting at three or four of the main towns in each county. Then all appeals could be heard in person. At the present time representations are made by letter, and I submit that it is only proper and fair and just that all appeals should be heard in person, and in person only. If some such system as this were worked out, it would remove much of the rising criticism which we hear at the present time.

I wish to say a few words about the number of men in our reserve forces. Under the last book issued by the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson), I believe he listed them somewhere between 140,000 and 150,000 men. My understanding is that the men in the reserve forces are made up of three classes: First, the men who were called for thirty days' training, numbering some 87,000 or 89,000, who took thirty days' training and then returned to their homes. I believe, according to the minister's statement, some 20,000 of those men have since enlisted in the active forces.

The second class of men in the reserve army are the men who were called for four months' training and retained in the army, and the men who have been called since the four months' training scheme was dropped. How many of these men have been called, I do not know, but I believe some 10,000 or 15,000 of them have enlisted in the active forces. The other men who make up the reserve army are the second battalions, and various other units who take their training at their local headquarters. The men who were called for thirty days' training have not yet received any further training—except the men who have been called back for further training.

I submit that the total number of men in our reserve army to-day is only the total number of men who have been called up for the duration of the war and who, so far as I can figure, amount to something like 50,000 men, or thereabouts. That is a great deal short of the 140,000 or 150,000 shown by the minister in his little blue booklet.

A short time ago an order was issued whereby some of these reserve force units would be brigaded. I believe the brigade for military district No. 3 is in the city of Ottawa. But there are many other reserve force units in this district which are still orphans. I think the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) must surely realize at this late date that he cannot hope to train men in the reserve army by training two nights a week for two or three hours, with obsolete equipment.

The type of training carried on by these reserve force units consists in many instances of simply parade ground drill, and elementary rifle and bayonet practice. In many instances this is the only type of drill they can take, because they have no other equipment. I have read in the press at various times that the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has stated that he can equip a division every six weeks. If this means that he can fully equip a division every six weeks, what, then, is the reason why reserve force units have so little and, in many instances, no equipment for training purposes? These men in the reserve forces cannot continue to be trained in the Boer war methods any longer, because very soon these men may be called upon to engage in fighting an enemy who is fully equipped, highly trained and fully mechanized in the 1942 method of conducting a war.

When are those men in the reserve force units going to receive advance training, or when will they receive instructions on mortars, Tommy guns, grenades, or take part in manoeuvres or advanced military tactics in connection with planes, Bren gun carriers, tanks and so on?

If an emergency arose and these reserve force men were called out to engage an enemy, I submit that it would be only criminal to expect them to fight and to engage an enemy equipped with modern weapons. I have on various other occasions in the house attempted to impress upon the Minister of National Defence the importance of time. Time is the one great factor in this war. I should like to ask the minister why these reserve force units cannot be called up and placed on full-time training. There are dozens of armouries across this dominion which are used to no purpose, except for reserve force units. Any member of the house who has visited a modern training centre must have been impressed by the manner in which these training centres are equipped, and also impressed with the very highly skilled and trained officers and non-commissioned officers, and men on the permanent staff. Trained personnel of the army is a very, very important factor to-day.

I would suggest to the minister that in order to increase the number of men now being trained, dozens of armouries throughout Canada should be used for basic training. At the present time the basic training is taken at various training centres. If the men could receive their training—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WHITE: If the men could receive their basic training at local armouries, these training centres, with their fine equipment and their highly skilled staff could then be used entirely for advanced training. The recruit, on being called up, would be examined, attested, and attached to a reserve force unit at his nearest armoury. There he would go through a course of physical drill, route marches, receive instruction in discipline, training in rifle, bayonet, machine gun, gas and other elementary training.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WHITE: I am sure there are plenty of officers in the reserve force and plenty of non-commissioned officers in that force, also many veterans of the last war who are quite capable of carrying on and conducting basic training at local armouries. If some such system were adopted, the number of recruits passing through training centres could be practically doubled every two months. If this were done, the reserve force units would then be performing some useful purpose. As they are constituted at the present time, and as they train at present they are practically useless; and the cost of maintaining these dozens of armouries with partial staffs and small administrative and training staffs, and all the other thousand and one items which enter into military expenditures, must be enormous. Each year very large sums are spent on the reserve force units, and in my opinion the results do not justify these huge expenditures.

There is the further point, that if we are to continue the voluntary system of enlistment in Canada—and apparently that is the only system we are going to have—the reserve force units could do a great deal in supplying recruits for the active forces.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) has just placed before the house a bill providing for a gift of a billion dollars to Great Britain. There are in his name on the order paper other bills totalling over two billion dollars. Certainly these are staggering sums. Apparently he deals only in millions and billions. But when he comes to dealing with the soldiers he gets down to pinching pennies, for the first time. In the last session members from all parts of the house urged the government to consider a revision of rates of pay and allowances for boys in the armed forces. True, there was some slight adjustment in regard to the third and fourth child; but that was really nothing very much, because it should have been that way since the war started in 1939.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains to moderate his voice. He is interrupting the hon. member who is speaking. That hon. member is entitled to the same courtesy as the hon. member who is interrupting would expect.

Mr. LACOMBE: Never mind; it will be all right.

Mr. WHITE: Everyone admits that the cost of living has greatly increased since September, 1939. The government has recognized this by granting a cost of living bonus; but, strange to say, it does not apply to the armed forces. How strange that everyone else in this Canada of ours who is doing any kind of war work receives the highest of wages; yet the men in the armed forces, the only men in Canada who are really making any sacrifice, are discriminated against because they receive no increase in pay, no increase in living allowance, and their dependents are forced to get along on the scale established in September, 1939. I submit to the minister that there is nothing political whatever about this request for an increase in pay for the soldiers, since members of all parties have urged the government to give consideration to making some such adjustment. I sincerely trust that in the very near future the minister will announce that even at this late date something will be done in the matter of adjusting the soldier's pay, and I can assure him that it would have some effect on recruiting, because undoubtedly a young man to-day can earn a great deal more money and enjoy a great many more privileges and comforts by undertaking war work in a factory than by joining the army.

I noticed on the bulletin board of a local newspaper this morning that there were three air attacks on England last night, the first for months, the warming-up for the spring offensive that is soon to break. It will break within a matter of days on all fronts round the world. Here in Canada what are we doing about a spring offensive?

Mr. LACOMBE: France will never die.

Mr. WHITE: Our spring offensive in our appeasement policy will open on the 27th day of April when the people of Canada will be asked to vote "yes" or "no" on a meaningless question. What a fine contribution to our allies of the united nations! Only a few days ago in this house the members heard the Prime Minister read a statement that had been issued by Anthony Eden disclosing the atrocities and vengeance wreaked by Japanese soldiers on helpless Canadian and British war prisoners at Hong Kong. Members heard how a ruthless, barbarian, savage yellow enemy raped and ravished white women and girls.

Mr. LACOMBE: We do not fear the yellow colour.

Mr. WHITE: How could any member sit in this house and hear that report read without his very soul being filled with rage and vows of vengeance upon this enemy? Yet, when the Prime Minister had finished his statement, we calmly proceeded with our plebiscite proceedings. I fully expected that after the Prime Minister had made that statement he would have announced that the plebiscite had gone by the board and that we would at last get on with a total war effort. In my riding there are many boys who enlisted and went to Hong Kong.

Mr. LACOMBE: And the plebiscite will be won by the government, with the radio.

Mr. SPEAKER: My patience is almost exhausted. The hon. member is deliberately defying the Chair. I cannot allow that to continue, and I warn the hon. gentleman now that if he persists in further interruptions, I shall certainly name him. I hope he will not put that unpleasant duty upon me.

Mr. WHITE: There are many boys in my riding who went to Hong Kong, and it would not be well for anybody to go into that riding and ask the parents, brothers, sisters, wives and sweethearts of any of those boys, what they think about the plebiscite or whether they think that Canada should at this late date make a total war effort, nor would it be wise for anybody to go into my riding, which, of all the ridings in Canada, has probably the largest percentage of men in the armed forces, and ask the parents and families of those boys who have gone overseas what they think about the plebiscite and whether they think we should wage total war at this late date.

This yellow peril is coming closer and closer to our shores every day. If Australia falls, what happened at Hong Kong and Singapore will happen here. The very thought of such outrages happening in this country should be enough to make us finish with our appeasement ways and decide at once to make a total war effort and wage total war, which our enemies have done from the day war started. Surely our days of complacency and appeasement should end now, because what happened in Hong Kong and Singapore can happen here and probably will happen here. In the few remaining days that are left to us before the storm breaks, are we bending every effort and making every preparation we can? Are we mobilizing all our resources and making plans for every possible emergency, or are we still living in a fairyland and saying that it cannot happen here? Are we still depending upon the British navy and the Yanks to protect us? I regret, Mr. Speaker, that even to-day there are many Canadians to whom the war means only some slight curtailment of their rights and privileges.

Mr. LACOMBE: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. WHITE: Will the hon. member please sit down.

Mr. LACOMBE: He does not want to answer my question?

Mr. WHITE: Certainly not.

Mr. LACOMBE: All right; continue your speech. It is a very Tory speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am compelled by the hon. gentleman to take a step that I hoped I would not have to take. If he has any explanation to make of his conduct or any apology to make to the Chair, I shall be glad to hear it now.

Mr. LACOMBE: I am not Hitler in this House of Commons; I am not Quisling in this house; I am a Canadian; that is all. I want an answer from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. Apparently there is no explanation and no apology to the Chair for the attitude of the hon. member. I therefore name him—Mr. Liguori Lacombe. The hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains will withdraw.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Speaker, I believe the practice is that the minister leading the house or the senior minister present moves that the hon. member be suspended for the remainder of the sitting. I do that.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved by Mr. Ilsley, seconded by Mr. Crerar, that the hon. member, Mr. Liguori Lacombe, member for Laval-Two Mountains, be suspended from the service of the house during the present sitting. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

(Mr. Lacombe thereupon withdrew.)

Mr. WHITE: I regret that even to-day in Canada there are many Canadians to whom the war means only some slight curtailment of their rights and privileges. To many possibly the shortage of gasoline is a calamity, for they cannot and will not see this terrible menace that is looming up over our horizon. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the citizens of Canada can only be made to realize their great danger by the government giving them a proper lead and showing them proper leadership at this time. I am convinced that in 1942 Canada will be both invaded and bombed, and when that happens it will avail us little to weep, wail and wring our hands and vainly regret that we did not do more while we still had time. It is the plain duty, responsibility and obligation of every member of this house, because the members of this house are the only ones in Canada who have any real authority, to speed up into high gear our entire nation to a total war effort.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me a pity that the work of the house was not so organized that we would not be rushed, with so many matters of importance, just before the long Easter adjournment. The present resolution is one preceding the granting of a supplementary estimate. I believe it is a time-honoured custom of the British parliament that before supply is granted, members shall receive all possible information.

There is another reason why we should receive information at this time. We are sometimes accused of not cooperating with the government and of retarding the work of the administration. I submit that it is becoming more and more difficult to get any reliable information from this government. If we want to know what the government is doing, we have to go either to the press room or to the Financial Post.

I will give the house a glaring example of the condition of which I complain. On March 12 I put on the order paper a number of questions; they remained on the order paper for some time and then were passed as an order for return. I do not know why that was necessary, because my understanding is that an order for return applies only when the information required has to be obtained from several departments, or possibly from branches of the same department in various parts of the dominion. I submit that all the information covering the questions asked by me was in the Department of Munitions and Supply. These were my questions:

1. How many corvettes have been ordered by the Department of Munitions and Supply from the 1st of September, 1939, to date?

2. How many have been launched by the various builders in the same period?

3. How many have been delivered to the government in the same period?

To these questions the following answer was returned:

1, 2 and 3. It is not in the public interest to give this information.

Question No. 4 was:

4. What is the average cost to the government of the corvettes delivered?

That question was answered:

4. $600,000.

The next question was:

5. How many shipyards are building corvettes for the government?

This question was answered.

6. What is the average cost of the corvettes completed to date for each yard?

The answer was:

Partly answered by 4. To give complete answer would disclose the location of the shipyards concerned which is not in the public interest.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Everybody knows where they are.

Mr. MacINNIS: That is just what I want to tell this house.

I have in my hand a copy of the Financial Post of December 6, 1941. In it there is a full-page article by Allan C. MacNeish, editor, Canadian Shipping and Marine Engineering News. All of the information I asked for and more is given in that article. But the point is this. This information is correct, and was given to the author by officials of the Department of Munitions and Supply or by the yards building the corvettes; or it is not correct, and it is giving information which the department and the government state it is not in the public interest to disclose. Therefore I maintain that the government should prosecute the editors of the Financial Post. The Financial Post has not been prosecuted.

Seeing this information in the newspaper, I wanted it brought up to date, and the reply I receive from the Department of Munitions and Supply is that it is not in the public interest to give the information. Yet the public had the information months ago. But when we ask the government for it, this is the answer we receive. Then the government asks hon. members to cooperate with it in expediting the passing of this estimate and other business.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask the hon. member whether he can vouch for the truth of the statement in the Financial Post?

Mr. MacINNIS: The minister has missed the point. If the statement is not true, the Financial Post should be prosecuted. Even if the statement is true, and if it is a matter which the government considers it is not in the public interest to disclose, the newspaper should be prosecuted. It is now held that it is not in the public interest that I should have it—and remember that, when a member of this house asks a question and the question is made an order for return, it is not the member who is refused this information, but this house, because when the return is tabled it becomes the property of parliament.

Mr. CRERAR: May I suggest that a newspaper report of the cost or of the number of corvettes built and where they are built does not carry the same sanction as a return brought down by the government.

Mr. MacINNIS: All right, then. I should like to ask who gave out this information.

Mr. CRERAR: The information may have developed in the imagination of the person who wrote the article.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then a person should not be allowed to give out information in that fashion. There are people in internment camps for saying far less than that—if this is government policy. Remember this is a responsible paper, and the author of the article is a responsible individual, the editor of Canadian Shipping and Marine Engineering News. It begins:

Most Canadians are landlubbers.

I believe the government thinks that most members of parliament are suckers, when it treats us like this. The article gives a history of the development of the shipbuilding industry since the war began. It states:

These sobering facts might lead to the conclusion that Canada's shipbuilding programme is nothing to write home about. But this impression would be even less correct than the quick optimism gleaned from first impressions. Actually, the Canadian programme is one of the biggest jobs the dominion has ever tackled.

And so on. I will give the house the figures given by this paper. The government can deny them, if they like. It begins: Of cargo ships, 4,700 and 9,300 tons, 153 were ordered. 7 launched and none delivered. The total estimated cost of these was $275,000,000, which works out at $200 per ton, or an average of $1,800,000 per ship. Where are the yards? Vancouver, North Vancouver, Victoria, Prince Rupert, Montreal, Lauzon, Lévis, Sorel, Saint John and Pictou.

Then we have corvettes—this is the information I wanted: Ordered, 135. It is not in the public interest that hon. members should have this information. Launched, seventy-seven; delivered, fifty; total cost, $81,000,000; cost per ship, $600,000. Where are the yards? Victoria, Vancouver, Collingwood, Midland, Kingston, Montreal, Sorel, Lauzon, Quebec. There are some others which may not be operating just at the moment. Everyone in Canada knows where corvettes are being built.

Now we come to mine-sweepers: Ordered, eighty-five, launched, fifty-nine; delivered, forty; total cost, $51,000,000; cost per ship, $600,000. The yards are at Port Arthur, Collingwood, Toronto, Kingston, Montreal, Sorel, Lauzon, Quebec, Sydney and Halifax. Information is given in the same way for destroyers and wooden vessels.

An hon. MEMBER: What was that date?

Mr. MacINNIS: The date of this paper is December 6, 1941. I fancy the only difference between the information quoted and the actual information in the Department of Munitions and Supply is that a few more corvettes have been delivered than is indicated here.

I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that such treatment of the members of this house is not good enough, and it is happening every day. It was only yesterday that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) said in reference to certain subsidies which are to be paid in connection with the importation of certain food products that he did not know whether he would tell the house who received those subsidies. If the house has any pride or independence left, its reply will be that these subsidies shall not be paid until the house decides that they shall be paid, because if this sort of thing is to be done we might as well go home, for we are of no further use here. We cannot protect the interests of the people who sent us here unless we have sufficient information on which to base our decisions; neither can we cooperate with the government because what we do will not be cooperation but merely acquiescence in what the government does. There is an immense difference between cooperating in the doing of something and acquiescing therein. I should like very much to assist the government, because I am intensely interested in furthering the country's war effort; but I certainly feel that I should be treated as a responsible member of this house. I do not believe the members are Quislings or fifth columnists or children or imbeciles that they should be treated in this fashion. What is the use of asking questions if we are to be given answers of this kind?

There are a number of other things to which I was going to refer while on my feet, but I do not wish at this stage to mix too many subjects. I simply wish to call this situation to your attention, Mr. Speaker, and to the attention of the hon. gentleman who is leading the government to-night, and I do so in the strongest possible terms.

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): Although wholeheartedly in favour of the billion dollar gift to Great Britain, I allowed my leader (Mr. Hanson) to speak for me and did not participate in that debate because I did not wish to feel that I was delaying the passage of the bill even by a moment, realizing the truth of the old Roman proverb that "he gives twice who gives quickly". Having listened to a number of speeches during that long debate, I have been forced to the conclusion that many members of this house have not even yet awakened to the full realization of the news that comes to us daily from all parts of the world. They seem still to believe that the horrors of war cannot touch us. I can best answer them by quoting some significant words of Sir Stafford Cripps:

> This war is not a game to be played according to certain rules; it is a life and death struggle for survival, and in that struggle there are and must be no partial interests. It is impossible to have regard to the interests of groups and classes and people still keeping in mind what their position is likely to be after the war, and at the same time to make our effort all-inclusive.

Yet we are dawdling along in this house as if we had all eternity before us, and in a few days we shall adjourn for three months' vacation—

An hon. MEMBER: Three weeks.

Mr. BRUCE: It might as well be three months. What have we done to deserve a holiday? One cannot help being forced to the conclusion that many of the speeches which were made on the two measures so far concluded would have been enormously curtailed if it were not for the opportunity given here to parties and groups to make parliament a sounding board to publicize their particular theories and ideas of government.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member is imputing to members of this house motives which he should not suggest. He said that if this house were not a sounding board for theories and policies, certain speeches would not have been made. The suggestion is that the motive was not to discuss the business of the country but to use the house for an entirely different purpose, and I request that the statement be withdrawn.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the remark were made in the general terms which the hon. gentleman states, I should not think he intended to make any imputation of improper motives to any members of the house.

Mr. BRUCE: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the 40-minute rule with regard to speeches be changed to 15 minutes, which would require that the speeches be more carefully prepared and condensed. In order to illustrate my point I should like to tell a story of a clergyman who was asked if he would give a 15-minute address on a particular occasion. He declined on the ground that he had not time to prepare it. When surprise and disappointment were expressed he said, "I should be glad to give you an address of 40 minutes, because I could speak discursively, but if I have to concentrate and crystallize my remarks into a 15-minute speech I have not time to prepare it." That, I think, is a very apt illustration of a good deal of what we have heard here.

I make the further suggestion, that for the duration of the war Hansard be abolished. This would have the effect of saving a good deal of time and money which could then be devoted to war purposes. We are facing the greatest crisis in our history; the issue soon to be settled is whether we are to be free or slaves. We are up against the greatest combination of superbly trained and magnificently equipped military forces that this world has ever seen, who continue to inflict upon us defeat after defeat. Let us not deceive ourselves, but admit the fact that up to the present we have lost every battle, and unless we make a total war effort by utilizing at once all our resources both physical and human, we shall lose the war in this year 1942.

When Sir Stafford Cripps, who should be better informed on the situation in Europe, than any other man, arrived in New Delhi yesterday he said, "There is no time to lose and no time for long discussions." The able representatives of the newspapers in Canada in the press gallery can be relied upon to sift the wheat from the chaff, and I am sure the reading public will not suffer as a consequence of what I propose.

The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe), speaking on the radio last night, revealed an alarming shortage of rubber, stating that when our present supply is exhausted there will be no more rubber available until the synthetic plants are built and able to produce, rubber. This, I understand, will take from one to two years. So it is quite obvious that our prospect of getting rubber in the near future is very remote. I wonder whether the government have done all that is possible to conserve our rubber supply. Have they taken an inventory of the tires in the hands of manufacturers and dealers throughout the country? Only two weeks ago I was told by a responsible citizen that he had been offered new tires for his car by a dealer who said that up to that time no inventory had been taken of his stock and therefore no one was in a position to check up as to what he did with his tires.

To be caught at this time with a shortage of rubber seems to indicate a lack of foresight on the part of those responsible for our war effort. I was told more than a year ago by a high official in the rubber industry in Canada that Japan was very likely to destroy our major sources of rubber. This man had this information; so surely some one connected with the Department of Munitions and Supply or with the war departments of the government would equally have had the opportunity of knowing what the situation was likely to be. Again "too little and too late".

The minister also announced last night that the speed limit would be reduced to forty miles an hour. Why not to thirty-five miles an hour? I know that investigators in the laboratories of some of the oil companies have proved that the most economical speed in regard to the use of gasoline and oil is thirty-five miles an hour, which was the speed limit in Ontario until a few years ago. I suggest that it be again reduced to thirty-five miles an hour to save gasoline and rubber tires.

I wish to express my approval of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) last evening that we send a token force to Australia. We fought side by side in the last war, and I think all hon. members will appreciate what a wonderfully stimulating and encouraging effect that would have upon our brothers down under. The force need not be large, a regiment or a brigade. It would be very much better for us to fight Japan in Australia than in Vancouver.

I feel that some comment should be made on the recent adoption by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) of the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South when the minister announced the appointment of officers to the supreme command on the west and east coasts of Canada. We are fighting Germany and Japan whose policy has been and is to require their senior officers to be trained in the three arms of the service—the navy, the air force and the army—before they are given a unified command. May I ask the Minister of National Defence what training the recently appointed commanders in chief on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts have had in the air force and the navy? We have had many indications that our enemies have adopted entirely new methods of warfare, which have been very successful, and if we are to have a chance of defeating them we also must adopt new methods. Is Canada adopting new methods similar to those to which I have referred? True, we have three ministers of defence; I think it is true also to say that the plebiscite bill recently passed was a defence measure—a defence of members of the government for their past performances. May we not learn from our enemies, who have introduced into this war entirely new tactics? Only to-day a Japanese general is reported on the radio to have said, "Defence methods will never lead to victory." I would add that Australia did not hesitate to place her military forces under the command of a man of experience and proven ability, even to the extent of going to the United States to secure such a man, when they obtained General MacArthur. Mr. Churchill did not hesitate to go to Australia to secure a man militarily and diplomatically capable of filling a position in the middle east, when he appointed Hon. Richard Casey of Australia to that important post, at the same time making him a member of the British war cabinet.

I have just one more suggestion to make, which I have saved till the last because, in my opinion, it is the most important of all. I am sure no one will gainsay the truth of my assertion when I say that we have in Canada to-day a man who has the knowledge and experience, and who stands out as the greatest leader this country has ever produced. I refer to Lieutenant-General A. L. McNaughton, whom I now suggest that the Prime Minister appoint as minister of war and deputy prime minister. It may be urged that he could not be spared from his position overseas, but I venture the opinion that after two years of effort and training and planning, someone else could now be found to carry on his duties over there. I am sure that this would go a long way toward satisfying and relieving the anxious and much perturbed Canadian people.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, in concluding his remarks last evening the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) sounded a very realistic note. While I do not agree with everything he said, I believe that his remarks in discussing many national problems should be carefully considered by every member of parliament. If there were other hon. members who felt disposed to follow along a similar line, I would hesitate to take the time of the house to say what I am going to say to-night.

The subject which I propose to discuss no doubt will appear to many hon. members as one which should be left until after the war is over. I refer to the housing of the Canadian people, particularly those in our defence area. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) made reference to the distinguished commander of the Canadian forces overseas. When General McNaughton was interviewed last fall by a delegation of Canadian editors and asked for a message which they could bring back to the Canadian people, which would convey to us the most urgent need of the moment, he is reported in an article written by Hugh Templin, which I believe appeared in most of the weekly newspapers of Ontario, as follows:

> Asked what is the most urgent need at present, General McNaughton replied: Put every emphasis on the production of weapons and equipment. We need technical improvements such as can be worked out under the direction of the national research institute and others who work under Mr. Howe. Then these improvements must be put into production quickly. . . .
> General McNaughton would not say how many should go into the army and how many into industry. We should survey our man-power first. We want no flash in the pan. We must plan for a war of long duration and not put all our goods in the show window now.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that the reverses have been many, and the thing that may impress many people at the moment as being most important may not necessarily be most important in the long run. I think that before Hitler will be defeated we must follow the suggestion of General McNaughton and prepare great quantities of the most modern equipment; and if that is to be done, the question I am now discussing becomes a matter of very great importance. Mr. Charles Abrams, in a recent copy of the New Republic, states:

> . . . housing cannot win the war, but it can lose it. The habitats of thousands are now boxcars, pews, jails. Defence workers, bidding against each other, have doubled room rents and brought back the three-shift hot-bed. Increased rents have wiped out wage rises. Employers complain of labour turnover, inefficiency, disaffection; health officers warn of epidemics. Lack of housing has upset the production time table. Our programme of defence housing has failed; our wartime housing programme is threatened.

If all the workers in industry could live in surroundings similar to those enjoyed by members of parliament in Ottawa, there would be no question of our production being affected by housing. But in order that hon. members might understand the problems facing the workers, I would suggest that for the next three months we live on a budget similar to that followed by workers in industry, and then set out in this or any other city in Canada to find suitable housing for our families. In the city of Ottawa a great deal has been said about the difficulties experienced by stenographers who come here; and reliable reports indicate that already we are facing a very serious turnover of labour in all the cities of Canada where our large industries are located, as a result of workers being unable to secure housing. During the last war in the United States they found that in key industries they had a labour turnover of from 100 to 1,000 per cent per annum, as a direct result of not being able to find houses for their people. In the production of munitions this year we shall spend at least a billion dollars; and for the sake of argument assume that we may have a wastage of 10 per cent as a direct result of workers not being able to find living quarters. Thus, in terms of dollars and cents you have a wastage of $100,000,000.

Let me illustrate the problem that arises. In the city of Hamilton, for example, we have many of our largest war industries. Men have gone to that city from all parts of the dominion. Recently I visited one of my constituents who moved there. He spent days and days trying to find a place for himself, his wife and his family to live, and at last in desperation he bought a house for which he paid a cash payment of $300 and arranged to pay the balance in monthly payments representing about twice what that house was actually worth in terms of rental. In all probability this man will be leaving Hamilton when the war is over; but if he had not been in a position to pay the amount I mentioned, I do not know what he would have done for housing accommodation. He happens to be a trained artisan; but had he been unable to find housing in Hamilton, and if he could have found in Guelph or Palmerston or Georgetown a place to live, so that his children could go to school, naturally he would have left the essential war industry if he could have found any sort of employment, even in a non-essential industry.

I realize that the government has given consideration to this question. A year ago it was so impressed with the matter that $10,000,000 was appropriated to set up Wartime Housing; and at a later date, when the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is in the house, I plan to say something about Wartime Housing projects. To-night, however, I make a special plea to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), before he writes finis to a very interesting chapter in housing in Canada, the national housing administration. Representations have been made to the Minister of Finance from many places in Canada appealing to him to have activities in connection with national housing continued for at least another year. I know the problem confronting the minister in finding money, spending it, and satisfying the many demands. It might seem to him that this is a place where economy might be effected, and that we might discontinue the building of cheap permanent houses until the war is over. But let me remind the house of the condition which prevailed in Canada at the commencement of the war.

Canada and the United States had two of the most unenviable records, as far as providing houses within the range limit of people receiving low incomes is concerned. No civilized country in the world waited as long as we did, before giving consideration to this national problem. We have said that this was a problem for the municipalities. The municipalities have replied, "We cannot cope with it; the provinces should assume the responsibility." The provinces, in turn, pass the buck to the dominion.

In the time at my disposal, I am unable to review the development in Canada since 1913, when the very first Canadian conference ever to be held in connection with town planning was assembled in Winnipeg. I have before me a table showing the building activities in eighteen of the most important countries in the world between the years 1929 and 1937. Canada is outstanding in this report in two respects. Taking 1929 as a base period of 100, our percentage dropped to a level lower than that of any of the other countries—namely to a point of 9·7 in 1933. It remained at the lowest level in 1937, when it stood at 24. Other countries, such as Great Britain, did not get below 114 in 1933 and 151 in 1937. In Great Britain they took the attitude, quite correctly, "Here is a field where the government should spend a large sum of money. Money invested by a government in providing low-priced housing is a good investment." They realized that workers who otherwise would be unemployed would in this way be engaged in using raw materials to build something of permanent value. The result is that in the United Kingdom they had a comparatively good record.

If we take 1932 as a base period at 100, we find that the figure for south Africa in 1937 was 582, or five times as much building in 1937 as there was at the depth of the depression. Unfortunately statistics are not available for a very wide area in Canada. As a matter of fact, Winnipeg is the only city in Canada that has prepared a careful annual report which gives any true picture of the prevailing situation. The last report from Winnipeg points out that during the last five years the total dwellings and suites provided was 1,886, while during the same period there were 18,322 marriages, or one dwelling or suite for approximately every ten marriages. Of course, many of the marriages are of people from outside the city; but if three-fourths of the marriages were of city people, the rate would be only one dwelling or suite provided for approximately every seven marriages.

The figures show that in 1941 Winnipeg had the most serious housing shortage in its history. There were only 111 vacancies, including suites and houses, as compared with 337 in the previous year and 704 in the year before that. In other words, the vacancies amounted to less than one per cent. Last week the mayor of Winnipeg appeared in Ottawa with other mayors to present the housing problem to the Minister of Finance. While here, he told me of some of the problems which arise in a city like Winnipeg. The wife of a man who is overseas had informed him she had been notified to vacate, and she had not the faintest idea where another house could be secured. He pointed out that this was very bad for the morale of our troops. It is not good to have married men in the forces learn that housing is not available for their dependents here, and that there will not be sufficient housing for them when the war is over.

I realize it is very important that our men and materials should be used in the production of those things which are most necessary. But we have in Canada a great many middle-aged men who have been associated with the building trades, and who will be in the ranks of the unemployed unless we continue our house building programme. I am referring to houses built under plans such as the national housing administration. Housing under Wartime Housing Limited is being carried on by large contractors, and the small contractor has not a chance to enter the picture at all. So, from the point of view of housing our people who are in war industries, and housing the relatives of our men in the forces, I suggest that the minister should give this problem very careful consideration before he dismisses it. I am sure it has been presented to him with great force by many delegations.

I do not approach the subject from the point of view of those real estate people who are concerned about the carrying on of a national housing activity from a purely personal point of view. I am thinking only in terms of a national problem. Again I must say that unless a maximum housing programme is carried on in Canada, we are going to have a very serious reduction in our production, and we shall have a whole host of social problems before the war is over, and after it.

I believe the national housing programme is one which might give the Minister of Finance a great measure of pride. I have in my hand pictures sent to me by the Quality Homes Corporation of Vancouver, showing homes which had been built in Vancouver under Wartime Housing Limited. As has been stated repeatedly, these houses are only temporary. Assurances have been given that they will be demolished when the war is over. Wartime Housing Limited have been able to satisfy public opinion that these houses will not interfere with the investments of the other property owners. The houses built in Greater Vancouver by Wartime Housing Limited are built at an average cost of $2,996.97 per house, without basement or furnace. In the same city permanent houses have been built with full-sized basements, containing furnaces. These houses are of permanent construction, and they are built at a cost of $2,500, or approximately $500 per house less than these flimsy wartime houses.

On motion of Mr. Nicholson the debate was adjourned.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, March 25, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

TAXATION

AGREEMENT WITH BRITISH COLUMBIA RESPECTING VACATION OF TAX FIELDS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I desire to lay on the table copy of the agreement between the dominion government and the government of British Columbia relating to vacation of tax fields.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Are printed copies available, or are they not to be distributed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, it was not intended that copies be distributed.

PRIVATE BILLS

PETITION OF SAGUENAY TRANSMISSION COMPANY, SAGUENAY ELECTRIC COMPANY, AND ALUMINUM POWER COMPANY

Mr. J. E. A. DUBUC (Chicoutimi) moved:

That the petition of the Saguenay Transmission Company, Limited, Saguenay Electric Company, and Aluminum Power Company, Limited, presented on the 24th instant; praying for the passing of an act to approve of the site and plans of their electrical transmission lines crossing certain navigable rivers, together with the report of the Clerk of Petitions thereon, be referred to the standing committee on standing orders to consider the suspension of standing orders 92 and 93 (3) (a) and (c) in relation thereto.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I cannot understand why special legislation is required for this application. We have a Navigable Waters Protection Act. It may be that a situation has arisen which is not covered by the act, but we ought to have some explanation by the mover as to why this legislation is required.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion is presented only in order to cover delays which have taken place in connection with the petition. It is purely a formal matter.

Motion agreed to.

ALBERTA NATURAL RESOURCES

AMENDMENT OF TRANSFER AGREEMENT RESPECTING ROYALTIES ON OIL PRODUCTION

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to amend the Alberta Natural Resources Acts.

He said: In 1929, by agreement between the federal government and the province of Alberta, the natural resources in that province were transferred to the Alberta government. At that time there were certain licences outstanding for oil rights and timber rights. These licences had been issued by the federal government, and of course the Alberta government accepted the responsibilities which attached to the licences. Under the terms of the transfer agreement it was held that their conditions could not be varied. In 1938 it was necessary to amend the transfer agreement to enable the Alberta government to put into effect certain conservation measures in respect of the oil development in the Turner valley. The present amendment to the transfer agreement also relates to oil produced in Alberta. The Alberta government have been desirous for some time to secure the power to vary the royalties which may be charged. Certain wells were capable of paying higher royalties than other wells, but the government was limited to similar treatment for all wells covered by dominion licence. The matter has been the subject of discussion between the provincial authorities and the majority of those interested in the oil industry, and the amendment to the transfer agreement which is here proposed is to give effect to certain understandings which have been reached between the provincial government and these oil interests.

[Mr. Dubuc.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister say that the matter referred to has been the subject of correspondence which could be laid on the table for the information of members of parliament?

Mr. CRERAR: I should be glad to bring down any correspondence which relates to the matter, but my recollection at the moment is that there is very little. I recall that over a year ago the matter was first broached to me by the minister of resources for the province of Alberta, and the suggestion was made then that, since certain oil interests were concerned, the provincial authorities should discuss the matter with them before we would be warranted in giving authority to vary the terms of the licences which had been issued. Subsequently that was done, and we were advised several weeks ago by representatives of the oil interests and by the province that they wished to have the agreement amended to give effect to certain understandings they had reached.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PRICE CEILING—POTATOES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Did the wartime prices and trade board release a statement to the newspapers regarding the establishing of a price ceiling on potatoes in which there was mention of speculative buying?

2. If so, what evidence is there of speculative buying?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes.

2. Potato price quotations collected by the wartime prices and trade board indicate that in many cases the spread between prices received by the grower and prices paid by the consumer widened appreciably in the period immediately prior to the application of the ceiling on potato prices. These facts were accepted by the board as evidence of speculative buying.

ESTEVAN-BIENFAIT LIGNITE COAL AREA—POWER

Mr. TRIPP:

In view of the increased demand for electrical energy for manufacturing purposes, will the government favourably consider developing a head of power in the Estevan, Bienfait lignite coal area?

Mr. HOWE: The federal government does not assume financial responsibility for developing power projects. However, the information is that the supply of power in the Moose Jaw-Regina area at the present exceeds the demand, and, until such time as this is taken up, it is unlikely that any additional power development will be undertaken in this area.

*SMALL MACHINE SHOPS IN WAR PRODUCTION

Mr. CASTLEDEN:

1. What steps have been taken to utilize the smaller machine shops throughout the dominion in war production?

2. How many of these shops capable of some war production are still not utilized in such work?

Mr. HOWE:

1. As a result of approximately 1,800 surveys of machine shops alone, every effort has been made and is being made to bring all of the machine shops in Canada into war production, consistent with the efficiency required to make as much war material as possible, as soon as possible.

We are still in the position, partly due to shortages in raw materials, of being able to select first those machine shops which can be used most efficiently. This efficiency depends upon:

(i) A combination of good management and skilled labour with machine tools which are in shape to do the precision work required in to-day's war machines;

(ii) Reasonable proximity to the prime contractor's plant, so that supervision of quality and deliveries can be maintained and a minimum of time lost in transportation;

(iii) A reasonably sound financial condition, which enables the shop to finance its expanded operations.

2. A considerable number, particularly those located at a long distance from a prime contractor. This condition may continue until the raw material shortage becomes less acute.

There is a substantial surplus of certain types of machine tools, and these are, generally speaking, of the types found in the smaller shops. The machine tools of which there is an acute shortage are of types found only in the larger shops.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION

Mr. HANSON (Skeena):

1. What was the cost of aids to navigation (lighthouse service) for 1941, (a) Atlantic coast, (b) Pacific coast, (c) inland?

2. What was the total cost?

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Cost of aids to navigation (lighthouse service), including operation of dominion steamers for same for the fiscal year 1940-41: (a) Atlantic coast, $1,143,962.10; (b) Pacific coast, $387,528.53; (c) Inland waters, $1,379,344.22.

2. Total cost, $2,910,834.85.

PRICE CEILING—FRUIT AND VEGETABLES

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Are any rebates or other payments in connection with price levels being paid to importers of orange juice, oranges, bananas, lettuce, and celery?

2. If so, what amounts have been paid to date?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Under the import policy of the wartime prices and trade board orange juice is eligible for subsidy, but oranges, bananas, lettuce and celery are not subject to the price ceiling and consequently do not qualify for subsidy.

2. None.

ANTI-TANK SHELLS

Mr. ROY:

1. Were any anti-tank shells No. 1, 1956, B.S., shipped as scrap from St. Paul l'Ermite or Sorel, in the province of Quebec?

2. If so, (a) for what reason was this ammunition rejected, (b) where was it manufactured, (c) was it made under contract, and by whom, (d) what was the quantity and total cost, (e) who is responsible for the defective nature of such ammunition?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.

2. Answered by 1.

*SHIPBUILDING

Mr. BLACK (Cumberland):

1. What is the number, the total tonnage and the estimated cost of all ships ordered built by the government of Canada or by any other government to be built in Canada of 100 tons capacity or more for commercial purposes, since September 10, 1939, in each of the following provinces, (1) Nova Scotia, (2) New Brunswick, (3) Prince Edward Island, (4) Quebec, (5) Ontario, (6) British Columbia?

2. What is the number and the total tonnage of all ships launched in each province to March 14, 1942?

Mr. HOWE: This question asks for total production in a certain line of war effort. I have no objection personally to giving the information, but we have been asked specifically by the British government, and an agreement has been entered into on the part of the British government, the United States government and the government of Canada, not to give total production figures of war materials. I notice that in the discussion last evening, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) raised the point, and I must say the same to him. He stated that figures were given in periodicals. We cannot help that.

Mr. MacINNIS: Where did they get the information?

Mr. HOWE: They can probably collect it from the shipyards. It is not hard to get. But publishing unofficial information is different from giving out official information; at least that is the view of the allied governments, and until the allied governments change their position in that regard I do not intend to give figures on total production.

*BARRAGE BALLOONS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has a committee been set up to arrange for barrage balloon protection for cities on Canada's coasts?

2. Have we any barrage balloons in Canada?

Mr. POWER: I would ask the hon. member to withdraw this question as not being in the public interest.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Would the minister give the information privately?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

GOVERNMENT FILM COMMISSIONER

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. What is the total amount that has been paid to John Grierson in salary, fees and/or allowances as government film commissioner?

2. What is the total amount of money that has been paid to John Grierson since he has been employed by the government in any capacity whatsoever, including travelling expenses?

1.

Fiscal year	Salary
1939-40	$ 1,987 10
1940-41	5,703 43
1941-42	6,899 99
Total	$14,590 52

No fees or allowances.

2.

Fiscal year	Fee	Salary	Travelling expenses
1938-39	$3,650	None	None
1939-40	None	$ 1,987 10	$ 612 34
1940-41	"	5,703 43	1,105 99
1941-42	"	6,899 99	5,948 58
	$3,650	$14,590 52	$7,666 91

Total amount paid—$25,907.43.

[Mr. Howe.]

*PRICES OF HOGS

Mr. SENN:

1. Did the dominion government take action at any time during 1941 to stabilize the price of hogs by means of bonus or subsidy?

2. If so, by how much per hog?

3. What was the total amount expended in this manner?

Mr. GARDINER:

1. Yes, through subsidizing the price of export bacon to bring hog prices in Canada more in line with a rising United States hog market and thereby retain hogs in Canada for processing and export to Great Britain.

2. By $2.50 per one hundred pounds of export bacon in three successive advances:

June 2 by 75 cents per 100 pounds
June 24 by 75 cents per 100 pounds
July 23 by $1 per 100 pounds.

3. $2,281,264.99.

*WESTERN WHEAT ACREAGE

Mr. PURDY:

What is the estimated percentage of wheat acreage under crop in 1941 in the three western provinces represented by self-contained farm units of 320 acres or less?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): On March 16 I tabled an answer to a similar question. At that time I said that information was not available at present in view of the fact that the compilation of agricultural statistics as taken in the 1941 census had not been sufficiently advanced to afford the information. On receipt of the second question, which asks for an estimate rather than a definite figure, I consulted the officials of the dominion bureau of statistics, and they advised me that any estimate they might give at the present time would be purely a guess. I regret I cannot give the information.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

COMMODITY PRICES STABILIZATION CORPORATION

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing—1. A list of the price ceiling subsidies issued, the estimated amount of same and on what articles, or in what trade and commerce.
2. A list of the members of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, a list of their chief officers, servants and agents, showing where they are located, the number thereof, together with their salaries and other allowances.
3. Estimated cost of one year of maintaining the ceiling prices staff herein, and the aggregate number of officials and total payroll.
4. The estimated cost per annum of the operation of this corporation.
5. The walks of business life that are not yet supervised or directed by any departments of state.
6. What training the members of this corporation and their chief officials have had in actual trade or commerce, or in a competitive business.
7. What minister of the crown is responsible to parliament for the work of this corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am willing to have this motion passed with the qualifications which I stated the other day; but if the hon. member would like to let it stand so that I can make a statement to the house as to the principles upon which information should be given or withheld regarding price ceiling subsidies, I am willing to take that course. The question of principle was raised last night sharply by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) to the effect that the amounts of these individual payments should be given to the House of Commons. Generally speaking, the objection I have to doing that is that the principles upon which subsidies are made public, and the giving of the amounts that are paid to individual companies, would give competitors a fairly precise knowledge of the volume and kind of business which their rivals were doing.

There may be other objections as well. Perhaps that is not a sufficient objection, but I should like to get my position formulated, whatever position is eventually adopted by the house, and give my reasons to the house, because this is a very important matter. These subsidies will be large in amount; they are virtually consumers' subsidies, and I do not want to take a course which will be at variance with the proper practice or in conflict with the rights of the House of Commons. On the other hand I certainly do not want to take a course which will prejudice the successful operation of this subsidy system. If the mover of this motion would like to have it go through with the qualifications and exceptions mentioned the other day, I am content. If on the other hand he would like to have it stand until I have opportunity of giving further consideration to the principles that should apply, and of making a statement of those principles to the house, I am content to have it stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would the minister be able to make his statement prior to the Easter recess?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Because this is now becoming a very important matter. We are even subsidizing the packers of Canada on the beef we eat in the restaurant, which is going pretty far. I think the public need this information. I should like to have it as soon as possible, because this thing is getting out of hand.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would point out that if this motion passes to-day without any qualification, the information will not be available until after the Easter recess.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But we would have a start on it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should like to give that a little consideration, because it is most important to get this on a proper basis.

Mr. CHURCH: May I suggest that I be allowed to see the minister and have the motion redrafted? I do not object to part 6 being struck out, but if the minister is going to make a statement I might have to discuss it with the minister and the leader of the opposition.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is agreeable to me.

Motion stands.

TRANSPORT OF GOODS IN BOND THROUGH CANADIAN TERRITORY

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports, resolutions, memoranda, or any other documents:

(1) Exchanged between the government of Ontario or any official thereof and any minister or official of the dominion government;

(2) Exchanged between the Minister of National Revenue, the Commissioner of Customs, the Minister of Transport, the Deputy Minister of Transport, the Minister of Munitions and Supply, the Deputy Minister of Munitions and Supply or any other official of these departments and the Railway Association of Canada, the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Canadian National Railways, the Michigan Central Railway, the Toronto-Hamilton and Buffalo Railway, the Wabash Railways or the Pere Marquette Railroad or any official of any of these companies;

(3) Exchanged between any minister or official of the government and any municipal council in the province of Ontario or official thereof with reference to any request of International Highway Forwarders Limited or any motor transport carriers in the United States for permission to operate any transport in bond between United States points through Canadian territory.

Mr. CRERAR: May I direct the attention of the hon. member to the wording of the motion? As I read it, parts 1 and 2 would cover almost everything that has happened. So far as part 2 is concerned, it does not relate to any particular matter, and the same is true of part 1. Part 3 is more specific. If the information asked for in parts 1 and 2 relates to the information asked for in part 3, then there is no objection to bringing it down. Perhaps that is what the hon. member had in mind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that would be satisfactory. The motion is rather badly drafted; I do not know who is responsible for it. I suggest that the interpretation which the minister seeks to place upon it is correct, and if the return could be brought down on that understanding it would be all right.

Mr. CRERAR: With that understanding there is no objection to its passing.

Motion as amended agreed to.

CANADIAN FORCES—SERVICE OUTSIDE CANADA—CASUALTY LISTS

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

For a return showing the names and addresses of all persons who were serving outside of Canada who have appeared on the casualty lists of (a) the army, (b) the navy, (c) the air force.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to ask my hon. friend if he will omit, unless it is important, the request for the addresses of the casualties. We have on the casualty lists the names and addresses of the next of kin, but to get the addresses of the casualties themselves we would have to go to the attestation papers, and there are about 2,000 of them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The order could be amended to read "names and addresses of the next of kin of all persons..."

Mr. RALSTON: That is quite all right.

Mr. POWER: I might point out to produce this information would take a very long time. I should like to know if any useful purpose is to be served.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think so.

Mr. POWER: Frankly I doubt it so far as the air force is concerned. If the house passes the order I will have to obey it, but I shall do it with considerable reluctance.

Motion as amended agreed to.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the insurance of property against war risk and for the payment of compensation for war damage out of a special account of the consolidated revenue fund, and to provide further in connection therewith for the employment of such officers, clerks and other employees and agents necessary for the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): This is one of the matters which the minister informed me he would like to have advanced a stage. I assume nothing further will be done in regard to it until after the Easter recess. But it might be of some interest, having regard to questions asked across the floor, if the minister could make any statement concerning it before the Easter recess.

Mr. ILSLEY: If I can get to the stage at which I can introduce the bill I will introduce it, but if I cannot, then I shall have to make a statement either in this house or afterwards, depending upon the time that I can get.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): I suggest to the minister that it is desirable that this bill be introduced before the recess. I happen to know that in certain circumstances people are reluctant to ship essential war goods to either coast for export overseas when they cannot obtain war risk insurance. There are people on both coasts, in Halifax and Vancouver, who are vitally interested in a measure of this kind.

Motion agreed to.

POSTAL SERVICE

FREE POSTAGE ON LETTERS FROM SOLDIERS—MONTREAL-QUEBEC AIR MAIL SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. P. MULOCK (Postmaster General): I should like to advise hon. members that steps are being taken to facilitate the exchange of correspondence between soldiers and their homes in Canada at all times. Letters from Canadian troops in England and Newfoundland have been accepted free of postage for some time past, and arrangements have now been completed under which letters posted in Jamaica by Canadian troops stationed there will pass free of postage to their homes in Canada. This concession takes effect on April 1 next.

The regular Jamaican postage will be required on all other items.

I should also like to say to the house, in response to numerous questions that have been asked in regard to the establishment of air mail service between Montreal and Quebec, that the business value of an air mail service between these cities has been carefully investigated, and in the light of the facts disclosed steps are being taken to inaugurate a regular daily-except-Sunday air mail schedule between these two important points on or about April 15 next. The proposed schedule of service will link the city of Quebec with main line air services at Montreal, operating to and from maritime provinces, the Canadian west, and all points in the United States. The postal advantages of this service should prove to be of definite value, especially at this time when speed in the transmission of the written word is of such great importance.

Mr. GILLIS: Is the Postmaster General's department still considering the extension of the air mail service to Cape Breton island?

Mr. MULOCK: The hon. member's representations will be carefully considered. That is a matter of policy about which no doubt the house will be advised in due course.

Mr. GILLIS: It was definitely promised a year ago.

WAR APPROPRIATION

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Ilsley that the house go into committee to consider a resolution to provide that sums not exceeding $135,000,000 be granted to his majesty for national defence and security.

Mr. A. M. NICHOLSON (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, before eleven o'clock last evening I was discussing a question which would have been left until after the Easter recess had it not been for the fact that unless something is done immediately in this connection the effect upon our production programme will be very serious indeed. I am referring, of course, to the question of wartime housing. Hon. members no doubt are aware of the fact that during the past year we have had two departments engaged in trying to provide more adequate housing in key centres in Canada. I refer to the activities of the national housing administration and to Wartime Housing Limited.

Last year I expressed the opinion that the entire programme of providing housing in war time should have been administered by the government owned and controlled agency, the national housing administration. The government, however, decided otherwise; and a number of dollar a year men were entrusted with the responsibility of administering Wartime Housing Limited. I do not plan to discuss their activities at this time, but after careful consideration and comparison of costs it would appear to me that we are getting permanent construction under national housing for less than we are getting temporary housing under Wartime Housing Limited. Last night I referred to a return which was tabled some time ago, giving the cost of war-time houses built in North Vancouver. It showed a striking discrepancy between the costs of war-time houses and those built under natonal housing in that city. I have before me a return brought down on February 3 of this year, giving the average costs of these temporary houses in various cities, as follows:

Fort William	$2,860
Halifax	3,742
Hamilton	2,818
Welland	2,886
Peterborough	3,018
Wrightville	3,379

Let me remind hon. members that these houses are of temporary construction, without basements and without furnaces. The fuel is stored in a box, attached to the back of the house, capable of holding half a ton of coal. Some of the occupants of these houses in Hamilton spoke of the difficulties they experienced in securing fuel deliveries, since the box has to be empty before half a ton of coal can be put in, and there is an extra charge of fifty cents for making these small deliveries. In view of the fact that permanent houses have been built in many of these centres at much lower cost it does seem to me that it would be a great mistake to terminate the activities of the national housing administration. I understand that since the commencement of the war that agency has assisted in the construction of over 12,854 houses, at a cost to the treasury of Canada of approximately $9,700,000. I should like hon. members to remember these figures. According to the information given by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, we are committed to a spending programme of over $20,000,000 for something like six thousand houses, under the wartime housing programme. I know the answer will be given that these houses have to be built in a hurry, and that necessarily the cost is higher.

Mr. HOWE: Just to keep the record straight, I should say the fact that they are built in a hurry has nothing to do with it, but I would point out that under the housing act the services are furnished by the city, and a tax is put on the property to cover the cost of those services. On the other hand Wartime Housing build their own services, the cost of which is distributed among the houses, and there is no tax against the buildings of Wartime Housing.

Mr. NICHOLSON: I am aware of that, but still it does not explain the cost of $3,379 for houses of this type across the river in Hull. I would urge hon. members to go and see those houses, and then draw their own conclusions as to whether or not the taxpayers of Canada have received good value for the money that has been spent. What the minister says is true with regard to arrangements under the national housing administration; but in Canada there are a great many cities which would be quite prepared to encourage the administration to undertake a building programme. Of course it must be remembered also that the figures I gave represented only the government's investment, not the total cost of those houses. The average cost of the permanent houses is given as $3,250. I think hon. members will agree that if permanent houses can be built for anything like the cost of the temporary houses, we should encourage the construction of permanent dwellings as far as possible at this time.

I realize that the whole question of supplies must be taken into consideration. It is quite conceivable that we may have to use very different methods of construction; that we may have to abandon the installation of bath tubs, and that houses may not be wired for electricity if the shortage of copper becomes more acute. We might even be required to get along without central heating. But I submit that the government should take into consideration the raw materials and manpower that will be available for the construction of permanent houses, so that the promise given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) some time ago that we are not going to be governed by dollars and cents but that whatever is physically possible will be made financially possible, may be implemented. That policy should be carried out in connection with housing. It will be a great calamity if the national housing administration is compelled to fold up, with the personnel obliged to go into private industry or leave the country, so that the only building activity will be carried on by Wartime Housing Limited.

I should like to remind hon. members that it is estimated that ninety per cent of the 12,000 houses which have been built since the beginning of the war by the national housing administration have been constructed in centres where we consider there is a definite war-time housing shortage. According to the order in council which was passed when Wartime Housing was established, the places in which construction should be carried on were centres where the production of munitions of war and supplies, or defence projects, would be affected by the lack of housing. There are a great many places in Canada where training centres and military establishments are located to which men of the armed forces bring their families, and if it is physically possible we should be prepared to provide them with housing accommodation. I make this final plea to the government that it give the most careful consideration to providing an appropriation for national housing and that national housing be given consideration in the matter of priorities. It would be unfortunate if all the bathtubs, heating appliances and wiring were directed exclusively into wartime housing so that the national housing administration would find it impossible to carry on. I hope the government will give careful consideration to the argument I have presented, so that our munitions production may not be seriously handicapped in the months to come because of adequate housing not being available.

Mr. J. G. DIEFENBAKER (Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate until the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) last evening brought out a circumstance which, I think, demands reiteration of the rights of parliament. Some time ago an address was delivered in this house by the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Moore) in reference to the like matter, in which he stressed the situation to-day prevailing in the parliament generally speaking, indicated the trend away from democratic practices. I find it hard to understand why so important a measure as the war appropriation should have been delayed in being brought down to the house until a day or so before the Easter recess. This is not the first time this has occurred. This is one measure that gives us as members an opportunity of placing our viewpoint before the house and the country and of obtaining information with regard to the position of our war effort. I cannot understand why a measure such as this should not have been introduced earlier in the session. Various explanations may be given, but the fact remains that in the last two or three days before the Easter recess we are asked to deal with an expenditure of many millions of dollars and to vote supply to enable the government to continue during the period of the Easter recess.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman would permit a question, does he think we should have deferred the discussion on the address and the discussion on the plebiscite until after this discussion was completed?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; but it should have been run on a different basis.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: What I do think is this, that it is strange that each year and each session millions and millions of dollars of estimates are brought before the house toward the very end of the session without giving the members an opportunity to debate or consider them fully.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is not the end of the session.

Mr. DIEFENBAKER: The same thing happens year after year. That course may have been all right during the routine days of peace; but my submission is that with a war on—I reiterate what I have said before—committees of the private members of this house should be set up along the lines of the committees which the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) is having set up at the present time, to enable members to recommend to the government the cutting down of unnecessary expenditures because, Mr. Speaker, the thing the government should do to-day—and it would thereby secure the unanimous support of the country is to reduce non-war expenditures to the limit.

Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, speaking in the city of Montreal, outlined the position of Canada to-day and emphasized the necessity for action. He stressed the terrible urgency of the situation to-day and said:

> Selfish or private interests must be ruled out completely. The competitive system must go, to be replaced with one which is based entirely upon the criterion of maximum production, with the most efficient use of labour, machinery and materials to operate steadily without cease except for necessary rest or maintenance.

Then he used these words:

> Regimentation and more regimentation was coming for Canada, he continued, but "let us develop it without the ugly meaning which it has been given in gestapo land and by the Japanese imitators."

He points out that regimentation is coming in ever-increasing measure. I realize, as all of us must, that during a period of war it is necessary that the freedoms, which are ordinarily accepted as inherent in democracy be controlled in the greater interest of the safety of the state—the freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of association and the like. As Lord Baldwin said:

> The price of liberty is eternal vigilance, eternal knowledge, eternal sympathy and eternal understanding.

In Great Britain the rights of parliament have been restricted as have the rights of individuals, the rights of the whole people throughout the nation; but, Mr. Speaker, they are doing it with the consent and under the control of parliament, and wherever there is an invasion of the rights normally enjoyed by the citizens of Great Britain the matter first comes before parliament and is debated. I point this out because the hon. member for Vancouver East last evening in his address showed that information, whatever its source may be, which is not being furnished to parliament, is being or has been furnished to private corporations. That is a flouting of the rights of the members of this house, but it is what has been going on in ever-increasing measure ever since the war began. I point out first the fact that until recently it was impossible for the members of any party other than the government party to go on the national radio network; yet day after day members of the government and members of its various boards are making speeches, many of them tinged by political considerations. It is through the instrumentality of the radio—and it is at least one of the main methods—that public opinion can be created to-day. The other method is through the press, and the government is trying to control the press. Prosecutions are taking place from time to time; and while up to date none of them has been successful, the fact remains that the taking of the prosecution, unjustified though it was proven subsequently by the finding of the court, has a tendency to restrict the freedom of the press.

I am not going into any detail, but I would point out the tendency on the part of this government to do that which has been condemned by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) over a period of years. I refer to the almost universal ruling by decree, by order in council. This has been so to such an extent that in May, 1941, the Prime Minister stated that statutes had been changed or suspended in their operations since the outbreak of the war, but that the government had no record of the statutes that had been so changed. So general has this trend become that statutes passed by this parliament, such as the War Exchange Conservation Act and the excess profits tax, now allow the governor in council to discriminate in favour of one individual as against another. In other words, the rule of law that provides for equality before the law and allows each and every citizen of this country an opportunity to take his case to establish that equality before the courts is denied, when in statutes we allow the government to suspend or amend them by order in council.

If we as a parliament continue to receive the answers that we have received during the last few days—this practice is ever-widening in its scope—we shall find ourselves, unless we protest, where the government will proceed to say to us, regardless of what the matter is which we ask about, that it is not in the public interest that information should be given. If our right to secure information is denied, we are meeting here as a parliament for one purpose only, to vote supply. Other than that there would be very little justification for our being here. Everything that we pass by way of law could be passed by the instrumentality of orders in council, and even the few bills that do come before parliament appear to be merely fillers in between votes of supply and supply.

From time to time the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) has replied to questions about production in a way that I suggest is not considerate of the rights of parliament. It would appear that the answers were prepared by a bureaucracy, by the rule of desk, instead of by a responsible minister answerable to parliament. On February 6 I asked how many licences had been granted for the erection of buildings other than those required for war industry since construction control had been adopted. In other words, I wanted to find out whether, during a time when all materials were required for war purposes, certain materials were being allocated for civilian or domestic purposes. The answer I received is a revelation of the attitude of certain bureaucrats to this parliament, the representatives of the people. The answer was as follows:

> There have been issued up to February 5, 1942, a total of 3,150 licences for the erection of buildings. Records covering these do not differentiate between war and non-war industries. A clear line of demarcation is not possible.

That means one of two things. Either the answer is evasive to conceal that permits are being given for non-essential purposes, or permits are being issued by the board in charge without regard to whether or not they are for war purposes.

I would direct attention to the answer given to-day by the Minister of Munitions and Supply to the effect that the British government does not want information given out. I realize that in connection with particulars of quantities and details of that kind, it might be dangerous to give out information—not one of us wants any such information. In a recent speech the minister said that we now can equip a division in six weeks, but when we want to cross-examine him and find out the production in order to ascertain whether that is a statement of fact or merely a statement to make us all feel good, we receive the answer that it would not be in the public interest to give the information.

True, it would not be in the public interest to give out information that might be helpful to the enemy, but I think that is an excuse which is being used by this government to an ever-increasing extent as a latch-key to shut the door against information. That is the attitude they are taking. We want information; we want particulars. If the particulars and information cannot be given to us in the house, then let it be given in a secret session. We are asked to look into the expenditures of millions of dollars, and yet no information is given to us except in general terms. We are asked to vote millions and billions of dollars when we realize, as do the people of Canada, that it is not expenditures of themselves that will preserve freedom; it is the result that follows that will achieve its preservation.

What is being done with the money? Only a few short months ago the system that was followed previously of issuing monthly lists of contracts awarded was done away with. To-day no member of this house, unless he is a member of the government, has any idea of what contracts have been let since the issue of this information was discontinued. What expenditures have been made? Who have been the recipients of contracts in the different provinces? All we know is that money has been spent and no information has been given as to the nature and the particulars thereof or the results. The people are willing to sacrifice, but they want to know what use is being made of the money being expended.

Within the last few days a number of articles have appeared in the western press by Mr. Dexter, one of which was referred to the other evening by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green). In one of these articles Mr. Dexter discussed the whole production situation. We have had no information on this. No information is being brought before parliament. No information is being made available to parliament. This series of articles points out that we have not yet achieved all-out production in Canada, that we have not to-day a nearly all-out production. All we have in fact is promises of future action, of what will happen in 1943. This parliament representing the people of Canada is concerned with what is going to happen in 1942 and have the right to know the present position.

I think we have a right to know where we are going and what is the plan in reference to production. Can time run forever in our favour? The record in the far east in the last four or five months has been terrible in its implications. Defeats, glorious defeats; retreats, glorious retreats, all because of the fact that there has been a need, not of manpower with courage but of sufficient manpower; a need, not of proper machinery but of sufficient amounts of proper machinery.

To-day in this country there should be a stop to the construction of buildings for civilian purposes. It is not being stopped: the answer to which I referred a while ago shows this. Is it not about time that the increase of man-power in industry due to enlarged demands for civilian requirements should be restricted? Since the beginning of this war there has been an additional employment of one million men, of whom the increased demand for consumer goods accounts for 339,000. Why has this flow of consumer goods production not been stopped? The people are willing to accept a reduced standard of living; yet to-day we have more men producing goods for civilian and domestic uses than in 1939, and I would point out that one of the orders in council which the Prime Minister placed before parliament yesterday starts with the admission that there is a shortage of man-power in the country for war and industrial purposes. I shall allude to that again in a moment. In the meanwhile let us see what this increased employment has, in large measure, done. Here are the comparative index figures showing the increases:

Trade	September, 1939	December, 1941
Furniture	84·2	118·4
Musical instruments	59·9	86·1
Beverages	181·8	235·2
Heating appliances	135·1	163·8
Street railways and cartage	130·6	149·5
Hotels and restaurants	151·7	162·7
Retail trade	139·0	177·8
Wholesale trade	124·1	138·5

There must be a reduction in civilian demand, and the services of many men who to-day are engaged in industries of this kind must be diverted to war purposes.

I suggested a while ago that we reduce this year to the very limit both public and domestic expenditures for the ordinary ways of life. It can be done. Place our estimates before members of this parliament who are business men; give them the authority of the government to pare down and reduce, and they will do it. I notice that Saskatchewan, which in this respect is no different from any other province, is expending to-day several million dollars more than ever before in its history, and twice the amount expended twelve years ago, although it has no relief bill to speak of. To-day too many of us are trying to take advantage of the war situation to ask the government for this and that. I suggest that a message be given by the Prime Minister to the people of Canada, who are willing to listen to it, to desist from being what I choose to call "gimmes" until the war is over: "'Gimme' appropriations for my province or my city or my constituency, for industry; 'gimme' patronage, 'gimme' shorter hours, higher profits, more business, and higher prices." Away with that for the period of the war. Once you have established, as regards agriculture as with all other war industries, a fair and reasonable return, that can be done.

We remember what happened two years ago, prior to the fall of France. We little thought then what would occur in the next two or three months. "France had her 'gimmes' then. They were fighting among themselves; they were asking for appropriations; they were doing all the things which we are doing all over this dominion to-day. They did it until the French army was forced to retreat toward Paris. Then, everybody got to work on production. But the determination to work and to do was too late. To-day France has her 'gimmes' too, but the 'gimme' to-day is not the 'gimme' of two years ago. To-day it is 'gimme' my lost liberty; 'gimme' even death rather than what I am passing through."

The challenge comes to us to-day. It is a challenge to this parliament, the institution in which resides the hope, the aspiration and the determination of the Canadian people. I speak without sentimentalism; I sincerely believe what I say. The Canadian people are asking us to give them that leadership without which they can do nothing; they want us to do our part regardless of any lesser considerations.

Last week I had the honour to be one of a party which went to Hamilton, upon the invitation of the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Ross). We had an opportunity of seeing something of the munitions factories, those great industries which have sprung up or been greatly enlarged during the past two years. Having been there a year ago to a day, I could realize something of the development which has taken place there, as I did in certain other industrial centres which I have had an opportunity of visiting recently. But I would be remiss in my duty as a member if I did not say that, while great advances have been made, they are far below what they should be having regard to the fact that almost two years have gone since their establishment.

I believe that a committee of this parliament should be set up to look into production. There are among our members manufacturers and business men who would willingly serve on a committee which was empowered to look into the whole situation, go to the root of to-day's problems, and offer solutions or suggestions. I believe that the Minister of Munitions and Supply has done a very great work, but he has not been able to coordinate all the various production agencies under his control. It is too large a job for a man to come before parliament as a minister and at the same time put into effect a complete organization and correlation of the war industry of this dominion. The time has come when this government, instead of having different heads of the various departments of munitions production, should appoint one supreme head, a czar if you will, a man who will be able to coordinate production.

I have in mind production in one particular line, wherein I think the people should know what the turn-out is and what deliveries overseas have been. I realize, however, that to furnish that information by making a statement in parliament might be of service to the enemy. The people do not believe the government in everything it says. The government issues statements that all is well, everything is fine, no major mistakes are being made—only one minister has ever risen in his place in this chamber and admitted a mistake—and the people, looking at the situation in the east, realizing that Japan is at our gates in the west and that submarines are attacking on the east coast, are asking whether the information they have received has been unreal. These things were believed to be impossible a few months ago. The time has come for the Prime Minister, with the tremendous influence and prestige which his position commands, and which his service in public life demands, to tell the people of Canada the true story, what it is we have to face, what sacrifices have to be made, in a particular way and not by generalizations promising total war—often generalizations with regard to future action.

In the United States a committee of the senate was set up one year ago. The other place, so far as parliament is concerned, is not being used. Many of these problems could be submitted to that house and an opportunity given to the people of Canada to take advantage of their experience, business acumen and ability. The United States' senate set up a committee for the purpose of looking into the whole position of production. They were not satisfied that everything was being done. They had been told the same stories that we in Canada had been told. The committee set up was not partisan; it was composed of Democrats and Republicans, and I believe there was a farm labour representative and functioned under the chairmanship of Senator Truman. It met off and on for the period of a year, and its recommendations changed the picture in regard to production in the United States. It placed the United States in the position where the United States is producing 2,000 war planes a month, a little less than the axis is producing to-day.

The same committee brought out the fact, in regard to production of certain lines, that though there were potential possibilities in the united nations of a three to one advantage over the axis nations, that is not so to-day; to-day the percentage is the other way about. The advantage is a potential situation. For this reason that committee considered whether it could mobilize the industry of the United States. It found, first, that too many civilian requirements were being manufactured at the present time. The report pointed out that in 1941 the automobile output was higher than in any year except 1929. Second, it found that the production programme was behind schedule because of departmental red tape and lack of organization, and they recommended that the dollar-a-year men should be given an opportunity to dissociate themselves from the industries from which they had been loaned. It was pointed out that in the United States there were 255 dollar-a-year men and 631 who worked without compensation. That committee, composed of business men, came to the conclusion that dollar-a-year men from industry, however patriotic and desirous to serve they might be, might be considered still to have the business point of view of the organizations to which they originally belonged. It showed that comparing the war effort of the United States now to the last war effort was aimless and purposeless. I believe the fact to be that the expenditure of $22 to-day gets the same results as the expendture of $1 in the great war.

There was one piece of information which I do not think has ever been given to this parliament. I will ask the minister to tell me whether it is true that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the United States advanced $50,000,000 to the aluminum industry in Canada in order to permit of the development of that industry here, repayment of the amount to be made as deliveries occur. That is what the United States News of December 5, 1941 says—that there was that advance given the Canadian aluminum industry in order to build up the necessary industry in this dominion.

It was found, too, that as late as January, 1942, 75 per cent of the industry of the United States was still producing civilian needs, 50 per cent in Great Britain and 40 per cent in Germany. The committee pointed out that there was only one way in which there could be a reduction in civilian demand and that was for the government to act promptly and ruthlessly and place in charge a man who had power to act regardless of any influences or any consideration.

I have already suggested that we should set up a committee with powers similar to those of the United States committee, not for the purpose of criticizing the government—I think the government is too prone to think that every suggestion from this side of the house is made from political motives, but to help in the war effort. I offer that suggestion to the government, but I say this: Do not set up a committee like the war expenditures committee which is overloaded with government members. Give the opposition equality. Set up a committee reasonably equal, the chairman and vice-chairman from the government, to assure a majority, and let the proceedings be in the open. As far as the war expenditures committee is concerned, while I was not here all summer, I know of the results achieved. We sat on that committee and everyone was desirous of doing something; but measured in actual performance, if honestly admitted, we did little or nothing—and I am rather overstating the case when I say "little". The committee met behind closed doors. The information that was given to us should, I submit, be known to the people of Canada. There was no question of production or of details of that kind. If you want to ensure honest production on the part of all in production in Canada, you must have them realize—certainly some of them—that what they do is subject to investigation by parliament, or subject to being brought to the light of day.

When that committee is set up again—and I am speaking only for myself—I would say if it is going into details in regard to contracts, it should be open to the public, so that the information shall become public, for what information we did get is hidden and concealed. Such a committee could do a great deal of work. It cannot perform an impossible task. There are those who say that if we set up that committee we should be able to investigate all contracts. My answer is that no private member of the house knows what contracts have been awarded since August; but we do know that if the committee dealt only with current contracts that were being awarded when we were sitting, 1,500 a week, we would have been able to devote only eight seconds to each contract—and there were eighteen or nineteen lawyers out of twenty-three members of the committee. I need say no more as to the possibility of investigating all contracts.

I pass on to one other matter before I conclude, and will make a passing reference to the orders in council that were tabled yesterday regarding man-power. It should be noted that what opposition members have been saying for the last year is now admitted by the government, in the very first paragraph of P.C. 2250:

Whereas the Minister of National War Services and the Acting Minister of Labour report that there is a growing scarcity of men available for service in His Majesty's armed forces and for the employment in the war industries. . . .

All that these orders in council do is to set up a scheme for service in Canada, far removed from the sanguine hopes expressed by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) or by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) in the advance statements that both of them made. Why was the raising of the age limit stopped at thirty? With the threat by the Japanese to the Aleutian islands, only seven hundred miles from their nearest naval base, why the thirty-year age limit when there is an admitted shortage of men to-day?

I suggest that the men who have already been called up and medically examined and rejected should be rechecked. I realize that there may be some cases where advantage was taken by a prospective recruit of the opportunity of the examination by the physician of his choice—they were very few in number—who granted a lower category than the person properly belonged in. I mention Saskatchewan in that connection, and according to a member of the board there, there were three rechecks, and in one it was found that out of nineteen turned down seven, on recheck, passed as A-1.

The whole foundation of these orders in council seems to be based on what has been found insufficient in the United States, namely that only the age limits should be chosen in which men could be expected to continue in military service for ten years. The United States started off in that way, taking only the highest physical class, and those who normally could be expected to continue in service for ten years. But to-day it has been found necessary to extend the age limits. If we are to have men in Canada for Canadian defence, why not train more than those of ages up to thirty? Even all of them are not subject to call, because the choice is going to be made by lot. It strikes me as passing strange that, facing the spring offensive of 1942, the government is not able to tell us what scheme it has for choosing the men who will be taken into the non-active force. In the rehabilitation of those men who have been turned down, the government is taking a step in the right direction, but that rehabilitation should cover not only those who might be made A-1 by slight operations and the like, but also those other men of B, C or D categories who might be used in Canada for home defence.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Yesterday as the house was debating the resolution to appoint a committee to deal with matters of reconstruction and reestablishment that may arise at the close of the present war, I debated in my own mind whether or not, for a reason that seemed to me a most important one, I should intervene in that discussion. I did not intervene because I was anxious to see the committee appointed; I was also anxious that no one should have reason to feel I was in any way unsympathetic with the purpose for which it was being appointed. I doubt if too much thought and study can be given to questions of reconstruction as they are likely to arise at the close of the war. But in thinking the matter over I have since regretted that I did not say a word at the time, because of a possible false emphasis that might be given in the public mind from the discussion which took place in the house and from the fact that the resolution was presented from the government side of the house. It is just conceivable that a large part of the public, reading that the House of Commons has appointed a committee to deal with post-war reconstruction, may gather the impression that the government has in its possession information which would lead it to assume that the war may terminate at an early date and that we should be prepared immediately to deal with questions of reconstruction.

One of the reasons why I rise to-day is to say that I would wish emphatically to dispel any possible impression of that kind. One does not like to dwell unduly upon the seriousness of the existing situation, or unnecessarily to alarm the country; but I think it is only right that the people of Canada should understand that at no time since the commencement of the war was the international situation as serious for the free countries of the world at it is at present. Far from seeing ahead a moment at which it may be expected that the war will terminate, I must confess that I am unable to see any time that could be specifically mentioned, and that it would be little short of a miracle if the war were to terminate within what some would describe as a short time. One has only to face the facts as they are known and try to realize their significance to see what a tremendous and terrible course this world will have to run before anything in the nature of reconstruction of an order even such as existed in the past is going to be possible for any country or any group of countries to undertake.

When the war started there was a Europe composed of free nations. To-day the whole of Europe practically has ceased to be free and lies prostrate at the feet of the conqueror, whose country occupies a large part of central Europe. There was at the commencement of this war a great French empire; to-day there is no France that can call itself its own, and the French empire, as such, has virtually disappeared. So far as it exists, it exists in large part to carry out the wishes of Germany in different parts of the world.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And yet we have the Vichy ambassador here.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Well, I will give my friend an answer in regard to that later. When the war commenced all the strategy of the war was planned on the understanding and belief that the close alliance then existing between France and Britain would be maintained throughout. The dispositions of armed forces and of naval forces were made in accordance with a plan of joint cooperation. France being defeated at an early stage of the war has altered all that situation, and altered it very, very much for the worse.

Not only has France ceased to be an ally, but as I have pointed out her possessions in other parts of the world have come to serve the purposes of the enemy rather than the purposes which they would have served under the alliance between those two countries. Indeed, as I have said, there has virtually ceased to be a French empire. There was also at the beginning of the war another empire of considerable importance and significance, the empire which Holland had in the far east. That Dutch empire has been overrun. The Netherlands themselves are overrun by the enemy and their possessions have been taken from them. The United States had its possessions in the far east, and in part those possessions have become the possessions of the enemy. The British empire existed in part as an empire in the far east. To-day part of that empire has been taken by the enemy while other parts of it are threatened as they have never been threatened before. In Africa, where there were large and important French possessions, Britain at the commencement of the war had hoped and expected to find the bases from which operations might take place which would serve effectively to meet any enemy whose forces had to be met on the Atlantic ocean or on the African mainland. There again the enemy has possession in large measure to-day, and one cannot say what the outcome of subsequent conflicts may be. No one can say what the word may be twenty-four hours hence of the increasing gravity of the situation in any part of the world. It is known that Britain has had to move many of her forces from one part of the empire to other parts of the empire and of the world in order to meet the situations that exist there. All along the way there has been to some extent a thinning of the defence forces of the vast British empire.

I mention and bring together these facts, just in the way one would gather them from the press of the day, in order to illustrate how wrong it would be that anyone should get the impression that the government, or this parliament, has in mind the possibility of an early termination of this war. The war has to be won before there can be any thought of reconstruction; and if the winning of the war is to include, as we hope it must, the restoration of freedom to those parts of the world from which freedom has been taken away by aggressor nations, there is yet a vast task that lies ahead of the free nations of the world.

I stress this because I should like to remove altogether any impression that in constituting a committee of this house to study the problems of reconstruction, the government or anyone on this side of the house—or for that matter I hope I may say anyone in this House of Commons—entertains the illusion that at the present time we are anywhere within sight of the termination of the present war, or by any means certain as to its course, at least for the immediate present. I have not any doubt that if this year goes by successfully, as I believe it will, with the increased production of munitions and the increased power that will be brought together from the different united nations, ultimately the free nations will triumph. I believe they will; but before that moment is reached there is going to be a vastly different world from what we have ever known in the past, and, I believe, a world even vastly different from the world as we know it at the moment. That being the case I hope no impression will exist anywhere, either in this house or in this country, that the government entertains other than the most serious views of the very critical situation that exists in the world to-day.

I had another reason for rising this afternoon, Mr. Speaker. The night before last, when the present resolution was introduced, my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) said that he thought the ministry should make some statement with respect to its war policy, particularly in relation to the territorial defence of Canada; the necessity for that defence has manifested itself in larger measure since the outbreak of the war with Japan. The hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has spoken particularly of the situation as it has changed since the entry of Japan into the war. Since the opposition have stated their feeling that this particular resolution should not be allowed to pass until some further statement is made by the ministry, I thought it might facilitate the progress of the debate if I were, on behalf of the government, to make a statement this afternoon. But may I say at once to the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), who has just spoken, that I do not think the government should be taken to task for having brought down the war appropriation measure, and begun to discuss it immediately before the Easter recess. As a matter of fact, I think, had we brought the measure down at an earlier stage and then attempted to crowd the measure through before the Easter recess, we might have been open to some degree of censure for failing to give the house more time and opportunity for full discussion on the most important measure the government has brought before the house. As matters stand, it seems to me that we have pretty well taken the right ground in the circumstances. We have brought to the attention of the house all the large financial measures of which the house will have to take cognizance during the session. Hon. members are in a position to know the entire programme; and they will have the benefit of the time afforded by the Easter recess to familiarize themselves with the various features of the proposed legislation, and also to consider the points which they think should be further discussed when we reassemble after Easter.

Speaking in the debate on the address, I outlined, I thought very fully, the war policy of the government, going into considerable detail with respect to the armed forces overseas—indeed, all forces on land, in the air and at sea. I outlined the progress that has been made in the production of munitions and supplies, as well as the government's programme with respect to the supply of food. In fact, as I recall it, I covered the entire field fairly comprehensively. I had thought that what was said at that time, and what was subsequently said by my colleagues, might have furnished sufficient information to have justified the passing of these interim supply resolutions without at this time any further detailed discussion. However, the request that the government should, if possible, give members before the Easter recess further information in regard to the development of its war policy is I think a reasonable one, particularly in so far as it relates to the defence of Canada itself, as the need of that defence has become more evident within the recent past. I shall accordingly now make a brief statement to the house of the further progress made by the government in the carrying out of its programme. May I say, however, that I did this in part yesterday when I spoke on the government's policy in respect to national selective service. I also at that time answered some of the questions which had previously been asked and I anticipated others. I hope that with what was said yesterday and what I may now say, hon. members of the house will have a fairly comprehensive understanding in their minds of the programme which the government has under way at this time.

The phenomenal successes of the Japanese in the southwestern Pacific have done more than all the nazi successes in Europe to bring home to the people of Canada the reality of the danger to our own country in the present war. No one should seek to minimize that danger or the new sense of urgency it has brought with it. At the same time, it should not be permitted to destroy a true perspective. In actual geographical distance, in thousands of miles, the Japanese menace is much farther from Canada than the nazi menace. In strategic terms, the probability of attacks upon our Atlantic coast and upon Newfoundland is as great as it is upon our Pacific coast. But for the shield which Britain constitutes, the danger to Canada from Europe would be far greater than the danger to Canada from the far east.

One of the most difficult decisions in waging war is the decision which must be made as to the disposition of fighting strength. Over and over again it is necessary to decide what proportion of total fighting strength should be sent to the front line to engage the enemy, and what proportion should be held in reserve to secure the base of operations and protect the lines of communication.

From the outset of the war the government has been attacked on this score from opposite extremes. At one extreme are those who would send every trained man and every available weapon overseas, without regard to the risk thereby incurred of exposing our own country to direct attack which nothing could be done to repel. At the other extreme are those who would keep every able-bodied man and every available weapon in Canada, without regard to the risk of allowing our allies and friends to be defeated, and thus exposing ourselves to the full fury of a triumphant enemy.

Both extremes are perilous. To adopt either might be fatal to the very existence of our country. Unless we take every reasonable precaution to maintain the territorial security of Canada, the enemy might, by sudden surprise attacks, do incalculable damage to the country. On the other hand, unless we take our full share of the combat and do our full part to defeat the enemy before he reaches our shores, we may be left practically alone to face his onslaughts.

Before the Japanese attacks were made on British and American territories in the Pacific, the insistence of the government upon the maintenance of a foundation for the actual physical defence of Canadian territory aroused in some quarters a good deal of impatience. The opposite tendency has been more in evidence since December 7. Canada will never enjoy permanent security until the axis powers are defeated, and the spirit of aggression is uprooted and destroyed. That can never be achieved by keeping at home all our men and resources in an attempt to build an iron wall of defence on our coasts. That, indeed, would be the best way of making sure we should have to fight the war on Canadian soil.

So long as the international gangsters are plundering and marauding at large in the world, we can never make Canada so secure that there will not be somewhere some danger of attack. But, as I have repeatedly pointed out, we cannot on that account afford to neglect reasonable precautions. In certain strategic areas we must be prepared to meet sudden raids from sea and air. The maintenance of the security of the base of operations is the most elementary rule of warfare.

To meet the increasing menace of attack on both coasts, the government has taken many important steps to strengthen Canada's capacity to resist attack. For obvious reasons I cannot give to our own people precise information concerning these measures without giving the same information to the enemy.

I am prepared, however, without being so precise as to reveal specific details which might assist the enemy, to give some indication of the steps being taken to strengthen our territorial and coastal defences. What I am about to say on this subject refers mainly to land and air defences. Concerning naval defence, I can add but little, if anything, to what I said on January 26 last. However, there is something that I can add.

Since that date, attacks by many submarines have been made in coastal waters of Canada and the United States. In many cases these attacks have occurred within sight of the shores of this continent. There is no reason to believe that these attacks will not continue and probably become more intensive. Officers of the Canadian naval service have expressed the view that within a few months submarines may well be found operating within the gulf, and even in the St. Lawrence river. It is known that enemy submarines can leave their bases on the European continent, voyage to the shores of this continent, seek their prey for some days or weeks and return to their bases without the necessity of refueling. If enemy submarines do operate in the gulf and river St. Lawrence, an additional burden will be thrown on the Canadian navy. Not only will our navy have the duty of assisting in escorting Atlantic convoys, but it will also have to assume the task of escorting convoys in the river St. Lawrence and in the gulf as well as along our coasts.

The Canadian navy has a share in the primary responsibility for our territorial defence. In the midst of world-wide conflict, warfare on the seas is indivisible. Any Canadian ship of war, wherever it may be operating, is engaged in defending Canada. How or where our ships are employed cannot, of course, be disclosed with exactness. It is, however, common knowledge that the major strength of the Canadian navy is in the Atlantic, sharing in the burden—and bearing a large share—of escorting convoys. This does not mean that the naval defence of the Pacific is being neglected. Inevitably the naval tasks of the united nations are so apportioned as to secure the maximum advantage from their total naval strength.

As I said on January 26, save in so far as the number of available ships necessarily sets the limit to the number of men who can be enlisted for training, no limitation so far as our navy is concerned has been placed upon the number, either of ships or of men.

There is no lack of recruits for the naval service. Indeed there is a considerable waiting list. But in addition to the limitations which have been mentioned as to the number of available ships, there is the further limitation imposed by the difficulty of training men, particularly officers and petty officers. In the nature of things, naval training takes a longer time than the training necessary for either of the other two services. After men have been given all the instruction in the art of naval warfare that can be given on shore, there still remains the long path of varied experience over which they must pass before they are thoroughly equipped for positions of responsibility at sea.

Up to the present the building of naval craft and the training of men to man these craft have proceeded at an almost equal pace. Most of the ships of Canada's navy have been built in Canada, and they are, of course, manned by Canadians. The achievements of Canadian corvettes, named after Canadian cities and towns, have captured the admiration of Canadians generally and have won the praise of naval authorities in other countries. What is true of Canadian corvettes is true also of every other type of craft in the Canadian navy. Officers and men of the Royal Canadian Navy, of the Royal Canadian Naval Volunteer Reserve, and of the Royal Canadian Naval Reserve, manning armed merchant cruisers, destroyers, minesweepers, patrol boats and other naval vessels have acquitted themselves ably and honourably over wide expanses of ocean. It can be truly said that with every month that passes, Canada's contribution to naval warfare is growing in extent and effectiveness. As that contribution grows, our security increases.

The programme for the army overseas, announced on January 26, is already under way. At that time, I also gave a résumé of what had been done with regard to the territorial defence of Canada, following the outbreak of war with Japan. I stated that new units were being mobilized in accordance with anticipated deliveries of equipment. I can now say that, in accordance with that policy, nearly a dozen new battalions have already been mobilized, together with a considerable number of additional anti-aircraft and coast defence batteries. These formations are being given an active role in connection with territorial defence.

I also indicated that the organization of additional formations would depend on developments in the war situation, and mentioned particularly the mobilization of another division. Since that time the war situation has further deteriorated, particularly in the far east. In consequence of this fact the government has authorized the mobilization of two additional divisions, the 7th and the 8th. The additional formations will add depth to our existing and contemplated defences. They will be given the role of mobile reserves, with special reference to the east and west coasts.

I will not repeat what I said in January as to the special steps and special dispositions which had then been made to meet the conditions resulting from the outbreak of war with Japan. Those measures have been implemented. The new mobilizations which I have just indicated are by way of additional security. Our coast defences and anti-aircraft defences are being strengthened week by week as new equipment becomes available, and as new units already authorized complete their mobilization.

The house will understand that, for reasons of security, I cannot give the disposition of these new formations. It has, of course, to be recognized that the ultimate disposition of all troops necessarily depends upon circumstances which determine the course of the war. I can say, however, that both the troops and the equipment available will be disposed of to the very best advantage to meet any anticipated forms or scales of attack.

In the outline I gave of the war programme for the present year, I referred to the fact that the air force, like the navy and the army, had its part in the territorial and coastal defence of Canada and Newfoundland. I added that the responsibilities of the air force on the Pacific coast had been increased by the outbreak of war with Japan. I stated that, in consequence of the increased responsibilities of the air force for territorial and coastal defence, some increase in the home war establishment of the Royal Canadian Air Force must be anticipated. While there are obvious reasons why precise details of the expansion of our air defences cannot be made public, it can be said that this expansion will involve marked increases in the number of combat squadrons, for reconnaissance, anti-submarine, striking, and fighter operations.

Some indication of the scale of expansion of the home war establishment of the R.C.A.F. is revealed by the rise in expenditures on air defences in Canada. These expenditures are exclusive of the cost of air training. The expenditures were:

In 1939-40 over $28,000,000.
In 1940-41 over $50,000,000.
In 1941-42 approximately $115,000,000.

The estimates for 1942-43 were originally fixed at $233,000,000. Events since December 7 have led to a new survey, as a result of which this estimate has been raised to $315,000,000. Long range commitments have been made of an additional $120,000,000.

I might indicate some of the factors which have made this substantial increase possible. More aircraft are becoming available. Canadian production of combat aircraft is reaching its zenith. Orders placed some time ago in the United States are now being filled. It might be of interest for me to point out that by far the largest proportion of the aircraft will be provided by Canadian plants. The air crew and ground crew required for the expanded programme will be readily available. The British commonwealth air training plan is training pilots, observers and gunners in numbers sufficient to meet all our commitments to our partners in the plan, and, in addition, to provide fully for our home war establishment. Our requirements of ground crew are readily filled by voluntary recruitment. The technical ground crew training facilities are easily able to meet the additional demands placed upon them.

The construction of air fields and other defences presents no difficulties. The experience acquired during the years 1940 and 1941, in the construction of home war establishments, as well as air training schools and establishments, has made of the departments of transport and munitions and supply highly efficient and highly expeditious construction agencies. Most of the essential developments connected with the basic defence of our coasts are either completed or in process of completion. The projects this year will provide mainly for defence in greater depth, and for the development of satellite and auxiliary aerodromes.

The last thought or desire of the government would be to lull the people of our country into any false sense of security. No matter how complete our defences may be, we can never be sure of preventing the enemy from attempting some form of attack. To defeat such attempts we must utilize to the best advantage possible the men and equipment we have and are able to obtain.

It goes without saying that in any attempted attack on the north American continent, the joint United States-Canadian plans for defence would come into immediate operation. What I have said is, I trust, a sufficient indication that the security of our Canadian coasts is not only not being neglected but is being constantly increased and strengthened. I can assure the house that, keeping in mind strategic conditions elsewhere, the government is endeavouring, practically and vigorously, to strengthen Canada's defences by sea, land and air to meet any situation which is likely to arise.

Something has been said during the course of the present debate about the possibility of Canada sending a force to Australia. In connection with the utilization of the Canadian army there has been one principle which the government has invariably held to, and that is that our troops should serve where and in whatever way they can do the most good to the common cause.

We consulted with those with whom we are associated in the war effort as to how best we could help, and we undertook a programme accordingly, which I announced in January. We had full consultation with our military advisers, and in view of the obligations to which we had committed ourselves overseas, and having regard to the other factors involved, it did not appear to be in the interests of the combined war effort that Canada should undertake at this time the sending of an expeditionary force to Australia. There was the further important circumstance that such dispositions were properly the subject of consideration, not by Canada alone but by the combined chiefs of staff committee of the united nations. It goes without saying that we are most anxious to cooperate with our sister dominion in every practicable way at this time of danger, and we have examined and have communicated with Australia, respecting other forms of assistance.

What I have said does not mean that Canada, as far as the army is concerned, withdraws one iota from the attitude we have taken, namely, that Canada wants its troops to be used in whatever way and in whatever theatre it is considered they can make the most useful contribution. That has been and will continue to be our position. In addition to other statements on the subject, I, myself, have personally made that purpose abundantly clear to the United Kingdom government.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to the latter part of his statement? He did not say anything about the Pacific council for which Australia has been pressing so strongly. Is the Prime Minister in a position to state whether Canada will ask that such a Pacific council be set up, and will ask for representation on that council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The subject to which my hon. friend has just referred is a part of a larger subject, which is, the most effective kind of cooperation that can be arranged between the united nations, and in particular, between the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States.

As the house is well aware, the foundation of that cooperative effort was laid at the time of the visit of Mr. Churchill to Washington. Since then, very careful consideration has been given to what is likely in the long run to be best in the way of boards or councils on which the different parts of the empire, the United States, and the other united nations may be represented. There are advantages and disadvantages with respect to having all these boards or councils located in the United Kingdom; advantages and disadvantages in having them all located in the United States. What the countries concerned have been seeking to do is to weigh carefully, in the light of all considerations which should be taken into account, the best arrangement for furthering a common, cooperative effort.

In regard to the Pacific council, it was felt for some time that, having regard to strategic considerations in particular, the area which was immediately concerned was the southern Pacific and the far east, and that the nations which should be called into consultation in reference to matters likely to arise there, should be the nations that were more immediately concerned with that particular area.

May I say this, in a general way, that sometimes an individual achieves most, not by asserting himself too much, but by effacing himself, by taking into account the difficulties which others have and which have to be met, and by seeking as far as possible not to emphasize and increase those difficulties, but rather to minimize and lessen them and, as far as it is possible, overcome them. In that regard it is much the same with a nation as with an individual. One of the difficulties which presents itself respecting the appointment of a board or council which relates to any part of the British commonwealth is, that the commonwealth is composed of several self-governing nations and, where one part seeks representation on a particular board or council, unless it is possible to give the best of reasons why every other part of the commonwealth should not be similarly represented, a difficulty immediately presents itself.

I give that as an illustration of the kind of thing which has presented itself to the Prime Minister of Britain and his colleagues in deciding upon representation of certain nations of the commonwealth in Britain and the kind of thing of which we here have had to take account in considering whether we should be represented on a board or council in Washington rather than in London. Hon. members will see at once that, the minute Washington is preferred to London in the matter of representation on some board or council that has to do with war strategy and war policy, a question arises in the public mind, as to why Washington was chosen in preference to London.

Up to the present, and may I say, right along, we have taken the position as a government that, where we saw that Canada's interests were likely to be prejudiced in any particular, we have made strong protest and strong representations as to why we should be given representation which up to that time we had not had. But where we have had reason to believe that our position was such that it in no way was being prejudiced or impaired, we have sought, as I have said, not to raise or press matters which were likely to make a difficult situation more difficult, but rather to watch the situation and at the right moment gain the representation we wished.

That is, I think, pretty much the situation with regard to the matter of Canada's representation on a council at Washington at the present time, that the final arrangements in respect to that council have not yet been made as between Britain and the United States; but both know that Canada expects to have full representation, and we have no reason to believe that we shall not have the needed representation at the moment that it may be best to bring it into being.

Mr. GREEN: I raise the point because the Australian minister who is now visiting in the United States is reported as having expressed the wish that Canada should have representation on that council; and for a Pacific coast Canadian it is of vital importance that we should be on that council. The situation has changed so much now, with the Malay States and Java gone, that I think Canada comes fairly into the Pacific picture and should be represented on that council.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. But may I say to my hon. friend that I hope it will not be assumed, because we are not actually represented on any council, that we are not kept very fully informed with respect to all that is taking place and that Canada's interests in every particular are not being closely watched. We have our liaison officers at Washington; we have there the representatives of the different departments; we have our minister. We have similar representation in London. We are, I can say, kept informed day by day as to any matters of vital concern. The matter of the formal representation, in the long run, is something which relates only to the question of the right moment.

Mr. GREEN: Is it not a fact that Australia and New Zealand, in addition to Great Britain, are already represented on the Pacific council?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At the moment I cannot answer my hon. friend's question, because I am not sure whether both countries are being represented. I know that both expect to be represented, and they may be

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): The position in relation to the Pacific council as explained by the Prime Minister may be described as one of watchful waiting. I gather that so far Canada has not been asked to become a member of this council; and with that, I think, at the moment we shall have to be content. But there is no doubt that a large body of public opinion, especially in western Canada and of British Columbia—which opinion the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) has presented in this house—thinks Canada as a Pacific power should be represented on that council. Whether or not that is possible at the moment, I do not know, and I do not propose to explore the position any further this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I hardly think the expression "watchful waiting" describes it, because our position has been strongly presented to the United Kingdom and the United States governments. They both are informed of our attitude and of our desires. Governments do not all move as rapidly as some people would like, and it is just a matter of the right moment of adjustment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Have we asked to be represented on the Pacific council, or how far has Canada gone? I will make that inquiry.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will say we have, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister did not make that clear in the statement he made. I am not saying it to be critical. I know that anyone in his position must speak with great care. Now I think we have had some clarification of the position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When I say we have, I do not say we have pressed for it at this very moment, because we realize that there have been situations in England which require our point of view to be given there rather than in the United States. But we have made it sure that we expect to be represented on the council in the United States if it is finally decided that the council is to continue there.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would expect that to be about as frank a statement as the Prime Minister could make at the moment, and I have no doubt that in due course, if, as and when it is set up in Washington, Canada will be represented. I should be astonished if it were otherwise, notwithstanding what other people in other countries might say. So much for that. I refer to it in opening because it is the last topic to which the Prime Minister referred.

I hope the people of Canada will give heed to the earlier part of the Prime Minister's address, because I am afraid that even right down to this minute the people of Canada are not awake to the perils of the international situation. I have never felt, all through these two and a half years of war, that the people of Canada realized the immense gravity of this whole terrible situation. As somebody said the other day, the great mass of our people are still movie-minded; and if what the Prime Minister has said, if whatever small amount of power I can get behind whatever I have to say to-day, will bring to the minds of the Canadian people the intense gravity of the situation, then the time spent this afternoon in holding up the item of the Minister of Finance, which I know he is so anxious to get through, will be well worth while.

I will say this. If the speech which the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) made on Monday evening, and if the request which I made just at the close had the effect of bringing forth the latter part of the Prime Minister's statement, that was worth while too.

I do not have to be convinced about the gravity of the situation. I have tried to urge, with all the power at my command, upon all the Canadian people how grave the situation is. Hon. gentlemen on this side do not have to be sold the idea. I do not think hon. gentlemen on the other side have to be sold the idea of the gravity of the situation. There may be some exceptions; I will not make them this afternoon. But a great many of the Canadian people do not know that there is a war on in the true sense of that term, and if what the Prime Minister said in the early part of his remarks brings home to them just how serious the whole situation is, it is all to the good.

What is the position? Ever since the fall of France the international position has steadily deteriorated until day by day, week by week, month by month the war has been brought nearer to our doors. To-day we are witnessing the spectacle of submarines on the Atlantic coast within sight of land. I am glad the Prime Minister made the statement he did with regard to that—submarines within sight of our own nations blowing up merchant ships. And that might well have happened on the banks of the St. Lawrence. If that be so, I wonder if the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) and other hon. gentlemen I could name will continue in the attitude which they have adopted from time to time in this house. While the actual theatres of war are still far from our shores, the fact of the matter is that the war is coming day by day, week by week, month by month, nearer and nearer to us. That is a truth which I should like to see instilled into the Canadian people this afternoon. I welcome that part of the statement of the Prime Minister if it will have the effect of bringing home to the people that we must have, in truth and in fact, total war preparation in this country, which we have not got to-day.

I am not going to jibe the Prime Minister at this moment, and say that while this is so and while we are all agreed about it, we are pausing to hold a plebiscite. I have said all I want to say about that. Let me add this about the plebiscite, however. If it fails to carry, then a crisis will be precipitated in this country, and God help this country!

I welcome the announcement of the establishment of two new mobile divisions. I welcome and the country will welcome the announcement of the extension of the home war establishment of the air force, because we who have studied the situation have known for a long time of the tragic trend of events in the various theatres of war. We have known for a long time that you cannot win, you cannot defend, you cannot do anything with success unless you have air equipment to fight with. This has been demonstrated so many times. Singapore! Oh, if they had had air defence at Singapore the story might have been different. The more we can get, whether of domestic manufacture or imported it matters not, so long as we can get them, the better. They must be had. I am wondering if the production of aircraft in Canada is what it ought to be. I should like to see the director of aircraft production in Canada brought before, I will not say the whole parliament, in secret session, but before a select committee of members of this house, and asked to give us the true picture about aeroplane production in the dominion, without let or hindrance. I do not know what he would say. But I do know that certain factories in this country have not been operating on full time, or anything like full time, in aeroplane production. I do not know whose fault it is. I do not know where the lack of coordination is. I have heard stories, and as a lawyer I must characterize them as hearsay, that there is lack of coordination in those corporations which have been set up to supply certain essential parts for our aeroplane production; that there has not been coordination in production in order that the assembly plants may operate on full time. I do not know how much truth there is in it—members of the ministry will know much better than I do—but that is the nasty story that is going around the country and reaches me. I merely mention it in order that the Prime Minister and those around him may give it consideration. I do know that some aeroplane factories in this country are not running full time. They ought to be running twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week, because I believe that is the best source of defence material for the allied nations and for Canada as well.

The Prime Minister said a word on reconstruction. He issued a solemn warning to the people of Canada about the conduct of the war. I suspect that the topic of reconstruction was, I will not say an excuse, but an opportunity for him to make the important statement he has made this afternoon. Be that as it may, the question of reconstruction has occupied the attention of this house in recent days, and there are people in this country who are devoting to it a good deal of time and thought. It is a popular topic among the intelligentsia; I understand the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Claxton) journeyed away down to Williamstown the other day, and he gave us some results of his trip down there relating to this matter. I do not want to throw cold water on the enthusiasm of those who are talking of post-war reconstruction; I do not think it is too soon to begin to talk about reconstruction. But what type of blueprint for reconstruction, either at this time or in the immediate future, can this country set up when we do not even know whether we are going to have a country or a constitution to operate?

Mr. RALSTON: Or a post-war period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or even a post-war period. After all, when you come down to the final analysis of this whole situation the winning of the war is the only thing that matters now. It is popular among certain classes in this country to cry out, "Oh, you must plan for a new world order." We have all given lip-service to that theory, but what kind of world are we going to have if we do not win this war?

Mr. BRUCE: Slavery.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If we do not win this war, if Britain falls, if we cannot defend ourselves, if the United States cannot defend us, what kind of order are we going to have in Canada? There is only one answer to that; the Canadian people, irrespective of class, race or creed, must get right behind any and every effort that it is possible to make to win this war. And the government must give the leadership. I think the government is trying to give some leadership. I do not want anyone to believe that I am indulging in carping criticism. But I am glad to have the opportunity to unbosom my soul this afternoon on this matter, because it is borne in upon my conscience that this war situation as it affects Canada, as it affects the united nations certainly, has grown steadily worse. I was almost going to use the language used by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) the other day, that only a miracle can win this war. I do not say that, I say that the united will and purpose of the united nations can win this war if they and we will face the situation realistically. It would be all very well to set up committees on rehabilitation and talk about planned economies for the future if you knew that there was to be a future. But from the bottom of my heart I say to hon. members all over this house, let us win the war, and then see what kind of blueprint the best minds of this country can produce for the post-war period. Let us not be too sure that our opinions of to-day are the best opinions. We may all have to change our views. No nation, none of the united nations, were ever confronted with a situation which seems to change so rapidly, almost overnight. Economic changes will come, but who can say what they will be when the time comes that we can give practical effect to our ideas based on conditions that may then obtain?

When I came into the chamber this afternoon I had no idea of making the statements I have just uttered. I intended to rise to call the attention of the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) to some changes which I think should be made in the national war regulations. But I have no apology to make to this house or to the Canadian people for what I have said. I should like to commend to this house and to the people of Canada the thoughtful, able and challenging address made here earlier to-day by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker). I agree 100 per cent with nearly everything he has said. I know that there has been a sense of frustration in connection with the examination of the war expenditures of bygone days. I think it would be wise if these committees are to be reestablished, that they be open to the public, and that the whip should be taken off. I am told that the whips are there and that when the danger point is approached the lid is closed. That ought not to be, in the present situation.

Mr. GOLDING: That is not true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; I have not first-hand information. I was not present, but that is the report given to me by those who represented us on those committees. I am not going to say anything more about it now.

Mr. McILRAITH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish to go on with my speech.

Mr. McILRAITH: On a question of privilege in that connection, some hon. members here, and I was one, sat on that committee. No such pressure was exerted in any manner whatsoever on me as a member of the committee. I wish to make that perfectly clear. In saying what he has said I feel that the leader of the opposition tends to cast a reflection on the members who sat on the committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, if the hon. member takes it that way I cannot help it, but does he say there was free wide-open discussion?

Mr. McILRAITH: Yes, he does say so.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is not my information. I am content to leave it there.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

My intention was to rise to-day in connection with what I am informed and believe are certain anomalies in the national war service regulations. I regret that the minister in charge of that department is not at the moment in his seat, because my remarks will be largely directed to him. He was here earlier in the afternoon, but is not here now.

It will be recalled by members of this house that the National Resources Mobilization Act was passed in June, 1940, after the fall of France; and that upon that act being passed a national registration was held, in August of that year. In my understanding, that was predicated upon the theory of a national stock-taking of the man and woman power of Canada at that time, and their availability for service. The cost of that registration was upwards of $900,000; and I am bound to say that so far the evidence of the results flowing from that registration has not been anything like commensurate with the expenditure involved and the effort expended, much of which was given to the country gratuitously. So far as I have been able to ascertain, practically speaking the only use that was made of the national registration was to draw out the cards of the men of military age. There may have been other uses; if there were, they have not been brought to my attention.

I pause here to direct the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), the members of the government and the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) himself, to what to me is a rather astonishing answer to a question placed on the order paper by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) and answered in this house by the minister on March 9. If hon. members will turn to page 1115 of Hansard, they will see exactly what I mean. On that occasion the hon. member asked the government these questions:

1. Has the government used the information obtained in the national registration to compile statistics which will show, (a) the number of skilled man-hours of work which are available; (b) the extent to which these hours of work are being utilized; (c) the manner in which they are being utilized; (d) the number of unskilled man-hours of work available; (e) the manner in which and the extent to which they are being utilized; (f) the extent to which the unskilled labour is being trained?

2. If so, what statistics are available?

The answer brought down by the minister was "no", repeated seven times. Not only have they not used the information available; they have no statistics about anything. There is one thing to be said about that answer; it is frank; I assume that it is true, and there is no ambiguity about it. But it is an astonishing answer.

Mr. THORSON: It deals with the matter of man-hours.

Mr. HANSON: I understand that; I read what it meant—man-hours, based on a statistical review of the registration, and nothing has been done with respect to that. It asks what is the available man and woman power in this country, in terms of hours, and nothing has been done about it. To me that is just an astonishing situation.

At the same time that the mobilization act was passed the Department of National War Services was created and set up; and on August 27, 1940, the national war services regulations were established. Later on they were consolidated and further amended and approved by order in council P.C. 1822 of March 18, 1941, and I think they have been further amended from time to time. As originally set up, the regulations provided for the military training of unmarried men within certain age groups for a period of only thirty days, which, as we all know, was later increased to four months. I shall refer only briefly to the reasons given at that time by the then chief of the general staff as to why the training was limited to only thirty days. Several reasons were given. The two important reasons were, first, that there was no equipment available for further training and, second, that the young men of Canada had to be taught a sense of their national obligation. The only observation I desire to make with respect to that is that to me it was a very strange reason to advance. I have made other observations in that connection, but I am not going to pause to repeat them to-day.

The set-up adopted in August, 1940, had to take into account the existing methods of military service in Canada, such as those furnished by the reserve militia units for the men and the training given at various institutions under the officers' training corps. I am assuming, without being a student of military matters, that the regulations as then set up were appropriate to the conditions as they existed then, qua the thirty-day training period. Men carried on the strength of the reserve militia units were considered as receiving the equivalent of thirty days of training at the different centres to which the age groups from twenty-one to twenty-four were to be called up.

Then came the extension of the war in practically every theatre and on almost every continent which, of course, as conditions in the Department of National Defence expanded and improved, led to the replacement of the thirty-day training plan by the four months plan, which, as everyone knows, was subsequently extended to training and service for the duration of the war, but within Canada. As I stated before, the national war services regulations, first established in 1940, have been amended on several occasions, in particular on February 24, 1941, as approved by order in council I think in March of the same year. The dates are not very important. They were amended to deal with the additional service required.

This is the first point I want to make to the minister, and I hope what I have to say will be constructive and will receive the attention of himself and his officers. It has been represented to me that many of the rules and regulations which were reasonable at the time they were adopted in August, 1940, have no place under the existing system as it is now extended. The suggestion that is made to me in this connection is that many of these out-of-date regulations, if that is a proper term to apply to them, are now being used as loopholes which it is alleged encourage or enable persons to evade their responsibilities.

Mr. THORSON: I do not think that is true.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the allegation that I get. In support of that allegation I received the other day a communication from a gentleman whose patriotism and knowledge of military affairs are of the highest order. He was a soldier in the last war; he comes from a family which is perhaps noted for its patriotism. He served, and I believe is still serving, as the head of the citizens' recruiting committee for military district No. 4, which is Montreal. Recently he wrote a letter to the Montreal Star, a copy of which I hold in my hand and which I have no doubt has been brought to the attention of the minister. In this letter he points out that at present there are no less than seven training centres in military district No. 4, and that at these camps the young trainees called out for service in Canada are urged from time to time to join one of the active service units of their own selection. We know that is so, and we have heard on several occasions in this house of some of the methods used to attain that objective, but it is not my intention to pursue that topic at the moment.

It is alleged that the esprit de corps and spirit of sacrifice among these trainees would be immeasurably strengthened if the Department of National War Services were to rescind all those portions of the 1940 regulations which permit a way out for dodgers and slackers.

This gentleman goes on to point out some of the most important weaknesses in the regulations, and I am going to deal with them seriatim. I am not doing it in any spirit of criticism. I think this may be helpful to the minister.

Mr. THORSON: I should like to assure the hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) that any constructive suggestions which will make the regulations more workable, more adaptable, for the purposes for which they were framed will be cordially welcomed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So far so good—we are met on common ground. This is the first suggestion made.

1. That men of the trainee ages who were on the strength of a reserve unit on August 15, 1940, have not been made liable for service in Canada for the duration if they have been attending parades of their reserve units.

I understand—the minister may correct me—that this position is still recognized; and if this excuse still obtains, the position should be changed. It is not good enough.

2. As I understand it, the exemption and postponement provisions of regulation 17, headed "University and College Students," enables students attending a university Canadian officers' training corps to avoid full-time compulsory military service in Canada. In fact, subsection 4 of regulation 17 goes so far as to give complete exemption from service to a student who is qualified by training in this corps to be a commissioned officer in the naval, military or air forces of Canada; that is, unless he has agreed to go on active service in consideration for the special training he has received at the country's expense. It is represented that young men are now taking these courses at the expense of the public without undertaking to serve Canada either here or anywhere the authorities may need them. That is the allegation. That would seem to me to be a wrong position, and if it is the situation it should be corrected. I want to follow that a little further.

In addition, it is represented that the existing regulations permit a partial student in a special course—after all, that may be only colour—or a post-graduate student in a profession not connected with any war activities to be taken on the strength of a university officers' training corps and claim similar exemption privileges. I believe that is true. Why? I ask that question. I suggest that that position is capable of great abuse.

All this, I am told, tends to cause resentment among those called out for the duration who are not able to bring themselves within these special provisions, and it is suggested to me that these rules permit those who are better off financially and who are indifferent to their obligations to escape from doing their duty at this time of national peril. I suggest to the minister, therefore, that the time has passed when this country should go to the expense of further qualifying young men as officers unless they are prepared to join up in the active service forces. This would appear to be just to those in the ranks of the Canadian active army in Canada and abroad which is full of men who have earned the right to be selected and trained for commissioned rank.

It is further suggested that the presence of potential officer material in the ranks of the various training centres would act as a stimulus to the morale of the men.

I suggest to the minister that regulation 17 can be and has been abused. It should be tightened up, for otherwise, as time goes on, it will be more and more abused. I am not going to fathom the whole depth of the abuses. We can use a little of our imaginations. The appropriate department should take the necessary steps to correct this position and make the thing airtight.

3. I suggest to the minister that it is a recognized principle that in all compulsory war regulations, in so far as humanly possible, everyone affected by an order should be treated alike, and in calling out men for service in the armed forces the medical category into which a trainee is put is a matter of the first-rate importance.

Under regulation 12, which deals with medical examination, the decision is left in the first place to the judgment of a single civilian medical practitioner. We have heard of abuses in certain parts of the country where treatments have been handed out so as to lower the categories of those called up. I do not know whether that is true or not.

Mr. THORSON: Will the hon. gentleman give any instance of that in respect of trainees?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I only know what I read in the papers and what the minister himself and his department must have read. I simply state that there are reports to that effect, but I have no specific instance and I am making no charge.

Mr. THORSON: There is no truth in the report.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope there is no truth in the report; but how did it get abroad? The Canadian Press is a reliable organization and it gives credence to this report. I suggest to the minister that where there is smoke there is some fire. I am going to leave it at that. The minister gives the report a flat denial. I wonder just how he knows there is no truth in the report. He cannot possibly know. He can only say what somebody else has told him.

I am dealing with the first examination of a trainee. He goes to a single civilian medical practitioner of his own choice. I am afraid that in certain and, I hope, isolated cases that power has been abused.

Mr. THORSON: If there has been any abuse on the part of doctors, I, as minister of the department, would welcome any particulars. Charges have been made with regard to some practising physicians, and these charges have invariably been investigated. I am glad to be able to say that the investigations of these charges show that there is no foundation for them and that the physicians of this country are discharging their duties in an honest manner.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister can make his statement when I am finished. I am going on with my statement and I do not care what the minister says. This is a charge made by a responsible civilian recruiting agent who had probably more first-hand information than the minister can possibly have.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have not mentioned his name, but he is well known to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) who could vouch for his character. It is true that if the registrar is not satisfied he may order a reexamination. In the days of the thirty-day training period, the regulation was of no particular consequence because of the short period of training; but now that the period of training and service has been extended for the whole duration of the war, and the men are retained in the service, I suggest to the minister that the regulation puts too much power and responsibility in the hands of one civilian physician. I think it would be a good thing to abolish this practice and appoint medical boards made up of three full-time army officers to decide whether these men fall within categories A, B, C, D or E. That is a specific recommendation I make. I suggest to him that as things get tighter and more men are required, if we are to follow up the present practice of recruiting, they will have to come to that. Why not face the situation now?

Mr. RALSTON: So far as I know, this comes under my colleague's department, but I have inquired about the same thing. I think the only reason given—and here I may be wrong—was that men are located in individual communities all over the place. If they had to come to a training centre and then were turned down and had to go back, it would be a lot of trouble for nothing. This principle was adopted, as is said, under the thirty-day plan.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not think there could have been so much objection under the thirty-day plan, but I heard over the radio the other night an announcement made in connection with recruiting for the Royal Canadian Air Force, and it was stated that they were carrying along with them an army doctor. The man is examined right on the spot.

Mr. RALSTON: That is different.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There may be some difference, but the principle is just the same.

Mr. RALSTON: For the men called up for training you would have to have the boards acting all at once.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know it is not quite the same. I was suggesting that the theory upon which this was set up no longer serves, and that proper medical boards should be appointed.

Mr. RALSTON: You will find no objection from the army.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You mean to say, if that recommendation is carried out?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister ought to back me up. He is not doing it very strongly. Apparently he supports the theory I am advocating.

Mr. RALSTON: It is really a matter of practical ability to carry it out.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know, but what is money between friends in this war effort? Money does not mean a thing in this war effort. I do not mean to say that we approve extravagant expenditures; we do not. We stand for the principle of equality of service. A man should not be put in a lower category when he ought to be in a higher category. We should see that he is put in the right category.

My fourth question is in reference to the interpretation section, or that part having to do with key men, training period and war industry. I have often wondered how a man between the ages of twenty to twenty-five years could be considered a key man in industry. He may be a key man on the farm, but I doubt very much if any twenty-year-old man can be a key man in industry. I suggest that consideration ought to be given to this. Then "training period" is defined to be such period as may be ordained by such proclamation. That may have been all right when the period was thirty days, or even when it was four months, but it does not fit the facts to-day when we are dealing with service for the duration. I am going to omit some of the comments I had intended to make.

The next definition is that of students. I suggest that a new definition to cover bona fide students is required. In drafting this new definition regard should be had to those students proceeding to take medical degrees as opposed to those taking other professional courses. The announcement of the Minister of National Defence of aid to medical students who will go into the army indicates that the department is alive to the necessity of more doctors for national service, but I do not suggest that we need more lawyers or architects or engineers or preachers. I do not know whether I should include other professions, but we certainly do not need any more lawyers in this country.

To sum up, it is represented that because of some of the anomalies to which I have referred in the present regulations, and certain deficiencies in the rules, inequality of service results, and that acts as a deterrent to enlistment in the three fighting forces. I call upon the minister at this time of grave national emergency and necessity to remove all existing anomalies, inequalities and loopholes. These reforms are long overdue.

I should like to say a word or two about the regulations generally. There does not seem to be any elasticity in the regulations. There is no flexibility and I think the whole position should be reviewed. I know there are grave dangers, but if the proper boards are set up I think the advantage of flexibility will outweigh any other disadvantages.

I had intended to say something about the statement made yesterday by the Prime Minister on man-power mobilization. This is a huge subject matter which requires a great deal of thought and much more knowledge than I possess at the moment. I have not even been able to read the Prime Minister's statement, let alone study the orders in council. But I will say this: what I understand of the announcement does not nearly measure up to the advance press notices. I am convinced now that government propaganda is not factual, but is propaganda pure and simple. The statement made by the Prime Minister, as opposed to the advance notices, indicates that the policy has been whittled down to a degree. Considerable teeth have been taken out. That is the first observation I want to make.

My second observation is that it is apparent that the government is approaching the problem of man-power for the army and other services by the indirect route rather than by the direct approach. According to the Prime Minister, we are to have an extended national selective service plan, designed to accelerate Canada's war effort through application of what he terms the "negative compulsion of restriction". I am not going to pause to analyse what that high-sounding phrase means, but it is opposed to the positive compulsion of allocation. The young men of this country between the ages of nineteen and thirty-five are in effect told definitely that they are to join the army or starve.

Then there is a policy with respect to farmers, which I have not quite analysed yet. But I shall say this, that the steps announced by the Prime Minister yesterday fall far short of complete national selective service. They are steps in the right direction, and good steps, but they do not go the whole way. Food production is being taken care of, and of course that is very important, not only to sustain the morale of our civilian population but also the armed forces, and to feed our gallant defenders overseas.

Employment in a restricted list of non-essential occupations is to be curbed—what the Minister of Labour is reported to have termed the "golden slipper" jobs—a striking phrase, and one which sounds well, though I do not know how much it means; nobody knows. Authority is given to the Minister of Labour to obtain skilled technicians for war work. But this I say, in criticism of the plan, and in the hope that it will stimulate the government to go further: the plan appears to fall short of making provision certain that every job which has to be filled will be filled by the most competent man. Without this, any plan fails.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion? Carried.

Mr. CHURCH: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee on the resolution, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, it is not carried. The debate was adjourned by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church). He has been waiting to speak.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Or by one hon. member. The motion is not carried. I object.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As hon. members are aware, these particular resolutions are to be followed by bills which will have to pass another house as well as this. All the bills which will be before the house between now and the Easter recess will relate to the war effort or supply; and I was going to suggest, unless it appeared to limit or restrict in any way what hon. members might wish to say, that the speeches on the war effort could take place on any one or other of the resolutions. As regards the resolution with respect to the war appropriation of two billion dollars, there will be no effort to put that through before Easter, but there may be time on Friday for debating it, and in that event speeches could be made at that time on the war effort. I think it might suit the convenience of hon. members generally if we got into committee on one or two of these resolutions, and such speeches as may be of very brief duration could be made in committee instead of on the resolution with the Speaker in the chair. Speeches at greater length with the Speaker in the chair could be made on the resolution with respect to the war appropriation bill. I believe that if my hon. friend understood that he would join with us in this matter.

Mr. MacINNIS: Will not the two billion dollar resolution also have to go into committee if we are to make an interim appropriation of $500,000,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. MacINNIS: That will put all the resolutions in the same category?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, that is not necessary. It is necessary that the resolution should be before the house. It has been before the house and is before the house on the order paper for consideration in committee of the whole. We could not have got the proportion voted if the resolution itself had not been introduced and a motion made to have it discussed in committee.

Mr. CHURCH: I cannot make my speech in committee. I gave way this afternoon to two or three other speakers, to let them go on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I suggest to you that there was in the hands of Mr. Speaker a whole list of speakers. The balance has been upset by the intervention of the Prime Minister this afternoon—which was quite right; he should speak—and perhaps I spoke longer than I should; but I do not think that we should rush through this debate. We shall get through on Friday by six o'clock.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. But there is the senate.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh! Well, I should not laugh at that. The hon. gentleman is concerned for the senate!

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not concerned with the senate, but I am concerned with the money to carry on the war, and I cannot get it unless I get a bill through this house and a bill through the senate. What I would suggest—if this would meet the convenience of the house—is that this $135,000,000 measure be carried through all stages to-morrow, and also that the $500,000,000 interim supply, which is No. 12 on the order paper, and the supplementary estimates which are before the committee of the whole, and the interim one-sixth of the main estimates, go through all stages to-morrow. If those are all through by to-morrow night they can go to the senate and the senate can pass those bills on Friday. Meanwhile no one will be prejudiced in the slightest degree, because there will still be the two billion dollar resolution, which is in committee, and discussion can go on upon that all day, every day. I am not asking the house to do anything which prejudices any single hon. member or prevents any hon. member from making a speech which he desires to make. But I suggest that that would be a businesslike way of dealing with this matter, and I am merely asking the house to carry out the programme which I suggested a little over a week ago it would be necessary for us to carry through before Easter.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): So far as I am concerned, I promised the minister a week ago that I would help him to get these measures through before the house adjourned. I am in honour bound to help him do that; and if the government wants to do it this way, why, I am content. I cannot, I should not, do anything else.

Mr. GREEN: Is there not to be any statement made by the Minister of National Defence? We can sit in committee to-morrow on this resolution.

Mr. RALSTON: I am prepared to make the statement at any time, but really I may be pardoned if I suggest that the Minister of National Defence will endeavour to make a statement at such time as may be opportune. I do not think that it is up to any hon. member to bid him at any time to make a statement. The leader of the opposition suggested the other evening that a statement be made by the ministry. The statement has been made by the Prime Minister. As the Minister of Finance has indicated, there will be ample opportunity in connection with the two billion dollar resolution to make any statement and to discuss in full the matter of the carrying on of the war; but I do suggest that it seems to be a waste of valuable time to do that twice—on this resolution and on the other one too.

I have talked to my hon. friend a good many times and he has heard me make a good many statements. I do not know that my voice is so pleasing to him that I should get up just for the purpose of making a statement; if I made one, there are three ministers of national defence, and all of them should make statements if one did. But we thought that in connection with this war appropriation bill we would endeavour to proceed in some order, for the convenience of hon. members and of the ministers, too. Last year, you will remember, the three ministers sat here day after day. Questions were asked one minute with regard to air, another minute with regard to the navy, and another minute regarding the army. It meant that we could not have our officers here at any particular time, and we had to be prepared for almost anything, and I must admit that, so far as the army was concerned, I felt that the matter was not presented in the form which was most satisfactory either to the house or myself. This year I did hope that we would arrange in connection with the two billion dollar appropriation resolution to have one department taken at a time and exhaust the subject as nearly as possible, in the manner which would be adopted if departmental estimates were under consideration. That would apply to the minister of munitions also. If we have to get into a general discussion of the three departments in connection with the supplementary bill with regard to last year, and have to do it all over again on the new bill, we do not have the same order nor do we get an opportunity of presenting the matter in as logical and orderly a fashion as otherwise, and I do not think it would be as convenient for the members. If the citizens read the reports, it would not be as satisfactory to them either. My hon. friend suggested that I might make a statement at the moment. I do not see the need of making a statement on this resolution. I have heard two speeches, the speech delivered by my hon. friend, and the speech made by the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, and certain suggestions have been made with regard to reserve units, home guards and some other matters. I shall deal with those at the proper time, but is there any hurry about dealing with them before Friday?

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister deal with them before the house adjourns on the 27th?

Mr. RALSTON: It depends upon what the questions are.

Mr. GREEN: The minister knows what suggestions have been made in the house in this debate and I want to know whether or not it will be possible for him or some other minister to deal with them before we adjourn on the 27th.

Mr. RALSTON: I shall endeavour to deal with matters that I think should be dealt with before the 27th. I say this with all due respect to my hon. friend, who made a very constructive speech indeed, that most of these things he spoke of are being dealt with in one shape or another. He talks about home guard; we talk about coast guards. It is the same thing. If it is necessary that I make a statement with regard to a matter of that kind I shall be glad to do so, but I shall have to reserve the right to decide what I think is important enough to be dealt with at this time, particularly in view of the fact that we shall be coming back shortly to be engaged in a discussion in connection with the whole matter all over again.

Mr. GREEN: Will there be an opportunity for discussion to-morrow?

Mr. RALSTON: The Minister of Finance will answer that question.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the three ministers of defence make statements to-morrow I shall never get these interim supply bills through. I suggested a week ago that they should go through quickly by consent and that we could go into the two billion dollar bill and the ministers could make their statements, so that we could have an orderly discussion. The hon. member for Vancouver South would not agree to that course because he wanted to make a speech with the Speaker in the chair on this supplementary appropriation. I had no power to dissent from that. He made his speech and a great number of other speeches were made with the Speaker in the chair, and I had no power to prevent their being made, nor did I desire to prevent these speeches being made.

Mr. CASSELMAN: And they were all within the rules.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. But I asked the house —and I gave ample notice—to have these important supplementary and interim measures go through parliament before the recess, and that means that they will have to be through before to-morrow night. I do not think my hon. friend can get the advantage of both courses of procedure which he is asking. He has insisted on making his speech with the Speaker in the chair, rather than follow my suggestion of putting these interim supplementary measures through by consent. If he had agreed to that course we could have gone on with the two billion dollar measure and the ministers could have made their statements and have been questioned if that were desired. But if the ministers are to make their statements on this, then we shall not get through. I am asking the house to let me get this through to-morrow night, and when the two billion dollar bill comes on such statements can be made as there is time in which to make them.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention of the Minister of Finance that his resolutions and bills shall go through by consent to-morrow and following that, and for the rest of the sitting until we adjourn on Friday, the two billion dollar resolution will be under discusssion with the house in committee of the whole? Is that the intention?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps we could make some arrangement about one minister coming on at a time.

Mr. CHURCH: Why were these war items not given precedence by the Minister of Finance, instead of taking up grain and the plebiscite? War is primary; these others are domestic and secondary.

Progress reported.

It being twenty minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, March 26, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved:

That the reports of the Canadian wheat board, tabled in the House of Commons for the crop years 1939-40 and 1940-41 be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization and that authority be granted to print from day to day 500 copies in English and 200 copies in French of the minutes of proceedings and evidence to be taken by the said committee on such reports, and that standing order 64 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SALARIES OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. COTE:

How many government employees are receiving, in addition to pensions or allowances granted for their services in the last war, salaries of (1) $2,000 to $2,999, (2) $3,000 to $3,999, (3) $4,000 to $4,999, (4) $5,000 or over, (a) in the federal civil service, (b) in government-owned companies?

Mr. COTE: I wish to withdraw this question, with the reservation that at a later date I may put a new question along more specific lines.

Question dropped.

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION BONUS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. What are the names and addresses of the persons to whom cheques were issued (a) for over $10,000, (b) for $5,000 to $10,000 on wheat acreage reduction bonus?
2. How were the amounts made up?
3. How much did each receive?

Mr. GARDINER: We have been refusing this type of information to many companies and municipalities and to others who are desirous of knowing what cash is going into the hands of individuals. I do not think it is proper to publish the information that is asked for, and I would ask that the question be dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It may be all right to refuse it to companies, but is it to be refused to the House of Commons? Are we not to know where the public moneys are going?

Mr. GARDINER: I do not think it is in the public interest, when amounts are being paid to a large number of individuals across a certain section of the country, to put all the information with regard to these matters into the hands of the public generally by having it placed on Hansard. I would suggest that the question be dropped.

Mr. COLDWELL: I want to join in the protest made by the leader of the opposition. Too often it is said in this house that information cannot be given because it would not be in the public interest to give it. When it comes to the payment of money under statutes enacted by parliament we should know the persons to whom that money is going. I object strenuously to this manner of dealing with questions of this kind, and I hope in this case the question will not be dropped.

Mr. GARDINER: If the house is of opinion that questions should be asked and answered, which result in the publication of the names of 186,000 farmers across western Canada, I cannot, of course, object. This is a section of them and if you can publish this group of them you can publish them all. We have appeals made to us by implement companies, mortgage companies and others for lists of these farmers with the amounts that have been paid to them, and we have refused them in all cases. An indirect way to get the information would be to have the names and addresses and amounts published in the records of this house. I have no objection to doing it if the house thinks it fair to do that kind of thing.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister's statement is no answer to the principle involved. It evades the issue. What do we care whether the implement manufacturers get their money? The people of Canada have a right to know who is getting $10,000 under the wheat acreage reduction plan.

Mr. CHURCH: Where is the auditor general?

Mr. HAZEN: A return was filed in the house according to which two farmers in the west received over $10,000. If I remember correctly there were just fifty-six who received between $5,000 and $10,000. To furnish the names of those men would not take a great deal of time. Public money is being expended for this purpose, and I think we are entitled to the information.

Mr. GARDINER: I have no objection to giving the hon. member or any other hon. member of the house the names of those two men, or even the fifty-six. But should we establish the practice of putting on the records of the house the names of the whole 186,000? That is what it would amount to; for if the hon. member can get half a dozen he can get them all.

Question stands.

ASSISTANCE TO AUSTRALIA

Mr. MAYBANK:

1. Was the Canadian high commissioner in Australia authorized to state that although Canada had a large force in the United Kingdom her immediate concern was the defence of the Pacific area and particularly Australia and that he had come to Australia to discover if there was anything which Canada could do for Australia; that Canada had sent troops to Hong Kong as part of the defence of Australia; but she (Canada) could do more; and if Australia desired any action by Canada, she (Australia) had only to say the word?

2. Has there been any exchange of notes or correspondence of any kind between the government of Canada and the government of Australia upon the subject matter of the said statement of the Canadian high commissioner?

3. Has the government of Australia either directly or indirectly asked for any kind of help from the Canadian government, and if so, what help and what sort of help was requested?

4. Was there any suggestion made by the Australian government with a view to ascertaining from the Canadian government what its answer would, or might be, if a request for assistance were to be made by the Australian government?

5. Did any other agency make any such request, or suggestion, on behalf of or for the benefit of Australia?

Mr. MAYBANK: It has been made to appear to me that it is not advisable to answer some parts of this question. Therefore I am content that it be dropped.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member may be willing that it be dropped, but I am not. I do not know just what my rights are in the matter. I hold in my hand a copy of the "Bulletin of International News," issued by the Royal Institute of International Affairs, on page 63 of which I find this statement from Australia under date of January 14:

The Canadian High Commissioner—

Presumably General Odlum.

—told the press in Melbourne that though Canada had a large force in the United Kingdom her immediate concern was the defence of the Pacific area, and particularly Australia. Canadians realized that Australia's danger was greater than their own, and he had come there to discover if there was anything which Canada could do, and to see that it was done. She had sent troops to Hong Kong as part of the defence of Australia, but she could do more, and if Australia wanted it she only had to say the word.

Was the high commissioner authorized by the government to make that statement? If not, was he disciplined for making it? I ask the question in the light of the announcement made by the Prime Minister yesterday. What is the position of Canada?

Mr. MAYBANK: I rise to a point of order —I am the one who started this. In the first place, I submit that the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has no right at this moment to put the question he has been putting. Second, with reference to the question itself, I submit that before the question is put to the house I have the right to ask that it be dropped, or to drop it, which I did before he rose.

I may say frankly that I dropped the question with a good deal of reluctance, but it is because of representations made to me that I do so. I cannot of course prevent the hon. gentleman from himself putting the question on the order paper, but so far as the question in my name is concerned, it is my right to ask that it be dropped.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and to the house that it was I who asked the hon. member if he felt it necessary to ask this question in view of the information I gave the house yesterday with reference to the government's intentions in the matter of assisting Australia at the present time. In the first place the question is not correctly worded; it seeks to convey information rather than to obtain it, and on that score it might easily have been ruled out of order. But apart from that, unless it can be shown that there is going to be something gained by entering into matters of controversy, which should not be considered matters of controversy at all, I would not think it is in the public interest that the question should be answered. I so informed the hon. member who asked the question, and I still hold that view.

As to whether or not General Odlum made the representations indicated here I am unable to say.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The Prime Minister can say whether he was authorized by the government to make them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the statement here has reference to some words that were reported in connection with one of the very first interviews General Odlum gave in Australia. No doubt General Odlum was expressing what is the desire of the Canadian people, namely that where we can assist, we are anxious to do all we possibly can, though it may not be in the immediate way that may be desired, but rather in doing our part in the general assistance that is being given. To that extent he would be representing an attitude as far as Canada is concerned which would be wholly correct. But undoubtedly the high commissioner was speaking on his own at the time he made the statement.

Mr. CHURCH: Then he should be recalled before he does any more mischief.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) claims he has the right to ask that the question be dropped before any answer is given. I refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 114, citation 355, which reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker Marcil ruled as follows on January 13, 1910: "In my opinion there are only two ways in which a question can be properly withdrawn when once it has been presented for answer in the house; that is, first by written notice by the member putting the question to the clerk of the house, stating that the question is withdrawn, or by the member in his place in the house informing the Speaker that he desired the question to be dropped or withdrawn."

The hon. member has so intimated to the house and to the Speaker, therefore the question is dropped.

Question dropped.

COAL

PAYMENT OF SUBSIDY ON IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES FOR DOMESTIC USE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I should like to bring to the attention of the government the contents of a telegram which I received to-day from the Drumheller coal operators, in regard to the subsidy which is to be paid to the importers of United States coal for domestic use. The operators and producers are very much concerned—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. gentleman consider this to be a question of urgency, which should be answered now?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, because the house is about to take recess for the Easter adjournment.

Mr. SPEAKER: If there is something about the question which requires to be answered before we reassemble I will permit the hon. member to ask it, but from what he has said up to the present this seems to be the kind of question that should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I think it is of great urgency, and I would ask the government why it is necessary to pay a subsidy on foreign coal imported for domestic use at this time.

Mr. SPEAKER: That is a question which should be placed on the order paper.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

PROCEDURE WITH RESPECT TO QUESTIONS ON THE ORDERS OF THE DAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. H. A. BRUCE (Parkdale): I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In his speech in Montreal a few days ago Mr. Donald Gordon, chairman of the wartime prices and trade board, is reported in the press to have said:

If we are to make a realistic approach to total war, we must demand a complete inventory of our entire productive machinery.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the form of this question indicates that it should be placed upon the order paper.

SHIPBUILDING

STATEMENT AS TO SOURCE OF INFORMATION APPEARING IN "FINANCIAL POST"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): A day or so ago I raised a question in the house with regard to information on shipbuilding. Now I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if he saw the statement appearing in the Financial Post of March 23, in which it is stated that the information for which I asked, and which appeared in that publication was given by the officials of the Department of Munitions and Supply.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): I have not seen that statement, but I shall make inquiries in the department, and if information is being given out I will see that it is stopped.

WAR APPROPRIATION

SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Wednesday, March 25, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide that sums not exceeding $135,000,000 be granted to his majesty for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Last night, just before we went into committee, I had intended to say a few words with respect to this resolution. Yesterday afternoon the leader of the opposition gave an interesting and rather challenging speech upon the subject of Canada's war effort; I should like to refer to one or two of the things he said.

In the first place the hon. gentleman raised the question, "Do the Canadian people realize the gravity of the war situation?" It seems to me that something needs to be said with respect to questions of this kind. It is my opinion that the people of Canada do realize how serious the war situation is, quite as fully as the members of this house do. I know, from my own personal experience, of hundreds of people who have been trying, ever since war broke out, to find something they could do to help the war effort along. Invariably they have found themselves unable to discover anything they can do. Now I would ask the leader of the opposition this question: Suppose the people of Canada did know how serious the war situation was; what could they do? Many of them have no work. What can be done by a man fifty-five years of age, for example, who cannot obtain work in industry, who cannot get the capital with which to go into any kind of private production and who, if he did go into private production, would be uncertain that he could sell his product at a remunerative price, and even uncertain that he could sell it at all? What can a man in that position do? There are tens of thousands of men in Canada over fifty-five years of age who are eager to do something to help the war along, but who are filled with a sense of frustration because they can find no outlet. If a man is unable to get work it is obvious he cannot contribute any more money than he is already contributing. What can he do? It is important at this time that the minister consider this question, so as to enable people to do more in connection with the war effort.

And now may I ask: What would the position of the leader of the opposition be? Time and again members of the official opposition rise in their places and rail against what is being done, but never once have I heard them offer a suggestion as to how the thing could be done better—not once. I ask the leader of the opposition, not in any spirit of criticism, to tell me what he conceives to be the cause of the deficiency in the war effort—granted that there is a deficiency in the war effort. Does he consider the cause to be a shortage of money? If the cause is a shortage of money, would the leader of the opposition, if he were in power, tax any more rigidly than the Minister of Finance is doing? I would ask the leader of the opposition, too, to tell the committee whether he would borrow any more money than the Minister of Finance is borrowing. And if he could not tax any more or borrow any more than the Minister of Finance is taxing and borrowing, how would he proceed to make Canada's war effort any more effective than it now is? Would he change the system under which we are labouring? The Minister of Finance has not chosen to do that to any great extent, although he is making progressive moves.

The leader of the opposition also spent some time on the question whether we should consider after-the-war conditions. It is my opinion, as one member of the house, that we could scarcely be occupied any more advantageously, either in the house or in the country, than in the discussion of after-the-war conditions. We have no right to assume we are going to lose the war; and even if we had reasonable assurance we were going to lose it we certainly should be prepared for any eventuality which would result from our winning it.

Let us suppose the war lasts six years or ten years, and we persist in trying to manage the affairs of this country in a dive-bomber age by ox-cart methods of finance and economy. Under such circumstances what will be the effect upon our war effort? In my judgment it cannot fail to be disastrous. Therefore it would appear to be very important that we discuss some new form of economic system—in the event of our finding such a form—which will enable us to function better. The longer the war lasts the worse will be the dislocation resulting from it, and the greater will be the need for planning now to meet the distressful conditions which are likely to rush upon us as soon as the war is over.

Some people seem to have the idea that every bit of time we spend in planning for after-the-war conditions is of necessity taken away from our work in connection with the war. This is utter nonsense; just as foolish as the assumption that the time we spend in discussions in this house necessarily detracts from our war effort. I believe the Prime Minister has indicated that in his opinion there was no likelihood that the time we would spend in discussing the plebiscite would in any way detract from our war effort. Such discussions are not going to lessen the number of bolts we make, the number of aeroplanes we make, the number of cars, tanks or any other supplies or materials we make. It is not going to lessen the number of men who join up, or the rapidity with which those men learn to fight. How in the world can it mar the war effort?

The time we spend in discussing some new economic system certainly cannot impair the effort with which we wage this war, so far as taking our time or energy or the use of material or money is concerned. I maintain that we certainly should be open and ready to discuss after-the-war conditions so that we may be prepared to go out and meet new situations when they come.

It is my feeling that we must change our order. I am not going to speak in detail on that point. We simply must change the system under which we labour. We must do it, first of all, to get maximum production. We must do it if we are to maintain the health of our people. We must do it if we are to maintain the morale of our people. We must do it if within six or seven years we are to avoid economic or financial collapse. Why not go out and meet these changes before they get to us?

May I draw the attention of hon. members to some conditions which exist to-day under the present system, after more than two years of war. I wish to refer to a passage in an editorial appearing in the Western Producer.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

The periodical is commenting on the observations of Mr. Grant Dexter; in the editorial that writer's words are quoted in part. The editorial runs as follows:

> But nowhere has Mr. Howe been given authority to organize total war production. The total of our output to-day therefore is the total of orders placed for our own fighting services and for allied governments. Mr. Howe, it appears, has sometimes taken chances.

And then, quoting Mr. Grant Dexter, it continues:

> It is an old story at Ottawa that the general staff hesitate to order more than is needed to meet the immediate requirements. Where the generals or admirals have asked for 100, he, Mr. Howe, has ordered 10,000. But in so doing he has been taking chances and no minister however courageous would go too far out on the limb.

Again, quoting the words of the Western Producer:

> May we ask: What are the general staff and even the minister afraid of? Is it Mr. Ilsley? Is the dead hand of treasury control having the same paralyzing effect here as in Britain?

I am going to ask the minister himself the question asked by the Western Producer: Is this uncertainty, this failure to use our war production capacity to the limit, this failure to do many other things which we ought to do—is this because of Mr. Ilsley? I believe my question has a direct bearing on the appropriation of $135,000,000 now under consideration, because that is the amount of money to be voted to help pay for what has already been done. The matters we are now discussing are the result of what has already passed. If Mr. Ilsley is the cause of the uncertainty, then it seems to me that fact ought to be made known. And if Mr. Ilsley is in difficulty which he cannot overcome, I say he should take us into his confidence and at least to some extent tell us what his difficulties are, so that we may set about trying to find some way of overcoming them. Otherwise I fail to see how he can possibly be conducting the financial affairs of this country as he ought to be conducting them, in this third year of the war.

I should like now for a moment or two to refer to the Prime Minister's speech made within the last two or three days with respect to the mobilization of man-power. He said things which scare the ordinary person in Canada as regards the way in which he is going to mobilize man-power and woman-power. No one objects to a complete mobilization of man-power and woman-power, but there are many persons in Canada who greatly fear lest some women or some young men shall be mobilized and put into their jobs. In order to indicate that what I am saying is not entirely without foundation in fact, may I refer to a statement which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of March 25 under the heading "Mr. M.P." I think I will read this passage. I believe the people of the future would like to know that statements like this did appear in our newspapers as paid advertisements on March 25, 1942, when Canada was supposed to be engaged in an all-out war effort. The statement reads:

Thousands of Autoworkers are Jobless or Facing Unemployment.

What are we going to do about it?

You are assembled now in parliament to bring about the most completely effective all-out war effort. Your job is to adopt a programme which will translate the words of Prime Minister Churchill: "Give us the tools and we will finish the job!" into terms that will smash the axis. As Canadian autoworkers we are trying our best to do this job which rests jointly on industry and labour.

But we have found that the job is not being done in the manner which is vital to victory over the axis. In fact, we are so appalled at the mismanagement and continuing blunders in the battle of production that we feel that they must be brought to your attention. We believe that if you are made aware of the facts, you will act as duly elected representatives of the people to see that the deplorable state of affairs existing for many months in the automotive industry is brought to a swift end. Otherwise we face disaster.

Understand—not just remember—Hong Kong and Singapore!

You like all of us, know what happened to Hong Kong and Singapore. We were told that Hong Kong was "well in hand." We were told that Singapore was "well in hand." We are being told that Australia is "well in hand."

But Australia may well go the way of these other bastions of democracy if we do not act quickly. You, Mr. M.P., and the Canadian people must see that it does not happen again. But there is a danger that it can tragically happen unless you learn the truth in time. The truth was hidden from the French people and the republic fell. That should be a lesson to us.

700 G.M. workers have been laid off in Oshawa.

1,500 Chrysler workers will be laid off in Windsor.

2,000 other Ontario automotive workers will be idle.

Idle men and idle machines do not make total war.

Seven hundred skilled autoworkers have been laid off in the General Motors plant at Oshawa and they will be jobless for several months while Australia calls for tools. Thousands of autoworkers in the same plant are working on an average only 30 hours a week producing military trucks which could be used to aid our allies in Russia and other parts of the world when the impending spring offensive begins. Fifteen hundred Chrysler workers and an estimated two thousand other autoworkers in Ontario face similar lay-offs for several months.

We ask why aren't they working 40, 50, 60 or as many hours weekly as their physical condition permits? We ask why the machines are not working 168 hours weekly producing the tools that Churchill has asked for in the name of the British, Australians, Russians, Chinese and all the peoples of the united nations?

We believe that once you know these facts you will ask the responsible officials of the various departments why these conditions continue to exist, stalling the war effort through idle machines and idle men.

I desist from reading for a minute or two to comment that it has been my impression, gathered from all the information I have gained from men who seem to be in a position to know concerning industry all over this dominion, that a condition similar to that here complained of exists everywhere in this country. Now, if a condition similar to what these men depict obtains throughout this dominion, how on earth can we say that we have an all-out war effort? As the Western Producer asks, whose fault is it? Is it the fault of the Minister of Finance? If it is not his fault, then whose is it? I go on with the statement:

Floor show automotive displays do not make total war.

We agree with Hon. C. D. Howe, Minister of Munitions and Supply, in his public statement last week, that Canada can supply all the military vehicles the united nations can use. We agree that it can be done but it is not being done. Why?

It has been my conviction that Canada could produce all the automotive vehicles that the united nations need. Yet in all probability we lost Hong Kong because of a shortage of such vehicles; with such vehicles we could perhaps have saved Singapore, and if there were in Australia at the present time a sufficient number of tanks and automotive vehicles, I think there would be no anxiety in the hearts of Australians as to their ability to throw off the Japanese attack. Yet the vehicles are not there. They were not in Singapore and they were not in Hong Kong. Here we are in this parliament ready to do anything the Minister of Finance asks, and yet we are unable to get the results we desire. I submit that this is one of the most astonishing situations ever faced by any group of legislators in the history of the world. If the minister had asked us for three billion dollars as a war appropriation, we would have granted it to him just as readily as we shall grant him two billion dollars. If he had asked for six billion dollars, we would have granted it, and it could have been granted. But he has asked for two billion dollars. Last year he asked for a certain amount of money and we granted it to him. All we asked was that he use it in such a way as to bring about a total war effort for Canada. Why is it that we cannot get results in this house? I go on:

We agree with Hon. Humphrey Mitchell, Minister of Labour, that this war will not be won with typewriters.

Neither will it be won with the floor show displays in the automotive industry in which men are hastily put on military work on occasions when His Royal Highness, the Duke of Kent, the Governor General or Lieut.-General A. G. L. McNaughton, commander of the Canadian forces overseas, visit these plants on tours of inspection. We are happy to have them visit our work shops to lend encouragement to the men on the machines but we would rather have them see an all-out war effort than an artificial pretence at one.

There is getting abroad throughout Canada, in every hamlet, in every street and in every tavern, the idea that the fine pictures we see representing Canada's all-out war effort, those fine radio programmes that we hear and which seem to indicate a feverish degree of activity on the part of the workers, are largely artificial and created to produce a particular effect. In other words the Canadian people as a whole are being deceived on a tremendous scale, a scale unprecedented in the history of mankind. I go on:

Who allows such conditions to continue?

It is a shocking picture and we believe you and the Canadian people should be made aware of it. We believe that, knowing the facts, you will act to stop the imperilling of our war effort without any further delay.

We have tried to correct this situation for many months. We have studied the situation thoroughly—and who knows better the existing conditions than autoworkers in these plants?—and made suggestions to no avail. We are still waiting for a conference to discuss this situation with the Department of Munitions and Supply and Mr. J. H. Berry, controller of the automotive industry.

We don't claim to know all there is to know about the problem but we believe it is time that common sense was exercised and industry and labour sat down together to pool their ideas. No one group in the nation is the repository of the brains and brawn that will guarantee a total war effort. They have realized that such conferences are imperative in Great Britain, Australia and the United States if the united nations are to win the war. Who is standing in the way of such labour management conferences in Canada? We have a right to know. You have a right to know.

I think no comment is necessary on that passage. I am going to read another one:

"Let bitterness and discontent get into the hearts of my workers, and, by God, we've lost the war."

That was the statement made by Hon. Ernest Bevin, Britain's Minister of Labour, who is charged with the responsibility of obtaining maximum production. The same is true of any of the nations where free men are working to drive the nazi menace from the earth. But it is not helpful to their morale to be piddling around at war work. It is not helpful to their morale to be working part time on army trucks when they have been told that every minute, every hour, every day counts.

It is not helpful to their morale after helping to put the victory loan drive over the top to be working short time. It is not helpful to their morale to be thrown on the streets without being eligible for unemployment insurance because they have not worked the maximum 180 days. They want to know what is going to be done about it, Mr. M.P.

I had intended to speak of conditions in Britain, but I find I shall not have time. But I do say that people are going to lose confidence completely in members of parliament. Before I close I wish to refer to what was said by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Bruce) the other night, but meanwhile I will finish reading this advertisement. It goes on:

How can members of parliament guarantee total war?

That is the question I ask and every hon. member wants to ask and wants answered. It goes on:

If parliament is to represent the will of the people as it should, you can act to remedy this situation without delay. It is your responsibility to ask those who carry out your will why these conditions we have described only in part continue to exist. You can see that they are stopped. You can see that labour-management conferences are called to end this bottleneck in democracy's arsenal. And we will do our part.

As I said a while ago, this merely indicates a condition prevailing in virtually every industry in the Dominion of Canada, whether it be engaged in producing food, shelter, clothing, or munitions of war. That is a serious statement, but I am positive that if all the facts were brought to light they would establish the truth of what I have said. The mere fact, as the leader of the opposition, I think it was, pointed out yesterday, that we had a national registration in the fall of 1940, which apparently has not so far been used either to determine the extent of our man-power or to put that man-power to work, is I believe one of the greatest condemnations conceivable of this government. And then to think that, without having used the national registration, we should now be contemplating another national registration, and that the Prime Minister should have issued a statement about mobilizing all our man-power when he has not taken steps to use the manpower we do know about—the whole thing is so grotesque that it strikes one almost speechless.

I am going to suggest that the government should immediately begin to cooperate with the labouring men; that it should call a round-table council in which the representatives of the men, the representatives of industry and representatives of the government shall get together and make known the actual conditions which exist in any and every industry in the country. I would hesitate to state on the floor of the house at this time some of the things which I have had brought to my attention respecting the conditions of unemployment and inactivity which exist in a good many of our plants. It is such that it simply makes one sick to think of it.

I am going to put once more to the leader of the opposition this question: If he and his party were in power in Canada to-day what would they do to change these conditions?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would put the men to work.

Mr. BLACKMORE: How would you do it?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Give me a chance and I will show you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The present Prime Minister of Canada used to talk in exactly the same way when he was in opposition, and the night after his election his glorious outburst of enthusiastic promises and resolves was enough to raise us up into a condition of ecstasy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have his words right here; I carry them with me.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Well, I am going to get a copy of them; I want to frame them. But the fact that the Prime Minister made such glowing promises and such confident forecasts at that time, and then made such a dismal failure of his whole effort, suggests that perhaps the leader of the opposition might not know how to improve matters any better than the leader of the government.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh no, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I want to be shown. I want some indication as to how he would manage differently. I believe the people of Canada have heard talk enough about what their leaders are going to do without hearing how they are going to do it.

I am going to lay this principle down to see whether the leader of the opposition and the leader of the government agree with it: Will the leader of the opposition agree that what is physically possible can be made financially possible?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Get an answer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): An academic question.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If we can all agree such can be done, then we shall be ready to go forward. I say it can be done. I do not wish to obtrude upon the house my ideas as to how things can be better managed, but at least I have some ideas as to how conditions can be improved. My contention is that the government has no ideas as to how to manage better and has no intention of making any fundamental changes.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would you also ask, if it was spiritually possible?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not know that it is necessary to go into the spiritual realm. I always feel safer in the physical.

Mr. COLDWELL: So do a good many other people.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Yes. If the leader of the opposition cannot show me how he would govern the country better, he really ought to go about finding out how.

The Prime Minister in one of his speeches, if I recall correctly—he has made so many that I cannot remember them all—has stated that what is physically possible would be made financially possible. But afterwards in one of his characteristic evasions he explained it all away, just as he did his undertaking in 1935 to issue currency and credit in terms of public need. When he got into power he showed that he had an altogether different idea from the commonly accepted meaning of the expression.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Did the hon. member really believe that the Prime Minister was going to do anything like that?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The hon. gentleman is not imputing motives, is he?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I never believed it and I do not believe it now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not saying that I would believe it, but I would hate to disbelieve it. The point I am making is that the Prime Minister in 1935 used an expression which was commonly being used throughout the country, and as a result of his using it he deceived tens of thousands of people into voting for him, believing as they did that he would do what he said he was going to do.

Then about a year or a year and a half after he had got into power he said in the house that all he had ever intended to do in that respect was exactly what Canada had been doing for the previous twenty years. To regard currency and credit in terms of public need as meaning the amount of credit that people would borrow and the amount of currency that was necessary to back the borrowings is so far away from what currency and credit in terms of public need really means that it is shameful to use the expression to describe the process. Our present system is based on the idea that the money a nation can have is only the amount of money which people will borrow. What the farmers will borrow to raise hogs, what the woollen manufacturers will borrow to manufacture cloth, what the wholesalers will borrow in order to distribute, et cetera—that is supposed to be public need. In an age of plenty, the amount of money which producers will and can borrow for production falls altogether short of public need.

It is right there, in that respect, that the change in monetary management has to take place. The governments and the people who are going to manage the countries of the future must know that money, from this time forward, must be issued not only as debt-money, for production, but also as debt-free money, for consumption. The minute that fact is acknowledged we shall begin to understand how a new order can be set up.

I should like the leader of the opposition to tell us by and by, after he has thought it over, whether he actually thinks that what is physically possible can be also financially possible. If he actually does, we shall have a basis on which to work.

Before I close, I would observe that the amount of money which a nation can have depends on the goods and services, producing and consuming power of the nation, and only on that; and that the money shall be issued not only for production but for consumption, not only as debt money but as debt-free money. Once that is granted, then we shall begin to see how it is that what is physically possible can be made financially possible.

If the Minister of Finance were managing a new system based on that new conception, with the skill, energy and intelligence with which he is administering the present system, he would perform miracles in Canada—miracles of production. He would not have to be offended by advertisements such as the one I have read. He would not have to come here and hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) say that we had gone as far as we possibly could in giving the farmers a good price, that we have taken every dollar out of the treasury which we can possibly spare. He would realize that the amount we can give to the farmers depends upon our power to produce lumber, coal, butter, milk and cream, fruit and vegetables and other commodities; upon the doctors ready to look after the people, upon the dentists, and others who serve. He would understand that Canada's production of goods and services is what determines the amount which she can pay for wheat and other primary products; not the amount of money the minister can borrow from banks or from any other source, or the amount which he can tax from the people. He would know then how to make what is physically possible financially possible.

Mr. CHURCH: The desire has been expressed by my leader that these bills should pass to-day and I have no intention of holding up their passage, but I want to mention a few matters which hon. members have not had an opportunity of discussing during this session. There are some questions which we have a right to discuss and with regard to which we have not been given any information since the war started, of adopting measures for the better protection of the soldiers who serve us overseas or in the three forces, questions such as high cost of living bonus, better pay, national insurance, free railway fares, and leave. In the first place, the House of Commons has completely lost control over expenditures. Where is the auditor general while all this is going on? The last budget which the minister presented was for $1,300,000,000 and now he wants another overdraft of $135,000,000, making for the last year, $1,435,000,000. I have a great deal of sympathy for the minister. He has sat here day in and day out and has devoted himself to his duties and the opposition as a whole has given the government good, independent support. True, there has been criticism, but there has not been enough, our friends back home tell us. The Conservative party secured very nearly half the vote in the last election and we have constituents to represent, and to do our duty and perform our function efficiently as an opposition in a great peril like this war.

Parliament fought for over a hundred years to get control over expenditures in England. There is not one word in the main or other estimates, I would point out to the minister, in regard to matters relating to the war, the price ceiling, grain and so on, and it is difficult to ascertain what the exact state of affairs on our budget for the war really is. I suggest that the public accounts committee should meet and go into these matters. For next year the government is war budgeting for $2,200,000,000, which is an increase over last year of about 50 per cent. I do not intend to speak now for more than about fifteen minutes in connection with all these bills, but I suggest that in the recess something should be done to give to the House of Commons that control which it should have over the budget, whether it be in connection with the war or for civilian purposes. Such control is exercised in the old country. There, there is a committee on national expenditures meeting nearly all year, which goes over every dollar of expenditures and every voucher, and coordinates all war effort. We have nothing of that sort. I believe it would be a good thing for us to follow their example. In the British House of Commons certain modern rules are followed which make for expeditious dispatch of business. I support all the rulings of His Honour the respected Speaker, and I support your rulings too, Mr. Chairman. I always pay tribute to the chair and you, sir, also, but I would urge that in the recess the government might take into consideration certain new rules which I shall suggest. I will send copies to the leaders. They can compare the British rules with ours. I think that our standing orders should be amended in accordance with the paragraphs I am going to read.

In a book on parliamentary procedure, 1930, published by G. F. M. Campion, Second Clerk Assistant of the British House Commons—he is now clerk and has been knighted—I read the following:

> Not later than three o'clock the question hour begins. This is a more important item of business than any yet described. It is expected to provide lively moments and seems to be of unfailing interest to members and the public. It is modern and affords a useful method of supervising the administration of the government. Its effectiveness is generally recognized. Questions 'turn a searchlight upon every corner of the public service.' (Lowell, i. 332.) Their chief object is 'the explanation to the public of the meaning of political events', and 'they are often arranged by the government itself, so as to give them an opportunity of making announcements in a somewhat informal way.' (Redlich, ii. 241 and 242). They are 'serviceable as obviating the necessity in many instances of more extended debate and of motions for papers.' (Todd, 1982, ii. 85). And finally, 'Questions afford to the private member under modern conditions almost his only opportunity.' (Marriott, i. 571).

I suggest that our standing order 1, relating to procedure in unprovided cases, should provide that the customs of the British house shall govern. In my opinion, although there is some doubt whether amendment is necessary, this should be considered by the government and by the officers of the house and the three parties.

I wish to speak about two or three other matters relating to the soldier question. We are now at the forty-fifth day of the session. The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Blackmore) said that a debate on the functions of money and the basis of credit is not wasted. He has the right to urge it, but it is a purely domestic question. I contend that the war is primary and should take precedence till it is won. I have been here since the session started, and I have never had an opportunity of mentioning the five or six soldier matters to which I wish to refer but which I will not discuss. As I said last night after 6 o'clock, primary matters should have first consideration in war time and domestic matters wait over. What is the good of talking about changes in our economic system if the war is not won? Life then will not be worth living; there will be no such thing as the price of wheat or the price of anything; everyone will be a slave. We have been here forty-five days and it is almost impossible to get in a few words on behalf of those who are fighting for us. These domestic questions have taken all the time—the plebiscite, the price of wheat, and other local matters.

We are going to have another registry. How many registrations have we had? In 1938, 1939 and 1940 I proposed a national registration of man-power, industrial power, food power and economic power; also a survey of every large and small industry. I urged that about thirty times but it was not adopted. Now we have about six different counts or registers all over again; first the census—and where is all that information to-day? It is not tabulated in such a way as to be of use in the war. Then we had a costly national registration on a huge scale, not worth much so far. My proposal was for a real selective national register two years before the war for security and war and defence purposes, because I saw the war coming and urged this. Now we have another proposed registration of man-power and matters like that by the new Minister of Labour, all over again, which will end in overlapping and doubt and more muddle. I do not believe the new registration to be taken by the Minister of Labour will help our war effort one iota. It is just a duplication and waste of money, because they have all that information already, but it is not tabulated in such a way as to be of use, so a third count is now on in this third war year. Why are all these different people interfering with business and industry and labour so that no man can conduct his own affairs with all these counts so costly and useless? Now they propose to exempt farmers and their sons and help altogether; yet we have never known how many there are available, and we are about the only country in the world in which agricultural workers are entirely exempted from military service. How can we win the war when 70 per cent of our population are exempt? In the last war many farmers' sons in Ontario did not want exemption, and they are not asking for it now. The government has information through those registrations as to the number of farmers' sons who have left the farms and gone to the cities and taken jobs in war and munitions industry, some at $10 or $15 a day with overtime, while the soldiers are fighting for $1.30 a day. Is that fair? Is that the way to beat Hitler? It is not, with these wholesale exemptions of numerous classes. Man-power overseas alone will win the war, not home defence.

This new survey of the Minister of Labour will be a muddle and a sad mistake and a waste of time and will cause endless delays. It is a mistake to exempt farmers. The government have listened to the clamour and agitation of a number of hon. members to do so. There is no scarcity of wheat and grain; in fact there is a large surplus in the world, over 1,500,000,000 bushels, a drug at present on the world's markets. When we have this overproduction why put more men on the land to let them escape military duty? City men are no good on the land. What use would the leader of the opposition or myself or the leader of the house be to-day on the farm? I doubt if we could ride a horse now without falling off. What good would that achieve for farm production or city men as a rule? The thing is ridiculous.

I am asking for better protection for soldiers' dependents, and I ask the two parties to my left for their support. They are asking for $1.41 as a parity price or one dollar for wheat; the soldier is working for $1.30 a day, twenty-four hours a day overseas. Some of them are suffering untold privation on land and sea and in the air and will lose life itself, and they are getting 11 cents a day less than the price asked for a bushel of wheat. I have urged this matter in this house until I am sick of urging it. Some of the ministers, like myself, did not go to the last war. Some of us could not go; I am not here to criticize anyone; I want to be fair, but I was keenly disappointed at the lack of consideration which the Minister of Finance and other hon. gentlemen opposite gave to an application by the soldiers' dependents in this country for a cost-of-living bonus. They have to pay the same prices for groceries and fuel as others do, and I say it was a very hard-hearted answer that was given them by the Minister of Finance. He followed me in the debate on March 4, I think, and replied, opposing this bonus, that as for paying the poor women at home a cost-of-living bonus, it could not be done. Here we are appropriating these billions of dollars, yet we have not a few cents for the dependents of the soldiers fighting for us and serving overseas. I could take the minister into homes in my own constituency and all over the Toronto district where the dependents cannot live on the pay, with several children, and the soldier's wife has to go out to work or washing in many cases in order to buy a ton of coal or help maintain the home fires. Such a condition is a disgrace, and history will criticize us and condemn this parliament for wasting forty-five days discussing purely domestic questions like a plebiscite and other matters, while conditions of the kind exist. I protest against it. I am sick and tired of it with war matters in the background. We can make no headway here on primary, but only on secondary matters; we might just as well go home, because the executive rules. The executive passed 26,000 orders in council, and goodness knows what the deficits will be next year when we have such a huge one for the end of this year, March 31.

I stood in front of the Chateau Laurier the other day and watched able-bodied uniformed men in the pay of the government, some officers in cars, some of whom have never been in this war or the last, and they have able-bodied young soldiers driving them round the city.

Another question I have raised is with regard to a national system of soldiers' insurance. On every soldier the cost would be little. No reply has been given concerning that. If you ask the government about it they simply say that it is a matter of policy and that any announcement will be made in due course. We have been told that three or four times, the past two years in succession.

The question has been raised of free transportation for soldiers. I travel in only one province, though before I was a member at one time I travelled quite a bit. But when I see some of the luxurious cars occupied by those engaged in sports and for conventions and theatre and Hollywood people, and then see the cars occupied by the soldiers who are going over to fight this war for us, I protest, and I ask for a change by the railways and better accommodation for the aid parliament gives them. I do not think the present system in regard to soldiers' fares and meals on trains is fair. Here we are asked to vote a post-mortem, as it were, because we cannot strike off one cent of the $135 million or the other votes.

Another question is the housing problem. In 1934 and 1935 the construction trade was almost down and out. In January, 1935, I moved for a committee on housing. One was appointed a little later on, and on the basis of the report of that committee the new and present government, in 1936 and 1937, did good work, bringing about the spending of some $72,000,000 to date in connection with small housing construction. May 1 is almost here again; civilians and soldiers alike are being turned out of their houses, and I would ask that the old housing administration's policy of the last four years be continued at least until a year after the war.

Some time ago, just after the present Minister of National Defence took office, I offered a suggestion which I want to renew to-day. I greatly sympathize with anyone who has to carry in that department the burdens of government in these war days; but I believe in British Columbia, in the maritimes, in the St. Lawrence ports and elsewhere, in cooperation with school boards, provinces and municipalities, an attempt should be made to teach every man, woman and child to handle a rifle. That was done in Norway and Finland, and those people put up a great home battle. British Columbia will not be able to do so well, I am afraid. In Finland and Norway they had miniature ranges, where the people were taught to shoot, and as a result great numbers of invading Germans were destroyed. It is true that we have no army rifles to spare at the moment, but we could provide miniature rifles and ranges and give instruction to all the people in these vulnerable named areas.

Before the Easter adjournment I think the government would be well advised to give us further information with regard to shipping losses in the Atlantic. I am only going to mention the matter; I do not want to discuss it. The losses in men and tonnage have been appalling from the lack of bases in Eire. We are at times losing more ships than we are able to turn out. Shipping should have first priority, not only in Canada but in all the united allied nations, and I think something should be done in this connection. The same thing applies in the Pacific. I am sorry we cannot give more help to Australia, and I cannot help feeling that in some ways we did not do our duty toward that country before war started or at the imperial conference of 1937 and after it. We should have joined in an empire shipbuilding policy, such as was proposed in 1937, a grant to the Singapore base and adopted the Jellicoe report. I give the government credit; they have done well in many ways, but my point is that we have done only about one-third of what we should do and we have not yet done enough for a total war effort. I believe also that we should recognize General de Gaulle, who has taken action in the approaches to the St. Lawrence at St. Pierre and Miquelon, to keep enemy submarines, lurking there to destroy our ships, away from our cargo and troop ships. Then I would abolish the censorship of the press; and, if the Minister of Labour is going to take over the duties in regard to industry which were announced the other day, there would be no further necessity for the Department of National War Services. It would only be duplication; the unemployment insurance department and the three war departments could do some of it.

I disagree with the theory that the farm is our first line of defence. The first line of defence of Canada in man-power, and our only defence, is overseas; and if that falls all our home defence will not amount to anything. The defence of Canada is not and will not be decided in Vancouver, Halifax, Saint John, Quebec or Montreal; it is being decided overseas and in the battle of the Atlantic, the Pacific, Africa and the far east; and if that line of defence fails, the enemy will be here in Canada in no time and home defence will not amount to much. Why, even if we had a million men we could not do anything in the Pacific, as Mr. Churchill has said, because Japan has command of the whole Pacific ocean, north and south, and her ships can roam like a circus wherever they please, for 15,000 miles among the Pacific islands. How can we stop her? We were offered three or four destroyers and cruisers by the British government in 1937 and urged by Jellicoe to get more, but because of our pacifist sentiments we did not accept the offer to rearm before it was too late, since we depended solely on America's aid in the Pacific.

I think it was a mistake for Admiral Jones and Canada's navy heads, to make the statement they did make in this city to press men the day before yesterday. As head of an important branch of our naval service, that so-called silent arm of the services, he summoned the press and gave them an interview. Surely that is not in the tradition of the silent service. I believe it was a mistake to make that information available to Japan and Germany, who have their agents all over Canada and know our plans. Such talk will hurt us. This incident reminds me of the situation which arose between the two admirals in Halifax not long ago. Under the statute of Westminster the British fleet cannot come closer to our shores than the three-mile limit; they cannot get into Halifax or Victoria, and I think that is one of the greatest mistakes we ever made, because we owe our protection to the British fleet. I predicted in 1937 and 1938, if war came, we faced the possibility of the invasion of the St. Lawrence then.

I should like to refer to what is going on in connection with competitive industry in this country. It will be noticed that the amount covered by this resolution has to do with a number of civilian departments which apparently had overdrawn their appropriation in the $135 million. A list of these departments is shown at page 1556 of Hansard, in the breakdown given there, and among them is the Department of External Affairs. Before the war we spent a great deal of money through this department to establish high commissioners and legations all over the world, and I think that was another great mistake because it divided Britain's representation status. We had at our disposal our representatives in these places, our trade commissioners, and it was a most mischievous policy to follow, fatal in war and of little value in peace. The war has cleared some of them up.

In conclusion, may I say that "never were there so many who knew so little about so much"; and I am referring to the speech by Mr. Gordon in which he told the people of Canada, on behalf of the government, what they should expect and the abolition of all competitive business. All these announcements in the newspapers and speeches over the radio show that Mr. Gordon is acting as a sounding board for the government. Why, even the House of Commons has not been consulted about these changes in our economic system although in session, nor told a thing about it. Our friends to my left have been talking about our economic system and our domestic matters for forty-six days this session, but it was the old competitive system that built up this country in the days of Macdonald and Laurier when everyone owned a small property. It was that system of thrift, with the right fundamentally to possess private property, that made this country and the dominions rich and prosperous. That is the fundamental basis and principle of all sound finance and commerce the empire over. I am not one of those who want to live in the past. I want to rewrite it to meet modern conditions and bring it up to date, because we are entering upon a new world. I have always been a friend of labour consistently, but I would say that the right to possess private property is derived from nature, not from man, and the state has no right to abolish it, but only to regulate its use.

People are wondering what this House of Commons is for, and what minister of the crown is responsible to parliament for all the ins and outs of this wartime prices and trade board and all their controllers and legion of officials. Is all competitive industry to die and wither away, as Mr. Gordon says, over our heads? Is everybody to become an employee of the government, under national ownership, with every worker on a farm to receive $15 a week? The small business man might just as well close up and go out of business; the retail trade of Toronto might just as well quit because no independent private business man can function and make a living. I do not believe in that system, with all the artificial barriers, burdens and restraints put on him. At the beginning of the war, and up to 1941 the old policy was maintained, "no commitments; parliament will decide," but now that has gone to the archives, following all the announcements that have been made by these various people, and bureaucratic czars over the head of parliament. The public will agree to any regulation so long as they know it is helping the war effort, but a great many of these things have no relation to the war at all. In those cases we should have something to say, I believe.

I am free to admit that so far as such necessities of life as food, clothing, fuel and many other domestic things are concerned, some regulation may be quite necessary, and the public will agree to it if necessary and are glad to comply for the sake of the war. But that is not the case in connection with many other commodities, and the rationalization and streamlining, zoning policy made nationally in everything, with bonuses and subsidies as well will lead to untold abuses and no one knows at what cost.

No doubt war production should have priority, but there are very few walks of life to-day which are not supervised or directed by some department of state at Ottawa. Canada is fighting this war with Britain as her leader for two real objects—to keep Britain, the dominions and our allies free, and to see that Canada and Britain may enjoy prosperity. If Germany were to win we would lose our freedom; they would grind us as slaves to the earth. If Germany wins, still more bureaucrats will be here, and our freedom will wither away and life will not be worth living. This new belated plan of controlling everything, this heterogeneous device with respect to man-power threatens our economic and commercial and trade freedom. It will not half of it, help the winning of the war or help one iota to beat Hitler, or assist in bringing about a total war effort It will only cause, like the new registration, more muddle, confusion, waste, duplication of services, coma, doubt, inertia, vacuum and expense, and in the end national bankruptcy. There will no doubt be a complicated duplication and multiplication of numerous new boards to ruin retail and small business and our industries, and in the end cause unemployment.

The new plan of exemptions eliminates about 70 per cent of the population from military service altogether. It will lead to a muddle in man-power, hurt our army, navy and air force, and cause confusion in trade and industry. Industry does not yet know what it is or where it will lead to. Is the war policy of the government to be that the government is to control and administer every walk of life and almost every article or commodity of trade and commerce, and all competitive business? If so, it will lead this country to disaster and, in my opinion, sooner or later, national bankruptcy. It will not help the war effort and they will try to continue it after the war on international grounds. In England an act has been passed to restore former trade practices as before the war. One should be passed here.

New departments are being created all along the line. May I point out, too, that I am sick and tired of all these orders in council by officials and registrars in the making, who have never had to deal in business with masses of men, or to shoulder any responsibility, or even to take any risks or serve in a competitive calling, but are merely theorists. They tell us of brave new worlds to conquer and to come; and if we were to follow them we would invite and bring nearer in Canada decay, ruin, stagnation, economic slavery, ruined enterprises both large and small, closed factories, and no work for our people. It will all end in doom for all competitive business, with a mighty host and a large standing army of inspectors, examiners, dreamers, supervisors and registrars, regulators, clerks, stenographers, card-filing officials and stamp clerks. It would be a mere nepotist army, also, the way these boards have selected all their people. Many of these new departments have more than one of the same family on their payrolls. The fact that we are at war and are in desperate need is no good reason why some of these matters should be adopted but not be discussed. We should be less ready, as a House of Commons, to tolerate any method which is not meant to win the war. When we know that seventy-five per cent of them do not help at all in winning the war, then we ought to object to them, and insist that when parliament is meeting this is the place to announce them.

The system which has been introduced supplants courageous leadership and courageous business men, most of whom by a small start got a good small or large business together. But these new departments by dilatory methods and aim are going round in a circle, and the adoption of cumbersome routine, will fundamentally destroy Canada in time and not help win the war. It is likely, however, that the new condition will want to continue in business after the war is over. Those new boards are going to find some excuse to continue after the war, but in England they are checked by the act passed to restore pre-war trade practices to aid trade.

For three or four centuries Britain has proved that free men and free enterprise would lead, the world over, and this made her not only the mart of all the world but the leader in trade and commerce. Now we are asked by dreamers, theorists and officials to surrender it all; we are asked to surrender it for new plans and new schemes impossible of fulfilment. I can say to the minister and to some of his deputies that a good deal of this has been introduced by theorists who never had any dealings in any Canadian competitive business. They were imbued with new-found, socialist ideas, or whatever they were. They do not understand cause and effect of those theories on retail and wholesale business or on any business, and will hurt labour and its best national interests. It is a design which will ruin our system which made British and empire trade. The press and members of parliament to-day have come to the point where they should do something to combat this condition and insist on parliamentary control over it or a discussion here. I will admit that much has been done by some of these boards to keep down some well-needed prices. That procedure may have been all right. But to put a ceiling over all prices by subsidies for some, not others, and to abolish competition, something upon which the two older political parties have based their whole history, and upon which the economic trade and commercial history of this country is based, and to destroy it over our heads is not a proper procedure. The older parties in Canada have always encouraged private independent business; surely they would be sorry to see it go. If it passes away, then I say we shall be in just as bad a position as Germany—a nation run by bureaucrats, something we are fighting in this war for freedom of everything and to make our country have proper security for its people and work for our people under a new deal worth living for; for everyone.

Mr. GILLIS: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting for the floor since yesterday afternoon and, while I have no desire to hold up the progress of the resolution, I should like to speak at this time. Had hon. members to my right carried out the wishes of the Minister of Finance in dealing with this measure to-day, so far as I am concerned I would have foregone the right to say anything. Nevertheless there are some matters which I believe should be discussed, and in dealing with them I shall be brief, abrupt and to the point. Incidentally may I say that sitting here as I do five days of the week it irritates me to hear someone who ordinarily spends two days in the house to get himself on record, and the rest of the time in Toronto, talk about wasting time.

With respect to the question of selective service, we have stated many times in the house that there is a good deal of merit in that method of organizing industry, in view of the setting in which we find ourselves to-day. But we have also expressed the view that if that system is to be effective, and if it is to do the job it aims to do, those who are to be regimented under it must have some say in the control set-up.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They should not be chattels.

Mr. GILLIS: That is right. If the government is desirous of making effective their selective service system, the thing they should do first and foremost is to make the recognition of collective bargaining obligatory on the part of the operators. If that is not done I see a stormy road ahead for those who are charged with the responsibility of organizing industry and man-power on a selective basis.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There is a threat.

Mr. GILLIS: I merely express that opinion. I will make no criticism of the system proposed until such time as we have seen it tried out. But I do insist that what I have suggested should be carried out. So far there has been no mention of any representative of those who will be regimented under the controls being set up.

I should like briefly to bring the coal situation to the attention of the government. Earlier in the afternoon the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) read a telegram which stated that United States coal imported into Canada for domestic purposes is being subsidized. I understand the duty has been taken off. I do not know whether the statement contained in the telegram is correct, but if it is, there is something radically wrong with our fuel control. I know that in Nova Scotia mines are closing. I believe this is a matter of public concern at the present time. I received a telegram this morning stating that a mine operated in Inverness by the provincial government, which employed some 450 men, is now idle, and that a new opening they were making has been abandoned because of cost.

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member said I spent three days a week in the house. I am here four days, and I come as often as I can. The hon. member has not stated the facts, and I ask him to be gentleman enough to retract what he has said—because he is a gentleman for whom I have high regard.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member should withdraw the remarks which are offensive to the hon. member for Broadview.

Mr. GILLIS: I did not make those remarks. I mentioned no names, and I named no hon. member.

The CHAIRMAN: That is worse, because it applies to all hon. gentlemen who come from Toronto.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The hon. member had better take it back; that is the shortest way.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. member should withdraw his remark.

Mr. GILLIS: If it offends anyone, I am prepared to withdraw it. Nevertheless it is true.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman must not attach such a limitation to his withdrawal.

Mr. GILLIS: I withdraw it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think we might as well have this cleared up. The hon. member cannot get away with that; I have tried to do it myself and he cannot do it. This is a reflection upon every hon. member from Toronto, and he must withdraw it.

Mr. GILLIS: I have withdrawn it.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will please withdraw his last remark, "nevertheless it is true."

Mr. GILLIS: I did withdraw it. As I was saying when this other matter arose, the coal industry is in need of more efficient planning. It must look strange to the Canadian people to see the government subsidizing imported coal while our own mines are idle. I am going to mention a number of matters at this time because the Minister of Finance is in the chamber. While these matters may refer particularly to the Department of Pensions and National Health and the Department of Munitions and Supply, they involve additional expenditure and therefore must be approved by the treasury board.

I would call the attention of the minister to the basic training being given cadets in our schools. These are our future soldiers. Under the present system there is a duplication of work and a waste of time and money. Cadets are trained for the three services, the navy, the army and the air force. The initial or basic training consists of some two hundred hours, and it is the same for all forces. But at present the different cadets are being handled separately, which necessitates more instructors. One instructor could do the work now being done by three. Then the matter of uniform comes into question. The most attractive uniform attracts the most cadets; they all want to get into the air force. This is the problem created for those who are handling the cadets. The boys in our high schools who are taking this basic training will be the soldiers of to-morrow. If they get this training under proper supervision the need for it on the parade ground will be largely eliminated. In addition they receive sixteen hours of specialized training to fit them for whatever unit they may want to join after leaving the cadet corps. This is all very useful work, but an analysis should be made in order to eliminate any defects that might exist.

Another matter I should like to bring to the minister's attention is in connection with the air force cadets. This corps is organized on a charitable basis. The work is necessary and could be productive of much good. At the present time committees in the different communities are obliged to raise money by appeals to public-spirited citizens and the work is financed in this way. Teachers who receive honorary appointments as officers in the corps are obliged to buy their own uniforms and so forth. Many of them cannot afford to do this. They would like to do something but they are placed in an awkward position because they cannot afford this expenditure. I think money should be appropriated for this purpose and the work should be directed by the Department of National Defence. I call this to the attention of the minister because if any change is proposed the matter will be brought before the treasury board which will say whether or not an expenditure is justified.

I have received a number of complaints from men in the armed forces who are desirous of adopting children. If a child is adopted subsequent to enlistment, as the regulations now stand no pay and allowances can be granted. Many institutions across Canada are trying to find homes for unfortunate children and their work is carried on on a charitable basis. Many men in the armed forces have adopted children but they cannot get any allowance, and more would adopt them if allowances were available. The present regulations are retarding a necessary endeavour and depriving children of homes. Many persons who would like to have children in their homes are blocked by the regulations. I mention this so the minister may give it some consideration.

I think the gasoline regulations discriminate against clergymen. Drugless healers and others are permitted a mileage of 15,000, but clergymen get only half this amount. In the community from which I come the clergyman is as necessary as the doctor. He has many calls to make at all hours of the day; he covers a large territory; he is on call day and night. Some consideration should be given to him. At least our regulations should conform to those in the United States; clergymen in Canada should receive the same consideration as is given to clergymen in that country.

I should like to say a word or two about wartime housing. Before coming to Ottawa for this session the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) and I met the city council of Sydney. There is a serious housing shortage in that city. Perhaps 1,000 more men are employed in the steel plant to-day than were employed prior to the war. A plate mill has recently been opened which will employ from 400 to 600 men. During the summer months hundreds of men come in and out of this port. An air field has been established there and this has brought another group of men to the city. The officials are at their wit's end to provide wartime housing. They told us that their requirements are at least 500 additional houses. I understand a report was made to the government. The city council urged that we try to do something about this, that we bring it to the attention of the government for consideration.

Another matter about which I have corresponded with the government has to do with the facilities for shipping at this port. Perhaps 2,000 ships used this port last year and there are no wharfage facilities available. If a ship comes in slightly damaged there is no way to get its cargo out. Those who are endeavouring to regulate traffic in and out of the port have a serious problem on their hands. I urge that some consideration be given to providing facilities for commercial shipping. This is not for naval purposes; it is for the purpose of taking care of the growing flood of traffic in and out of this port occasioned by the war.

I should like to direct the attention of the minister to the plight of the retail gasoline dealer. We all realize that the use of gasoline for domestic purposes should be reduced as much as possible, but if the regulations are effective it will mean that many retail gasoline dealers will be put out of business. The more effective the regulations are, the greater the number of retail gasoline dealers who will be put out of business. Many of them have an investment in this business; a good many of them run a repair shop in connection with the station, but gasoline is the main attraction. Their costs have gone up from 20 to 30 per cent since the outbreak of war, and now that they are being legislated completely out of business they at least have the right to know whether the government can utilize their plants. If not, some compensation should be granted to them for the loss they are sustaining. The government is practically taking over their business of selling gasoline, and the retail gasoline dealers should be compensated on the basis of replacement value. I suggest that that question be given consideration. The regulations are unjust to the average retail dealer because in addition to all the restrictions put upon his business the oil controller has permitted wholesalers, for example, who were purchasing 500 gallons of gasoline a week from the local dealers to put in their own tanks. Owners of commercial vehicles can also put in their own tanks. The retail dealer is being legislated out of the picture. He is being treated unjustly in comparison with the big oil companies which have been getting a two-cent increase on their sales since the outbreak of war, while the retail dealer got absolutely nothing. His business has shrunk about 50 per cent, while his costs have gone up. He is liable for cost-of-living bonus, must pay increased costs in other directions due to the war, and is receiving no consideration. I rise for the purpose of bringing this to the attention of the Minister of Finance, because in the final analysis all these things must pass through the treasury board.

I suggest also that the Minister of Pensions and National Health give consideration to extending the allowance to adopted children so that children who have been adopted subsequent to the soldier's enlistment can be taken care of. The regulations do not cover that now.

I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, to have taken up the time of the committee, and I would not have done so had you received the cooperation of the committee in the manner suggested by the minister.

[Mr. Gillis.]

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The other night the Minister of Munitions and Supply, speaking over the radio on the rubber question, said that the rubber situation was critical. Has the Minister of National Defence checked over the specifications for rubber requirements used by his department, with a view to eliminating any excess rubber that may be used in certain articles? I understand that most of the specifications call for super-aging rubber, while for many of these articles standard rubber would be satisfactory and its use would save many thousands of pounds of rubber.

Mr. RALSTON: A study has been made of that matter already and is continuing. There are several methods under consideration by which the use of rubber can be curtailed and possibly a lower quality used, so that there will be less use of the higher grade of rubber of which my hon. friend speaks.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): There has been some criticism of the use made in Canada by the Department of National Defence of automobiles, trucks and other vehicles. The complaint is that they are being used for non-essential purposes. Some of them are driven along the streets with nobody in them but the driver, and sometimes they run half a dozen times to the same place in one day. There has been that criticism not only in Ottawa but elsewhere, and I wondered if there was going to be any check-up.

Mr. RALSTON: Perhaps my hon. friend was in on the conference I held last night on that very subject.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am glad to hear there has been a conference. I have heard the same complaint in Fredericton, where this practice has been observed. It would save a lot of money if the minister put the clamps on.

Mr. RALSTON: There was an article in the Kingston Whig-Standard some time ago which caused me considerable concern and regarding which I took what was thought to be drastic and vigorous action. The matter is being pursued.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): In a report that was made on March 17 by the Minister of National War Services it was stated that ten million pairs of woollen socks had been ordered. Why should such a large quantity as ten million socks be ordered for the army?

Mr. MARTIN: The Minister of National War Services is out of the chamber.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know, but can the Minister of National Defence tell us why that number would be ordered? There are ten thousand branches of the Red Cross right across the country, each of which knit many dozen pairs of socks a week. Ten million pairs of socks in addition to those knitted by the Red Cross seems to be an enormous number.

Mr. RALSTON: I really cannot believe that the minister's statement was understood aright; or perhaps my colleague had some mis-information.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have his statement here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It was a public statement.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): It says ten million pairs of socks, and underneath that it says that woollen gloves are being issued at the rate of 100,000 pairs a month.

Mr. RALSTON: I will find out about it.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask the Minister of Finance how much of this war appropriation and of the other war appropriation already dealt with is to be allotted to agriculture?

Mr. ILSLEY: The total allotted to agriculture out of the war appropriation is $32,786,000 for the whole of the present year. It is impossible to say what part of this $135,000,000 enters into that $32,786,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Some of it is used to pay for subventions.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I say to the Minister of National Defence in regard to the money to be appropriated under this resolution that many people both in the house and outside have suggested that a rehabilitation fund be set up for the armed forces which would be available for their use after the war. I realize that there may be reasons, although they are not very clear to me, why the armed forces should not be receiving higher pay at the moment. But I suggest in all sincerity that nothing could do more to improve the morale of the men in the armed forces of Canada than for the government to set aside a savings fund, a rehabilitation fund, if you will, in which the armed forces would have a real stake after their fighting days are over. I have always been strongly in favour of such a fund. I think one other member has already drawn it to the attention of the house. It seems to me that in our national selective service arrangements we are faced with two problems which are very difficult of solution. First we are up against the lack of parity—we have used the word parity in many debates on agriculture, and lack of parity seems to me to present one of the greatest difficulties in connection with national selective service, as I think the minister will agree. Here you have on the one side, agriculture, which is a wartime industry, and as the months go by I feel that agriculture will be recognized as an essential wartime industry even more than it has ever been before. I am not going to make a special plea on behalf of the farmer to-day except to mention that the farmer is definitely operating under a lack of parity of return as compared with other wartime industries.

In addition to that, the armed forces are working under a similar disability. If we are to put into effect a definite national war-time selective service in Canada, it behooves the government and parliament, from the point of view of financial and economic returns, to treat our farmers and the men in the armed forces on a basis of equality of remuneration with other war-time activities. I hope that the committee and the ministers in charge will take into serious consideration the question of setting aside for our soldiers, airmen and sailors some kind of rehabilitation fund so that in addition to the pay they receive, and the allowances they are given by virtue of service in the forces, they will have each month or year, as the case may be, set aside for them, something in the way of a savings fund in order that they may have a substantial stake at the end of the war. That is important in the interests of morale at the present time and of the welfare of the men at the close of the war. The men, I think, will find it easier to rehabilitate themselves and to resume their normal places in our civilian life if they are given something to start with instead of coming back not fully provided for. I make that suggestion seriously. I think it is one of the most important points which the government can deal with at the moment, and I couple with it the question of agriculture which I brought up a moment ago.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not quite sure what the hon. gentleman refers to. He speaks of a savings fund. As he knows, pay is deferred now and is paid when the men return. In addition to that, orders in council were passed last October with regard to rehabilitation and providing for one month's allowance, for compensation really in lieu of unemployment insurance, providing for assistance in connection with interrupted education, providing for vocational training and for assistance while awaiting return to employment, and providing for out-of-work assistance and for other benefits. These things have already been done. I should think, as my hon. friend has anticipated, that the matters to which he refers are properly matters which might be brought before the committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation appointed yesterday.

Mr. GRAYDON: All members, I believe, are fully aware of the steps which have been taken, and they are certainly steps in the right direction. My main objection is that they do not go far enough. They do not provide a really large enough fund against the time when the men are discharged, because one cannot do much with one month's pay and with a few odds and ends of that sort. I should like to see the men in our armed forces come back to their normal activities in Canada without being penalized financially or economically by reason of the fact that they have served overseas or in Canada in the forces.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is the objective.

Mr. GRAYDON: I am glad to hear the minister say that, and I hope he will keep that objective in mind and increase the savings fund which I suggest should be set up, because, even with what has been done, we are not approaching parity in dealing with our men at home and with the men in the armed forces generally.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What the hon. gentleman is referring to is the discrepancy between those who go to fight and those who stay to engage in war work. That is the point, and it does seem to me that there is a substantial disparity between the $1.30 a day that is paid to our men, with what is given to their dependents, and what is paid in the way of wages to men in the factories. They do not begin to compare. I do not think that is a fair deal to the man who is risking his life. What the hon. member suggests is that the government consider setting aside by appropriation a credit in the nature of additional pay—call it that if you will—which will be paid to the man after he is discharged, with a view to reestablishing him on his own. I will not say more about it now, but that is the theory underlying the suggestion. I know there is difficulty about it, and I am not going to enlarge upon it at the moment, but that is the theory which I hope the government will take into consideration.

One word to the Minister of Finance. On page 1698 of Hansard, when he gave the table of totals amounting to $1,435,000,000, there is a total of $1,407,000,000 chargeable to war expenditures and $24,030,000 odd chargeable to asset accounts. He may have explained that to me on a previous occasion, but I cannot recall just what that means.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is made up in this way: Active loans and investments, Canadian National Railways: (a) purchase of equipment, $1,030,000; (b) working capital, $18,000,000; and advance to commodity companies in the Department of Munitions and Supply, $5,000,000, making a total of $24,030,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, but was it necessary to advance $18,000,000 to the Canadian National Railways when their earnings were the highest in history?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I should like to have an explanation of that. They have I do not know how many millions in the bank to-day. I have not the report here, but I thought they were in a state of affluence; yet they are working on capital borrowed from the government. That seems to me to be a most astounding situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not astounding at all.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, at first blush, I will say it is astounding.

Mr. RALSTON: Blush again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, I do blush. That is only a manner of speaking; but that is how it strikes me, an ordinary layman who is not on the inside. I do think that if ever there was a time when the Canadian National Railways should go on their own, it is now. They are doing the greatest business in the history of the country. If they cannot go on their own now, with all their earnings—I am not speaking about buying back securities, because that is another matter; I am speaking of working capital—what are we to expect when the post-war period arrives?

Mr. ILSLEY: The larger the volume of business, the more working capital is required.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): How many millions have they to their credit in the banks? Much more than $24,000,000 I will bet.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They may not have as much when they repay, before the 31st of this month, interest on government loans, but they are still a long way from the poorhouse to-day.

Mr. RALSTON: May I say one word first with regard to the matter of pay. Nobody is more anxious than I am about the apparent discrepancy when one speaks of $1.30 a day and compares that with wages paid in industry, but there are more compensating factors to be taken into consideration. Those factors have been brought out from time to time at various conferences which have been held throughout the country. Men in trades, receiving the wages to which my hon. friend refers, generally receive promotion before very long and get tradesmen's pay. It has been figured—without the actual documents before me I would not want to give the exact figures—that there is not anywhere near the discrepancy that might be imagined. In some cases they come pretty well up when dependents' allowance is counted in as well as the tradesmen's pay received. Some time I will give the committee a statement in regard to that, not in any defensive spirit, but with the idea of showing that the facts show a considerably different situation in comparing pay due the armed services with that received by those in civilian employment.

Mr. GRAYDON: That does not take into consideration the danger, of course.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, you cannot measure that.

Mr. RALSTON: I sometimes get a little irritated when people talk about a man doing equally valuable war service. I say there is no service that compares in equality with the service of a man who enlists and risks his life.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Absolutely. You cannot measure it in dollars and cents.

Mr. RALSTON: When people advise a young man that he is doing just as important and valuable work at home, I say it cannot rank with the service given by the soldier.

Might I turn from that to a very plebian subject, the ten million pairs of socks. A member of the house who is a good deal better at mathematics than I am and who is in the clothing business points out to me that with a force of 500,000 men—and of course there are more than that when you think of those who went in and out again, and including all three services and reserve units as well—at eight pairs per man per year and assuming everyone had served for two and a half years, that does not seem out of the way at all. However, I will inquire further into the matter.

Mr. MacNICOL: I wish to make two brief observations. The first relates to a number of letters I am receiving from people who use cars in their business and who are not classified for gasoline rations in a class that permits them to continue in business. I will describe one instance that is more or less typical.

I know a man who deals in automotive supplies and travels from garage to garage all over western Ontario. He bought a big old-fashioned car and uses it as a truck with shelves in the back seat to carry his goods. He writes telling me that he will be forced to give up his business, in which he has been engaged for some twenty years, because the amount of gasoline allowed him is not sufficient to enable him to carry on. I know the government do not want to drive small business men out of business; the Minister of Finance needs the revenue. If thousands of small business men like the one I mention are forced out of business, that will be detrimental to the revenue. I think the differentiation between a car such as this used in business, practically a truck, and a private car, should be looked into very carefully.

Another matter about which I am greatly concerned is the direction of the road from south of the Peace river to connect with the Alaska highway at Fort St. John. I have been in that area; I am not perhaps as familiar with it as those who live there, but I made a careful survey by photograph and otherwise and I think I know the situation. I know that the government wants to do what it can to expedite travel north of the Peace river in the direction of the Alaska highway. My observation was that that country might possibly be invaded. There is a great deal of prairie; the mountains are not so wide at the north end of British Columbia; and while I hope no invasion takes place, it is imperative that this country be in a position to transport numbers of troops rapidly to defend it against invasion. The other day we had a statement tabled here, not of the direction the road is to take from Edmonton to Fort St. John, but of several directions that it could take. In my opinion every consideration but speed should be disregarded as far as the direction the road should take in war time is concerned.

It is some 267 miles from Edmonton by rail to the railway junction point south of the river at McLennan. There the railway branches, one branch going directly north or northwest and crossing the Peace river at the town of Peace River, some fifty miles northwest of McLennan. This branch of the railway then continues west on the north side of the Peace river for some sixty-four miles to Hines Creek. That is the terminus on the north side of the river. Last fall—hon. members from Alberta will be able to tell the time better than I—the Alberta government, very rightly in my opinion, subscribed money to project the highway west of Hines Creek in the direction of the British Columbia boundary. The British Columbia government—and the British Columbia members will know better than I, particularly the hon. member for Cariboo—projected their highway eastward towards the Alberta border with the intention that the two highways would meet. That road is constructed to a considerable extent. On the north side of the Peace, one river has to be bridged, not a large river as we consider rivers here, and very small in comparison with the Peace river. Both in northern British Columbia and northern Alberta, they have been working to have that road completed. It is not completed. I am convinced that this government should advance whatever is required to complete, as an essential military project, that highway from Hines Creek to Rose Prairie, which is some twelve miles north of Fort St. John, because the only bridge over the Peace river is that at the town of Peace River. That is a huge bridge, longer I think than this across the Ottawa river here. I believe it is something around 1,800 feet or more in length. Why there is any delay in completing the road west of Hines Creek I cannot understand. In my judgment its completion is absolutely imperative as a military necessity.

There is another roadway, as the Prime Minister pointed out, a much longer one, running west of McLennan to Rycroft, where it turns immediately to the left and runs away to the south approximately fifty miles, then northwest to Dawson Creek. When it reaches Dawson Creek it is a matter of fifty miles more or less to Fort St. John, but between those two points this huge river has to be crossed by ferry, and shortly, when the ice breaks and the spring freshets come, it will be some time before a boat could cross that river. Once the ice is gone and the floes have disappeared, they could cross on a pontoon bridge, if one were constructed. There is not one there now, or rather there has not been one up to the present time. So, from the point of view of a military project the government should waste no further time in attempting to develop the roadway, and I believe also the railway, west from its terminus at Hines Creek to Rose Prairie, which will be on the road from Fort St. John to Alaska.

I appreciate the opportunity of making these few observations, because I am interested in these two matters and particularly, if I may say so, in the defence of that vast country in the Pacific northwest, and our ability to get to it rapidly in case that defence becomes necessary.

[Mr. MacNicol.]

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This item, as I understand it, has to do with expenditures for the present year.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of National Defence one matter based on sessional paper No. 154. In a committee where we seem to be talking all the time in terms of millions and billions, it may seem picayune to bring up a matter concerning only several thousand dollars, but I should like to point out that the average man on the street, particularly in a small community, does not deal with millions of dollars. He deals with the few thousand dollars spent in his locality, and he forms his impression as to how we are administering public funds from what he sees in his immediate vicinity. Personally I always feel sad when what seems like a glaring example of poor management tends to destroy the public confidence of a community, especially a community such as the one from which I come, where enlistments have been high and support for the war has been very strong.

I am referring now to the Weyburn barracks. I am not going to take time to do more than point out the highlights of the matter to the minister. The first battalion of the South Saskatchewan regiment, stationed at Weyburn, was mobilized immediately on the outbreak of war. In order to secure a barracks the government rented the International Harvester building, which was a very good building, and spent some $7,229.65 in equipping it; paid $560 a month rent; kept it in repair from time to time, spending on one occasion $1,773.72 and on another $1,196.94 for repairs. The building gave excellent service. The first battalion of the South Saskatchewan regiment trained there until a few months before it left for overseas, and another regiment also trained there. The barracks was closed for a time, and then the second battalion of the South Saskatchewan regiment was stationed there for training.

Last fall some officer was sent into the district, and he intimated that the government were not prepared to continue paying $560 a month rent for a barracks which was used only from time to time, and that it was intended to close the barracks. My information, from those who are in a position to know, is that the general manager of the International Harvester company put it up to the government in this way. He said, "We do not expect you to pay this rent. We are prepared to let you leave your equipment there; let the building stand as it is and we will charge nothing at all, even for the storage of the equipment. We are not likely to use the building in these times, and when you want it again you can take it over." The reply of the officer was, "Well, those are not my orders. We must proceed to take out all the equipment and fixtures we put in, and place the building back in the shape in which we found it in 1939." That was done, at a cost of some $1,840.70, with the result that the building is now back in the shape in which it was before and is not available as a barracks should the occasion arise to use it as such. In all, we have spent on that building $39,209.82.

Mr. RALSTON: Including the rent?

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Yes, including maintenance, repairs and rent, and of course I point out that a large part of that total is rent, amounting to $14,560; but that still leaves $25,000 which has been spent on maintenance and repair. I am not objecting to that at all. What I am pointing out is that here was one of the finest barracks in western Canada. It is not just a matter of closing it; it is a matter of spending nearly $2,000 to take out all the fixtures, which in all probability will have to be put back again. Should certain contingencies materialize on either coast; should the second battalion of the South Saskatchewan regiment have to be mobilized, that barracks will have to be used again, because it is the only place available. We are talking about building training centres for the trainees. Here was one of the finest barracks, capable of accommodating anywhere from eight hundred to a thousand men.

I ask the committee to consider the impression on the public mind. Here is a barracks on which we, the public, have spent money. Perhaps there is no need to use it at the moment; but why spend $2,000 to take out plumbing fixtures, heating equipment, equipment for showers and so on, and probably have to spend several thousand dollars more putting them all back some time later? It seems to me this was a case of red tape actually interfering in what would have been an ordinary, common sense business transaction of accepting the offer of the International Harvester company to let the building stand idle, to waive the rent and storage charges, so that in the event of the building being required the arrangement could have been picked up again right where it was dropped.

Mr. RALSTON: The criticism which my hon. friend puts forward depends, of course, for its validity on that conversation of which he speaks between the officer and the president of the company.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The general manager.

Mr. RALSTON: Of course I know nothing whatever about that. What my hon. friend says is that the general manager offered to give for nothing a building for which he had been charging $500 a month. That may be quite so. I am going to find out about it, of course; certainly I shall look into it.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is what I want the minister to do.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I wish to congratulate the Minister of National Defence upon his statement that there was no service which ranked as high as that of the man who offered his life for his country. I think we are quite in agreement with that, but I do not believe that is sufficient. It is all right to offer platitudes and praise to the men of the fighting forces, but I think that must be supplemented with something a little more concrete. I do not think anything would please the soldiers more than to be given a little better financial consideration.

That recalls to my mind a question which I have brought to the attention of the Minister of National Defence since war broke out; that is, the matter of the treatment given those in the army, as compared with the treatment given those in the other services. I recall when I left to come to Ottawa for this session, standing in the station at Calgary and seeing a colonial train pull out ahead of us. There were quite a number of soldiers standing there, and when that colonial train had pulled out of the station I went to the policeman at the door and asked whether the soldiers were going on that train. He said they were. I said, "Well, that seems queer. What is the matter with these air force fellows, and these navy men? Do they not go on the same train?" His reply was, "No, none of them are going on that train." I thought what a tragic situation that was, that because some of those men happened to be in the army they were packed off on a colonial train, while others, members of the air force and the navy—and I am not complaining about their treatment—were allowed to go tourist. I do not think that is conducive to good feeling.

Mr. RALSTON: I admit at once to my hon. friend that that condition did exist; but I must say it has been cured, and that the provision for travelling accommodation is exactly the same for parity of ranks in all three services at the present time.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am extremely pleased to hear that. I brought this question up when war first broke out. I have gone through trains, and have passed from the standards with which officers are accommodated—the very best of accommodation—and on through to the tourist class, where the air force and the navy received excellent accommodation. Then, right on through on the same train, I would go into the day coach and find soldiers sleeping on their coats, with their lunches under their arms. That is not good, and we cannot expect to maintain the morale of our forces under those conditions. I am more than pleased to hear now from the Minister of National Defence that that condition has been changed.

Mr. RALSTON: Some time ago.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It could not have been very long ago because it was when I was coming to Ottawa to attend this session that I saw it.

Mr. RALSTON: Then I say to my hon. friend that it was absolutely contrary to regulations, if that was the case. I have the information that it was changed during the November session. If my hon. friend would be good enough to tell me what train it was, I would be glad to inquire into the matter.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not remember what train but, as I say, it was when I left to come here for the session.

Mr. RALSTON: There are times—and they are not infrequent just now, on account of the tremendous traffic on the railways—when the proper kind of rolling stock is not available. But if my hon. friend says there was one train in which men in the army were found in the colonist cars, and men of the air force in tourist cars, I say to him that that was not according to regulation, and I would be glad to look into the facts. I would do that, if the hon. member would tell me what train it was.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I can understand the minister's answer that where rolling stock is scarce, such a condition might arise. But I do not think there should be any hesitancy about putting some of the air force men, navy men and army men together. All the fighting forces should be treated the same, and the sooner we come to that, the better for everybody.

Mr. JACKMAN: I used to ride in a colonist car, myself.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Probably you should have been there; I would not argue that point.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. That is most irregular.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): There is another point I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. One of the greatest problems with which we are faced is that of production. Of all the things which will contribute most to our war effort, certainly production stands at the top. In the last couple of years we have seen what happens when our forces are not properly equipped. There is absolutely no question about it that we are not producing anywhere near what we should be producing. I have no doubt all hon. members received a copy of the Financial Post this morning. In that issue it is stated that we are turning out about 25 per cent to 30 per cent of the amount of production we could turn out. Not long ago the Prime Minister said that we are turning out about 44 per cent. I believe the figure of 30 per cent gives a fair estimate of our production at the present time. It is not good for the morale of our people to see manufacturing industries which are idle. We have an illustration right here in Ottawa, one which has not yet been corrected. I refer to the laying off of 500 men by the Ottawa Car and Aircraft. To my mind that is next to criminal. There is another situation in Oshawa where it has been estimated that 700 men have been laid off. Another 1,500 men are going to be laid off by the Chrysler works. Another 2,000 are to be laid off in other automotive industries. There is no question in the world that such a condition should not prevail.

I was interested in the meeting called the other day and attended by automotive workers who came from Oshawa and Windsor to interview ministers in the government. I believe they spoke to the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the Minister of Labour. Those men suggested that the ministers should go into the streets of Oshawa and Windsor, and listen to the comments made by the workmen, and by people generally. I hear those comments every time I come to Ottawa on the train, and I do not believe I would be exaggerating if I were to say that the people of Canada are fast reaching the belief that there is no concerted war effort, and that the government has no definitely laid plan.

The men who came to Ottawa the other day were as sincere a group of workers as one would find anywhere. Their desire was not that of embarrassing the government, but rather to assist labour and industry to organize so as to bring about greater production. That was their only purpose, and surely it was a most commendable procedure for those men, who came here at their own expense.

I was particularly interested in the condition in regard to tool and die-making in Oshawa. It is my understanding that one of the greatest lags in industry is caused through lack of proper dies and tooling equipment. The General Motors plant has laid off over 700 workers, and the excuse given by the minister is that the men were laid off because the plant was tooling up for a new order. But while that was taking place, a considerable number of experienced tool and die-makers were out of work in Oshawa. I understand a small fraction of those men were working full time, and some were receiving overtime. Others were working only five or six hours a day. To my mind that condition suggests a lack of coordination and organization. I believe the men who came to Ottawa the other day left with the government a very good suggestion. Whether it will be worked upon, remains to be seen.

They pointed out that one of the great difficulties in production centred round the speedy production of dies and tools, and they made the suggestion that tool and die workers should be organized into a pool. This pool would be supervised by the government, by the workers through their trade unions, and by industry. The result would be that when there was a job of tooling up and die-making for certain contracts, the government could keep those tool and die-makers busy all the time. Under proper supervision and organization blueprints could be sent to those men, and from those blueprints, even if it were necessary to work twenty-four hours a day, the required tools and dies could be made.

I cannot understand why the government does not awaken more readily to the seriousness of the situation. One of the ministers has pointed out that one of the greatest difficulties has been the production of tools and dies, thereby causing a lay-off of from 700 to 1,500 to 2,000 men. That is a tremendous waste of man-hours. It is a tremendous waste of time which we can never regain. I am waiting patiently to see what the government will do.

I was exceedingly surprised and disappointed at the answer given to these men by the Minister of Labour. They wanted something concrete to take back to the men at Oshawa. They were asking for some suggestions from the government in regard to the solution of their difficulties, and the Minister of Labour said to them in effect: "I do not think you fellows should come to the government with your difficulties; you should iron them out yourselves." To me that was shocking. The only possible way these men have of ironing out any difficulties with the company is to go on strike. It is illegal to do that unless they comply with certain government regulations. If they do comply with those regulations, then they are likely to be starved to death before the situation is solved. This is what happened in Kirkland Lake. Personally, I do not think that was the way in which this situation should have been handled. These men are desirous of cooperating with the government, and I do not believe we shall get anywhere in solving this production problem until there is complete coordination between the government and labour. There is to be set up before very long a war expenditures committee.

An hon. MEMBER: When?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I hope before very long. I understand that that committee did good work last year, but I do not know how much they accomplished.

Mr. MARTIN: How could they have done good work if they accomplished nothing?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I did not say that they did not accomplish anything, nor did I say that they did not do anything. The hon. member was probably a member of that committee and he knows more about it than I.

Mr. MARTIN: I was not.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am assuming that they worked very seriously and did good work under their term of reference. But despite all the work they did, despite all the energy they expended, we still have this appalling situation where around three to four thousand men have been laid off in these production plants. I contend that the reference to this committee should be widened and this production question should be turned over to it for investigation and report to the house.

There is another matter I should like to bring to the attention of the government. I attempted to do this on the orders of the day, but Mr. Speaker ruled that the question should be placed on the order paper. This situation to which I intend to refer is likely to cause severe trouble before very long. The situation in Drumheller, the Alberta coal mining area, is becoming so serious that it may interfere with our war effort before very long. The telegram which I attempted to read is as follows:

F. G. Neate,
Deputy Coal Administrator,
Wartime Prices and Trade Board,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Drumheller coal operators view with great alarm your statement, as reported in the press, made at Hamilton on March 19, in which you said that importers of American coal for domestic use are to be subsidized, particularly coming at a time when the mines in this district are having to close for lack of orders. Cannot some arrangements be made whereby coal can be taken from Alberta mines, to take care of some of the demands before the question of paying subsidy to foreign coal is undertaken.

Drumheller Coal Operators Ltd.

Mr. MacNICOL: I received the same telegram. I have been at the Drumheller coal mines, and I endorse the hon. member's plea for the coal mines at Drumheller.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I thank the hon. member, but again I say that sympathy is not going to get us anywhere. Some action must be taken.

Mr. MacNICOL: They have good coal there; I burn it at home.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They have good coal, and they are in position at the present time to take care of a large share of the domestic market. It is quite likely that these mines will be forced to close, and one reason for this is the fact that foreign domestic coal is coming in. There is a tremendous supply of coal in Nova Scotia and Alberta, and yet this foreign coal is being subsidized and is competing with our own mines. The result will be that these mines will have to close down. They had to close down last year and the men got other jobs. Some of them are going to enlist in the army; some of them are going to go to other places to get jobs in industry. They must live; but as a result when these men are urgently required they will have gone to other places.

Mr. ILSLEY: No subsidy paid by the war-time prices and trade board will alter the competitive position of domestic and foreign coal.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not understand the technical details; but I would suggest that if, instead of paying this subsidy on the foreign coal, it were paid on our own coal, it would make a tremendous difference. The price could be lowered to that extent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a large question to go into, and I am not prepared to do so just now. I do not want the impression to go abroad that we are subsidizing foreign coal so that it can undersell domestic coal. That is not the case. If subsidies are being paid—I do not know whether they are or not—they are paid only to the extent necessary to enable those selling foreign coal in this market to keep it under the price ceiling. That is all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I cannot see why we cannot increase the subsidy to the same extent on our own coal.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is a matter of policy.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I would say to the minister that where policy interferes with the prosecution of the war, then it is high time that policy is changed. I do not think a mere matter of policy, whether it be to employ these miners or to reorganize production or any other matter, should stand in the way of the proper prosecution of this war. Merely to say that it is a matter of policy is not sufficient. I believe that is one of the reasons why the people are becoming so dissatisfied with this war effort. Some little time ago I attended a theatre—

Mr. FAIR: Was that on a Wednesday night?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That was on a Wednesday night; the house was not sitting. I saw one of these propaganda pictures put out and paid for by the government, showing the huge production we were having in Canada in connection with our defence weapons. In two or three places you could hear the audience hissing. I say that that is a clear indication that the people are recognizing, and rightly so, that this stuff is nothing more or less than rank lies.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is very strong language.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is strong language, and I intended it should be strong, because I, for one, do not believe this stuff. We hear of what happened when the Duke of Kent visited these plants. I think that is an outrageous shame.

Mr. ISNOR: At what parts did they hiss?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not just recall. When the Duke of Kent visited Oshawa, that plant was engaged in producing commercial cars, but for the duke's visit army trucks were put on and the commercial trucks standing in the corner were covered with tarpaulins. Nothing can dampen the morale of the people more quickly than that when they become aware of it. Such a thing should not be permitted for a moment. If the Oshawa plant were working 365 days a year, I would say, broadcast that fact all over the country and let the people know it.

Mr. MARTIN: Come to Windsor and see the Ford plant.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not think the plants in Windsor are any better than the others.

Mr. MARTIN: You do not know what you are talking about.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): My hon. friend had better speak to some of the workers down there. How does it happen that 1,500 people at the Chrysler plant in Windsor are being laid off?

Mr. MARTIN: Who said that?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It says that right here in the advertisement and it was a submission by the men who came here yesterday. Does my hon. friend say they were wrong?

Mr. MARTIN: No one suggested that yesterday at all.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): That is their statement in this advertisement put out by them. Does my hon. friend say they are not right?

Mr. MARTIN: I did not say that.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Is the statement right or wrong?

Mr. MARTIN: You are talking a lot of nonsense.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You do not know what you are talking about, and further, when you go back to your constituents—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Hon. gentlemen should address the chair, and should not say that another hon. member is talking nonsense.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Let me suggest through you, Mr. Chairman, that when the hon. member for Essex East goes back to his constituency, the workers in these plants in his district will call him to a meeting and tell him what to do.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Put him on the spot.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Yes, he will be on the spot.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. member will recall that I was at that meeting yesterday and that I supported the presentation to the ministers by the workers representing my city. What my criticism was a moment ago was that the hon. gentleman should be fair in stating the case.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): If my hon. friend wants to ask a question, all right, but if he wants to make a speech he can do it afterwards.

Mr. MARTIN: Is it not true that I was at that meeting and supported the men's presentation?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Would you ask the hon. member to sit down, Mr. Chairman? I have the floor and I am not prepared to let him take my time. If he wants to speak after the dinner recess, he can go ahead then. It is true the hon. member was there and spoke in support of the men, but now he says that this statement in the advertisement which these men put in the paper is not right.

Mr. MARTIN: No, I did not. Will the hon. member permit me a moment?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): You can get up after the dinner recess.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If the hon. member rises to correct a statement purporting to have been made by himself, he can do so.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I do not think he was correcting any statement that he had made, Mr. Chairman. He has just said that he was at the meeting and supported the men, and I agreed with him.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that the hon. gentleman who has the floor stated that the hon. member for Essex East said that the advertisement was not correct.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, Mr. Chairman, I am afraid you have it a little bit wrong.

Mr. MARTIN: May I speak for one moment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Have I the floor, Mr. Chairman, or has my hon. friend?

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member for Bow River did not refer to a statement made by the hon. member for Essex East, then he has the floor.

Mr. MARTIN: But he did refer to my observation, Mr. Chairman. What I said was this, that the advertisement which contained the representations of the workers of Oshawa and Windsor was correct, but then I said that the hon. member was not quoting correctly from it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): The hon. member is changing his story entirely. First of all, when I was speaking of the representations made by the men to the government, the hon. member interjected and said that was nonsense. I pointed out to him where he was in error, and he objected to that. Then, when I read from this advertisement he implied at least that I was not reading it correctly. Now he says it is correct. Why? Because I said that when he goes back home and meets the people who made these representations they will call him to account.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman, I understand, said that this advertisement was correct but that the hon. member who has the floor was not reading it correctly.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Then I ask the hon. member, through you, Mr. Chairman, to withdraw that remark because I did quote correctly from that advertisement. I will read it again and then ask you to see that the hon. member withdraws his statement.

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member was reading correctly from the advertisement, the remark should be withdrawn.

Mr. MARTIN: If the hon. gentleman was reading correctly from the advertisement, I certainly withdraw, but he was not reading correctly.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I insist that the hon. gentleman withdraw that remark.

The CHAIRMAN: I did not quite catch it.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I will read the advertisement again, and then I will ask you, Mr. Chairman, to have the hon. member withdraw his remark when I have proven that I was reading correctly from the advertisement.

The CHAIRMAN: I have to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman that he was reading correctly from the advertisement.

Mr. MARTIN: Mr. Chairman, to save the time of the country I withdraw all I said.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I am glad that the hon. gentleman admits that I was right.

I shall finish in just a moment. In my opinion, when the war expenditure committee is set up, the reference to the committee should be widened to include an inquiry into war production, in order to ascertain whether our industries are functioning properly in cooperation with the workers and the government. War production is the one question that gives me the greatest concern. I am not so much concerned with what the Minister of National Defence does with that production after he gets it. What I am concerned about is to see that we get it, and plenty of it, and get it in time.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Vien in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. C. E. Johnston.]

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN: Bill No. 19, section 1, short title. Shall the section carry?

Mr. MacNICOL: We do not have copies of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: I understand that according to the practice these bills are not generally distributed. The phraseology is that usually found in money bills.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is it just the resolution?

The CHAIRMAN: It is the bill for $135,000,000, in terms of the resolution.

Mr. ILSLEY: The bill is in the words of the main appropriation act. There are five sections. This is a supplementary appropriation of $135,000,000, and the wording is exactly the same as that of the bill for the $1,300,000,000, which was passed. There is no occasion for holding up this bill. It is purely a formal matter.

Section agreed to.

Sections 2 to 5 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, March 26, 1942.

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Hon. Sir Lyman P. Duff, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on Friday, March 27, at 6 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
F. L. C. Pereira,
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that $3,530,840, being the amount of each of the several items voted as set forth in the further supplementary estimates, 1941-42, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to his majesty for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942.

He said: These are further supplementary estimates for the current year.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not going to speak at any length on this, but I am sorry the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) is not in the house because I was going to ask a question, which need not necessarily be dealt with to-night. The Unemployment Insurance Act makes provision for the registration of persons out of work, and I believe that provision should be used for the purpose of keeping both members of parliament and the country advised from time to time, much in the same way as is done under the British act, regarding the number of unemployed in the country. We have never had any satisfactory statistics in Canada in connection with unemployment, but inasmuch as, under the Unemployment Insurance Act, all unemployed have to register at government offices, we should know from week to week or from month to month how many people are actually unemployed and what the unemployment situation is. If some member of the government would draw this matter to the attention of the Minister of Labour, I should be glad to let it go at that.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, do I understand that you are putting the supplementary estimates through en bloc or are you calling them item by item?

The CHAIRMAN: We are taking en bloc $3,530,840, which is the total amount of the several items for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1942, as per further supplementary estimates that have been tabled.

Mr. STIRLING: Therefore you are not calling them item by item.

The CHAIRMAN: No—that is, with the consent of the house.

Mr. STIRLING: May I raise a question with regard to the Prince Edward Island car ferry and terminals. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) had, I know, intended to ask some questions and make a statement thereon, but in his unavoidable absence perhaps the minister would be good enough to make a statement to the committee.

Mr. HOWE: The Prince Edward Island car ferry is operated as a separate operation. Years ago it was included in the accounts of the Canadian National Railways, but some three or four years ago the car ferry was separated from the operation of the railway and a deficit item placed in the estimates. Evidently the amount placed in the estimates was a fairly close approximation to the deficit, and only a small additional amount is required.

The ferry is operated at a loss; and the greater the traffic, the greater the loss, in that additional trips cause increased expense. As hon. members know, there were two ferries on the run, but unfortunately one was lost some months ago en route to Prince Edward Island from Saint John, where the boat had been overhauled. The boat sank in deep water. For a time it was thought it could be salvaged, but all the salvage operators have now examined the situation and decided that the boat could not be salvaged; consequently it was abandoned to the underwriters.

The position is that to keep up our war programme of shipbuilding and to rebuild the car ferry is impossible. The ways of one of our shipyards would have to be occupied for some fifteen months, and provision made to build special equipment. I suppose the building of that car ferry would interfere with the building of three or four standard 10,000 ton freighters. With the need for shipping so urgent, it is felt that the remaining ferry should perform the service until the war situation eases. In the meantime the one ferry is carrying on successfully. The operation has been normal this winter—I think there were one or two interruptions—but records show that there has never been a winter that there have not been interruptions for some twenty-four to thirty-six hours. I think the situation is one that can be allowed to continue until the war permits the replacement of that boat.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister anticipate that this one ferry will be able to take care of the spring and summer traffic, which, of course, will be much greater than in the winter? A considerable amount of agricultural produce comes across by that ferry, does it not?

Mr. HOWE: The business has always been taken care of by one ferry. It is only in very busy seasons, perhaps in August when the tourist traffic is heavy, that the two ferries are used. One is usually a standby for the other. The present ferry was the only means of communication with the island for a great many years, and it is felt that the one ferry should be able to handle the traffic this summer, because we expect there will be very little tourist traffic on account of the shortage of gasoline and rubber. A second ferry service to the island which operates during the summer months, has been greatly improved in the last two years. That service, from Woods island to Pictou, should relieve the strain considerably on the big ferry.

Mr. RALSTON: My colleague has not referred to two matters which I regard as very important in connection with this ferry.

He, of course, is the acting Minister of Transport. I have had some direct correspondence with both the minister and the Canadian National Railways. The president advised me some little time ago that after a good deal of examination they had found on the west coast a boat called the City of Sacramento which might possibly be available as a standby. I had been urging that if a new ferry could not be built, some boat be obtained in order to make absolutely sure that there would be no break-down in the service should anything happen to the present boat. The president of the railways realized the desirability of that situation being buttressed if at all possible, both because of the needs of the citizens of Prince Edward Island and the fact that there are two air training establishments on the island. The result is that at the present time there is going on an extensive examination with regard to obtaining the City of Sacramento, not only as to the terms on which she can be obtained, but also her fitness for use as a standby boat. She is not a car ferry, but she would provide desirable accommodation for a fill-in service.

While that examination has been going on, another project has come up, of transferring a car ferry from lake Michigan. The points about the use of that ferry were, first, whether or not she could get through the St. Lawrence canal locks, and it is found that she cannot without having to be cut in two and put together again, as was done during the last war. The difficulty there is that in putting her together we would have to preempt for some little time a dock down the river, but it seems that situation is not insurmountable. The other point that has to be examined is whether the docks at cape Tormentine and Borden can be adapted to the boat or the boat to the docks. An examination is going on as to these two points. I have in my hand a letter from the president of the company giving me the latest word, and the matter is being dealt with actively. I know that everything possible is being done to supplement the present service of the Price Edward Island with a standby or fill-in service by obtaining another boat.

Mr. MacNICOL: In my judgment the past service was not very satisfactory. I have been to the island many times, and I cannot say I ever found the service what I would call 100 per cent. In the first place it was difficult to get a car on the boat, and once you got it on, it was just as difficult to get it off. I am not sure whether it was the new boat or the old one that was lost—

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. MacNICOL: Well, even as to the new one, I often intended to protest here about the difficulty one experienced in getting a motor car on and off the boat. The last time I went across that strait I scratched my car and jammed it a bit because of the narrow boat space. I hope, when the time comes that the government can build a new boat, they will build it large enough that people can come and go to the island without so much difficulty as in the past. If there were real accommodation for visitors to reach the island, instead of an arbitrary figure of 50,000 cars crossing in the season to that very beautiful island—nothing like it anywhere in America—it might be an arbitrary figure of 100,000, which would be a very good thing for business on the island. So I would say to the minister that when he comes to build a boat he should build it so that automobile traffic can be loaded and unloaded easily. I have seen lately in the Charlottetown Guardian reports of meetings of boards of trade and city councils—and I am not sure that the matter did not come up in the legislature—detailing the difficulties with which they are now faced. One boat will have very great difficulty in giving adequate service to those producing farm products on that island. Personally I have a very warm feeling for Prince Edward Island, because of its great beauty. There are no stones on the highways; there is beautiful rolling landscape everywhere. This country owes a lot to Prince Edward Island, and nothing should be left undone that might help give those people better transportation facilities than they have to-day.

Mr. HAZEN: A few weeks ago I wrote the Postmaster General about a matter of censorship concerning the city of Saint John. I have not a copy of that letter before me, but as I recollect them the facts were that a gentleman in Saint John had been corresponding with someone in the city of Boston. He came to the conclusion that there was a great deal of delay in the delivery of his letters, so to test the matter he wrote two letters at the same time, one of which was mailed in Saint John and the other taken to Montreal and mailed from there, both to the same address. The letter mailed from Montreal reached the addressee in Boston within a day or two; the letter mailed from Saint John did not reach Boston until about two weeks later. I wonder whether the Postmaster General could give any explanation as to this very great delay.

Mr. MULOCK: I shall have an inquiry made, and shall be glad to give the hon. member an answer to-morrow. I have no information at the moment, but I shall endeavour to get it as quickly as possible.

Mr. BOUCHER: Could the Postmaster General give us any information as to the postal situation in Westboro? That suburban area has been extensively built up within the last three years, and a year ago last Christmas an unsatisfactory state of affairs existed in regard to postal delivery. During the past year some steps were taken to improve the situation, but they were grossly inadequate and quite unsatisfactory. That area is virtually an extension of the city of Ottawa. There is a mail service along the main streets, but no service further on. Many of the residents of that community have to walk a mile or two miles for their mail, and have to wait an hour or two before getting it. Sometimes they have to wait as long as three days for their mail. I believe it is the policy of the government not to extend the mail service any more than is absolutely necessary in these days, but actually this would be simply an extension of an already existing service. The municipal authorities of that area have gone to the extent of making provision for clearing the streets, numbering the houses, renaming the streets and everything else in order to get this service, and the situation is getting more serious all the time.

Let me give an example. Recently a constituent of mine who was working in Shawinigan Falls received a letter from the Department of National Defence asking him to report for military training. The letter had been expected, and calls had been made at the post office every day for it. It took seven days to arrive from Toronto and be delivered to the recipient, which left him only nine days in which to make his arrangements to answer the summons. I quote this as one isolated instance, but it is only one of many. I say that an area like Westboro, the home of so many business people and civil servants who require efficient mail service, should not have to put up with this deplorable situation. So I would ask the Postmaster General to reconsider the matter, which I have already discussed with him, and to which he gave a favourable hearing. I feel it my bounden duty to continue urging him until his pleasant reception, and the pleasant smile he is now giving me, are crystallized into the desired action in that community.

Mr. GILLIS: On two occasions during the session of 1941 the Minister of Munitions and Supply stated in the house that the airmail and passenger service would be extended to the Sydney area in Nova Scotia. At that time the minister said this was one section of the country that would benefit perhaps to a greater extent than any other section by the extension of these services. I was led to believe that this extension would be inaugurated by August of last year, and I should like the minister to inform the committee now if this matter is still under consideration, and what are the prospects.

Mr. HOWE: Well, they say hope deferred maketh the heart glad, and I am glad to tell my hon. friend that the service will commence on April 1, only five days away. It will be on a trial basis, to test out the service. Mail will be carried from April 1, I assume at the ordinary postal rates, and the regular airmail and passenger service will commence May 1.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the Minister of Pensions and National Health explain item 435, "nutrition service"?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. The 1942-43 regular estimates contain an item, under the heading "Nutrition Service", to provide for—

> Carrying on educational work for the purpose of assisting the public to maintain the nutritional requirements of the home under existing circumstances by advice as to advantageous purchasing, preferable choice of foods on account of cost and food value, and proper methods of preparation; to make available expert opinion for the information bureau of the Department of National War Services; to visit, inspect, and confer with the managements of cafeteria in industries; to check nutritional values of foods planned for workers, and to suggest improvements where indicated.

In October, 1941, the treasury board authorized the establishment of this division for the above purpose, and the sum of $10,000 has been provided from the war appropriation subject to reimbursement when the supplementary estimates for 1941-42 are available. Details of the expenditure during the current year are as follows:

Telephones, telegraphs and postage	$ 100
Equipment	100
Salaries, temporary	6,000
Materials and supplies	300
Transportation and travelling expenses	3,500

The personnel now employed in this division consists of the following:

Director of Nutrition Service
Dr. L. D. Pett	$4,080
Asst. Director of Nutrition Service
Miss M. W. Harlow	3,120
Field supervisors
Miss J. M. Skene	1,560
Miss N. Hinton	1,560
Miss A. M. Jessop	1,560
Stenographer, grade 2
Miss M. H. Kiggins	1,080

These are all details in connection with the vote.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Does this vote look after the new legislation with respect to vitamins in different foods?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, not necessarily. It may in the future, but not so far. The regulations in regard to Canada approved flour and bread go into force, respectively, on April 1 and April 15. A period of six months will be allowed for experimental purposes before there is any prosecution under those provisions. These regulations are the most modern and scientific in the whole world. They are not mandatory in their present form. It is expected, however, that a standard bread will be adopted almost universally within a few months.

Mr. MacNICOL: If all these estimates are passed now, shall we be permitted to speak with respect to these matters when the regular estimates are before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN: We are not discussing the main estimates, but rather we are discussing further supplementary estimates for the year ending March 31, 1942. The main estimates have not yet been touched.

Mr. MacNICOL: When the main estimates are under consideration shall we be permitted to discuss these items?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. BOUCHER: What provision is made for the staff of the House of Commons during the Easter recess as to work, pay and so on?

Mr. ILSLEY: The staff is being paid during the recess.

Motion agreed to.

INTERIM SUPPLY BILL

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $38,803,172.40, being one-sixth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted, as set forth in the estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1943, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of parliament, be granted to his majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1943.

Mr. STIRLING: We are quite prepared to facilitate the passage of this interim portion of the estimates, with the understanding, of course, that we shall not be precluded in any way from discussing them, item by item, when they come up in the estimates.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the understanding, yes.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

WAYS AND MEANS

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

1. Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1942, the sum of $3,530,840 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

2. Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1943, the sum of $38,803,172.40 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 43, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending the 31st March, 1942; and Bill No. 44, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ending March 31, 1943.

Motion agreed to, bills read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY—INTERIM APPROPRIATION

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide that a sum not exceeding $500,000,000 be granted to his majesty towards defraying any expenses or making any advances or loans that may be incurred or granted by or under the authority of the governor in council during the year ending the thirty-first day of March, 1943, for the purposes and subject to the terms, conditions and limitations set out in the resolution to provide that sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 be granted to his majesty, which resolution was referred to the committee of the whole on the 17th of March, 1942; and being one-fourth of the said amount of $2,000,000,000.

Mr. STIRLING: I understand that this is the fourth of the measures referred to last night by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister stated that he was desirous of getting these through because the end of the fiscal year will come during the Easter recess.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) concurred in the minister's suggestion on the understanding that we shall not be precluded from the fullest discussion when the main bill is before us.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is correct.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair I want to take this opportunity of saying a few words on this resolution. I realize that opportunities will be given after the Easter recess to discuss the appropriation, of which this forms a part, and I should hope that at that time we may have the debate so well organized that it will not necessitate all the ministers remaining here during the whole discussion, and that we may be able to deal with our problems department by department and perhaps facilitate business in that way. I wish to say a few words on the matter which was brought before us yesterday and which forms part of the programme for the year for which this appropriation is being made. In further explanation, I would say that I do not expect to be here to-morrow, and I crave the indulgence of the house to permit me to say what I have to say at this time.

The war has necessitated many drastic measures being introduced into the house, but I suppose that nothing more drastic has been suggested to the country than the recent outline for the mobilization of man-power. We realize that this war must be a total war if we are going to win it, and again I should like to say as emphatically as I can that a total war involves much more than the mobilization of human labour power. Without the mobilization of our resources upon the same basis and at the same time we shall not get an enthusiastic all-out war effort in Canada. Moreover, we are fighting for the democratic way of life, and the proposals made in this house the day before yesterday were of such a nature that they involve the setting aside, at least for a considerable time, of many of the ordinary procedures of democracy.

I hope the determination that we have seen here from time to time to defend individual enterprise in the midst of this war will not be continued to the detriment of our war effort. Hon. members probably saw in the Ottawa Journal this evening a description of the manner in which a great monopoly in the United States, the Standard Oil company of New Jersey, represented in this country by Imperial Oil Limited, handled a secret process for the making of synthetic rubber. That process was handed over to Germany and everything was done up to yesterday to prevent the use of the patents, even in connection with the war effort of the United States. I want to say that that kind of attitude brings home to us as forcibly as it could be brought home the danger of allowing great monopolies to control, in peace and in war, the vital resources of the countries in which we live. I have noticed that some of the people connected with these organizations, and some hon. gentlemen in this house, have stated again and again that we must preserve individual enterprise in our war effort. It has been amazing to me to hear some people from their places here demand that we shall not interfere more than necessary with private business, that we shall continue the individual enterprise system, and then demand mobilization on a compulsory basis of the labour power of our men and women. In this great crisis we are not objecting to the compulsory mobilization of labour power, but we say that if we are to have equality of sacrifice, there must be a mobilization of our industrial and economic resources upon the same basis and at the same time.

I wish to object to the manner in which the sweeping proposals were introduced into this house. Orders in council of the most sweeping nature, already finally approved by the government, have been placed before this house while it has been sitting. During the war we have found that immediately before the house assembled on one or two occasions, and while the house was sitting on other occasions, policies of the most fundamental nature have been placed before the house in the form of orders in council, without any opportunity being given to parliament to discuss the various phases of the proposals being made.

I am not arguing that in the midst of war it is always advisable to introduce, in a manner permitting of long discussion, new policies which may interfere with business or with people. But I do say that when it is necessary to introduce policies suddenly by order in council a certain period should be set aside immediately so that this house may discuss their implications. It may not be proper and it may not be easy to make any changes in those policies, but in almost every instance the government is empowered to make regulations to carry out the policy and at least we should have an opportunity of discussing the policies before the regulations are made.

As I said, this is a matter which affects the lives of all Canadian people more than anything else we have done. In my opinion, it is too important a matter to be the subject of a mere governmental decree. We should have had a bill which we could have discussed section by section. I think this matter might have been introduced in such a way as to make unnecessary a very long discussion. To some extent I understand why certain measures of this description are introduced in the way they are. We have had some rather long discussions on some things that perhaps did not require such lengthy debate.

I am going to throw out a suggestion which hon. members may think over. We have admired the manner in which during this great war crisis the British parliament has justified itself as an institution. Its rules differ materially from our own. Perhaps the time has come when this house should set up a committee to study the rules followed in the British House of Commons and see if we could not adapt some of those rules to our own needs. In that way we might have a different type of discussion, just as free but not as prolonged as the discussions that have occurred during this war period. I said a few moments ago that there are many ways in which prolonged discussion might be obviated, but I think a measure of this description should be given all the consideration we can give it, and at once.

I notice from the public press that the head of one of the great labour organizations in this country has stated that labour will give every cooperation to the government in carrying out this policy, but he regretted that the labour movement had not been consulted on this policy before it was introduced into this house. In my opinion, the representatives of the people's organizations should have been taken into the confidence of the government and the whole question thoroughly discussed with the labour organizations, the farmer organizations, the legion and other organizations vitally interested in the mobilization of labour. In any event, whether or not these organizations were called into consultation, surely there was no reason why parliament should be ignored in the manner in which parliament was and has been ignored on so many occasions during this war. I have followed the speeches of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) over a number of years both before and since coming into this house, and if there is one man in the public life of this country who has talked about the supremacy of parliament and the need for parliament to decide, it is the Prime Minister himself. Yet again and again policies of vital importance are adopted by order in council without parliament being consulted at all, and we have the latest example in the measure to which I have just referred.

I want to protest, too, against the manner in which this measure has been introduced into the house at this late hour just before the Easter recess. The government orders on to-day's order paper, although we have managed to dispose of some of them this afternoon and this evening, are still pretty well filled with important measures or have been right up to to-night. Consequently members have refrained from entering on a discussion of this measure. Yet this policy has long been under consideration by the government. I remember reading a speech made by the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power) in Montreal as long ago as last December in which a measure such as this was clearly foreshadowed. I looked over a summary of the minister's speech yesterday and found that the orders in council which have been passed bringing into effect this new policy were also clearly foreshadowed and almost accurately outlined by the minister when he spoke in Montreal as far back as last December. Therefore this policy has been under consideration by the government for some time, and there was no reason, to my mind, why the organizations I have mentioned should not have been called into consultation before the policy was decided upon, and certainly no reason why some discussion of it should not have taken place in this house.

Why the haste now, when we have not yet provided employment for some of our workers who are at present unemployed? The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) this afternoon read into the record an advertisement which appeared in the local press from an automobile workers' organization pointing out that there were many technical men in that organization who are unemployed to-day. There are some hundreds more unemployed at Kirkland Lake, many others at Kitchener, and there are men working short time, I am told, in a number of industries throughout the country. While it may be essential to organize our men and our women, we should first have utilized fully the labour power and the machinery that we have already available before a measure of this sort is adopted by order in council.

I know that the total war effort which must be waged in order to bring us to victory involves some sort of intelligent selective service, but an intelligent selective service not only for men and women but for industries as well, and I want not only on my own behalf but on behalf of those associated with me, to protest in the strongest possible manner against the way in which these important proposals have been introduced at this time.

I do not wish to go into the problem at great length. There are some features of the legislation that are interesting, and not only interesting but worthy of commendation. I would commend the attempt to provide labour for the farm. But in saying that, I am not sure about the justice or rightness of taking one particular class out from under the selective service system. I am not sure that it is either wise or proper; it may cause grave antagonisms between groups. Agricultural labour has to be provided, and the condition of the farmer to-day is such that he cannot compete with industry for labour. His prices are too low and wages too high in relation to his prices, although not too high in relation to the cost of living and the cost of other things. But the young farmer, the farmer's son, by this legislation is kept on the farm, and no matter how low his standard of living may be, he is prohibited from seeking work in any other industry unless he obtains permission. So not only have you frozen farm labour on the farm at a comparatively low wage level, with farmer's prices at least in the prairie provinces too low to enable them even to operate, let alone pay a decent and reasonable wage, but you have said to the young men engaged in that industry: You must remain where you are unless you agree to enlist voluntarily in the armed forces. One of the criticisms I would make of the proposals is that in my opinion they doom the farmer to the sort of peasantry in which he has lived for a considerable time, and doom the farm labourer to a sort of peonage as compared with other forms of labour in this country.

In the working out of these selective service measures, who will control the operation of the policy? That, I think, is a vital question. I notice that a director and an assistant director have been appointed. I do not know either of these gentlemen, but I presume they are worth-while citizens of this country and probably very able men in their own spheres. But one is an engineer and company director, and the other is a stockbroker. The two people who will head this selective service system are, first, a company engineer, and second, a stockbroker. Where are the representatives of the people who are going to be regimented? Where are the representatives of labour? Where are the representatives of the farmer? Where are the representatives of the common people?

I say to the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) to-night that while I think he has done a remarkable job in many respects in organizing, nevertheless I have been alarmed at the trend in his department to the control of all our activities by powerful business men or by dollar-a-year men who are close to big business and big-business organizations. Our people are becoming suspicious of this sort of thing.

This is another mistake which the government has made in selecting men—no matter how good personally they may be—who have the wrong sort of association to command the right sort of confidence and support all across the country. The same is true of the manner in which it is proposed to grant the appeals. We have to-day national service appeal boards throughout the country. I am not going into the boards separately to-night, but in my opinion, from personal observation, some of the boards that have been set up have not commanded the confidence of democratically-minded people, and such boards are not the type that should be entrusted with this new power. If they were set up originally to select men who may be suitable for military training and to decide those who should get training or those who should be exempted, that does not qualify them for deciding whether a man is suitable for a certain type of industry or not. We require a new form of board, and the government should look over the personnel of the boards set up and endeavour to give a much wider sort of representation on those boards than we have had up to the present time.

We have, of course, the national advisory board, and the Prime Minister told us that provision would be made for the representation of women's organizations and other bodies upon such a board. That is all to the good, but so far the national labour relations board has not been functioning as it should have done. Then again, the selection of those who will be chosen for various types of work is left to officers to be located in the various cities, and unless these officers are selected with the greatest care we shall find that there will be a great deal of discontent with regard to them. I suggest to the government that before this mobilization goes into effect, on every board there should be adequate representation of the people's organizations, such as the labour and farmer organizations, the legion, if you will, and other organizations which represent great masses of the people of Canada.

Another thing that struck me about this measure is the fact that if a young man has been turned down on account of physical unfitness, he may get medical aid and hospitalization so that he may be taken into the army. If it is necessary to give hospitalization and medical aid to bring up to efficiency a man going into the army, ought it not to be equally wise to give the same medical treatment and hospitalization to men and women so that they may be rendered efficient in industry as well? I should like to see the government provide medical aid and treatment for those who fall below the proper physical level both in industry and in the armed forces—men and women. Let me say in connection with this problem that the orders in council do provide for the payment of transportation to women if they are going to take work in industry. I suggest that we should have a comprehensive plan so that when men and women are moved from one place to another, where their labour is required for war purposes, we should look after the transportation problem so far as they are concerned and make some family allowance if they are compelled to be away from home. That, may I add, is being done in Great Britain where they move people around from place to place for the purpose of industry.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is done under the unemployment act.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, under a special scheme under the ministry of labour, I understand.

Mr. MacNICOL: I meant to say under the ministry of labour.

Mr. COLDWELL: This is, indeed, a drastic mobilization of human power. On more than one occasion the Prime Minister has told us that the government intended to use the power now in its hands, under the National Resources Mobilization Act, to mobilize industry and wealth; but in spite of all that may be said, the fact is that industry and wealth are not yet mobilized to the extent to which it is proposed now to mobilize human power. In whose interests is this labour power being organized? In the interests of the country? Yes; but at the same time, under the present economic set-up, we are mobilizing labour for the National Steel Car Company, for General Motors, for Chrysler and for Ford. I say that we ought to mobilize these corporations on the same basis and on the same terms; then we should have something approaching equality of sacrifice. We have not that equality to-day, no matter what ministers may say.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

I suppose all members of this house must have observed, from the balance sheets these days, how prosperous some of these companies are. They must have noticed the very expensive advertising these companies are undertaking. All members, I know, a few days ago received a very expensively framed copy of an advertisement that had been published during the recent victory loan campaign. I have not written to thank General Motors for the nice picture to hang in my office; I feel I ought to write and thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), because that advertising will be charged up to profits—excess profits—and eight-five per cent of the cost of that framed picture and that type of advertising will, in fact, be paid by the people of Canada, because the government of Canada will not collect the excess profits tax on money which is spent in that manner.

Mr. ILSLEY: A limitation was placed on the amount of that kind of contributed advertising.

Mr. COLDWELL: I will not ask the minister to tell me what the limitation is because that would probably not be easy. It would vary from company to company.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no. It was in the Department of National Revenue, but my recollection is that only ten per cent of the normal advertising expenditure was permitted to a company for contributed advertising.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is contributed advertising?

Mr. ILSLEY: That was a contributed advertisement.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am not talking about contributed advertising; I am talking about the reprints. I do not know whether the minister had a framed picture that most of us received. That is not contributed advertising. I was speaking, not about the advertising contributed by these companies for the victory loan, but other sorts, such as the rather beautiful framed copy of an advertisement that we received, and the pictures we received a short time ago from the Chrysler company, and some other material that we have been receiving which were not contributed advertising but the normal advertising of the companies. I suggest to the minister that it would be well to look into the advertising that is being done at the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is subject to control by the Department of National Revenue; they may disallow if they see fit.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hope they will look into some of the advertising and disallow a good deal of it.

We have not yet begun to mobilize wealth and industry. If we are to have equality of sacrifice, that must be brought about without delay. If we are to have an enthusiastic war effort it must be achieved without further delay.

I do not intend to delay the discussion any longer, but I want to emphasize with all the force I can, first, that the method of introducing policies of this kind is undemocratic. It is unfortunate. It does not give members of this house an opportunity to do what they are sent here to do. Secondly, if we are going to mobilize the human power of this nation, it must be mobilized under the supervision of the people themselves, supervised by representatives that they themselves choose. To-day in Canada we have organizations which choose representatives of the people for the people, other than this House of Commons. I refer, of course, to the great nation-wide labour and farmer organizations. When we have done that, as my colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) said this afternoon, we should guarantee to the men who are mobilized and engaged in these industries the right to bargain collectively through organizations of their own choice.

When we were in Great Britain I asked Mr. Bevin, the British Minister of Labour, as to the status of collective bargaining in Great Britain. He replied, "Oh, well, to-day that has become a part of our constitution." When I asked him the further question as to whether in government-owned plants or government partly owned and controlled plants normal labour organization was permitted he said, "Well, our great naval dockyards are, of course, government-owned; our civilian workers are organized in the union of their choice." Then with a smile he added, "And I am a national secretary of that union."

If we are to have a satisfactory and enthusiastic war effort, we have to safeguard the rights of the common people to determine through their organizations their own activities and their own way of life to a larger extent than we have in past days. Indeed, we have to go further than that; there must be some joint management of industry between the present management and labour. Only in that way can we get an all-out, complete and enthusiastic war effort.

So, then, in making this appropriation, one-quarter of the $2,000,000,000 estimate for this coming year, I want to impress upon the government that we shall not get the all-out effort required to win this war unless we and the other democratic nations can organize ourselves completely and efficiently. The totalitarian powers have done that; they have done it in a manner which we detest. I am one who believes that under our democratic institutions we can organize our countries as efficiently as, and much more enthusiastically than the totalitarian powers can ever do if we only take the people into our confidence and show them that we are prepared to give them a square deal. Equality of sacrifice demands that the people's organizations shall have a voice in all the war activities of this nation, and that the great industrial concerns of this country shall be mobilized, selected, conscripted if you will, in the same manner and upon the same terms and at the same time as we mobilize human labour.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): I would not be true to the character of my representation in this house or to my convictions in this matter if I did not rise at once to support in the main the observations of the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Coldwell). I believe that among hon. members on all sides of the house there is a growing conviction that if we are to make our prosecution of this war what we all want it to be in a world in flames, there must not be on the part of any group in this country any suspicion of the loyalty and good faith of other groups in the country. I represent a constituency largely engaged in the automobile industry, which is at the present time, as to the Ford plant namely, and to only a relatively less extent at the Chrysler plant in Windsor, engaged in a total way in the production of military vehicles of all kinds that are being used to wage this war. I think that, generally speaking, labour has a legitimate complaint about its representation on important boards that are being set up. There has not been thus far, because this measure was introduced before any opportunity for discussion in parliament was presented, any real opportunity for members of this house to discuss the proposals for the mobilization of man-power announced the other day by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Labour has complained, and the responsible type of labour leadership has complained, that it was not represented on important boards. It is not too late now for the administration to include on boards of selection, boards that will deal with postponements and exemptions, not only the representatives of industry—they should be there—but, as well, representatives of labour and of the farming community as well as of the legion and other such organizations. The time has come when there should be on the part of labour and of industry less suspicion of one another than there has been in the past. I have heard it said by various people in this house; I have heard it in the corridors; I have heard some of my own people whom I represent say, "Oh, we cannot trust these men." If in this country we have reached the point where labour is not to be trusted, that is a terrible indictment of the nationhood of this country. I do not believe that. As I said a moment ago, I represent a constituency which contains a huge proportion of labouring men. I know them. I come from that group myself and, indeed, I believe practically every member of this house in some way or another owes his inheritance to people of that kind. At the present time my own father is engaged in a factory making munitions of war. Am I to say that I do not trust him? And he is no different from the thousands of men who are engaged in the war factories of this country.

So I say, with all the sincerity and all the force of which I am capable, that the time has come when we should recognize that if there is a partnership in industry—and we have talked about that for years—we should make it a real partnership. Let us give labour full representation on these boards. Let us also give the farming community full representation. I am sure we shall not find that, as a result, any of the so-called radical groups will take advantage of the situation. We can trust the labouring people of this country; and by trusting them we shall help develop the sort of labour leadership, the kind of responsibility in leadership, which so many people in Canada find lacking in connection with labour in this country at the present time.

I fully agree with what the hon. member has just said with regard to the right of collective bargaining. The government of this country recognizes that right, so we are not asking for something that is new. Collective bargaining is a technique that is older than any member of this house, and it has kept the industrial peace of more countries than one could count on one's ten fingers. The preservation of the industrial peace of England has been maintained largely because the British government and industry and labour in Britain have fostered the development of a tradition under which not only employees but employers themselves would not for a moment think of resorting to any other technique. Recently, in my own city of Windsor we had a committee to carry on the victory loan campaign. On that committee were found not only representatives of industry but also representatives of labour and of the farming community; and in that campaign the labouring people, fourteen thousand of them in one plant alone, invested their money just as willingly as did the management of those plants. So, if they can be trusted in a victory loan campaign, surely we can trust them in these other endeavours.

I say these things because I think we on this side of the house who represent the traditions of Liberalism should not hesitate, when the opportunity is presented as it is to-night, to properly enunciate our principles. I agree in the main with what has been just said; and I am satisfied that if this house gave a similar concurrence, if there were an attitude of trust on the part of labour toward industry and on the part of industry toward labour, we would not have the suspicion and the lack of unity which still exist in the industrial world.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): I should like to add only a few words to what has been said already. I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and with a great deal of what he said I am in hearty accord. For many years I have been very closely associated with labour, and I believe that I know a good deal about the labour problem. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar spoke of present conditions, and of what should be done now. I want to add to that something about what should take place when the war is over. To-day a committee met for the first time to deal with the question of rehabilitation after the war. I am not going to speak of that matter now, but I hope the work of that committee will bring about many of the results to which reference has been made already this evening. Certainly, after the war no such unemployment as has existed heretofore should be permitted. That matter may not come under this resolution, but much has been said about the organization of industry, and I am one of those who believe that industry should be organized so that, after the war, unemployment will be a thing of the past.

Since I have been very closely associated with working men for more than a quarter of a century, naturally their hopes and desires have always been foremost in my mind. Many industries, I know, have within their own organizations what they call sick benefit or medical assistance plans, whereby any of their employees who become sick or incapacitated receive assistance. That is not government assistance, however, and I am convinced that the time has come for the government to consider adopting the methods prevailing in the old country, under which all working men in all plants, not only in those having their own organizations, shall receive sick benefits and medical assistance. I would say that was the second thing that should be provided after the war.

Furthermore, as I look back over the last ten years and recall the number of cases that have come to my attention of workmen losing their homes through no fault of their own, I hope that sort of thing will not prevail after the war either. Men who for years saved out of their humble wages and salaries acquired homes, perhaps not fully paid for, and then during the depression, which was not the result of any fault of theirs, they lost those homes. That is a situation which must not be allowed to prevail after the war.

I agree with what was said by the two previous speakers, that the time has come when we all—for I believe every member of this house is just as much interested as I am—must see to it that the conditions which obtained in the past shall not prevail again, and that our working men may receive that to which they are entitled. I hope, as has been suggested, that some modus operandi will be worked out under which these most desirable aims may be realized.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): May I add just a word, to deal with what has been said by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). There seems to be some misapprehension with regard to the mobilization plan, particularly with reference to its application to labour and the part labour will play in connection with the administration of it. May I point out to my hon. friends, to the house and to the country that this system of national selective service is being operated by the Department of Labour, which is presided over by a man who is as well known in labour circles as any man in Canada, and who, indeed, has made his reputation in connection with labour. I do not feel at this stage that anyone should have any apprehension that labour will not be wholly, fairly and properly represented in connection with the administration of this measure.

May I say this, that having in mind my position and responsibility, someone might have suggested that it might have been administered by the Department of National Defence, simply because of the fact that in respect of the men needed for the army we have a heavy interest in it. That was not done. It might have been administered by the Department of National War Services, but that was not done. It was placed with the Department of Labour, and I believe that all labour men in this country will realize that that was a recognition of the fact that they are very much a partner in this war, and that their rights and their responsibilities would be respected by this government.

May I add, as my colleague the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) has pointed out to me, that many of the functions of the Department of National War Services were transferred to the Department of Labour in order that this national selective service system might be worked out with the full appreciation and full cooperation of labour.

Then, mention has been made of boards. I do not know what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had in mind. The only boards we know of are, in the first place, the employment offices which will be operated throughout the country—and operated by the Department of Labour, under the Minister of Labour. They will be operated by men who understand the problems of labour and who have been acting in connection with it. Then, if there are advisory committees throughout the country, those advisory committees most assuredly will have on them representatives of labour. I am sure the house and the country, and particularly our friends who represent labour, can be assured that they will have the fullest representation in connection with anything which has to do with the administration of this legislation. With that assurance I feel the house will be satisfied. I should not want the wrong impression to go out from the debate which has taken place to-night, or from the speeches which have been made, that labour has been overlooked. It seems to me that labour at least is recognized fully in connection with the administration, and will be recognized in connection with the organization and set-up which will be put into effect throughout this country.

Mr. CLARENCE GILLIS (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) very well stated the case for the group he leads in the house. I was much interested in, and deeply appreciated the remarks of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). I am now prompted to rise for a few moments because of the statement made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston).

May I point out that having been a worker myself, and having been associated with the trades union movement for a considerable number of years, I know the attitude of the average working man to-day to the national selective service programme as proposed by the government. There is a suspicion on their part, and that suspicion is well founded. It is based on the attitude of those who, we know, at the present time are in charge of organizing the national selective service of the working people of this country.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has stated that to date we know an engineer has been appointed, as representative of the companies. Another gentleman is one whose qualifications no one doubts, but whose environment and background are not reassuring. They are to take care of the problems of the people who are to be regimented. Many, many times I have heard it said in the house that the government recognizes the rights of labour and favours collective bargaining. We can judge that statement only on the basis of the government's approach to that problem in the past. I want to say this, that it is anything but reassuring.

Only 15 per cent of the workers in this country are organized. Eighty-five per cent of them are unorganized, because of their opposition to organization. Very recently we have had a demonstration of just about what the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) will do with respect to the enforcement of the rights of workers who organize. Kirkland Lake is a blot on his administration. It will take a long time to remove from that department the stigma of what happened there. I shall not go into it in detail, because the story is well known. They obeyed the wishes of the government and the laws of the land. They endeavoured to lay down their organization, with the result that, according to the last information I had, a thousand of them were without jobs and without relief. Nothing has been done about it, so far as I know.

Another thing I should like to call to the attention of the house is this: Many, many times, from many platforms and over the radio I have heard the statement made that one of the first things which would come in Canada or any democratic country, in the event of totalitarian nations winning the war, would be the loss of trades unions. I want someone to explain to me what is the difference in the mentality of a person who destroys a trades union, and one who will not allow it to be born. In my opinion, there is no difference at all.

Furthermore, an active campaign has been carried on by industrialists in Canada, since the outbreak of the war, to offset the formation of any kind of legitimate trades unions functioning in this country. I am ashamed of such tactics. In the press from time to time and in the house hon. members have risen in their places to point out the relationship between this country and our good neighbour to the south. It has been said that if we are going to get through this struggle successfully, Canada and that good neighbour must have a common understanding, and no differences of opinion. We are in this fight, all the way—both Canada and the United States. But at the same time big business directorates interlock between this country and the United States. Nothing is done about that. It is said that it is legitimate business, and it passes. Manufacturers' associations can organize on both sides of the boundary line, and lay down international organization rules. But just as soon as a representative of labour comes from the United States to Canada and endeavours to employ the experience he has gained over many years in a similar field in the United States, when he sets foot on Canadian soil he is accused at once of being a foreigner. It is said that he is a foreign agitator, and the press of Canada from one end of the country to the other goes to great lengths to build up the idea that a "foreign agitator is in Sudbury creating a disturbance."

Only just recently the Canadian offices of the mine, mill and smelter workers' union, with headquarters in the United States, were destroyed. This was a respectable group associated with that organization, a group which was endeavouring only to give the Canadian worker the benefit of their experience. The men were prepared to organize to carry out an all-out war effort. But one of these men, who is accused of being a foreign agitator, was beaten up and placed in a hospital. There were screaming headlines in a large section of the press.

I call this to the attention of the Minister of National Defence, because he has a serious job to do, and we want to help him.

Mr. CRERAR: In regard to the destruction of the offices and the beating up of certain labour leaders in Sudbury, may I ask the hon. member why a charge was not laid? They were invited to lay a charge with the police, but no charge was laid. If my hon. friend does not know it, there is a very strong suspicion, whether it is well founded or not, that the whole breaking up of the office was a bit of a racket to gain sympathy.

Mr. GILLIS: I can answer that. There is no mystery about it, so far as I was concerned, because I have gone through that kind of stuff. That job was planned. There was not any use in or any necessity of laying charges and for this reason: Do not make any mistake about it that the men who are organizing those unions are the men who will finally drag some of the people to-day out of the mess into which they have got themselves. That is why they do not lay charges. The men who did that job were paid to do it by the company which makes a fairly good profit in that section.

Mr. CRERAR: Has my hon. friend any proof of that?

Mr. GILLIS: I have that information from the people.

Mr. CRERAR: A story is not proof.

Mr. GILLIS: My story is just as good as the story told by the company. The minister has only their side of it.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not defending the company for a moment, but these people allege that they were attacked and they said they could recognize their attackers. If so, why did they not lay a charge of assault?

Mr. GILLIS: Every man who committed that assault was checked into the mine although he was not in it, and he had a perfect alibi before the assault was committed. That has been done quite often. I have seen it done myself under certain circumstances. What is the use of a union which has not very much money to start with going to the courts against International Nickel and having a case tried by people who know where they stand? It would be a waste of money.

Mr. CRERAR: The union would not need money to prosecute. The crown attorney of the district would prosecute.

Mr. GILLIS: You go to a magistrate and try to take out papers and you will see. The first thing he wants is some money and a guarantee of more. There is something wrong with the leadership of any trades union that gets hooked up with the courts of the country. I am merely pointing out that you cannot stand up in the House of Commons and tell the working people of this country that their interests are well protected. They have been listening to that for twenty years. Why is there so much opposition in this country to the formation of trades unions?

Great Britain's war effort has been lauded, but I want to tell the house that there would have been no war effort in Great Britain were it not for the 5,000,000 trades unionists led by Bevin. He is the only man in England who could mobilize industry. He had demonstrated in the past that they could trust him, and they were willing to relinquish many of their rights on the understanding that they would get them back when the war was over. They knew they had one of their own with them. They would not take that from General Motors or International Nickel. These men are perhaps honest in protecting their own organizations, and they are going to try to have a continuation of the system that has been good to them. I think it is being demonstrated that the organizations which could not plan the peace-time requirements of this country without having a million people on relief are certainly not capable of planning an all-out war effort and carrying it through.

We are glad to get the most production, but you will have to do something about it. You cannot have a continuation of Kirkland Lake and General Motors. We cannot have our mining industry partly shut down at a time when the fuel controller is hollering for coal. We want to help out with this job, but we want to be recognized as a partner in it, not as a poor relation. These people are saying, "We are willing to use you while there is a crisis, but we are not willing to give you the same rights that we have ourselves." The headquarters of International Nickel are in the United States and they are not considered as foreign agitators. We have no objection to them; we are merely asking for the same rights.

Who is going to organize this selective service proposition? Is it to be done under order in council 2685? Is the government going to recognize the right of the workers of this country to bargain? This thing is becoming a joke. If this thing is only a gesture, there is no use in wasting any time on it; but if this national selective service is to be a success, it will be necessary to get all possible help in order to put it over. The miners' unions in the east will be ready to work with you. I say that any industry operator who retards collective bargaining, who refuses to take in the men round the table with him, is throwing away one of the greatest assets he has. If General Motors is going to operate this thing; if you deny the workers the right to sit in at these councils and help out with this war effort, it will not be a success.

Yesterday I met twenty men from the automotive industry. These men were workers; they were not officials or salaried men. But they were alarmed at the lack of production in their industry. They had sent a committee here to Ottawa to find out what could be done to step up production and to make the industry work. They were here to offer their services. If you do not want them to work with you, that is all right, but I say that the first requirement is to have these men sit in with the boss. If a boss is afraid to meet his employees, then there is something wrong with his business. If the worker is going to be a partner, then he should sit round the conference table to study these problems. If we are going to beat Mr. Hitler and the Japs, there must be some understanding on that basis. If you are going to have a sixteen-hour day, I am prepared to accept it on the understanding that when the real job is done, the bosses and the government and labour will sit round the conference table to rearrange this whole thing and avoid a repetition of what is occurring now.

Our people have gone through a lot of misery. Only 15 per cent of the workers of this country have been permitted to organize. That is not good enough. Things like this stick in the crops of the people. If they have suspicion, it is well founded. The industries of this country have thrown away one of the best assets they had.

I am sorry I have had to say what I did, but it was prompted by what the Minister of National Defence said. I have no doubt that he is honest in his opinion, but he has been living in an environment different from the one in which I have been living. I have been for thirty years with these men. I have attended trades unions meetings and councils; I have listened to these men, and I understand what is going on. If you take a man from one of these trades unions and put him on a board to regulate any industry, the workers will have confidence in him. They will know that he knows their problems and you will avoid a lot of headaches. You will receive one hundred per cent cooperation. But if you send a stockbroker from Montreal or Toronto down to sit in with a bunch of coal miners and discuss their problems, he will not get very far. He does not talk their language, and they do not talk his.

Mr. G. E. WOOD (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to participate in this debate, but I am prompted to do so by what has been said in some of the speeches here to-night. The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) claims that he has been living in a different atmosphere from that in which those who administer some of the laws of Canada live. When I hear labour exponents argue their case I often wonder who is really the labouring man. Labour includes a large proportion of the population of this dominion, and there are certain elements in this country who seem to think that they have a divine right, that they can enjoy all the rights of society without undertaking any of its obligations.

If we are going to have an all-out war effort, it is necessary and essential that we should all contribute according to our ability, that we should give the very best that is in us and not always be looking to find fault with what the other fellow is doing. We should see that we do our own job and do it right.

I have not armed myself to-night with figures beyond those I have charged my memory with, taken from news items, but I should like to take a few moments to reply to some of the things which have been said. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) waxed eloquent over the contribution of labour and criticized the shortcomings of the financiers. Mr. Speaker, I am not a financier. I live among about the same class of people as those represented by the hon. member for Cape Breton South, the common people who are in the great majority, and, after all, an expression from a representative of the common people should have its weight. I am going to give my view as I see it from the point of view of the ordinary, honest-to-goodness farmer who labours, I think, just as much as any organized labour man that I know of. I think, too, that we should appreciate those in this country who work in an executive capacity. It is foolish to suppose that because these men wear white collars they are not working men. I know a lot of people in the city in my constituency who are sitting up nights over the financial problem of seeing that those men who work from eight to five shall have some place to sell their labour. These people deserve some recognition, especially in our war effort, and I am prepared, too, to pay a high tribute to industry for the wonderful contribution it has made to our war effort.

The Monetary Times in the month of January published a record of the business done in 1942 by firms with seats on the Montreal and Toronto stock exchanges and showed that although these firms had to do a great deal more business than they did during the preceding year, their dividends amounted to only five million dollars more than the year before. In spite of doing almost double the volume of business, a large part of their profits were taken away from them by the excess profits tax legislation and corporation taxes brought down in the early part of this war. Therefore these firms are more or less tax-collecting agencies for the government. It is wise to let them have a reasonable profit because 85 per cent of the profit made by corporations is collected for the war effort of this country. I know it is not popular to defend finance, but it is more easy for me to do so because I am not a financier myself. I try to look upon the question from the common-sense point of view that there should be harmony and a proper relationship between the industrial man, the labour man, the farmer, and the executive who are all working together in this all-out war effort that we have to make. I think it is hardly becoming to champion one particular class of our people as if they possessed all the virtues, although I have a great deal of sympathy with labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We are all labour.

Mr. WOOD: That is true, and we should try to keep a proper perspective.

My Social Credit friends in the far corner of the house are exponents of a new order in finance. They make a special attack on our existing financial institutions. I am a practical man, Mr. Speaker, and have to look at things from results as I see them in a practical way, and so I shall not attempt to go into their monetary theory. But let me point out this to my Social Credit friends. I see by the Financial Post to-day that the net profit of the chartered banks last year was about $13,500,000. The net profit of the banks would be what it would probably cost the nation for the banks to be the bookkeepers of the nation, and in spite of what hon. gentlemen said about our financial institutions being parasites, and so forth, $13,500,000 represents only one-quarter of one per cent of our total national wealth if we accept the figure of $6,000,000,000 as the estimated national wealth of the whole country. Suppose the social credit theory were put into practice and we had what the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar advocates—tax-free money. You would have to pay for the cost of doing that business. At the present time the interest charged remunerates the banks and allows them to pay their staffs. The interest charge is their profit motive. So the net profit of the banks represents only what it costs the public for the banks to be the bookkeepers of the nation. I thought it was time that somebody should rise in his place in this house and turn over the leaf so that we could see the other side of the picture. I am not here to defend the banks or any financial institutions whatsoever. I am just trying to use the ordinary common sense the Lord has seen fit to give me and to vision this thing from the point of view of a practical man.

Our Social Credit friends in the far corner of this house also dwell on the new order there is going to be after the war. But I say to them, do not be carried away by any false hopes, for I do not think this new order will ever take away the struggle from life, and I think it is well to keep that in mind. It is all very well to find fault with some of the things we have with us to-day under our present system, but very often, you know, it is difficult to put something better in their place. I would also give this word of warning to the same hon. gentlemen, that when you have this new order, you will still find the same elements among us complaining about it, because no matter what kind of new order is brought into being, there will always be those who will make the best of it and finally find their way to the top, and then we shall have the same element we have to-day wanting another new order. But why do we need to argue about the new order while the war is on? Why not postpone that discussion and see if we cannot make a job of winning the war against the most vile and vicious enemy that ever befouled this earth? That is what I have been thinking, and I have been waiting for some man more able than I to discuss these matters. Perhaps they were too modest, and with me it may be a case of "fools rush in where angels fear to tread." Nevertheless that happens to be my nature. I generally champion the cause of the underdog, and I believe that when you have a friend who needs protection it is better to do it behind his back than before his face.

While the banks and industry have not been making excessive profits, labour, I believe, is getting as fair a share of the wealth of this country to-day as any class. If there is any preference, it is the labouring class that gets the preference, as compared with the farmer and industry. This war has been carried on upon the basis of a 3 per cent war. The last war was a 5½ per cent war; therefore even finance is taking its cut this time. That is something which ought to be considered. Furthermore, while we have been at war for two and a half years, there is no evidence, so far as I can see, that one man in the dominion has become a millionaire or one firm has made millions in consequence of the war. We have taken the glamour of profiteering out of the war, and I am also prepared to say that a great deal of the opposition to the government—why do we not do this, and why do we not do that?—is due to the fact that a certain element of society in the country are disappointed that they cannot get their hands in up to the elbow and make themselves millionaires. A great deal of the criticism of the efforts of the administration could, I believe, be traced to that very reason. I regret that I did not come here a little better prepared to contribute to the debate, but I could not sit here any longer and allow some of the things that we have heard to go unchallenged.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South referred to the Kirkland Lake strike. Perhaps he is more familiar with organized labour than I am, but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that his view of the strike is not shared generally in the part of Ontario from which I come. I may be wrong, but I think that when the men who have enjoyed the distinction of having from 20 to 25 per cent more for their labour than the labour men in the rest of the country, assert themselves at this time in the manner in which they have done, they do not do organized labour any good, nor do they enhance themselves in the estimation of the Canadian people. The hon. member can argue all he likes, but I suggest to him that the less said on this subject, the better. Let it die down, and the next time these men attempt to organize, let them see to it that they do not repeat the mistakes which they have made in the past. Let it go by the board; that would be my advice.

Mr. GILLIS: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. WOOD: If I can answer it, it does not hurt to ask.

Mr. GILLIS: With regard to the Kirkland Lake situation, he says that the men made a mistake. Does he think that any section of the people of this country who obey the instructions of the government, following every legal avenue provided by the government, taking a referendum and getting an affirmative vote, are doing wrong? They carried out literally the laws laid down by the government.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOOD: I do not think I am expected to answer that question yes or no. That is impossible, and I do not think I will attempt it. The question relates to a highly technical matter. Let me say to the hon. gentleman that it is results that count, and these men are out of work to-day. Ask them if they had to do it over again what they would do. Let the hon. gentleman get their answer first.

Mr. GILLIS: They would tell you that they are still good citizens and will obey the laws of the country.

Mr. WOOD: I do not claim to be an authority on these questions, but I am giving the hon. member the benefit of the views of the people with whom I come in contact. Sometimes, living as I do next to nature, among the quiet, placid country folk, I take a great deal of pleasure in going among that satisfied community in the evenings, where people get together in the country stores. These people are called by the rude name of nail-keg orators; but some hon. members here, who try to philosophize us into a new order, would do well to go into some of the old pioneer sections and get the philosophy of life of the people there, talk the language they talk, and learn what their views are. I venture to say that such hon. members would come back into the house better informed. I am prompted to say what I am saying now because I have gathered a considerable amount of the information which I am giving to-night as a result of my associations with these people. As I say, I can talk their language and they can talk mine as well.

I regret having taken up so much time, but I could not sit here quietly without coming to the defence of people who apparently have no one to speak for them. Not that I am interested in the industrialists of the country, but I would remind the house that we need all phases of the economic order if we are to make this a happy and comfortable place to live in. After all, happiness is what we are all after. I would suggest another bit of philosophy to my friends. They may argue as long as they like about finances, they may talk as much as they like about the dollar; but happiness is a home-made product and it cannot be made out of dollars and cents.

Mr. G. H. CASTLEDEN (Yorkton): May I answer the charge which the hon. gentleman has made, that criticisms of the government's efforts can be traced to those who have not been able to get their hands up to the elbow into the pool of profits. Apparently he understands the language and mentality of those who think their main object in life is to get their noses into the trough at the expense of their fellowmen who are contributing to the welfare of the nation by their sweat and toil. I want him to know now that we in this part of the house at least, in our efforts to represent labour, will have nothing to do with that sort of thing.

I make this criticism of the government's action. I say to them: You have mobilized labour, but you have left industry and finance unmobilized. The people of Canada wanted complete mobilization of the country in total war; you have brought down orders in council, and the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) confirms it—mobilizing man-power, the labour of the country. But there has been nothing so far as we can see to show that you intend to have the factories continue operating. This war will likely be won or lost on the production lines of industry.

It is equipment that we need. Labour in Canada is showing itself willing to be mobilized if you will produce the machines, but nothing is done to see that the factories are kept operating. General Motors can close down, or the aeroplane plants can close down production or slow down, and the shipbuilding yards can slow down, but there is nothing in the way of mobilizing industry so that parliament and the government of the country can demand that plants keep working day and night.

Mr. CRERAR: Will my hon. friend explain how we could mobilize industry?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: See that the plants of the country are working day and night.

Mr. CRERAR: Are they not?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Many of them are not.

Mr. CRERAR: Where?

Mr. CASTLEDEN: One in Ottawa. Oshawa was closing down, and a thousand men in Kirkland Lake are doing nothing. I do not know why they should be digging for gold anyway; they would be better employed producing tanks and aeroplanes.

This government claims that it has representatives of labour operating the mobilization work. I say that men who left labour and organized labour and have been in the pay of the government for years do not properly represent labour. What needs to be done first of all, as the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) has said, is to get labour organized and then let labour and farm organizations select their own men to represent them on the board, not for a government which has prevented labour from organizing for forty years to go out and select those whom it probably knows from their position will carry out the will of their masters. A partnership between labour and industry as it is operated to-day is like a partnership between the cat and the canary; the canary ends inside the cat. What we need to solve this problem of labour is to have on these advisory boards men selected by labour to act as labour's representatives in directing policy. Labour must be a part owner of industry, just as the people of Canada feel that the natural resources of this country are the birthright of the Canadian people.

Labour will be more efficient when it is organized. There are fewer strikes when labour is organized. Organized labour is satisfied labour, because they know that if they have not their rights they have at least the machinery with which they can work in a democratic way for those rights. What has happened in Kirkland Lake in the past few months is a disgrace to a country or a government which claims that in any way it has the interests of labour at heart.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 45, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second times, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Tuesday, March 17, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1943, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: I anticipate that there will be some debate on this. To keep the record straight, I should say that at some early stage I shall have to move or have one of my colleagues move to reduce this amount from $2,000,000,000 to $1,500,000,000 because of the fact that a bill has just been passed voting one-quarter of the amount by way of interim supply. But I do not think I need do that to-night; it may be that I should not do that until the $500,000,000 bill has passed parliament as a whole. But just in case anyone wonders why we are voting $500,000,000 and then $2,000,000,000, we are not. This $2,000,000,000 is subject to reduction by the $500,000,000.

It is on this particular measure and at this stage that the defence ministers make their statements and we try to lay the basis for an orderly discussion of the war effort of the government. I see no reason why we should not start right in. The Minister of National Defence is prepared to start now and give some information regarding his department.

Mr. STIRLING: It would appear to me that there must be a correct time at which to make the modification in relation to the $500,000,000. I do not know whether that should be at this stage in committee or on the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be in committee, I think. I will get information about that. I think that can be attended to to-morrow.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): I do not propose to make any statement in the sense of the statements which have been made in previous years in connection with the army activities. I rather felt that they were not regarded as being particularly helpful and that hon. members would prefer to elicit information by way of question and answer. I am, however, prepared to give any information possible and to make a statement on any particular subject which may come up. It has seemed that, in a prepared statement, there has been so much that one has spoken about in which hon. members were not particularly interested, and that one was taking the time of the committee needlessly. Having regard to the fact that the Prime Minister made a statement in regard to army policy along with the policy respecting defence generally in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, also that I made a statement on February 10, and that we have had since then the secret session in which hon. members will recall that quite exhaustive statements were made, I do not propose to traverse the activities of the department by way of opening because, as I say, it would be waste of time.

I propose now to give to the committee for the purpose of the record a break-down of the figures which my colleague the Minister of Finance gave as being the amount included for the army in the total set out in this resolution. I also propose to deal with one or two matters that have come up in debate and, as I have said, with any other matters the committee desires. Perhaps the committee might indicate if there are any particular subjects on which they would desire statements to be made; that is, apart from the statements which may be made in the form of answers to questions.

May I say just one more word by way of explanation. I am making this statement tonight because I find that an unavoidable appointment will keep me away when the house opens to-morrow. I hope to be back here by four o'clock, or very soon after; and if it should be the wish of the committee, I would arrange that one of my colleagues, the Minister of National Defence for Air (Mr. Power), or the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services (Mr. Macdonald), should be here to go on with some subject in their departments, if this order is reached before I return to the house.

Mr. STIRLING: May I ask if in this statement the minister is going to make any reference to the two new divisions to which the Prime Minister referred?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, I was going to refer briefly to that matter. In the first place, the break-down of the $997,000,000, together with the functions or definitions and the amounts relating to them, is as follows:

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the minister mind explaining the difference between recurring and non-recurring items?

Mr. RALSTON: Generally speaking, non-recurring are capital expenditures; recurring, to use a colloquialism, might be called operating expenses. That does not perhaps apply to departmental expenditures generally, but it indicates the rough division between the two terms.

On January 26, I think it was, the Prime Minister indicated what our programme was for 1942-43. I dealt with the same matter also at some length, so I shall not take time to go over that again except to remind the committee, so that we may get a running start, that we have the first, second and third infantry divisions overseas, together with the fifth armoured division, and an army tank brigade. We have the fourth division in Canada. These are all active units. The proposal is, and the programme for this year is, to convert the fourth infantry division into an armoured division and to mobilize an army tank brigade, which will be in addition to the army tank brigade which is now overseas. The expectation is to dispatch the fourth armoured division and the army tank brigade which is to be mobilized, together with a considerable number of corps and army troops, overseas during this year, so that if the programme is carried out, our overseas representation will be five divisions, two of which will be armoured divisions and three of which will be infantry divisions, together with two army tank brigades.

Those are the formations. In addition, there will be a very substantial number of army troops, and corps troops, that is to say, on lines of communication. The committee will realize that, as I have said before, the number of men in the division itself, that is to say, what we regard as the division proper, is augmented and has to be augmented and supplemented very considerably by men on lines of communication, for working with the corps and for working with the army.

We emerge, then, with two corps. It was stated by the Prime Minister that one of the two corps would consist of three infantry divisions and the other corps of two armoured divisions. That may or may not be the composition of those corps. We want to have them perfectly flexible, and it may be that the composition of the corps will change from time to time, depending upon whether or not it may be desirable to use an armoured division with an infantry division, or an armoured division with two infantry divisions, or otherwise as the case may be. Those two corps will compose the Canadian army, which will have an army headquarters and will be a complete organization, what I described before as a hard-hitting, fast-moving fighting force ready to take on any job which may present itself. That does not mean by any means that this army has to fight as a unit. I have said before, and I repeat, that those with whom we are associated understand full well —and I know this personally because I have made it clear to them myself—that the Canadian army and the Canadian troops are, as the Prime Minister said the other day, for the purpose of serving the common cause to the very best advantage, that they are prepared to serve in whatever theatre and in whatever way may be considered best, having regard to the task which has to be done.

That is our overseas programme. That will require, as I anticipate, something like 100,000 men by the end of the ensuing fiscal year. Of those, roughly 25,000 will be for new units, that is to say, for those additional corps and army units, and something like 75,000 for reinforcements.

Mr. GREEN: Those are all for overseas?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, or intended for overseas.

Mr. STIRLING: That would add up to nearly 200,000?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, it would add up to nearly 200,000. But of course the house will understand that when reinforcements are needed and go over, it means that they will be taking the place of some men now there, so you do not add together all the proposed reinforcements and all the men you have over there.

Mr. GREEN: I did not get that clearly. Did the minister say there would be a total of 175,000 go overseas this year?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. I have in mind that the army will have something like 175,000, but it all depends upon casualties, as my hon. friend knows.

Mr. GREEN: Did you mean that there were 175,000 to be raised for overseas this year?

Mr. RALSTON: No. I said 100,000, of which 25,000, roughly, were for new units, and 75,000 for reinforcements. That is our programme.

Mr. STIRLING: Will they be ready by the end of the year?

Mr. RALSTON: I would think so, yes—earlier than that. That is our programme for overseas, as we see it at the present time. I intimated, in addition, that we had certain plans in Canada. Certain special dispositions had been made, due to the worsening of the situation following Pearl Harbour. These dispositions had been made particularly on the east and west coasts.

I need hardly say one of the most important items of those dispositions was the formation of anti-aircraft batteries—that is, so far as the army is concerned. That has been followed up. Along with that, as the Prime Minister said yesterday, has gone the formation of about a dozen new infantry battalions, and a certain number of additional artillery batteries and other arms of the service.

In addition to that, there has been authorization for an organization of reserve brigade groups. That is to say, reserve battalions across Canada have been authorized in each district to form into reserve brigades, and permanent staffs have been provided for those brigades, in order that they may have training, and be in a position to assist in connection with the defence of Canada, should the need arise.

In addition to that, there have been arrangements made for the organization of men in training centres into a special formation for use in emergency conditions.

All those are, of course, in addition to the fourth division, which is now in Canada; in addition to the three brigade groups of the sixth division, which is in Canada; and in addition to the coast defence artillery units, and their supplementary services, which are on both coasts.

That would have been quite a comprehensive programme. Then, in addition to that—it was not in the Prime Minister's announcement—I should point out to the committee that we have authorized the completion of the sixth division as a self-contained formation, by providing divisional troops and divisional headquarters which, along with the three brigade groups of the sixth division, which have been mobilized for some time, will form a complete sixth division.

Mr. GREEN: Does that include artillery?

Mr. RALSTON: Artillery, engineers and all units of other services. The commanding officer of the sixth division will be, I expect, named very shortly.

Then, as the Prime Minister said, we have authorized the mobilization of the seventh division. That is to say, it will be the mobilization of a complete seventh division, which means the infantry battalions, plus all services—artillery, engineers, signals, army service corps, medical corps, and so on—a complete division.

That division will be mobilized and composed of units which are already in being by forming them into brigades, and putting alongside them in brigade groups the various services required. Headquarters will be provided as well.

Following that will be the mobilization of the eighth division, which will also be formed, I anticipate, from units which have already been mobilized—or some which have been mobilized very recently, and probably with the addition of some to be mobilized. Hon. members will understand that that does not mean that the formation of the seventh and eighth divisions simply means the conversion into divisions of battalions which up to this time have been individual battalions. That will be so, but battalions will have to be organized to take the place of those battalions which will go into these two divisions. That is to say, we are adding to our strength in Canada to the extent of these divisions.

Mr. WHITE: Will they both be active divisions?

Mr. RALSTON: They will be active home defence divisions, and they will be composed of men, largely, who will be called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. WHITE: Will they be active force units?

Mr. RALSTON: They will be active force, in the sense that they will be full-time units.

Mr. WHITE: But they will be reserve force units?

Mr. RALSTON: They will be active; they will be home defence forces on active service.

Mr. STIRLING: But not attested.

Mr. RALSTON: No, not attested. They will be home defence forces on active service.

Mr. WHITE: Do you call them active forces?

Mr. RALSTON: I am calling them that. Each of these units will have some in them who are attested. A very large proportion will be men who have been called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. GREEN: That is true of the sixth division also.

Mr. RALSTON: The sixth division was very much less. I would say probably 20 per cent, or less, are under the National Resources Mobilization Act at the present time.

Mr. WHITE: Is it the intention to take any of the present second battalions, and make them a part of the seventh and eighth divisions?

Mr. RALSTON: Some of the second battalions may be taken and made part of the divisions, and some of them may be mobilized to take the place of the battalions which have been made part of the divisions. I can say to my hon. friend that after the operation has been completed and the two divisions have been formed, and units have been formed to take their place, I would anticipate that so far as infantry is concerned there will be practically no units which will not have a representative either overseas or mobilized in Canada. That will mean that second battalions will have to be formed for units which will be mobilized.

Mr. STIRLING: Will that not mean that the reserve to which the minister has referred as the second defence string will be largely depleted?

Mr. RALSTON: No; the units mobilized will then form reserve battalions.

Mr. STIRLING: New ones?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. Second battalions will be formed; that is the general programme.

Mr. TUSTIN: Will reserve battery units be mobilized?

Mr. RALSTON: I anticipate that the first infantry units will all be mobilized. I cannot be sure, without counting up with regard to the other units. But, answering the hon. member for Yale, do not let anyone think there will not be plenty of second battalions still in existence. I am answering the hon. member for Hastings-Peterborough, too. Probably there are eighty or ninety second battalions still in existence.

That is the programme, very roughly, for the year. In that connection I do not believe I have anything more to say at this time. The committee will have an opportunity to get such information as I can give it, subject to this, that I do not feel I can give the proposed disposition of these new divisions, except to indicate what was said by the Prime Minister, namely, that they will be used as mobile reserves for the east and west coasts at the present time. That will mean that when the mobilization is complete there will be, until the fourth division goes overseas, the fourth division, the sixth division, the seventh division, the eighth division, plus the coast defence battalions on each coast, of which there are quite a number. That is in addition to the coast defence artillery.

Mr. HAZEN: How long will it take to complete the mobilization of these two divisions?

Mr. RALSTON: I think the mobilization of the seventh division will be completed within a comparatively short time, and the eighth division will be completed perhaps sooner than my hon. friend expects.

Mr. WHITE: How soon will the names of the units be announced?

Mr. RALSTON: I have them under my hand for the seventh division, but I am not in position to announce them at the moment. I may say to my hon. friend that it is not because I have no desire to give them, but simply because it is felt that these should not be given out publicly. I refer to the list of so-called "Order of Battle" from which a man can find out that his particular unit has been called up. This "Order of Battle" has not been given out, and perhaps hon. members will note that it is not being given in the Canada Gazette. If my hon. friend wants to know about any particular unit, I can give him the information.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister explain about the reserve army? Figures have been given from time to time showing that there are about 140,000 men in the reserve army, and a return brought down in this house shows that about 62,000 of these are men who were called up for thirty days' training under the National Resources Mobilization Act and then returned to their homes after completing their training. The only connection they have with the army is that their names appear on the nominal rolls of the reserve units to which they have been posted. In other words, they have not been taking any training with the reserve units at all and are really no longer in the army; yet they are always shown as part of the reserve army. This would appear to make the strength of that reserve army quite a lot larger than it really should be. It really amounts to a paper strength. Furthermore, there was a return No. 1241 brought down on March 23 which includes a copy of a letter from the acting deputy minister for the army to the under-secretary of state, which contains this paragraph:

> No information is available concerning the number of enlistments among personnel who were called for 30 days' training and who have not yet been recalled for further training.

In other words, of these 62,000 men we do not know how many have enlisted for active service. They may be in the active army, the navy or the air force; they certainly are no longer in the reserve army. I think these points should be cleared up by the minister.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is perfectly right when he says that when men enlist in the active forces, they are not available as part of the reserve army.

Mr. GREEN: But they still appear as part.

Mr. RALSTON: I heard what my hon. friend said. I understand about that. To that extent I think the figures are incorrect, but it does not mean that we have lost those men. It means that they have become more useful than if they were still in the reserve army—

Mr. GREEN: I maintain—

Mr. RALSTON: Will my hon. friend just permit me to finish the sentence? It means, of course, that they are being counted in the reserve army and in the active army too. I think my hon. friend is perfectly right in his criticism. I know of no way that that could be corrected except to take a percentage.

My hon. friend is not quite correct in his reference to paper strength. These men have had thirty days of intensive training. Knowing what I do of the training of the reserve army, I would think that really qualifies them to be members of the reserve army. I quite understand that they do not go to the armouries, but they are there and available for the reserve army and therefore I think they might properly be counted. My hon. friend is only repeating what he said in the house the other day. He referred to the reserve army and much to my surprise indicated that he thought the reserve army should be called up compulsorily for training.

Mr. GREEN: I said if they could not be obtained in any other way.

Mr. RALSTON: That is how I would have expected my hon. friend to put it, rather than the way I put it. It is the easiest thing in the world for the Department of National Defence to make a requisition to the Department of National War Services for them to ask so many men to report for training. The reserve army is a citizen's army, organized and mobilized for the primary purpose of defending the homes of the people who are in them and their communities.

Mr. GREEN: Then these 60,000 should not be counted in the reserve army.

Mr. RALSTON: I say that that is not the idea of the reserve army. It is pointed out by my officers that the suggestion which my hon. friend makes that they should be called up for compulsory service is a complete negation of our whole idea of the reserve army. But I say to him that if it is necessary in this time of stress to call on our citizens compulsorily to defend their communities, then it will have to be done. But I do feel that we ought to give these citizens a proper opportunity to enlist in that reserve army and to do their share with respect to the defence of their homes and the communities in which they live. The reserve army essentially is one which lives and thrives on the patriotic fervour and self-denial of the men who are in it, men who are willing to give up something for the sake of assisting in the defence of their country; men who are willing to stay after hours; men who are willing to take extra classes; men who are willing to make the best use of little equipment perhaps; men who are willing to wait for their turn on a piece of equipment in order that they may fit themselves. I feel just as strongly as my hon. friend, perhaps a little stronger, with regard to calling men up compulsorily, but I do feel that we should not do that until we have made dead sure that the citizens in these communities understand what their responsibilities are and have had an opportunity to fulfil them.

It is obvious that the citizens are not coming into the ranks of the reserve army as we would like them to. There are only two ways to get them, voluntarily or by calling them up. There is a place for the reserve army in our organization. Men below 19 years of age or from 35 to 50 years are taken into the reserve army. Recognition is given to the fact that these are men who probably are not in a position, because of age, family responsibility, or business responsibilities, to take their part in the active army. We have just decided to do one thing more in this respect, that is to lower the age limit from 35 to 30 years in the case of married men. We are doing this in the hope that we will get more men into the reserve army. I say to my hon. friend and to the committee that I am perfectly ready to consider the calling up of men compulsorily for the reserve army if that is the only way in which they can be brought in. I hope that will not be so because I think it would defeat the spirit which is behind the reserve army and which has done so much to build up the active battalions we have. The whole Canadian army has been built up on the reserve army. The units which are overseas were reserve army units which were mobilized. This is entirely different from the situation in the last war. As I say, the whole army is built up on the organization, the esprit de corps, of the units of the reserve army.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister not think that the best way to build up the reserve army would be for the government to decide how many men it wants and then make an appeal to the people of Canada for that number to enlist? These men have had all kinds of discouragements, and I am not surprised at all that there has been great trouble in keeping these units up to strength. The position now, it is quite evident, is that there are only about 80,000 men in the reserve, the difference between that number and 140,000 being made up of these thirty-day trainees, and they by the way are not volunteers, so they do not fit in with the minister's description of the purposes of the reserve army. It does seem to me that if the ministry would announce how large a reserve they are going to have—100,000 or 200,000 or whatever the number may be—and then go out and appeal for these men, they would have no trouble in getting them.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not going to let my hon. friend or any other member of this house suggest that the government should necessarily set a target for the total reserve army. My hon. friend knows perfectly well the reserve units in a particular community. Their officers know the number of men they want and all you have to do is to ask them. It is the community that primarily has to do with the reserve units. We have reserve brigade groups right across this dominion. We have reserve units in each district, and I ask hon. members to assist in encouraging a community spirit and in asking men to go into the reserve army. If the emergency exists which has been pointed out in this house and in the country, I cannot conceive of men not responding if the matter is properly put to them, not only by the government, but by people in their own community.

Mr. GREEN: If all the reserve units were brought up to strength, what would the total strength of the reserve army be?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell my hon. friend without knowing the number of the reserve units.

Mr. WHITE: What is the approximate strength of the reserve army now, after subtracting the number of thirty-day trainees?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend has been given the figures. I have not the strength returns, but if there are 140,000 on the reserve army and 60,000 of supernumeraries, that makes 80,000.

Mr. WHITE: I understand that 90,000 men were called for thirty days' training.

Mr. RALSTON: But a good many of them have been called up and are on service now. That number is going down all the time as men are called up for four months' training and going into active service. That number is getting less and less. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. GREEN: If the minister cannot say how many men will be required to complete all the reserve units, surely he can tell the committee how many men will be required to bring up to strength all the reserve units which have been ordered brigaded.

Mr. RALSTON: For one reserve brigade, about 3,000 men. Multiply that by eleven districts; eleven times 3,000 would make it 33,000.

Mr. WHITE: Is it the intention of the department to have one brigade in each military division, or will all the reserve force units be brigaded in time?

Mr. RALSTON: The plan has not been to brigade all the reserve force units. The brigade plan was for a special purpose at a particular time. The reserves have never been brigaded, with an active full-time brigade staff. They have been in their regular brigades in their particular locality, but all on a part-time basis. For operational purposes administration and training staff have been provided for one brigade in each of the districts. That does not mean that the other reserve units are not operating as they always have been.

Mr. GRAYDON: From what medical categories are the reserve army drawn?

Mr. RALSTON: I think it goes down as low as "C", but I cannot tell my hon. friend to-night. My hon. friend the member for Vancouver South asked me a question with regard to the reserve army and with regard to strength, and that gave me an opportunity to give the committee what I had made a note of, namely my hon. friend's suggestion that the reserve army should be completed by the calling up of men for service under the National Resources Mobilization Act. May I say to him that I thoroughly agree with some of the things that have been said. The reserve army has had a good deal of discouragement. Their functions have been changed twice that I know of, having regard to the particular situation in which we found ourselves. The reserve army units at first had the expectation of being mobilized, and each one of them held on to the men in their particular ranks as active service men. They did not want them to go as reinforcements because they entertained the hope that they would be mobilized for active service. That hope faded in a great many cases; some of the active service men went to other units from the locality or elsewhere, and that caused discouragement. The suggestion was made and followed of setting up an organization whereby they were asked to keep a certain percentage of their personnel in the active service category, A category men, so that they could furnish reinforcements and at the same time carry on reserve units proper. Then that was reviewed. Representations were made to the department by some of the reserve units themselves. They felt that the reserve units were in competition with the active service units in the matter of recruiting, and they felt that the age limit should be changed so that men between 19 and 35 years of age would not enlist in the reserve units. That age limit has been in force now for some little time. As I have indicated, an order is just going out now that the age limit will be changed for married men from 35 to 30.

Mr. BOUCHER: What is the situation about the single man from 30 to 35 who cannot enter the reserve army and cannot be called up? Would the minister tell us about that?

Mr. RALSTON: What does my hon. friend mean by "tell us about that"?

Mr. BOUCHER: What is to become of that particular class?

Mr. RALSTON: I suppose they could enlist.

Mr. GREEN: They cannot be called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act.

Mr. RALSTON: These men can enlist. Under the National Resources Mobilization Act, all one has to do to call them up is to issue a proclamation increasing the age limit. That has not been done, but a proclamation can be issued, and probably might be in the very near future, so that these men could be called up. In the meantime, they can enlist in the active service.

Mr. GREEN: Why should there be that gap? The Prime Minister announced that the government was only going to call men up to thirty years of age, from twenty-one to thirty, and they are to be chosen by lot. Why that gap between thirty and thirty-five? You are allowing the married men from thirty to thirty-five in the reserve, but not the single men.

Mr. RALSTON: The government did not announce that they would not take men over thirty but that they would take any man up to thirty. They may announce at any time that they will take any man from thirty to thirty-five. I think it is perhaps a pretty good policy that single men from thirty to thirty-five should be encouraged to enlist. It has been represented by officers commanding units that there are cases in which a man does not realize his duty to enlist if he is in a reserve unit. The situation is that there is a place for that man to serve. He has not been called up at the present time, but he may be called up. I do not see any harm being done to the national interest or to the army by what my hon. friend calls that gap, which is really not a gap at all.

Mr. GREEN: A man from thirty to thirty-five is supposed to enlist in the active service force, but a man from twenty-one to thirty is called up for home service. Why are they not all treated in the same way?

Mr. RALSTON: I would say that the man from twenty-one to thirty has the same opportunity to enlist in the active service forces. The man from twenty-one to thirty has two opportunities: he is liable to be called up, and his alternative is to enlist in the active service forces. The man from thirty to thirty-five is not liable to be called up as the proclamation stands at present. But he does have the opportunity, or liability, or obligation, or whatever he may want to call it, to enlist from thirty to thirty-five. If any preference were given, it was given to the man from thirty to thirty-five.

Progress reported.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

SECOND VICTORY LOAN

COMMISSIONS AND OTHER COSTS—CASH AND CONVERSION SUBSCRIPTIONS—APPRECIATION OF SERVICES OF COMMITTEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): I think I should make a statement regarding the second victory loan before the house adjourns. The main part of this statement will relate to commissions and other remuneration paid in connection with the sale of the second victory loan bonds. I make this statement because certain hon. members of the house have been good enough to call to my attention certain reports which are apparently circulating in some sections of the country. These are so obviously false as to suggest that they have been inspired by sources which have a selfish interest in undermining and impeding Canada's war effort.

Unfortunately it will be some time yet before all the payments have been made and the returns completed in connection with the loan, and therefore I cannot now give the actual dollar amounts of payments that will be made to those who rendered services in connection with the campaign. However, I can and wish to give the house the basis upon which the payments will be made.

First, let me deal with the commissions paid to individual salesmen. The basis of these commissions will be five-eighths of one per cent on subscriptions to the twelve-year bonds and three-eighths of one per cent on the six-year bonds. This represents an increase of one-eighth of one per cent compared with what was paid in connection with 1941 victory loan, but it must be noted that this time no commission will be paid on subscriptions classified as employee subscriptions. Moreover, no commission will be paid on conversion subscriptions to the two and one-half year bonds which were not issued for cash, or on subscriptions from subscribers included in the special names category. Last year we found that in a good many instances, particularly in the case of salesmen working in rural districts or other districts which for one reason or another did not represent good sales territory, the amount of commissions paid served to do little more than cover out-of-pocket expenses of the salesmen. Provision was therefore made this time for more extensive pooling of part of the commission by provincial and local committees so that fair treatment could be rendered to each salesman no matter what the type of sales territory in which he was assigned to work. My hope is that this arrangement will result in reasonably fair treatment to all the individual salesmen. In this connection it should be remembered that the salesmen used in the campaign were drawn away from their usual occupations, and had not only to devote their full time to the sales of bonds while the campaign was on but also had to spend considerable time in preparation and training during the three weeks period before the campaign actually commenced.

Next I deal with the remuneration to banks, trust and loan companies, Quebec savings banks and other savings institutions (province of Ontario savings offices, Alberta treasury branches, and La Federation des Caisses Populaires Desjardins). No selling commission of any kind will be paid on sales made to the public by the various branches of the banks or these other financial institutions. However, we will pay a service fee for the varied services they rendered in entering subscriptions and handling the payment and delivery of the bonds to purchasers. This service fee will be at a rate of one-quarter of one per cent of the par value of bonds serviced by each such institution calculated in accordance with the regulations.

With regard to the remuneration to be paid to investment dealers and stockbrokers, provision has been made for investigation of the services rendered and recommendation to me of a fair basis of remuneration for such services by a committee consisting of the chairman of the national war finance committee, the securities advisor of the Bank of Canada, and the deputy minister of finance. In arriving at this basis of remuneration, the committee will take into account the number of different types of personnel made available to the national war finance committee for varying terms of employment, which extended over a period of four months in many cases, and will also have reasonable regard to the past record of performance of the various firms in connection with dominion loan campaigns.

The house may recall that the total expenses in connection with the first victory loan campaign, including not only commissions and other remuneration for services rendered but also advertising and publicity expenses, printing and distribution of bonds, et cetera, amounted to only 1·09 per cent of the total amount of the issue. It is anticipated that total expenditures in connection with the second victory loan campaign will represent a slightly lower percentage of the total issue. There has been some criticism in certain quarters of some aspects of the loan campaign. In my opinion these criticisms are unfounded. The campaign itself was a striking success, the reports I have received pay uniform tribute to the highly efficient organization which was developed, and I think the house will agree that the percentage cost figures which I have just indicated represent a very economical cost of raising a public loan of this magnitude and character.

In conclusion, I wish to express at this time and in this place not only the keen appreciation of the government and myself, but also I hope of this parliament, for the fine services rendered in this very important campaign not only by members of the national war finance committee, which includes the provincial chairmen, but also by a great many other voluntary workers in provincial and local committees who gave unsparingly of their time and energy to make the campaign the success it proved to be. Because, apparently, there has been a rumour circulating to the contrary, I wish to emphasize the fact that with the single exception of one provincial chairman serving in a western province and who because he is devoting his full time to the work of the national war finance committee receives a modest compensation, these persons gave their services without any remuneration.

Before I take my seat, it may be of interest to the house if I now give the latest figures we have available in regard to the results of the loan. Figures compiled as at March 14th, show a total number of subscribers of 1,643,013, and a total volume of subscriptions of $993,884,350. Of the latter total, $841,766,350 represented cash subscriptions, and the remainder, $152,118,000, represented conversion subscriptions. These figures are not as yet final but they will probably approximate the final results. The house, I think, will agree that these are astounding results for a loan offered to the public in the middle of winter and only one month prior to the due date of heavily increased income tax payments.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

PROVISION FOR INCREASED RATE PER BUSHEL ON WHEAT DELIVERED BY PRODUCERS

Hon. J. A. MacKINNON (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 13, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

On section 1—Payments to producers delivering wheat.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Chairman, as one of the members who asked that the committee on agriculture should be called together to consider the bills relating to agriculture, I should like to make a few observations on this matter.

Last year I was a member of the committee which dealt with pensions and returned soldier problems. That committee accomplished a good deal of excellent work. We met as a group of returned men, not as members of political parties, to consider the recommendations which had been made, and as a result of our work we offered certain suggestions to the government, which to a great extent were accepted. I was in hopes that when the agriculture committee met, the procedure would be something similar, that we would meet as a group of members representing agricultural constituencies, to consider the problems of the wheat growers of western Canada.

I am sorry to say that this was not the case. Even before the committee met, its work was prejudiced by the remarks of certain members on the government side of the house. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), speaking the day before the bill was referred to the committee, is reported at page 1382 of Hansard to have said:

> The changes in policy this year, as brought down by the government, have been accepted by hon. members in the government and followers of the government in the house, and for that reason they will finally pass the house as they are. No number of speeches made by hon. members can change that position. They did not even know what was going to happen until it came down in the house.

That is an entirely wrong spirit in which to refer any measure to a committee. We found when the committee met that the same condition prevailed in the committee. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) told us that we could make representations, but that it was altogether unlikely that the government would be prepared to accept them, and that it had already viewed these bills from every angle. He pointed out that everything that could be said with respect to them had already been said in the cabinet, and it was doubtful whether anything we would recommend would be accepted, if it entailed any further expenditure of money.

Under such circumstances it was pretty hard in committee to get anything which would give western agriculture a better deal than it had been receiving in the past. We did, however, recommend certain changes. We recommended a change with respect to basic acreage, as covered in section 3 of Bill No. 12. But that recommendation was not accepted by the government, and the bill went through in almost the same form as that in which it had been presented to the committee.

There were many of us who thought that in the consideration of Bill No. 14, to amend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, a change should have been made to bring into the bill the principle of insurance. We were told that this was ultra vires of the British North America Act. It will be remembered, however, that when the government wished to introduce unemployment insurance it found a means to get round that difficulty; and I am sure, if it desired, it could find the means of developing from the Prairie Farm Assistance Act a comprehensive insurance scheme. A recommendation which was made in the committee that the government give further study to this matter was voted down. The fact that the committee on agriculture voted down a recommendation that the government should consider and study the matter of crop insurance does not seem to reflect the exercise of any great amount of intelligence. In the United States this matter has been considered for a number of years, and they have introduced a comprehensive scheme of crop insurance not only for wheat but for cotton and many other agricultural products.

These three bills taken together do not place the western wheat growers in any better position to-day than that which they occupied last year. Last year, under the prairie farm income legislation the farmers of western Canada were paid approximately $20,000,000. Under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, as it operated last year, they were paid something over $11,000,000. This year that act has been amended so as to exclude those having crops of from eight to twelve bushels to the acre. Last year $7,000,000 of the money paid under the act was paid to this class. Wheat acreage reduction payments last year were made on the basis of $4 an acre; this year the basis is reduced to $2 an acre. This means that $11,000,000 less will be paid under the act next year.

The basic acreage under the wheat acreage reduction bill was changed. Under the new regulations it will mean that the bonus will be paid on a million less acres than last year. This means another $2,000,000 less that the farmers of western Canada will receive. In all, a total of $40,000,000 less will be paid under the regulations this year than was paid last year. If we take the crop we had last year, one of 200,000,000 bushels, and pay an additional 20 cents a bushel on it, as is recommended under this measure, we find that we have an additional payment of $40,000,000. On the other hand—

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think the hon. member is discussing this bill at all. He is discussing other measures which were before the house on earlier occasions. This bill provides only two things: first, to change the price from 70 cents to 90 cents and, second, to include the word "mills". My hon. friend is discussing the acreage bonus, and matters of that kind, which have nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. MacINNIS: On the point of order, while I did not take part in the discussion, my understanding is that all the bills were discussed interchangeably, or at the same time. I believe that was done to facilitate discussion on the whole question. If the hon. member for Melfort believes that that procedure is necessary on this occasion, I suggest he should be allowed to proceed.

Mr. CRERAR: I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that an arrangement was reached in preliminary discussions, on second reading of these bills in the house. The bills were then sent to committee, and this bill was reported back without amendment. I suggest it is stretching the understanding too far if we are to permit the same discussion at this stage.

Mr. WRIGHT: I was discussing the other bills only as they relate to this one. I have, however, completed that phase of the matter, and I shall not pursue it further.

With respect to the bill before the committee, we were informed in the committee on agriculture that we could not be told the price we were receiving for our wheat because the British government did not think it advisable to state the price at this time. But it will be noticed that the British government have allowed proper prices on other agricultural products. We know the price for cheese, and the prices for pork, bacon and other products have been made public. But there seems to be some deep dark secret so far as wheat is concerned. Perhaps there is a good reason for this secrecy, but I have never been able to see what it was. It seemed very unfair to me that the British government should be willing to pay their own farmers the cost of production, but that it should insist that the price paid to the farmers of western Canada should be less than the cost of production. That does not develop good-will or unity among British countries, but it is a condition which has prevailed up to this year.

Under the billion dollar gift to Britain that condition has been changed entirely. The matter is now in the hands of the Canadian government, and it seems most unfair to us in western Canada to know that our wheat is being sold to Great Britain below the cost of production, thereby compelling us to pay an unfair share of that billion dollar gift. Everything else going to Great Britain under that gift is being sent at a price which at least equals the cost of production. We in western Canada feel that our contribution to the gift should be at a rate equal to our cost.

There are three things these bills do not do which I believe they should do. It seems to me that the 8 to 12 bushel class should not have been eliminated from the provisions of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and there should have been no change in the basic acreage provision in the wheat acreage reduction bill.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bradette): The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) was quite in order when he contended that hon. members should keep within the limits of the bill. Later on there will be another bill having to do with wheat acreage, but at the present time we are dealing only with the wheat bonus.

Mr. WRIGHT: As I say, the rate should not have been cut. This amendment to the wheat board act provides for a price this year of 90 cents a bushel, but I believe that this price should have been at least $1 a bushel, Fort William, plus participation certificates which would bring the farmer at least a parity price for his product. It seems to me that with these bills we are doing just what the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Abbott) referred to about a year ago when he stated that some people believed they were thinking, when they were in reality only rearranging their prejudices. It seems to me that in these bills we are simply rearranging the payments to the farmers of western Canada. We are paying but little more than was paid last year, and with the wheat grower working under the conditions which prevail to-day, this seems to me to be most unfair.

Mr. REID: It has been said that this 90 cents is below the cost of production. I can visualize a man with a five-bushel crop and another one with a twenty-bushel crop, and I cannot just understand what amount a farmer would have to get to cover his cost of production. Could the hon. member tell me what the cost of production really is on a bushel of wheat?

Mr. WRIGHT: The cost of production must always be figured on an average yield. The average yield in western Canada for many years has been between 16 and 18 bushels per acre. In my own section of the country our crops are larger than that. My own average for the past twenty years has been over 30 bushels per acre, but I grow wheat only on land that is specially prepared. You must take the average in arriving at these figures.

Mr. REID: In other words, this 90-cent price would amply pay some farmers, while it would not pay others; would that be correct?

Mr. WRIGHT: There would be few farmers in western Canada who would have made a profit at 90 cents, taking the average for the past ten or twenty years. There may be exceptional cases where a profit would be made, but they would be exceptional. Western Canada asked for a parity price taking 1926-29 as a base, which would be much easier to arrive at than the cost of production. I have in my hand an article which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of March 4, dealing with what the western farmer is receiving to-day for his wheat. This reads:

> The prairie wheat producers' purchasing power dropped to its lowest point in ten years in 1941, down nearly 21 points from 1940, an index prepared by dominion bureau of statistics showed to-day.
> The index was based entirely on wheat. In cases where wheat farmers have turned to production of coarse grains or other products, their 1941 purchasing power compared favourably with that of 1940, officials said.
> With yield per acre, farm price per bushel and value per acre taken into account, the bureau index for 1941 stood at 33·3 against 54·2 in 1940, 63·8 in 1939, 44·7 in 1935, 89·3 in 1928 and 100·1 in 1927.

The index basis of 100 established in 1913, when yield per acre was 20·8 bushels, farm price 65 cents a bushel and value per acre was $13.62. In 1941 the yield per acre was 12·9 bushels, farm price 49 cents and value per acre $6.38.

The bureau noted the 1941 average yield was the lowest since 1927. In the present crop year, the farm price of wheat averaged 49·2 cents a bushel from August to December, or 2·4 cents a bushel less than the 1940-41 crop year average. The average value per acre of $6.38 in 1941 was the lowest reported since 1933.

I contend that the western farmer is entitled to at least a parity price for his wheat. That is what the delegation which came to Ottawa asked for; that is all western agriculture has ever asked for—equal treatment with other groups in the dominion.

Mr. FAIR: Mr. Chairman, what I shall have to say has been said year after year and I expect it to receive the same consideration now that it has received in the past. When this delegation of 400 from Saskatchewan, accompanied by representatives from Manitoba and Alberta, came down here, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed that their demands were reasonable and fair. On one occasion the Prime Minister went so far as to say that the wheat situation was Canada's problem. I wonder what the Prime Minister is doing about it? Is he going to make it the farmers' problem or Canada's problem as a whole? We have not received the same consideration as that which has been accorded to other groups. We have been picked out and treated as a poor relation. As has been pointed out by the previous speaker, we have been no better off this last year than we were before. I think this fact must be recognized, regardless of any figures which may be placed before the committee. We know from experience that we are in no better position to-day than we were in the past.

We are asking for parity prices for agricultural products, not for one or two products but for all. This group with which I am associated and for which I am now speaking have suggested for a number of years that a price of 95 cents per bushel at the local elevator should be paid. The cost of production has increased tremendously because of the war, and this year we asked for at least $1 per bushel at the local elevators. Of course this would apply only where a farmer has a crop. Where he has no crop, some sound system of crop insurance should be put into effect. This could be done quite easily by amending the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. Consideration of this matter was refused by the agriculture committee, for what reason I do not know. Perhaps the main reason was prejudice and ignorance of the question under discussion. Any one who uses his brains for the purpose for which they were given would not refuse to ask the government to investigate the feasibility of instituting a sound policy of crop insurance. I think it is admitted that we are not being treated the same as other citizens of Canada. Speaking on March 10, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had this to say, as reported on page 1211 of Hansard:

I would say to him that any member of this house who carries back into western Canada the government's policy in relation to wheat and its policy in relation to other farm products can stand before any audience and explain to the people there that this is the best that can be done under the conditions with which we are confronted in the Dominion of Canada to-day, and the best that has been done in an attempt to settle their problems at any time.

Two wrongs, Mr. Chairman, never did make a right. I say without fear of contradiction that the wheat growers of western Canada have not received the cost of production since 1929, thirteen years ago. Put any other class in Canada in that position—industrialists, bankers, insurance men, or any other group—and after they have been producing below the cost of production for thirteen years what would you have? You would have sit-down strikes all over the country. But the farmers have never gone on a sit-down strike, and so I say that they are among the most loyal citizens of this country. We have also done our share in sending fighting men to the front, and the Minister of Finance will bear me out when I say that the farmers have done more than they were really able to in subscribing such large amounts to the victory loan, about which the minister spoke a few moments ago.

The Minister of Agriculture went on to say in that same speech:

We are taking every last dollar out of the treasury of Canada to deal with these problems which we feel it is safe to take at this present time.

Every other class is accorded its full share before the farmers are even considered. Why should we be treated as the orphans of this country? Why do we have to take the treatment of a stepmother, and carry on below the cost of production? I can see no reason for it. When money is required to pay interest on our national debt or to provide supplies for our fighting forces we can always float a loan —and just here let me say that the Minister of Finance has neglected the one institution which should do the most of Canada's financing outside of the money that is raised by taxation, and that is the Bank of Canada. The Minister of Finance seems to have neglected it entirely. Apparently his advisers and the rulers of this country have seen fit to decree that the farmers must continue in their present condition of poverty.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Shame.

Mr. FAIR: Yes, because for a number of years past we have produced figures in this house, supported by argument, to show that the farmers have been and are still producing at below the cost of production, yet the government has not seen fit to alter that condition. As I see it, we shall have to have others on the treasury benches before the farmers will get fair treatment. It is my intention when I go back to my constituency to tell the farmers, as I shall continue to tell this house, that until they organize and vote in their own interest when election day comes, they can expect no better treatment than they are receiving and have been receiving for years past.

Mr. KUHL: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture a question based on the quotation from one of his addresses in this house which the hon. member for Battle River has just made, to the effect that the government was taking out of the treasury to deal with agricultural problems every last dollar it felt safe in taking. If funds were made available to the department for raising the price of wheat from 70 cents to $1 or to a parity price or whatever is considered a just price, would the minister go so far as to recommend to his department that this money actually be paid?

Mr. GARDINER: In the first place, Mr. Chairman, I made my speech on the second reading of the bill, and the statement which has just been quoted is fully explained in that speech. If my hon. friend wishes to read it he will find the explanation there. In the second place, this bill is introduced not by me but by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. No amount of money will be paid into my department, or for that matter into the Department of Trade and Commerce, to be paid out on wheat.

Mr. KUHL: Then I will ask my question of whichever minister is responsible. It is a pertinent question, and if the Minister of Trade and Commerce is the responsible minister I should like to hear his reply.

Mr. GARDINER: No money is paid into a department to be paid out on wheat. The wheat is delivered at the elevators in western Canada, and the amount paid out on the wheat is paid out through those elevators. There is no money paid out on wheat through any department of the government.

Mr. KUHL: I think the ministry understand the question which I am trying to have answered, and it is a fundamental point. The government has taken the position, as one would assume from the quotation from the speech of the Minister of Agriculture, that the reason the farmers are not paid more for their wheat is that there are not sufficient funds in the treasury. Is that so or is it not? I ask this further question: If the funds were made available for that purpose, would the government go so far as to recommend a price of $1 or $1.40 or whatever the parity price may be?

Mr. WEIR: Parliament has to make the funds available.

Mr. KUHL: What has the Minister of Trade and Commerce to say?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West): The question is based on a statement alleged to have been made by my colleague the Minister of Agriculture, not on a statement made by me, and I do not think the question can properly be addressed to me. In any event it is more or less a catch-question; I do not think the hon. member is really serious in expecting an answer.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): It is right enough that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should not be held to account for the statements made by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. KUHL: I am much in earnest in asking the question and in expecting an answer. It has been definitely established, I think, by all those who have spoken on behalf of the agriculturists that they are deserving of far more consideration than they have received as compared with other classes in Canada. My opinion is that the reason the farmer is not being helped more is that the government is limited in its assistance to the farmers because of its financial policy and nothing else. If that is not correct I should like to be told so.

Mr. GARDINER: That is not correct.

Mr. KUHL: Then I cannot understand the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that the government is taking every dollar out of the treasury to help the farmers which it feels safe in taking. Certainly more funds can be made available, and if more funds can be made available I see absolutely no reason why the farmers should not receive $1 or $1.40 for their wheat.

Mr. QUELCH: I had not intended to take part in this discussion, but the point raised by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl) is an interesting one and, I think, should be answered. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. MacKinnon) will not answer it I suppose we shall have to wait until the appropriation bill is before us and get the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) to answer it. All the farmers' organizations requested a price of $1 a bushel, and I do not think the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture or any other minister has endeavoured to show that $1 a bushel would be an unfair price. The Minister of Agriculture, on the contrary, has stressed the fact that the government is paying every last cent out of the treasury to help the farmers, that it is scraping the bottom, so to speak. If $1 a bushel is a fair price, and if the government feels that to pay the farmer more than ninety cents a bushel would, by increasing the effective demand of the farmers, be likely to bring about inflation, could the government not make up the difference between ninety cents and $1 a bushel by giving the farmers war savings certificates maturing, we will say, at the end of the war? Then, as they would not be able to cash them, the danger of inflation would be removed, but at the same time the farmers would receive a price equal to the cost of production. They would be able to put these war savings certificates into a sinking fund, so that at the end of the war these certificates could be used to pay off the debts which the farmers are bound to incur as a result of not being able to get the cost of production. If the minister will not answer that, perhaps the Minister of Finance would? Well, we will raise it on the appropriation.

WHEAT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ACREAGE REDUCTION AND CERTAIN PAYMENTS TO FARMERS—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 12, respecting wheat acreage reduction.

Mr. STIRLING: What are these amendments?

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member who at the moment is leading the opposition asks what these amendments are. There is no change in the meaning of the bill as a result of the amendments.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendments are printed in Votes and Proceedings, page 200.

Mr. GARDINER: The amendment of the subclause which was in section 4 of the original bill to provide for members of the House of Commons and members of the Senate being paid the amounts which were allowed under the regulations of last year, as well as under the legislation this year, was considered by the Senate not to make the intention clear, and they have reworded it in order to make clear what was intended by this house and by the Senate. There is no change in what was intended by this house.

Then, in section 11, there is just a rewording of the clause. The clause dealing with the penalty now reads:

(a) wilfully submits false information or knowingly makes a false return with respect to any information or return required under this act or regulations thereunder.

Previously, it read in this way:

(a) in respect of any information or return required under this act or regulations thereunder, wilfully submits false information or knowingly makes a false return thereto.

It is exactly the same, but the words are arranged in a different order.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the insurance of property against war risk and for the payment of compensation for war damage out of a special account of the consolidated revenue fund, and to provide further in connection therewith for the employment of such officers, clerks and other employees and agents necessary for the administration of the act.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister make a statement before going into committee?

Mr. ILSLEY: Perhaps it would be better if I made the statement after we got into committee. If the hon. gentleman prefers, I will make it now; but I am sure that some questions will be asked, and I would be in a better position to answer them in committee.

Mr. STIRLING: The only point I wished to make is that on frequent occasions recently we have gone into committee without anything being said by way of explanation. But we are going to adjourn in a short time for the Easter recess, and if the minister would prefer to make the statement in committee, I think we ought to agree.

Mr. ILSLEY: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, my purpose in endeavouring to have this measure considered to-day is that I may introduce the bill to be based on the resolution and have it distributed among hon. members before the Easter recess. Many hon. members will wish to study the bill during the Easter recess and, possibly, to secure the views of their constituents on this matter.

It is hoped that, when the house resumes, after the Easter recess, the bill can be given thorough consideration in the banking and commerce committee and that many valuable contributions to it will be made, particularly by hon. members from the coastal areas and the concentrated industrial areas of Canada.

The bill is presented after an exhaustive study of the problem from coast to coast. A report was prepared for me by an eminent member of the legal profession, after he had visited the Pacific coast, the maritime provinces, Quebec and Montreal, and Washington. In addition, the question has been studied by an interdepartmental committee of capable civil servants and by the office of the superintendent of insurance. With the aid of such advice and material, and after full consultation with the official representative of the fire and casualty insurance companies in Canada, the plan of war risk insurance and compensation as embodied in the bill has been formulated. The bill has been drafted with the assistance of the Department of Justice.

I hope and expect that the proposal and the plan as outlined in the bill will commend itself to the committee, but at the same time I am anxious that the bill receive the fullest possible consideration before the banking and commerce committee.

The British precedents, both in this war and in the last, were very helpful to those who drafted the bill; but of course conditions in Canada are vastly different from conditions in the United Kingdom, and therefore the British examples could not be too closely followed. Under the War Damage Act, 1941, of Great Britain, all real estate owners must insure their property, the premium being simply added to their income tax. The rate works out to approximately 2½ per cent of the value, actually 50 per cent of the "annual value". Voluntary insurance of private chattels is available with a minimum free coverage. The rates on private chattels are graduated, starting at 1 per cent on values up to £2,000, 1½ per cent on the next £1,000, and 2 per cent on the next £7,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is the minister quoting the British bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am describing the British bill.

Then there is a commodity insurance scheme, under which business houses insure their inventory. This insurance is compulsory, unless the goods are worth less than £1,000, or £200 in the case of food retailers. The rate of premiums charged for this type of insurance was originally 10 shillings per £100 per month, but was later reduced to 7 shillings and 6 pence per £100 per month.

In the United States a corporation has been set up under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and authority has been granted to pay over to the War Damage Corporation funds not in excess of $1,000,000,000. The terms of the bill and the rates of premium to be charged have not yet, I believe, been completed.

I understand that New Zealand has recently adopted a scheme of compulsory war risk insurance based upon the fire insurance policies already in force, and that the rate fixed is the equivalent of 25 cents per $100.

The need and demand for war risk insurance in Canada arose after December 7, 1941, when the insurance companies in Canada ceased writing new policies against war risks. The government immediately set to work to prepare a scheme which would be suitable to Canadian needs and conditions. On December 24 I made an announcement through the press to the effect that pending completion of the scheme and its introduction the government would protect Canadian residents with regard to property situated in Canada in the same way and subject to the same terms and conditions as they would be protected if they were insured under the scheme eventually adopted. It is important therefore from the point of view of the public as well as of hon. members that the terms and conditions of the coverage be announced at the earliest possible day. The government must indicate clearly that there are definite limitations to its liability either before or after the introduction of the scheme. The proposal embodied in the bill is based upon the following principles—I am talking about our bill:

1. The burden should be distributed equally across the country rather than be left to be borne by the more exposed areas.

2. The insurance should be voluntary rather than compulsory, and apart from a certain minimum coverage which I shall mention later, no property owner is entitled to compensation unless he along with other property owners has made a special contribution proportionate to the indemnity he would get.

3. A certain minimum coverage should be given to all home owners, householders and certain others without the payment of premiums.

4. Payment of indemnity and compensation, except in cases of undue hardship or national importance, should be postponed until after the war. War needs must have priority.

The rate of premium to be charged cannot of course be put into the bill, since this is a matter which must be determined after the most careful study and upon the advice of a special advisory committee of competent and experienced insurance men. The bill provides that the minister may set the rate or rates of premium and the terms of any particular policy, such as, for example, the terms of a particular policy covering a very large risk or a particular type of commodity.

The insurance policies will be issued by the existing fire and casualty insurance companies through their established agents and at a minimum of cost. I am informed that the insurance companies have offered to render this service at actual cost of doing the business.

It is anticipated that a minimum of administrative machinery will need to be set up, since the selling of the policies and their actual issue will be handled by the established insurance companies and their agents. The bill provides for the appointment of a supervisor and such officers and clerks as are necessary to enable him to supervise the work being done by the insurance companies and their agents. The advisory committee of insurance men will be consultative and will serve without remuneration, apart from their actual expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties.

The premiums are to be deductible for income and excess profits tax purposes only to a limited extent, namely to that extent which results in a diminution of the combined taxes paid by the insured equal to forty per cent of the premium. This is a question upon which a considerable difference of opinion exists, some advocating that the premiums should be wholly deductible irrespective of the rate of tax paid by the insured under the income and excess profits tax acts, while others contend that the premium should not be deductible at all, since the policy is designed to protect a capital asset rather than to produce income. Still others believe that the premiums should be deductible but only to a limited extent, so that all insured persons will get an equal tax advantage out of such deductions rather than one getting a tax advantage of 79·5 per cent of the premium and another getting a tax advantage of only 40 per cent of the premium.

That clause relating to the deductibility of premiums for income tax purposes is a clause which I should like to see discussed in the banking and commerce committee. I am not wedded to any particular view in regard to it.

When the resolution goes through the bill can be introduced and distributed, and, as I have said, hon. members will require some time to read the bill and digest its provisions.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): If the resolution passes now and we get the bill later, after the Easter recess we would have full chance for discussion of it in the house?

Mr. ILSLEY: When the bill receives second reading there will be opportunity for debate on it with the Speaker in the chair, which will not give opportunity for questions to be answered by the government. But I would hope that at that stage the bill would be referred to the banking and commerce committee, where it could be fully examined and questions asked and answered. The bill can be fully discussed by hon. members in the usual type of debate which takes place in the house on second reading.

Mr. STIRLING: Do I understand that, as the business is to be done by existing insurance companies, practically it will amount to the rewriting of policies now held to include the war risk? At the present time I believe only a small proportion of the policies written include war risk insurance.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true. No new war risk insurance is or has been available since Pearl Harbour. I believe—certainly very little. Previously existing policies covering war risk, if not cancellable, have continued in force. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has not an accurate understanding of what we are proposing. These policies will be issued by the insurance companies as agents of the crown; it will be really the government that is issuing the policies through the insurance companies. The insurance companies will be making their organization and administrative machinery available to the government, that is all.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): As I have said before in the house, there is need for some kind of war risk coverage on property. It will take some time to get the bill through. Does the government assume the risk at the present time, for example on the coasts? Does it now provide indemnity against damage, or what recourse in the meantime is open to individuals on the coasts? This is an important matter.

Mr. ILSLEY: They have not recourse at the moment, except that the government has given the assurance that they will be protected if there is damage before the bill is passed, to the extent that they would have been protected had the bill been passed. This does not mean—and I want to make this clear—that the government stands ready to make good any amount of damage or loss. These policies may contain a limit of liability; the government may not commit itself to private property owners in Canada to pay them the full amount of their loss. I do not want to get into the terms of the bill, but I may say that the proposal in the bill is to give free coverage to householders up to an amount of $3,000; that is, the person who is living in a home, who owns the home and has a loss as a result of the sort of enemy action insured against under this bill—

Mr. REID: He would have to have a coverage?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, he will be compensated up to $3,000 under this bill, if it passes. I must not give that undertaking now. His protection will be only the protection which is eventually provided for under the bill; but the government proposes—and it will be found in the bill—that there will be free protection of home owners, without the payment of any premium, up to an amount of $3,000.

Mr. GREEN: That is even if the home owner has no policy?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; and there is a provision with regard to the loss of chattels. The free coverage there is, I think, $600.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Will the government set up adjusters in this connection, or will they use the insurance company adjusters?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a moment until I get these amounts correct. Perhaps I had better withdraw that figure of $600, because these figures must be expressed accurately or it will do more harm than good. There is a certain limited free coverage for the loss of chattels owned by the householder; a certain amount for the chattels owned by his wife; a certain amount for the chattels owned by each child, and there are exceptions and limits to the amounts, and so forth. It is a little hard for me to describe this briefly in advance. One can hardly discuss it without the bill before him; but the proposal is that for the loss over and above the $3,000 there will be no protection unless it is covered by a policy, for which a premium will be paid, and that policy may contain such terms and conditions as may be thought fit. As I say, however, the protection will not be unlimited.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I asked a question about the adjusters. I understand that in England, as soon as a bombing takes place, government adjusters go around and check, and the report is in within twelve hours after the bombing or damage occurs. Will the government have their own adjusters in this case, or will they use the adjusters of the insurance companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: We will use the adjusters, inspectors and so on of the insurance companies.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Will this bill take care of inland transportation insurance as well? For instance, will it cover goods during the time they are in transit, while they are on the dock, and until they are reshipped? That was what I had in mind in speaking about the matter before. Shippers do not want to get their stuff to the coast too soon at the present time because they cannot get war risk insurance for their goods. Is that included in this bill as well?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, property in Canada may be insured under this bill, whether it is real or personal property.

Mr. BOUCHER: Are we to understand that at the present time the government have given an undertaking that in case of loss by virtue of enemy action the individual is to be protected to the full extent that he would be protected by an insurance company, after this bill is passed; and that when the bill is passed, the insurance company protects an individual as far as his residence is concerned to the extent of $3,000, whether or not he has a policy? If he has not a policy, after this bill is passed he can get protection only in so far as he has protection from an insurance company? My point in asking this question is this. When the bill goes through, does the condition prevail and continue whereby the individual householder gets protection through the insurance company, on behalf of the government, to the extent of damage to his house up to $3,000, without having a policy at all? Beyond that he gets protection only in so far as he has a policy with a particular company?

Mr. ILSLEY: If damage is done before the bill is passed, and the bill passes exactly in its present form, then it is the intention of the government to pay a home owner his damage up to $3,000.

Mr. BOUCHER: Is that changed after the bill is passed?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. This provision is contained in the bill:

> The minister may pay compensation to any person in the amount, not exceeding three thousand dollars, of the diminution of value caused by war damage to the dwelling house in which he ordinarily resides and of which he is the owner.

That is the section which it is proposed to insert in the bill.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the position that the government will treat this bill as having been passed at this time? That is, if damage should occur between now and the time the bill is actually passed, for all practical purposes the government will treat the bill as having been passed?

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot think quite quickly enough to grasp the implications of saying "yes" in reply to that question.

Mr. GREEN: I am not implying anything at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know that, but I sometimes assent to statements which contain implications that I cannot foresee. This is the statement I made on December 24:

> The question of providing insurance or compensation for property damage resulting from bombardment or other enemy attack has been and is receiving attention. It is not yet possible to say what form any plan which may be adopted will take or the terms and conditions which will apply. The plan will, however, be retroactive to this date.

That undertaking will be carried out; and while it is not good practice in committee to read sections of a bill that is only proposed, I may say the section which it is proposed to insert in the bill to cover that point is as follows:

> If any person, during the period between the twenty-fourth day of December, 1941, and the thirtieth day after the commencement of this act, both inclusive, has sustained or sustains loss from war damage, and if he makes application to the minister on or before such thirtieth day aforesaid, to enter into a contract of insurance in respect of such property, the minister may enter into a contract of insurance in respect of such property effective from the beginning of the twenty-fourth day of December, 1941, but the amount of the indemnity payable under any such contract in respect of war damage to such property during such period shall not exceed fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. GREEN: That does not cover the $3,000 at all, does it?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; the $3,000 case is covered by the other section I read in reply to the hon. member for Carleton.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has said in his statement that the burden of this insurance is to be spread over the whole of the nation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: In other words, people on the coast who are most likely to be bombed are not to have to carry all the burden?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Is the method of spreading the burden across the country as a whole the fact of making the first $3,000 free, or is it that the premiums are to be lower than they should be if they were actuarially sound? In other words, in what way is the burden to be spread out?

Mr. ILSLEY: To the extent that the government pays under its free coverage commitment, the payments are made out of the consolidated revenue fund, which is built up from taxation on all the people in Canada. To the extent that the government pays out of the special section of the consolidated account, it will be paying out of a fund made up from premiums collected from people at various places in Canada. It may be that a larger proportion of the population in the coastal areas will insure than in the central parts of Canada. But the rate will be the same for all of them.

In one sense the country as a whole is carrying the burden, if there is no difference in rate. I am not talking about free coverage; I am talking about losses covered by policies. If we were to fix a rate twice as high in Halifax and Vancouver as in Winnipeg, the Halifax and Vancouver property owners would be penalized because of their geographical location, and the Winnipeg property owners would benefit thereby. But when the rate is the same everywhere, that condition does not exist.

Mr. GREEN: We will suppose a person has property valued at $5,000. Is the first $3,000 covered automatically by the government, the owner of the property himself insuring for $2,000, or would the owner have to insure for the whole $5,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: The first $3,000 in that case would be paid by the government, without any premium.

Mr. GREEN: There would be a premium only on the last $2,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I agree with the principle of making the rate low for the whole of Canada, but I do not see how it can be done without having a compulsory feature in it.

While I am on my feet, may I ask the minister how the maximum was set at $50,000. I know that some of these men have larger amounts at stake. A man may have bank commitments, and may have goods to ship to the coast. He should be able to get something to protect himself to the full amount of his goods, because a bombing might wipe him out. The very fact that he cannot get insurance has a detrimental effect, because he will not ship those goods as quickly as he otherwise would. He will wait until a time when less risk is involved.

The feature with respect to spreading the risk over the whole of the country represents a big step, and one with which the banking and commerce committee could deal.

I am wondering why the $50,000 provision is in the bill.

Mr. ILSLEY: I suggest that the $50,000 limit might be discussed in committee. That is all I would care to commit the government to in the meantime.

Mr. MacINNIS: Did I understand the minister to say that since December 7, insurance companies have not been accepting war risks on the west coast?

Mr. ILSLEY: My understanding is that, as a general rule, they cancelled where they could, and they did not issue any new policies against war damage.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does that apply only on the Pacific coast, or to the whole of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I understood it applied on both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts; I presume it applies everywhere in Canada.

Mr. MacINNIS: To the whole of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so.

Mr. GREEN: The person who is renting would be covered for clothing and furniture up to a certain minimum?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: Up to $600?

Mr. ILSLEY: I believe it is $600; the hon. member will find that in the bill.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Does Canada carry the entire risk, or are the insurance companies interested?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Are they going to handle it, or will it be handled by officials assisted by the crown?

Mr. ILSLEY: The insurance companies will handle it as agents of the crown, at cost.

Mr. GREEN: Why was it done in that way?

Mr. ILSLEY: Instead of in what way?

Mr. GREEN: For example, could it have been handled through the Post Office Department?

Mr. ILSLEY: I have great admiration for the Post Office organization, but not that much. I do not think they could have handled it.

Mr. MacINNIS: They could, unless there were a raid.

Mr. GREEN: If it were handled through the Post Office Department, could it not be done considerably cheaper?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. GREEN: There are post offices in every community, no matter how small, whereas agencies will not be found in all communities.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think it would be desirable to add this class of duties to the present duties of postmasters. I do not think they are qualified by training, experience or other qualifications to handle that kind of business. The insurance business, the procedure of making adjustments, receiving application and all that sort of thing, is almost, if indeed not quite, a profession. It is something which requires experience, and I should think the suggested method would be the most satisfactory way of doing it.

Mr. BOUCHER: The adjusters and valuators would be those of the various insurance companies. They would not be government officials. The government simply accepts the services, at cost, of insurance company valuators?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BOUCHER: Even with regard to the first $3,000 of a risk?

Mr. ILSLEY: I expect that will be the case.

Mr. GREEN: In some centres at least, adjusting is done by independent adjusters. Are they to be engaged to do that work? If so, it would mean that the business would be handled by the insurance agencies and the adjusting would be done by adjusting firms, which are independent of insurance companies.

Mr. ILSLEY: I must say I have not given much thought to the details of adjustment, but I believe that the same persons who are now doing adjusting would do the adjusting in the future. Whether the undertaking of the insurance companies to do this work at cost covers the adjusting, or includes the adjusters belonging to a different organization, I am not quite clear. I do not, however, believe there would be any difficulty along that line. Those are matters which can be discussed in committee on the bill.

Mr. GREEN: Should there not be some check-up, because adjusters would not be bound by any agreement reached between the government and insurance companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: That can be looked into.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister have that checked?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I will have it checked.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 56, to make provision with respect to insurance of property against war risks and the payment of compensation for war damage.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Thursday, March 26, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1943, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Bradette in the chair.

Mr. MacINNIS: Some days ago I asked if the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) would make a statement on air raid precautions on the two coasts, and I believe he is prepared to make that statement.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): A few days ago, and again last evening, I was asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) to make a statement, to which he has just referred, on air raid precautions on the Pacific coast. I think it may be preferable if I discuss the subject as it affects all parts of the dominion that have been designated for organization of A.R.P. work. Then, if necessary, I can particularize with regard to the Pacific coast area.

Air raid precautions basically are those measures which the civilian population can and must take for the protection of their own lives and property. They should not be confused, as they frequently are, with the defence of the country from attack. That is the function of the armed services. The functions which make up air raid precautions are the ordinary functions of a municipality, such as patrolling the streets, fighting fires, conveying injured persons to hospital, repairing damaged public utilities, demolishing damaged buildings, et cetera. These are functions for which every municipality is normally equipped and organized up to a point, namely, to the extent necessary to cope with normal hazards. It is recognized that enemy air raids or bombardments greatly accentuate the degree of risk, and the ordinary municipal services must be greatly expanded in the interests of the public safety. It is considered that this expansion should take place in two ways, personnel and equipment, neither of which should impose any substantial or unbearable expense upon the municipal exchequer.

In regard to personnel, the number of trained and available personnel can be and has been increased through enrolment, training and organization of volunteers. There is nothing foreign to our genius in this method. In the smaller municipalities fire fighting and many other public services are performed by volunteers. The A.R.P. programme contemplates extension of this method into the larger cities where people have been accustomed in normal times to leave their public services to professionally trained experts.

In regard to equipment, the provision of additional equipment to meet the war emergency has been assumed by the dominion government. Thus the municipality, which must necessarily assume the direction and control of its own people in the matter of air raid precautions, is not called upon to undertake any great expense. Let me now, for the information of the committee, give a concise history of the development of air raid precautions in Canada.

In March, 1938, the departmental committee formed to consider the defence of Canada in case of war recommended to the cabinet that air raid precautions should be under the jurisdiction of the minister and the Department of Pensions and National Health. This was concurred in by the government. The Minister of Pensions and National Health immediately set up, under the chairmanship of the deputy minister, a committee within the department.

Ruling was made by the Department of National Defence that the following areas in Canada should be considered as subject to definite risk of enemy attack: Sydney, Halifax, Saint John, Quebec City, Vancouver, Victoria, and Prince Rupert. In addition, Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto were assessed as subject to "slight risk."

The departmental committee contacted the Home Office and obtained from them all secret and confidential information referring to the formation of air raid precautions in Great Britain. There was also attached to the committee representatives from the Department of National Defence, national research council, St. John Ambulance Association, and so on. A scheme, based on the English outline but modified to suit Canadian conditions and expectancy of degree of attack, was prepared.

On receipt of information in the latter part of August, 1939, that war with the German reich was imminent, members of the departmental committee were dispatched hurriedly to British Columbia, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. Contacts were made with the provincial premiers, and provincial A.R.P. committees were set up and organization started. When war was declared this organization had advanced sufficiently that the provincial committees were in a position to call immediately for recruits. Later the organization was set up in the province of Quebec. These provincial committees were set up by authorization of the minister under section 33 of the defence of Canada regulations. The province of Ontario was approached but did not accept the A.R.P. scheme for organization until the fall of 1940.

The designated areas have been changed from time to time in accordance with advice given to cabinet by the joint staff committee of the Department of National Defence. On September 10, 1941, by recommendation of the treasury board, these areas were specifically named in P.C. 7147, and it was provided that assistance could not be extended to any other areas unless approved by the treasury board. On December 10, 1941, the treasury board, on advice of the joint staff committee, broadened the areas which are considered to be subject to the risk of attack and, hence, which may be assisted. The order in council did not describe these areas in language, but accomplished its purpose by annexing thereto a shaded map indicating the comparative degree of risk by shading from dark to light. These areas may be described as follows:

Definite Risk

The entire province of Prince Edward Island.

The entire province of Nova Scotia.

All the coastal portions of the province of New Brunswick.

The banks of the St. Lawrence river as far inland as Montreal.

The entire coast of British Columbia from Alaska to the United States border inland to the summit of the Cascade mountains.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

Lesser Risk

The interior of the province of New Brunswick.

The entire province of Quebec as far north as approximately the latitude of the southern end of James Bay.

The entire eastern portion of the province of Ontario as far west as the 85° of west longitude, just west of Sault Ste. Marie.

The southern interior of British Columbia as far east as the Rocky mountains.

Prior to the order in council of December 10 the population of the designated areas was approximately two and a half millions. The enlargement of the designated areas made the department responsible for organizing A.R.P. for more than seven and a half million people. The area to be covered is between 350,000 and 400,000 square miles. On December 15 the number of A.R.P. workers enrolled and receiving training was:

Wardens and auxiliary police	59,917
Auxiliary firemen	7,375
Doctors, nurses, ambulance drivers and first aid workers	12,950
Other services	13,991
Total	94,233

In the ensuing three months, or the last three months, the number of workers has been increased by 50 per cent, as follows:

Wardens and auxiliary police	90,821
Auxiliary firemen	11,111
Doctors, nurses, ambulance drivers and first aid workers	29,083
Other services	22,345
Total	153,360

Whereas prior to the order enlarging the designated areas we had only a dozen cities organized, we now have A.R.P. organizations in 435 cities, towns and communities, as follows:

Nova Scotia	68
New Brunswick	45
Quebec	129
Ontario	91
British Columbia	102

In Prince Edward Island organization has only recently commenced but is progressing favourably.

The director, Doctor Manion, has personally visited both coasts with a view to assisting the organization work and familiarizing himself with local problems which may require action by the dominion government.

In addition, we stationed at Vancouver for more than two months, one of our experienced officers, Colonel E. H. Minns, who personally visited all the areas where air raid precautions have been organized. Their reports indicate that the organization of the additional areas is proceeding rapidly and efficiently under the direction of the provincial committees.

New Brunswick has been divided into eight districts—with a commandant for each district.

In the interior of British Columbia the industrial communities between Kimberley and Trail have been most effectively organized under local committees, and I am advised that the entire portion of British Columbia west of the Cascades can be blacked out on three minutes' notice. The interior areas, which were designated only in December, had organized to some extent on a voluntary basis prior to the date at which my department was authorized to assist them with equipment. Every effort is now being made to expedite deliveries of the essential equipment which they require.

In regard to the question of legal authority I have some notes here with reference to the interpretation of certain sections of the defence of Canada regulations, and since they are purely interpretative and possibly of not so much interest to hon. members, perhaps I might be permitted to place them on the record. They are as follows:

Legal authority for the organization of air raid precautions is to be found in the defence of Canada regulations, especially regulations 32, 33, 34 and 35. I shall deal with these one at a time, but for convenience I shall vary the sequence.

Regulation No. 32 deals with evacuation. This regulation provides that the Minister of National Defence may, in anticipation of an attack, order people out of any area.

Regulation No. 34 deals with decontamination and demolition. Under this regulation the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of Pensions and National Health, or any senior police officer, may order the decontamination or demolition of any premises or chattel, or prohibit access to any premises including highways.

In practical administration under regulation Nos. 32 and 34 it is contemplated that action dealing with evacuation of areas and demolition of property would be taken only in the event of an actual attack. For this reason the authority is vested in the Minister of National Defence and his officers, with the exception that senior police officers may take action in an emergency for the decontamination or demolition of premises rendered dangerous by enemy action.

The authority vested in the minister of pensions under regulation 34 will enable air raid wardens and others trained and organized in the civil air raid precautions organization, to exercise their functions in support of any orders issued with respect to decontamination or demolition.

Regulation No. 33 deals with organization of air raid precautions. Under this regulation the minister of pensions may issue orders

(a) with regard to general organization of air raid precautions;

(b) requiring that specified private premises may be occupied by the public as a shelter;

(c) prohibiting public assemblies;

(d) prescribing the signal upon which precautions shall become operative.

(Note: Although the regulation authorizes either the Minister of National Defence or the minister of pensions to issue such orders, it has been agreed that the minister of pensions shall assume the responsibility. An order respecting public assemblies may be enforced by a police officer.)

At the outbreak of war, the minister of pensions issued an order to each province within which military advice indicated that air raid precautions should be organized. This order authorized the premier of the province to form a provincial committee and to form local committees in the areas designated as subject to the risk of attack. Such local committees were to function under the direction of the provincial committee.

Under regulation 33, no authority to provincial or municipal governments or A.R.P. committees has been delegated. The minister of pensions exercises his own authority under this regulation by issuing orders.

To facilitate action in an emergency, the minister can be represented on the ground by a direct representative—if necessary. (Colonel Minns was sent to British Columbia for this purpose.) We have recently been augmenting our A.R.P. staff so that trained officials may be available for dispatch to any threatened point to represent the minister in an emergency.

The regulation covers three main subjects:

(a) Organization. The order to organize was issued by the minister at the outbreak of war to each province affected;

(b) Use of premises as shelters. The procedure in this connection is for certain premises to be specified and for the minister to issue an order that the public shall have access to these premises when an alarm is given.

No such order has yet been issued by the minister, but the A.R.P. committees in most of the centres have surveyed suitable premises —and these are available as shelters—in Halifax and Saint John on a voluntary basis, without the necessity of an order being issued.

In Vancouver a survey has been made, and the minister has a representative on the ground so that any necessary order can be issued on full information and without delay.

The printed instructions advise that people stay where they are in a raid. But should an attack take place when large numbers of people are in the down-town streets, provision of this type is necessary.

(c) Public Assemblies. Here the minister has power to authorize a senior police officer to prohibit public assemblies. The minister can and will issue such orders to senior police officers upon the advice of his departmental representative on the ground when any special occasion for it arises. Senior police officers have inherent authority to keep public order, and this regulation is to meet any special emergency.

Black-out. Regulation 35 deals with control of lights, sounds and traffic. It is popularly known as the "black-out regulation". The general provision is that the minister of pensions or any person to whom he has delegated authority may issue orders prohibiting or regulating the display of lights, sounds on roads; to designate signals upon which orders shall become operative.

(Note: No such order shall apply with respect to the navy, army and air services, except with the consent of the minister at the head of the indicated service department.)

The minister of pensions has delegated his authority under regulation 35 to the provincial premiers with the exception of Nova Scotia, where it is delegated to the minister of health and Ontario to the attorney general, with authority to redelegate to provincial ministers and officials. The provincial minister thus commissioned may issue orders for the darkening of lights, the suppression of noises, and for the regulation of traffic, either in connection with an actual air raid or in training for such eventuality. It is for the provincial premier to prescribe the signals, to issue orders, and to enforce them. There is authority in regulation 35 for the provincial premiers to redelegate to officials or to municipal authorities within their own areas.

The three defence ministers have conferred upon the senior defence officer in each area their authority to approve such orders in so far as they may affect the services. However, on December 19, 1941, regulation 35 was amended by adding an additional provision that "no lights other than those used for street lighting purposes shall be displayed in any area specified in any order made" pursuant to the general authority of the regulation. The additional amendment also prohibited the display of lights in business premises except during business hours and while staff is present on the premises. There is provision that these regulations may be removed, either temporarily or permanently, by order of the minister of pensions, concurred in by the Minister of Munitions and Supply. Difficulty was experienced at first in administering this regulation, and a conference was called in Ottawa on February 3, in order that a uniform code of regulations for lighting might be drawn up for the whole of Canada, if considered desirable. At this conference were represented provincial governments, transportation companies, retail merchants, and industry generally.

The conclusions of this conference were, briefly, that the new subsection in section 35 should remain and that each province should request the exemptions which they considered advisable for their particular province. These exemptions, with the exception of Quebec, have been completed, signed by the two ministers and issued. Exemptions were also applied for by the federal district and issued.

Compensation.

(a) Insurance for property: The Minister of Finance on December 24 announced that a scheme of war risk and bombardment insurance is in course of preparation and that its terms shall have application as from the date of this announcement. This means that any damage caused prior to the enactment of the insurance plan will be covered by the scheme as it may ultimately emerge.

(b) Personal injuries and death: A scheme of compensation comparable with that of workmen's compensation acts has been adopted by the dominion government for air raid precautions workers who may be injured or killed in performance of their duties as a result of enemy action or during a black-out. The scheme covers registered workers in an authorized air raid precautions organization.

Medical care, hospitalization, compensatory allowances for the injured worker and his dependents, and pension for the dependents of an air raid precautions worker who may be killed are included in the scheme. Administration is in the hands of the Canadian pension commission.

Certain classes of air raid precautions workers are entitled to compensation for injuries or death sustained during the training period. These classes of workers are auxiliary firemen and demolition squads, whose training is considered to involve a certain amount of danger to life and limb.

The order in council providing for compensation is P.C. 7147, of September 10, 1941.

The order in council providing for hospitalization and treatment is P.C. 115/9130, of November 22, 1941.

P.C. 7147 originally dealt with only eleven designated areas. The designated areas were greatly enlarged by P.C. 2/9660, of December 10, 1941 when the entire coastal areas were held to be subject to risk of attack.

I come now to the types of work involved in air raid precautions. They include:

Patrol of city streets to ensure that regulations are obeyed and to detect and report incidents requiring attention.

Regulation of traffic.

Care of casualties.

Firefighting.

Decontamination in case of gas attack.

Demolition of damaged structures.

Repairs to damaged public utility services.

Transportation and communication services to facilitate the foregoing.

Prevention of panic.

Wardens are expected to become acquainted with all individuals in their respective blocks.

Wardens are expected to survey every house and building in their blocks, and to have full particulars regarding the number of persons domiciled therein, their status as to numbers of infants, invalids, et cetera, the availability of exits, and so on.

Organization Policy. The dominion government undertakes through the Department of Pensions and National Health to provide necessary equipment and supplies, training manuals and instructional literature.

The provincial governments have been asked to form air raid precautions committees and to encourage formation of local air raid precautions committees in the designated areas.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health asked the provincial premiers to be chairmen of the provincial committees, and suggested that the mayors of municipalities should be chairmen of local committees.

It was considered by the dominion government that the bulk of the work must be done by private citizens on a voluntary basis, and that organization and direction would be given to a large extent by permanent dominion, provincial and civic officials, selected from appropriate departments.

Committees were preferred to the rigid municipal organization, because it is considered desirable that groups of municipalities should organize their air raid precautions as a single unit, with provision for cooperation in such matters as firefighting.

Key officers in each area for the actual training and administration of air raid precautions must necessarily be chiefs of police, fire chiefs, medical officers of health and municipal engineers.

The duties to be performed by the voluntary organization are very largely an extension of the duties of the regular police officers, firemen, and maintenance crews of the engineering departments.

It was considered advisable, therefore, that voluntary groups should be trained and directed by the permanent officials responsible for the various specialized types of activity in which volunteer air raid precautions workers are called upon to assist.

Where voluntary organizations exist, and are equipped to discharge valuable functions in connection with air raid precautions, these have been asked to cooperate in order that new organizations need not be set up.

For instance, the Saint John Ambulance Association has done a notable work in training air raid precautions workers in first aid.

The Red Cross society has also organized for the relief of distress which might arise in a raid.

The suggestion has recently been made that a number of firemen from each of the principal cities might, with advantage, be sent to train at special schools which are being set up in the United States for that purpose.

Already the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, at the suggestion of the director of air raid precautions, has sent one or two men to attend schools on transportation problems. It is believed that those to be trained at these special schools will be able to instruct others.

Care of Casualties. The plan is that air wardens shall patrol the streets and report where casualties occur. There should be in every locality, first-aid posts from which qualified first-aid workers can be dispatched with stretchers and other equipment to bring injured persons to hospitals or other centres where care can be given.

Doctors and nurses should be at key positions where they can supplement the efforts of the first-aid assistants.

The most seriously injured should be transported to hospital in vehicles, organized and held available for this duty. Hospitals should have emergency staff and space available to care for casualties thus brought to them.

Local committees should survey buildings in the vicinity of existing hospitals, wherein emergency accommodation can be given. The Department of Pensions and National Health has supplies of beds and bedding to place in such buildings.

It is considered that general hospitals can, on the shortest of notice, make emergency accommodation available by evacuation of a substantial percentage of their normal patients.

In every hospital there are convalescents and other patients who could, with little disadvantage, be cared for at home. By constantly checking their own population, hospital managements should be prepared to evacuate such patients speedily in an emergency. The voluntary transportation committees in the air raid precautions organization can be asked to hold themselves in readiness to assist in the process.

The Saint John Ambulance Association from the outset of the war has assisted in training volunteer air raid precautions workers in first aid. The number of air raid precautions workers holding the association's first-aid certificate, on December 15, 1941, was 12,950.

Shelters. It is a function of local air raid precautions committees to survey their areas for premises in which people may take shelter during an air raid. The minister of pensions has authority to order that such premises may be used, and to restrain the owners or occupants from refusing access.

In all the more exposed areas, the necessary staff work for this purpose has been done so that, in an emergency, orders can be issued at the briefest notice.

Equipment. It was considered that the greatest expense would be in connection with the provision of equipment and supplies. This expense the department of pensions has undertaken to meet. Reserve stores of equipment were accumulated before the outbreak of war, and issue was made from these stores to the provinces. The provinces, in turn, were asked to make issue to the local areas.

Municipal areas should requisition their provincial committees for supplies and equipment. The provincial committees will, in turn, requisition the department of pensions.

It is considered desirable that, with respect to many types of equipment, only sufficient for training should be issued to local areas, and the remainder be held in central stores available to meet emergencies wherever they may occur.

The dominion government has, however, allocated small credits to each province for the purposes of financing organization expenses not covered by the provision of supplies and equipment issued from Ottawa. The procedure is for the province or municipality to obtain approval of a proposed expenditure, and then to submit a properly vouched account. The minister of pensions may then authorize payment thereof.

In Nova Scotia, where a comprehensive system of air raid precautions has existed in the two leading urban areas for more than two years, the original grant of $5,000 for organization purposes has not been exhausted. Supplementary grants were made recently, however, when the areas to be organized were greatly enlarged.

In some provinces, there was a desire on the part of the provincial authorities to broaden the functions of the organization formed for air raid precautions purposes.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

In view of the fact that the provincial authorities considered that useful public purposes could be served by asking the air raid precautions organization to assume other duties, the dominion government raised no objection, but it could not undertake financial responsibility for these other duties.

Instructional literature is considered to be included under the heading of "equipment and supplies". Municipalities desiring to issue circulars to all householders have obtained authority to do so, and the Department of Pensions and National Health has paid for the printing and other expenses connected therewith.

The following are the main types of equipment issued:

Badges and arm bands	Rubber boots
Crutches	Protective overalls
Arm and leg splints	Berets
First-aid haversacks	Steel helmets
First-aid kitboxes	Stirrup pumps
Pouches	Iron scoops
Stretchers	Fire hose
Tarpaulins	Respirators
Anti-gas suits	Fire pumps

Up to the most recent report, equipment had actually been issued to the value of $613,726. Other equipment is on order to the value of $789,642, making a total of $1,403,369. Our estimates for the coming year under the war appropriation bill, aggregate $4,805,000.

The department of pensions has administered air raid precautions up to date very largely by allocating the required duties to members of its regular staff. It is believed that provinces and municipalities can administer in the same way without engaging special paid personnel. This has been done quite successfully in the maritime provinces.

In December, however, when, on the advice of the Department of National Defence, the areas considered subject to risk of attack were very greatly enlarged, it was decided to increase our administrative staff at Ottawa. The Hon. R. J. Manion—a former minister—had offered his services to the government in any capacity in which they could be used. Doctor Manion was good enough to agree to accept the position of director of civil air raid precautions, and at the beginning of the year undertook his duties with his accustomed energy and ability.

The volume of work has been greatly increased by the enlargement of the areas designated for organization, and we now have four officials dealing in a specialized way with subdivisions of the work. Three of these are regular government employees assigned to A.R.P. duties, and the fourth was engaged from outside. It is possible that further additions may have to be made to our A.R.P. staff.

No direct cash grants to provinces or municipalities have been made, nor can they, with propriety, be made. The dominion government does not delegate even to one of its own ministers the authority to make expenditures of money without prior submission to treasury board and approval of the proposed expenditure in all particulars. It follows that no minister can delegate such authority to a province or a municipality.

In certain areas there has recently arisen a demand for financial aid on a scale quite out of proportion to that accorded to the cities on the Atlantic coast, where efficient A.R.P. organizations have been developed and have operated for two and a half years. In some cities, some of the officials seem to have formed the opinion that effective air raid precautions will require a large paid staff. Our experience with the cities on the Atlantic coast suggests definitely that this is not correct, that the various duties can quite effectively be discharged by the ordinary municipal officials with the cooperation of volunteers. I am not, however, prepared to say that conditions in any two cities are identical and that because local conditions in one city permit a thing to be done, every other city can necessarily achieve the same results in exactly the same way.

Accordingly, after reviewing a budget presented by my home city and containing many items which certainly should not be charged against the federal treasury, it was decided to adopt a standard scale of organization and equipment. This suggested "establishment" was recently forwarded to the provincial committees together with a brief statement of dominion government policy with respect thereto. The model establishment took account of variations in population and variations in the degrees of risk as estimated by the government's military advisers. It indicated with regard to each type of city the minimum number of wardens, the number of auxiliary firefighters, the number of roof watchers, the number of first-aid detachments that would be required in such an area.

The scheme was heavily annotated, indicating circumstances under which the model scale of establishment should be larger or smaller. Account was taken of density of population, of the types of construction prevailing in an area, and appropriate comment on the variations indicated by such factors was included. This model establishment is not mandatory. The whole secret of air raid precautions is, in my opinion, to rely upon the special genius of the people in each area to work out their own methods. Our model establishment is intended as a guide to them, and also as a guarantee in this sense, that the dominion government accepts the responsibility to supply equipment up to the minimum standard laid down in the establishment. We undertake to supply such equipment as and when it may be available.

With this in view, the plan itself contains particulars of the amounts of equipment required for an organization of the proportions indicated. With respect to certain types of equipment, such as identifying badges, there should be one item of personal equipment for each A.R.P. worker. With regard to certain other types, however, we need to provide only certain items. There was recently indicated in Vancouver and Victoria an assumption that every warden should receive a suit of protective clothing. This is, of course, quite incorrect. Protective clothing is required only for certain squads, such as the decontamination crews. We have indicated the appropriate number of workers to be trained and equipped for each such specialized activity, and we are prepared to supply equipment up to that number.

While discussing this subject of equipment, I must inform the committee frankly that we have not been able to supply all the equipment which, according to our own standards, should be available. This is not due to any unwillingness or lack of forethought. It is due to absolute inability to obtain the materials.

Let me illustrate by steel helmets. We placed orders for these in very large numbers right from the outset of the war. As it happened, however, the armed forces also placed very large orders. The requirements of the pensions department for A.R.P. purposes had to take second place, and I am perfectly certain that there is not one air raid warden in Canada who would expect to be supplied with a steel helmet at the expense of a soldier. The limiting factor is, of course, the steel that goes into the helmet. Steel is a vital commodity for every branch of our armed services. Nevertheless we have from time to time obtained supplies of steel helmets, and just recently we found it possible to obtain quite substantial deliveries. These have been distributed as quickly as received to the most vulnerable areas.

With regard to equipment of which there is any shortage, we have had to adopt the principle that the requirements of the more exposed areas on the two coasts shall receive first priority. This has been explained to the provincial committees in the less exposed provinces, and the situation has been accepted in good part. Indeed, when last December the Pacific coast was considered to be under direct menace, the provincial government of Ontario, without hesitation, offered us the use of the entire forest firefighting equipment in northern Ontario, and this equipment was speedily transferred to the threatened zone.

As a British Columbian and as a member of the dominion government, I am glad to have this opportunity of expressing publicly the most cordial appreciation and gratitude to the government of Ontario for this unselfish and patriotic act. Only a few days ago the Ontario government again notified me that, if it were not yet possible to return the equipment, they were prepared to have it remain at the coast until we were able to replace it. I wish to assure the committee that every effort is being made to effect replacement at the earliest possible moment, because we are no more desirous of having the forests of Ontario exposed to any hazard from time to time than we are to incur risk for our own people of British Columbia. My fellow citizens of British Columbia are deeply grateful, as I have said, to Ontario for the splendid spirit of cooperation and support exemplified in this loan.

With respect to equipment generally, we have received every possible assistance from the priorities officers of the Department of Munitions and Supply and where we have not been able to meet the full requirements of certain areas, I can assure the committee that the difficulties are real and not due to any neglect.

At the time we sent out our model establishment we also laid down a general policy with regard to federal assistance which I shall state to the committee definitely.

The dominion government is to provide reasonable, initial, organizational expenses to the provinces.

We are to provide booklets and printed matter, and personal equipment—as such is obtainable by us—to the provinces, who will distribute them to the municipalities. The personal equipment for A.R.P. workers will be provided for numbers up to an established strength, as decided by the federal A.R.P. office.

Special equipment, such as medical supplies, auxiliary firefighting apparatus, air raid sirens, and so forth—as such is obtainable by us—will be supplied according to local conditions, in amounts considered adequate by the director of air raid precautions. In the case of air raid sirens we will also pay reasonable costs of installation and maintenance. The above supplies will be sent by us to the provincial A.R.P. committee whose duty it will be to allocate them and distribute them to the municipalities concerned.

[Mr. Ian Mackenzie.]

The federal A.R.P. office in Ottawa has set up a model establishment for areas designated as liable to attack.

The federal government will pay 50 per cent of A.R.P. expenses of municipalities situated within the vulnerable areas, but such expenses must be kept within reasonable bounds, in every sense of that term.

No new paid staff should be taken on for A.R.P. work, unless absolutely necessary. No salaries may be charged against the federal government for any extra work performed by the regular and ordinary municipal staff.

The same principle is to apply to the use of public buildings or office space. In other words, where public buildings are available for this work, no charge for rent, heat, janitor service or other expenses shall be made. Municipal budgets must be submitted for examination to the representative of federal A.R.P. in the area and through him to the provincial A.R.P. committee, or, if we have no representative in the district, then directly to the provincial A.R.P. committee. The latter, after checking the budgets, will send them to the office of the director at Ottawa. Only when the budget has been agreed to by the office of the director will it be recommended to and considered by the dominion government as one on which the 50 per cent may be paid.

It may strike hon. members as remarkable that, in two and a half years of war, this is the first fairly comprehensive statement with regard to air raid precautions that has been made to this committee. There is a very definite reason for that. As has been stated, we regard air raid precautions as essentially a local activity. The work is done very largely by volunteer workers. A successful scheme requires that every citizen shall have some knowledge of what will be expected of him in the hour of emergency. Therefore our effort at Ottawa has been to encourage the provincial and municipal officials to take the leadership in their own areas. We have felt that the more they rely upon their own efforts, the better the programme will be carried out. Or, to state the opposite, the more the local people are encouraged to look to far-away Ottawa for leadership and guidance at every turn, the less efficient will be their local organization. My policy, therefore, has been to keep quiet in regard to certain controversies that have arisen. We are glad and anxious to help where we can and when we are asked.

Our A.R.P. officers have visited the various areas repeatedly to give advice and assistance, especially to help with that type of advice which comes from knowing what is going on in a number of centres. Each city or province has developed out of its own genius especially successful measures in some one particular field. Our federal officers are able to pass this information along to others.

We have sought no publicity. We have felt that the spotlight should rest on the local leaders, the chairman of the provincial and municipal committees. In the hour of emergency it is they who will have to take the responsibility and to whom the people must learn to look. There have been numerous misunderstandings and occasional lack of co-operation, but by and large the spirit of co-operation has been excellent. As compared with England, where I had opportunity last year of personally inspecting the wonderful A.R.P. organization, we have been one happy family. Their magnificent system of air raid precautions has been developed out of strife and friction and grief and bitter experience.

Despite all their precautions, when the great fire attack was made on London they were largely caught unawares; yet in a few days they managed to develop a system of defence such that I am confident no incendiary attack can ever again succeed in that great city. We have the benefit of studying their experience under actual fire, and we have maintained continuous contact with their organization, so that we know of their mistakes as well as of their successes. We have been strongly advised to avoid some of their most outstanding methods, methods which they would not adopt if they were starting from scratch again. This advice has been quietly passed along to our provincial and municipal committees, and I believe the responsible heads of the local organizations are reasonably well informed.

Large public shelters, and evacuation of population, are two measures that we believe to have been mistaken, and most of the authorities in Great Britain now agree that that is so.

In conclusion, I wish to pay my tribute to the tens of thousands of voluntary workers for their untiring efforts to build up in their own towns and cities an efficient system of air raid precautions. I wish also to pay my tribute to the provincial and municipal committees, consisting partly of public officials and partly of private citizens, who have given splendid leadership to their communities. In no aspect of our war effort have the people of Canada demonstrated more fully their loyalty and willingness to cooperate for the public welfare. The number of voluntary workers is now in excess of 150,000. All of these people have taken training courses in some phase of A.R.P. work. It is upon them that success depends.

This is an activity in which every man and woman must be prepared to do his or her part. Old London learned a year and a half ago that the city fire department cannot cope with an incendiary raid. Every man must learn to be his own fireman; every woman in the home must know how to deal with a fire bomb on her own doorstep, or her own roof-top. Others will be too busy to help. Therefore I appeal to the people of this country to take this matter very seriously and that each one learn from the wardens in his own city block what measures he must be prepared to take. This is one phase of war effort that cannot be left to somebody else. It is the responsibility of each and every individual man and woman.

I think I have now gone into the matter fairly extensively and answered the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East.

Mr. GRAYDON: I should like to ask the minister a question. I know he will not take it as a reflection on his splendid work in connection with the departmental activities which he has just analysed, but last May I asked a question in the house, and the Prime Minister subsequently answered it, as to whether or not the Canadian government had under consideration the matter of appointing a minister of home security, as was done in Great Britain.

I should also be very glad if the minister would outline the reasons, to which I am sure he must have given much consideration, which led to the discarding of the idea that was then advanced.

In addition, I should like to ask as to the blackout method. I know there has been considerable controversy as to the efficiency of the blackout method of defence against air attack. Many people have pointed to the fact that Moscow, one of the great targets, used the direct searchlight method of warding off aerial attacks, while an article in a prominent magazine in Canada a week or so ago stated that there had been some change of opinion among authorities with regard to the efficiency of the blackout method as opposed to the searchlight procedure. Would the minister clarify those two points at this time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Regarding the first point I do not think my hon. friend would expect me to answer. That is entirely for the Prime Minister, and I shall be glad to direct his attention to the question.

With reference to the blackout method, my hon. friend has correctly stated that it is now a matter of controversy in London. In our entire organization in Canada we have followed the British system. We have the very latest details of the system used in Moscow, and I do not feel confident to express a technical opinion as to the merits of the blackout as against the other system. We have had visitors from Britain here; we have been over there ourselves, and in every case we have modeled our organization upon theirs, which by and large stood up pretty well to the attacks made.

Mr. GRAYDON: Does the minister believe that it is possible to follow the British system entirely in view of the very different conditions existing in Canada? I hope he has taken that into consideration. No doubt he has.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We shall do that as things develop.

Mr. HATFIELD: What is the policy of the government in regard to the establishment of air raid shelters?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I mentioned that, according to recent advices we have received, the policy is against the adoption of air raid shelters.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to thank the minister for his exhaustive view of this matter. I do not know about other parts of Canada, but I know the people in British Columbia, and particularly in Vancouver, were much disturbed over this question. There was a very general feeling that air raid precautions, so far as British Columbia was concerned, were in a very bad muddle. I am not saying either that they were or that they were not; I am just mentioning some of the opinions that have been expressed, and I think the minister knows them as well as I do. For myself, I have refrained from giving opinions on this matter, as I have refrained from discussing most military matters and other questions in connection with the war. Whenever I found that I had to criticize the government I did so because of its attitude rather than on the facts of any particular matter.

I was surprised to hear from the minister that the provision of air raid shelters had been discouraged, if I understood him aright, and also that no provision was being made for the evacuation of the civil population in case of a raid or military action. That question is of considerable importance in Vancouver, where we are so hemmed in that there is really only one way out. Again I do not know what the technique should be in that case, but I rather believe that the people would feel safer—whether or not they would be safer—if some provision were made for the evacuation of at least women and children in case of bad raids.

The minister gave the number of air raid workers in the whole of Canada. Could he give the number of workers in the Vancouver area? I should like to know also the amount of the credit granted to British Columbia, and how that credit was allocated among the various municipalities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In regard to equipment, I have the figure only for the province, because we issue all equipment to the provincial committee, and the allocation is decided by that committee as among the various municipalities. I can get the other information for my hon. friend; I have it, but not here. For British Columbia the equipment delivered so far is valued at $161,823.30. The value of the equipment ordered but not delivered is $235,129.19, making a total of $396,952.49.

Mr. MacINNIS: And the value of the equipment for all Canada was something like $630,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is what has been delivered. The equipment, both ordered and delivered, for the whole of Canada amounts to $1,560,000, roughly speaking; I gave that figure a few moments ago. In regard to the number of air raid workers in British Columbia, I do not have that information here by municipalities, though I have it in my office. Roughly speaking in the whole province we have some twenty-one thousand workers.

Mr. MacINNIS: Did the government get trained instructors from the old country, or did we have our people go there and receive training?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We had some of our own officers go over there at the very outset; and though officially we have not had anyone here under government auspices, from time to time experts have come here from England and have travelled throughout Canada lecturing to our various organizations. As I said a short time ago, however, they have established special schools in the United States, and it has been suggested that we might send a few of our auxiliary firemen down there to take short courses, so they could come back with some training in the newest developments.

Mr. GREEN: I understood the minister to say that the dominion government was assuming full responsibility for the necessary equipment and supplies. Is that correct?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct, in this sense. We have assumed complete responsibility for all equipment except such as is normal to the peacetime activities of the municipalities, what you might call standard fire-fighting equipment and so on. After consultation with the fire chiefs, the underwriters' associations, and others; after obtaining the best advice we could get from sources in England and the United States, we decided to supply only auxiliary fire-fighting equipment. That is why there has been a certain amount of discussion with regard to fire hose, for example. We only supplied one and a half inch hose, whereas the standard equipment would be a larger size.

Mr. GREEN: Take the case of fire-fighting equipment. The cities and towns are called upon to buy far more equipment than they would otherwise require. Why is it the government will not assume any responsibility for that extra fire-fighting equipment?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Well, as I have said, the principle has been laid down and followed that we accept responsibility for such equipment as is rendered necessary by the fact that we are at war; that is in addition to the standard equipment. We do not accept responsibility for the replacement of normal fire-fighting equipment.

Mr. GREEN: But they require larger quantities of standard equipment in order to prepare against larger fires caused by raids in which incendiary bombs may be dropped. Surely it is only fair that the dominion should assume responsibility for the increased expenditure brought about by reason of the fact that the municipalities have to buy more of the standard equipment than they would otherwise buy.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We carefully canvassed the whole situation with some of the best experts available, and that was the advice we obtained and the advice we have followed.

Mr. GREEN: It is not necessarily a matter of the best advice we could get from Great Britain or the United States. We should be able to make up our own minds.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): We did; we got advice from Canadians too.

Mr. GREEN: A situation has risen on the Pacific coast which is most unfortunate. We have the mayor of the minister's own city, Vancouver quoted in the press of a week ago to the following effect:

> As head of the A.R.P. in Vancouver, I am in a position to know that we have an excellent A.R.P. organization, but it is so dangerously deficient in equipment that the homes and even the lives of all of us are in danger.

Futhermore, at this very time there is a drive under way, under the auspices of the board of trade to raise over $200,000 for air raid precautions. In another press dispatch the city engineer states that a portion of this money is to be used for additional fire-fighting facilities, and that the balance will be devoted to completing the city's twenty-three first aid posts, establishing additional A.R.P. posts, providing protection, probably by means of sandbags, around those posts, and for administration. Why should the citizens have to go out and raise that amount of money in order to finance proper air raid precautions? Surely there is something wrong when that state of affairs exists. I do not doubt that the minister has done his best. It may be that his associates in the ministry are to blame, but from the start it has seemed to me that the dominion government are dodging this air raid precaution issue; that they are keeping themselves as far away from the front line as possible, making the provincial and municipal authorities carry the load. That, I suggest, should be changed. Why at this time should it be necessary for the citizens of Vancouver to subscribe over $200,000 in order to finance air raid precautions?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In the first place, deliveries of equipment are entirely conditioned by the speed with which we can obtain them. In the second place, Canada is doing more in this regard for her municipalities than any other country. In the United States, though they have voted $100,000,000 to provide for air raid precautions, not a single cent has been given to any municipality.

Mr. GREEN: They have been in the war only two or three months. We have been in it three years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is the situation. First, we paid preliminary organizational expenses in Canada. In the second place we provided this equipment and even the technical officers. In the third place, similar methods now followed by some of the public-spirited citizens in Vancouver have been resorted to in different cities for the same purpose.

While I understand the natural apprehension of my fellow citizens of Vancouver, as a matter of fact I can tell my hon. friend that Vancouver has received the best treatment of any city in Canada in regard to A.R.P. We are doing everything we can. And I must say in regard to my colleagues that they have been absolutely sympathetic in every way in assisting me to get equipment for the Pacific coast as fast as possible.

I must say about the Atlantic coast that they have been remarkably patient. In Nova Scotia they have been magnificent, because until recently, they have themselves entirely shouldered the whole cost of A.R.P. organization. I believe the first small grant we gave them was one of $5,000, and it was not all expended when we made the second small grant the other day. I was told by Doctor Manion, who came back from Halifax a short time ago, that he was there during a blackout, and he said it was one of the most efficient he had witnessed anywhere.

The whole trouble, if I may say so to my hon. friend, is that under the constitution of Canada, which decides what are provincial and federal responsibilities, you have tripartite control. Where you have divided control you are bound to have a certain amount of dissatisfaction and criticism.

Mr. GREEN: Does not the minister think that A.R.P. should be a national responsibility?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What would happen to-morrow if we made A.R.P. a national duty? There would be a nationalized fire service and police service in Canada. You would step into all cities and take charge of their police and fire-fighting forces. In other words you would interfere with the jurisdiction of the provinces and municipalities. That is where the danger arises. Frankly at the present time I do not think our municipal authorities want that to happen. The real basis of this whole situation is cooperation. Give control of the organizations to the municipalities and provinces. We have endeavoured to carry that out. Unfortunately there have been a few difficulties here and there, but these are unavoidable. As long as I have anything to do with the federal end of the matter we will cooperate with every area as best we can to obtain equipment and do all we can to help them in this very necessary work.

Mr. GRAYDON: The minister referred to the various jurisdictions, municipal, provincial and federal. Surely that can scarcely be an argument, in view of the provision of the British North America Act for dominion jurisdiction where peace, order and good government are concerned.

I was struck by the minister's argument in one or two particulars, but it is still not clear to me. The matter we are discussing is one of the most important branches of our whole defence scheme. How do we differentiate by regarding it as the only one to be placed under the jurisdiction of the municipalities, and the provinces and the dominion, while in respect of every other part of our war effort from beginning to end the dominion government alone, and rightly so, has taken the initiative and coordinated the whole undertaking? As I said last year, I am not criticizing the minister in this respect because I believe he is working under what is no doubt a worn-out policy, so far as his view of the situation facing Canada to-day is concerned. Until we get a ministry of home security in Canada, where one minister would be the focal point from which all instructions would emanate, a minister who would have full authority and exercise complete supervision with regard to this important part of our national defence, we are going to have in years to come with respect to our whole A.R.P. set-up the same type of criticism that we have heard during the last few months. It is the most natural thing in the world that the municipalities and provinces should attempt to shift some responsibility from one to the other, but I think the time has come—and I am not speaking only for myself—for the setting up of a ministry such as I have described. There are many people permanently and closely identified with A.R.P. work and civilian defence who have expressed similar views to those I am expressing to-day. I feel keenly on this particular point. Undoubtedly it is most important, and the government should not for one moment remove it from consideration. I repeat that I do not see why we should separate this equally important branch of our national defence from the other branches. Why should we single it out for special attention and divide the supervision in respect to it into three different jurisdictional branches?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In Great Britain, where they have an excellent organization, and one which has had an experience extending over two and a half years, the administration is vested in the Home Office. There is a certain amount of cooperation from the Department of Health, but the major portion of it—I believe I can say practically the entire authority—is vested in the Home Office.

Mr. GRAYDON: I may be entirely wrong in the information I have, but I understand that Sir John Anderson, who was at one time Minister of Home Security—I cannot say whether he is now or not—had the entire supervision of the work of the A.R.P.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I personally visited Mr. Herbert Morrison, the present Home Secretary, in his office, and discussed with him the organization of A.R.P. in Great Britain. He was good enough to give me the time of his best officers so that I might get all the information they had at their disposal. He was in charge of that work, in cooperation with the ministry of health.

Mr. GREEN: Who is it in Ottawa who revises the estimated expenditures sent down by cities in connection with this A.R.P. work? A budget was sent down by Vancouver, and it was turned down by some board in Ottawa. Quoting again from a newspaper clipping having reference to the city engineer:

Mr. Brakenridge prophesied that "if things get tougher" the dominion and provincial governments would be forced to take a greater hand in the development of A.R.P.

A.R.P. in Vancouver had accomplished a great deal, but had been consistently hampered by a lack of funds, largely due to refusal of Victoria and Ottawa to approve city expenditures.

The A.R.P. here is really between the devil and the deep blue sea. It has no power to raise money.

When we want something we have to go to Victoria, and our request is then sent to Ottawa. Ottawa generally replies "we don't know anything about this."

This is an impossible condition. I wish the minister would explain just how these matters are handled.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The budget of the city of Vancouver was sent to the premier of British Columbia. He sent it to Ottawa and it was examined by officers of the air raid precautions division in Ottawa. As a result of an analysis of that budget I wrote a personal letter to the premier of British Columbia, part of which appeared in the press, giving substantial reasons why items in the budget could not be passed by this or any other government. If my hon. friend would like to hear the letter I will read it, but I do not think the house would want to be troubled with it.

Mr. GREEN: The citizens are trying to raise $200,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): True.

Mr. GREEN: Is that all for expenditures in which the dominion government is not interested?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Not at all. My hon. friend cannot put words like that in my mouth.

Mr. GREEN: I did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have the interests of Vancouver as much at heart as my hon. friend.

Mr. GREEN: I know that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have responsibilities to the city of Vancouver as a member, and to my hon. friend as a minister, but I also have a responsibility to the treasury of Canada. There were items in that budget which could not possibly be passed—not even by my hon. friend if he were in my position to-day.

Mr. GREEN: The minister knows about the present campaign to raise $200,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Does the minister say that those are expenditures a portion of which at least should not be paid for by the dominion government?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have no information as to whether the campaign at present going on in Vancouver is to cover any of the items in the budget sent to me.

Mr. GREEN: Would the minister find that out. I read to him earlier to-day the statement that a portion of the moneys is to complete first aid posts, to establish additional A.R.P. posts, to provide protection around those posts, and so on. Would the minister check with regard to these present expenditures?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I understand that the present campaign has been conducted by an honorary committee of citizens; I do not think it has been conducted by the official air raid committee. Here is the reply I made:

This budget contemplates:

(2) that the dominion government shall pay for light, heat and janitor services to the extent of more than $1,000 a month, in the Vancouver city hall and other civic premises;

(3) that the dominion government shall pay the salaries of at least nine permanent civic employees of the city of Vancouver;

(4) that the dominion government shall pay for the expense of operating a police car;

(5) that we shall pay the salaries of some ten or eleven stenographers;

(6) that we shall pay some $2,200 for a control room, already established in the city hall. This sum is indicated as a non-recurring commitment already made, and I am advised by my departmental officers that it consists of a room in the city hall containing some plain furniture and maps, for which separate items are submitted;

(7) this budget contains the following extraordinary items which the dominion government is asked to approve:

Miscellaneous $105.20 monthly,
Miscellaneous $35.70 monthly,
Miscellaneous $6.10 monthly;

(8) the budget includes several hundred dollars for telephone services upon which my officers are unable to comment without more definite information, either by way of your recommendation or personal inspection by our own representative in British Columbia. In any event, we have had no such item from any other city, although there are several in which efficient precautions have been maintained for two and a half years.

With deep regret and a full sense of my responsibility, both as a minister and as a representative of Vancouver, I must inform you that I cannot approve this budget.

Could any minister of the crown support items for which no details are given?

Mr. GREEN: You could have got the details.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It was not even recommended to us by the provincial committee of British Columbia.

Mr. GREEN: Many of these expenditures have been caused entirely by the necessity of taking these air raid precautions. It is all right for hon. members from the central part of Canada to complain or applaud when the minister makes this statement, but I would point out to them that there are not many cities in Canada which are so close under the gun in connection with possible bombing as the cities on the two coasts. I suggest again to the minister that the department is being entirely too tough about what they will or will not pay for in respect to these air raid precautions.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am from the Atlantic coast, but if the city of Halifax sent in a bill for rental for part of the city hall, I would take exception to it.

Mr. GREEN: Some of the items may have gone too far.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think we should try to discuss this matter as calmly as possible. Air raid precautions are made necessary because of war conditions. The question arises who is responsible for the condition arising out of military operations. I think it has been decided by experience and general practice that there are certain things that the cities and municipalities must do for themselves, unless the whole municipality is to be put under military law and control. Since air raid precaution work is made necessary by military operations, and since it is not desirable to put the municipalities under military control, the question then arises as to the division of expenses and jurisdiction. I think it is sound policy that the dominion government should provide all essential equipment, because the dominion government has taken to itself all the fields of taxation. The fields still open to the municipality are very limited, and they have great difficulty in getting money for the ordinary essential services. If the government can satisfy the municipality—the city of Vancouver in this instance—that the equipment provided is sufficient and that the government is paying for it, it is only reasonable that the city should assume certain small essential expenditures on account of the work. As has been said, a great deal of the work is being done on a voluntary basis. I have refrained from criticism in this matter because I do not know enough about it. If I had more information I might be able to decide between the contention of the minister and that of the city. I think the minister has made a very reasonable statement.

Mr. GREEN: The minister was questioned as to whether or not arrangements had been made for the evacuation of women and children from the coastal areas. I understood him to say that the government had decided that evacuation was not wise.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That was the advice received.

Mr. GREEN: Has the government given any consideration to what would be done in the event of an attempted invasion as distinct from a bombing attack? The two are quite different. If an attempt at invasion were made, the question of evacuating women and children would be of the utmost importance. I should like to know if the government has made any plans to meet that eventuality.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend will have to address his question to my colleague the Minister of National Defence. That whole matter is covered by the defence of Canada regulations.

Mr. GREEN: I want to know if there is any government plan for the evacuation of women and children. I do not care which minister gives me the information.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid my hon. friend will not be satisfied with my reply.

Mr. GREEN: It will depend upon the reply.

Mr. RALSTON: The defence of Canada regulations provide that the Minister of National Defence shall give the sanction for removal and specify the class or number of people who may be removed from a certain area after a certain time. The arrangements for the removal are not matters for the Department of National Defence or the dominion government; they are made by the local authorities, and in some cities have been made already. The local authorities decide who are to be moved, make the arrangements for the moving—that is the physical removal—and decide where those who are being removed are to go. The Minister of National Defence is given the power, which power is delegated to the district officer commanding, to make an order which would give legal effect to the removal. This would enable the removal to be made in case somebody objects to it.

Mr. GREEN: That would be under the province and the municipalities?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: I want to address a question to the Minister of National Defence, and one to the Minister of National Defence for Air. A great problem confronts the people of Canada, and they are exercising their minds over it. I wish to direct my question and the few observations I desire to make to the very pertinent problem of recruiting.

Coming as I do from Alberta, which has a favourable record in recruiting as compared with other provinces—and in the observations I am about to make I am not in any way casting reflections on my own province or boosting it unduly—I have a few suggestions to make which may be helpful in this time of peril and crisis. I have been critical in my own mind, although I have not hitherto given expression to it, of some of the recruiting methods and practices followed in obtaining men for the army. There are certain conditions, and certain practices which have been followed, which to my mind are not calculated to draw forth to the country's service the thoughtful and self-respecting young men of Canada to-day.

In the first place I would be critical of the recruiting offices as I have observed them in various places. It does seem to me that when we are asking the young manhood of Canada, the self-respecting, self-starting and self-reliant young men of our country, to offer their lives on the altar of sacrifice, they should at least be approached in a spirit and in a manner becoming free citizens of Canada, and be treated as self-respecting individuals and not as automatons or people who can be pushed around or as people who can be drummed into doing their duty. It has been my observation that men have come for miles to some of our recruiting centres, and men living in our cities have also found their way to these recruiting centres, but where are these recruiting offices to be found for the most part? In out-of-the-way places, on side streets, and in many cases in second or third-rate buildings, poorly lighted, not well kept, not clean or attractive—and there, perforce, the cream of our manhood are invited to come and offer their lives as a sacrifice for this civilization of which we are so proud. It does seem to me that the best is none too good for men who are willing of their own volition to come forward and offer their lives for their country, and I do think we might well give very thoughtful consideration to that phase of our war effort so far as the army is concerned.

I am glad to say that in my own home city within very recent months the army have moved the recruiting centre and have now got it in a fine office building centrally located, well lighted, cleanly kept, and where the volunteer is met by a civilian. The results have been remarkable. Why cannot we have decent recruiting offices across Canada, not merely in centrally located buildings but in buildings that are clean and wholesome and attractive, where our men who are volunteers will be courteously received and have no fear of being treated with contempt or be called yellow if they do not forthwith sign up in our forces.

I consider that the young men entering upon an army life, many of whom, in fact the very best we have, come from rural communities, would respond much more readily if they were met by civilians whom they would meet on equal terms, and with whom they could discuss their problems. Many of these young men who come to the cities to volunteer do not know for which particular branch of the service they are best qualified by training, experience and education, and in many instances they are met by an old recruiting sergeant and hustled in, it being taken for granted that they must join the army when they might be much better fitted for one of the other services.

I have also heard complaints and severe criticism of the recruiting centres themselves and of how they are maintained. I know of several men, including myself, who have gone into recruiting centres where there seemed to be no anxiety to meet or welcome you or any great concern whether you were there or not or as to the nature of your business.

Another criticism I have heard is of the treatment of the volunteer in many of the recruiting centres. In my own city of Calgary the recruiting office until recently was on a side street, and after arriving there the recruit was marched a mile and a half or two miles to another place for his medical examination. Then he was marched another mile or two to undergo a dental examination, and finally he would be told: "If you will come back to-morrow we will be able to tell you whether we can use you." Imagine having to go a mile and a half to be examined by a dentist, to find out whether your teeth are satisfactory!

Many of these young men who are coming forward have come miles and miles at their own expense to lay their lives on the altar of sacrifice for their country, only to be told that they will have to wait over until to-morrow at their own expense. It does seem to me that that is something which can and should be corrected. These men should be provided with accommodation, and given every consideration and consultation and advice. They should be treated as individuals. It has been my conception that fundamentally what we are fighting for in this war is for the rights of individuals, and it ill behooves us in any of our forces to treat the young men who are coming forward as recruits as other than self-respecting men wishing to do the right thing. We should respect the highest thing about them, their individuality and their personality.

I think that a great deal more inspection and supervision should be given to the recruiting centres as such and to the personnel who examine the men who are offering their lives. Why should the medical man whom I visit in his office as a private individual treat me any differently when I come forward to offer my life for my country? Yet does the young recruit take off his shoes and socks and disrobe in a clean room? Are there the same sanitary conditions as prevail in that doctor's own office were I to consult him in private? Ask any recruit; ask the men in the army to-day, whether those conditions prevail. It is not unknown that volunteers who came forward have, because of the delay and the treatment which they experienced, returned home and never bothered to wait and see what was the result of their examination. I suggest to the government and to the department that such conditions and treatment may be an explanation, at least in part, of the fact that we have not had as many volunteers for the army as, possibly, we should have liked.

I wish, however, to commend the government for the improvements being adopted and the army for the revision of the methods being used so far as the equipment, dress and treatment of the men are concerned. That instead of the battle dress we have given the soldier a walking-out uniform is something of which we should be very proud. One has felt we owed an apology to the boys who have come forward in thousands in past months and had only one uniform in which they worked, a battle dress, thus being compelled to go in these work clothes to their home or to see their sweethearts. You would not do it; your friends would not do it; the ordinary average working man does not do it. Yet these "right honourable" men, the only men who, to my way of thinking, are really entitled to that title, who have offered their lives for their country, have had to go home to greet their loved ones in a working suit—a glorified windbreaker.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Edwards.]

VACANCY

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have been notified by two members of the vacancy caused in the electoral district of Winnipeg North Centre by the death of J. S. Woodsworth.

And I have sent my warrant to the chief electoral officer for the issue of a writ for a new election.

THE PLEBISCITE

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ADJOURNMENT OVER VOTING DAY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware the voting with respect to the removal of restrictions on the government arising out of past commitments as to the method of raising men for service overseas takes place on Monday of next week.

I believe hon. members generally feel it would be of assistance to others if they were privileged to be in their constituencies on Monday, at the time the vote is being taken. I am sure it would greatly facilitate the work of organization if they could be present in their constituencies not only on the day of actual polling but as well a day or two in advance. As the house does not sit on Saturday or Sunday, and as the sitting on Friday is only for a half day, in the opinion of the government it would be of real assistance if hon. members could be in their constituencies one or two days immediately preceding the taking of the vote, as well as on the day on which the actual vote is taken.

We realize of course that in provinces which are some distance from the capital it might not be possible for hon. members to return to their constituencies. However if the house were to adjourn on Thursday evening, after concluding Thursday's proceedings, only half a day in the present week would be lost, and the only day in the next week would be Monday, the day of polling.

In those circumstances during my absence the acting leader of the government communicated with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) and the leaders of the two other parliamentary groups with respect to ascertaining their views as to adjourning for the time indicated, and I am informed there appears to be general agreement that an arrangement of that kind would be satisfactory.

If I were to make a motion at this time unanimous consent of the house would be required. If unanimous consent were not given I would give notice of the motion in to-day's Votes and Proceedings, and if discussion were desired it could be discussed later. But I believe it would perhaps be to the advantage of all if a decision could be arrived at immediately.

The leader of the opposition has, I understand, been kind enough to intimate that he is prepared to second the motion I may make in this connection, and I wish to thank him for so doing. In the circumstances, with the consent of the house I move, seconded by the leader of the opposition:

That when the house adjourns on Thursday, the 23rd instant, it stand adjourned until Tuesday, the 28th instant.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I had not understood that I was to second this motion, but I shall say at once that when the matter was brought to my attention late last week I agreed with the substance of the proposal now before the house. I am so strongly impressed by the urgent necessity of an affirmative vote by the people of Canada on Monday next to release the government from its commitments that I think it of very great importance that all hon. members who think as I do should be in their constituencies for the vote, and should exercise all the influence they can through personal contact with the voters in those districts.

I regret that the idea did not germinate sooner, because some hon. members from western Canada would like to participate as well. Obviously that is now impossible. However, for the reasons I have given, those outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and others which must be obvious to every hon. member, I suggest that unanimous consent be given.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I too gave approval to the suggestion when it was telephoned to me by the Secretary of State (Mr. McLarty). But in doing so I had considerable misgiving. I felt that some hon. members adjacent to this city might be able to assist in bringing out an effective vote, and that we should place nothing in their way if they were so disposed. But we had had a very long recess, during which we had all been in touch with our constituents, and it seemed to me that we should have done everything then that we felt it necessary to do to this end.

I also regret that the intimation was not given until Friday of last week, which made it impossible for those coming from western Canada to remain in their constituencies. I feel that parliament at this session has been lagging in the work that has to be done. So far no war expenditures committee has been appointed. The committee on radio has not met, and we have a large amount of committee work ahead of us. I believe the general feeling throughout the country is that we are not making the progress, with regard to measures relating to the war, that we ought to be making. It is my view that this feeling of dissatisfaction with this parliament may be reflected in the vote on Monday next. I urge the government to see to it that we do not further delay our proceedings, that the committees which ought to be sitting be appointed forthwith, and that we get down to the business of the session more expeditiously than we have done during the past two months.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I have no particular comment to make upon the short adjournment, but I am wondering if it would not be in order for the Prime Minister to make a statement as to where the members of parliament are to vote in case they do not happen to be in their constituencies on voting day.

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): I am not opposed to the motion that the Prime Minister has moved, seconded by the leader of the opposition, but I do object strongly to the words the Prime Minister used in explaining this motion. He said that the vote was to be taken for the purpose of deciding on the recruiting of men for overseas service—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HOMUTH: —or getting men overseas. Yes, the Prime Minister said that. If the Prime Minister will have Hansard read his statement he will see that he referred to the raising of men for overseas service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Unless my memory has failed me completely, I think my hon. friend will see that the words I used were the words of the question that is being asked.

Mr. HOMUTH: I beg the Prime Minister's pardon, he did not use the words in that way. For three weeks hon. members of this house, and particularly members of the opposition, have been going out, not only organizing their own ridings but trying to organize other ridings where there was not the same enthusiasm for a "yes" vote by members of the government as there is by members of the opposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: They have been out organizing these ridings with the idea—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HOMUTH: —of getting a "yes" vote.

An hon. MEMBER: Nobody wants you in his riding.

Mr. HOMUTH: I would not go into yours anyway because you would not be of any help to anyone. Let me say this: the very words of the Prime Minister will do a great deal to defeat what we have been telling the people, that it is not a question of voting to raise men for overseas service or for conscription, that the purpose of the vote is to release the government from a pledge which it made and that the question of overseas service is entirely a question for the House of Commons. I say in all sincerity that I think the words of the Prime Minister were not the best words to use in bringing forward this motion.

(Mr. Blackmore.)

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that the words that I intended to use, the words that I thought I had used, were the words that will appear on the voting paper on Monday next. If I did not use substantially those words I was entirely unconscious of not having done so and I thank my hon. friend for drawing my attention to it. I assure him that those are the words I intended to use and that I would wish to have used.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC DEBT

Mr HANSELL:

1. What was the total amount of our national debt as at March 31, 1919?

2. How much had been paid on such debt up to the above date?

3. What was the total amount of our national debt as at March 31, 1939?

4. How much had been paid on the national debt up to the above date?

5. What is the total amount of our national debt at the present time?

6. How much of our present national debt is attributed to (a) the last great war, (b) the present war?

7. What is the total amount of interest that has been paid on our national debt since confederation, or as far back as our records of borrowings show?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. The net debt (total liabilities less active assets) of the dominion of Canada on March 31, 1919, was $1,574,531,032.44.

2. Annual increases and decreases in the net debt of Canada since confederation are shown on page 65 of the public accounts of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1941.

3. The net debt (total liabilties less active assets) of the dominion of Canada on March 31, 1939, was $3,152,559,314.48.

4. See answer to question No. 2.

5. The net debt (total liabilities less active assets) of the dominion of Canada on March 31, 1941, (the latest date for which the figure has been published), was $3,648,691,448,56.

6. It is not possible to determine with any degree of accuracy what portion of the net debt of Canada is due to the last war and what portion is due to the present war. All loans issued during the last war have matured; in some cases maturing issues were paid off, in most cases they were refunded, and in some cases refunding issues were increased to provide funds for other purposes.

Expenditures due to war are charged to the consolidated revenue fund as are all other government expenditures.

All receipts, either from taxes, loans, or from other sources, are credited to the consolidated revenue fund. It is impossible, therefore, except by the use of highly hypothetical assumptions, to calculate the proportion of the present net debt attributable directly or indirectly to the last war, the present war, or to other specific causes.

However, because since the outbreak of the present war total government revenues have been in excess of total non-war expenditures, there may not be great inaccuracy in taking the total increase in net debt between March 31, 1939 and March 31, 1941, namely, $496,132,134.08, as being due to the war.

7. $3,509,928,986 has been paid by the dominion in the period July 1, 1867 to March 31, 1941, in interest on the public debt (bonds, stocks, trust funds, etc.).

MILLEDGEVILLE, N.B., AIRPORT

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Was a flag pole erected at the Milledgeville airport, New Brunswick, in 1940 or 1941?
2. If so, when was it erected?
3. Who erected it?
4. What did it cost?

Mr. POWER: In so far as the Department of National Defence for Air is concerned:

1. Yes, in 1941.
2. Erection completed 19th May, 1941.
3. John Flood & Son, Saint John, N.B.
4. $631.

WHEAT ACREAGE REDUCTION BONUS

Mr. HAZEN:

1. What are the names and addresses of the persons to whom cheques were issued (a) for over $10,000, (b) for $5,000 to $10,000 on wheat acreage reduction bonus?
2. How were the amounts made up?
3. How much did each receive?

Mr. GARDINER: Stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This question has been on the order paper a long time. Undoubtedly the names are available in the archives of the Department of Agriculture, and the only question is: should the names be revealed. I want to make a protest here and now before this question stands. The names of any persons who get the money of the taxpayers of Canada should on request be revealed to the public of Canada. A refusal cannot be cloaked behind such a specious answer as the minister gave in this house before the adjournment.

Mr. GARDINER: The question was up previously in this house on one occasion and at that time it was asked to be allowed to stand for further consideration. I have just arrived back this morning from the west and this question has not had that further consideration. I might say to my hon. friend that I do not think the reason given is any more specious than the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition a few days ago to the effect that anyone who is paying money into the treasury by way of income tax should not have the amount disclosed.

Question stands.

PRICE CEILING—SUBSIDIES

Mr. HAZEN:

1. On what goods and materials, domestic and imported, are subsidies now being paid?
2. What subsidy is paid on each kind of goods and materials?
3. How much has been paid to date on each kind of goods and materials?
4. What are the names and addresses of the persons or companies who have been paid subsidies and how much has each received?

Mr. ILSLEY: I propose to make a statement on the subsidies being paid by the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation at the earliest opportunity that offers on the war appropriation bill. I should like to ask that this question, as well as the first notice of motion for the production of papers, stand until that time. I ask this because a question very similar to the one which has just been discussed arises, as well as certain other questions which can be dealt with only in a complete and full statement.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Will there be an opportunity to debate the principle?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall make the statement on the war appropriation bill.

Question stands.

TUG "BALLY"

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. On what date was the tug Bally chartered by the Department of National Defence for naval services?
2. Was she released from service in September, 1941?
3. If so, for what reasons?
4. Was she subsequently re-chartered?

5. If so, on what date?
6. Has she since been released from service?
7. If so, on what date and for what reasons?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City): The tug Bally was chartered by the naval service on the 8th December, 1939. As the vessel required extensive repairs to continue on the duties upon which she was employed and as the department purchased a more suitable vessel, the owner was advised to take delivery of the vessel at Halifax on the 9th September, 1941. The owner did not take delivery and was again notified on the 14th November, 1941, that from the 9th September, 1941, the department would assume no responsibility with regard to the vessel, its stores and appurtenances.

By letter dated 30th October, 1941, the owner advised the department that he preferred to loan the vessel to the department until the spring of 1942, if no other arrangement could be made, as he considered it unsafe to bring her to Charlottetown during the winter.

Charter fees have not been paid beyond the 9th September, 1941, nor has the department assumed any responsibility with regard to the vessel, its stores and appurtenances since that date.

Due to the expansion of the naval service, it is possible that the vessel would be suitable for other purposes without the necessity of extensive repairs required for her original duty. The possibility of utilizing the vessel for other purposes is under consideration, but a decision with regard to her re-charter has not yet been reached.

TUG "PEGGY L"

Mr. McGREGOR:

1. On what date was the tug Peggy L chartered by the Department of National Defence for Naval Services?
2. From whom was she chartered?

4. What payment per day was made in respect of her operations?
5. What was the total amount paid to her owners in each of the years 1939, 1940 and 1941?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. The tug Peggy L has not been chartered by the Department of National Defence for Naval Services.

2, 3, 4 and 5. Answered by Number 1.

CARRIER PIGEONS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Has the government purchased any carrier pigeons for use as message carriers?
2. What action, if any, has the government taken to encourage the raising of carrier pigeons?

Mr. McLARTY: It is not considered to be in the public interest to provide answers to these questions.

WOMEN AS METEOROLOGISTS IN R.C.A.F.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK:

1. Are women used as meteorologists, grade 3, in the Royal Canadian Air Force?
2. If not, will their services be used to replace men now employed in this work?

Mr. HOWE:

1. This question is taken to refer to meteorological assistants, grade 3, in which position it is not proposed, for the present, to employ women. Women are being employed as meteorological assistants, grades 1 and 2, to replace men now engaged in this work at forecast stations.

A considerable portion of the work of meteorological assistants, grade 3, consists in giving lectures to pilots in training for overseas duty, and in this lecture work, both in the air force in Great Britain and in Canada, it is believed that the instruction can best be given by men.

A large number of meteorological assistants are assigned to isolated stations where no provision is made for the accommodation of women. However, arrangements are being made by the meteorological service for training a class of women enlisted in the air force to assist in the preparation of weather maps and in taking weather observations at air training stations.

2. Answered by No. 1.

WARTIME HOUSING

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. What contracts were let by the housing administration of the Department of Finance for wartime housing?
2. At what locations were these contracts let?
3. How many houses did these contracts cover?
4. What are the descriptions of these houses, showing the number of rooms, construction, material, etc.?
5. What are the conveniences at each location such as water, sewers, etc?
6. What was the estimated cost of each unit at each location?
7. What was the contract price at each location?
8. Was it a lump sum, cost plus percentage, or fee?
9. What was the actual cost of each unit at each location?
10. Do the above costs include the cost of the land?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. None.

2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10. Answered by No. 1.

NAVAL SERVICES—OFFICER TRAINING

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's):

1. Is it the rule of the Department of National Defence for Naval Services that a person who never served in any army or navy or graduated from the Royal Military College, or naval college, and who now desires to join the naval forces with officer rank, must first join up as a rating and serve as a rating for several months before he will be put in training for officer rank?

2. Are there any exceptions or exemptions to this rule; and if there are, when were the exceptions and exemptions set up, to what classes of persons do they apply, in what parts of Canada are they being made effective, and what is the nature of the exceptions and exemptions and why are they set up?

3. Are there boards to select prospective young Canadians both English and French to take officer training without first serving as ratings?

4. If there are any such boards who are the members of the various boards, what are the naval qualifications of each member, when were the boards set up, and where are they located?

5. How many young men, (a) English-speaking, (b) French-speaking, have been selected by these boards to take officer training without first serving as ratings?

Mr. MACDONALD (Kingston City):

1. No. Officer vacancies are filled both by advancement from the lower deck and by direct entry from shore.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes.

4. If possible boards are composed of at least one captain and two commanders, one of whom is an authority on educational matters. Naval qualifications are indicated by the senior rank held by officers on the boards. The boards are appointed from time to time as required by naval service headquarters, and sit in all the principal cities of Canada as required.

5. It is not possible to give an exact reply without extensive review of records, but in 1941 out of approximately 1,000 officers entered after interview approximately 150 were French speaking.

PRICE CEILING—DAMAGE OR COMPENSATION CLAIMS

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Have damages or compensation been claimed under the Price Control Act?

2. If so, what is the aggregate of the amount of damages claimed?

Mr. ILSLEY:

1. Yes, one claim. The claimant stated that after the passage of P.C. 8527 of November 1, 1941 (maximum prices regulations) but prior to the issuance of order No. 66 of the wartime prices and trade board dated November 26, 1941 (exempting fresh fruits and vegetables from the provisions of section 3 of the maximum prices regulations) he contracted to sell potatoes to the Department of Munitions and Supply without making any stipulation that the contract price was subject to adjustment in the event of an increase in the price of potatoes. It appears that during the currency of the contract the claimant was unable to purchase potatoes at prices which would enable him to fulfil his contract with the Department of Munitions and Supply without financial loss to himself. The board took the position that it was not liable for such losses.

2. $1,695.71.

MILITARY SERVICE—CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY EMPLOYEES

Mr. BRUCE:

In regard to the clerical staffs of the Canadian National Railways, has provision been made to exclude young men and women in category "A" who are fit for active military service between the ages of 18 and 45?

Mr. CARDIN: The management of Canadian National Railways state that in the employment of men the railway will be guided by terms of order in council P.C. 2250, and instructions have been issued accordingly. Said order in council refers only to male persons.

PRIORITIES UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. CHURCH:

What steps are being taken by the government to aid the victims of priorities unemployment who are bearing part of the war burdens, as compared with the lot of munition and defence workers?

Mr. MITCHELL: The government has established some 100 employment and claims offices across Canada, the personnel of which offices are charged with,—

(a) placement in employment of those who are seeking work; (b) the administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act; and (c) securing workers to meet the demands of employers, especially those who are engaged in war work.

The managers of all those offices have been instructed to keep themselves informed as to possible "layoffs" due to changes in employment requirements brought about by causes such as shortage of material due to priority orders or other reasons and where any such "layoffs" occur to make special efforts to move those laid off into other remunerative employment and where this cannot be done locally to contact the regional offices in order that other arrangements to this end may be made.

BROADCASTS OF UPTON CLOSE OVER NBC

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the offensive broadcasting for the NBC, of one Upton Close, and his tirades against Britain?

2. Have any complaints been made to the NBC regarding same?

3. What will be done to stop it, and also similar anti-ally broadcasts?

4. Is there any censorship on NBC or on CBC broadcasts on matters of this kind?

Mr. THORSON:

1. The attention of the CBC has been called to the broadcasts mentioned.

2. Yes.

3. The NBC has taken action which, it is believed will be effective.

4. The NBC is subject to U.S. censorship and the CBC to Canadian censorship. There is close and friendly cooperation between these broadcasting organizations.

MORATORIUM ON MORTGAGES

Mr. CHURCH:

What action is the government taking with respect to a national moratorium on all mortgages on land, including homes and other buildings, under the War Measures Act, for the period of the war and two years thereafter, on (a) property owned by civilians, (b) property owned by members of His Majesty's forces?

Mr. ILSLEY: No action has been taken. Whether such action will be taken in the future is a matter of policy, as to which an announcement will be made if and when action of the kind suggested is taken.

TORONTO DISTRICT DIRECTOR OF POSTAL SERVICES

Mr. NOSEWORTHY:

1. What was the salary paid the Toronto district director of postal services of mail, Mr. Gibson, in 1939, 1940 and 1941?

2. What was the salary paid the Montreal district director of the same service for each of these years?

Mr. MULOCK:

1. 1939, $6,000; 1940, $6,000; 1941, $6,000;

2. 1939, $5,475; 1940, $5,775; 1941, $6,000.

The amounts shown for 1939 and 1940 in the answer to question No. 2 are explained by the fact that the present incumbent was promoted to the position effective 1st September, 1938, at the minimum rate of the class, viz., $5,400. He received a statutory increase effective 1st October, 1939, raising his salary from $5,400 to $5,700 per annum, and a further increase effective 1st October, 1940, from $5,700 to $6,000 per annum, the maximum salary range of the position.

WAR EXCHANGE TAX ON IMPORTED FARM IMPLEMENTS

Mr. WEIR:

1. Has the Department of National Revenue any knowledge of any farm implement company adding the war exchange tax to its prices on farm implements imported and cleared through customs before this tax was applicable?

2. If such information is not available, will the department make the necessary inquiry to ascertain if such practice has been followed, and if it is found that such tax has been added, will the department take steps to, (a) secure such amounts as so added for the benefit of the treasury, (b) require such companies to reimburse the purchasers who may have been overcharged?

Mr. GIBSON:

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes.

2. (a) No information.

(b) We are requested by the British government not to divulge any information regarding war contracts placed by them in Canada.

7. Where was such machinery tested?

8. What is the cost per shell, according to size or type?

9. What is the lowest cost of such shell, or shells, manufactured in Canada for the government?

10. Could the plant turning out such shells at the lowest cost to the government have turned out an additional quantity of shells equal to the amount turned out in the Alberta plant, at such lesser price or even at a still lower price?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes, the Alberta Foundry and Machine Company Limited, Medicine Hat, Alberta.

2. 3·7″ shell—quantity 150,000—machining only.

3. As of March 20, 1942, shells delivered 81,937.

4. The government advanced no money for the building of the shell plant nor for the purpose of providing working capital. The government did provide capital assistance for: Alterations to buildings, $5,850; jigs, tools, dies and gauges, $7,158.75; machinery and equipment, $135,201.85; total $148,210.60.

Title to the above, except the alterations of $5,850, is vested in the Canadian government and may be removed at the government's discretion.

5. Answered by 4.

6. The greater part of the machinery was made in Canada by the John T. Hepburn Co., specialists in the manufacture of shell machinery. Smaller items were bought from the Williams Tool Company, Brantford; W. R. Perrin, Toronto; Gray Foundry and Forgings Company, Toronto; Standard Machine Tool, Windsor; and Hanson Van Winkle, Toronto.

7. All machinery was tested before it left the manufacturer's plant, and was subject to rigid performance specifications.

8. The cost of the shell has not yet been determined, being subject to a government audit which has not yet taken place.

[Mr. Power.]

9. One other contractor is operating on the same basis as the Alberta Foundry and Machine Company Limited, but no audit has been completed in this case.

10. It is possible other plants could turn out shell at a cost equal to that of the Alberta Foundry and Machine Company Limited. The head of this company machined shells in the last war and is a highly competent machine shop operator. The contract is a target price contract and the production is running considerably ahead of rated capacity.

Mr. POWER:

PLEBISCITE—CANADIAN FORCES

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. What arrangements are being made for the taking of the plebiscite among the eligible voters in the British West Indies, (a) in the army, (b) in the navy, (c) in the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. A special returning officer, a chief assistant, and two scrutineers have been appointed with regard to the taking, receiving and counting of votes cast by Canadian Service voters stationed in Jamaica, B.W.I., and they have been provided with a sufficient number of ballot papers, envelopes, and other necessary plebiscite supplies.

2. For service reasons, it is not in the public interest to indicate the numbers of Canadian soldiers, sailors and airmen in the area mentioned.

NATIONAL INCOME—PROPORTION TO PERSONS IN CERTAIN WAGE CLASSES

Mr. JACKMAN:

1. What was the national income for the years 1939, 1940 and 1941?

Mr. MacKINNON (Edmonton West):

1. Canada's national income was provisionally estimated for 1939 at $4,862 million, while the estimate for 1940 was about $5,400 million. The total for 1941 is not available.

INVENTORY OF PRODUCTION MACHINERY

Mr. BRUCE:

1. Has the government taken any steps towards having a complete inventory made of our entire production machinery?

2. If so, what steps have been taken in this regard?

3. If not, will this be done?

Mr. HOWE: Since the inception of the department, a reasonably complete survey has been made of Canada's production capacity, 3,122 surveys having been made. Of this number, resurveys have been made of 1,486 plants, 516 of these having been resurveyed by department engineers during the first three months of this year. In addition to this, a survey of production capacity involving 4,986 plants has been made by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Chambers of Commerce who have co-operated very fully with the Department. This combined information is now in charge of the Industry and Subcontract Coordination Branch. These files are in constant use and are continually being revised.

Small plants are urged to make sure that their facilities are on record with the Department. This can be accomplished by writing or telephoning to the nearest district office of the Industry and Subcontract Coordination Branch. These are located in Saint John, N.B., Montreal, Que., Toronto, Ont., Winnipeg, Man., and Vancouver, B.C.

CAPITAL ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY

Mr. O'BRIEN:

1. What is the total amount of capital assistance given by the Department of Munitions and Supply to, (a) private industry, (b) wholly owned government corporations, since war was declared?

3. What is the total volume of all orders given by the Department of Munitions and Supply to all Canadian industry?

4. What is the amount of all war orders given to private industry in the province of New Brunswick?

Mr. HOWE:

1. (a) $498,766,451; (b) $71,464,857; as at December 31, 1941, for United Kingdom account and January 31, 1942, for Canadian account.

2. (a) $1,135,172 as at dates given above. (b) There are no wholly-owned government corporations in New Brunswick.

3. $3,602,707,875 as at March 31, 1942.

4. It is impossible to give a breakdown by provinces that will properly reveal the extent to which each province is participating in war contracts. A contract placed with a firm in one province may require manufacture or purchase of component parts from firms in other provinces. Also, contracts may be placed with companies whose head offices and administration are in one province and whose factories for production are in one or more provinces.

PLEBISCITE—VOLUNTARY SERVICES

Mr. WARD:

1. Will volunteer workers be used in connection with the coming plebiscite?

2. If so, what method will be adopted to enlist such services?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. So far as may be possible, advantage will be taken of offers of voluntary services.

2. Subordinate plebiscite officers are nominated by two candidates of different and opposed political interests who received the highest and the next highest number of votes in the last general election. In some electoral districts services of volunteer workers have been recommended.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF PUBLIC OPINION

Mr. O'BRIEN:

2. If so, who are the incorporators and where is the head office?

3. Is any control exercised to determine that a truly diversified public opinion is obtained on public or allegedly public questions?

4. May such an organization privately conceive and inaugurate any such series of questions?

Mr. McLARTY:

1. There is no record of the grant of incorporation under the Companies Act (Canada) nor dominion statute to any organization under the name "Canadian Institute of Public Opinion."

2. Answered by 1.

3. Such an organization would be subject to dominion, provincial and municipal laws and regulations in force in each place where its operations are carried on.

4. Answered by 3.

NEW BRUNSWICK COAL DEPOSITS

Mr. O'BRIEN:

1. Has the government made any investigation regarding the coal deposits in the province of New Brunswick?

2. If so, what are the findings?

3. If not, will investigations be inaugurated in order to supplement Canada's fuel supply?

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. CRERAR:

1. Yes.

2. Published maps of the Geological Survey, Canada, show the areas in New Brunswick where the presence of coal is considered possible. Investigations of the survey from 1866 to present indicate the strong probability that workable coal in New Brunswick is restricted to a single seam (18 to 26 inches thick), the one already being mined. Results of a special investigation of the Grand Lake coalfield accompanied by geological maps of the field were published in 1926 and formed the basis of further detailed investigations by the provincial geologist of New Brunswick from 1935 to present. Because the workable coal is confined to a single seam within a nearly flat-lying thin surface rock formation, there are no outstanding problems of geology remaining to be solved that would further exploitation; nor has the government of New Brunswick made any requests for specific investigations upon which action has not been taken.

Systematic drilling is the main requirement as a preliminary to further production. By its use present producing companies have extended the workable areas and increased coal production in 1940 by 82 per cent over the average production for the past ten years.

The fuel laboratories of the Department of Mines and Resources have made many tests on New Brunswick coal. The results of this work demonstrated that New Brunswick coal could be materially improved by washing and sizing and that a substantial reduction in ash took place. It was also shown that not only could a good coke be prepared by utilizing a low temperature carbonization process but also that an excellent coke could be produced when the washed coal was processed in the Curran Knowles by-product coke ovens.

3. No investigations are presently contemplated during the fiscal year 1942-43.

WARTIME HOUSING—HULL, QUE., AND WELLAND, ONT.

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. Did wartime housing call for tenders in connection with the building of houses in Hull, Quebec?

2. If so, what firms submitted tenders?

3. What firms were awarded contracts in connection with the building of these houses?

4. Were tenders called in connection with the beautifying of the wartime housing plots in Welland, Ontario?

5. What will be the total cost of this work?

Mr. HOWE:

1. Yes, by advertisement in the Ottawa Evening Journal, the Ottawa Citizen, and the Daily Commercial News, on July 31 and August 1, 1941.

The following were also invited to tender by letter: Bertrand & Paquin, 5830 rue Chabot, Montreal; L. O. Trottier, 633 Bonaventure St., Trois Rivières, Que.; Ed. AIRCRAFT—CORRESPONDENCE WITH CURTISS-WRIGHT AEROPLANE AND MOTOR CORPORATION

Mr. HOMUTH (for Mr. Adamson) moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Curtiss-Wright Aeroplane and Motor Corporation and the Director of Aircraft Supply, the War Supply Board and the Department of National Defence, during the years 1938, 1939 and 1940, offering to manufacture aeroplanes and aeroplane products in Canada; also a copy of memoranda submitted to the Director of Aircraft Supply during December, 1939, in connection with the subject.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, the documents referred to in this motion are in my opinion privileged. They refer to an investigation made within the department as to certain aspects of this production. Nothing came of it, and no good purpose would be served by bringing down the correspondence. Communications between officers of the department are privileged in any event.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is a little late for the minister to be taking that attitude with respect to this motion. May I call his attention and that of the house to the fact that on May 22, 1940, this house unanimously passed this same motion, and the following motion, in identically the same words, without exception and without reservation, and the house ordered the production of these documents. They were not brought down, which is contempt of parliament.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not through yet. Surely I have the right to make my statement. I say that, not merely an utter refusal, but disobedience of an order of this house by any department for two years is contempt of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, no.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My language may be a little strong, but I say that on the face of it, it is contempt of parliament. I entirely disagree with the reasoning of the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe). There is nothing in this motion about interdepartmental correspondence, but there is a request for copies of all letters, telegrams, and other memoranda between the corporation and the Director of Aircraft Supply. These cannot be considered, in relation to public business, as privileged communications. I do submit to this house that we should and must have this information.

The same is true with respect to the following motion, No. 11 on the order paper, which also was passed as an order of this house on May 22, 1940, and to my surprise I find that the return to this order has never been brought down.

This sort of thing should cease. By no stretch of the imagination could the documents asked for be construed to be privileged documents or interdepartmental documents, although that principle has been carried quite a long way in this house in recent days. These two motions call for correspondence between corporations and government departments and this house has the right to that information and to have copies of the correspondence brought down.

Mr. HOWE: My hon. friend has been in the house longer than I, and he should know the rules of the house better than I do, so just why he needs to exercise his forensic abilities on this question I am not sure. As I understand it, orders of the house for the production of documents are subject to the reservation that the documents be not privileged documents or such that it would be against the public interest to bring them down.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. HOWE: I have examined the files, and I take the ground that these are not documents which should be produced in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The rule does not go to anything like the extent the minister has stated—absolutely not. If it were so, this parliament might just as well fold up so far as the production of correspondence is concerned. I am not prepared to take that position; I do not believe the country wants me to take that position, and I do not think the minister himself ought to take it.

Mr. COLDWELL: I want to support the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) in this matter. It has been said too frequently in this house that the production of documents or other information is not in the public interest. If it is not in the public interest to place these documents publicly before the house because of some matters contained in them, then, it seems to me, they should go to a committee of this house and be examined. It is intolerable that documents relating to the public business of this parliament should not be produced to some responsible committee or to the membership of this house. I warmly support the leader of the opposition in his protest. Too many questions asked here are being answered, "Not in the public interest".

In regard to this particular motion, I notice that the minister—and I am glad he did—changed his ground, admitting that this correspondence is not privileged in the sense that it is correspondence between departments of the government; because by no stretch of the imagination can the Curtiss-Wright Aeroplane and Motor Corporation be regarded as a department of the government, and I hope that the government has not become a department of the Curtiss-Wright Aeroplane and Motor Corporation. I cannot, therefore, see the force of that argument. I believe there should be some method by which such documents could be placed before a committee of this house if for some specific reason it is not in the public interest that they be tabled here. Documents relating to contracts between a corporation and the government ought surely to be subject to some supervision by parliament.

Mr. HOWE: I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but may I point out that no contract arose out of this correspondence. I reviewed this morning the correspondence with the Curtiss-Wright company. It deals with some matters relating to licence and the price of services. We did not purchase either the right to manufacture the motors or the licence; and it seemed to me quite obvious that to lay on the table the business of the Curtiss-Wright company, which never was consummated, would not be in the public interest.

Mr. HOMUTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HOWE: Where do you come in?

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

Mr. HOMUTH: No, it is not dropped. I want to protest against the answer of the minister. The very fact that these deals were not consummated is what brought about this question, because we want to know why they were not consummated or why something was not done about them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): There was the offer of war service which was not accepted by the government. Why?

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

AIRCRAFT—CORRESPONDENCE WITH UNITED AIRCRAFT CORPORATION AND SUBSIDIARIES

Mr. ADAMSON:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between officials of the United Aircraft Corporation or any of its subsidiaries in Canada, more particularly the Canadian Pratt and Whitney, and officials of the National Defence Department and the War Supply Board, during 1938 and 1939, in regard to the manufacture of aeroplanes aerial motors and other aeroplane products in Canada by the said companies.

Mr. HOWE: The same remarks apply to this motion.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What remarks?

Mr. HOWE: Let me proceed, if you please. The same remarks apply to this as to the former motion. A large part of the correspondence relates to business that has not been consummated and also to certain business that was consummated, which latter is a proper subject of investigation for the war expenditures committee. The war expenditures committee have full authority to investigate any expenditures for war purposes, but the correspondence in question is not such as can in the public interest be brought down in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wish to register the same dissent. Which set of reasons is applicable to the minister's position on this motion? He shifted his ground not less than three times in connection with the last. I have no desire to prolong the discussion or to hold up the house, but the very closing sentence of the minister's statement is an admission that there are at all events certain documents that should be brought down. If the government is going to take the position it has taken, it must assume the responsibility.

Mr. HOMUTH: On division.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped, on division.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

MOTION TO SET UP SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER BILL

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Bruce, Donnelly, Edwards, Fraser (Peterborough West), Lafontaine, Leger, McCulloch, Marier, Martin, Mitchell, Noseworthy, O'Brien, Reid, Shaw and Winkler be appointed to consider a bill intituled: "An act to assist in the carrying on and coordination of vocational training" and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the minister and the leader of the government that this motion is at least premature. If hon. gentlemen will turn to page 17 of the order paper it will be seen under order No. 8 that this measure has only reached the resolution stage preceding the introduction of the bill. To set up this committee, or to consider the notice of motion to set up such a committee, before the bill is actually before the house, is most unheard of. I do believe there is no precedent for it in the history of this parliament.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Perhaps my hon. friend did not hear, but when the motion was called I said "stand".

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Somebody called "stand", but the minister in charge indicated that he wished to proceed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): On a point of order I should like to inform my hon. friend that during this very session we passed a resolution setting up a special committee on land settlement, while the measure itself was still in the resolution stage.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I know that. That is a double reason why we should not go on with this motion to-day. There have been more things done in the name of expediency in this house under this government than in the whole of our previous history since confederation.

Mr. SPEAKER: Do I understand that the motion is to stand?

Mr. MITCHELL: Stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With regard to the question of setting up a committee to which a bill may be referred, I believe it is quite in accordance with the rules of the house that a committee should be set up at any time; then the existence of the committee makes it possible, once a bill is passed a certain stage, to have the bill referred to the committee at once.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is usually done after second reading.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That would be the case with some bills, but it might be done in the resolution stage, or at any time when the bill is before the house. The purpose of appointing a committee is to have something referred to it, and it really facilitates matters in the end to have a committee in existence, in a position to immediately receive any measure that may be referred to it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To me that seems to be putting the cart before the horse. Suppose the bill does not receive second reading?

Mr. CRERAR: Then it will not go to any committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then why have the committee? I am just looking at it from a logical point of view, though I do not suppose it makes very much difference one way or the other.

Motion stands.

VICHY REPRESENTATION

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENT POSITION FOLLOWING RECENT DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister what is the position of Canada with relation to the Vichy government, in view of recent developments.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say to my hon. friend that we have been in communication with the government of the United States and the government of Great Britain with respect to recent developments at Vichy, with a view to considering, in the light of opinions expressed to us, the course it would be most advisable to adopt with respect to the continued presence here of the French minister. I have not thus far received all the information which would enable me definitely to reply to my hon. friend's question, but I assure him that the matter is being considered in the light of what will prove of greatest service to all the governments I have mentioned.

THE PLEBISCITE

ARRANGEMENTS TO PERMIT VOTING BY MEMBERS AWAY FROM HOME

On the orders of the day:

Mr. KARL K. HOMUTH (Waterloo South): During an earlier discussion this afternoon the leader of the social credit group asked the Prime Minister a question, to which no reply was made. Might I ask the Prime Minister now if some arrangement cannot be made whereby those hon. members who are unable to get home for the plebiscite vote may be permitted to vote in the city of Ottawa, in view of the fact that they have really established residence here?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I understand that the Secretary of State has been going into the matter, and I believe he intended informing the house to-morrow that arrangements would be made to have a polling booth established somewhere near the front entrance of this building.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I think perhaps I might add one word to that. At the moment the matter is purely tentative, but we are endeavouring to work out some arrangement that will facilitate voting by members of this and the other house.

Mr. ROBERT FAIR (Battle River): I was going to suggest that it might be interesting if we could have a recorded vote right here, to indicate how hon. members will vote on this very interesting question.

BEEF

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BEING TAKEN TO RELIEVE SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, arising out of the shortage of beef in the butcher shops throughout Canada. Will the minister tell the house what is being done by his department to relieve that shortage?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The matter is under consideration, and possibly I will be in a position to make a statement in a day or two.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

On the order:

Second reading of Bill No. 56, An act to make provision with respect to insurance of property against war risks and the payment of compensation for war damage.—The Minister of Finance.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): In the communication which I received this morning from a member of the ministry this order was given as No. 3 on the list. I assumed that we would go on first with the notice of motion in the name of the Minister of Labour, which has been referred to, and then with order No. 4, concerning the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service, which has been on the order paper for a long time. I may tell the Prime Minister that I have had a great deal of difficulty in studying Bill No. 56, which of course is of a very technical character. I understand it is to be sent to the banking and commerce committee, where of course it will receive intensive study; but I should prefer that we do not proceed with this business to-day, unless there is some reason that has not as yet been indicated. It will be recalled that this was one of the matters to which the Minister of Finance referred when he said it was desirable that they should be advanced a stage before the Easter recess, because of certain specific reasons he had then in mind. But I did not know it would be coming on to-day, and I suggest that if possible it would be advisable to adhere to the programme which was intimated to me.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): It is quite all right to let it stand for the moment, but could I have it understood that it will be proceeded with promptly? I should not like it to stand for a number of days, because it is rather urgent that we get ahead with it. Mr. Leonard, who was of great assistance in the drafting of the bill, is coming here to-night; and if we could go on with it to-morrow or the next day it would be very much better than if the matter were to stand further. It has stood for a long time now, and I made a statement on it before the Easter recess in order that hon. members might become familiar with the matter, and also more particularly so that the public would understand what the government had in view. Now I should like to get it to the banking and commerce committee at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, perhaps we can take it up to-morrow.

Order stands.

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

REINSTATEMENT IN CIVIL EMPLOYMENT OF PERSONS WHO ENLIST IN HIS MAJESTY'S FORCES—REFERENCE TO CANTEEN FUNDS COMMITTEE

On the order:

House again in committee of the whole on Bill No. 5, an act to provide for the reinstatement in civil employment of individuals who enlist for service in His Majesty's forces or who perform essential war employment.—The Minister of Labour.

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): I desire to move:

That the order referring Bill No. 5 to the committee of the whole be discharged, and that the said bill be referred to the special committee set up to deal with the disposition of canteen funds.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before this motion passes I suggest that in justice to hon. members who took part in the discussion on previous occasions when the bill was before the house we should have some explanation from the minister with respect to the present motion. I have not before me the dates on which the bill was debated, but it is my recollection that it was the subject of a long discussion. Various aspects of the bill were considered, and many constructive suggestions were made to members of the ministry having charge of the measure. A considerable amount of redrafting was to be done to meet the suggestions made.

During the recess a number of discharged men came to see me, and I was forced to tell them that this legislation and the order in council it follows date back only to July 1, 1941, thereby leaving out a substantial number of discharged ex-service men. Before the motion passes I suggest the minister should give the house a statement of reasons for the present move, and he should explain the import of the motion. Is it to take away free discussion on the floor of the house?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) will recollect that many suggestions were made, and notes respecting those suggestions were taken by the government. There was the suggestion that the matter should be referred to some committee. In view of that suggestion the government felt that the discussion would be expedited if the matter were sent to a committee on which returned soldiers were serving. When the subject returns to the house there will be no objection to the freest discussion hon. members may think necessary or expedient.

Mr. GREEN: I take it there will be several amendments to the bill as it was presented to the house.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: Many hon. members who are not on the special committee to which it is being referred took part in the discussion on the bill. Under these circumstances would it not be well for the government within the next day or so to provide each member with a copy of the bill as it is to be amended, so that they may know what is proposed?

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised to hear any opposition to the resolution of my colleague.

Mr. GREEN: I was not opposing it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I know that; but I thought the leader of the opposition was inclined to oppose it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I wanted an explanation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If hon. members will read the debate which took place in committee of the whole before the recess he will find that the request was practically unanimous, from every party, to have this particular measure referred to a special committee of the house. One reason for proceeding in this way is to meet the request of hon. members opposite.

The other reason is that for years past a practice has grown up in the house of referring to a special committee all matters affecting ex-service men. All the amendments suggested in the debate can be considered carefully by the very able committee already set up to deal with the question of canteen funds. That committee in due course can make its report to the house, and the matter could then be further considered. Surely that is a fair suggestion, and one which will expedite the progress of the measure and the proceedings of the house.

As was mentioned by the Minister of Labour, and without any specific allocation as to personnel, the committee is composed exclusively of ex-service men of the great war and members serving in the present one.

Mr. CASSELMAN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There was one exception; I do not know how it happened, and I have taken steps to have it corrected. It was the fault of the whips, no doubt.

Mr. CASSELMAN: No.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Surely men who served in the great war and who are serving in the present one can give this measure the very best consideration. They will have the benefit of the debate which took place on two or three occasions in committee of the whole house.

Mr. GREEN: Is the government in a position to state what amendments are proposed?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That will come up before the committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not objecting to referring this bill to a committee. When it was before the house it appeared to be very unsatisfactory, and it was quite apparent that the matter should be referred to a committee. It seems strange, however, that it should be referred to the committee appointed to investigate canteen funds rather than to the reconstruction committee. It is true that returned men are serving on the canteen funds committee, but this measure has to do with after-war rehabilitation and reconstruction, and in my opinion it should be referred to the committee set up for that purpose. If we are to deal with matters of reconstruction and rehabilitation in a piecemeal manner, obviously there will be no order or coordination in our reconstruction programme.

Mr. MITCHELL: I see no objection to its going to either committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why is it going to the canteen committee?

Mr. MITCHELL: The members on the canteen committee are men returned from the last war, or engaged in this one. I see no objection to dividing the work. This matter more or less stands on its own feet. Personally I can see no objection to using both committees, so long as the hon. members doing the work have some knowledge of the conditions confronting returned soldiers, and particularly the conditions which confronted them after the last war.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): My understanding is that this order is to be discharged and the bill is to go to a special committee. In this instance it is to be sent to the canteen fund committee, although it would seem logical to send it to the committee on rehabilitation. I do not believe however that there will be much difficulty about that, nor do I think that one committee would not be as satisfactory as the other. It is my understanding that the bill was last before the house on March 9. It received second reading and was considered in committee of the whole. A certain number of sections were passed and others were allowed to stand. I have no great objection to the course indicated by the minister, so long as there is an understanding that there will be an opportunity to discuss the report of the committee.

There is one aspect of the matter however to which I suggest the minister should give careful attention. I refer to the suggestion already made that the proposed amendments should be printed and distributed to members of the house who have taken a substantial interest in the matter. It seems to me I had some correspondence with one of the ministers respecting proposed amendments, and I concurred in most of them. We all want to do a job here to the best of our ability limited though it is. Having now understood the position, I am not going to oppose this motion.

Motion agreed to.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the promotion of vocational training projects, the entering into financial assistance agreements with the provinces in connection therewith, the appointment of a vocational training advisory council and of such officers, clerks and other employees necessary for the administration of the act.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): As this is somewhat of a new matter, I suggest that before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, the minister at least should outline to the house what the government's proposals are.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): According to a previous decision of the present year, that cannot be done.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps that is so, but I do not recall the decision to which the minister is referring. It does seem to me that we ought to know the government's policy with regard to this important matter at some early stage before the resolution passes. Perhaps the minister will do this in committee.

Mr. MITCHELL: In committee.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That will be good enough.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Fournier (Hull) in the chair.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not quite hear what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) suggested just now, but I understand it has been suggested that it is not possible to make a statement on this resolution. The resolution is important and I think we should be given some understanding of what is involved.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I referred to a previous ruling of Mr. Speaker to the effect that the merits or demerits of a bill cannot be discussed on the motion to go into committee. Of course all kinds of questions can be asked in committee, and with the indulgence of the chairman and of the committee, the minister could make a full statement on the merits.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What I suggested was that on making this substantive motion, the Minister of Labour should make a general statement of the government's policy. I cannot understand any other procedure being followed that would be logical.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do I understand that we cannot discuss the principle of the resolution on the motion that Mr. Speaker do leave the chair? It has always been the custom here to do that, and I am greatly surprised to learn that a decision otherwise was made this year. If we cannot discuss the matter, what is the sense in making the motion?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Discuss it now.

Mr. MacINNIS: The Speaker has left the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It should be done before the Speaker leaves the chair.

Mr. STIRLING: I rise to a point of order and a question of privilege. Apparently a new doctrine has been accepted in this house that the first stage of debate on a resolution should be ruled out. In years past tremendous debates have taken place on resolutions when they were first presented to the house by Mr. Speaker. For us to be told that Mr. Speaker should leave the chair so that the house may go into committee for this reason or that, or to have some profound statement, or for some other reason, seems to me to be entirely different from what we have been accustomed to in this house. I can remember when the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie) sat on this side of the house and the very skies shook with the debates as to the logic or illogic of the position taken by the government of the day in connection with certain resolutions. Because Canada is at war this opposition has kindly consented again and again to forego its right so as to facilitate the business of the house. Now we are actually told that some impediment stands in the way of discussion on the first stage of a resolution. Surely that is not right.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): At this stage of the proceedings there is a definite resolution before the chair and it is now open for study and discussion. I do not think that what has been discussed up to now is relevant to the resolution; it should have been brought up while Mr. Speaker was in the chair. The chairman has no authority at this stage to decide as to what should have taken place before the house resolved itself into committee. At this stage discussion is open to all members, and I understand there is to be a statement by the minister concerning the principle of the resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of order, Mr. Chairman, perhaps at this stage of the proceedings you are technically right, but my colleague has been trying to voice a matter of privilege and protest against the suggestion that on the resolution stage, while the Speaker is still in the chair, we cannot discuss the principle of the resolution. If that is the ruling of this house, let us get it changed at the earliest possible moment. I have great respect for Mr. Speaker, but if he has made an ill-considered decision on that point, let us get to work at once and revise the decision. I have been here quite a long time and I have seen many of these money resolutions brought in. I have never even heard it suggested that you could not discuss the principle of the proposals underlying a government motion, especially when it was a money bill. Let us retrace our steps if it is necessary to do so in order that a hard fought for privilege may not be taken away from the people's representatives. There is a great deal underlying this whole matter, much more than applies just to this resolution now before the house.

Mr. COLDWELL (Rosetown Biggar): Was such a ruling ever made?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I do not recall that it was, but I do not like to question the veracity of anyone because I do not have it under my hand. I should be astonished if there was such a ruling; if there was, I do not understand how it would have escaped me. I know that things sometimes get by me, but if I let that get by me I shall not forgive myself very soon.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the Minister of Pensions and National Health was quite in error about the ruling. As a matter of fact, the ruling was the exact opposite to what the minister said. The point was raised by the Prime Minister on February 22 and the Speaker gave his ruling after the dinner recess, to be found on page 800 of Hansard. He said:

> The next question is that raised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who quoted standing order 60 and submitted that the resolution before the house is not debatable. With this standing order, however, must be read standing order 38, which provides, inter alia:
> "(1) The following motions are debatable:
> Every motion
> (a) standing on the order of proceedings for the day."
> The resolution is on the order of proceedings for the day. I would point out that standing order 60 was passed in 1867, while standing order 38 was passed on March 22, 1927. In other words, standing order 38 is remedial to standing order 60, and I must conclude that standing order 38 must rule, and decide that the resolution before the house is debatable.

This resolution is similar in character. We are told it is not debatable now.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) will see that the ruling he has referred to bears out the construction I have placed upon it. The construction of Mr. Speaker was that whereas you could debate the principle of a resolution, you could not debate the merits or demerits or the details of a measure until you reach the measure.

Mr. MacINNIS: Can you read that into Mr. Speaker's statement?

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): I cannot see the usefulness of this discussion. We are now in committee of the whole on the resolution. The matter now being discussed should have been brought up while Mr. Speaker was in the chair.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I did bring it up, but hon. gentlemen opposite would not listen to me.

The ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fournier, Hull): This point should have been raised before the motion that Mr. Speaker leave the chair was put and carried. I would ask hon. members now to proceed.

Mr. MacINNIS: The last words which the Speaker used on that occasion were:

> In my judgment the debate should be general, with no reference to details, all of which can be discussed in committee, and on the bill which follows the resolution.

But the principle of the resolution is subject to debate at this time. There are no clauses before us, and consequently the debate must be general. It cannot be in detail because there are no details to discuss.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not believe there is any difference between my hon. friend and myself. If he will read the preceding paragraph he will find that the Speaker said:

> The debate, therefore, must be directed to the negative of that motion, that the resolution should not be submitted to the committee of the whole, for, as I have poined out, no amendment at this stage can be in order.

The motion being that the resolution should be submitted to the committee of the whole and the negative that it should not be, Mr. Speaker says that the debate must therefore be directed to the negative of the motion, that the resolution should not be submitted to committee of the whole.

Mr. MacINNIS: In my judgment, and I believe in the judgment of the Speaker, the debate should be general, with no reference to the details; for, as he says, all these details can be discussed in committee and on the bill which follows the resolution. If we cannot discuss the principle of the resolution, what in the world can we discuss on going into committee?

Mr. CRERAR: I hesitate to project myself into this discussion, but I believe there is some misunderstanding. The point taken by the leader of the opposition and by the member for Vancouver East is not disputed on this side of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then I misunderstood.

Mr. CRERAR: Let me proceed. The resolution before us reads:

> That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide for the promotion of vocational training projects, the entering into financial assistance agreements with the provinces in connection therewith, the appointment of a vocational training advisory council and of such officers, clerks and other employees necessary for the administration of this act.

If there had been any differences of opinion in the house on the principle of this measure, then I would say certainly that the principle should have been the subject of debate with Mr. Speaker in the chair. The practice has developed in this house of perhaps too much discussion of details on many resolutions, and that is the practice to which exception was taken on the occasion referred to by the hon. member for Vancouver East. But as I understand it, no exception is taken to the principle of this resolution. While it would have been quite proper to discuss the resolution with Mr. Speaker in the chair, business is expedited, in view of the fact that there is general acceptance of the principle, by going into committee upon it where it can be discussed in more detail. That discussion would have to take place in any event. I can assure the leader of the opposition and other hon. members on both sides of the house as well that the last thing the government would think of doing would be to take away any of the privileges of discussion of hon. members on the principle of a resolution. I hasten to give hon. members that assurance. But as no exception is taken to the general principle of this resolution I see no reason why the minister in charge should not proceed to make his statement now. Then we can have a general discussion.

Mr. COLDWELL: How can we possibly know what the principle of the bill is if the minister does not make his statement when we are about to deal with the principle?

Mr. CRERAR: I quite agree, but my hon. friend should have raised that point when the motion was made, before the house resolved itself into committee of the whole.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That brings us back to where we started. When this item was called the minister rose and read rather hurriedly a long resolution which I had never seen before, not having been favoured with a copy of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: That was the other resolution.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps I am wrong. I take that back. When this item was called I thought that was the proper time for the minister to make his statement to the house of the principles upon which the government proposed to proceed, and I invited him to do so immediately. For no reason that I can see at all, except to be very technical, the Minister of Pensions and National Health said that that would be out of order, and I allowed myself to be dissuaded. If the minister who is leading the house wants to regularize this thing, he can move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day, and then begin de novo and have the minister make his statement with the Speaker in the chair. When we understand what the government's proposals are, debate may ensue upon them. I do not say that it will. But to say that because we allowed the motion to pass without any debate we therefore approved the principle is just too thin for anything. I am all in favour of vocational training, but I want to know what the government's proposals are at their initiation. That is when the minister's statement should have been made, ruling or no ruling.

Mr. CRERAR: The motion was made in the regular way to refer the resolution to committee of the whole and was adopted by the house. We are now in committee of the whole, and I do not think we should reverse our procedure. There can be no objection that I can see to the minister in charge of the legislation going ahead and giving the explanation he would have given with Mr. Speaker in the chair. The objection should have been raised on the motion to go into committee. But to reverse our procedure now —I am not sure of the steps that would have to be taken—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It is no trouble at all to do that.

Mr. CRERAR: We are in committee and we cannot get out of it.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): You can move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Mr. CRERAR: But we cannot debate the principle of the resolution once it has been sent to a committee. We cannot send it back to the house to have the principle discussed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The house can rescind anything it has done. As a matter of fact, the whole thing was railroaded through before the house knew what was going on.

Mr. CRERAR: I take decided objection to that reflection on the house by the leader of the opposition. It was not railroaded through, and there was no desire to railroad it through. There is not going to be any lack of opportunity of discussion, and I cannot see anything that is sacrificed by letting the minister make his statement now in committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: Would it be in order for him to make it now?

Mr. CRERAR: Quite in order.

Mr. MacNICOL: He would be more in order if the Speaker were in the chair.

Mr. CRERAR: If it were a resolution upon which there was wide divergence of opinion, and there was definite opposition to the principle, I think the objection raised would be pertinent. But there is no such divergence of opinion, and I repeat that there was no railroading of the resolution into committee of the whole house. It was open to any hon. member to object to the passing of the resolution to put the house into committee of the whole to consider it. It never occurred to me that any objection would be taken, and so far as establishing any precedent is concerned, I say here and now that no precedent is established. I can recall occasions in the past when the same thing has been done. The house is not sacrificing any of its privileges or its rights, as the leader of the opposition suggested in the remarks he made a little while ago.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am satisfied if no precedent is established. The matter was dealt with so quickly; the leader of the opposition spoke in a low voice and was replied to in a low voice, and I did not hear what was said. But I did hear the minister of pensions make a statement and say that this was not the place, and then I rose to ask what was going on. But if it is understood that no precedent is established—

Mr. CRERAR: None whatever.

Mr. COLDWELL: —and that the minister of pensions may be said to have given us information which we are not to regard as being authentic and correct, as far as we are concerned I am willing to let the matter go.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But not to happen again.

Mr. NEILL: I am pleased to see that at last the opposition has awakened to the rapid disintegration of the privileges of private members on this side of the house. It has been going on for years, but they do not appear to have caught on to this until just now. I have been wondering when they would draw the line. They have drawn it on what is perhaps a comparatively minor matter which might be got around in a way that I will suggest. Last November we sat here for eight days and debated something with the distinct understanding and instructions that we were not to do anything. we were not to propose anything. This session I saw a lady member, whose constituency I have forgotten, bluffed out of her right just as cold-bloodedly as I have ever seen anything done. A year ago we spent a whole day debating something. It was a very intricate bill, quite a proper subject of debate. At ten minutes to six the minister who was then leading the house got up and complained that we were interfering with the progress of the war and he wanted the said bill to go to the senate which had been waiting all day for it, although the senate did not sit until eight o'clock that evening. This sort of thing has been going on all the time, and sooner or later it has got to come to a showdown. The practice has been pursued gradually, bit by bit, little by little, of taking away our privileges. The privilege of moving resolutions has been taken away from us, and we dare not protest at all, or somebody points the finger of scorn at us and says that we are trying to hold up the prosecution of the war. In regard to all proposals similar to the one we are now discussing, ministers have crept into the way of saying, "Don't hold up the progress of the war; let the bill go to committee, where we can explain it very much better", and when we get into committee the chairman—quite properly—enforces the rules, which say that in committee we can only discuss the bill section by section, and we cannot discuss the principle of the bill. That is the sort of thing which has been going on all the time. The hon. gentleman who at this moment is leading the house (Mr. Crerar), speaking with his proverbial air of innocence, says that he would not do anything nor think of doing anything to interfere with our privileges. The fact is, however, that we as private members have been doing nothing but lose our privileges for months and years.

We are in committee now, as the chairman says, and the point has been raised by an hon. member that we cannot now revert to the second reading. I suggest that we go on in committee and that we now ask the minister to make the statement which he should have made originally, upon the understanding that we have defended and defined our rights, and that this will not occur agian.

Mr. BLACK (Yukon): The matter is now before the committee of the whole house. As I see it, there is no doubt that the motion to refer that resolution to the committee could have been debated, under standing order 50, referring to a motion to refer a bill to the committee of the whole. According to citation 427:

> This motion is not debatable under S.O. 38 unless it be an order of the day.

This is an order of the day, and it is therefore debatable. But the house allowed the matter to go through without debate, and if the government is willing to let the matter be discussed in committee I cannot see any object in having the chairman report progress, followed by another motion that the resolution be referred to the committee of the whole house.

Mr. BOUCHER: While that may be so, and we may get the information in the manner which has been suggested, the fact is, as the acting leader of the government has stated to the house this afternoon, that when the resolution is brought in, the principle should be discussed. That is quite clear. Then, he says, this resolution having been brought in, the principle not having been discussed, we, being in committee of the whole, can do now what we should have done then. How can a person discuss the principle of a bill before that principle has been enunciated to the house? It is impossible, and, in the interests of every individual member, I say that if there is a way of reverting to the point at which the motion to go into committee was made and passed—erroneously, I submit, because of the false position taken by the Minister of Pensions and National Health, leading hon. members to believe that we could not discuss it then—I believe that the house should be big enough to undo its error.

Consider, for example, the situation where a bill is brought in to establish a bird sanctuary. What does the house know about the principle of the bill until the minister states how and where he wants to establish the sanctuary and what sort of sanctuary he wants to establish? Would it not be preposterous to require this house to pass a resolution with the mere title of a bill before them, before they know anything about what it contains or what its principles are? I do not agree that parliament, even in these days of strain, should be expected to discuss bills of this kind before they know anything about them. I contend, in the interests of the private member, that if there is any possible way of reverting to the resolution stage we should now revert to it, if only to keep the record clear and to maintain the rights of the private member which have been established and recognized in this house.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to support the suggestion made a few moments ago by the leader of the opposition, that the government permit the committee to rise and report progress and ask leave to sit again, and that the motion to go into committee be debated, and that the minister give an outline of what his proposals are. I was very much surprised to see how quickly the motion passed that Mr. Speaker leave the chair. I had intended to say something on this subject, but apparently discussion will not be allowed in the committee except on the clauses as they are put forward. Therefore I recommend that the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition a few moments ago be acceded to by the government.

Mr. MITCHELL: If there is no objection, I will proceed with my statement. I regret very much that these technicalities have arisen. Hon. members may rest assured that I would have been quite willing to make a statement before the resolution reached committee. I think the most important thing is to get on with the work, and as a precedent is not established—as recognized by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—I suppose no ill effect will have resulted.

The bill to be based upon the resolution is really a continuance or extension of the Youth Training Act which was sponsored by the late Minister of Labour, the Hon. Norman Rogers, and which set in motion the youth training plan of that day. From its inception until 1941, three hundred thousand persons have received training under that legislation. The act expired on March 31 of this year. The intent of the new bill is not only to maintain that system of training in which the provinces and the municipalities cooperate to the fullest extent, but also to extend its scope so as to make provision for a number of additional training schemes. The war emergency training programme must be carried on. It is fair to say that the groundwork laid by the youth training plan made possible the quick and extended war emergency training programme that exists at the present time. It might fairly be said of the late Minister of Labour that he planned better than he knew, with the result that at the outbreak of the war we had perfect cooperation between the federal government and the provincial governments and municipalities in order to set in motion an enormously extended programme that made possible the training of men and women for war industries as they exist to-day.

Mr. MacNICOL: Was that before the war?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am referring to 1937.

Mr. MacNICOL: At that time there existed an unemployment condition which we have not got to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL: But we laid the foundation of a training programme, and had it not been for what was done prior to the war, as those of us know who have had experience in launching programmes of this kind, it would have taken very much longer to set in motion the war emergency programme which has assisted so greatly in manning the war industries of the country. Moveover, it has rendered very considerable assistance to the Royal Canadian Air Force, the navy, and the armed forces.

The purpose of the bill is so that the cooperation with the provinces and municipalities shall be carried on and largely extended as the need arises, with the inevitable expansion of war industry. It will provide training facilities for such unemployed workers as may require training under the terms of the Unemployment Insurance Act. That act provides for the training of unemployed workers and it is the intention that the machinery set up thereunder, and the training facilities, shall be made use of. That responsibility will be assumed for the unemployment insurance commission. Provision will also be made for vocational training for persons discharged from the armed forces in the present war, and in the post-war period the foundation will be laid and provision will be made for the training of returned men as they come back from overseas—that is, those who require training. In the last war, I may say frankly, a magnificent job was done without any previous experience in the training of men returning from overseas. I have a vivid recollection of having a number of trainees working under me at that time, and at the conclusion of training they all found employment with the firm with which I was working.

The framework of the bill allows of projects being undertaken either directly by the dominion or to be carried on by agreement with the provinces. At the present time, in some instances, the cost of the training programme is shared fifty-fifty by the federal government and the provinces, and in other instances the cost of equipment is shared on an equal basis. In still other instances the cost is paid wholly by the dominion. In connection with preliminary training for the Royal Canadian Air Force, the navy and the army, the whole cost is borne by the government.

No specific sum will be mentioned in the bill because of the uncertainties of the situation and the conditions that confront us. Estimates will have to be introduced every year for the purpose of carrying out training under the bill. As I have pointed out, inasmuch as training for the army, the air force and the navy is primarily the responsibility of the dominion, that is assumed in toto by the dominion. I think a great deal of credit is due to the provinces and the municipalities for the assistance rendered the dominion not only prior to the outbreak of war but since then. They have placed at the disposal of the government technical schools which in some cases have been operating on a twenty-four hour basis, and they have also provided teachers and teaching staffs. I need hardly tell hon. members that the dominion had not the facilities for creating immediately an organization of this kind. We have had that decentralization which in the final analysis is sometimes the best form of government when it is closest to the people.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I say to the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) that the contribution made by his province to the war emergency training programme has been a grand one, the equal of any other in the dominion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It will always be that way.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think I have covered in brief the basis of the act. The committee can rest assured that after the bill goes to the special committee, if there are any suggestions which hon. members desire to make, provided they are sound from the point of view of the government, such suggestions will receive every consideration when we are dealing with this most important problem.

Mr. GREEN: Does it cover training both for men in the forces and those in industries, as well as post-war training?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. GREEN: It covers all training?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: I will not oppose the objective which the minister has in mind, but I must say I am a little at sea as to the method. The minister referred to the bill introduced a few years ago by one of his predecessors, the late Hon. Norman Rogers. I supported the bill at that time, but that bill was predicated on a great unemployment condition that prevailed then, and it was for the purpose, as the minister has pointed out, of training young men in vocations that would fit them to take their place in producing munitions or any other equipment that would be required either in peace or in war. That however was a time of depression. Now, apart from one remark which the minister made with regard to the purpose of the bill, to the effect that it would take care of those now returning, I do not see what else it will do. With that part of the bill I would be in hearty accord, because there are a great number of young men now returning from overseas, who, before they enlisted, were wholly untrained, not having had the opportunity to train for anything, having lived their youth in a period of unemployment. If therefore the bill does cover those young men coming back I am all for it.

But we have now, under the Department of National Defence—I am not sure whether I have the right department—fine schools at London, Galt and Hamilton. I have been in all of them. In these schools young men are being trained to do all the necessary work in connection with aeroplanes, engines and machines of one kind or another. I should like to know if this bill will have anything to do with these schools that are now operating, apparently under the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston). At London there are perhaps a thousand young men who are being well trained. I was greatly impressed by that school being operated by the Department of National Defence in training young men for work in the army in connection with machines. This bill will not cover that work, because it is under the Department of National Defence. The same would apply to the Galt school, which is well operated, and also to the Hamilton school. So I am wondering just what is the scope of this bill, apart from providing for the young men who are now returning from overseas, who did not have training.

Mr. MITCHELL: I would point out that the Galt school is what is called a pre-enlistment school for the air force. Between April 1 and December 31 there were enlisted in the pre-enlistment classes for the air force some 10,113 men. They receive the preliminary training, the ground work, which my hon. friend understands as well as I do. In connection with the army and navy there have been 15,343 individuals enrolled in the various pre-enlistment schools in the several provinces.

Mr. MacNICOL: In London they are already enlisted.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is different; I am talking about pre-enlistment training.

Mr. MacNICOL: And in Hamilton they are already enlisted.

Mr. MITCHELL: In addition, some 4,200 have been trained for other vocations in the pre-enlistment training schools; in the main that is before they reach the age of enlistment.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What is the age limit in connection with pre-enlistment? I have in mind that under the government's policy with respect to man-power, as announced by the Prime Minister in this house and to some extent elaborated by the Minister of Labour himself, nobody dares hire one of these men. In other words, the government, instead of taking the bull by the horns and making a direct approach toward getting men in the army, are resorting to the worst back-door methods this country has ever witnessed in order to drive men into the army for compulsory service. Last week a woman, whose husband was ill, came to see me. She had a son eighteen years of age, who was the only support of her family, and he was being refused employment in New Brunswick under the provisions of the government's man-power policy. I have heard of some of the worst cases on record of men now in the army, enlisted for home service, who cannot get a furlough to go home and see their families unless they will sign up for overseas service. The whole thing is so disgraceful as to call for an explanation on the part of the minister. We had the words of the Prime Minister in announcing his man-power policy, establishing the indirect route toward military service. Never was there a more cowardly statement of policy in this House of Commons than that statement of man-power policy qua the war effort of this country. It was an absolute refusal to meet the situation by the direct route and a plain statement, after one analysed it, of the indirect approach in order to do something which the government had not the backbone to do directly.

That is the situation in a nutshell; yet the minister says this measure is to take young men in and give them vocational training. The minister knows that under the policy of his government these young men cannot get vocational training unless they enlist for overseas service. That may not be according to the letter of the law, but that is the spirit of the policy of the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I rise to a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh, I thought we would have some mention of some technicality.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The leader of the opposition a few moments ago, in referring to the Prime Minister's statement, said it was a cowardly statement. I refer you, sir, to page 97 of Beauchesne, citation 298, in which that is described as an unparliamentary term, and it should be withdrawn.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If that statement is too harsh I shall withdraw it and use something else. Pusillanimous is a good word; you could use either one, but the public understand what is going on to-day. The public are now beginning to understand the effect of the government's policy with respect to this question of man-power. Then, in connection with vocational training, how many men will get vocational training under this proposed measure unless they sign up for overseas service? I put that question to the minister; he knows.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not know.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He knows in the bottom of his heart that none of them will get vocational training if they are fit to go into the army and have arrived at that stage. In other words, the young men of this country have been told, "Enlist for overseas service or you starve. You cannot get a job and you will not get vocational training."

I am not objecting to the principle of vocational training; I am going to have something more to say about that in a moment. I want to know what the minister means by his statement in connection with the setting up of a vocational training advisory council. What are to be the functions of that council? Who are to compose it? I think he should give us that information. Are they to be a new set of paid public servants in the country? We have the spectacle of the Department of Finance, I think it is, sending Mr. McGregor, the trust buster, all over this country hiring young lawyers here, there and everywhere, paying them $4,000 a year to become public prosecutors in connection with the price control policy. Parliament never authorized that. Did we think we were going to have an army of young lawyers, who ought to be in the army themselves, going round prosecuting farmers, perhaps, because they sold maple syrup at a little more than the price level fixed by the board?

Mr. ILSLEY: If I may ask a question, does the hon. gentleman think the maximum price regulation order should not be enforced?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, and I did not say anything of the sort. But who gave Mr. McGregor authority to go to Montreal and appoint a young lawyer at a salary of $4,000? Who gave him authority to go to Brockville and appoint another young lawyer at a salary of $4,000, to act as public prosecutor? Parliament knows nothing about it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just a moment; those questions can be answered. The young lawyers who were appointed at less than $5,000 a year were appointed by the civil service commission pursuant to an order in council which was passed establishing the price ceiling policy, and that order in council was passed legally under the War Measures Act. I can assure my hon. friend that everything that has been done has been authorized and carried out under legislation. Some of it may have been done under the War Measures Act, but that is what the War Measures Act is for. I would ask my hon. friend not to make these sneering statements discrediting a great policy unless he goes more fully into it than he has by these collateral attacks. It is all very well to make these attacks during the discussion of a measure such as this, when his statements are not at all in order. It is all very well for him to make these glancing attacks against important policies. But I would ask him just to leave the discussion of this price ceiling policy to the proper time. It can be debated and will be debated fully in this house. In the meantime I implore him not to make attacks of that kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I was not attacking the policy.

Mr. ILSLEY: But you are destroying the policy.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Oh no, I am not destroying the policy. But if you do not look out, the policy will destroy itself.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, there you are again.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think hon. members have been most restrained in discussing this question, as I know I have. There have been injustices and inequalities perpetrated under the plea that we must avoid inflation, and we have refrained from advocating anything that would do harm to the objective. We have had a hit-or-miss, hit-and-run, trial-and-error system in regard to this matter. That is what it has been. We had the spectacle of the head of the price control board going to the country and telling the people—

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order I suggest that the discussion of the price ceiling policy is not in order at this time.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): All right; I accept that. Technically and legally the minister is quite right, and I shall reserve anything further I have to say to another time. Probably I have said all I want to say at the moment, anyway.

I now invite the minister to tell us what he proposes to do with respect to young men for vocational training who are eligible for military enlistment. Are they to be given vocational training before they actually sign up, and will they be compelled to sign up for overseas service in the active army?

Mr. MITCHELL: I can say this, that I served in the last war. If I were physically fit, and of age, I think I would sign up; I would join the armed forces to-day. I would not run to a war industry, or anywhere else, to dodge my obligations. But I would say that under the government's policy there is nothing saying that these young men cannot get jobs in war industries. The only thing denied them is a job in a non-essential industry.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Who is to say what that is?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. MITCHELL: That is generally understood.

Mr. MacINNIS: Can they get a job in a war industry, unless they have a certificate of rejection from some branch of the armed forces?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have not heard anything about that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No; they cannot get a job.

Mr. MacNICOL: I do not believe they can. A young man came to me only two or three days ago. He told me he was in his eighteenth year, and implored me to assist him in getting a position in a munitions plant. I said to him, "Why can you not get a position there? They are taking on a great many men." He replied that when he went to the plant he was told that unless he had a certificate from the military authorities permitting him to accept a position, he could not have a position.

Mr. MacINNIS: I quite agree with the point raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), in regard to the government's instituting conscription by the back-door. The condition applies particularly to men between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one, but it actually includes men between seventeen and forty-five. The order calling up men between the ages of twenty-one and thirty for service in Canada provides that they will not be called until they have reached their twenty-first birthday. This means that for service within Canada the government is not using compulsion until a man has reached his twenty-first birthday. But with respect to service for overseas, in an indirect way, by making it impossible for men between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one to gain employment, unless they have rejection certificates, the government is driving young men into the army before they have reached their twenty-first year.

This is a most despicable way of putting conscription into force—economic conscription, because that is what it is. The same applies to men up to the age of forty-five years. I believe all hon. members receive copies of advertisements sent out by the civil service commission. These advertisements point out that persons between the ages of seventeen and forty-five must have rejection slips; otherwise their applications would not be considered.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is a non-essential industry; that is the reason.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not necessarily a non-essential industry. Surely the minister does not say the civil service is a non-essential industry?

Mr. MITCHELL: In many respects, yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is the Department of Labour a non-essential industry?

Mr. MITCHELL: In some respects, yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then, why don't you resign, and tell the government to disband it—that your work is useless; that it is non-essential?

Mr. MITCHELL: We would not be justified in taking from clerical positions men of seventeen years. Let us discuss this dispassionately. We would not be justified in taking these young men from the Department of Labour. There would be more criticism from that angle than from the other one.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am not raising the question only as it applies to the civil service. It is unlawful and a criminal offence to give those men employment in non-essential or restricted industries. In essential industries they must have certificates of rejection from the armed forces. That applies to the civil service, as well as to other employments. What is the minister going to train them for? If they are between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one, after receiving training they must have their certificates of rejection before they can get into an essential service—a war service.

Mr. MITCHELL: You are wrong there—wrong again. They can go into a war industry without exemption.

Mr. MacINNIS: They have to have a certificate of rejection.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, no.

Mr. CASSELMAN: Oh, yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Referring to the point as to what is an essential industry, I understand the minister had ruled that the textile industry is not an essential industry within the meaning of the regulations. I point out to him that 80 per cent of the textile industry of Canada is engaged in manufacturing war goods. If it is not so engaged, it should be, and the non-essentials should be cut out. Assuming that 50 per cent of the production of the textile industry is on war orders, how can it be said that that industry is not essential? We have just come through a cold winter, and no one knows it better than the soldiers who have to live in the sheds. I should like to see the minister standing on the bleak reaches of Gander, Newfoundland, to see an Ontario regiment parading around there.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have stood there, with no shoes on.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Then the minister knows exactly what I am talking about, because they are chilled to the bone, even with their greatcoats on, even as I was. Surely the textile industry, at least in part, is an essential war industry. Under this proposal, who is to judge what is or is not an essential war industry? Is it to be the Minister of Labour? Will it be the Minister of National War Services? Presumably it is to be the Minister of Labour.

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes, the Minister of Labour.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That being so, the minister may declare that any industry is not an essential industry, and that therefore he can drive every young man in this country, by the back-door route, into enlistment for active service overseas. That is the absolute truth, and it is a shameful policy. If "cowardly" is not a parliamentary term, I shall use the expression "shameful policy"—and I believe I am stating the truth.

What has happened in connection with these young trainees? A young lad is about to attain the age of call. He is called by the Department of National War Services presided over by the minister from Selkirk. Before his call goes out, his name is given to the recruiting officer in the district in which he lives. Mark you, this is before he is called. This is another indirect approach on the part of the government to get recruits by the voluntary system—and we are told how wonderfully it is working! He gets a letter from the chief recruiting officer in the area telling him that he is going to be called, and by a more or less polite paragraph in the letter he is advised that he had better sign up for the active army. He may do so or he may not, but I want to tell the minister and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Ralston) that so far as that recruiting officer is concerned, that young man is a marked man the minute he gets into the training centre.

I have evidence of the case of a young man in a county in Ontario who is in the non-active army. He has been approached repeatedly by the non-commissioned officers and asked to enlist for active service. He has applied for a furlough to go home to see his family, but this has been refused although his furlough is long past due. He has been told that if he will sign on the dotted line, for active service, he can go home on a double furlough. What kind of recruiting system is that? That is a travesty on British justice.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does the hon. member think it is a travesty on British justice to defend your country?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No, I do not; I am advocating something quite different. I am advocating a manly, straightforward system. I believe the Minister of Labour, if he were free, would advocate this also. In fact, within the week he probably has advocated it. How can he retain his self-respect and remain in a ministry that will adopt such methods? I do not just understand why methods such as those to which this administration has resorted should be adopted in order to get recruits for the active army. While the objective is excellent, I want to say that the methods resorted to in order to obtain men for the active army for service anywhere are everything that they should not be. The methods vary. One method will be adopted in one recruiting area, and another will be adopted in another area. Much will depend upon the resourcefulness of the recruiting officer or the degree to which he is hard-hearted or hard-boiled. Some of these fellows are pretty hard-boiled and they will resort to anything. I have heard of cases where physical pressure has been applied, where a man was blackened because he would not sign up. I have heard of one recruiting area where they got 100 per cent of the trainees to enlist for the active army by methods which I believe could not bear the light of day.

Let us get away from this sort of thing. I think this has been admitted on the floor of this house. Let us not be extreme in our language. But I want to say to the minister that there are many things that I believe he would not approve. I think we agree as to the objective, that is, to get men into the active army to defend this nation, and I shall talk about that to-night, but we ought to revise our methods.

Just a word or two about these young lawyers appointed by the war-time prices and trade board. The minister stated that these young lawyers were appointed by the civil service commission, but I want to tell him that that is not the case. I have never seen an advertisement by the civil service commission advertising any of these positions. Were the positions publicly advertised, or were they just hand-picked lawyers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): They were hand-picked Tories, most of them.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Mr. McCANN: I think the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) has referred to special and isolated cases in an attempt to prove that the wrong methods of recruiting have been resorted to with a view to getting men to sign up for overseas; that it is not done on a voluntary basis. During the recess I had occasion to visit several sections of my constituency, and in one small village I found there had been 150 voluntary enlistments for overseas service during the course of the present war compared with twenty-five enlistments from the same part of my constituency during the last war.

Mr. MacNICOL: One hundred and fifty enlistments from a small village?

Mr. McCANN: One hundred and fifty compared with twenty-five in the last war.

Mr. MacNICOL: It must be a pretty good sized village.

Mr. McCANN: It is a village of 1,500 people. I think that ratio of enlistments is highly creditable. Speaking more directly with reference to the vocational training, I can see where it can be used to great advantage in connection with men who have been rejected for military service. We must take into account the number of men who are physically unfit to be placed in category A1, either for service overseas or in our own country. The fact remains that we must be prepared to do something with men who cannot be placed in these categories. Last week I sat on an examination board examining voluntary recruits for the Lanark and Renfrew Scottish regiment. Of the number who came up that afternoon for examination exactly thirty-three and a third per cent were rejected on physical grounds. These men were given certificates to the effect that they were unfit for service, and on the strength of those certificates they could make application to certain industries for employment.

But what becomes of them if they have had no training or are not trained artisans? That is exactly where this vocational training could be used with excellent results. These men have done their bit by offering their services, although they may have known they were physically unfit and were likely to be rejected. It becomes the duty of the government to take these men and give them some training so that they can go into industry of some type or another. The men are doing this voluntarily in order that they may be put into the classification in which they belong. Having gone through the normal process of being examined and receiving certificates of physical rejection, they know where they belong. They can either find employment or take up vocational training as supplied by the government. This resolution, and the bill which will come after it, are in keeping with the policy previously adopted by the government and carried out for a number of years. At this time that policy should be speeded up and augmented as quickly and as much as possible.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The hon. gentleman has just raised another point which has not been touched upon in the debate this afternoon. During the past year the war emergency training programme has accorded the veterans of the present war and of the great war a preference in accepting candidates for training. Subsistence allowances have been paid to those selected for such training, and employment has been found for trainees in war industry. I am replying directly to the point raised by my hon. friend.

The war emergency training programme has developed from the youth training facilities, and is carrying on in conjunction with the provincial governments and in close association with educational bodies throughout the dominion. These arrangements in respect of vocational training have laid a useful foundation for cooperation between the youth training organization of the Department of Labour and the Department of Pensions and National Health in respect of vocational training of discharged men which will be very helpful, we hope, in the difficult period that lies ahead.

This committee will recall that last year the rehabilitation committee, in a comprehensive report to the parliamentary committee during the past session, filed a recommendation in respect of vocational training which goes far beyond the narrower view of vocational training established at the end of the last war. At that time vocational training facilities were restricted to those with pensionable disabilities who were unable, on account of disability, to resume their previous employment, and to minors. It is recognized, however, that many men now serving had little opportunity prior to enlistment to acquire a skill, and unfortunately many of them have not had the discipline or training of a job. The subcommittee on vocational training therefore recommended:

> That training should be given those who on the recommendation of competent vocational guidance officers are considered by age, aptitude and inclination as likely to benefit from such training.

This recommendation, together with the recommendation of the subcommittee on interrupted education suggesting that provision be made for resumption of interrupted education, and reports of other subcommittees, were given coherence in what is known as the post-discharge reestablishment order, passed on October 1, 1941.

The provision made for subsistence allowances in respect of vocational training is wide, and such allowances will be payable by the Department of Pensions and National Health. That department is now proceeding to establish a vocational training division with a competent and experienced director to carry on the work.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): To how far back in point of time is the last order in council effective? It does not go back to discharge earlier than July, 1941, does it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There were definite reasons for that. One of the main features of the order in council—there were about six definite and distinct benefits provided for by the order in council—was that it conferred upon those who had joined the forces the same benefits in regard to insured employment as were conferred upon civilians. Unemployment insurance came into effect on July 1, 1941, and for actuarial and other purposes it was necessary to provide that limitation, although very few cases were discharged before that date. There were special cases which required special treatment. I quite appreciate my hon. friend's point.

As I was saying, we are establishing a vocational training division within the department, which will have the following functions:

1. It will carry the responsibility of the Department of Pensions and National Health with respect to the training of special casualties such as amputees, the blind and others. These are our entire responsibility and their vocational training will be carried on by the Department of Pensions and National Health. That is the recommendation made to us by those who are most competent to make it, and it was endorsed, I think, by the committee of last year.

2. The department will endeavour to secure continuity in the various stages leading to the reestablishment of such special casualties. These various stages may include physiotherapy, occupational therapy, functional training, vocational guidance, and specialized vocational training for the seriously handicapped.

3. It will approve the selection of those who are to be authorized to resume, with public assistance, the education which was interrupted by their enlistment. It will also generally supervise the continuation of their education, which will, of course, be actually received in the universities and institutions of higher learning.

Next, and this is important:

4. It will select and give vocational guidance to those physically fit discharged men who are to pass into the vocational training classes operated under the Department of Labour as envisaged by the vocational training coordination bill which is to follow the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will young women in the service be included as well as young men?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): By a recent order in council all the privileges of the post-discharge order of October 1 were made applicable to women who have enlisted in the various forces.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does it say whether it is men or women?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The order in council making the previous order applicable to women was of fairly recent date.

Mr. HAZEN: What does functional training embrace?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would not claim to be an expert on all the various aspects of it; but the intention of the department is to get experts in regard to special aptitudes and the best directional advice for each individual case based on the nature of the casualty, and, in the case of those who are discharged as fit, based upon their previous experience and to some extent upon their natural inclination and aptitudes.

The vocational training branch of the Department of Pensions and National Health will therefore be responsible for vocational guidance with respect to all ex-service men who may be considered eligible for further training courses. The Department of Pensions and National Health will also administer vocational training for the seriously handicapped.

It is proposed that the Department of Labour shall conduct the actual training of the physically fit men who are awarded training courses as a means of fitting them for civil life.

During the months that lie ahead steps will be taken to make a complete survey of the present facilities available for vocational training and to examine into methods of vocational guidance, aptitude testing, job analysis, types of training available, opportunities for training in industry, apprenticeship, and the transfer value of training and skills in the armed forces and the cousinship of such skills with civilian skills and training.

The purpose is to correlate the condition after discharge, if the man is fit, with his natural aptitude for a particular industry or for special vocational training, and if a special casualty, with special training within the jurisdiction of the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is there not grave danger there of duplication?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I do not think so. The subject has been carefully studied by the committee on special casualties and the committee on vocational training, and what I have submitted is very largely the result of their recommendations to the government.

Mr. RALSTON: I understand that in my absence the leader of the opposition had something to say with regard to methods of recruiting. I did not know that that matter was related to this subject or would come up, or I would have remained in the house. Only a short time ago I arranged with my hon. friend that discussion of army matters would come on the discussion of the war appropriation bill, and I would have thought that that would be the time to bring up recruiting rather than when I did not happen to be in the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It arose only incidentally, and not because the minister was not here.

Mr. RALSTON: But I understand that my hon. friend made a considerable point of it. I understand he had something to say with regard to methods of recruiting in training centres, and that he even intimated that he knew of a case or had had a case reported to him in which physical pressure had been used upon some individual to induce him to enlist.

I say for the benefit of the committee—I have not the orders under my hand because I did not expect this matter to come up to-day—that express orders have been given that no undue influence or improper pressure is to be used upon men in the training centres. I have no doubt that as the men are associating together men in the active army and men called up under the National Resources Mobilization Act, there will be inducements from the active men to the others to go active, just as there are inducements on the college campus from time to time to get a fellow to come into a particular college fraternity. One would expect that kind of thing to go on. But so far as improper pressure is concerned or any undue influence,

I want to say distinctly that it is directly against the most positive orders which have been issued.

The only case brought to my attention was brought by a colleague of mine. It was said that an officer had been present in a certain camp when some physical influence was being used. I myself sent to the training centre and had the officer brought to headquarters and dealt with by the adjutant-general. I found that the report was completely erroneous in so far as the use of physical pressure was concerned, but that this man had said something which was contemptuous towards the recruit, and was dealt with by the adjutant-general.

I invite my hon. friend or any other member of this committee, if he knows of any case of undue or improper influence in this connection, to bring it to my attention. I may say that I have known in evangelistic meetings of a good deal of pressure and much fervour being used to bring in converts; and I know also that in connection with recruiting meetings, quite apart from training centres, a great deal of emotional pressure is used. I would rather expect that, and I do not believe that anybody in this committee is finding fault with it. But so far as any physical pressure or violence or undue influence is concerned, that is absolutely against orders, and will be dealt with if cases are brought to my attention.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no objection to the statement made by the minister. There have been cases, but I would not assume that the department would give legal authorization to such methods. A great deal depends upon the recruiting officer. The point to which I was speaking had reference to vocational training and government sponsorship of young men, and the methods to which the government have resorted—I call them "back-door methods"; the Prime Minister used the term "indirect methods"—of making it impossible, speaking generally, for any young man to get employment to-day if he is capable of going into the active army. I deprecate that sort of approach to military compulsion, and that is what we have in Canada to-day.

Mr. RALSTON: I am very much surprised to hear my hon. friend take objection to that. All he wants to do is to go one step further and make it positive.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Would that not be more sincere?

Mr. RALSTON: I would think that this is an endeavour to put the round peg in the round hole and the square peg in the square hole. I would regard it as an attempt to make available for military service the man who is physically fit and of suitable age, when some other man can do his job in civilian life. I am astonished to hear my hon. friend take any objection to that method. It is the only way whereby you can allocate the man-power of this country. The man who is physically fit and of military age can either be doing a military job or be in civilian employment. The man who is not physically fit and is not of military age cannot do a military job, but he may do a civilian job; and the method to which my hon. friend refers is intended to provide that the older and less fit man is put into that civilian job, and the other man is left free to do the job which his neighbour cannot do. I do not think my hon. friend should take objection to that. I think it is part of any selective service system. To see to it that young men who are physically fit and of military age are not employed in non-essential industries is, I believe, a perfectly proper system. I would say the same thing with regard to the civil service. I notice on the order paper to-day a question on this subject. The hon. member who puts the question asks why the railways do not adopt the same method. I believe that is just a part of selective service—seeing to it that the man who can do the job is made available to do it; and I cannot concur in my hon. friend's criticism of that method.

Mr. THORSON: Furthermore, I think the matter might be put in another way. One of the essential purposes of any sound national selective service system is that as far as possible every person in the country, whether man or woman, shall work in that field of war activity where he or she can best promote the total war effort. Another purpose of any sound selective service system is to avoid wastage of man-power in comparatively non-essential industries, in the case of men who are physically fit for active service and of military age. The purpose of passing this order restricting the entry of certain persons into a number of occupations was, in the first place, to prevent a wastage of man-power. These occupations have a very large turnover; and when any person who is at present engaged in one of these occupations ceases to be employed therein, it is intended that that person's place shall be filled either by a woman or by a man above military age or unfit for military service. That in a broad way is national selective service. The various regulations which were discussed by the Prime Minister on March 24, indicate the attitude of the government in this matter. There are two possible approaches to a national selective service system. One is to try to assess the individual qualifications of every man and woman in the country, and ticket them, and move them round from place to place. That task in itself would take an army of people who would be much better engaged in doing something else to promote the war effort. The other approach is a much more practical and realistic one. The government has announced its war programme; it has announced its programme for the armed forces and for munitions production, both programmes in terms of man-power requirements; the purpose of our national selective service system is to assist in meeting those requirements in a practical and realistic way, meeting situations as they arise by means of regulations, seeking also to anticipate by regulations situations which are likely to arise; in other words, meeting specific conditions by specific measures. I believe that is a much more practical and more realistic approach to the whole system of national selective service than the first approach would be. The order to which reference has been made is part of that system. It restricts the entry into a certain number of occupations of men who are of military age and physically fit for the armed forces. All the occupations are listed in the schedule. All are comparatively non-essential, or if they are essential they can be filled either by women or by older men or men unfit for military service. This is the kind of national selective service which every one has been urging, and this is a realistic and practical way of putting it into effect. The persons who are prevented from entering these occupations are not barred from entering essential war activities.

Mr. GREEN: Is that quite definite, because statements to the opposite effect were made earlier?

Mr. THORSON: Then, with regard to the question which was raised regarding the war employers—

Mr. MacINNIS: Aha! What is the definition of "war employers"?

Mr. THORSON: —if a war employer does not wish to employ a young man who is physically fit, and who is either likely to enlist or will be subject to call under the war service regulations, that is a matter in which he is interested from the point of view of continuity in his war production.

[Mr. Thorson.]

Mr. MacNICOL: But he cannot take such a young man into his employment.

Mr. THORSON: Oh, yes, he can. There is nothing to bar him from employing such a man, but if he is reluctant to do so, from the point of view of keeping his industry up to the maximum of production, that is something in which he and the country at large are deeply interested. There is again, if you like to describe it so, a situation developing whereby persons are being allocated either directly or indirectly to those theatres of activity where they can make the greatest contribution to the totality of the war effort and its maximum effectiveness. That, after all, is the important governing policy.

Mr. GREEN: Is there a government policy with regard to men between the ages of seventeen and forty-five going into war industry? As I read the order in council which has been under discussion, it applies only to non-war jobs. Apparently the government, with regard to war jobs, is leaving it all to the individual employer. Would it not be fair; is it not proper, that there should be a government policy? Either these men can go into war industry or they cannot. Why leave it to the individual employer? That is bound to mean great discrimination in different towns or in different industries in the same town. Surely the government should be in favour of one policy or the other. Why leave such an important question up in the air?

Mr. MITCHELL: I want to say frankly that I cannot get steamed up over an able-bodied, single man—

Mr. MacINNIS: Why don't you make that your policy?

Mr. MITCHELL: I am coming to it.

Mr. MacINNIS: Get steamed up the other way. Make it your policy.

Mr. MITCHELL: You have never been steamed up in your life, my boy. I can understand your stand.

Mr. MacINNIS: Get steamed up the proper way.

Mr. MITCHELL: If you had your way there would not be a House of Commons to-day.

Mr. MacINNIS: My hon. friend must withdraw that statement.

Mr. MITCHELL: I will withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: Don't make any more remarks like that. We can make statements over here too.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the policy is clear. These men can go into war industry. They cannot go into non-war industries without a permit. That is perfectly clear. When my hon. friend says for me to look out, he started it. He sneered at me.

Mr. COLDWELL: When a member rises and makes the statement that if somebody had his way there would be no House of Commons, it is time to interrupt.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not.

An hon. MEMBER: Yes, you did.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, no, I did not say that.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes, you did. It is exactly what you said.

Mr. MITCHELL: If I said it I regret it. It is not the interpretation I meant to put on my own words.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know what interpretation to put on your own words when you do not know yourself.

Mr. MITCHELL: I think the policy is clear. If I were an able-bodied young man I would be in the fighting forces. They are the aristocrats of their day. If it were not for these young men, there would not be any House of Commons. I think that is perfectly obvious. I took that position in the last war and I take it in this war. I do not know why I should waste any time over able-bodied men of military age, single men.

Mr. GREEN: The minister is saying in one breath that the policy of the government is that these men shall be able to go into war industry, and in the next breath he says that so far as he is concerned—and he is the man who has the administering of the order in council—these men have no right to go into war industry.

Mr. MITCHELL: I did not say that.

Mr. GREEN: That is what it amounts to.

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, no.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest to the minister and to other members of the ministry that the house and the country are entitled to know what the government's policy is on this question. Let us know, and then let the employers comply with that policy. Do not have this business of the government having one policy and winking at the employer following another. We cannot expect to have a wholehearted war effort under such conditions. The country is entitled to better leadership than that.

Mr. MacINNIS: My good friend the Minister of National War Services (Mr. Thorson) put the case very nicely, as he always does, but it is no less economic conscription. Then my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), who is not so particular about putting things nicely, asked why he should lose any sleep over an able-bodied man who is not in one of the services. But the government that he represents, the government whose policies he has adopted, took the position that they would not by law compel any man to go into the armed services.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): By the direct route.

Mr. MacINNIS: But now they are putting him into the armed services through his stomach.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not believe it.

Mr. THORSON: There are plenty of opportunities for these men.

Mr. MacINNIS: There are not. Dozens of young men have come to me and said that they could not get into any service that is non-essential or otherwise. This is not a condition that has arisen since the orders in council were passed; it has been going on for many months. This is what it amounts to. The poor man who has no one to keep him will starve or go into the armed forces. He will starve unless he already has a job. Economic conscription applies to him, but it does not apply to the young, physically fit man whose father can keep him, or whose father is in a position to keep him.

Mr. RALSTON: Are there many of those?

Mr. MacINNIS: I imagine that if my hon. friend had a son of that age it would apply to him.

Mr. RALSTON: I assure you it would not.

Mr. MacINNIS: It possibly would not, but the fact is there. I am not saying how many it applies to. I am telling my hon. friend that it is the government's policy at the present time to put the poor man into the armed forces through starvation, while the rich man's son is not affected. The government have not the courage to put another programme into effect.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like a little further information. I listened with interest to the remarks of the Minister of Pensions and National Health, who seemed to have right at his finger-tips just what he wishes to achieve along these lines. But I am trying to find out whether this bill covers what the minister has in mind.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, definitely. As far as the physically fit discharged men are concerned, the machinery of administration will be under the Department of Labour. As far as special casualties are concerned, the machinery will be exclusively under the Department of Pensions and National Health, in which there is being set up a director of vocational training. He will deal with two things, in the first place the actual training and placement of special casualities, and in the second place the supervision of matters having to do with the guidance of those physically fit men who are placed in certain industries through the machinery administered by the Department of Labour.

Mr. MacNICOL: I agree with the objective the minister has in mind, but the resolution refers to a measure to provide for the promotion of vocational training projects, and it does not specify returned men only. When I first read it over I was of opinion that it was very much along the lines laid down by the Minister of Labour when he first outlined the proposal, at which time he followed more or less the proposals of his predecessor, the late Mr. Rogers. Am I to undersand now that the bill does not cover any but returned soldiers.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The Department of Labour advises that preference for discharged men was embodied in the war emergency training programme regulations which became effective on January 1, 1941. Since that preference was instituted, until February 25, 1942, discharged men have been admitted to training forces to the number of 3,002. The Department of Labour further advises that the number admitted to training in the month of February of this year was 282 men, discharged during the present war. The Department of Pensions and National Health paid the training benefits to discharged men under the post-discharge order, to which I referred, passed on October 1, 1941, to 285 veterans during March, 1942, involving an expenditure of $11,802.06. That is under the terms of the post-discharge order, one of which benefits is this vocational training, and these figures indicate how that is progressing even though at the present time it is only in its very early stages.

Mr. MacNICOL: This afternoon a good deal was said about young men being trained under this programme, and it was stated that in order to enjoy these benefits they would be forced to enlist in the army. That has not been denied. The matter was dealt with by the hon. member for Vancouver South and the hon. member for Vancouver East; as a matter of fact hon. members from Vancouver seem to be in the thick of it to-night, between the Minister of Pensions and National Health and the two hon. members I have mentioned, who seem to understand the bill pretty well. Those two hon. members were under the impression that under the bill which will be founded on this resolution, in order to obtain these benefits young men would be forced to join the active forces, whether or not they wanted to do so. I should like some further information along that line. I have been wondering just how the bill will fit in with the present scheme sponsored by the manufacturers of aeroplanes. In the vicinity of Toronto, for instance, the aeroplane companies secure a great deal of their help, many of their men and, I presume, their women also, since now they have thousands of women working in their plants, through the central technical school, where they send them to take courses lasting several weeks or several months before they enter the plants. Will this vocational training scheme fit in with that scheme which is now in operation?

Mr. MITCHELL: Yes. That is already part of the scheme.

Mr. MacNICOL: And it is a very worthy part of it. The board of education in Toronto have been in communication with the minister for some time asking for assistance in order properly to equip the large central technical school on Harbord street, which requires a new building which they propose to erect in front of the present building, in order that they may be in a better position to train those who will be engaged in the production and operation of aeroplanes. Will the scheme fit in with the construction of that building, and will the department assist in the construction of that building?

Mr. MITCHELL: That matter was taken up with my predecessor and myself. The view expressed by the department was that we could not subsidize permanent buildings, because the building suggested would take perhaps eighteen months to construct, and there is ample space available of a temporary nature that could be put to use almost immediately. The provincial government was sounded out in this connection also, and that was why the representations of the city of Toronto were not looked upon in a kindly way by the federal government.

Mr. MacNICOL: The representations were not looked upon in a kindly way by this government but they were supported by the provincial government, who said they would cooperate. That, however, is something quite apart from this bill, and perhaps I should not have brought up the subject. Let me conclude with this. Was the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East and the hon. member for Vancouver South correct, that in order to obtain benefits under the bill to be founded on this resolution young men will be compelled to enlist in the active army?

Mr. MITCHELL: No.

Mr. HOMUTH: Could we clear up that point a little? We are told that those who attend these schools are not forced to enlist in the active army. They do enlist to this extent, that after they complete their training and pass the medical examination they are automatically in the army.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is so.

Mr. HOMUTH: Then actually they do enlist, but their enlistment depends entirely upon the result of their medical examination when they finish their training. So they are enlisted men. It may be that the department does not recognize them as enlisted men, but they are, and if they pass their medical examination they go into the active army automatically.

Mr. MITCHELL: I do not think that is altogether correct. We have what are called pre-enlistment classes, and also classes for enlisted men. For instance there are pre-enlistment classes at Galt and many other centres in connection with the air force. Some of those men go into the air force and some go into industry.

Mr. CHURCH: We have a motion to appoint a committee to consider a proposed bill to assist in the carrying on and coordination of vocational training. Parliament has not been in session for the last three weeks. Primary things should come first. The war is primary; the appointment of this committee is secondary. We do not know where we are to-day, so far as the war is concerned. Since parliament adjourned for the recess, we have suffered heavy losses on the seven seas, and the very fate of civilization has been at stake. How will the appointment of a committee advance this vocational problem? I have been in the house for many years, and I have failed to see how any committee has made progress on any public question, so far as section 91 of the British North America Act is concerned.

The minister is new to the department, and no doubt he is anxious to do certain things. But I can tell the committee that the country wants parliament, now that it is back here in Ottawa, to act and to get on with this war, and not just to talk about it. In my opinion the appointment of committees to consider these domestic questions should wait, and it is the function of this government to handle this question and not just deal in window-dressing.

As a former member of a school board I have had some experience in this matter. It will be recalled that the Laurier government appointed a commission to investigate technical education, and to give special attention to technical and vocational training as applied to secondary schools and trade and industry. A report made to the government of that day pointed out that it was the function of the federal parliament to take that action, because it controlled trade and commerce. We control finance, banks and banking and matters of that kind, and for that reason vocational and technical training is a function for which this parliament is solely responsible.

There can be no doubt that, after the war, vocational training will be of great importance, and especially since it is applied to soldiers on reestablishment in civil life. I believe, however, that sooner or later we shall have to consider education of this kind. The report dealing with vocational training, as a part of technical education, showed the necessity of parliament taking on this task here.

After the war the wreckage will be so great that there will be nothing to salvage. No one will want to be in industry, or connected with trade. With all the bureaucratic boards established by orders in council almost every day we meet, how can any businessman deal with vocational training in his business or aid it after the war in his industry. I fail to see how it can it be done.

What has been done in England? They have not appointed committees, as we have done. Over there the government has accepted the onus of responsibility. While I have sympathy with the present proposal in principle, may I point out that Toronto was a poineer in matters affecting vocational and technical training. Technical and vocational schools were established in that city. Every day between 10,000 and 12,000 day and night students attend those schools, and in the evenings between 7 o'clock and 10 o'clock students meet to study. All this is done at the city's expense. The government does not do a thing for those schools or give them any direct aid. Those technical schools in Toronto are doing a fine work in matters of vocational training and war work, and yet the government will not grant one cent, although war industries seek their graduates eagerly. Federal power should assist this work by grants and other aids.

I hold in my hand some pictures showing the work in Toronto's technical central school in connection with acetylene welding. I believe the first technical school in Canada was established many years ago in Toronto. Students from those schools are going to the industries engaged in manufacturing munitions, and in carrying out other war work. The schools have applied to the minister's department to obtain a grant for a new wing to the central technical school, because some of the students are now working in an old garage on Bathurst street on war work. The main school building in which all forms of technical work are now carried on cost about $1,500,000 with plant and additions. They are doing war work, and because of that the board of education came to Ottawa asking that it be given a small grant for a new war wing for these enlisted war workers and students. But the government turned a deaf ear to that application.

As I see it, after the war the wreckage in industry will be so great that there will be nothing left to salvage, and no one will want to be in trade and commerce. What has been done in England? A bill known as the trade and commerce bill has been passed by both houses of parliament. That bill has reestablished in Great Britain certain pre-war trade practices. Because of that action industry and trade and commerce know where they stand. On the other hand, in Canada we have the cart before the horse. Win the war first, and then take up all these domestic questions.

On an earlier occasion, when this matter was under discussion I asked the minister what the policy of the government was. I asked questions regarding all these bureaucratic boards which have been established throughout the country, placing impossible barriers and artificial burdens on business. A certain businessman told me he has three or four clerks who do nothing but get information and file these returns.

What is the function of government? We have been refused information by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) with respect to one board dealing with a feature of war work—the commodity price corporation. No doubt if this measure passes, some corporation or board will deal with vocational training, despite the fact that we have been refused information as to how this price corporation money has been spent, and the price paid. About a week ago the chairman of one of these boards gave an interview to a reporter on the Toronto Globe and Mail in which he gave detailed information the Minister of Finance had declined to give to parliament two weeks before.

I have no objection in principle to a committee on vocational training. Although nothing has been said about it yet here in the house, I have no doubt that, after the war, commercial aviation will accord a great opportunity for vocational training to a great degree and provide work, because I believe it will constitute one of our most important transportation facilities. At the present time, however, I believe this motion is purely academic, and nothing can be accomplished by it at this time. It is based entirely on winning the war. While I am in favour of the principle of the resolution, I believe the onus is on the government to carry on this soldier education programme in conjunction with the provinces and the various boards of education across Canada and secure real vocational training at cost and avoid duplication and waste by coordination now absent.

It is all moonshine to talk about planning after the war when at this very moment Britain is fighting for her very life and existence. We do not know where we shall be. We were beaten in January and February, on the Pacific and on the seven seas. It is all very well to say that we are enjoying a party truce, but at present it is very much one-sided. It may be that in some respects we are enjoying a party truce. However, I just came from one of the Toronto constituencies where certain gentlemen in one party have appeared and preached about this planning, and matters of that kind, in a purely socialistic way and do not observe the party truce to win the war. Let us deal with war problems first. It is all very well to talk about vocational training. I appreciate what it has done for the returned soldier, and I realize that after the last war it was most commendable, although very much delayed at the start. But at that time it was a non-partisan effort. In my opinion any action along this line in the future should be taken in conjunction with the provinces, and especially with the boards of education, to avoid overlapping and duplication, and federal power must aid post-war education.

The university of Toronto, through all her graduates, has been a pioneer in this matter. In my opinion the appointment of this committee will not do any good. The executive can do this work better. We must get on with the war, which is primary, and which is not secondary to these domestic questions.

While I am in sympathy with everything done for the soldiers along this line, I believe there has been too much playing with this question, and unless we give it more careful consideration we shall accomplish very little. This committee will be like the war expenditures committee, which found out practically nothing. The report of that committee has not even been discussed here, and the report of this committee will be too late for any action till after the war.

I have had some experience with these matters, and in my view we ought first to lay down future principles with respect to industry, trade and commerce, and particularly agriculture in Canada. We must decide whether industry is going, after the war, as it is now, to be placed under all these burdens and barriers in restraint of trade with which industry is now faced. Some of those regulations may be all right, but large portions of industry are affected by them all, and we know that many of the regulations will not help by one iota to win the war. We must first break the shackles of bureaucracy by which trade and commerce are bound now in Canada, hand and foot, before we shall be in a position to support vocational training in industry. We must break these shackles with which trade is now bound, hand and foot, by some such act as in England to restore pre-war trade practices.

There are legions of men sitting in offices who pass these regulations of price boards with respect to trade and industry, so that no man can conduct his business. The small, independent businessman is being driven out of business and cannot function or shift his industry to aid vocational training. All parties in the house have supported vocational training. At the close of the last war we were not properly prepared. In this matter of education we might very well give grants to the provinces and local school boards. Certainly before very long we shall have to go into education, on a very elaborate scale. Further, this bill must take care of these apprentices who have gone to the war, and place them back in their industries to continue on.

Labour and industry could be united; they are united. The contribution of labour has been most magnificent in this war as has that of industry and employers, and I do not think we would have been able to do what we have done had it not been for labour. Labour, agriculture and industry are united in a magnificent effort.

We should develop the resources of this country to their limit. In water-power, only 7,000,000 horse-power have been developed when we have 42,000,000 horse-power available. Next year Great Britain will face the greatest coal shortage in her history, and we may be suffering here while our natural resources in coal and substitutes are allowed to lie dormant. I believe we should first lay down the principle of where trade and commerce are to be to-day and to-morrow, and where they will be after the war, if industry will be enabled to support the policy of the government which they want to do when the war ends, and after the war all bureaucratic boards should go.

Mr. MacINNIS: Despite anything that was said this afternoon, I am supporting this resolution, and I believe it will receive general support from the whole committee. We find ourselves at the present time with a pressing work to do, that is, war production, and not enough trained workers to do it. I imagine the first purpose of this vocational training will be to fit men and women for war work. That is most important. It is proper that we should consider questions of this kind now. Not only shall we need it to-day; we shall need it equally when the war is over. As the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) said quite rightly this afternoon, it is in line with the work initiated by the late Norman Rogers when he was Minister of Labour. I do not know, and possibly I shall not know until the bill is brought down, what age ranges will be covered by this measure. Will it be restricted to young people?

Mr. MITCHELL: No limit.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am glad of that. In my opinion our aim should be to fit every man and woman in Canada for some job, and provide a job for every man and woman in Canada. We should not be satisfied with anything less than that.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): A chicken in every pot.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes; two automobiles in every garage. That was promised at one time, but not necessarily here. There is only one way of getting a chicken in every pot and a car in every garage, that is by getting our men and women producing those things. They do not fall out of the skies. I was always a little suspicious of the story about the manna. The minister has said that there will be no age limit. Our aim should be to train every man and woman in Canada for work. When we fit people for work, not only are we making them capable of producing useful things, we are recreating them. To the extent that this measure will perform that function, I am certainly in support of it.

There is nothing that destroys everything that is worth-while in a man as quickly as unemployment and the feeling that he has no useful place in the community.

Mr. GREEN: To what extent are men and women over forty-five years of age being given vocational training at this time? There is a great need for the training of older men and women. That would be in line with the government's policy of restricting the entry into industry of men between the ages of seventeen and forty-five years. It does seem most important that the older men and women should be given this training. To what extent has that been done?

Mr. MITCHELL: I would point out to my hon. friend that I have been close to this war emergency training programme since its inception. I was one of those who helped to draft it. The emphasis has always been placed upon the training of older men. Those of us who thought we saw the development of this war were convinced that sooner or later young men would be drawn into the army, navy and air force and that there would be a shortage. At the moment I can tell my hon. friend that of those between the ages of thirty and thirty-nine years, there are 3,505 being trained; between the ages of forty and forty-nine, 1,915, and fifty years and over, 737. I met many manufacturers, as well as the manufacturers' association, and the emphasis was always placed on this point. We all appreciated that there was a spill-over from the depression to the war and that many young men were out of employment, but we felt that sooner or later the time would come when these younger men would have to go into the fighting forces, or at least would go into the fighting forces, and that then a demand would be created for the older men. I am convinced that we must consider the woman problem as soon as we possibly can. Personally I do not think we have scratched the surface of the man-power available in this country. A year from now the women of this country will be doing things they never dreamed of doing in the past.

Mr. GREEN: What steps are being taken to get these people into war work or into the training classes? Are you advertising that these courses are available?

Mr. MITCHELL: Oh, yes.

Mr. GREEN: For older men and women?

Mr. MITCHELL: It is well known through the employment services and other agencies established by the government.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): This afternoon I asked the minister what I thought was a most pertinent question with regard to the council, but I do not think he got to the point of answering it. Is this to be a voluntary committee or are the members to be paid? What is to be the character of the committee? What will be its functions?

Mr. MITCHELL: The hon. member is referring to the advisory committee?

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes. I understand that there is a voluntary advisory committee in Toronto which is doing good work without any cost to the government. This resolution also contemplates the employment of such officers, clerks and other employees necessary for the administration of the act. Are they to be appointed by the civil service commission, by the minister or how?

Mr. MITCHELL: The clerks will be appointed by the civil service commission.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Perhaps the minister could tell us what he has in mind with respect to the advisory council.

Mr. MITCHELL: My view is that in the broadest sense it should be composed of the people most concerned with this form of training.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): People who are interested.

Mr. MITCHELL: People who are interested. I think it should be voluntary except that those who come any distance should have their expenses paid.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will be a part-time affair?

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What is the attendance at the present time at these vocational training classes and what was it a month ago? I understand that the attendance has dropped considerably because farmers' sons are not now allowed to attend the classes.

Mr. MITCHELL: I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): What is the difference in the figures?

Mr. MITCHELL: If there are any figures, I shall try to get them.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I know there is a definite drop because some of the vocational schools which previously ran all night are now going only to about four or five o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Even though this proposal is about ten years late, I do not think we are going to oppose it in any way. Realizing for some years that a mechanized war has been approaching, Canada should have been awakened by self-preservation alone to the need of vocational training, and many of the boys who have been riding the boxcars across this dominion for the past number of years could have been much better employed in being trained in some skilled trade. Such vocational training has, I think, the support of everyone in this country. Has a survey been made of the number of vocational schools in the various provinces which could be utilized to-day or in the immediate future?

Mr. MITCHELL: I have been deeply interested in vocational training and technical education in Canada for the last thirty years. I recalled vividly, when the hon. member for Broadview was speaking this afternoon, the splendid pioneering work done by Toronto in technical education. A royal commission on technical education was set up by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and labour men and other public-spirited citizens helped in establishing the foundation of the system of technical education in this country. I appreciate, of course, that in some provinces technical education is not as far advanced as in others, and what is proposed under this bill is an extension of the work already being done, the work that was set in motion, as I pointed out this afternoon, by the former Minister of Labour. He knew as I know, and as do hon. gentlemen, that until the fall of France we were engaged in what has been called a war of position and blockade. Rightly or wrongly, that was the high strategy of the allied governments at that time, and consequently there was not the demand for industrial expansion for armament purposes in this dominion or in north America generally that there was after the fall of France. I think it is only fair to say that under the policy, the foundation-stone of which was laid by the former Minister of Labour, tens of thousands of our young people have been trained and are now absorbed in the industrial structure of this country or have voluntarily joined the armed forces. This bill is simply a continuation of the act which expired on March 31. It is no latter-day thought, as my hon. friend seemed to suggest. I sat on the committee which drafted the war emergency training programme, and I think my hon. friend will agree with me that with a blank sheet of paper in front of you it is not the easiest thing in the world to draft a policy; you are more or less in the position of a composer who is writing a symphony. On paper he does not know just what it is going to sound like.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): He has it in his head. That is the trouble with our leaders—they do not have it up there.

Mr. MITCHELL: The composer may have it up there, but he does not know what it is going to sound like until it is played on the organ, and sometimes it does not sound so very good. So it is with drafting a policy, but I say frankly that this House of Commons and the government have done a remarkable job in vocational training.

Mr. MacNICOL: Vocational training has been good.

Mr. MITCHELL: Of course it has, and the government's war emergency training programme has greatly increased the strength of the industrial structure of this country. If our neighbours to the south—I say this in the kindliest spirit—make a similar contribution to the material side of the war effort to that which this dominion has been making for the last two and a half years, then the war is over—make no mistake about that—

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is rather a large claim.

Mr. MITCHELL: —provided that our people measure up also to their responsibilities in a physical sense, because it is no use having the material things of war if you are afraid to use them.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If you have not the man-power.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am convinced that the war is going to be won ultimately through the industrial structure and we on this north American continent are the only people who have mastered the technique of mass production. Prior to the outbreak of the war 75 per cent of the internal combustion engines manufactured throughout the world were manufactured in north America and when the industrial machine of this continent gets rolling, then look out—provided that human beings measure up to their responsibilities.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I am pleased to hear the minister's statement, and I am glad to know that a survey has been made of the number of schools available for vocational training in the various provinces. How many hundreds of students can be absorbed in the vocational schools of this dominion?

Mr. MITCHELL: It has been estimated that 10,000 boys and girls leave high school every month in this country.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Throughout this dominion, and particularly in the west, there are a large number of idle machine shops which, if there had been vision on the government benches, would have been very busy working these days or training skilled mechanics for our war effort. It has been evident that this war is going to be won or lost on the industrial production line. According to a statement made by the Minister of Munitions and Supply, some eighteen hundred surveys have been made of our existing resources in machine shops, and the people of Canada are wondering why so many of these shops should be standing idle with good lathes and other machinery all in a condition to work. If these shops cannot be given war work, could they not be training men in the trades so urgently needed in our war effort? I hope the minister in the near future will give us a statement of the vocational training capacity available in the various provinces for students. The whole question of education in the larger field will have to be tackled in the near future, and if some of the facts in regard to education across this dominion were revealed I am sure they would startle many people in this country.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mitchell thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 64, to assist in the carrying on and coordination of vocational training.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

PROVISION FOR SETTLEMENT ON THE LAND OF VETERANS OF PRESENT WAR

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to make provision for the settlement on the land of veterans of the present war, to prescribe the terms of such settlement and to grant a measure of financial assistance to such settlers, and further for the appointment of a director, of officers and other employees in connection therewith.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Vien in the chair.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a statement to the committee in regard to the principles of the bill to be introduced provided this resolution is approved by the committee. The resolution precedes a bill to be known as the Veterans' Land Act. It is one of the measures resulting from the work on the committee on demobilization and rehabilitation and its several advisory committees and subcommittees. The bill to be introduced has three main purposes: first, to assist discharged members of the armed forces to establish themselves successfully in the farming industry in Canada; secondly, to ensure that the agricultural industry bears its share of the rehabilitation problem along with other phases of our industrial life; thirdly, to give ex-members of the forces returning to agricultural pursuits benefits comparable with those available for men entering other occupations.

In this last connection it should, perhaps, now be pointed out in the first place that discharged men entering insurable employment are credited with the time spent on military service since July 1, 1941, and the government of Canada—the people of Canada—pay the premiums; second, that employers are compelled to reinstate ex-members of the forces in their former positions; third, that discharged men who have no trade may be given vocational training and their families maintained by the state while they are undergoing such training; fourth, that young men whose education was interrupted may be supported while completing their educational course and their tuition fees may be paid by the state; fifth, that former civil servants have their positions and their security of superannuation preserved for them; and lastly, that discharged men who are temporarily incapacitated and also those who are capable of and awaiting work may be paid benefits or grants of $9 a week for single men and $13 a week for married men for a period up to fifty-two weeks.

It will be seen, therefore, that some similar measure of assistance for those who undertake farming is fully justified on the grounds of equity.

This bill differs in many vital respects from the Soldier Settlement Act adopted during the last war. These differences are based upon a study of the history of the former soldier settlement plan, which was admittedly by no means the success hoped for both by the country and by the ex-servicemen who went on the land under its provisions.

I come now to the terms of the Soldier Settlement Act.

Under the Soldier Settlement Act the country advanced $109,034,331 for the establishment of 24,793 soldier settlers and 224 Indian soldier settlers—just over 25,000 in all. The great bulk of the settlement, as hon. members are aware, took place in 1919 and 1920. Of the original number of settlers there remained on the land as at March 31, 1941, approximately one-third, namely 8,118 settlers. On March 31, 1941, the situation with regard to these approximately 25,000 settlers was as follows:

Remaining on their land	8,118
Paid off their loans	2,750
Sold out their equities	884

The remainder, 13,041, had abandoned the scheme either voluntarily or by notice.

On March 31, 1941, total recoveries from the original advances were $65,640,518. This includes payments made by civilian purchasers to whom foreclosed properties have been sold. The recoverable value of the outstanding loans is estimated at not more than $30,000,000, which would make a gross recovery of $95,640,518, as against an original capital investment of $109,034,331. These recoveries represent an estimated capital loss of $13,393,813, all interest payments actually made having been included in the $65,000,000 of recoveries already mentioned. The administrative cost from 1918 to March 31, 1941, stood at $25,910,495.

The primary reasons for this state of affairs are, I think, to be found in the following facts. When the operations were begun there was available no staff fully trained in settlement operations. Second, in the period when the bulk of the settlement took place, prices paid for land, chattels and building materials were influenced by war-time inflation. The depression beginning in 1931 brought about a serious deflation in these values. Third, all advances were repayable with interest at 5 per cent; consequently the settler was placed under a burden of debt, including land, live stock and equipment, which often represented 125 to 150 per cent the value of the land. In an effort to remedy these defects the following measures were taken: in the first place, the consolidation of loans; second, cancellation of interest charges for a certain period; third, revaluation of land; fourth, 30 per cent horizontal reduction in the debt in 1930; fifth, a bonus system, subject to the payment of taxes by the settler, whereby a credit of $2 was given for every $1 paid; and lastly, adjustment of contracts under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. These deductions totalled $47,518,215 as of March 31, 1941.

Other factors contributing to the high degree of failures may be mentioned as follows. Seventy per cent of the establishments took place under very difficult conditions in the prairie provinces. The difficulties encountered by all farmers in their communities arising from drought and market fluctuations were shared by the soldier settlers. All establishments were predicated upon the settler deriving his living and his main income from the land. Many could have been better assisted by considering the farm as merely a home, the main income of the family being derived from employment. In the new bill to be presented, the government has profited, I think, by the experience gained under the Soldier Settlement Act, and the major difficulties have been avoided.

I now come to the chief differences between the old act and the one to be introduced.

There are three vital differences between the present bill and the Soldier Settlement Act of the last war, as well as a number of minor differences. The three chief differences may be described as follows:

First, whereas the Soldier Settlement Act contemplated that settlers should give their full time to their farming ventures, the present bill is broad enough to assist men in taking up small holdings where the veteran will make his home and derive a substantial portion of his income from employment apart from his cultivation of the land.

Second, the benefits of this measure are confined to persons who were domiciled in Canada upon enlistment and who served in Canadian or imperial forces. The former act covered members of the forces of the allies. It is felt that since this act provides a subsidy by the dominion government, the benefits should not be extended to other than prewar residents of Canada unless there is a reciprocal arrangement.

The third and greatest difference is that no soldier settler under this bill will be encouraged or permitted to assume an uneconomic and unbearable burden of debt. This necessarily involves a direct grant by the state, which in some instances may represent almost 50 per cent of the total cost of the enterprise.

In broad outline, the proposed scheme contemplates that an applicant for assistance must satisfy the director in charge of administration not only that he wishes to engage in farming, but that he has the qualifications for that occupation. In this connection there is provision for training, at public expense if necessary. In order to ensure that the veteran shall have a personal stake in the success of his enterprise, it is an absolute condition of the bill that the veteran himself shall make a cash payment at the outset equal to 10 per cent of the cost of the land, improvements and building materials upon which a loan is to be issued. Under the old act there was authority to waive any csah contribution by the settler, and experience has clearly shown that this was a mistake.

A vital principle of this bill is recognition at the outset that the average veteran under typical conditions cannot be expected to provide a living for himself and his dependents and maintain the farm plant in working order and pay annual taxes, and in addition thereto meet the payments required, if his indebtedness is for practically the full cost of the land, improvements, live stock and farm equipment. This principle was not recognized in the original provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act, and failures under that act were largely due to the hopelessness of the debt structure, notwithstanding a series of remedial amendments.

The bill embodies the principle that the debt assumed by the veteran shall not exceed two-thirds of the cost of the land and buildings, or, if the maximum costs permitted by the bill are reached, the debt will not exceed 50 per cent of the cost of the whole enterprise, including stock and equipment. The state contribution, subject to specific performance by the settler, is a grant equal to one-third of the cost of the land and buildings, and a further grant of the cash cost of the stock and equipment furnished to the veteran. On a maximum basis the annual payment required from the settler is $144. This sum, in addition to his annual taxes, is believed to be such as the average veteran can successfully pay while providing a reasonable standard of living for himself and his family.

If justification be needed for the policy of making a grant, it is to be found in the following considerations.

In a country like Canada it is futile to say that land should not play an important part in the rehabilitation of ex-service men. Second, industries other than agriculture will be expected to absorb the majority of ex-service men, and other industries cannot be expected to meet the total problem. Third, the experience gained in the operation of the Soldier Settlement Act and similar projects in other countries shows that without such assistance the average veteran stands but a limited chance of establishing home ownership within his working lifetime. Fourth, following every former war in which Canada was engaged, there were valuable ungranted crown lands available for distribution among veterans. That situation no longer exists to-day so far as the federal government is concerned.

Under the relief settlement agreement with the provinces of Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta, more than 10,000 families have been assisted to settle on the land by means of an unrecoverable grant of $1,000 per family. In Manitoba the amount was $1,250 per family, and in Quebec the grant was increased to $2,000 per family. It is estimated that the cost of the grant made by the state in the average case under the proposed bill will be $1,360. Assistance is being made available to the ex-service man who wishes to become a lawyer, a doctor or a skilled workman, under provisions previously passed. It is felt that similar assistance should be given those who wish to become farmers.

Before proceeding to explain the chief provisions of the bill I think it is desirable to refer briefly to another important consideration. Under the Soldier Settlement Act of 1919, establishments were in the main predicated upon the soldier settler deriving his main income from the land upon which he was established. Similar provisions are contained in this bill, but it is sufficiently flexible to provide for a wide range of establishments involving the use of land. It is contemplated that establishments may be on a full-time farming programme or on small holdings where the veteran may derive his main income from employment apart from his holding.

With the brief statement that I have made of the vital principles of the bill, it may be desirable to explain its chief provisions in logical order. The desirabilty of such a measure, notwithstanding numerous failures which attended the Soldier Settlement Act, is strongly indicated by the expressed desire of substantial numbers of the members of the forces to engage in agricultural pursuits after the war. While our information about the intentions and desires of the members of the forces is not yet complete, sufficient information has been obtained to establish clearly that the number of men who wish to take up farming or to return to it will be very substantial. The demobilization committee of the government authorized a questionnaire to be addressed to all members of the forces with respect to their previous civil experience and training and their desires and ambitions for the future. The complete results of the questionnaire are not yet tabulated, so it is not possible as yet to indicate the precise number of men who have this desire. But a review of 200,000 of these forms indicates that 16·6 per cent of those completing the form had expressed the desire to settle on the land. This represents more than 33,000 individuals.

The following is a tabulation of the results obtained from an examination of more than 200,000 occupational history forms received and tabulated prior to October 31, 1941. It shows that in the navy, of a total of 17,588, those wishing to farm are 1,042 or 5·9 per cent. In the army the total examined numbered 136,913, and those wishing to farm are 29,067 or 21·2 per cent. In the air force the total number examined were 46,225, and those wishing to farm are 3,343, or 7·1 per cent, making an over-all average at that time, among that number, of 16·6.

Mr. GRAYDON: Would those be mostly farm boys?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, in most instances they were. It is a hopeful and encouraging sign in connection with the proposed legislation that the desire to go on the land which is found among members of the forces serving in the present war does not seem to have any of those romantic illusions which captured the imagination of the soldiers of our generation twenty-five years ago. The men who have expressed a desire to take up farming, in the present instance at least, seem to be actuated by a sober, serious appreciation of what is involved. It is in keeping with the serious purpose of this measure that the director administering it is to be empowered to make regulations regarding the qualifications to be required of applicants. That is, it is expected that a loan shall not be issued unless the director is satisfied that the man has experience and ability which justify the expectation that he can make a success of farming.

Mr. NEILL: These men have to be experienced?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Either they must have some experience or they must undergo a course of training, for which provision is made in the bill.

In regard to administration, the measure is to be administered by the Minister of Mines and Resources, through a director. Under the original Soldier Settlement Act, administration was placed in the hands of a statutory board. Later on, as hon. members are aware, that board was abolished and the administration was placed in the hands of one director. It has been deemed desirable to follow the latter practice in this instance. A board of three or more may be desirable where there are consultative features connected with the administration. Where, however, as in this measure, the administrative functions are not consultative but executive, it seems better that authority should be vested in one man, with the assistance of such technical advisers and staff as he may require.

I come now to the question of those who may be qualified. Those who qualify for assistance under this measure are confined to (1) members of the armed forces of Canada who served in a theatre of war; (2) members of the armed forces of Canada who did not serve in a theatre of war but who served for at least twelve months; and (3) Canadians who enlisted in the British forces, and particularly in the Royal Air Force.

Mr. STIRLING: Will (2) and (3) be treated the same as (1)?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes; provided they were residents of Canada before the war, the same conditions apply. Provided an applicant has the above qualifications arising from military service, it shall be within the discretion of the director to determine whether or not he is entitled to be assisted; that is, on the grounds of qualification. Broadly speaking, the discretion of the director will be concerned with a man's fitness and qualifications for the vocation of agriculture. In cases where applicants are considered to require training, the director may make provision for placing veterans with selected farmers for practical instruction. Provision is also made for arriving at agreements with the federal and various provincial departments of agriculture, or the extension departments of Canadian universities, or accredited agricultural schools or colleges, for the purpose of training veterans.

The measure does not provide for subsistence during the training period, because the post-discharge order, administered by the Department of Pensions and National Health, contains provision for a scale of allowances to be paid to ex-service men whom it is considered can be helped toward reestablishment by vocational training. It is intended that the two departments shall cooperate in this connection. The director of the Veterans' Land Act will indicate the type of training required; and when subsistence for the individual applicant is needed, it will be forthcoming from the Department of Pensions and National Health under order in council P.C. 7633.

I come now to the powers of the director. The director is to have authority to buy or acquire land and farm property, which is to be vested in the director as a corporation sole. The land and property acquired by him shall be subject to taxation in the ordinary way by a properly constituted taxing authority. Under the old Soldier Settlement Act there was a period of uncertainty, which was ended only through costly and confusing litigation, as to whether soldier settlement lands should be subject to municipal taxation. In the present bill this issue is faced definitely from the outset, and it has been decided that the land shall pay taxes to the local authorities in exactly the same way as any other farm property.

Two types of transactions between the director and the veterans applying for assistance are provided for in the measure. In one case the director buys the land and resells it to the veterans under agreement of sale, in accordance with the provisions of the bill. The director is required to calculate the cost price of any land acquired for the purpose of resale to veterans. In calculating the cost, he must take into account not only the price of the land but the cost of improvements effected under his own administration. A ceiling has been placed upon the cost which the director may incur in connection with any individual property; that ceiling is $4,800. This top limit is to include land and improvements, building materials, live stock and farm equipment. In connection with any individual transaction it is provided that the cost to the director of the land, improvements and building materials shall not exceed $3,600, out of the utmost price of $4,800. The veteran is required to make a cash down payment of ten per cent of the cost of the land, improvements and other materials. That is, if the property has cost the director the maximum amount, the veteran shall be required to pay down $360. It is provided that the live stock and farm equipment included in the transaction shall not exceed one-third of the cost to the director of the land, improvements and other materials. Again using the maximum figure, this means that if the land, improvements and building materials cost the director $3,600, the live stock and farm equipment shall not exceed $1,200. These two figures make up the ceiling cost of $4,800.

It is in the next provision that the government's grant to the settler is to be found. The sale price to the veteran of the complete enterprise, including live stock and farm equipment, shall be two-thirds of the cost to the director of the land, improvements and building materials. By way of illustration, if the land and improvements cost the director $3,600 and the stock and implements cost the director $1,200, or a total of $4,800, then the indebtedness assumed by the veteran shall be $2,400, and the down payment to be made by the veteran shall be $360. The interest set out in the bill is 3½ per cent, unless otherwise provided by the regulations. Payment shall be completed in a term of twenty-five years, with the interest calculated on an amortization basis. The director, however, may exercise his discretion to permit for the first five years the payment of interest only, but the total repayment period of twenty-five years is not to be exceeded.

No conveyance or transfer of the property shall be made to the veteran within the first ten years, and then only if the veteran has complied with the terms of his agreement. This means that the government's grant to the veteran is not made unless and until the veteran has proved by ten years' fulfilment of his contract that he is making good in his venture. While it is provided that the director shall not incur costs in excess of $4,800 upon any single property, there is nothing to debar a veteran from undertaking a larger venture if he is himself able out of his own resources to put up the additional amount of money required. In this connection it should be said that the proposed ceiling of $3,600 for the land is considered to be equivalent to the ceiling of $5,000 under the Soldier Settlement Act, having regard to present-day values.

I come now to the question of live stock and equipment. The Veterans' Land Act is so drafted that the veterans' land does not become encumbered with any charge or mortgage arising out of the acquisition of live stock and farm implements furnished to him by the director. The title in such live stock remains with the director until the time comes for disposal, when the director may facilitate marketing or exchange by conveying the ownership to the farmer.

In effect, live stock and equipment are merely issued to the farm and remain the property of the director until the ten-year period has elapsed, at the end of which the director may release the live stock and equipment to the veteran if he has complied with the terms of his agreement. This does not in any way militate against the farmer profiting from the sale of his live stock. Thus, increase from foundation stock may be sold and the proceeds used to meet farming expenses. It is expected, of course, that the value of foundation stock will be maintained.

The second type of assistance to settlers contemplated by the bill is a loan upon property which the veteran already owns. The amount of assistance, by way of loan, that may be made in these circumstances is limited to $3,200, and shall not exceed 60 per cent of the value of the land as established by the director.

Advances for the purpose of live stock and farm equipment shall not exceed 50 per cent of the value of the land, or a total of $2,500. Repayment may be extended over 25 years at the rate of 3½ per cent.

It is felt that this provision may be of assistance to a number of veterans who have farms encumbered by mortgages at higher rates of interest than provided for in this measure.

It is considered that there may very well be cases in which a veteran possessed of a property worth from $6,000 to $10,000 may need a loan of only $2,000 to facilitate resumption of farming occupations. In cases, however, where the property is heavily encumbered, it is probable that the Veteran's Land Act will prove of greater assistance through outright purchase by the director and resale to the veteran on the terms contemplated by the provisions already described.

The bill provides that the veteran shall keep his property insured and that all taxes and assessments shall be paid, but there is a provision that, if the veteran is unable to pay taxes when they are due, the director may do so in his behalf and demand repayment with interest at 3½ per cent.

One of the most important features of the bill is the method adopted for dealing with settlers who prove unsuccessful. Under the old Soldier Settlement Act, unsuccessful settlers clung to their land long after they should have given up the enterprise, and it was very difficult for the soldier settlement board to evict them, because from the very nature of the transaction it was exceedingly improbable that there could be any salvage to assist the settler in embarking upon any new enterprise.

The present bill gives the director definite powers of rescission when the veteran falls down on his payments. The director may, without resort to any legal proceedings, rescind the agreement and retake possession of the property. There is a requirement, however, that the director shall give thirty days' notice of intention by registered mail and, upon taking possession of the property, the director may sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of the property. Any surplus proceeds from the sale, over and above the outstanding costs and the expenses of the transaction, shall be paid to the veteran.

Before establishing any surplus, the director must take into account the cost to the director of all the property acquired for the veteran's establishment. Obviously this does not presuppose that veterans who fail will have established an equity in the enterprise. But there is provision in the bill to deal fairly with veterans who fail through ill health or other reasons beyond their control. If, in such cases, the director believes that no surplus will be realized upon resale, he may recommend to the minister, and the governor in council may, upon the minister's recommendation refund to the veteran his initial down payment in whole or in part.

In view of this, it is considered that the director will not be tempted to allow a veteran to continue a doomed enterprise beyond the point at which his failure is indicated. The prompt application of the director's powers to rescind the agreement and the repayment to the veteran either of his down payment, or of a realized surplus upon resale of his property, will give the veteran an opportunity to reestablish himself in some other occupation where he is likely to have greater success than in farming. It is of no real assistance to the veteran who is doomed to failure to let him carry on for an unduly long period. It is far more in his interest that he shall cut his losses and try some other enterprise before he is too old to be able to make the change.

There are in the bill a number of miscellaneous provisions of considerable interest. It is obvious that the director will have to acquire a large amount of land, and, for its conservation pending sale to a veteran, the director is authorized to lease the property on terms approved by the minister. It is considered also that, in transactions of the magnitude of those upon which the director is authorized to embark, there will be a percentage of errors of judgment in valuation. Where such errors appear, there is a procedure whereby, under the approval of the minister, the property may be revalued or sold to others than veterans.

The director is also authorized to sell lands at his disposal as sites for dairy factories, cheese factories, fruit preserving factories, creameries, or for any educational, religious or charitable purposes. He may also sell lands to any provincial or municipal authorities for any purpose. Nobody indebted to the director of soldier settlement, under the Soldier Settlement Act, may receive a loan or advance under this measure.

A set of circumstances that arose not infrequently under the Soldier Settlement Act has been guarded against by a provision that the director may refuse to sell to a veteran land occupied by his parents or other immediate relatives. It was a not uncommon experience, under the Soldier Settlement Act that a father would sell his farm to the soldier settlement board for resale to his soldier son on the advantageous terms provided for in the Soldier Settlement Act. The result in many instances was that the father received a substantial sum of money from the soldier settlement board and remained in occupancy and management of the farm exactly as he was before. The soldier settler was thereby saddled with the maintenance of his father's family, as well as his own, and the whole transaction contributed nothing to the real problem of soldier settlement.

There is also very strict provision excluding commissions on the sale of land to the director. The prohibitions with regard to commissions are extensively set out in sections 32 and 33 of the bill, and severe penalties are prescribed. The bill provides for regulations to be made by the director for administrative purposes, and all regulations are required to be published in the Canada Gazette and tabled in parliament.

It has been estimated that under this bill an expenditure of $80,000,000 will provide for the settlement of 25,000 veterans. On that number of men, the capital loss arising from the provision for granting the veteran a percentage of his equity, would be $34,000,000. This is an average of $1,360 per settler. The capital loss per case under the old act was an average of $4,000, which represents the concessions granted from time to time.

It will interest the committee to know that this bill is the result of more than a year's study and consideration by one of the committees set up under the cabinet committee on demobilization and reestablishment. The cabinet committee, it will be remembered, is advised by a general advisory committee, presided over by the chairman of the Canadian pension commission, and consisting of senior officers of eight or ten government departments.

The general advisory committee, in turn, set up a series of subcommittees to deal with specialized phases of the problem of reestablishment. One of these committees was assigned the subject of soldier settlement, and the present bill is the product of its labours. Advice and assistance were received not only from government officials, but from a number of authorities outside the service of the dominion government. Some of the most prominent citizens of Canada were engaged in that work for eighteen months, before the bill was finally approved by the government.

The members of this committee and its consultants and advisers are entitled to the thanks of the government and of this house for the measure which is to be presented to the house, after the adoption of the resolution.

In conclusion, I would commend the measure to the earnest consideration of the special committee, and afterwards, of the house.

Mr. STIRLING: One of the difficulties under the old act would seem to have been avoided in this. Under the old act it was possible for a veteran to choose his piece of land and ask that it be purchased on his behalf. Under this scheme will the veteran have any choice whatever as to the province, as to the part of the province and as to the type of land, or will it be left entirely in the hands of the director who has these lands for sale?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It will be left to the judgment of the director with such advisers as he may call in to indicate whether land is suitable for settlement and whether the applicant is liable to succeed if settled on the land.

Mr. BOUCHER: Will the veteran be able to decide in which province he is to settle?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would say yes, within reasonable limitations, provided that the conditions for success with the ceiling limitations existing in this bill are as good in one province as in the other. I would certainly think he should have the right to decide.

Mr. BOUCHER: Do I understand that a returned veteran will be able to obtain only what property the director has available? Do I understand that he cannot pick out a particular piece of land and then take advantage of this legislation to purchase it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I pointed out that there would be supplementary provisions in the bill whereby a veteran already owning land outside the general provisions of this bill could be assisted in reestablishment by refinancing under this legislation.

Mr. BOUCHER: That does not answer my question. What option has a veteran who has proven to the director that he is a fit and proper person to be established on the land given, as to a particular parcel of land he may prefer to purchase? What assistance will be given him in the purchase of a particular parcel of land not owned by the director? A man may want to go back on the old homestead or another farm near by.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I would say that that would be a matter entirely for the discretion of the director in consultation with the applicant. That is the only way whereby that could be successfully decided.

Mr. BOUCHER: Do I understand that if an applicant applies to the director and states his desire to purchase a certain parcel of land, the decision is left to the director whether that land will be purchased on behalf of the government and resold to the returned man?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is quite correct unless the director had available—I must be frank and say that I am rather speculating—sufficient land for the number who could be accommodated under the provisions of this legislation. Then, of course, the applicant would have to be accommodated from the lands already acquired. But if the director did not have sufficient land, then the situation mentioned by my hon. friend would be met.

Mr. BOUCHER: The veteran will have little say as to the purchase price of the land?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. BOUCHER: He would simply have to pay a proportion of the price the director paid for that parcel of land?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. HAZEN: Were the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act limited to soldiers who had lived in Canada prior to the last war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No; I think the provisions of that act were extended to our allies. That is why the provisions of this bill are limited to those who resided in Canada prior to this war.

Mr. HAZEN: That is rather a funny reason.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I think it is a fair reason, unless there is reciprocity among our allies and we are given the same treatment in their countries.

Mr. BOUCHER: Would the minister go a little more fully into the matter of the judgment of the director in connection with settling a veteran on the land? I can contemplate a condition where a great number of young men who left agriculture at a very young age have spent three or four years overseas. They will come back without a firm foundation of agricultural knowledge. They did not have that before they left; and after a number of years of war when they seek to return to the world they left behind they will find that considerable changes have taken place meanwhile. Let us assume that a young man has satisfied the director that he is a fit and proper person to return to the farm. Would it not be in the public interest, either by a course of training or instruction, to see that this man was given the necessary training in farm pursuits? I think the minister realizes that farming today is not what it was in the days of the last war. It is a much more technical pursuit, requiring more skilled management in carrying it out. After this war is over, it will probably be much more so. I think the utmost care will have to be taken in seeing that these young men are given the proper training. The veteran who has dreamed of a utopia on the land is quite likely to find a different condition existing upon his return; and if he is not given the proper training before being placed on the land, his chances of success may be lessened.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to point out to hon. members of the committee that when a resolution is introductory of a bill, only the principle of the bill should be discussed; the committee should not discuss the details of the bill to be introduced. There is a certain latitude given to hon. members, but I do not think it goes to the extent of permitting a discussion of the powers of the proposed director or the conditions under which the soldiers are to be reestablished on the land. The principle may be discussed quite broadly, but I do not believe at this time it would be in order to go too fully into the details.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Perhaps I was out of order in going into the details in my presentation, but I asked for the indulgence of the committee and, earlier to-day, of the house, because this bill will not be in committee again. It will go straight from the second reading to a special committee which has been appointed by the house, and because of that fact possibly we may have a little more latitude than is customary according to the rules of the house.

Mr. BOUCHER: I think it is dealing with the principle of the bill to ascertain the qualifications of the participants of its advantages.

Mr. GRAYDON: I doubt if there is a subject which could come before the committee where the personal equation enters more into the picture than it does in this matter of soldier land settlement. I should like to point out to the minister in charge that I have a great sympathy with him because of the problem which he is attempting to meet with this proposed legislation. Those who have made some study of the problems which successive governments have had to solve in connection with land settlement since the last war will realize the problem which now confronts this administration. But I do submit that in dealing with the question of veterans' land settlement the whole matter of the disparity between agricultural returns and those from other industries in the dominion must inevitably be taken into consideration and must inevitably form a factor as to whether this scheme shall be a success or a failure.

I can conceive of the difficulties encountered by any person going on the land. I can still recall most vividly the difficulties my own father experienced through the years in trying to wipe out debt on his agricultural lands. It meant not only hard work but long hours and the saving of every possible penny of farm income. For that reason it seems to me that the committee must take into consideration the necessity of bringing the man on the farm up to a position of economic equality with other classes in this dominion. It is all very well to give our soldiers who are demobilized from active service after the war every possible advantage to start with, but something more is needed to keep them on the land after they get there, as well as those already on the land who have now a stake in agriculture. Most of the farmers with whom I have talked are of the opinion that it is almost impossible in many parts of Canada to-day for a man to make ends meet, if he has to pay interest upon any considerable portion of his investment.

I think we all realize that the difference between success and failure on the land, whether the farmer be a soldier or a civilian, is quite often a matter of how much interest he has to pay on the debt owing on his farm and the amount of principal he has to repay. So it seems to me that in this soldier settlement plan which has been outlined by the minister we must first of all bring agriculture up to a parity with other lines of activity in our economic life. Not only must we encourage these men to produce the stuff, but we must help them find a market for it at a proper price after it is produced. I can conceive of nothing more pathetic than to bring a man who has been demobilized from active service into any industry which has not at least an equal chance of success with other lines of activity.

May I say this too, from a practical point of view. The question of the adaptability of the man who is to go on the farm is of major importance and must never be lost sight of in the administration of this measure.

There are many people who think they would like to farm, but the desire to farm and the ability to make a success of it, are two different matters, and we have had thousands of cases across this dominion to show that the adaptability of the individual is a most important factor. Then there is, of course, an angle which the bachelor Minister of Pensions and National Health could not be expected to appreciate. From my experience in agriculture—and this is no reflection on the menfolk on the farms—I would say: Show me a good farmer's wife and I will show you a good farmer. The womenfolk are a very important factor in the success of anyone who settles on the land, no matter where he may be.

May I say, in closing, that the director of this project and the board that is to be set up will need to do much more than take just simply a business administrative interest in these settlers. They will need to exercise a fatherly supervising eye over the men who go on the land. Some of the most glaring failures in land settlement under previous administrations have been largely attributable to the fact that men were placed on the land, given an opportunity that looked good on paper, and then afterwards there was no supervision, no fatherly eye was kept upon them by those in authority or even by their neighbours. The director himself ought not to be just an ordinary civil servant, and I am making no reflection on the service when I say that, because the thought I have in mind is that the director of this land settlement scheme must be first of all a man who has made his own money by the sweat of his brow on a dirt farm. I do not care whether he is a prominent citizen of Canada or not. I am more interested in getting a man who knows the farm problem intimately so that he will understand what the settlers will face when they go on the land. Certainly he should be a veteran of the last war and, if possible, a man who has undertaken and made a success, if you will, of farm settlement under some scheme administered by previous governments. He should have associated with him men of broad, practical farming experience.

I want to say this to the committee, that so far we have only scratched the surface in giving agriculture adequate representation on the many boards which have been appointed in this country in connection with our war effort. We should not be ashamed to put farmers upon every board in the country. If we had had more farmers on boards in Canada in the last twenty-five years, certainly we would have had less extravagance and better management than we have had on many public boards in this dominion.

Mr. MacNICOL: We should perhaps have farmers in the cabinet.

Mr. GRAYDON: My good friend the hon. member for Davenport brings up a very delicate question. A lot of the cabinet would like to look like good farmers—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is a compliment.

Mr. GRAYDON:—but I am told they belong for the most part to the professions. The board to be appointed must never lose sight of the advantage of having the advice of practical farmers who understand what it means for a man and his wife to go on a soldier settlement farm to carve out what may prove to be a very precarious living. The committee, then, it seems to me, should give consideration, first of all, to the adaptability of the men who are to go on the land; next, sympathetic supervision should be exercised over them; and equally important, there should be something like equality of opportunity with other lines in our economic life. In other words, our farmers should have a parity of return, the opportunity of being on an equal basis with other lines in our economic life.

Mr. QUELCH: I find myself thoroughly in accord with the sentiments which have just been expressed by the hon. member for Peel. I do not feel any too optimistic about the chances of the soldier's success under this land settlement scheme. Any soldier who starts with a debt of $3,600 on a half- or quarter-section of land and has to farm under an agricultural policy such as we had in this country from 1930 to 1939, will find that he has an impossible task on his hands.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My hon. friend referred to a maximum debt of $3,600. The maximum debt will be $2,400.

Mr. QUELCH: Even with a debt of $2,000 on a quarter- or half-section of land, the soldier will find he has an impossible task on his hands under the type of agricultural policy that we had in this country from 1930 to 1939, because during that period, year after year, the farmers had to sell their products below the cost of production. Show me any concern that continues to produce below the cost of production, and I will show you a concern that is going to go into debt. Before considering any new land settlement scheme, the government would be well advised to take the necessary steps to clean up the old one—and that old scheme needs a good deal of cleaning up at the present time.

In order to judge of the principle of this new bill, we should have a thorough understanding of the land settlement act that was brought in at the end of the last war. Then, perhaps, we shall be in a better position to avoid the tragic mistakes which were made under that one. The story of settlement under the last scheme is one of tragedy and despair, interspersed all too infrequently with happy memories or records of success. I want to stress to the minister the all-important fact that unless a more humane attitude is adopted towards many of those men who still remain under the scheme, the closing chapters of that story are indeed going to be sordid ones. Since the government has undoubtedly a very direct responsibility for the conditions which exist under that scheme, I think they should take immediate steps to rectify them.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health dealt to a certain extent with the former scheme, but on the other hand there are many angles with which he did not deal. He did not refer at any length to the tragic conditions which exist under that scheme as a result of the policy laid down by the government.

Some of the main reasons for this unhappy picture may be briefly summarized as follows:

In the first place the method of selecting settlers was a haphazard one. Many of the soldiers regarded the scheme as just another adventure. They were neither physically nor mentally equipped for the job. The majority of them in the early stages of the scheme gave up. Then, many settlers—and the same will happen after this war—brought back young wives from the old country, girls who had lived a decent, simple country life; and these girls were called upon to live in such squalor and poverty that, in a great many instances, they refused to stay on the land. In some instances the family left the land; in others, domestic troubles ensued and the families were broken up. In either event that was the end of the soldier as a settler. In many instances the choice of supervisor was unfortunate. Men were chosen who had no qualifications for the job. Poor land was purchased as well as inferior stock and equipment. The soldier settler was exploited from every side. For some reason or another the soldier settler after the last war was looked upon as fair game for exploitation, and unfortunately the supervisor too often was not qualified to give him the protection which he needed. Purchases were made while prices were greatly inflated. Any old cows were selling at $125 each, and equivalent peak prices obtained for other kinds of stock. Land prices were based on $2 a bushel wheat. Consequently the settler had to face an interest-bearing debt which he could not possibly meet.

Mr. ILSLEY: May I ask the hon. member a question? Would he not say that the greatest cause of the failure of farmers under the scheme of the last war was inflation, the inflation at the end of the war?

Mr. QUELCH: Undoubtedly inflation was one of the causes, but I would not say that it was the main cause. I would point out to the minister that even the civilian farmers, who had benefited by inflation, found themselves in tragic circumstances afterwards. The distress was not confined to the soldier settler. If the civilian farmer twenty years after the war found himself in a position of bankruptcy, how much more likely was it that the soldier settler would be in a no less difficult position? To a certain extent, of course, inflation exists at present. If you compare prices of stock before the war with prices to-day, you might say that to-day's prices are highly inflated, or rather that the price of stock before the war was greatly deflated.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was just trying to be helpful; that is all. I think that shows the tremendous importance of preventing inflation now and at the end of this war, because it was the high prices which were paid for farms and for stock by these soldier settlers which weighed them down and kept them in misery for a decade or more and eventually ruined a great many.

Mr. QUELCH: Would the minister say that prices of stock to-day are not inflated? If that is the situation, would he guarantee that the prices which are now received for stock will be continued after the war? Can he guarantee that five years after the war the price of cattle will not be half what it is to-day? I do not think he would consider for one minute doing so.

Mr. ILSLEY: I cannot guarantee anything of that kind but I will guarantee that I will do everything within my power, and the government will do all it can, to prevent the kind of inflation which set in after the last war.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What about the deflation which will set in?

Mr. QUELCH: I believe the farmer will be more interested if the government will guarantee that the condition of deflation which we had in this country from 1930 to 1939 will not be allowed to come again. It is all very well to talk about inflation but speaking generally the farmer benefits as a result of inflation; it is deflation against which he wishes to be protected.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not talking about these soldier settlers buying farms during a period of deflation.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. QUELCH: Unfortunately they were victims of something which was far worse than that. I know many soldier settlers and civilian farmers who in 1928 were fairly well off who had a fair amount of money in the bank a paid-up insurance policy and no mortgage, but who at the beginning of the present war were bankrupt. It was this continued deflationary policy which, along with drought, ruined the farmers. I know many who did not suffer from drought who were ruined by low prices. No farmer can continue year after year to produce crops and stock below the cost of production and continue in business. Once his reserves are gone, he is forced into debt. We all know that was the position of agriculture. Of course, any farmer who has to start in during an inflationary period is under a still greater handicap.

Another big mistake which was made was that many soldier settlers were placed on marginal land, and in a drought area. The constituency I represent comprises a great part of the drought area of Alberta. Many soldier settlers were placed in that area, in spite of the fact that the government had been warned year after year by their engineers and surveyors that that land was not suitable for the purpose. Just to show the type of land to which I refer, eight million acres have been taken back by the provincial government, who are now leasing, in many instances three thousand acres to each farmer, realizing that it takes that amount of land to enable him to make a living. Yet soldier settlers were put in that area on a half-section or a quarter-section basis. What possible chance had those men of making a success? They were settled under the advice and supervision of the soldier settlement board. All expenditures had to be passed by the board for payment. Therefore, I think, the federal government assumed a very direct responsibility for what took place.

The minister gave some figures of the number of settlers who went on the land and the number who are left. I want to quote another set of figures. To-day, approximately twenty-three years after the initiation of the scheme, out of a total of twenty-five thousand established under the act, only 7,360 remain under the scheme. Of course that does not mean that all of the 17,640 can be classified as failures. I believe that three thousand of them have paid in full for their land, but undoubtedly the majority of these men must be looked upon as failures. I want to break down that 7,360. Of the 7,360 who still remain under the scheme, 2,953 have an average equity of 67·5 per cent; 606 have an average equity of 32 per cent, 1,078 have an average equity of 16 per cent, and 2,723 have absolutely no equity of any kind. So, out of the total of 7,360, 3,801, or 52 per cent, have an equity of less than 16 per cent. In other words, 52 per cent of the soldier settlers who are still under the scheme have no chance of ever making a success. I say that for this reason. I want to quote figures which were given to the special committee on pensions last year by Mr. Walter Woods. I will quote what he stated at the time, as reported at page 768 of the record:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I understand that this morning I am required to make some comment on the deliberations of a subcommittee of the general advisory committee that has been dealing with the subject of land settlement for the new forces.

He goes on:

It is perhaps sufficient to say that the committee finds itself in agreement on certain important principles, the outstanding one of which is that state financial assistance, a substantial part of which will not be recoverable, is a prerequisite to the institution of any comprehensive plan of land settlement as a rehabilitation measure.

This is the important point to which I wish to call attention:

The question arises as to what is a safe margin. What equity should a settler have to ensure reasonable chances of success? Private mortgage companies have set a limit of approximately 50 per cent. The Canadian farm loan board has a limit of 50 per cent. The Central Mortgage Bank Act contemplates reducing the farmer's total debt for land and equipment to 80 per cent.

You will notice that the private mortgage companies figure that a soldier must have an equity of at least 50 per cent in the land; yet to-day, under the land settlement scheme, there are 3,801 men who have an equity of less than 16 per cent. In other words, we are justified in saying that at least 52 per cent of the men who are still under the scheme have little or no chance of succeeding. What is to become of these men? The majority of the 3,801 have come under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act; but unfortunately, owing to continued crop failures and low prices, they have lost all the benefits of their reductions. But even if they were young, even if their equipment were in good shape, those men would not have any chance of succeeding, judging from the figures given to the committee by Mr. Woods. Unfortunately, however, they are no longer young. The majority of them are getting on in age. Their stock and equipment are old and their buildings are dilapidated. To-day these men are being pressed—I think I am almost justified in saying that they are being hounded—by the soldier settlement board. I am not criticizing the board for their action because they are only carrying out a policy imposed upon them. Let me read a letter from the British Empire Service League on a very important question—rather, it is not a letter but the report of a soldiers' committee. It is the report of the soldiers' settlers committee of the legion.

Your committee begs to report as follows:

Since being appointed at a meeting of the provincial council held in the Memorial hall, Edmonton, on January 2nd of this year, to investigate soldier settlers' affairs, I have received from the provincial secretary copies of the resolutions dealing with soldier settlers; and I have written the branch sponsoring the resolution, asking for statutory declarations to substantiate the claims set forth in their resolutions.

I have had sufficient replies with the required evidence to prove that all is not well with our comrades, the soldier settlers, and it is my considered opinion that many of them are struggling under a load of debt too great for them to carry. I find from the evidence submitted that the S.S.B. has been insistent on the yearly payments being met regardless of whether there was enough left over to insure a living for the settler or not.

In many cases where the soldier settler was dispossessed, the land was sold later to other parties, who were not ex-service men, for a great deal less money than the debt of the original settler for the board amounted to. It is possible that if the board had given the soldier settler the same price as the land was sold for he might have been able to carry on and remain in possession of his land.

I have also seen letters myself written by the board to soldier settlers informing them that in view of the fact that they were in the position where they could not pay for the land, they might as well get off it. I would ask, where are these men to go? They are told that they have no chance of succeeding now and that they have no equity. Where will they go if they are forced off the land? Men of that age cannot easily find a job, and many of them are physically incapable of working. Of that total only 554 are receiving war veterans' allowance. I would say that as part of our war effort immediate steps should be taken to investigate the situation in regard to these 3,801 men to whom I have referred. Before initiating any new scheme, I think it is the obligation of the government to take the necessary steps to reestablish those men who are already on the land. I have absolutely no faith that under the new scheme conditions in the long run will be any better than they are under this one, unless the government can guarantee an agricultural policy for the future which will return to the farmers cost of production. I would recommend that where there is a chance of a settler carrying on, especially where he has the help of his children, the amount of the debt should be written down to a point where he will be in a position to pay it. I say to the government, treat him the same as you are treating the soldiers of this war. Treat him the same as he should have been treated under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Owing to the continuance of low prices, the farmer now finds himself no better off than when his debts were reduced under that act.

Unfortunately the board have no power to reduce these debts to the point I suggest. Legislation is necessary to make it possible. I have spoken to officials of the board, and I found that they would have been only too glad to make a reduction, but they had no power. They could only suggest that where the settler was married, he should release the farm so as to enable his wife to buy it from the board. They would be then in a position to sell it to her at a greatly reduced figure. Why they had to deal with the subject in that roundabout way I do not know, but not all settlers have wives, and it can be done only where there is a wife. On the other hand, where the disability or the ill-health of the soldier prevents his ever making a success of the farm, even if the debt were reduced, I would urge on the government that they carry on a somewhat similar scheme for such men as they propose under the new measure. They should place these men in communities, in low rental cottages, with decent gardens, and pay them a war veterans' allowance so that they can at least finish their days in a certain amount of peace.

Let me refer to one thing more, a certain action on the part of this government which I regard as despicable. I would not have believed that this government could possibly be guilty of such an action if the evidence had not been presented to me. The government passed an order in council which gave them power to seize a portion of dependent's allowance in payment of the soldier settler's debt. When that matter was first called to my attention I told the particular settler, "You must be wrong, because under the regulations dependent's allowances cannot be touched." He replied, "I don't know whether they can or cannot be touched, but the point is that they are being seized at the present time."

When I got here I took the matter up with the board and found that order in council P.C. 138, 1936, had been passed. Perhaps I should read that order in council because there are not very many people who are familiar with it. I hope the minister is not proud of his responsibility for this order in council.

The board has had under consideration a submission of the honourable the Minister of Mines and Resources reporting that:

1. A considerable number of persons who agreed to purchase farms from the soldier settlement board or from the director of soldier settlement on long term contracts have enlisted in the Canadian armed forces.

2. In many cases the dependents of such enlisted persons continue to occupy their farms but no provision has been made for payment of instalments in respect of their contracts or of taxes in respect of their farms.

3. The director of soldier settlement has no authority to carry such accounts indefinitely and it is considered desirable to provide for deductions from dependents' allowances to cover local taxes and interest due.

Accordingly the board recommend that notwithstanding any provision to the contrary contained in any of the regulations providing for payment of dependents' or marriage allowances in respect of dependents of members of the Canadian armed forces, that in all cases where the dependents of an enlisted person continue to occupy the farm for which such person is indebted to the director of soldier settlement and in respect of which the contract terms are not otherwise satisfactorily provided for, there may be deducted from the dependents' or marriage allowance amounts sufficient to provide for payment of taxes levied by the local taxing authority in respect of the property in question and interest accruing annually on indebtedness to the director of soldier settlement, such deductions to be made monthly and in no case to exceed $20 per month except with the consent of the dependents concerned.

After having read this, I wrote the settler asking if he would forward me the correspondence that had taken place between himself and the board with regard to this matter. A number of cases were brought to my attention, but I am going to refer only to one specific case. First, I should like to read the letter which the soldier settler received from the board, without giving the name:

We have for acknowledgment your letter of September 26 requesting that we consider cancelling the deduction from your dependents' allowance of $13 a month under P.C. 138/1936.

Before it is possible for us to make any recommendation in this connection to head office it must be ascertained what amount will be received from the crop proceeds to apply against the contract.

You no doubt realize the state of your husband's account. The current loan instalment amounts to $126.36 with arrears outstanding of $355.65 making a total due on October 1 of $482.01. To date, against this sum we have only received $73.89.

When your husband's account was adjusted under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act the board of review ordered that in each year the department should receive a one-fourth share of all crops grown on this land as collateral to the payment called for annually but this, of course, is not the basis of the settlement. In other words, if the crop share does not meet the annual payment, Mr. . . . is required to make up the difference.

According to the information we have received, the one-fourth share of the crop this year will in no way meet the equivalent of an annual instalment nor will it even amount to the carrying charges.

We must, therefore, leave this matter in abeyance for the time being.

You will notice that according to the agreement under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, this settler had to turn over one-quarter of his crop, but that did not meet the payment, so they were deducting $13 a month from the dependents' allowance.

Mr. CRERAR: Does the letter state what the allowance was?

Mr. QUELCH: It does not. This man had a number of children, but at that time they were given allowances for only two children, so it could not have been more than $35 plus the allowance for the two children. I took up this matter with the board, who finally agreed to refund the amount of money that this woman had paid out of the crop proceeds, under the agreement, but they refused to stop this seizure of a portion of the dependents' allowance. I suggested that it would be better for them to insist upon the turning over of one-quarter of the crop, and allow this woman to keep the dependents' allowance. Their reply, however, was "No, we will not do that, for this reason. She may not always get a crop. If we just insist on a quarter share of the crop we may get nothing, but if we deduct a share of the dependents' allowance we will get that right along." In other words, they were destroying the very principle laid down by the dependents' allowance regulations, of which section 98 reads:

A dependent's allowance may not be claimed as a right. The allowance is for the purpose of promoting the well-being and efficiency of the military forces of Canada by providing a means to alleviate the financial anxieties of temporarily enrolled members with respect to the domestic welfare of dependents. . . .

Note that; it is for the purpose of removing anxiety from the mind of the soldier; yet the soldier settlement board refuses to accept a part of the crop, insisting upon a portion of the dependents' allowance because they do not want any financial anxiety. They prefer to place that anxiety upon the soldier, though it was the purpose of these regulations to remove it.

Mr. CRERAR: In the instance cited by the hon. member, did the soldier's wife manage the farm, or was it rented to someone else?

Mr. QUELCH: I shall deal with that point after I have read the next letter.

The CHAIRMAN: I must direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he is going into very full detail as to the application of the previous land settlement act. A general discussion, in general terms, of the proposed bill and the former act might be permissible, and some latitude might be allowed, but I do not believe the hon. gentleman is in order in going into very great detail with respect to the application of the other act.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There has been no objection on the part of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN: It is not a question of any objection; it is a question of the application of the rules.

Mr. QUELCH: To show that I am keeping within the rules, we are discussing the general principles of the new bill—

The CHAIRMAN: Exactly. I was pointing out to the hon. gentleman that as long as he deals with the general principles, he is quite in order; but when he goes into minute details and reads letters with respect to cases arising under the former land settlement act, I must rule that he is out of order.

Mr. QUELCH: I was just going to point out that in dealing with the general principles of the new bill, the only way in which we can possibly judge as to whether or not those principles are good is by making a detailed analysis of the old act. Are you, Mr. Chairman, in a position to say whether this proposition is sound?

The CHAIRMAN: My ruling has been given, and the hon. gentleman will have opportunity for full discussion at the proper stage, which will be in committee. When the bill is referred to the special committee the hon. gentleman will have full opportunity to point out the details that he now has in mind.

Mr. QUELCH: Perhaps, while complying with your ruling, I may be permitted to answer the question which was directed to me a few minutes ago by the Minister of Mines and Resources, as to whether this dependent was herself farming the land. She is farming the land; but in order to do so she has to employ a man to run the farm, and she needs the dependents' allowance in order to pay him the wages for the work which otherwise her husband would have been doing. If the government is going to seize a portion of the dependents' allowance, this woman will not have the money with which to pay this man. During the winter, because of the health of the children and the distance to school, she has to move into town and pay rent. The only excuse given by the board in this case was that they were merely charging a fair rental for the use of the farm property. If that is true, I would ask this question. If a soldier owns a house, does the board deduct from the dependents' allowance in that case an amount equal to the rent for that building? Certainly it does not. Then, why should it be deducted in the case of a person on the land, who is far less able to pay? If the government are justified in this action, a mortgage company would be equally justified in asking the government to allow it to seize a certain proportion of a dependents' allowance as fair rent for property on which they have a mortgage. Why should the government take unto itself the right to do something that no one else can do? I think, as I said before, that this is a most despicable action.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What was the average capital indebtedness of each farmer under the old act? I understand there were about twenty-five thousand settlers?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): There were 24,793 soldier settlers and 224 Indians.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And the total indebtedness was about $109,000,000?

Mr MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Then that would give an average investment or debt of about $4,400?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I believe $4,600 was the average original investment.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Did I understand the minister to say that the average capital loss on those debts was about $4,000?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct. That includes interest charges.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I think that is where the nigger comes in. In other words, these soldier settlers paid $65,000,000—I believe that is the amount collected over a period of years.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: And the cost of collecting that was about $26,000,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): About $25,000,000, I think.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Yes. In spite of this, there is a capital loss to the settlement board averaging about $4,000 on an original debt of $4,400 to $4,600. The cost of collection runs about 40 per cent. We would have been a good deal further ahead if we had given them the land, to start with. We would have had about 25,000 noble veterans of the last war who would have had homes. But the net result of what has happened is that only 10 per cent of these men have been able to pay off their indebtedness, in spite of the fact that settlers altogether have paid $65,000,000. Two-thirds of these noble veterans have given up in despair.

Where are they to-day? The 33 per cent who do remain on their homes are, in many instances, living in miserable hovels. They are living in fear and in insecurity. They are wondering when the representatives of the soldier settlement board will be around to ask them to give up everything, to sign a quit-claim deed and get off the land. Those veterans are now twenty years older than when they returned from the last war, when they were willing to give their lives for this land of ours. Now their home is tied down to debt —to inflation, as the Minister of Finance has said. Interest is bled out of these people on that debt.

As the previous speaker has pointed out, the government is apparently out-Shylocking Shylock in passing orders in council compelling the wives of these men to take certain action. If the settler enlists again, in many instances to obtain a living, she is forced by order in council, to give up a portion of her separation allowance. In many instances these returned veterans are only wrecks of their former selves. Surely it should be the intention of such a bill to provide homes for those men who were willing to sacrifice. If that is so, then in heaven's name remove some of the worry and insecurity and fear that fill the hearts of these people. Give them a chance to make homes for themselves. Is that not the intention?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): That is what this bill is to do.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Then it is failing in its objective, because it leaves the same principle in the bill. How are we to know the value of the properties for which these men are going to be asked to pay? Is the property going to be valued by the director? Will he place the price upon it? What will the price be, and who will say what that price will be?

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): They are paying only 50 per cent of the cost this time.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Whose cost? If it is 50 per cent of something valued at twice what it is worth, what is the difference? In the years those men spent on the land they have given all their labour, and the labour of their wives and families to produce some cash return, something to maintain their home. They are forced to pay their taxes; those must be paid. In this instance the board is going to lend that money to pay the taxes, and pile that on top of the soldier's indebtedness.

Then, every year the capital debt against each man is going to reap its interest. True, the interest rate is lower than it was last time. Still it is too great, because in all those years when there was no return for a farmer's work his labour went for nothing; but the capital invested there has to be paid its interest; the debt must reap its reward. Oh, yes, capital has to have its reward, whether labour is paid or not!

The second suggestion made by the hon. member for Acadia was that something should be done under the bill to provide decent homes for these people. Something should be done to see that men going into this scheme are not tied down to burdens too great for them to carry. Something should be done for those men who are already trying to hang on, on present settlement board farms throughout the country. If for 20 years these men have continued on those farms; if they have worked for 20 years and have stuck to their jobs, surely those men and their wives and families, after what they have suffered as a result of the last war, should receive better treatment. Surely, for the balance of their worried lives they should be told, "Well, you have done your bit. At least there is a home for you for the rest of your days." Instead of that, they are being hounded and asked to pay interest and payments, year after year.

I received a letter from one of them who happens to live in my constituency. His income will not be any more than $300 cash for the whole year. He has paid his taxes this year. He informed the supervisor that his wife had contracted a cancer, and that she had been in hospital for about seven weeks. The supervisor was informed that the wife would have to return to the hospital every two months, but no account was taken of that. On the contrary he received a letter from the provincial office telling him they would like to receive $15 or $20 as a token payment, to keep the debt in good standing.

This type of thing—well, I claim it is almost sabotage, in days like these. Some better ray of hope than what is shown in this bill will have to be placed before them. The treatment of these men has been dastardly, and I do not see much hope in this bill unless there is a change of viewpoint.

The purpose of the bill should be that of providing homes, with security. Assuming that a farm in an ordinary year should make a certain return, then I would say in such case a settler could make a payment, and I believe he would be willing to. But in those years when there are no returns for work, there should be no interest piled on—none at all. Weather conditions, crop conditions, price conditions, and market conditions vary from year to year. These are matters over which the farmer has no control. But, in spite of the fact that he is prevented from earning anything, extra debt is placed upon him. This should not be.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, I certainly cannot let the remarks of the hon. member for Yorkton pass without challenging them. Let me say at once that the contribution he has made to the discussion to-night is of very little aid either to the soldier of the last war, or to those who will return from the present one. The hon. member lacks a sense of reality, altogether.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: Well—

Mr. CRERAR: I did not interrupt the hon. member, and I ask him to keep his place now. When he says the treatment accorded by the government to the men who returned from the last war was dastardly, I throw it back in his teeth, and tell him he does not know what he is talking about.

The Minister of Pensions and National Health gave a summary of the benefits or readjustments made on behalf of the returned men who settled on the land after the last war. There is no doubt that there were many who settled at that time who should not have done so. But they expressed a preference to go to the land, and their preference was met.

I cannot agree either with the hon. member for Acadia. I do not know whether these two hon. gentlemen are in favour of the principle of the bill, or are opposed to it. I would judge from their remarks that they are opposed, and that they do not wish to see the government make any provision for the settlement on land of the men who will come back from the present war. If they are in favour of the bill, why do they not rise in their places and say so?

The hon. member for Acadia painted a rather gloomy picture of the last land settlement scheme. I admit that there were difficulties. The scheme was new when it was undertaken—I may tell the committee that I did not have any responsibility for that scheme—it was a new venture altogether in land settlement. There is no doubt that high prices were paid for the land because, as the Minister of Finance stated a moment ago, it was bought at a time of highly inflated values. The scheme came into effect and was operative in the latter part of 1919, and in 1920 and 1921, before deflation in values took place. It was during those years that a large amount of the land upon which these men were settled was purchased, and unquestionably it was purchased at inflated values. That was recognized by the several adjustments that were made from time to time. I would say that that was the first difficulty in the last scheme.

The next difficulty was that no test was made of the men who were settled on the land; that is, no test of their experience in a practical way to manage and operate farms. I think I am within the judgment of those in the house who are familiar with farming operations when I say that to succeed on a farm a man needs some experience and the ability to apply managerial skill; he must have the ability to apply those qualities that lead to success in any occupation. The old-fashioned idea was—perhaps it entered too much into the last scheme—that the main requisite for a farmer was a strong back. That is not the situation. If a man is going to succeed in farming, he must possess managerial skill, experience and the knowledge of how to make the best of the occupation he is in. Without discrediting any of the returned men from the last war, I think it is admitted that many of them did not have that experience. Indeed, some of them had never been on a farm in their lives, at least had not done any practical work, and naturally they were handicapped. That was a serious handicap.

In many instances men were settled on poor land. I am not going to criticize the methods by which the land settlement scheme was carried through; but I know that in my own province, in the area between lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba, the land is not good farming land, and yet many soldier settlers were placed there. They were handicapped from the beginning by that very fact. These have been guarded against in the measure which the Minister of Pensions and National Health introduced to the house this evening. There is provision for the selection of suitable land; there is provision that experienced men only are to be placed on the land. If an individual has not had farming experience, an opportunity is to be given to him to acquire that experience in a practical way before he undertakes the job of managing his own farm.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Cooperation by the provinces.

Mr. CRERAR: There will be a provision in the bill to guard against the acquisition of poor land. Benefiting by the experience gained in the operation of the soldier land settlement scheme, provision is made to guard against these things as far as it is possible to do so. Provision is made also for much more generous assistance on the part of the government than was given under the last scheme. With the experience gained in the operation of the soldier land settlement scheme, there is a reasonable chance—I would say a good chance—that in the great majority of cases this scheme will succeed.

The last scheme was not quite the dreary failure indicated in the remarks made a short time ago by the hon. member for Acadia. There were between 24,000 and 25,000 settlers placed upon the land.

Mr. GILLIS: As I understood the Minister of Pensions and National Health, he told us definitely that in the working out of the last scheme for land settlement you had something then which you have not now—you had land. As far as the federal government is concerned, they have no land now. Where is the director who is going to place these men on the land going to get the land upon which to place them?

Mr. CRERAR: I can tell my hon. friend that that will be the least of the difficulties of the director. In the last scheme there were between 24,000 and 25,000 settlers placed upon the land. Of those, over 3,800 have title to their land to-day; they have made their payments in full, they own their homes and there is nothing against them. It is estimated that another 5,800 or thereabouts have from a fair to a substantial equity in their properties, and in the course of time they will probably acquire title to their homes.

Mr. QUELCH: I challenge those figures as not being correct. I have a letter here from the superintendent of the soldier settlement board which gives different figures entirely.

Mr. CRERAR: The figures which I give will not conflict with the information my hon. friend has.

Mr. QUELCH: They certainly do.

Mr. CRERAR: That was achieved in the face of the difficulties I outlined a moment ago as attendant upon the inauguration of the soldier land settlement scheme following the last war. A note has been handed to me which may give a little comfort to the hon. member for Cape Breton South who is doubtful as to whether land can be secured. According to the last census figures, there are to-day over 70,000 farms in Canada occupied by farmers over sixty-five years of age with no grown sons to follow them. All the time farms of that kind are coming into the market. Let me repeat: I do not think there will be any problem in securing suitable land.

Mr. Chairman, I ask your indulgence because I realize that I am out of order, but I do not want to let the statement made by the hon. member for Acadia pass without some qualifications. He gave an instance of a veteran of the last war who had enlisted in this war, leaving his wife and several children on the farm. He criticized the government severely because it had asked that a certain amount, I believe it was $13 a month, should be given by the recipient of the allowance toward paying taxes and maintaining interest payments on the farm. There are cases of that kind.

I think that was the kind of case to which the hon. member for Yorkton applied the adjective "dastardly". What were the circumstances of the case? In the first place, the wife of the soldier got an allowance of $35 a month contingent upon his assigning $20 of his pay each month. For each of two children she got an allowance of $12 a month. Therefore altogether she was in receipt of $79 a month. She was not disturbed in her possession of the farm; she could rent it or work it herself, and pay a quarter of the proceeds to the soldier settlement board. She was asked to pay $13 a month for taxes and to help pay the interest on the amount that was owing. That is the treatment to which the hon. member for Yorkton applies the adjective "dastardly". I think it would require a pretty good stretch of the imagination for anyone to consider that dastardly treatment.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: I was not referring merely to that. It seemed to me dastardly that the government would take unto itself powers which were not permitted even to a mortgage company.

Mr. CRERAR: I have as Minister of Mines and Resources charge of the administration of the Soldier Land Settlement Act. I invite the hon. member for Yorkton and any other hon. member to give me chapter and verse of the particulars of any case, and I am quite willing to submit them to the judgment of the house. There may have been cases—I do not say there were none, although I would be surprised if I found any—where some hardship has resulted, but the whole purpose of the government in administering this scheme was not to oppress the settlers but to help them put their properties in a position where they would have a secure home for themselves for the future. There have been cases where $50, $60, $75 and, in some instances, $79 a month have been paid to soldier's dependents on the farm, where a veteran of the last war has enlisted in this war. That is a fair sum, $75 a month, when you are living on a farm where you have a home to live in and security of tenure. You are not paying rent. You are paying a part of the proceeds—in the particular case cited by the hon. member for Acadia, a quarter of the proceeds—but it is in the interests of the veteran himself and in the interests of the home to pay the taxes. Therefore I hope the hon. member for Yorkton will, upon reflection, conclude that the administration of the scheme is not nearly so severe as he would have the members of the committee believe.

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister intimated that in the questionnaire 33,000 indicated their intention of taking up farming.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is right.

Mr. GRAHAM: How many of these were engaged in farming or came from farms?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I am told that the information is not at present available but will be when the final classification is made. A substantial proportion of them were already possessed of experience on the farm.

Mr. GRAHAM: Are any agricultural courses under the vocational training scheme given under government control or under legion control?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes, I understand that the legion is conducting an agricultural course.

Mr. MacNICOL: I listened with interest to the minister's statement in which he said that the government has no land belonging to the crown.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): The leaseholds have been transferred to the provinces, and there is no crown land available, but according to the statement read by my colleague there will be plenty of land available for this purpose.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the riding of the Minister of Mines and Resources I was driven over a large territory just west of the Pas. It is some of the finest land in the world, open for settlement, and is available at a very low price. I would think it would be a splendid piece of land to settle anybody upon. Again, north of the Peace river I was shown very large areas of land upon which no one was residing. I do not see why the government could not settle large numbers of men in blocks up there. I have also in mind what is being done for the Sudetens. The Minister of Mines and Resources is more familiar with that than I am, although I spent some time in that territory upon two occasions.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If I may interject, all the provinces of Canada have been approached and have indicated their utmost desire to cooperate by way of surveys and otherwise in order to make the scheme a success.

Mr. MacNICOL: What I had in mind was that if large blocks of good land were available here and there at a very low price, it would be much better to settle the soldiers upon such land than upon land which was heavily encumbered with debt from the very beginning. Land settlement after a war is not a new thing. After the Revolutionary war, the United Empire Loyalists were settled in Canada in the eastern counties and the counties just west of Kingston, in Frontenac and Hastings. After the war of 1812, large numbers of soldiers were settled in Lanark county. They were given the land free, obtaining title to it after being upon it for three years. They were also given various implements with which to work the land, and were given rations for two years if they were required; and as I read history, most of these settlers made good. Many of my people on my father's side were soldiers of the Napoleonic wars, and they settled in Lanark county and made good. A private drew 100 acres; a lieutenant and a captain, larger amounts respectively. They made good partly because they were not encumbered with debt from the very beginning.

I have listened with interest to what has been said by hon. gentlemen from the west who sit to my left, who are familiar with the problems of the soldier settlers in the west; and after listening to what they have said it would appear to me that one of the reasons why some of these soldier settlers failed to make good is that they were encumbered with debt from the beginning. On the other hand, I believe that what the Minister of Finance has said is largely true, that inflation after the last war had a lot to do with the lack of success of many of these settlers.

I should like to see the bill contain provisions whereby the soldier settlers will be able to start on the land with a very low encumbrance of debt, if any at all. I would rather see them start free of debt, because I agree with what one hon. member to my left has said that if they are given the land free and they make good, that is to the advantage of Canada, and is much better than to settle the soldiers upon land encumbered with debt which they would give up after working upon it for a few years.

Mr. GRAYDON: May I ask a question of the Minister of Mines and Resources arising out of statements made by some hon. members and the minister's answer with respect to deductions from dependents' allowances. I shall be more moderate in what I say than the hon. member for Yorkton, but that, of course, is no reflection upon him. I should like to ask the government to review its position with regard to deduction from dependents' allowances, upon two grounds. First of all, in making the deduction the government is putting into operation a principle which is denied to private individuals. My understanding of the provisions is that no dependent's allowance can be garnisheed. It is judgment-proof. My understanding of the dependents' allowance provision is that they may not be garnisheed; they are judgment-proof, and in addition to that, the ordinary operations of law do not apply to the soldiers dependents' allowance. It seems to me, if that is the situation—and I am going on that assumption—the government is going a long way when it attempts to meet any governmental payment out of the dependents' allowance. The money is given to the dependents of soldiers serving in this war.

Might I also advance this suggestion? You are dealing here with veterans of two wars. You are dealing with the family of the man who served in the last war, and you are dealing with the same family where the head of that family is serving in this war. It seems to me that, if any evidence were really necessary on which to base a request to the government to review the situation again, this latter argument ought to hold water.

If the minister cares to reply, I should like some information, or at least an estimate, with regard to how many soldier settlers there are whose wives or dependents are being asked from time to time to share some of the burden out of their dependents' allowances.

Mr. CRERAR: I have the information here. There are 297 deductions being made.

Of these, 260 voluntarily asked that the reductions be made. My hon. friend the Minister of Pensions and National Health, who has a mathematical turn, tells me that that constitutes 87½ per cent. Within the total are only thirty-seven cases which might come within the strictures made by the hon. member for Acadia and the hon. member for Yorkton. These 260 people see the desirability and advantage of making a contribution from their allowances; they are interested in ultimately owning their homes and protecting them; and we give them every encouragement possible. Unfortunately all human beings are not made alike; all soldier settlers are not alike; but I venture to say that every one of those thirty-seven cases would be found to be within the category where they can well afford without hardship to make a contribution towards keeping their homes in good standing. I do not think it is any imposition to ask them to do it. If hon. members are interested in the matter, when the soldier settlement estimates are before the house at a later period I shall be glad to give particulars of every case and to leave it to the judgment of the house whether, in the words of the hon. member for Yorkton, they are being used in a "dastardly" fashion.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I understand that 260 are described as voluntary. Am I not correct in assuming that they were asked if they would voluntarily give this contribution? In certain cases they were.

Mr. CRERAR: In that particular case they were asked if they wished to help protect their homes in this manner, but no pressure at all was put upon them to make the contribution; it was merely suggested to them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I am not entering into this discussion, because I think we are wasting time in talking this evening about after-war problems instead of preparing to win the war, but I do not think it is fair to speak of this as purely voluntary. I have seen some of these letters, and I would not call the arrangement exactly voluntary.

Mr. HAZEN: Did the committee who recommended the plan embodied in this bill, or did the government, give any consideration to settling these soldiers, when they return, in communities rather than putting one here, another two or three miles away, and yet another some distance from the others? It seems to me that there is land available, at least in some parts of this country, where community settlement could be put into effect, and I believe that it has much to recommend it. When you settle one man here and another some miles away, you restrict their opportunities of social life; you lessen the opportunities of providing a suitable education for their children, and you place them under other and great disadvantages. By bringing a group of them into a community you are able to obtain for them better schools, superior educational facilities, improve their opportunities for cooperation and give them better instruction from the government employees who have to serve all those farmers. It seems to me a matter which should be very carefully studied.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): This is merely an enabling bill. All kinds of suggestions were made to the committee of eighteen who discussed these proposals for eighteen months, and these and other proposals for community settlement will be placed before the special committee of this house which is to review the details of this bill, and will receive their careful consideration, although I must say that in my own province, it seems to me, after the last war, group settlements were not very successful.

Mr. HAZEN: I have here the Votes and Proceedings of February 16:

> Resolved that a select committee be set up to which shall be referred all matters relating to the settlement of veterans of the present war on the land in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That is correct.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Is this part of a comprehensive plan which seeks to reestablish all the men who are now in the services and, if so, why has agriculture been selected as an industry which should have $80,000,000 expended? At the end of the last war, farm prices were at a very high level; wheat had been selling at $2.50 a bushel, and it was apparent that there was going to be a market for farm products at fairly high prices for a long time, so that men anticipated, in going into this industry, that they would be able to pay for their investment and make a living. We now find ourselves in a period when agriculture is a depressed industry. Farm prices are at very low levels. A person must have a lot of confidence to anticipate that in the next few years there will be markets for unlimited quantities of agricultural products. Has the government considered what will be the effect of spending $80,000,000 in a depressed industry, upon the people who have been struggling for the last ten or even twenty years to meet their interest payments and taxes and remain on the land? It would seem to me that there are other industries in Canada where these sums of money might be spent to better advantage. At the present moment we are experiencing a very serious shortage of steel. We are having difficulty in getting oil. I wonder why agriculture has been selected as the one industry to have such a large expenditure, and in which large numbers of men now in the service may look forward to finding employment and to repaying the amounts which they will receive under this legislation.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Every point which my hon. friend has mentioned in his remarks was very carefully considered by the committee of eighteen. I do not know whether he has seen the names of the committee who have studied this question. When he says that we are spending money on land settlement alone, he is misinformed. A very moderate view of the order in council of October 1 is that there will be an obligation to this country of at least $100,000,000; the returned soldier will be trained for various types of industry; provision will be made for putting him back to insured employment, on a parity with the man who has stayed at home, in civilian industry, and there are various other benefits. After-war land settlement has required special legislation. This, I think, has been very very carefully considered and reviewed, and it is the hope that it will be not only of great benefit to those who can avail themselves of the opportunities provided under it, but to the national economy as a whole. I do not think the mere fact that prices are depressed at the moment will involve injury to the agricultural industry in the slightest degree. It may be a very good time to lay plans for the future and take advantage of the depressed prices which may prevail at the moment, for the future benefit of the soldier settler—of course, in conjunction with the civilian who is now on the land. There is no intention of injuring the person now on the land; rather, the object is to cooperate with the person now on the land for the benefit of the returned soldier.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the minister's exposition of his plan. I believe he has done a very good job and that his ideas are commendable. I have just been wondering whether he has gone so far as to estimate the number of farmers that Canada really needs. I read the other day a statement concerning the United States to the effect that they had 30,000,000 farmers and they needed only 24,000,000. I am wondering whether there is any possibility of our getting more farmers than we really need. My interest in this question arises probably from the fact that I come from an agricultural constituency, and I have had reason to suspect that there were certain people in the government who were interested in destroying the farmers on the land, in displacing them by any means, torturing them to death if needs be. Perhaps these sound like bitter words, but no one who has been on the soil for forty years can come to any other conclusion when he sees the price structure which obtains at the present time through wide areas of agricultural lands. I am wondering whether the minister has really gone into that matter.

I think a good deal of care should be given to the question whether or not we shall be able to sell as much agricultural produce after the war as we are now selling. If we are not going to be able to sell more wool, for example, more beef, eggs and other agricultural products than we are now selling, and if we are now not producing anywhere nearly as much of these commodities as our present agricultural productive establishment can produce, then it seems to me that we are running a serious risk in very greatly increasing the number of our agricultural producers.

Let me hasten to say that I think there is no finer place in the world for men to be than on the land. There is no finer place to raise a family. There is no happier place to live in, provided conditions are such that one has a chance to make a living. But the minister will be one of the first to agree that those conditions do not obtain in Canada in the agricultural areas.

Unless we can see adequate reason for believing that after the war there will be a sufficiently greatly increased demand for our products to enable us to sell the output of many more farmers than we now have producing, I see no reason for optimism.

Then the question has been brought up once or twice—I merely refer to it here—of price. It would comfort me considerably if the minister or some of his colleagues would indicate to the committee, even by a word, that they see how in this country prices can be established and maintained so that the farmer can be guaranteed, over a period of five years, say, cost of production plus such profit as will enable him to live. The minister has not given any such indication. He may know, but he has certainly kept the secret very well.

Up to the present time our agricultural prices have depended in large measure on prices in world markets such as Liverpool and Chicago. The government are only recently beginning to realize that it must be made possible within the country to govern agricultural prices in the country independently of world market conditions. The moment they begin to govern prices within the country, using only the devices which they now possess, they will place upon the economy of Canada burdens such as the economy will not long sustain. This is the reason for the question I propounded to the minister. I would be, with him, happy in contemplating a greatly increased number of farmers on the land, which I think his scheme will bring into being, if only we could settle the matter of prices. But I contended last year in vain for a price to be fixed on eggs until a certain date in 1942. We were unable then to do that, and the Minister of Agriculture rather scornfully cast a certain amount of aspersion on me because I was so foolish as to insist upon it. The principle is a very simple one. If we cannot establish prices which are fair and remunerative in connection with the various agricultural products, then the minister's whole land settlement scheme will simply blow up like a bubble, because the ability of any farmer whatsoever, soldier or civilian, to subsist on the farm will depend in large measure on his price.

If the minister can give us some idea as to whether or not we have more farmers in Canada than we need, whether he knows how we can maintain prices, whether he has any idea as to how we shall market the goods we produce so that in case we increase by one-third our egg production, butter production, beef or hog production or flax or sugar production—if he can give us some information in these matters, I shall be greatly comforted. If he cannot do so, probably we shall need to look upon his proposal with some restraint.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE

EXCHANGE OF NOTES SETTING OUT RECIPROCAL ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to lay on the table of the house copies in English and French of an exchange of notes with the United States setting forth an agreement on compulsory military service.

There are three notes. There is the note of March 30 from Mr. Sumner Welles, Acting Secretary of State, to the Canadian Minister in Washington; the note of April 6, No. 222, from the Canadian Minister in Washington to the Acting Secretary of State, and the note of April 8 from the Acting Secretary of State to Mr. Wrong, chargé d'affaires in Washington.

The United States Selective Training and Service Act, when it was passed in the summer of 1940 applied only to United States citizens, and to aliens who had declared their intention of becoming United States citizens. The act was amended in December, 1941, after the entry of the United States into the war. One of the amendments which was then passed provided for the conscription of Canadians and of nationals of other co-belligerent countries who were resident in the United States, and who had not declared their intention of becoming United States citizens.

Thus, by last December all Canadians residing in the United States became subject to compulsory service on the same basis as the United States citizens. Subsequent to the passage of this legislation the United States informed us that they would be willing to permit some of these Canadians to elect to serve in the armed forces of Canada, in lieu of service in the armed forces of the United States. The United States offer applied to non-declarant Canadians—that is to say, to Canadians who had not declared their intention of becoming United States citizens. We gladly accepted this offer, since we agreed with the United States that the united war effort of our countries would be strengthened if Canadians in the United States who had not yet given evidence of their desire to make the United States their permanent home were given an opportunity to fight in the armed forces of their own country and under their own flag, instead of fighting in the armed forces of the United States.

The agreement is reciprocal in every respect. If United States citizens, in Canada should in future be made liable to compulsory military service in the Canadian armed forces they will be given exactly the same privileges as Canadians in the United States are being given by the United States government.

The United States government has also, by the exchange of notes, declared that it is agreeable to the Canadian government imposing on United States citizens residing in Canada a liability to compulsory military service.

It might be a convenience to hon. members if this exchange of notes were printed in the Votes and Proceedings of the house. They will be printed a little later in a series of documents published by the Department of External Affairs, but it may be some time before that series is published.

PACIFIC WAR COUNCIL

MEETINGS IN WASHINGTON—CANADIAN REPRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will make a statement at an early date concerning the Pacific council which was set up at Washington subsequent to the adjournment of this house on March 27.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the only statement that I would be at liberty to make is one which I think I might make immediately. As my hon. friend knows, the Pacific war council was set up about three weeks ago. The meeting which was held on Wednesday of last week, and which I was invited by the President to attend, was the third meeting the council has held. The meeting of the war council was presided over by the President, and its proceedings were similar to the proceedings of a cabinet. I would not be at liberty myself to state what subjects were discussed or what conclusions were reached; any statement to be given out with respect to the proceedings of the council would be given out by the President. I understand that no announcement has been made of that particular day's proceedings or of the proceedings of the two previous meetings of the council.

The discussions, as would be obvious, related to war matters pertaining to the Pacific. No public intimation could be given of what was discussed because anything given to the public would be given equally to the enemy. At the meeting which I attended there were present Sir Ronald Campbell, minister for the United Kingdom; Mr. Loudon, minister in the United States representing the Netherlands; Doctor Soong, representing China; Doctor Evatt, Minister for Foreign Affairs of Australia, who represented Australia, and the Hon. Mr. Nash, representing New Zealand.

I understand that meetings of the council will be held more or less regularly every week. I believe it will be in the interests of the proceedings of the council that for the most part the same persons should represent the different countries at the respective meetings in order that they may be more familiar with the matters being discussed. I do not know that there is more that I can say at the moment, unless my hon. friend has some specific question to ask.

Mr. GREEN: Who will be representing Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Our minister at Washington, Mr. Leighton McCarthy, will represent Canada at the meetings. Mr. McCarthy was not in Washington at the time of the first meeting. Mr. Hume Wrong, the counsellor of the legation, represented Canada on that occasion. At the second meeting Mr. McCarthy represented Canada. For reasons that will be obvious it has not been thought advisable that more than one person representing any country should be present at a meeting. If there were more than one representative of any country present, it might create embarrassment with respect to the representation of some of the other countries.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I follow up that question? As the other dominions and countries are represented on the council by men who have had experience in the government of their country, does not the Prime Minister think that Canada should be represented by someone other than a high commissioner, someone who has had experience in the government of this country, a man of ministerial status?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Canada has not a high commissioner at Washington, but is represented by the Canadian minister to Washington.

I would say, as regards the present minister to Washington, that, as my hon. friend is no doubt aware, Mr. McCarthy was for many years a foremost member of this House of Commons. While he has not been a member of the government of Canada he has had wide parliamentary experience. Canada is exceedingly fortunate in having one of Mr. McCarthy's exceptional attainments to represent our country at Washington and in having him represent Canada at the meetings of the Pacific war council. I would also say that I think Mr. Hume Wrong, while he has not been in parliament, has had exceptional experience in diplomatic work in different countries and is exceedingly well qualified to represent Canada on any board or council such as the Pacific council. I would not feel that previous cabinet experience would necessarily be an essential qualification. It no doubt would be helpful inasmuch as the proceedings of the Pacific war council are carried on very much as proceedings would be in any cabinet. The personal qualifications of the representative would count for a great deal, I think, in respect of the effectiveness of his service.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a further question? What relation has the Pacific conference which was established in London a month ago, representing certain countries, with Canada excepted, to the Pacific council at Washington, with Canada included? Will the London conference have to report to the Washington council, and will there have to be an exchange of notes before we can have any defence in the Pacific? What is the relation between the body in London and the one in Washington?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend will recall I had some difficulty, when I was asked at an earlier stage of the session a question with respect to a Pacific war council in Washington, to say whether Canada would be represented on that council. My difficulty arose from the fact that a Pacific war council was formed in London, England, in the first instance, and at that time it was not certain whether a Pacific war council would ultimately be also formed in Washington. The council which was first set up in London was a gathering of the representatives of certain Pacific countries which were immediately involved in the operations in the southeast Pacific, brought together at the instance of the Prime Minister of Great Britain. At the present time provision has been made for the meeting from time to time in London of this counterpart of the Pacific council which meets in Washington. Canada will continue to be represented on that body by the high commissioner. For the present it has been thought advisable to have the council dealing with Pacific affairs meet regularly in Washington rather than in London. The whole matter of the study of conditions in the Pacific has had to take shape more or less in accordance with the manner in which events have helped to shape it.

Mr. CHURCH: Will not the London conference have to report to Washington first? And in the meantime Japan may take action in the Pacific, as we have lost control of the sea in the Pacific.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As my hon. friend knows, there is a combined strategy with which certain of the heads of the defence forces are concerned in London and also in Washington, and communications pass continuously between the two. There are bodies which exist alike in London and in Washington which have to do with questions that arise out of decisions with respect to strategy; but the fact that one exists in the one country and the other in the other does not mean that either is subordinate to the other. It is part of the arrangement under which the present war is being carried on, on behalf of the United Nations and which recognizes at the head as the combined command, the Prime Minister of Great Britain and the President of the United States.

Mr. CHURCH: In other words, we are to depend on Washington instead of London for defence in the Pacific.

THE PLEBISCITE

INQUIRY AS TO ADVERTISING FOR AN AFFIRMATIVE VOTE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would ask a question of the Secretary of State or some other member of the government in respect to advertising for an affirmative vote on the plebiscite. Is the government or any department of the government sponsoring free advertising for the plebiscite? I am prompted to ask this because I have received a copy of the Campbellton Graphic of April 16, carrying a full-page advertisement signed by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), and upon it appears the coat of arms of Canada. I wonder if the government is doing any advertising on a national scale or on a constituency scale with respect to the plebiscite. I should like to know just what the position is. I had to pay for the advertising that was done in my own constituency, and if I had to do that, I assumed that others did.

Hon. N. A. McLARTY (Secretary of State): I think I can best answer the leader of the opposition by saying that the chief electoral officer has put in each newspaper in Canada an advertisement of the proclamation calling for the plebiscite, giving the date of the plebiscite, the time of the plebiscite, and other particulars. The government has not spent any money on any advertising for the plebiscite so far as I am aware—certainly the plebiscite committee has not—in so far as it asks any elector to vote "yes" or "no". We are spending some money in advertisements which I believe are quite modest, asking the electors to get out and vote.

Mr. HOMUTH: Too modest.

Mr. McLARTY: Perhaps too modest, but we did not wish to be extravagant. The advertisements merely ask the people to vote on the plebiscite.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, may I say in regard to any advertising that may have appeared in any newspaper in this country over my signature or printed at my request, that it is going to be paid for by myself. If the coat of arms appeared in one advertisement—I have not seen it—I presume that was due to the loyalty of the printers. I am not responsible for having the coat of arms printed alongside the advertisement which I requested them to print.

QUESTION AS TO SPECIAL GASOLINE RATION ON VOTING DAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. A. McLEAN (Simcoe East): I should like to ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply if it is the intention to have a special ration of gasoline issued for the plebiscite day?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Munitions and Supply): Consideration has been given to this matter. Is is obvious, to all those who are familiar with the situation, that to make any special provision for gasoline for the plebiscite day is quite impossible. The only notice which has appeared in the press on this matter was a quotation from a speech of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson). Repercussions from the oil administrator of the United States followed immediately; I believe the oil controller had a telephone message at noon next day.

The situation is that Canada is very heavily dependent upon the United States, not only for petroleum, but for the transportation of petroleum. All of us who read the newspapers know that the sinking of tankers has been extremely heavy, and our Canadian fleet has suffered along with the rest. Under these circumstances I think it would be a negation of the purpose of the plebiscite to provide additional gasoline for bringing out the vote.

When speaking in my own riding, I asked my constituents to give as freely of their gasoline as they were giving of their time. I got a very favourable response. I believe that all those who have an appreciation of the importance of the plebiscite will gladly provide the gasoline required, not only to convey themselves to the poll, but also to assist others who would be unable otherwise to cast their votes.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I regret the decision. I hope that the expectation of the minister with respect to the voluntary surrender of coupons for use on plebiscite day will be met. I made the announcement to which he refers as having had repercussions, simply upon a message which I received from one of the minister's secretaries that the matter was under consideration: that was as far as I ever went. I was hopeful that a formula might be adopted which would give some leeway in the use of gasoline on that day, because in the rural parts of the country it is going to be very difficult to get gasoline for the transportation of voters to the polls, and I do not think that they will walk.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

SHIPBUILDING—STRIKES AT MIDLAND AND KINGSTON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. NOSEWORTHY (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour as a result of two telegrams I have received this morning from the Midland shipyards. First, will the minister tell us what is the cause of the dispute at the shipbuilding plants in Midland and Kingston; and, second, what action is being taken to settle it?

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour): The hon. gentleman did not give me any notice of the question. In the first place, the strike at Midland was called without any knowledge of the department; it was called because a man was demoted and then laid off. A conciliation officer was sent in there, and an agreement was arrived at with the company that the man would be given his job back, and that the men could return to work without discrimination. It was pointed out to them prior to that that the strike was illegal. Following that they placed further demands before the company. The department took the position it always takes in the case of an illegal strike: first of all the men must return to work. The next step was the calling of a sympathetic strike at Kingston in support of the Midland workers who went on strike because this one man was laid off. I would say this about Kingston: they had an agreement with the company under which all disputes would be submitted to a tribunal of employers and employees. Notwithstanding that, and the fact that they were told it was illegal to strike, they went on strike. Now the position taken by the department is that the question is no longer one for us to deal with; it is a question for the Department of Justice. I would like to say this, though: it would be just too bad if the men who go down to the sea in ships, in corvettes, went on strike because a man was demoted.

NEW ZEALAND

APPOINTMENT OF HON. FRANK LANGSTONE AS HIGH COMMISSIONER IN CANADA

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The house will be pleased, I am sure, to know that this morning, at Wellington, the Prime Minister of New Zealand announced that the Hon. Frank Langstone has been appointed to represent New Zealand in Canada as high commissioner in this country. Mr. Langstone has had an important public career, having served in the House of Representatives of New Zealand, also having been Minister of Lands and Native Affairs in his own country. He is also well known to a number of our citizens, having visited Canada last year in connection with obtaining essential munitions and equipment for New Zealand. I should like to say how welcome Mr. Langstone's appointment to Ottawa as high commissioner of New Zealand will be by both the government and the people of Canada.

With Mr. Langstone's appointment we will now have in Ottawa high commissioners from all the self-governing parts of the British empire, just as Canada is represented in all parts of the British empire by our high commissioners.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are we to be represented in New Zealand?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We have been for the last two years, by Doctor W. A. Riddell.

CANADIAN ARMY

EMBARKATION INCIDENT AT AN EASTERN CANADIAN PORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence. A bulletin was posted to-day in front of a local newspaper office to the effect that 400 soldiers left a ship at an eastern Canadian port, and that 135 of those soldiers had missed the vessel when it sailed. Would the minister care to make a statement to the house about this occurrence? If that bulletin was posted following a statement issued by the Minister of National Defence, would he tell us why a statement is issued to the public before the members of this house are informed of the occurrence?

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Answering the last question first, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree that each statement issued from the Department of National Defence must necessarily be communicated first to the House of Commons. The statement was issued as soon as it was possible to issue it after the safe arrival of that particular convoy, and it was given to the press. As a matter of fact it was issued this morning and communicated to the press for the afternoon papers. I know it has been suggested here from time to time that no statements should be made to the press unless they have first been made here.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): No—on matters of policy, not factual matters.

Mr. RALSTON: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that, because I am sure the House of Commons is not to be regarded as a bulletin board, where a department has to make statements in the house in regard to matters of detail or administration which are ordinarily published in the papers. That is the answer to my hon. friend's second question.

Answering the first question, I am sorry I have not before me at the moment the statement which was issued to the press. Briefly, about 400 men walked off the ship at Halifax at the time of embarkation, and about 135 had not returned or did not get back to the pier in time to be embarked. The situation, as set out in the statement, was that the ship arrived very much later than she was expected. The time for disembarking those who were on the ship, for loading provisions—and by the way, they were to load eight weeks' provisions plus an additional twelve days' provisions—for cleaning the ship and for loading personnel to go on the ship, was cut to about half of the normal time. The result was some confusion, and some dissatisfaction, particularly with the condition of the ship and the rations. A special party was put on to make conditions as livable and comfortable as possible and I think that every step possible was taken to make the situation as agreeable as it could be under the circumstances. But there is no doubt in my mind that the ship was not in as good condition as is normally the case with troop-ships. As a matter of fact, the embarkation officials examined the ship and, after their examination, determined that the number to be carried on it should be reduced by about 20 per cent from the number which had been carried on her inward voyage; and notwithstanding that, these men walked off the ship as a protest against conditions in connection with the ship itself and with regard to rations. Many of them came back. Some of them were rounded up. All but 135 sailed on the ship and of that number some came back voluntarily and some were rounded up. They got back to the ship too late. She was in the stream. She had weighed anchor and they were too late to go on board. Disciplinary action has been taken with regard to them. I have no doubt from the information I have received that they were led astray by a few ringleaders, and these ringleaders are being specially dealt with. It is obvious that the situation was such that their action could not be condoned. It was not a case where men could take the situation into their own hands, and it would be manifestly unfair to the vast proportion of the men who embarked on the ship and who are now safely overseas.

I read further from the statement which has just been handed to me. Generally speaking, those who disobeyed orders expressed their disappointment and regret when they got to the dock and found the ship had gone. They had been warned that the ship would sail but they believed they had time to go ashore for a final fling before embarking. Conditions on board troop-ships are often cramped and not too comfortable, but the tens of thousands of Canadian soldiers who have gone overseas have recognized how necessary it is to utilize all available shipping and have put up with whatever discomforts there were as part of the day's work.

The difficulties were increased by the fact that the contingent which sailed on this ship was made up of no less than sixty-nine different reinforcing detachments and they therefore could not be organized and closely controlled in the same way as complete units would have been.

We are putting our views very clearly before the United Kingdom authorities in order to prevent a recurrence of conditions so far as transports are concerned. At the same time we are making certain changes in the embarkation and troop conducting system with particular reference to troops which are not in organized units. I can say definitely that corrective action is being taken. I am confident that there should be no excuse for a repetition of this isolated incident which in the absence of explanation might have reflected on the good name of Canadian soldiers.

[Mr. Ralston.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is understood that the first order will be No. 5, under government orders, continuing the discussion on the resolution of the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Mackenzie), and the next order will be No. 12 on the order paper, respecting provision with regard to insurance of property against war risks and payment of compensation for war damage. It is in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley). It is then proposed to take up item No. 7 on the order paper, for the house to consider in committee of the whole the resolution with respect to the two billion dollars to be granted His Majesty towards defraying expenses of the war. In order to avoid repetition and to expedite progress, it is proposed that when we reach the war appropriation measure we shall deal with departments in the following order: (1) The Department of National Defence; (2) National Defence for Naval Services; (3) National Defence for Air; (4) the Department of Munitions and Supply; (5) the Department of National War Services. In the course of the discussion the Minister of Finance may wish to make some statement on subsidies. With that exception it is intended to proceed continuously with the discussion of that resolution when it is brought down.

Mr. GREEN: There are several other departments which are concerned with the war appropriation bill. Is it intended that they shall be discussed en bloc after the ones enumerated are dealt with?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The departments I have named are the ones which I imagine will occasion most of the discussion. I have mentioned them in order, so as to prevent overlapping in the discussion of the subjects that may come up. It is understood of course that all other departments concerned directly or indirectly can be discussed immediately after the conclusion of those I have mentioned.

VETERANS' LAND ACT

PROVISION FOR SETTLEMENT ON THE LAND OF VETERANS OF THE PRESENT WAR

The house resumed, from Monday, April 20, consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) —Mr. Vien in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to make provision for the settlement on the land of veterans of the present war, to prescribe the terms of such settlement and to grant a measure of financial assistance to such settlers, and further for the appointment of a director, of officers and other employees in connection therewith.

Mr. GREEN: In making his statement last night the minister said that the new settlement bill would provide for assistance to men who wish to take up small holdings and who would be earning at least a portion of their income in some other way than by farming. I wonder if he would amplify that statement. For example, will the bill cover those men who wish to take up an acre or two outside our cities or towns? In recent years there has been some movement in that direction and I think that if the bill is made broad enough to cover that particular class of soldier it might be very helpful in improving conditions which have existed in our cities throughout the depression years.

Hon. IAN A. MACKENZIE (Minister of Pensions and National Health): The answer is yes. The bill is much more flexible in that regard than the old Soldier Settlement Act, but it is intended to have possibly a qualifications committee set up to deal with small holdings and with the question whether men might be self-sustaining or whether there might be supplementary wages earned in the cities or small towns.

Mr. GREEN: Is it intended to cover only the exceptional case, or will there be many thousands of such cases?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is contemplated as a definite policy under the proposed bill.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is to say, small allotments are to be made to those who may not be farmers and they would cover the chicken farmer, the man who lives on the outskirts of a community and works in the city.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Provided it is buttressed by employment opportunity. Otherwise it might not be economical.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): If he had employment, that would be a condition precedent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What are the buttresses to which the minister has just referred as being prerequisite to assistance under this scheme?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): In regard to the small holdings, the buttress would be reasonable assurance of employment opportunity within a reasonable distance of the holding.

Mr. WRIGHT: Is it intended to have small holdings adjacent only to industrial areas, or will they also be established in places adjacent to the cities of western Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I understand it is the intention to have them in the vicinity of industrial areas where there would be reasonable assurance of employment opportunity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I regret that the exigencies of the occasion—I think that is a good phrase—compelled me to leave the chamber last evening before the minister had completed his statement.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): You were rendering very good service.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I hope so; I am not always the best judge of my own efforts. I should like to express my thanks to the minister for the courtesy he extended to me in sending some time ago a review of the remarks which he made last night. I am interested in this question of land settlement. I am not at all sure that it will be a success; I have grave doubts, for various reasons. I am not going to pour cold water on the scheme; I hope it may be a success. But undoubtedly its success or failure will depend in large measure on the management, the character of the men who undertake obligations under the scheme, and the direction given to the men.

One of the first requisites for a land settlement scheme in respect of farming is that the applicant must have a genuine love of the soil. It is no good to put a man on a farm unless his heart is in it. Many of the men from the cities and towns in the old country who were brought out here under land settlement schemes had no knowledge of conditions in this country and had no real love of the soil. That I think is the first requisite for the successful operation of any scheme of this kind.

The second requisite is some knowledge of farming. I am speaking of those who will become genuine farmers. I want to impress upon the minister and upon his officials who are to operate this legislation, that a man cannot be put upon a farm and achieve success unless he has some knowledge of the work. The officials who are supervising should make very certain that the applicant has a knowledge of the vocation which he intends to attempt.

A third requisite is that no scheme of land settlement for farms should be undertaken with public funds unless the conditions are such that a man may have reasonable expectation of success. I know something about the soldier settlement scheme. It was started as a result of a public demand. Canada had vast open spaces, large areas of crown land available for settlement. The scheme was meant to operate for the most part in western Canada where land was still available for settlement, and it was subject to conditions then existing which to my mind doomed it to failure almost from the beginning. I am not familiar with the situation in the west, but in the east there was failure because of inflated values. The minister referred to that last night. But that was not by any means the only cause of failure. One of the chief causes was the failure of the administrative staff—I do not remember who they were, and at the moment it is not important—to see to it that the proper farms were purchased.

One member I heard to-day discussing this matter said that on some of the farms sold to returned soldiers they could step from one stump to the other. I can recall farms in my own province where the returned soldier could almost leap from one rock-pile to the other; from the very beginning he could not hope to scratch a living out of the soil under the conditions that obtained. Therefore a very great deal depends upon the skill and ability and judgment of those who are administering the scheme. The success or failure of the scheme so far as land settlement is concerned will depend in large measure upon the ability of those administering it and their exercise of proper judgment.

An interesting question was raised last night by the hon. member for Lethbridge as to whether we required more farmers in this country. I have my own view. I have never thought that a nation like Canada could have too much agricultural production. If we do not produce we shall never get anywhere. In my own province the lack of success of farmers is due to lack of quality production. The farmers of New Brunswick are not producing enough to feed our own population. Yet in many respects their plight is pitiable. It is a sad admission to make, but I think it is true largely of the maritime provinces generally—I could except Prince Edward Island, of course, because I believe in certain lines it produces enough to feed its people. But we have continuously the spectacle of foodstuffs being brought in by the carload from Ontario, meat products especially. That should not be. I am glad to be able to say there is a movement in that province now for greater meat production, sponsored I understand by the superintendent of the experimental station at Fredericton, who is very much alive to the situation. But the reason for the lack of production in New Brunswick is that for years farming in that province, and in various parts of the maritime provinces as well as elsewhere, has not been profitable.

[Mr. R. B. Hanson.]

Until it can be demonstrated that men can go on the land and make a reasonable living I do not think the scheme should be encouraged too much. What inducement is there to put a man on a farm in western Canada to raise wheat? Let us take the classic case, because we hear more in this house about that than anything else. I do not think anyone should be encouraged to buy a wheat farm in western Canada under this scheme until conditions are different from what they are to-day. We might produce more dairy products in this country if we established the necessity for them, and dairy products are in very good demand at the moment. We should encourage the production of more wool. And by the way, without wanting to start a discussion I should like to put this query to the Minister of Finance. Why is it that under the price ceiling the price of wool has been fixed at 25 cents a pound while just across the line it is 41 cents, a difference of about 70 per cent?

Mr. ILSLEY: I suppose that was the price prevailing in the base period.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It shows the inequity of the scheme.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not show anything of the kind.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we shall have to differ for the present. I did not intend to get into a discussion of that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The difference in price will increase until they have a price ceiling in the states.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Well, we cannot legislate for them, and I am not going into that at the moment. But 25 cents a pound for wool is inadequate, having regard to the present demand for wool in this country. I am going to leave it at that. There are various lines of agricultural endeavour which could be made profitable to the farmer if he were allowed to have a little free scope. I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that it is his duty—and I think perhaps he is already aware of that, and has been endeavouring to give effect to it—to see that the agricultural producer in this country gets a fair return, having regard to all the circumstances, and the conditions which confront this nation to-day. I am sure he is not unmindful of the position and will not be derelict in his duty, in so far as he has the power to produce that result.

I could speak with respect to the potato farmers in my own province who operate at a loss three seasons out of four and who, in the fourth season when they have a chance to operate at a profit, are met by this ceiling. No floor, may I add, is put under them.

All these things work inequalities which are not conducive to settling the land or to greater production from the land. There are certain aspects of the scheme which are quite commendable, and there are certain others which I query: I have not lived on the land, but for forty years in my own constituency I have been very close to it. I believe I can say I have as much money invested in the land in my own community as any other individual in that community. At all times I have tried my utmost, and always with great difficulty, to keep people on the land.

When this scheme is crystallized into legislation and becomes operative, I suggest the greatest care should be exercised in its operation. Do not let us have any stampede of men to go on the land because of an attractive offer—and I do not deny that from a financial point of view the offer is attractive. The state is making a substantial contribution, to which I raise no objection. I am not objecting to anything which may be done for the reestablishment of returned soldiers. But the element of selectivity must be exercised. A man's own conception of his abilities may not be the best one. A disinterested judgment by those who are competent to judge is essential. I hope there will be no great rush to buy land on which to settle farmers unless certain prerequisites are determined by the department.

I have tried to lay down only three of these prerequisites, and I believe they are sound. By the way, I notice this scheme is not to be administered by the minister. Perhaps he is to be congratulated upon getting out from under so far as the actual administration is concerned. I should hope that his colleague who is to administer the act, under a single director, will at least read my remarks, and perhaps act on them.

No one should be put on the land simply because he wants to be there. He must have a love of the soil and must know something about farming. Before he is allowed to go on the land there should be reasonable probability of his making a success. This country should not be buying land for men who will not succeed or who will not work. Let it be understood that the fact that the government is handling it is not the important factor. A man must be prepared to work, just as you and I have had to work, and as we will have to work for the rest of our days.

I wish this scheme well. I should like to see everything possible done for the reestablishment of the soldiers, but I certainly advise great caution. First I would say to the director: Beware of the land shark who will sell you farms for a consideration. Eliminate them, if you can, and deal directly with the owner. One great defect in the last scheme was indicated by the fact that a soldier who was the son of a farmer would apply for land and would wind up by buying his father's farm. That must be avoided, at all costs. The soldier would get the farm, under the agreement; his father had the money, and the farm was sold to the government.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): And the father died and left the money to the son.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Yes, sometimes he did and sometimes he did not. But it was a sale to the government under the guise of soldier settlement. I hope that did not happen often, but I remember one outstanding case in my own community which I deplored. Had I had anything to say in the matter I would have felt I had the right to interfere, but I had neither the authority nor the responsibility to interfere in that instance. Such are the pitfalls I ask the department to avoid. I have no doubt the department is fully aware of all these difficulties, and that these are matters which have come within their experience during the last twenty or twenty-five years.

Before taking my seat I make one more appeal to the Minister of Agriculture to see if something cannot be done for the general agricultural producers to the end that these price levels, which in many cases are uneven, may be made more equitable.

Mr. SISSONS: I desire to express my support of this resolution, and to say at the outset that I do not share the pessimism expressed by some hon. members. In my view a plan for soldier settlement on the land after the war is both desirable and in every way necessary, and is to the advantage not only of the returned soldiers but of Canada as a whole.

My remarks will deal chiefly with only one phase of the situation, namely, settlement in the area with which I am best acquainted and which is represented in this chamber by the hon. member for Cariboo and myself. Before dealing with any particular aspect of the matter, however, I should like to make a few general observations.

I am quite well aware that there are many difficulties confronting any settlement scheme. There is no doubt that western Canada's landscape is strewn with the wreckage of settlement schemes which have failed. Following the last war soldier settlement was not the success it might have been, but neither was it the great failure some hon. members would have us believe. So far as western Canada is concerned I believe it will be found that the number of soldier settler failures compared favourably with the number of failures of ordinary settlers.

We have heard the argument that because the farmer of to-day cannot make a living it is useless to put more settlers on the land. In this argument there is of course some merit. But surely if we can predict anything we can predict that we are going to win this war, and that in that victory there will be something new which will mean a better day for agriculture. I believe this resolution is predicated on two things, the winning of the war and a new day for agriculture following that victory.

I agree with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson) when he says that those who will be responsible for this legislation will have to exercise a tremendous amount of care. I was impressed by what he said about the type of man who should come under this legislation. I was struck particularly by his phrase "love of the soil". I think that phrase embodies a principle that should be followed. I do not think it is sufficient that the returned man was on a farm before he went overseas. I do not think it is sufficient that a certain amount of training may be given. I agree that both these things are necessary, but there must be something more. There has to be what we might describe as a temper for farm life.

I should like to give the committee a few interesting figures from an analysis made by Professor Dawson and Professor Murchie of field studies in the Peace River country in the years 1929 and 1930. They examined some 332 farmers who were located on different types of farms. Some were in well-settled areas, others in the homestead areas, and others in the in-between areas. Of those 332 farmers, 28 per cent had worked only at farming while 72 per cent had been engaged in other pursuits. Of the 332, 81·6 per cent were born on farms and 18·4 per cent were born in towns or cities. Twenty-five per cent had no previous agricultural experience, while 75 per cent had had one or more years' agricultural experience. Of the 75 per cent who had had some agricultural experience, 50 per cent had had from one to nine years' farm training; 32 per cent had had training of from ten to nineteen years, and 18 per cent had had twenty years or more of training.

They examined twenty farmers who had the highest farm labour income. Of the twenty, five had been farmers all their lives and fifteen had spent some part of their lives in other gainful occupations. Then they examined twenty farmers who had the lowest farm labour income, and the same thing applied there; five of them had been farmers all their lives and fifteen had been engaged in other gainful occupations for part of their lives. Again they took the experienced farmers and of those in the highest group it was found that they had an average of nineteen years' farming experience, but those in the lowest group had had an average of twenty-one years' farming experience.

I give these figures in order to make this point: one cannot be dogmatic as to what qualifications or what attributes an applicant should possess. It is not enough to say that he must have been a farmer in the past, or that he must have farming experience. While that principle should be kept in mind, there is a greater principle; as the leader of the opposition has said, the applicant must have a love of the land; he must have a temper for farm life.

Another question is the initial capital that a soldier settler should have. We know that in the scheme following the last war he had an indebtedness amounting to 90 per cent, or in some cases 100 per cent, of the value of his property. Inflated values prevailed at that time. It is quite evident that one poor season would wipe out any equity in the property. From the statement of the minister I take it that under this scheme he will have an equity at the start of at least 50 per cent. That is the amount of equity which the mortgage companies require before granting a mortgage, and it is the amount of equity required by the Canadian farm loan board. It seems to me that in that regard he should be placed in a much more favourable position than the soldier settler after the last war.

The leader of the opposition made reference to administration, and I do not think he stressed that point too strongly. There were weaknesses in the administration of the soldier settlement scheme following the last war, but personally I have a great deal of confidence that the present director of soldier settlement, Mr. Murchison, and the very able supervisors he has now—I am fairly well acquainted with these men in my own province—will make a success of this matter. They know their work, they know their settlers, and there is every reason to expect that they will make a success of it so far as administration is concerned.

I come now to a phase of the matter in which I am particularly interested, that is, the question of new land versus old land. I realize that of necessity most of the land acquired for these soldier settlers will be acquired from private owners. I suggest that there are several disadvantages in that. One disadvantage is that you will be buying land from farmers who are now operating, thus putting them on the labour market or into the field as competitive purchasers of other land. However, there is another angle; you may be purchasing land from farmers who because of advanced years are no longer efficient producers. Such land purchases would be all to the good. A great deal of caution will have to be exercised in the purchase of land from private owners. The land may be marginal or submarginal land; it may be overrun with weeds or generally run down. The leader of the opposition emphasized another disadvantage. These purchases are likely to cause speculation in farm lands and raise the purchase price of these lands far above their productive value.

Coming from the Peace River district, I am naturally interested in the frontier. I feel that a large number of these returned soldiers will inevitably seek the frontier. History will repeat itself. The Peace River country was settled largely after the last war, and returned soldiers played a great part in the settlement of that country. Probably the majority of these men were not under the soldier settlement scheme, and to-day these soldiers form the backbone of the Peace River country. Between 4,000 and 5,000 of their sons have enlisted, out of a total population of some 60,000. I believe this constitutes a record for the dominion. These 4,000 or 5,000 young men are either overseas or serving in Canada, and every one of them is a salesman for the Peace River country. When they come back they will desire to settle on the land, and they will bring a lot of friends with them.

The building of the Alaska highway is directing new attention to the Peace River country. A large number of United States soldiers are working on that highway and have passed through this country. I am told that a great many of them are keenly interested in settling in the Peace River country after the war. If we are not going to settle this vacant land with our own soldiers, I do not see how in the world we can prevent a large number of returned United States veterans from going there and taking up land. There is in this country the only agricultural frontier remaining unsettled in Canada.

The report of the Rowell-Sirois commission estimates that there are still available 16,000,000 acres of arable land in western Canada, the greater part of it in the Peace River country. This may be an underestimate, but it is probably pretty nearly correct. That land is in part first-class prairie soil, and first-class or second-class wooded soils which will require clearing. The colony at Tupper Creek has shown that the only way to clear that wooded soil is by mechanical equipment, with which you can clear one or two hundred acres at a time, and that is what will have to be done if that land is to be made available for settlement. This land is not particularly adapted to the growing of wheat, but it is particularly adapted to mixed farming.

There is available in the Peace River country an area which can take care of a large number of returned soldier settlers. I feel that it could take care of all the 25,000 soldier settlers which this measure contemplates, and I think the minister and the department would be very well advised to make this Peace River country the spearhead of their whole settlement policy. You must have some spearhead which will sell this policy not only to the returned men but to the people of Canada. So far as the Peace River country is concerned that territory has already through the years been sold to the people. It has been sold to this house since the days of Hon. Frank Oliver, who spoke here on its behalf. It has been sold to this house by Mr. Kennedy, a former member, and by Mr. Pelletier, my immediate predecessor, representing the constituency of Peace River. It has been sold to this house by other members such as the member for Cariboo, the member for Athabaska, the member for Skeena, the member for Chambly-Rouville, the member for Vancouver-Burrard, the member for New Westminster, and more recently by the member for Davenport, who visited the Peace River country last summer. He came, he saw, he was conquered, and he is coming back again. None of the things which these members have told this house of the Peace River country in times past has been an exaggeration. Here are some of the things which the Minister of Pensions and National Health said about that territory. He referred to it as "that Peace River empire"—"that marvellous territory, tremendously rich in resources"—"the last great undeveloped portion of this dominion, that splendid northland"—"what is in very essence and very truth a valuable empire in itself." And the Prime Minister has referred to it in these words: "The Peace River country is amongst the richest in Canada"—"a great tract of land crying out for development."

It has the soil, the climate and the sunlight. Nine times in the last fifteen years the Peace River country has brought the wheat championship to Canada. No other agricultural area in Canada has so many hours of sunlight during the growing season as the Peace River country, and spring comes earlier there than in any other part of western Canada except in the most southerly part of southern Alberta.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the day of haphazard planning of settlement in Canada has passed, or should have passed, and if the present scheme is to be a success it must be most carefully and thoroughly planned. There is no area in Canada where the foundation has been better laid for planned settlement than in the Peace River country Exhaustive soil surveys have been made of that territory by the province of Alberta, by Doctor Wyatt. Studies of settlement conditions in the area were made in 1929 and 1930 by Doctor W. A. McIntosh of Queen's university, by Professor C. A. Dawson of McGill, and by Professor R. W. Murchie of the university of Minnesota. These studies are all contained in a volume entitled "The Peace River Country" in Canadian Frontiers of Settlement. It is an exhaustive study of settlement and plans for settlement of that area. Much similar work has also been done by the experimental farm and illustration stations, and there has been the work of the soldier settlement board itself and of district agriculturists, as well as the many studies made by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National Railways. Of late years we have had in the constituency represented by the hon. member for Cariboo the Sudeten colony, whose experiences have brought out information which should be very useful to the minister and the department in any settlement scheme of this kind.

Such a scheme as this, Mr. Chairman, involves a good deal more than just putting the soldier settler on the land and then telling him to root, hog, or die. It means in the Peace River country a great deal more than that if the soldier is to be settled on new land. It means the building up of auxiliary services; it means settling the soldier conveniently to railway and other facilities if he is to have a chance to make good in a real way. He must have contact with all the social services which are required. The settlement of new communities of itself creates openings for other returned soldiers in a business and professional way. Any such new settlement also means the purchase of equipment, which in turn gives employment to returned soldiers in other parts of the country. And particularly new settlement means this, that you are getting the utmost in value for what you put out.

So far as the Peace River country is concerned, soldier settlement in that area must also mean the development of adjacent areas.

[Mr. Sissons.]

One such area is now being developed by the Alaska highway. It would mean the development also of such areas as the Yellow Knife mining field and the rich mining areas lying west of the Rocky mountains in the constituency of Cariboo. It would mean an outlet to the Pacific coast. It would mean all these things and more. I feel very strongly, sir, that there should be vision in any plans made in this connection, and that the Alaska highway, that magnificent and gigantic undertaking, should be a symbol of the scope of the development which will take place in that area.

Settlement means something more so far as the Peace River country is concerned. It means transportation. This has been clearly established in the past, and it is just as clear to-day. In that connection I should like to quote what Sir Edward Beatty said on September 27, 1937, on his return to Edmonton after visiting the Peace River country. I have been in communication with him recently and he tells me that he is still of the opinion that he expressed in these words in 1937:

> That north country needs a settlement plan and needs it quickly, and together with that there should be a programme of rail development.
> The Peace River district impressed me most favourably. But its one major need still is that of increased settlement. I am confident that the country could absorb at least twice the population it now bears.
> I certainly intend to suggest to the federal government that it embark on a broad policy of settlement for the north. Extension of rail facilities should go hand in hand with colonization. That is something that should be axiomatic.
> The Peace River country definitely needs more people, and the sooner it gets them, the sooner will an elaborate programme of rail development become feasible and imperative.

That territory is served by the Northern Alberta railway, which was incorporated by this parliament in 1929. The act of incorporation sets out certain rail extensions which the Northern Alberta railway was empowered to build. One of these extensions was from Grimshaw to the northern boundary of the province; another was from Spirit River to a point in British Columbia; another one was from Hines Creek to Fort St. John.

I quite agree that you cannot ask the railways to go in at this time for a programme of railway development. But, as my final thought, I certainly would like to urge that there should be a railway extension from Hines Creek to Fort St. John. It would open up an area which, according to the soil analyses of Doctor Wyatt, contains something like two million acres of the best arable land to be found in western Canada. More than that, Fort St. John is the southern terminus of the Alaska highway. That point can now be reached only by a highway which crosses the Peace river by ferry. Surely, with the United States government putting up the money for that Alaska highway, the least that Canada can do is to make Fort St. John readily accessible by rail. I do not know whether the United States engineers have asked for that or not. They may be timid about suggesting to this government what railway extensions should be made; but, seeing that they are taking the responsibility of building the road, I believe our government should inquire of them whether such a railway extension would be of benefit to them. I am certain that the answer would be that such an extension would be of immense service.

That is all I have to say to-day. I wish only to repeat that I am most strongly in favour of the principle of this resolution. I urge that the legislation following it be put forward with vision, with wisdom, and with courage.

Mr. SENN: I wish to congratulate the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sissons) upon the fine description he has given of the Peace River country. I hope, however, that the minister, and the director—whoever he may be—will not be so strongly impressed by the hon. member's eloquence that all the money to be expended and all the soldiers to be settled under this scheme will be placed in the Peace River district. After all, good opportunities for soldier settlement exist in other parts of Canada, and places where they have just as good an opportunity to be successful as in the Peace River district, however fine that district may be.

I am in favour of a soldier settlement scheme of this nature. The minister has had the advantage of reviewing the last act and profiting by the errors which were made in the drafting of it and in its provisions. I have no doubt that the director, whoever he may be, when the time comes will have the same advantage of profiting by a study of the weaknesses in the administration of that act. I am not one of those who think that that measure and the administration of it were altogether a failure. Undoubtedly there were individual cases, indeed too many of them, which were not successful. But there is this to be considered, that the soldier who settled on the land some twenty-odd years ago under the former scheme was handicapped in a way which the present soldier may not be. Land values at that time were exceedingly high; since that time there has been a constant lessening of values until they have now reached a very low level indeed. It seems to me that land can be purchased at the present time at a price which will give the present-day soldier much greater advantages than he had under the last scheme.

I fully agree with the leader of the opposition that two or three things are essential if this scheme is to be a success. First, we must have the right type of man to go on the land. Certain types are not cut out to be farmers. There are those who have not the proper qualifications for farming, just as there are men who have not the necessary qualifications for other callings. It seems to me that in large measure the success of the project will depend upon the director who selects these men. He will have an obligation difficult to discharge, and will likely make mistakes at one time or another.

The success of the scheme depends also upon the administration of the act. I am glad to say that I think the terms are very liberal indeed. The encumbrance on a farm should not be too heavy; in fact there was a saying among the older farmers that it should not exceed 50 per cent of the actual value of the farm if the farmer is to have any reasonable prospect of getting out of debt during his lifetime. That is as true to-day as it was in days gone by. There are, of course, always exceptions to a rule, but there have been altogether too many cases where the encumbrance was too high for the farmer to discharge during a normal lifetime.

I have already said that when the former act was brought into effect farm prices were too high and farms were purchased at too high a price. At the present time, it seems to me, that difficulty will not be encountered.

I am sorry that I have not had the privilege of studying as closely as I would have liked, what the minister said last evening. One thing I noticed is that the ceiling of expenditure is to be $4,800, of which $3,600 may be expended on the farm itself and the buildings, and $1,200 for equipment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Live stock and equipment.

Mr. SENN: I suppose the ratio between the cost of the farm and the cost of stock and equipment will vary in different localities. There are in the province of Ontario, I am sorry to say, places where you can buy a pretty good farm, consisting of 100 or more acres and with fairly good buildings, for $3,600. It is said, and I believe it is true, that in a great many instances farms are being sold for less than it cost to place the buildings on the farms. I am doubtful whether $1,200 for stock and equipment is sufficient to furnish such a farm so that the farmer may have a reasonable prospect of success. He has to have certain equipment. He must have power of some kind, and as $1,200 will not furnish him with motive power he will have to have horses. He will have to have a certain line of implements not only to put grain in, but to harvest it, and in addition he must have a certain amount of live stock, cattle, sheep, pigs or whatever he may want to produce. In certain localities in Ontario $1,200 will not properly equip a farm. I would ask the minister to explain how this figure was arrived at. What amount of equipment is considered essential, and what has been done in the way of calculating the amount of equipment that can be purchased for $1,200 to furnish a farm of this kind?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I have not that information, but I am informed that the committee which sat for eighteen months discussing the details of the measure did carefully survey the very point raised by my hon. friend. If the amount for live stock and equipment were increased it might lead to an increase in the burden on the settler himself, or it might lead to an increase in the public burden, which is $34,000,000 under this legislation. There is the point, which might partly meet the suggestion of my hon. friend, that they have the power of forgoing capital payments for the first five years, paying only interest, so that the farmer might increase his stock by natural increase or by adding to it himself.

Mr. SENN: I suppose when the bill is in committee figures will be presented if necessary to cover that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes. Suggestions will be gladly accepted with regard to the sufficiency of the amount.

Mr. CHURCH: We are asked to declare in this resolution that it is expedient to introduce a measure to make provision for the settlement on the land of veterans of the present war, and so on. What does the government mean by expediency in this connection? When the enemy is at our front door, at the side door and the back door, is this the time to bring in such a measure? Has the minister made any survey of the men engaged in the present war to find out whether many of them wish to go on the land?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My remarks last night contained a detailed analysis of a survey that was made of 200,000 service men, and it showed that 33,000 desired to go on the land, or 16·6 per cent.

Mr. CHURCH: I wish to point out three or four principles in connection with this resolution. In the first place, it is not expedient at the present time to introduce such a measure. How does it come about that because we have a plebiscite next Monday these measures are being brought down at the present time when they are not primary or expedient? The result is that the questions which are of primary importance, questions having to do with the prosecution of the war, we are not allowed to discuss at all. How many soldiers overseas at the present time will want to go on the land when they return? In the first place the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has announced a very extensive exemption from military service of farmers and their sons, and all that kind of thing. We have to be guided by experience in an important matter like this, and from the unhappy experience of the soldiers in the last war—the experience with regard to veterans going on the land—I am persuaded that at this time, until the war is won, the principle of this resolution is all wrong. I suggest that we should be very slow to adopt it, especially at a time like this. We all know what happened after the last war. I know a great many farmers who went on the land in Ontario to making a living, but because of lack of foresight, vision and efficiency what became of these men after the last war? They had to put up with unemployment, misery, want and greater and greater poverty and have their homes broken up, notwithstanding all the protective measures which the government gave them, including the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, which was a measure for the benefit of farmers and soldiers who went on the land.

Let me point out one or two features of this particular problem. In the first place, I think it is all moonshine at a time like this. It is not expedient to introduce this measure at this stage. I repeat, all this planning is nothing but moonshine when at this very hour Britain and Canada are fighting for their very lives, with the enemy at Canada's front and back doors. They kept on talking like this all last fall in Washington about what they were going to do after the war, until Pearl Harbour came. I suggest that the wreckage will be so great after the war that there will be little to salvage, especially for the men who have gone to the front. With all the exemptions that I have indicated, I know that there are a good many men who do not want to go on the land. A large majority of the recruits are from the industrial centres in our cities and towns and they will not be booted about the country as the men were who came home after the last war. They will not be booted about by a lot of stay-at-homes advising them to go on the land, when farmers' sons themselves are going into munitions plants making six, seven, eight and sometimes nine dollars a day with overtime, while these brave men are risking their lives on land, on sea and in the air to protect us, and doing it for $1.30 a day. That is what they are doing, and yet their dependents are denied a cost of living bonus. Some civilians in the civil service get $175 a month and the Minister of Finance rises in the house and gives people of that class a cost of living bonus, while next door is a soldier's wife with four or five children. While that breadwinner is over in England or on the seven seas fighting the battles of the country, how is he treated? How are his dependents treated? He is refused a cost of living bonus although his rent, groceries and everything else are the same as those of his neighbour who does not go overseas to fight. Do you think that these soldiers who have been fighting our battle will put up with this sort of thing as they did in the last war? I say no. It is the duty of the government first to win the war, to put first things first.

Regarding the expediency of introducing this measure, I would quote a couple of lines from something that Napoleon said in his correspondence. At a time like this when the enemy is at the door we are taking a plebiscite, and the government is bringing up secondary matters. This is the second day since we have come back and we are discussing only secondary matters; the chief issue before us, the war, is not being touched. In his Correspondence, No. 15212, Napoleon said that "by gambling with the lives of men you lose the confidence of the troops." That is what we are doing at the present time. We are gambling on the fact that we have had protection on land and sea and in the air through the mother country and we are gambling that the enemy will never invade our own country. We may have a rude awakening. We are therefore proposing all these secondary matters that could very well wait for a time, until the war is won.

War searches men and policies. In the first two years of the last war they were going on like this in Britain. They were considering politics and they made all kinds of mistakes, until in 1917 they decided that these domestic questions should wait until the war was won, otherwise you have the cart before the horse. The result was that at the end of 1916, with the dominions represented, an imperial war cabinet, proposed by Lord Milner, was formed, and it had a great effect in winning the war. It is unfortunate that that is not put into effect now instead of measures like this, at a time like this, which lead nowhere. The people of this country want something done about the war first.

What about soldiers who were industrial workers in the cities? They do not know anything about farming; why are they not protected? I asked years ago for the protection of that class of worker under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. In the last war a great many did go on the land and suffered untold hardships. This way of dealing with this problem is all wrong. To the former minister of national war services I proposed a plan in 1936-38 by which these young people, who have now nearly all gone to the war but were then riding around the country on freight trains, should be given some measure of protection by which they could learn a trade, get clothing and lodging and pay, and get military training. One way the government can help large numbers of these returned soldiers is by adopting a large building and reconstruction policy near to and in cities. The proposal in 1935 was along that line. The government spent nearly $80,000,000 on reconstruction and housing. That would do as much as or far more for the soldiers at the front to-day who do not understand farming than such a measure as this. A man cannot learn to be a farmer in a day. You can learn to be a member of parliament in a day and talk about these secondary problems, but you cannot make a success of farming without some knowledge of it, no matter how much protection is given.

Another point is that a great many of these young men who went to the war were apprentices in some kind of industry. To ask them to give all that up and go on a farm is not feasible in all cases. In any event this should wait until the war is won. We are not yet mobilized for war in Canada. The mentality of the people of Canada is not a war mentality; that is plainly shown by the introduction of this resolution. The whole way of doing business here is an illustration of what Mr. Churchill spoke of as the enormous and unquestionable part humbug plays in the life of great people dwelling in a state of democratic freedom. He was referring to the bringing up of domestic matters that could well wait until after the war is won. I do not ask the government to wait that long. But I do say that if that is the form of protection soldiers in England and overseas are going to get when they come back home, telling them to go on the land, when their families have been treated the way they have been, being refused a cost of living bonus, they are made sick and tired.

I hope the government will get on with the war. They are marking time, waiting for something to happen to the plebiscite next Monday, but the enemy may be here before long. It is not expedient to bring in a measure like this now. We have had nothing but unbroken defeat for the last two and a half years; Norway, Dunkirk, Crete, Libya, Malaya, Hong Kong, Singapore, Burma; nothing but failure, and it is because we have failed to do our duty in the last twenty years; we have failed to rearm. I have every confidence in the minister; I admit that he has done much good war work in getting the army mechanized and in other matters. But I think these matters are secondary; we should have some total war effort before the minister goes into these problems, which can wait until after the war is won. We do not know yet who is going to own the country, let alone who is going to own the farms. The people who are protecting us are the men who have gone overseas.

Mr. FAIR: Is it the intention of the government to review the cases of soldier settlers under the old soldier settlement board plan, with a view to bringing their debts down to such a figure that they will have a reasonable chance of home security?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That question does not come under my department but rather under the department of the Minister of Mines and Resources. So far as I am aware there is no such intention, but any question affecting soldier settlers under the old Soldier Settlement Act can be thoroughly discussed when the estimates of the Department of Mines and Resources are before the house.

Mr. FAIR: The experiences of the settlers under the old board have been such as to throw a wet blanket on this or any similar plan until we have in this country a different policy for agriculture. During the years I have been in this house we have argued persistently for a better agricultural policy, and to-day we are still waiting for that policy to be announced. I do not care what business a man may be in, farming or banking or anything else, so long as he is compelled to produce below cost there will be failure and failure and more failure, as we have had under the soldier settlement board and under all farming conditions.

The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) told us last night that so many men had paid for their farms. I agree that a small percentage did pay for their farms, but the minister will have to agree that a number of them paid not with money earned on those farms but because they had a little before, and a number of them who had money when they went on the soldier settlement plan are to-day without any. I know of several men who had pensions and sunk that money trying to pay soldier settlement board loans, and to-day they are either on the road or threatened with eviction. That is not right. Until we have a different policy for agriculture there is no use trying to make a success of this or any other land policy. If a soldier settler is given free land and then is compelled to sell his product at below the cost of production, anyone will see that in the near future he will be on the road.

Last night the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley), as reported at page 1777 of Hansard, suggested that inflation was the cause of failure of a number of men settled under the old soldier settlement board plan. I would say the government were responsible for the policy that existed at that time. If they did not control these matters in the interests of the common people instead of the privileged few, then the government must take the blame for the failure of these men. And if it was their responsibility to control the policy of the country, then it is their responsibility to make amends, even at this late day, for their thoughtlessness and carelessness in the past.

A number of what we might call arm-chair farmers have spoken on this question. Only a few moments ago one hon. member said it was necessary to have settlement in certain parts of the country so that railway facilities and that kind of thing could be built in. He even went so far as to quote Sir Edward Beatty. I believe the policy of the soldier settlement board and several other organizations in the past has been one, not of giving the people of Canada a living, but rather of building up Sir Edward Beatty's Canadian Pacific railway and other similar institutions. I do not believe it should be the policy of the government or the country to use any class for the purpose of building up railways or other companies. Rather the government's policy should be one of placing people in such a position that they may make a living. If the services and possibly the lives of our men overseas to-day have to be sacrificed so that others may make fat profits, then it is high time that some persons other than those in office to-day took over the reins of government.

I intend at a later stage to have something further to say with respect to soldier settlement on the land, but because it is out of order now I shall reserve it until the proper time.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): Mr. Chairman, this measure might have worked out successfully after the last war, but after this one conditions will be entirely different. At the time of the last war England had only 2,400,000 acres under the plough, while to-day she has over 6,000,000 acres under cultivation. At the time of the last war the British operated only 5,000 tractors, but to-day they have over 100,000, working night and day. After this war England expects to supply not only herself but also part of Europe. A book that I have just received from the British bureau of information makes this statement:

> British agriculture is doing much toward winning the war. It will do no less toward bringing plenty to Europe when victory has been won.

At the present time the government is giving bonuses to the farmers in the west and subsidies to farmers in the rest of Canada. I do not see how the returned soldier can possibly make a living on those farms unless the government is prepared to give much larger subsidies than it is giving to-day.

Mr. WRIGHT: Mr. Chairman, as one who took up land under the soldier settlement scheme after the last war, and one who has spent twenty-two years trying to pay for it, I believe I am familiar with this subject from the point of view of the settler. Much has been said to the effect that the administration was not what it should have been. My experience, however, has been that the administration of soldier settlement was probably as fair as the administration of any other measure.

There were certain basic things which were wrong under the old act, and I am afraid they remain in the present one. I am not going to discuss in detail the provisions of the old act; I shall go into that more fully at a later time. I would point out, however, that under the old act there was no relationship between prices paid and values of products which had to be sold by the farmers later on. We bought land when it was worth a certain amount, when wheat was worth so much, and when cattle, horses and everything else were at certain prices. We are repeating the procedure to-day, only on a smaller scale.

To-day milch cows are selling at $85 each. Cream is selling at 32 cents or 33 cents a pound. What guarantee will the settler have when he buys his cattle that he will be able to dispose of his cream at 32 cents a pound? Will he be in the same position as he was after the last war, when cream went down to 15 cents or 16 cents. After the war, what will prevent the Scandinavian countries from sending their produce to the British markets? Shall we be able to compete with them? Under our present set-up, I do not think we shall.

The measure before us envisions a quarter-section as a farm. To-day in western Canada a quarter-section is not an economic unit to operate. The settlers who were able to pay for their land under the old act were those who were in a position to purchase other lands, so that they would have economic units to work. If we are to accept the quarter-section as a unit under this bill, then right from the start it is doomed to failure, because a quarter-section is not a satisfactory unit.

The tendency in agriculture to-day is toward specialization; we find it in every branch of the industry. If we go to the coast, we find poultry ranches with from 2,000 to 20,000 hens. Farms with only a hundred hens have no chance in competition. In my own constituency I know of men feeding a thousand hogs. The small farmer with only a couple of litters has no chance in that kind of competition. Especially is that true in reference to the grain farmers. What chance has a quarter-section of land to-day in competition with the large grain farms? It has no chance in the world; and if that is to be the basis under this measure, I can assure the committee that it is doomed to failure. In my own district I know that in the last two years seven quarter-section farms have been sold and absorbed into larger units. Most of those farmers were men who had twenty-five or thirty years' experience in farming, but they could not make it go. In many instances their farms were paid for. How can we expect a young man who is green, as far as farming is concerned, to start in on a quarter-section farm and compete with a farmer who has one or two sections of land? It simply cannot be done.

One of the reasons why the old act was a failure, to a large extent, was that certain men who had not had experience and were unsuited to farming were placed on farms. That can be avoided this time. But the two remaining reasons cannot be avoided under this present measure, and I would seriously advise the government to think twice before making the quarter-section an economic unit. It has not proved successful in the past.

To-day in the United States certain schemes which I believe have some chance of success are in operation. Over there they have taken irrigated areas and have settled farmers on small acreages in those areas. Adjacent to them have been larger areas of land to be cultivated on a community basis. Those dry farms have been operated on a community basis, with the irrigated areas. Some such scheme might be set up in certain areas of the west, and I believe it would have a chance of success.

The small holdings suggested under the bill are a good thing, especially when they are set up adjacent to industrial areas where men can obtain part-time employment. That is a scheme which to a certain extent might be extended in western Canada. Around all our towns in the west we have certain developments along this line, where subdivisions are taken over by people who can obtain part-time employment either in the town or on the farms adjacent thereto. I believe that scheme could be developed in Canada for a certain type of individual who desires that kind of employment. But so far as accepting the quarter-section as a farming unit in western Canada is concerned, I doubt very much whether, in view of present-day competition from those who are specializing in various kinds of agriculture, it can be done.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to add a few remarks to this debate. Before proceeding, may I first compliment the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Sissons) upon the splendid address he made to-day with respect to the possibilities of land settlement in his part of the country. He was kind enough to mention the fact that I had been in that part of the country last year and had travelled many hundreds of miles through it. I did so, not only in that country but in northern Manitoba and in northern Ontario in anticipation of just such a bill as this being brought before the house.

I am strongly in support of the minister in his intention to try to do something. We cannot accomplish anything unless we make an effort. Some of the factors which have been mentioned strike me as having a good deal of merit. One which has just been referred to by the hon. member who preceded me is the settling of these men on small holdings near towns and cities. I hope that if small holdings are acquired, large prices will not be paid. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Lennox (Mr. Tustin) knows perhaps as much as any hon. member about what can be done on small holdings near our cities. Before this debate concludes, I hope that he will tell us something about the experience of suburban farmers on these small holdings.

In my long investigation through the western areas I came to the conclusion that certain matters were of vital importance to the success of a land settlement scheme. One of these is the provision of transportation facilities to enable those on the farms to get to and from their market in the shortest possible time. The second is the providing of social community interest. Last night I just happened to mention the Sudeten area which I believe is in the riding of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Turgeon). I had expected that he would speak on this, and I refrained from taking part in the debate for that reason. However, he has not done so and perhaps I should say something about the Sudeten scheme.

The Canadian National Railways have settled a number of these people in the vicinity of St. Walburg in Saskatchewan. I did not visit that area, but I did visit the area at Tupper in the Peace River block which has been settled by the Canadian Pacific. These two railroads have done an admirable work, and I hope that if the minister is able to settle large numbers of returned men on single large blocks of land, say one hundred families or perhaps a smaller number in one block, he will consider the scheme which has been carried out so successfully by the Canadian Pacific. I am not talking to laud the C.P.R., as someone has intimated. I hope I am big enough not to be characterized as talking for any railway company. I am simply referring to the success they have achieved out there.

This area is close to the boundary line between British Columbia and Alberta; in fact it may be on both sides of the line. It is what was known as the old Gundy property, and I believe in the early days the station bore that name. It consisted of 23,000 acres, part of which could be cultivated at once, but the major portion of which was covered with a fine stand of timber. The administrators of this land settlement scheme did something which is new to me, but which proved to be most effective in settling these people. They built groups of houses, enough to take care of from seven to ten families, in close proximity to each other so that women and children would have an initial community interest before later moving them to their own lots. In this particular Sudeten area, I suppose there were ten different groups composed of several families in each.

The administrators set up a small sawmill, and the men were paid for cutting timber to be sawn into lumber to build the cottages. In that way they were able to obtain some revenue with which to proceed. Then the administrators purchased large machines to put the land in condition to be cultivated as speedily as possible. I believe this scheme was founded on an allowance of $1,500 per family from the fund set up by the British government and France at the time of the Munich agreement, but which is being carried out by the British government. For single men there is an allowance of £200 or approximately $1,000.

The scheme has had eminent success, and I was over the area last summer. The products produced are sold through a community store or a community service. When I was there, they were shipping about seventy-five cans of milk or cream per week and about two cars of hogs monthly. In that way they were able to keep down the cost of delivering their products to the market. They had a community store, and there was a definite community interest centred in the school-house, and a community hall and the church as well as in a large building which they used for making repairs to implements and so forth. I was greatly pleased with what is being done there, and I hope that if the minister is able to find a large block of land upon which families can be settled, he will consider this scheme.

It is essential that you have some kind of community interest. The people who settled in the west in the early days did not have that, and I have often wondered how they ever stood what they had to go through in the early days in the western provinces. I am not much surprised at the way some members from the west talk about it because these people had to go through tremendous hardships. A community interest, similar to that which is to be found in this Sudeten area, would be a splendid thing in starting this new colonization scheme.

The hon. member for Peace River mentioned the land north of the Peace river. I was fortunate in being able to meet one of the first pioneers in that area. I believe his name is Sheridan Lawrence. He first settled 300 miles north of Peace River at a place called Fort Vermilion where he raised his family. He had quite a large farm and operated a mill, and I learned a great deal from my conversation with this well posted man. He told me what the hon. member for Peace River has referred to, that there are millions of acres of fine land in this section ready for occupation. I agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Peace River that the minister should try to settle large blocks of this land with returned men.

I made an extensive survey in northern Manitoba. There are large blocks of fine land available there, and there are large blocks in northern Ontario too. The same may be true of other provinces, but, as I say, I covered these provinces fairly extensively. If soldiers are settled on these lands, they should be engaged in and paid for making roads, etcetera. They should be encouraged to build roads as was done in Ontario in the early days when soldiers of the Napoleonic wars were settled in the eastern part of that province. That country needs roads.

I was at a place called Grimshaw in the Peace River country where I met a man who had come down seventy miles from another village called Notekewin. I inquired as to how he had come down, and he told me that he had travelled this long distance by wagon in order to bring his produce to market. I disagree with what someone else has said about building railways. I contend that the time has come when more railways and highways should be built in these new areas. These men could very well assist in building these railways and receive wages for so doing. The hon. member for Peace River spoke of extending the railway from Peace River west to Fort St. John. I agree with that proposal. There is a fine block of land there, but there is no use in sending soldier settlers or any other kind of settlers into these areas unless transportation facilities are vastly different from what they are now. One man told me that he had settled thirty miles north of Fairview and that at the time he settled there he was told by the immigration or settlement authorities that the railroad would be in promptly. He said, "I have raised my family and now I have retired, and the railway has not come in yet—after thirty years." That is not the right way to treat settlers. They must have transportation. Railways and highways must be built to enable them to get their products to market speedily. I believe that the area north of Peace River offers a golden opportunity to any government to give thousands of men employment in building roads and railways.

Mr. COLDWELL: First may I say that I am very glad indeed to note that the government is considering plans for the reestablishment of the returned men after the war. Because of the experience we had following the last war, I am not particularly enthusiastic about the bill that is before the committee. The figures presented last night by the minister himself regarding that experience are on record and show that out of some 25,000 settlers, the number now remaining on the land is approximately 8,000; those who have paid off their land number 2,700; those who have sold their equity, 884; and the remainder, over 13,000, have abandoned the scheme either voluntarily or upon notice.

Yesterday from the veterans' association at Drumheller, from a committee of three, I received three pictures. They are large enough for most hon. members to see. The first one shows a soldier settlement home after twenty-two years—a shack so miserable that it is a wonder that any human being could inhabit it; yet it is inhabited by a family. Here is the second one, a little better than the first, and here is the third. I have seen so-called homes like these inhabited by soldier settlers across the prairies, and I am hoping that any scheme that we adopt will not be a scheme that will lend itself to this kind of thing.

I am thoroughly in agreement with what was said by the hon. member for Melfort who sat down a few moments ago, that if we are going to have a land settlement scheme for our soldiers we should make sure that the men who are to be settled on the land are settled in an economic unit and in proximity to a market or within reach of transportation facilities so that they can get to market and sell their produce. The economic unit, as he has said, as far as the prairies are concerned, is very much larger than most members of this house think. I am not going into the bulletins which have been issued by the university of Saskatchewan, and which we have quoted in this house from time to time, showing that the economic unit in many areas of the west to-day is at least a section, 640 acres, and that in some instances where the land is light, no sufficient living can be made by a family unless they have a full line of machinery and two sections of land. So the economic unit varies in different places, and one of the reasons why the last settlement scheme failed was that we sent the settlers into districts which were unsuitable for the kind of settlement these soldiers could undertake.

As regards the small holdings near the cities, we should be careful not to think of this as a solution. A certain number of people could be employed in that way near some cities. But when I was at Victoria, spending just one day there, I admit, in December of last year, I took the opportunity of visiting some of the soldier settlement farms and the farms which they had abandoned and which are now settled by British settlers on the Saanich peninsula, very near to Victoria. I found that the stories told there of these small holdings, where the settlers are supposed to work on the land during part of the year and then get supplementary employment in the city, were not dissimilar from the stories we hear from the soldier settlers on the prairies. We have had periods of unemployment in the cities, and during those periods there was no supplementary work to be had. In addition, the small holders found that the people in the city could not buy their fruits and vegetables when they were produced. Unless we can devise ways and means of planning our agricultural and our economic life so that our agriculture and industry may be supplementary to one another, and that one may absorb the products of the other, we shall not be able to make a scheme of this sort work satisfactorily.

One hon. member said a few moments ago that Great Britain was bringing a great deal of land under the plough and that she would assist in the feeding of Europe. I do not think that is quite what the bulletin or the government had in mind. I suggest this, that Great Britain will be much more self-supporting after this war than she has ever been before. One who has been there can readily see that land which was never ploughed before, or not ploughed for many years, is now under the plough. In the county of Devonshire from which I come, when I went back there for a day I drove over land which I remembered as park land, land over which deer ran, and I saw this land now ploughed up. I know that when this war ends, the agricultural production of this country will be quite sufficient, and we must not make the mistake of settling men upon the land after the war unless they are thoroughly suitable for that kind of work and unless we can provide them with transportation facilities or find markets for what they produce.

I am hoping that when the war does end, the nations of the world will get together and formulate plans for international trade and commerce which will stabilize that commerce, and stabilize agricultural production to a degree. While I think we are wise to consider plans of this kind during the war, because if peace comes suddenly and we have no plans made for any of our returned men, we are going to be in a very bad position, I want to emphasize, in discussing this particular measure, that we must not consider a scheme of this kind to be any solution even for the 16 per cent of the men who have signified their desire to go back to the land after the war. Much more must be done, and that much more involves the larger picture of the economic structure of this country. I do not like to see this question being discussed apart from the larger picture. We must make sure that plans of this kind fit into the whole picture of Canadian economy when this war ends. There is no question that we are then going to be faced with conditions such as we have never faced before. The old methods of laissez-faire have undoubtedly gone for good; whether we like it or whether we dislike it, we are going to be faced with economic planning in practically every country of the world, and we ourselves will have to fit into that picture somehow. I warn the minister and the committee that, while it is wise to discuss plans of this description, we should not look upon them as being in the nature of a solution of the great problem which will face us at the end of this war.

I too, like the hon. member for Battle River, do not propose to go to-day into the whole soldier settlement scheme. I want to say something about it when the appropriate minister is before the house with his estimates, and although he is in his seat now, I do not propose to get that far out of order. The experience of the soldier settlers under the earlier scheme will interfere with the promotion of a scheme of this description. I believe that in the districts where soldier settlers inhabit such places as I have mentioned this afternoon, the very fact of the miserable conditions under which these people live did interfere at the beginning with our recruiting. I have heard young men say, "Look what happened to the men who gave up everything in the last war; see where they are now." In some instances these boys came from places just like that. I know that owing to the progress of the war and the intensification of recruiting efforts, as well as to some extent the economic pressure which was discussed here last night, many of these boys have joined up. But when they come back, though they themselves were born in rural localities, they are not going to risk getting into the condition in which their parents were or in which people on the land have been right up to the present time.

What I have said applies not only to the soldier settlers but to the agricultural industry very generally. The farmer, it is said, throughout history has always been the forgotten man. He was the slave, the peon, the hewer of wood and the drawer of water. I do not believe that our society can exist and go forward industrially unless we lay the foundations of prosperity in the rural and agricultural areas of our country. That involves much more than a scheme for putting people back on the land; it involves a reorganization of our economic system in such a manner that the farmer will be guaranteed a reasonable return for the labour which he expends and for the knowledge which he puts into his land and into his effort.

While I am going to support this measure now in committee, I want to have it clearly understood that, as far as we are concerned, we want a scheme which will fit into a larger economic scheme to deal with the rehabilitation of the country when the war ends.

Mr. CASTLEDEN: What is the present equity of the board in the land under administration at this time?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is $30,444,000.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is the written-down value?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Yes.

Mr. DECHENE: I would not have presumed to occupy the time of this house—as you know, I do so very sparingly—had it not been for the defeatism which has been so evident in this house in the remarks of hon. members opposite,—

An hon. MEMBER: Past experience.

Mr. DECHENE: —hon. gentlemen from that part of the country from which I come, where I have lived practically all my life, where I know that a scheme such as is being brought down by the government under this resolution is possible of successful achievement. I deprecate their manner of speaking, not only for that reason, but also because of the state of mind which it may bring about among our young men who are now in the forces and those who will enlist later. I deprecate the habit that some hon. members have of picking out one case, possibly a sad one, where an unfortunate situation has arisen on account of lack of crop or something of the kind, as a reason for condemning a whole scheme, condemning a whole district, condemning a whole country because of one failure. Time after time I have sat here and heard hon. members trying to make out a case for condemning a whole region and a whole government administration, on the strength of one incident arising in some settlement out west or elsewhere in this country.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has just pointed to conditions in some shacks. When the hon. gentleman was still in Britain and in swaddling clothes, I, for one, lived in a shack of that kind, homesteading with my father, some fifty years ago. But in those days we did not have the hon. gentleman's kind of party to offer us something for nothing. We did not have the sort of policy which seeks to have the government do something for you. We had spirit and courage of the kind which developed the great west, qualities which are still available to make a success of a measure such as the government proposes to introduce.

I wish to support the hon. member for Peace River, whose constituency adjoins mine. I desire also to say something to the committee, the minister and the government about the district which I represent. I beg the indulgence of hon. members if in the short time at my disposal I refer frequently to that particular part of the country, because it contains a great deal of land; and no matter what the hon. member for Melfort may say, or how successful a farmer he may be, I contend that if you put the right man on the right land, such as we have in our district, he can make a living, and a fairly good one.

Hundreds of friends of mine throughout that north land are making a decent living on quarter-sections and half-sections. I say to the hon. gentleman that if he is looking for a fortune, if he wants to make a lot of money, it is useless for him to go on any kind of land, be it homestead or any other kind. Let him join the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or something of that sort. What are we offering our young men to-day, these men who are braving difficulty and danger? Are we going to tell them that they are afraid to go on a piece of land? After offering their lives in the greatest and noblest cause for which any man can venture his life, are they to be told that they have not the courage of their ancestors to go to the lands in the west which are still available and make homes for themselves as their fathers did before them?

Mr. BRUCE: This is to-day, not yesterday.

Mr. DECHENE: I regret that my voice is bad, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): So is your argument.

Mr. DECHENE: I have before me the figures of the last census. Although probably some hon. members who have spoken to-day come from districts which people are leaving, I may say that the constituency of Athabaska showed the largest increase in population in the last ten years of any part of Canada, bar none, not even excepting the far-famed Peace River. We showed practically one-quarter of the entire increase of population in Alberta, and we would have shown a larger increase than that had not the provincial government, with the usual sanity shown by that government, cancelled some years ago the homestead policy so that to-day there is no more homestead land to be secured in that province.

Those who have condemned the proposed scheme but who say they will vote for it have forgotten that the government are doing what should have been done after the last war. What I am saying now is not a condemnation of the government of that day. The minister in charge of the bill said last night that it was a new venture, that no organization had previously been set up such as we are preparing to erect now in order to provide men going on the land with proper information as to location, the nature of the soil, the possibilities of the district, transportation and so forth. The government to-day are preparing to do all that. We are telling our boys that there will be made available for them an organization fully informed and capable of directing them in any province where land is still available.

From a point 25 miles northeast of the town in which I live the railway plan, as mentioned by the hon. member for Peace River, showed possibilities and indicated what the directors of the two great railway companies thought of that north country from the point of view of future settlement and development. The Canadian Pacific railway for a great many years had no interest in the northern part of Saskatchewan and Alberta until about 1925, and during that time the northern half of those provinces were considered Canadian National territory. Branches were built by the Canadian National Railways from Prince Albert and Edmonton, north, east and west. Later on, in 1927, 1928 and 1929, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company secured charters for lines from Prince Albert in a westerly direction, and a line was constructed to a point 25 miles west of Meadow Lake. The Canadian National Railways constructed north-easterly from Edmonton in the direction of the town in which I live, and the railway is in operation. They had a charter to build a line to St. Walburg, Saskatchewan, and another branch from my home town to join the Canadian Pacific railway at a place known as Beaver Crossing on the Beaver river. They obtained running rights to a place near Loon Lake, and from a point north of Beaver river the Canadian Pacific railway continued in a north-westerly direction to Lac La Biche, to join with the Northern Alberta Railways, leading eventually to a western outlet. It was a vast plan. Surveys were made; plans were all prepared, and when the crash came in 1929, both companies were preparing to give contracts to build these different lines. I have available for the committee figures with regard to homestead land at that time which was still capable of settlement in that country. These lands constitute a large area and are productive. The rainfall is almost certain every year, and there is a fair amount of merchantable timber so that the homesteader can earn a few dollars in the winter time. There are a large number of lakes filled with commercial fish—white fish, trout and so on—and the farmers can work thereat in the fall and the winter and earn some money. With the hon. member for Peace River I realize that the time is not propitious to ask the government to build railways, but the construction of necessary lines should form a part of the enterprise, because plans exist already. They relate to a part of the country which was known to be productive; it was known to have possibilities of earning sufficient to meet any expenditures that might be made in developing it and to justify a railway line extending all the way from Prince Albert into the Peace River and Cariboo country.

The failures of the last settlement scheme have been admitted by everybody. Unfortunately, as a result of lack of preparation, mistakes were made at that time for which we cannot blame the board to-day, nor could we have blamed them for many years past. I have had many negotiations with the soldier settlement board and have found them willing at all times to meet the settler more than half way. Any man who was willing to do his best found sympathetic treatment on the part of the board, wherever he might happen to be. The trouble was, however, that the purchases were made at a time of inflation. I realize that, unfortunately, human nature is the same everywhere, and I am afraid it will be the same after this war. A good many men who had some influence locally or with the then government took charge of the organization and the placing of settlers. In the district where I live, I can say that at least 150 men were placed all the way from Smoky Lake to Cold Lake. Some of the land was purchased through the agency of some men who had influence with the then government. The result was that land that was not suitable was purchased, and chattels were bought at prices that were far too high while stock was sold at ridiculous figures. I remember a team of horses that sold for between five and six hundred dollars and an ordinary cow sold for $150. That is sufficient to show that there was no possibility of any success. But where the soldier himself used his head, or where he was fortunate enough to fall into the hands of some man who wanted to be fair, he was able to succeed. I can point out in that district dozens of men who have made good on the land and who to-day are happy. They own their land, or at any rate they owe very little on it. They make first-class citizens, and they are the type of men who are most needed in the west. The returned men who went into that part of the country, after serving overseas and risking their lives, exerted a very beneficial influence among the foreign population of western Canada. They are the type of people I love and admire, for they helped to develop the western plains. Those people from other lands who do not speak our own language and had not the same customs came into contact with our returned men and were helped to a wonderful degree. Our soldier settlers inculcated in them a love of the flag and of our institutions. They have done a great deal to build up the national edifice which we have been trying to rear in northern Alberta and Saskatchewan.

I am the father of a family; I have many close relatives in the forces, and some of them might possibly take advantage of this scheme. I want to congratulate this government upon the method they are adopting under this resolution of bringing back into trade and industry the boys who went out from here and making provision that those who are fit to go on the land can take advantage of the lands available in Canada, as well as upon the other bill providing for vocational training, which together will provide that every one of our boys upon his return will have some place to go and make a decent living after the war.

But is it right for some hon. members to paint such a terrible picture of what is going to happen to us after the war? Is it a proper thing to try to discourage these men, whether in Canada or overseas, to say that the country will not be able to take care of them when the war is over, to induce them to believe that we no longer have the Canadian spirit, that we have lost the courage and initiative of our ancestors, who from the waters of the Atlantic to the sunny slopes of the Pacific and from the gulf of Mexico to the Arctic created civilization and progress on this continent? I believe there will be a new deal after the war. The government is now preparing to bring about this new deal. No matter what my hon. friends directly opposite me say, I believe that to take one example out of thousands of something they evidently do not like and base criticisms of the government upon that is not fair. We want to offer the young men of this country something better than that.

Since I am rambling on about myself, may I say that my ancestors have belonged to this country since 1632. When the foundations of the city of Montreal were laid, my ancestors were already established on the soil of Canada. I have never despaired of Canada. Even in the darkest days of the depression in 1930-32 when I was a member of the local house in Alberta I moved a resolution as an appeal to the people and particularly to the youth of Canada. It was very discouraging in those days, there seemed to be nothing for the people to do; at one time they were told to tighten their belts and at another time they were told they were too choosy. But I believe we shall never see those things again. We are now offering these chances of resettlement and building homes on the land. I should like to try with these young men to lift a corner of the veil which hides the future of the country I have the honour to represent. It is absurd to say that there are no possibilities here. There are great opportunities for those who come back; with this whole world to be reconstructed and fed, there will be tremendous opportunities for the young men and the young women. I am convinced that there will be more opportunities after this war for those with ambition and courage than we have had in this country for many decades. I say to the young men who are in the forces and to those who, unfortunately, perhaps because of physical defects are unable to join, do not listen to the proposition that this world will not be fit to live in after the war. I resent and deprecate and reject the libels being expressed on the floor of this house against Canada, its possibilities and its people.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not against Canada.

Mr. DECHENE: We often hear it said that the morale of our fighting forces is as important as or more important than anything else, yet some public men do everything they can to destroy it. We know that prosperity and success are almost as much a matter of the mind as of physical achievement. If you lack courage and ambition, if you want something for nothing, then you are not going to succeed.

In supporting this resolution let me say that the district I represent offers many opportunities and that the population will welcome those of the fighting forces who will be so minded as to take up farming there as an occupation. We will do our very best to help them in every possible way. An hon. member said in this debate that the small man cannot compete with the big man. But if a farmer on a quarter-section has only a dozen hogs to sell, and if he knows how to raise them and they are A-1 they bring the same price on the market as the three thousand hogs of the big raiser. I realize that to-day farming is a profession. It is no longer the haphazard thing it used to be years ago. But I repeat that if we place on the land that is available trained men, men who have courage and ambition, and those men receive from the government the help and guidance which I know they are going to receive, I am sure that the present scheme will work to the benefit of thousands of our returned men and to the vast benefit of the part of the country where these men will make their future home.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BRUCE: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say just a few words in support of the measure before the committee, one which I believe to be a sincere attempt to deal with the very difficult problem of rehabilitation. The minister in his most lucid statement of yesterday explained to the house that for months a committee had been sitting considering the various phases of this matter, and as a consequence of their work he is now presenting to the house what is believed to be the best way with which the matter can be dealt.

I do not think the fact that the Soldier Settlement Act following the last war was to a considerable extent a disappointment, if not indeed a failure, is any reason why we should not try again. We shall benefit from the mistakes made at that time, and avoid the pitfalls which exposed our soldiers to disappointment in their effort to rehabilitate themselves.

There are one or two features in connection with this matter with which I should like to deal particularly. I was glad this afternoon to hear the minister say that the bill would be wide enough to include men who wished to have a small lot of an acre or two which, I presume, could be extended to ten acres. These would be lots where they could live and enjoy rural life, and at the same time assist in maintaining their families while, for a portion of the year, they might be occupied in some industry in a neighbouring town. I hope that this will be considered also from the point of view of the rural districts. I have in mind the necessity of having community centres such as one used to see in France. During the last war I had an opportunity of visiting various parts of rural France. I had also seen them on previous occasions, and each time I had been impressed with the methods employed by the French people in the rural districts to obtain the maximum agricultural production, and at the same time to maintain community life. The people who are conducting the farms do not live on their farms, but maintain themselves in little settlements or communities where they can enjoy the privileges of social life, and bring up their children under those conditions, with schools and churches conveniently located, and with the advantages offered by stores and other opportunities which would be denied them if they were living in remote districts of the country.

Another thing in this connection which has appealed to me as a farmer, is that there should be more cooperation among neighbouring farmers. Surely it should be possible in a community of that kind to have many of the agricultural implements used in common, and arrangements made whereby at harvesting time reapers could be used in common to cut the grain quickly on the various farms. Then, later on, there would be the cooperative method of threshing and marketing the grain. It seems to me a great deal of labour is wasted through lack of cooperation. Although I do not always see eye to eye with the cooperative movement to my left, I believe there is much to be learned and much advantage to be derived from a cooperative movement in many phases of agriculture.

An example of this type of cooperation is found in the Antigonish movement in Nova Scotia. This is under the direction of St. Francis Xavier university and was started in the summer of 1927 by twelve farmers who got together to discuss what they could do to improve their crops and income for the next year. By meeting together during the winter and discussing their problems and cooperating one with the other, they were able in the following year to sell the product of their farms for $5,300, a sum which had not been possible to realize previously. That work was continued, and it has extended until the present time. I was very much interested in the movement there, because it included housing as well. It was found that by a cooperative effort they were able to build their houses at a much reduced cost, and thereby provide much needed housing which they were not able to obtain in any other way.

I was sorry to learn that the Dominion Housing Act had ceased to function, and I suggest that under this measure it will be necessary to provide housing as well as land. If these smaller allotments are given to returned men, some provision will have to be made to house them, and it should be quite easy to work out a housing plan in connection with the measure the minister is now introducing by way of resolution.

I should like to express my entire agreement with the sentiment expressed this afternoon by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar when he said that this should be part of a general scheme to improve the lot of the farmer. Farmers throughout the country have had a difficult time to make a living, and we all know quite well that many of them have struggled for a lifetime only to find at the end of their days that they still have large mortgages on their farms.

During the last year in the county of Durham some sixty farmers had to abandon their farms. Most of those were 100-acre farms, which means a loss in productive capacity of some 6,000 acres. It was not a question of selling their farms, but rather one of abandoning them altogether. Therefore, when the government is looking for farms it will find a few in the county of Durham already available at a very small price. Perhaps they could be acquired by the payment of taxes.

My leader expressed my views very clearly to-day—extraordinarily well, in fact, considering that he knows nothing about farming; all of which goes to show that a lawyer can always have a brief.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): He was brought up on one.

Mr. BRUCE: Many other opinions have been expressed by other hon. members with which I heartily agree. I do not wish to delay the committee further in discussing this subject. My only hope is that when the measure is brought down it will incorporate most of the suggestions that have been made during the sittings of this committee.

Mr. FAIR: Just before the dinner recess the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Dechene) endeavoured to make a contribution to this debate, and during the course of his remarks he made some misleading statements with reference to the homestead policy of the province of Alberta. While this may not be the place to go into the details of that programme, I do want to say that his statements in this connection were not any more truthful than those he made on another occasion during the last session. I suggest that they be investigated in other channels where the truth can be obtained.

Mr. SENN: If the minister will bear with me, there are one or two things I should like to find out. On page 1769 of Hansard I find this statement by the minister:

> The third and greatest difference is that no soldier settler under this bill will be encouraged or permitted to assume an uneconomic and unbearable burden of debt.

I should like to know if a settler who has been placed on the land will be able to purchase anything on credit. For instance, he may have a horse die when he has no funds with which to buy another, and it would be impossible to continue with his operations without a horse. Will he be permitted to purchase on credit in a case of that kind? A dozen cases of that sort might arise where a man would require to have credit. Will there be any supervision over purchases of that kind, or will he be allowed to go deeper into debt?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): What I had in mind when I made that statement last night was the fact that at the outset his obligation may only be 50 per cent whereas under the old scheme it was much greater. Also, the rate of interest was greater under the old scheme. There is no question that when a settler is once on the land permission could be obtained for a temporary advance to help him out, subject to the limitation of the measure. The more he progresses, the more opportunity he would have to obtain credit. As I mentioned this afternoon, there is provision for no capital payments during the first five years when a man is having a hard time. I think it is reasonable to assume that provision will be made in the regulations for such purchases.

Mr. SENN: That is by the department.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They will have to have something like that. I understand that all personal property will be vested in the crown.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Live stock and equipment. The man does not get final title to the equity until ten years have elapsed.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Therefore he would have very little merchantable credit. I would think that some provision will have to be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): That could be adjusted by the regulations.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is it the intention to operate immediately under this proposed statute, or will it be postponed until after the war period?

[Mr. Fair.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I should not like to be bound down too definitely because this is to be reviewed by the parliamentary committee, but the intention is to have it operative forthwith. I would not be emphatic about the degree of operation, but it must be remembered that 40,000 men have been discharged from the forces already.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I think that answers my question. The door is not definitely shut?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): No, not at all. The intention would be to acquire certain lands in the immediate future.

Mr. SENN: I have one further question to ask arising out of the fact that the ownership in stock and equipment is vested in the director or in the department. In that case a settler would have no authority to sell without direct permission from the director. I understand that these settlers will be located in different parts of the country, and without quite a large staff it will be quite difficult to have this permission granted just when the settler should sell his stock or whatever he has to sell.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): It is provided that he can obtain permission from the supervisor for the sale of certain stock.

Mr. WARREN: My few remarks on this resolution are prompted by some discussion that took place early in the afternoon regarding assistance to be given to men who are interested only in small holdings of perhaps one, two or five acres. I should like to refer briefly to that aspect of the proposal. If I understood the minister's reply correctly, it appears that it will be necessary for these holdings to be located within reach of industry where the settlers may be able to secure employment. I should like to suggest that consideration be given to placing men in small homes wherever they may want to settle.

After all, I suppose it is the ambition of nearly every man to own his home during his lifetime, but only a small percentage are able to achieve that ambition. There is a growing population of small home owners, men who have perhaps only one acre of land out in the country, sometimes four or five miles from even a village. I have been interested in noting how these people, with only a very small amount of cash, seem to be able to get along, raise a family and in some cases educate their daughters to be schoolteachers. If a man owns a home out in the country, his taxes may not amount to more than $5 a year. He has no rent to pay. If he has a good cow, he gets his milk and butter and has skim-milk to feed to his hogs and hens. He will have butter to sell, because it would not need an awfully good cow to produce sufficient milk for that. Then he will have his eggs. If he keeps four hogs and sells two, the return from the two will pay the cost of feeding the four. If he knows how to butcher and smoke his meat, he will have meat that really costs him nothing. If he is industrious, he will be able to get what fuel he requires without having to pay out any cash. He will not have to buy any vegetables because he could grow his potatoes and other vegetables on his land. The result is that at the end of the year he finds that he does not need very much cash to make a living.

I have an interesting example I should like to give the committee to show just how little cash it takes to keep a man and his wife and family. This particular man happened to be working for me, and I asked him how much cash it took to keep him and his family for a year. He had not any idea. I asked him about his taxes, and he told me that because he lived in the village, they were $23.50. I asked him about his cow, and he said that he had had to buy one bag of chop which cost him $1.70. I asked him about his hay, and he told me that he had cut it along the roadside and had been able to get plenty. He told me that he never had to pay cash for wood and that he was able to grow enough vegetables. After we had gone on for some time I said, "If you had $100 cash, would that be all you would require for one year?" He said, "Oh, yes; that would be plenty." Then I went in to see his wife. This was near Christmas. I asked her about the matter. When I mentioned the $100, she almost screamed. "Lornie has not given me one cent since the cow freshened last spring," she said, "and I have kept the house and myself and Phyllis on what we made from that cow." I told that to a member of parliament, the then member for Southeast Grey, I think it was, and she was horrified that people should live under such conditions. I said, "Tell me what is wrong. They have a nice, clean house and always have plenty of good food. They have meat and vegetables and fruit—everything that any person would want. Their clothes are always nice and clean. They have a good stove, a nice couch, and good beds to sleep in. What more can you ask?" Sometimes they have a radio and they own a car.

I give this, Mr. Chairman, just as an example of the small amount of cash that a person needs to live on if he has a little home of his own and can grow some of his own food, and so I would say to the minister and to hon. members, do not be too anxious to see that the returned men shall settle on land near an industrial centre. If, instead, they keep away from the city and go out into the country, no matter how far out they may go, they can always find work because some farmer in the community is always wanting an extra hand, and in addition there is road work and the lumber camps, so that they never need be out of work. It is not every man who is capable of taking one or two hundred acres of land and making a success of farming. There are men who can get along very nicely in some trade who could not make a success of a farm if you gave it to them, fully equipped, and so I would suggest that consideration be given to these small holdings. They do not cost much.

I had a man working for me last summer and he was preparing to build a good home. He had been paying rent, and he had built a little building in which to store his furniture while he was working for me. I suggested to him in the fall that he warm up that place and live in it for the winter. He was a handy man; he did that, and he told me afterwards that his wife was never so happy as she had been in that little house. He said, "You would hardly notice the small amount of fuel it took to keep the place warm." I said, "Is the place big enough?" and he replied, "Sure, there is lots of room." I suppose that little home did not cost him much more than $35 cash because he had his own lumber. They had two children, and they were comfortable and happy there. So we should not get into our minds that we need to be extravagant in our ideas of settlement. Let us help a man to find some sort of home that he can call his own so that he will be freed from the anxiety of always wondering whether he is going to be able to find the rent at the end of the month. We do not need to be too anxious to settle him near some industrial town or big city. I think very often we would be well advised to keep him as far away from the city as possible.

An hon. MEMBER: Why?

Mr. WARREN: For a number of reasons, and I think you would find that he would get along better and be more contented with the simple pleasures that people manage to find for themselves farther out in the country, and he would then be less likely to develop expensive habits.

Mr. MacINNIS: I had not intended to say anything on this resolution, Mr. Chairman, but I am concerned over some of the suggestions that have been made to the minister in regard to the various schemes that might be included under this measure. I want to be as helpful as possible to the minister because I know he is anxious to make a good job of rehabilitation. And rightly so, because it is one of the most important jobs that could be given any minister. We have to have a proper organization of life after the war for the men who are demobilized from our armed forces and for those now engaged in war production—it is either that or chaos. I think the minister should be commended for making a beginning on this problem now. But I am afraid that we cannot mix a small holdings scheme with a land settlement scheme where a man is supposed to pay for the land and become self-supporting after a certain period. On a small holding a man cannot produce enough to make his own living, let alone pay for the land. It seems to me they are two separate things altogether. The one scheme will be on a sort of charitable basis, it seems to me, and the other is to a large extent a commercial venture. I would suggest to the minister that he should not promise too much in order to be accommodating. These matters should be looked into very carefully to guard against spoiling one scheme by widening it to include the other. I am not suggesting that nothing should be done in the way of small holdings, but I do suggest that it should be kept separate from the real land settlement scheme.

We should remember also that any land settlement scheme to-day must be undertaken in the light of a full knowledge of the social and economic conditions prevailing. Many people when they talk about land settlement refer to what our fathers and grandfathers did in settling the land, and they overlook entirely the fact that conditions are quite dissimilar to-day. I was brought up on a pioneer farm where we saw very little money but where we could live fairly well because what we consumed was produced on the farm. We produced our own wheat, took it to the grist mill and had it ground into flour, and the flour was baked at home. We produced our own potatoes and vegetables, raised our own mutton, pork and beef. Of course we also had quite a bit of herring which we had to buy, except that in the spring of the year we caught a few. I have seen my mother shear the sheep, card the wool and knit it. She could not weave, but a neighbour woman would do the weaving.

All that is changed to-day. We have such and such a company to do our laundering, another company to do our baking, and all the time we are being pressed to have somebody else do our darning, mending and all that. The old life is changed. The farmer to-day requires money to pay for everything which was formerly produced in the household. That money has to come from somewhere. It must be produced on the farms through the sale of agricultural products, or come as income from some other source. If we are to have a land setlement scheme under which those who go on the land are supposed after a year or two to be self-supporting, they will have to be provided with fairly large tracts, depending upon the particular kind of farm product they intend to produce, and there will have to be a market for what they produce.

I advise the committee not to be too sanguine of the success of any venture of this kind. The fact that we are living in a machine age is as true of agriculture as of any other kind of production. The more agricultural machines you have, the fewer farmers you will require. So, when the scheme is all ready, the continued improvement in farm machinery will result in a greater volume of farm products than can be sold, and our problem will not have been solved; it will have just begun. I make this first suggestion to the minister with the best of intentions, and recognizing that the minister wants to help the person with a small income who hopes to add to his living by having a small holding, but I do not think we should include the two kinds of settlement under the same bill.

Another thing he should remember is that the farmers of Canada by and large are in a bad way. I believe I am right in saying that one-half of the farmers of British Columbia are not self-supporting on the land and must have some kind of other work in order to keep going. There are those here from British Columbia who may know a little more about farming in that province than I do, but I have travelled through the province, and I am quite convinced that not more than half the farmers support themselves wholly from their farms.

An hon. MEMBER: It is the same in Ontario.

Mr. MacINNIS: These are things which we must keep in mind when we are organizing this plan. We must not be too hopeful that we are going to settle all our problems by putting people on the land.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: The farmers of British Columbia have been mentioned so I should like to say a word, although I had not intended to say anything until we got into committee on the bill. I heard an Ontario farmer talking about putting a man in a $35 shack. I wonder how many recruits we shall get for our magnificent air force if they think that all we are going to offer them when they return is a $35 shack to live in. I wonder how many recruits we are going to get to join other branches of the service if we tell them that we propose to send them up to the Peace River district, no matter how far it may be, perhaps away in the wilderness. The proposition is not reasonable. I have not heard many returned soldiers speak in this connection. I am not going to talk at this time about the soldier settlement board, for I do not think this is the proper occasion, when we are discussing the present resolution. I may have something to say about the board later.

It seems to me that we are wasting a lot of time. Perhaps I am wasting some now. We have to win this war before we settle anybody. If any hon. member supposes that after this war these young men are going to be satisfied to be settled away off in some area forty miles from the nearest contact with civilization, he is badly mistaken. Speaking as a farmer member, I say that the hon. member for Vancouver East is correct in his reference to the position of farmers in British Columbia, except that I would say that 75 per cent, rather than 50 per cent, have not been able to support themselves solely from their farms. There is hardly an area to which that statement does not apply, with the possible exception of the Okanagan. I doubt if it does not apply there as well. But in the rest of British Columbia 80 per cent of the farmers have heavy mortgages and are behind in their taxes. Before you can settle these men on the land, the first thing you have to do is to find a market at proper prices for what the farmers produce. Apparently, from what was said by my good friend the hon. member for Renfrew North, or one of these millionaire districts in Ontario, all the farmers there are prosperous. But I should like to mention one farmer who came from that district to my district last year. He is one of these city farmers, with a big fortune behind him. We have been told by one hon. member from Ontario that eggs can be produced at a profit at nine cents a dozen. I may refer to a letter written by this city farmer who had a big business behind him, with regard to the fortune which could be made in the Fraser valley. This man found that things turned out very differently; he had to sell all his cows and all his other live stock, and he is now subdividing his property and selling it in five-acre plots. It is very easy for people in other lines of business to talk about the fortunes to be made in farming.

I am going to support any bill which will help to rehabilitate returned men, but the minister or anyone else who knows anything about returned men knows in the first place that you are not going to be able to talk to the young soldier coming back from this war as you talked to the soldier of the last war. It is all very well to say, "Here is this magnificent pioneer area for you to develop. Your grandfather did that sort of thing and now you do it." Possibly he should pioneer, but do you think he will be willing to do that? I say to my hon. friend who suggests building these mansions for $35 that I do not know where a man can make a living in British Columbia by working a small place and picking up jobs on the side. Ask the hon. member for Vancouver East or any other hon. member from British Columbia where you could pick up work in the last ten years out there? The Minister of Labour knows. We had some ten thousand single men from eastern Canada in British Columbia, and the best we had to offer them was relief. Remember that after the war we shall also have the problem of those who will be unemployed following the closing of our war factories.

I am right behind this bill, but I want to emphasize to the minister that neither this nor any other farm scheme will be a success as far as the soldiers are concerned, or a success ultimately for the treasury of Canada, if you start these men with a heavy debt on their shoulders. It would be cheaper to give them their farms, wipe out the heavy cost of administration, and let them have something to live on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: There is one more thought I feel I should like to express after the words of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. He asks if we believe that the returned men will be satisfied with a project of this kind. Certainly they will not be. I should like to know whether the members of this house are satisfied to offer them such a thing.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should just like to know whether the members of the parliament of Canada have sunk so low as to offer the men who volunteer to go and risk their lives a miserable pittance, on their return, an opportunity to spend a life of penury.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): What about growing sugar beets in your country?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That would be bad enough. It is very hard work. I believe that some hon. members who spoke this afternoon have altogether lost a correct sense of perspective. They have forgotten that we are a community of something like twelve million people living in one of the most richly endowed countries on the face of the earth, and that we are living in the year 1942. Certainly we should not be expecting our soldier sons to be forced to live according to standards which might have been acceptable in 1542. Let everybody bear that in mind as he faces each of the problems pertaining to the rehabilitation of the returned man.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have just a few words to say to-night.

The CHAIRMAN: The widest possible latitude has been allowed, but only the principle should be discussed at this stage. This is a resolution; it is not a bill. I am in the hands of the committee, but I would point out that if the rules are to be applied they must be applied somewhere.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I am speaking on the principle of the resolution. One most interesting idea that I have got from several members is this, that the old days of the scythe and sickle in the northwest are gone. There is no use trying to put any returned soldier on a quarter-section. There are many places in Ontario where we can take returned soldiers, and I am going to give my ideas in this regard. Let us go back a great many years to the time when we had the village and, gathered round the village, the shoemaker, the carriage maker, the blacksmith and all the other workers in the vicinity.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The grist mill.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Yes. One of our greatest difficulties to-day, one of the things from which we are suffering, is the geographical concentration of industry in various places. What I envision is this. The Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) is not in his place, but he has been endeavouring in our war effort to do something that is very much worth while, and that is what he refers to as bits and pieces. That is, where you have a factory here, a factory there, a little community that can do a good job economically and farm as well. But what have you in the northwest to-day on the farms out there? You have wheat farms, and in some places in the west it is an occupation for only four or five or six months of the year. What will you do with those people the rest of the time? In connection with those farms I suggest that we must get into mass production so that we can produce economically. Why should we be subsidizing poor people who have no more than a bare living on a quarter-section? You have all the machinery in the world, and all you need is cooperation. You need something else for these people to do. On a tract of land of two or three thousand acres you can produce wheat at 25 or 26 or 27 cents a bushel. I will ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) if I am right.

Mr. GARDINER: In most of it you are wrong.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I do not agree with the Minister of Agriculture. As a matter of fact in Ontario there are various parts of the province where people cannot afford individual tractors on the farms, but we have men working together, four or five of them, sharing a tractor. That is what we have to get. We have something that we can really do. We can have these men put back on the land where they like to be, and they can engage in industry as well. That is the solution of the whole problem. Let us restore small communities in the country. Let us bring them all back. Instead of having everything concentrated in one great big city, so that when there is a depression everyone is out of work without anything to live on, if things were spread throughout the country there would be an opportunity for people to make a living.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister should make it clear after the discussion which we have heard this afternoon and evening that primarily this is a land settlement scheme. He should distinguish. If he does not in his own mind, I do in mine. There is a great difference between a land settlement scheme and a small allotment scheme. They are two entirely different problems, and while he is endeavouring to gather into the fold some suggestion of a small allotment scheme, primarily what parliament is passing on now is a land settlement scheme. The other finds its place in the picture only incidentally. If he studies the problem, he will find that the small allotment scheme is an entirely different thing. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I quite agree with the leader of the opposition, and I thought I made that clear, but I did not want to bind myself too specifically because this matter will be considered in detail by a committee of the house and suggestions will be carefully weighed.

Mr. ESLING: Will the provisions of the proposed measure extend to enlisted men who before having seen active service have been discharged because of physical disability? The same question applies to men who have been called up for training but have been discharged on account of physical disability.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): My recollection is that the provisions refer only to those who have served abroad or who have served twelve months in the dominion. The question raised by my hon. friend is one that could be further studied by the parliamentary committee.

Mr. ESLING: Let me cite a case. A certain man actually disposed of a profitable business and enlisted. He went into the 111th battery and was discharged a month later because of physical unfitness. That was more than a year ago, and he has not yet been able to secure employment. In one instance he was practically accepted for employment, and when he came before the company's medical examiner and disclosed that he had been discharged from the army he was told, "If you are not fit to serve in the army, you are not fit to serve with us." He has been without employment. What is there in store for such a man? He offered his services to the country and should certainly have some attention.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): Only those discharged with a pensionable disability would come under the provisions of this measure unless they served twelve months in Canada or served overseas. As regards the man to whom my hon. friend refers, if he was discharged not pensionable, then the welfare division of the Department of Pensions and National Health should obtain employment for him if possible, or try to get various forms of training or benefits for him.

Mr. ESLING: I will go a step further in the same case. The man made his way through Shaughnessy hospital, Vancouver, and was simply told there was no provision for treatment for him. He cannot have even treatment, to say nothing of employment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): If my hon. friend will give me the name privately, I shall be glad to look carefully into the matter, because every one is entitled to free treatment except for certain conditions for a year without allowances, and also special treatment sometimes for four months with allowances under special conditions.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Mackenzie (Vancouver Centre) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 65, to make provision for the settlement on the land of veterans of the present war.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

WAR RISK INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR COMPENSATION FOR WAR DAMAGE TO PROPERTY

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 56, to make provision with respect to insurance of property against war risks and the payment of compensation for war damage.

He said: I made a statement to the house when this bill was in its resolution stage, and I have nothing to add to that statement at this time. I simply wish to say that when the bill receives its second reading I propose to move that it be referred, not to the committee of the whole house but to the banking and commerce committee. I felt that I should inform the house of that fact now so that the house will realize that in the banking and commerce committee the bill can receive detailed study and analysis.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): What reference will the minister give to the banking and commerce committee, and what powers will he give them to call witnesses?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall just refer the bill to the committee. Bills are often referred to standing committees of the house, and the powers of such committees are well understood. They are set out in the rules of the house and governed by the practice of the house.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It will be in the hands of the committee whether it shall summon any witnesses?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): The minister made a statement at another stage of this legislation. I do not think I was in the house at the time the statement was made. It was on the last day before the recess. I read that statement with care, and I think I understood some of the underlying principles of this legislation. At the same time I am bound to say that a study of the bill and of the minister's statement confirms the impression which I formed when the matter was in the resolution stage that this is a very technical matter. Since I am not an expert in insurance law, I confess at once that I am not in a position to offer much if any contribution to this debate. Yet there are certain points which I think I should briefly point out.

The preamble asserts:

> Whereas by reason of the state of war now existing there is risk of damage to property in Canada by enemy action.

That, of course, is a truism and, being true, it is expedient to bring in some measure such as that now before the house. I assume there has been some substantial public demand for this measure.

What apparently is contemplated is a limited measure of insurance for a limited sum covering a limited area of risk, and I assume that is as far as the government or the minister intends to go at the moment. I have not had time or opportunity to examine similar legislation in the United Kingdom, but I understand that over there the principles are very much more extended, because of the situation now and for some time past existing. That is natural and reasonable. Unquestionably the risk of damage to property from enemy action over there has been and is at the moment far in excess of anything contemplated here. If my understanding of the position is correct, based on announcements that have been made and the information I have received from members of the ministry, the anticipated damage to property here from enemy action is limited to that arising from sporadic raids on our coast and not from invasion. That may not be a correct statement of the position taken by the military experts of the government, but so far as I have been able to learn the government policy in that regard, from the public utterances that have been made—I am not going to refer to private utterances that I have heard—that is as far as the staff officers of the Department of National Defence have gone in their preparations for our coastal defence. I am not raising any particular quarrel with that. How far short of reality that may be no one knows, least of all myself; the whole thing is in the lap of the gods, and much will depend on what happens in the next few weeks.

In any event I assume that the present bill is in response to a public demand, although I am bound to say that very little inquiry has been made of me, neither have I had any communication with anyone. But in the statement which the minister made he adverted to the inquiry that the ministry had made with respect to this matter, and I shall speak of that in a moment.

Dealing with the bill itself, and without attempting to go into the clauses, it will be noted that the bill enables the government itself to enter into contracts for war risk insurance; that the terms of the bill are enabling. There is no compulsory provision. As a first venture in this new field it is perhaps as well that it should be merely enabling and not compulsory, because the whole thing, at least for a time, is in the experimental stage. Time and events will determine the wisdom of the venture and whether or not the scheme should be extended.

Section 3 of the bill sets up this enabling provision:

> The minister may, on behalf of His Majesty, enter into a contract of insurance with any person to insure against the risk of war damage, any property in which such person has an insurable interest.

That, if I interpret it correctly, visualizes a department of government entering into the business of war risk insurance contracts.

But I do not understand that that is the primary object of the bill. If I appreciate the situation aright, the minister proposes to use section 4 or some other enabling power in the bill whereby the actual insuring will be done by insurance or casualty companies. I am assuming—and he will correct me if I am wrong, because I have not had him give me a technical explanation of the bill—that he intends to operate under section 4, whereby the minister is enabled to establish one or more schemes of insurance, as he sees fit; or that he may refer to a separate condition that may obtain against which insurance will be taken out along the lines of the war risk insurance visualized by section 3. I should like the minister to make that clear.

However, if any other concrete scheme of war risk insurance is contemplated being set up under the bill, that is to say if the minister has in mind any scheme of war risk insurance other than that contemplated by the provisions of section 3, read in conjunction with the other appropriate sections of the bill, then I think he should tell the house what he has in mind. If there be such other scheme in contemplation, then I suggest to the minister that in conformity with sound legislative practice and sound policy the principle of such other scheme should be set out in the bill itself, and should not be left to the minister or supervisor really to legislate other war risk insurance schemes never contemplated by parliament.

I may be entirely on the wrong tack in this matter. I am speculating to a degree, and I should like to have a little more precise information. If there be such other scheme in contemplation, then I suggest to the minister that the principles of such other scheme of insurance should be incorporated subsequently in the body of the bill, and that he should make that clear; because, according to my way of thinking, under the provisions of section 4, read in conjunction with section 32, the minister may set up a scheme entirely different from that contemplated by section 3. Or he may set up any number of schemes. I suggest with great respect—and I do not intend to be controversial or destructive, but rather to be constructive—that parliament ought not to give to any department of government blanket powers of this kind, even in wartime. Of course it is a fact that in wartime, necessities on occasions may require full plenary powers in certain spheres and capacities directly connected with the war. But this would not appear to be one of those occasions. If the minister has in mind the setting up of any other type of insurance, then I think it should be set out in the bill. That is the principal objection I desire to register at this moment to the bill itself.

As I said before, I do not wish to hedge about this thing, but I must say that the minister's intentions are not quite clear to me. In fact I think it is clear from his previous declaration that it was not the intention of the government to enter into actual contractual relations under the provisions of section 3, but to utilize the facilities of existing insurance companies.

I may be wrong as to that, but I believe that is a fair interpretation to be derived from his words. But if it be true, may I say that I am not condemning his suggestion. I think it is worthy of the most careful examination, because I am one who believes that private enterprise will do a better job than any government department in a purely business matter such as this. I think it will be handled better, and greater care will be taken. They have a stake in the matter, and they will exercise greater care in the whole contractual operation, right down to the point of settling. Private enterprise may not be able to take all the burden in this matter. I do not know how great the burden may be, measured in terms of dollars and cents, and it might be able to take on the financial obligations only at a prohibitive cost.

This is an experiment. When the proposal was before the house on March 27, the minister made a statement in which he indicated that the bill was presented after an exhaustive study of the problem from coast to coast, and that a report had been prepared for him by an eminent member of the legal profession whose name he did not mention. The report had been prepared after that gentleman had visited the Pacific coast, the maritime provinces, Quebec, Montreal and Washington. I regret that the minister did not give the house the name of that eminent member of the legal profession.

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. D'Arcy Leonard of Toronto; I mentioned it yesterday.

Mr. JACKMAN: A good man.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I have no doubt. I have not had the honour of this gentleman's acquaintance. I have no doubt, however, that he was quite competent to make the report to the minister. I should have thought that perhaps we who have an interest in the matter, or who are trying to do our duty, might have had a copy of his report. It would have been informative, at all events. Perhaps it is my fault that I did not receive a copy of it; I dare say if I had asked for it the minister would have given it to me—although possibly it is confidential.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): It would have been not only informative but would have been of great interest to those who are really interested in this proposal.

The minister stated that in addition the question had been studied by an interdepartmental committee of capable civil servants, and by the office of the superintendent of insurance. He further stated that there had been full consultation with the official representatives of the fire and casualty insurance companies of Canada, and that with the aid of such advice and material the plan of war risk insurance and compensation as embodied in the bill had been formulated.

I commend the minister for the pains which I know must have been taken before this bill was drafted. At the same time I regret we were not given a copy of the report for our information before the legislation reached this stage. All of the minister's statements certainly indicate to me that there has been careful preparation of this bill—and that is as it should be.

The minister then went on to describe the British precedents, which no doubt are very helpful, although conditions there are vastly different from what they are here, and from what we hope they may continue to be. He also indicated the situation in the United States where a corporation has been set up under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and authority has been granted to pay over a sum not in excess of a billion dollars to the War Damage Corporation funds. He also indicated that New Zealand had recently adopted compulsory war risk insurance based upon fire insurance policies already in force, as I gathered from his statement.

From what he said I gathered that what is indicated in Canada is a scheme based on the experience of some of these other nations, but very limited in its scope and application. The minister then laid down four principles which he stated were the basis of the bill: First, that the burden should be distributed equally across the country, because the whole nation is at war. Prima facie I should say that requires some further explanation. I am not dissenting from it; I can see sound reasons why it should be that way. It is a war risk that is being assumed, and the cost of that may be substantial, although perhaps not much in a given case. Being a war risk, it may be just to say that the burden of carrying that risk should be borne by the nation as a whole.

Then he went on to say that the second basic principle was that the insurance should be voluntary rather than compulsory. As a beginning, I do not think there can be much criticism of that principle. It is an experiment. I do not think we would want to put into effect a compulsory war risk insurance scheme. Without being able to measure in any degree the risk involved, a compulsory system is not justified in Canada at the moment.

The minister referred to the third principle which was that a certain minimum coverage should be given to all home owners, householders and certain others without the payment of premiums. I am not just sure that that is sound. Per se I just cannot understand why those who have a certain minimum coverage or who come within certain classes of property owners should be free from the payment of any premiums. It may be that that is the system followed in other jurisdictions; I do not know, but at first blush I just cannot appreciate why there should be no premium cost to the owner. I cannot see that that is absolutely sound. After all, this is not to be a compulsory system, and it may be that there are sound reasons for that principle. I am not sure that it is absolutely sound having regard to the fact that under principle No. 2, the minister stated that no property owner is entitled to compensation unless he along with other property owners has made a special contribution proportionate to the indemnity he would get. I just cannot seem to add up those two things.

The fourth principle enunciated by the minister was that the payment of indemnity and compensation, except in cases of undue hardship or national importance, should be postponed until after the war. That is a pretty hard provision. I realize that the minister has stated that this is based on the theory that war needs must have priority, but there is an elasticity in the language with respect to the payment of indemnity and compensation except in cases of undue hardship or national importance. This will mean that certain persons will get paid and certain other persons will not be paid. That will give rise to great dissatisfaction. The phrase "cases of undue hardship" can be defined, but any significance can be given to the phrase "national importance." I just do not understand that particular class of case, and I think this should be made clear. Perhaps this is a matter that could very well be discussed in the banking and commerce committee. However, I do not expect to be able to attend the sessions of that committee, so I think I should make these observations here.

I do not think the time of payment should be left entirely to the discretion of any department of the government, or even to the minister. If there is a contractual obligation for which a premium has been paid, then I think there should be some stated time of payment. It should not have to wait until a declaration is made. I suggest to the minister that the time of payment should be made certain in the bill or in the contract itself. Then the minister went on to say, as reported on page 1703 of Hansard of March 27:

> The insurance policies will be issued by the existing fire and casualty insurance companies through their established agents.

That is what I was referring to before. If that is the settled policy of the government, I do not see why it is not incorporated in the measure itself. I have glanced over the measure, and I do not see anything to indicate that that is to be the line of policy adopted by the department in connection with this matter. As I said before, I offer this criticism, not in a spirit of opposition to the bill but because I believe that this is the proper method of legislating once a policy is laid down. The bill itself should, in concrete terms or in as concrete terms as possible, follow the theory and principle of the policy.

The bill provides for the deduction of premiums for income and excess profits tax purposes only to a limited extent. I should like to have from the minister on some appropriate occasion an explanation of why there is a limitation. The coverage will be small and the premiums cannot be great, relatively speaking, so I cannot see why there should be any limitation in the matter of deducting premiums for taxation purposes. I think that should be a legitimate expense. At least, that is the way it strikes me and I think it would so strike any business man. I do not blame the minister for trying to get all the revenue he can, but why penalize a man who takes the precaution of insuring his premises against war risk? Why not allow him to deduct the premiums just as he would deduct fire insurance premiums as a business expense? The minister has stated that he will recommend that the clause relating to the deductibility of premiums for income tax purposes should be discussed in the banking committee. He stated that he was not wedded to any particular view in regard to the matter and I gather, therefore, that he has an open mind on the subject.

My view is that in connection with business properties this should be deductible in full, taking into account the cost of operations. There may be some reason why there has to be a limitation, but it has not been made apparent to me. Section 28 provides:

> The premium payable with respect to any contract of insurance shall, for the purposes of the Income War Tax Act and the Excess Profits Tax Act, 1940, be deductible as an expense of carrying on the business if the property insured under such contract of insurance is used in connection with and required for the purpose of the trade—

I am not suggesting that there should be a deduction in connection with premiums paid on private homes. The section goes on:

> —but such deduction shall only be allowed to the extent that the total taxes payable by the insured under the said act are thereby diminished by 40 per centum of the said premium.

I should like to have an explanation of why that limitation is there. Just what the effect of that overriding provision is, I do not know at the moment and I have not sought expert advice. I think we should have some further explanation from the minister.

There are other observations I should like to make with respect to other sections of the bill, especially section 32 which gives power to the governor in council to make regulations. This matter of legislating by regulation is becoming acute from time to time. I object to the principle, and I think the house ought to object to the principle of legislating by regulation or by order in council in connection with things that ought to be in the statutes themselves. I do not like the theory that a bureau of the government is to be given from time to time the power of substantively enacting legislation, even within the ambit of the restrictions contained in the authorizing clause, unless it is absolutely necessary.

We are regulated to death to-day in matters in connection with the war. I believe that a large amount of that is necessary, but here you are giving power to an authority of government to put into these policies contractual obligations about which parliament knows nothing. They may be restrictions, or what not. Perhaps I am not expressing myself very well, but the principle, I say, is bad. I know it is the easiest thing in the world for government draughtsmen to put this class of clause in a bill. It is not new in this parliament; it is not new in the mother of parliaments. Hon. members who are students of legislation and of the law will recall a book that was written by a former Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Hewart, under the title of "The New Despotism." I think I should register a protest on every occasion upon which I meet this form of despotism. I wish I could see some more evidence of being backed up by my colleagues in the legal profession. I am looking at one of them right now (Mr. St. Laurent), but I am not backed up at all.

Mr. MacINNIS: They were opposing you in 1934.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): That is water over the dam so far as I am concerned. I am living in an entirely different age to-day.

An hon. MEMBER: They are too.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): They are too, but let us confine ourselves to the immediate question before us. My hon. friend the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) suggests they are living in a different age too, but do not know it. Perhaps that is true. However, it is beside the mark at the moment.

I desire to register my strong protest against this policy of legislation by regulation. That is not what parliament is here for, and we should not be delegating our powers to even the best of civil servants to legislate for us. I would ask the minister to give consideration to that.

The power to make regulations given by this bill covers a pretty wide range. I am not going to take the time of the house to analyse the regulations. Hon. gentlemen can see them for themselves if they will look at pages 10 and 11 of the bill. They are contained in no less than thirteen subsections and all the governor in council has to do is to pass an order in council, not even under the War Measures Act, which is the godfather of most of these things. Then it is put in the Canada Gazete, which nobody ever sees, and the result is that nobody knows what the law is. That is one of the dangers of legislation by regulation under order in council. Having made that protest, I have not very much more to say.

I would ask the minister if he will enlarge on the principle that payments will not be made under the bill until after the war, meaning, I assume, until after the declaration of peace. He said that war needs must have priority. I do not think we should be quite content with that general statement. A man might have to wait for three years for compensation after a destructive bombardment, which I hope will never happen. My hon. friend the member for Victoria (Mr. Mayhew) is giving me his attention. If his place of business were bombed to-morrow, he might have to wait until after the war to get indemnity, provided, of course, he is insured under this legislation. I do not think that is quite good enough. How will he carry on his business in the meantime? I have no doubt my hon. friend has control of an ample supply of resources—if the government leaves him anything after he has paid his taxes.

I am not opposed to the principle of the bill, but I would hope that the banking and commerce committee will give it intensive study and that the proceedings of that committee will be public so that those of us who have not the opportunity of attending and participating in its proceedings may become familiar with what takes place and the recommendations advanced there from time to time. In this connection I would ask the minister to make available the report to which he referred and to which I have referred, also the recommendations made by the fire and casualty insurance companies who have been consulted, on the assumption that their recommendations have been made in writing.

Mr. D. G. ROSS (St. Paul's): Mr. Speaker, I want first of all to congratulate Mr. D'Arcy Leonard who was called in by the minister, and who has gone back through some 150 years of war risk insurance for the purpose of recommending a policy such as we have before us to-night. I also want to thank the insurance fraternity of Canada, all those managers, adjusters and other officers who have given freely of their time to Mr. Leonard in order that the government might be in a position to bring down this bill to be put before the banking and commerce committee for consideration, and I am sure that they will be willing to come forward and give their services to the committee in order that we may get a workable measure. I personally take a little pride in having been able to expedite this measure because, being connected with the business myself, I have had a great many inquiries from time to time, and as hon. members know, I have frequently asked questions to ascertain how soon the government's policy might be brought down. While I compliment the minister upon bringing it down after making an announcement with respect to it on December 24, I think the delay has operated to a certain extent against our war effort. As I said in the house on a previous occasion, business men who have goods to send to the coast have always been a little fearful, having no insurance protection of this kind, that if anything happened to the goods they would be wiped out.

The minister stated to the house that the obligation to be assumed by the government under this legislation would be not more than $50,000 in any one case. Well, the people of this country may need the government to assume a greater obligation than $50,000, and I do not see the reason for fixing that sum when the bill says further on in section 27:

> The minister shall refer to the advisory committee any application to enter into a contract of insurance under which the maximum amount of indemnity which may be payable exceeds two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

I do not see why the minister says $50,000 in another place because, if we had passed this bill on December 24, we would be assuming obligations up to an amount of $250,000. I think the minister should make an announcement immediately to clarify that situation.

This question of war risk insurance is so vast and takes in so many subjects that it needs the greatest amount of discussion and the assistance of all the experts whom we can possibly get to formulate a bill and regulations which will be workable. After the banking and commerce committee have these regulations formulated, and after the advisory committee have done their work, the regulations should come back periodically to the house or to the banking and commerce committee so that the Canadian people will be informed of them and know where they stand. One of our greatest difficulties, as my leader said a little while ago, has been that so many regulations have been issued without the intervention of parliament. In connection with this business it is almost impossible to draft regulations which will be useful forever. For instance, you form a company of insurance and elect your board of directors; then you appoint your manager and your staff. Assume, for instance, that the House of Commons is the board of directors; the board cannot be telling the people who are running the business what regulations are going to be in force from time to time; certain rules of underwriting have to be followed. More especially in the present case, where we have something which is entirely new, and with no experience to guide us, we shall have to work by the method of hit-or-miss, and regulations will need to be formulated and revised from time to time.

In the bill it is provided that the minister shall appoint an advisory committee. My suggestion is that this be done, not by the minister, but by the insurance fraternity of Canada. They have done a pretty good job. Under the direction of the finest insurance department in the world, our Canadian insurance department directed by Mr. Finlayson, the insurance fraternity should pick out the people who are best suited for this job. The committee itself should designate the supervisor whom they think best fitted for this job. I believe that that course would remove a great many difficulties. There are thousands of agencies that wish to be consulted in this matter. The success of this scheme depends to a great extent on these agents. It is necessary that they shall be imbued with a patriotic spirit, so that they will be able to get people in Toronto, Saskatoon and Lake Centre, let us say, as well as those who are in hazardous areas such as Vancouver and Halifax, to take out insurance in view of the possibility of losing their property. There are only two ways of doing this. One is to give the agents a high enough commission; the other is to imbue them with a patriotic spirit so that the risk may be just tacked on to the fire insurance policies. By this means we could get a tremendous premium.

Who else are interested? Of course, we have the managers of all the companies in this country. There are the stock companies, the mutual companies, and the reciprocal companies. Each must be represented on the advisory board which we are going to set up. Besides them, we have the adjusters who must be consulted and induced to pick out their best men. If we do these things, we shall have success with this measure.

In reference to what the minister said about spreading the burden over the country, there are a great many ways of doing that. Take what New Zealand did. There, the burden is spread over all the people who have fire insurance policies. It just means that twenty-five cents per hundred dollars is added to each insurance policy. In Canada we have $12,000,000,000 of fire risks assumed by our companies. If we had compulsory insurance, a ten cents per hundred rate would provide us with $12,000,000. It is not a very big rate; I do not know whether it is enough. A twenty-cent rate, of course, would give us $24,000,000. That is one way. We might have the voluntary method of getting premiums, and also we could follow the course of taking money from the consolidated revenue of the country. Where we take the money from the insured risk, most of that risk would bear on real estate. I hardly think it would be entirely fair, because the hazard is on both coasts and real estate would be bearing it; whereas by the other method each individual one of us would be benefiting by the hazard which the people on the coasts were taking. Therefore, perhaps a total voluntary system is not the best one. Under a wholly voluntary system we would have a specified premium which would be taken out only by those people who were under the hazard—we will say Vancouver and Saint John and Halifax. We should, therefore, require assistance from the consolidated revenue fund. Other things might be considered. Take wheat, which is shipped from west to east under warehouse receipt; compulsory fire insurance is necessary. We might have some compulsory, some voluntary, and some consolidated revenue fund.

We do not know how much money will be required; that is an unknown quantity. We do not know what the hazard is, and there is no experience to guide us. Our position is entirely different from that of Great Britain, Australia, or New Zealand. For these reasons I urge that the best insurance brains of this country be brought together in this committee, so that the necessary study may be made.

In passing, I might point out something which may be more important than property loss, and that is personal accident which may befall people on either or both coasts. I know, Mr. Speaker, that you and I would be quite willing to pay some premium in connection with any physical harm which might come to people who are on the coast and taking the brunt of the risk while we right here in the centre of the country are sitting pretty. That is another thing which must be thought about.

The thing is not as simple as we think. In Great Britain this whole business does not hinge simply on one form of insurance. It is not just a question whether you will insure your house or anything like that. In section 4 it is provided that the minister may establish one or more schemes of insurance as he sees fit. In Great Britain there are seven different schemes at the present time, and they need seven different kinds of people to take care of the risks involved. In this country we have not seven different schemes. We have not some of the things they have to insure, but we do need a wide range of experience.

With regard to legislation by order in council, I congratulate the minister upon having brought in a bill instead of proceeding to carry out the policy by order in council. I think that the more the light of day is thrown on the question, the better it will be for us; the more the House of Commons knows about it and the more discussion there is in the banking and commerce committee, the better.

There is a provision with regard to regulations. It will be perfectly impossible for us to sit down in the House of Commons—it is impossible for most of us at any rate—and formulate the underwriting principles which will be required in this vast field, which is a life study in itself. We shall, therefore, have to go to the banking and commerce committee, formulate the matter there as closely as we can with all the brains we have, and then leave it so that it may be subject to change.

As regards picking out the supervisor, there is a provision in section 2 that the minister may, with the approval of the governor in council, appoint an officer to be called the supervisor of war damage insurance and may, with such approval, fix the remuneration to be paid to him. I suggest that would be the greatest mistake. Let the advisory committee pick their own man. You might not even have to pay him; they might pay him themselves. I happen to know what wonderful cooperation has been given by the whole insurance fraternity. All the companies of Canada have offered to do the business for the country at cost and the agents will do the same. Let us utilize all their services.

One or two other questions which enter into the consideration of this subject might be interesting to the house. Take the question of compulsory insurance. Let us take a big oil company—we will not mention any names—a company that has a tremendous hazard, for instance, in Bedford basin. Is that company going to be allowed to insure its hazard there without insuring all the rest of its property all over Canada? This is one of the questions which must be considered by the insurance companies and by the banking and commerce committee. Take a mortgage company which has an interest in mortgages throughout the country from Vancouver to Halifax. Will they be allowed to insure only their risks in Vancouver and Halifax, or must they insure all over the country? These are some of the questions that have to be considered. I am saying this only to illustrate the vastness of the whole subject and to show how necessary it is for us to enlist the best brains.

[Mr. Douglas G. Ross.]

I do not like legislation by order in council, but I think it would be a very great mistake to tie the hands of the committee to be appointed.

One last word. Insurance is a matter of trust and faith as between individuals and companies, and we must have that in this case. You cannot lay down rules and regulations that will be iron-bound. We must have it the other way. It is provided that the minister shall as soon as possible, but within three months after the termination of each year ending on the 31st day of March, submit an annual report to parliament covering the business affairs of the minister under this measure for the twelve months ending on the said 31st day of March. I suggest that the committee to be appointed should be responsible for expenditures. Leave it to them. Let them do the job under the control of the superintendent of insurance, and then you will have something that is worth while. I certainly commend the bill to the house.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I wish to support the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Ross, St. Paul's) on his suggestion that $50,000 is too small a sum to carry this policy. If Vancouver or Halifax were bombed for an hour, $50,000 would be a mere fleabite in satisfying the demands that would be made. Even if it were $200,000, the same thing might apply.

I want to accept the challenge of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Hanson), although I am not a member of the legal profession. He challenged support from any member of his own profession—he narrowed it down to that—in his opposition to legislating too much by way of regulation. As one who has suffered many things for many years from that practice, I heartily endorse him, lawyer or no lawyer. Someone once said, "Let me make the poems of a country and I care not who makes the laws." I would say, let me make the regulations under an act and I do not care who makes the act, because I have seen the whole spirit and sense and purport of an act crucified by regulation. It is something that lends itself to abuse. It is necessary to have some regulations, for there are very few acts which do not require something of the kind. Section 32 says that the governor in council may, on the recommendation of the minister, make regulations, and it gives three or four specific instances. One would think they were fairly limited to these things, but it goes on to say:

(a) as to the manner of making and the forms of policies. . . .

That seems as if it would confine it to the form of the policy, but under the Old Age Pension Act the same provision is put in, giving them power to draw up the application form. Of course the application form must or should be limited by the terms of the act. But what did they do? They said the act gave them power to make an application form and to put anything in that application form they chose. And they did, and nearly made a new act. I am glad to see that in the last few weeks the British Columbia supreme court granted an appeal brought forward on behalf of a poor old age pensioner and decided that these autocratic bureaucratic regulations must not override the actual meaning and intent of the act. While I admit that you must have some regulations, they ought to be limited as far as possible and their abuse prevented.

I understand that by regulations made some months ago or perhaps a year ago, provision was made that any damage to life or person of seamen or fishermen, or to their boats I think, should be compensated; I presume such personal injury does not come under this bill which deals wholly with insurance of property against damage and war risk. This is considered important enough to call for a special act. The other protection is even more important inasmuch as it relates to human life, the protection of fishermen and I think other people too who lose their life or are maimed by bombing or enemy action; would the minister not deem that sufficiently important to deal with by a separate act also? Because regulations might come and go, sometimes they go with the government or the individual who formulated them. It would be more satisfactory to have such an important matter concerning the lives of a great many fishermen on our coasts dealt with by statute also.

Mr. BRUCE McNEVIN (Victoria, Ont.): I note that by clause 4 of this bill establishing an insurance scheme to cover war risks the minister may establish one or more schemes of insurance. Might I ask the minister whether it is the intention to make provision for damage resulting from falling aircraft? Falling aircraft might be Canadian government aircraft or United States or British aircraft.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would point out that the debate on the motion for second reading is not the proper time to put questions to the minister.

Mr. McNEVIN: Then I wish to refer to cases where there has been damage done by aircraft of the Canadian air training plan. My understanding of the situation is that there is a committee which has power to make settlements, but there is no statute governing the matter, and therefore an individual whose property or person might suffer damage is entirely dependent on what might be termed a charitable attitude of mind on the part of this committee. There have been cases where very substantial loss has occurred from falling aircraft, in some instances British aircraft, associated, I assume, with the commonwealth air training scheme. I can give two examples. I am speaking only from memory, but I believe that in the province of Quebec a farmer, or perhaps the better term would be a truck farmer or vegetable grower, had his barn destroyed by fire resulting from a British aircraft crashing. I think the British representatives in Canada have power to make settlements up to $1,000; but if the loss exceeds $1,000, then the whole circumstances must be reported to the authorities in the old country for decision. Naturally that takes many months, and very substantial loss does accrue to an individual in waiting for a settlement. In this man's case the insurance company made a token payment of $200, but that would not replace his barn or equipment or seed, and therefore he is left in an unfortunate position.

In another case, I believe in Ontario, a falling aircraft destroyed a boathouse, and two persons lost their lives. We have no statute fixing the responsibility in such cases. If I am correctly informed, in both the United States and Great Britain there is a statute covering such incidents. As we now have one of the most extensive air training schemes in the world, such cases are likely to increase, and I do not think it should be left to the discretion of any committee to deal with these important and difficult matters. We have some insurance companies that now include damage by falling aircraft in their coverage; but a large number of insurance companies are not prepared to accept that class of risk, very largely because they are dependent, as I have stated, upon a charitable attitude of mind on the part of the committee as to whether compensation can be secured for such loss.

Therefore, if it is not the intention of the minister to institute a scheme to cover such damage, then I believe a separate bill should be introduced to cover matters of this kind, because Canadian citizens are suffering great inconvenience and substantial loss in the time intervening before settlement is made. For example, if an aircraft destroys some fruit trees, the committee has power to make settlement. One of the bases of settlement is that the identity of the aircraft must be established. That is sometimes very hard to do. If a bus or truck or automobile has an accident, then the operator of the vehicle must remain at the scene of the accident. But it would not be possible for the pilot of an aircraft to remain at the scene of the accident, because there would not be landing facilities there. The law should provide that where an aircraft does damage, there is an onus upon the pilot to report as soon as he reaches his destination that he had an accident which resulted in damage to life or property. I am firmly convinced that it is time a statute be enacted in order fully to cover such a condition as I have outlined.

Mr. GORDON GRAYDON (Peel): In rising to take part in the discussion with respect to Bill No. 56, I may say I was much impressed by reading to some extent the discussions which took place upon a bill involving to a limited degree the legislation passed by the British House of Commons in 1941, known as the War Damage Act. As was pointed out to-night by the leader of the opposition, there are very substantial differences and distinctions as between the principles of this bill and the principles embodied in the legislation in the old land. For one thing, the question of compulsory insurance has not been adopted by this government in the legislation which is now before the house.

Like my leader, at this stage I am not in a position to suggest to the government that at the moment in Canada there should be anything like compulsory insurance of war risks. But the government might very well give consideration to the extension of the legislation, as time and circumstances may dictate, so that if it should become necessary in Canada for some compulsory form of insurance on war risks, it could readily be enacted, and we could be prepared for such a step.

I wish, however, to voice my opposition to the method by which this legislation is to be carried out. I do not know that I would have objected quite so vehemently against the principle of the carrying out of the legislation in this particular instance were it not for the fact that it followed in a long trail of regulations which are attached to our legislation from time to time. Surely it is becoming clearer from day to day to hon. members that this chamber is dealing with—well, I was going to say matters of almost minor importance, in some instances, in connection with our whole war effort administration.

When the War Measures Act was first brought into operation during this war the object most hon. members had in giving it their support was that it would be a convenience and an accommodation to the government. In addition to that, we felt it would be of tremendous advantage in the event of any emergency which might have developed from the war. But I do not believe private members generally ever expected the government of Canada to utilize the provisions of the War Measures Act to the extent to which they have been utilized in the last two and a half years. Furthermore, they have extended the principle embodied in the War Measures Act in bills such as this one, and have left nothing but a skeleton for us to deal with in the house, and they have relegated almost the entire legislation to regulations.

I protest against that, because it seems to me that we are not following the precedent established by parliament in the old country. I have before me the War Damage Act of 1941 passed by the parliament of the United Kingdom. This is an act which was debated for many days, and which consists of 102 sections. That was the bill passed in the United Kingdom, as opposed to this bill of only 34 sections now before us. It seems to me that even if we eliminate the matter of compulsory insurance which was embodied in the United Kingdom act, we have not left to this parliament the proper scope and proper sphere of legislative activity to which this chamber and parliament are justly entitled.

The minister may attempt to justify the regulations on the basis that this is more or less an experiment in war risk insurance. Nevertheless the principle of government by order in council is there. Here again we have the principle of government by regulation instead of by the people. After all, we cannot treat lightly the trend taken by the government with respect to matters which I think might most appropriately form part of the discussion in this chamber.

In Great Britain the history of war risk insurance was one of slow movement. In the first instance there was a commission headed by Lord Weir which investigated the question of war risk insurance in the old land. In those earlier days that commission brought in a report opposing such a scheme, but that report was subsequently overruled, and the act to which I referred a few moments ago was the first step toward protecting the people in matters of that kind. The War Damage Act of Great Britain embodied not only the question of business principles but went almost to the root of the entire social fabric itself.

At this time I should like to read to the house one paragraph from the debates on that bill which took place in the British House of Commons on December 17, 1940. In answer to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Kingsley Wood, Mr. Pethick-Lawrence, the hon. member for Edinburgh East had something to say which, it seems to me, indicates clearly what was at the root of the legislation. More than that, it indicates the social and economic movement in the old country. This is what was said on that occasion:

> This decision is one which I have felt has very wide ramifications, because in olden days the idea that the community was not responsible in any way for individuals was widely held. It was held with regard to unemployment; it was held with regard to accidents to work people. Gradually we have come to see that we are essentially one another's keepers in these matters, and that we cannot allow people who are injured through circumstances over which they individually have not full control to bear the full burden of their individual losses. The community has, therefore, stepped in. It is stepping in to-day in this matter, and it will have to step in more and more under the complicated system of modern society to meet the immediate dangers to which the individual becomes liable.

Then he went on to deal with the provisions of the war damage bill which was then under discussion. Under the British act, of course the whole matter of compulsory insurance was considered, and that phase perhaps need not be discussed in dealing with the bill we now have before this house. I should like, however, to point out that it seems to me the present legislation can be regarded only as an initial experiment on the subject.

I can readily understand the difficulties facing the minister in connection with bringing in a measure of this kind, because first of all the question of vulnerable areas comes in. Then there is the question of the difficulty of getting private companies to assume the risks which normally would occur from war-time activity. There is the further difficulty arising from the different forms of warfare this war has brought home to us so emphatically. I think he must in all fairness and all justice consider how this matter has been dealt with in Great Britain. I do not think it is sufficient simply to bring a skeleton bill before this house as he has done and leave so much to regulations.

I was interested in what was said by the hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. McNevin). In the area from which I come, I suppose that there are more training planes in the sky than in almost any other part of the country, and we are naturally interested in the question of war risk for this type of loss. It is true that up to the present time it has not been substantial. Section 2, the interpretation section of the bill, has this to say with respect to war risk damage in paragraph (l):

> . . . but does not include damage occurring as the result of the restrictions imposed on the display of lights—

I assume that this would not cover blackouts.

> —or of measures taken for training purposes.

I take it that the government has in mind the training of pilots and other men in connection with the empire training plan. I think the government should consider the suggestion made by the hon. member for Victoria, Ont., because I believe that many areas in the dominion would be affected.

In connection with war risk premiums we have nothing in the bill to guide us as to what these will be. There is scarcely anything upon which we can base an argument, because this legislation is quite different from that of the United Kingdom, and no comparison or contrast can properly be made.

I would suggest to the minister in charge of this legislation that when the question of war risk premiums comes before the committee he give serious consideration to one particular point, and with this I close my remarks. We have in Canada many men and women who are householders and who are on active service. The homes owned by these people, or the other buildings that they may own, would ordinarily come within the purview of the regulations if, as and when they are made. We should not be picayune with regard to our treatment of these people. I know it is the intention of the government to do the best they can as they see it in their own light, but in many instances I am not sure but that we are treating fairly these men who are serving us on active service. I do not say that with any idea of demagoguery, but I think in this as well as in other matters we should give more consideration to these men. It would not mean much to the country, but it means a tremendous amount to them. If the morale of our fighting forces is worth anything, it is worth a good deal.

In bringing down any legislation we should be careful to see that the maximum of protection is given to these men. Having regard to the provisions of this bill, I suggest to the minister that in connection with men on active service who normally would be taking out war risk insurance, the premiums should be borne by the dominion government. It seems to me that when men are fighting overseas for us we might make this concession in their favour. I believe it is a right and just charge upon the taxpayers whom these men are protecting in the fight for righteousness and freedom. I leave this suggestion with the government because I believe it has some merit, merit which goes further than the mere question of saving a few dollars for the treasury of Canada. It means going one step farther and doing something worth while to improve the morale of these men and to provide a proper relationship between the men who are fighting and those of us who are legislating on their behalf.

Mr. D. KING HAZEN (St. John-Albert): Mr. Speaker the purpose of this bill is to set up a system of insurance of property against war risk and to provide for the payment of compensation for war damage. It was suggested by the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) that the bill might well include insurance against injury to the person, and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) suggested that a separate bill might be introduced for that purpose. I think those suggestions should receive the careful consideration of the government.

The regular insurance companies have refused to issue war risk insurance since the Japs attacked Pearl Harbour, and legislation of this kind becomes necessary.

There are certain definite provisions in this bill. It provides that the owner and occupier of a dwelling house will have his home insured without cost to himself up to an amount not exceeding $3,000. It contains certain provisions for insurance against loss to personal property without cost to the owners of that property. It provides also for indemnity in the case of loss prior to the bill being passed, but only to a limited amount. I take some exception to the limit of $50,000 imposed by the bill upon the payment of damages incurred before the bill becomes law. In my constituency there is a hospital which stands in a prominent place and which provides a vulnerable object for attack. This building cost well over a million dollars and, if it were destroyed prior to the bill becoming law, the damages would be limited to $50,000.

I think the bill should contain a provision to protect a mortgagee, a man who has lent money for the construction of a home. Our ordinary fire insurance policies provide that in such cases loss shall be payable to the mortgagee as his interest may appear, and it seems to me that this bill should contain a provision for the payment of any loss that may be sustained by a mortgagee under these circumstances.

There are certain provisions in this bill, however, to which I take serious objection. The bill provides that the rest of the plan will be established by regulations which will not be made by or apparently approved by the members of this parliament.

The bill provides that regulations will be made as to the manner of making and the forms of the policies, and as to the endorsements on and the applications for the policies.

It provides that regulations shall be made about the premiums to be paid, and about the standard conditions that will be incorporated in the policies; that regulations will be made to authorize insurance companies to execute policies and collect premiums.

In my opinion this system of insurance should not be set up by regulations or by order in council. There is altogether too much government in this country by order in council to-day.

The premiums to be paid, the form of policy, the form of endorsement, the form of application, the terms of the agreements which are to be entered into with the insurance companies—all these should be embodied in the bill or in schedules annexed to it.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) told us when he introduced the resolution that the bill was presented after an exhaustive study had been made from coast to coast. The conclusions of that study should have been embodied, it seems to me, in this bill and should not be left to regulations to be made by civil servants or by an advisory committee that is not responsible to the people of this country. The laws of the dominion should be made in this chamber, with the suggestions, the criticisms and the opposition of the elected members of parliament. We should not delegate our powers to a greater extent than is necessary even in times of war.

We should not let legislative boards or civil servants or advisory committees carry out duties that we were elected to perform, and members of parliament are negligent in their duty to their constituents if they permit the laws of this country to be made by regulations, the terms of which they do not know and have not passed upon or approved. All the provisions of the plan should be inserted in the bill that is submitted to parliament.

If it becomes necessary, as it doubtless may, to make regulations from time to time when parliament is not sitting, such regulations should have force of law only until parliament reassembles and passes and approves them. If parliament does not approve the regulations when it reassembles and they are submitted to it, they should cease to have the force of law.

This bill is contained in eleven printed pages. The War Damages Act of 1941 passed by the parliament of Great Britain for a similar purpose is contained in about ninety-five pages. This bill is shorter, but the regulations passed under it no doubt will be very long. The bill passed by the parliament of Great Britain is long, but the regulations in all probability are short.

I hope that the committee which considers this bill will see to it that it is amended in such a way that all the details of the plan are contained in the bill itself and that the law is not made by regulations about which the members of parliament will have no say.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, there is one matter which I think should be brought to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in connection with this bill. I wish to commend him for the purpose and principle of the bill, but I do not think it goes far enough, as perhaps the minister himself would be the first to recognize. It should be broad enough to provide for the protection of all property in the dominion which might be endangered or injured as a result of the war activities in which this country is now engaged. I do not believe that protection of property from war damage should depend entirely on whether or not the owner of the property may have made a contract with the minister. There will be many classes of property in this country which will need to be protected, the owners of which for one reason or another will not have been able to make a contract with the minister in time to protect the property against eventualities which might rush upon us at any moment. I believe there should be something in the bill to take care of situations of that kind. Probably there is, but so far, I have not been able to find it.

The main suggestion I would make to the minister is this. It might be well in a country like Canada to organize this insurance measure in such a way that the provincial governments will cooperate more fully in the organization and administration of the scheme. Already there is at least one province which is going into the insurance of property in rather a big way. I see no reason why each province should not be acting similarly, and I see no reason why cooperation should not be organized between the dominion and provincial governments with the object of accomplishing the aims of this measure.

I intended to comment on the fine spirit of cooperation with the provinces which was manifested in the proposals of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) yesterday with respect to the youth training and vocational training schemes. I think that is the correct conception of carrying on in this dominion. There has been far too much tendency on the part of a great many people in charge at Ottawa to think that somehow or another they ought to run the show. There is a place for Ottawa to fit in, very definitely; but there is also a place, very definitely, for each of the provincial governments; if the people of Canada get the idea that this country cannot be carried on successfully without centralization, the whole country is headed for trouble. Even in a matter like this insurance bill, the fact should not be lost sight of for a moment that the provincial governments are just as vitally concerned with the property within their borders as is the dominion, and consequently will be just as ready to cooperate and work hard to bring about a set of conditions under which that property will be saved. Then there will be no feeling, on the part of provincial officials at least, that there is a tendency to centralize control at Ottawa. I would suggest to the minister that, if the bill is to be redrafted, he keep in mind this idea of organizing a scheme under which the provinces will cooperate with him and perhaps remove a great deal of the burden from his shoulders, and under which also the provinces will be a great deal happier.

Mr. J. R. MacNICOL (Davenport): May I refer for a moment to the definition of "householder" as contained in paragraph (e) of section 2 of this bill. It reads:

> (e) "householder" means an individual occupying and maintaining a self-contained domestic establishment at his own sole expense and maintaining and supporting therein one or more persons connected with him by blood relationship, marriage or adoption.

That would bar from any protection a great number of people who maintain houses—widowers, and widows, who do not have living with them anyone of blood connection. Where would that great number of householders obtain protection under this bill?

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member will understand that we are not in committee. He has finished his remarks? When the minister replies it will close the debate.

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): It is getting late. I did intend to speak, but I am on the banking and commerce committee, and what I have to say I could bring up then. I do wish to say, though, that I feel that this bill is absolutely needed, because neither the minister nor anyone else knows when Canada may have an enemy attack, and if we do have an attack of that kind there would be a great amount of damage. Therefore, the sooner this bill is put in force, the better for Canada.

There are a few items upon which I wish to remark. I had noted the matter of military aeroplanes used in training; also, in regard to section 2, paragraph (1) (iii), the "proper authority", and also "the carrying out of any attack", that that should include, I imagine, A.R.P. work, because they might do damage, or damage might be done in training, and those things should be covered. That is especially the case when one remembers that bombing planes carry over two thousand incendiary bombs, and it is known that one hundred and thirty-three out of every thousand bombs will cause fires, seventy-five of them being fighting fires, and we have to be prepared. I will speak in committee on these matters.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation of the assistance which hon. members have given by their suggestions to-night. I know there are other hon. members who have suggestions to make, but who, from a sense of responsibility and appreciation of the situation, have decided to postpone their remarks until the bill is discussed in the banking and commerce committee. I wish to express my appreciation of their attitude as well.

Although the discussion this evening has not been long, it has taken a fairly wide range; various sections of the bill—definitions and so forth—have been referred to; and I am afraid it will not be possible for me to deal seriatim with the points which have been raised in the debate. On two or three occasions questions were put to me by hon. members opposite and others in the house. I refrained from answering them because under the rules it is not permissible to answer questions in a debate; they can be answered, as I understand it, only by the person who has the floor, upon request; and I should like to say now that I did not intend any discourtesy to any hon. gentleman who asked me questions when I refrained from replying. I shall try to answer them now if I can recollect them.

The leader of the opposition directed attention to a rather important feature of the bill. If his objection is well founded, it is fundamental—an objection, however, to drafting rather than to principle. It is not intended by section 4 of the bill to empower the minister to establish schemes of insurance which are not authorized by section 3 and other sections of the bill. That is to say, this is a bill for the establishment of schemes of war risks insurance, not a bill authorizing the establishment of schemes of insurance generally. The leader of the opposition advanced an argument, which appealed to me as ingenious rather than sound, to the effect that the bill as drafted gives a very wide power to the minister to establish schemes of insurance generally. That is not the purpose, nor do I think it is the purport of the bill. Certainly, if there is any danger of the bill being construed in that way it should be amended, and that matter should receive attention in the banking and commerce committee.

The leader of the opposition has made some reference to the deductibility of premiums for income tax and excess profits tax purposes. I thought that, in the explanation of the bill which I gave the committee of the whole when the measure was in the resolution stage, I presented the reasons why it was deemed advisable to provide that these premiums would not be in all cases fully deductible. To put a simple illustration to the house: if the premium is—for the sake of example—15 cents per $100, and one company taking out insurance is in what we call the 79½ per cent class under the Excess Profits Tax Act—roughly 80 per cent—that company would really be paying only 3 cents and the government 12 cents of the premium; while a company alongside, a competing company, which was not in that class under the Excess Profits Tax Act, but was paying 40 per cent, would be paying 9 cents out of the 15 cents and the government the other 6 cents. I put that rather briefly and perhaps not too accurately, because in a sense the government is not paying anything, but the government is paying by loss of taxation in both those cases. In the one case, however, the loss of taxation to the government is 12 cents, and in the other case the loss of taxation to the government is 6 cents. It was with a view of equalizing the treatment of those who insure their properties that the provision which is in the bill was inserted there. As I stated to the house, the matter of income tax treatment and excess profits tax treatment of those who insure their properties is a difficult one. There are three tenable positions. One is that the premiums should not be deductible at all, on the ground that they are not incurred as a necessary expense of earning the income but are really expenditures incurred for the preservation of the capital asset. Another is the position taken by the leader of the opposition, that they should be fully deductible, just as fire insurance premiums are fully deductible. A third is the compromise which I have suggested in the bill before the house. I merely mention that because it was mentioned by the leader of the opposition and because the matter is one of some importance.

Objection has been taken by several hon. gentlemen to the bill on the ground that too much power is given to the governor in council. That position is always taken by oppositions. When this party was in opposition we took the same position repeatedly with regard to measures of the government of that day, and objections to our legislation have repeatedly been put forward on the ground that we leave too much to the governor in council. There is a difference between war-time conditions and peace-time conditions, and I think the argument for leaving a great deal of discretion and power to the governor in council in time of war is very much stronger than in time of peace. In support of that submission I would direct the attention of the house to the fact that the War Measures Act, which was passed I think in 1914 or 1915, substantially in its present form, expressly gave the governor in council power to enter into contracts of insurance of this kind without reference to parliament at all. I should say the war appropriation acts, not the War Measures Act. In a series of war appropriation acts power has always been given the governor in council, among other things, to take a part of the money appropriated by the act for the purposes of promoting the continuance of trade, industry and business communications whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or in any other manner whatsoever; and it would have been strictly within the legal and constitutional powers of the government, not only under the War measures Act but under the War Appropriation Act, to have made provision for this insurance by order in council.

It is because it is a large measure involving an appropriation of $5,000,000 at the outset, and perhaps involving the establishment and carrying on of insurance business of very large dimensions, a measure which certainly concerns parliament as the custodian of the funds provided by the people of Canada, by taxation and loans—it is because of the large and important nature of this measure and because it is a financial measure, that we felt it appropriate to bring it before the House of Commons. I do not feel, however, that we should be asked, either here or in the committee, to spell out every line of the policies which we may see fit to issue or every provision of the schemes which it may be necessary to establish, nor do I think it should be required of us to state what the rate or rates will be. This business is experimental to a considerable extent, and necessarily a large amount of discretion must be left to the government in establishing such a measure. The insurance of life and insurance against accident to the person as a result of war injury will be provided for by order in council. There are already certain schemes which may be described as insurance schemes. One I think of is a certain measure of insurance to A.R.P. workers. That was provided by order in council. There is in preparation before the treasury board at the present time, although it has come before the board only recently, within the last two or three days, a proposal for compensation to civilians for personal injuries as a result of the war. That is a matter which will be subject probably to change from time to time, and in regard to which amendments must be made. I think it appropriate and entirely in line with the action which has been taken in the past that that should be done by order in council. I am giving that information to the house because, just as I expected, certain members have asked in this debate what we intend to do about protection for civilians from injuries as a result of the war.

Another objection that has been raised tonight to the bill is that in the retroactive section, the section which provides for compensation to those persons who have not taken out policies because there has been no opportunity to take out policies, the limit of $50,000 is too low. An instance was given of a property worth $1,000,000 which might be destroyed before the bill becomes law. The question was asked, what fairness is there in limiting the amount recoverable to $50,000? Naturally we hope and believe that no loss of that magnitude will take place; but if full compensation were to be made in that case, the owner of that property would get the benefit of the assumption that had the bill been law he would have insured his property for the full million dollars, which is an entirely unjustifiable assumption. The compensation is free, retroactive compensation, and I think it is fair that there should be some limitation of that compensation. Whether $50,000 is the proper amount, I do not know. It is an arbitrary amount and there may be an argument about that feature of it, but certainly there would be no fairness in providing in this bill the same amount of compensation to persons who had not insured, who might never have insured, as there would be to persons who had insured and paid the premium.

Mr. GRAYDON: Has the minister any idea as to prospective claims under that?

Mr. ILSLEY: There will be none if there is no bombardment. I have no ideas about what is going to happen.

Mr. GREEN: Is it intended that the home owner who suffers damage before the measure goes into effect shall receive $3,000? There is no retroactive section applying to the home owner. Perhaps it is the intention of the government that he should be covered just the same. The retroactive section applies only to the man who has to take out insurance.

Mr. ILSLEY: My understanding is that the home owner would recover. Perhaps that is not clear from the section, but I think it certainly should be.

Mr. GREEN: Is that the intention—that if there were bombing to-night, the home owner would be covered as though the bill had already been passed?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is my understanding. It is a matter that should be dealt with in committee, but it comes as a fresh thought to me that because he is a home owner instead of a property owner he is discriminated against. I do not think that could stand for a moment.

The hon. member for Victoria, Ontario (Mr. McNevin) raised the question of insurance against damage from falling aircraft. That is a matter which can be looked into in the committee, but I want to point out not only to that hon. member but to some others who advocated a wider range of coverage, that the government has no desire to provide insurance that is being provided now even by a few companies. It is only because war risk insurance is not provided at all now that the government is getting into this business. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that some companies provided it, but not all. The object of this measure is not to give a cheaper form of insurance or a more convenient form or anything of that kind; it is to give insurance that cannot otherwise be obtained.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): None of them has issued any since Pearl Harbour.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Falling aircraft, yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understood the hon. member to say that some companies do insure against damage by falling aircraft.

Mr. McNEVIN: Yes, but the point I was interested in is, if it is Canadian army training aircraft there is a responsibility upon the government to pay compensation, but there is no law providing that they must; it is dependent on a charitable attitude of mind. There should be some statute settling the obligation, as regards not only our own aircraft but United States and British aircraft.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think such insurance is available at the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understood it was.

I think those are the main points that were advanced by hon. members in the debate. There were other matters of definition, matters of considerable detail that I am not prepared to deal with at the moment, but which can be considered in the banking and commerce committee when the measure goes before that committee.

Mr. GREEN: As I read the bill, damage by sabotage is not covered?

Mr. ILSLEY: Correct.

Mr. GREEN: Why not? For example, an enemy agent blows up a war factory, with resulting damage to many people; why are they not covered?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that I can answer that very satisfactorily, but I think it is that the matter of sabotage is very hard to determine. I think it would result in endless debate as to whether the damage really was due to sabotage or some other cause, I believe that is the main reason for not putting it in. The kind of damage insured against here is damage the cause of which is readily ascertainable; it is there for every one to see. There may be other reasons as well, but that is what occurs to me at the moment.

Mr. GREEN: Of course by ruling out sabotage you give the person who suffers the damage no chance at all. Would it not be more fair if he were left in the position that if he could prove the damage was caused by sabotage, he would be covered?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think, for example, riot and civil commotion can be covered without any difficulty. I understand that the one purpose of this bill is to give coverage that cannot be obtained in any other way at the present time to anyone who wants to insure. That, I understand, is the principle.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is correct, to give coverage against damage from war risks which cannot be obtained from the insurance companies. I do not know whether sabotage can or cannot be covered, and there may be other reasons in that case. I think there are.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): There is one other thing that I think is important. Would the minister answer the question in connection with the $50,000? Perhaps I was out of the house and did not hear him. I cannot see any reason why the bill is to cover up to $250,000 and still we have that $50,000 at the present time.

Mr. ILSLEY: I attempted to answer that. If the hon. gentleman will look in Hansard to-morrow at what I said, I think that will be sufficient for the time being. If he wishes, he can raise the point again in the committee.

Mr. McNEVIN: This discussion is perhaps out of order, but as to the point raised by the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) I am only depending on recollection but I think that last year the banking and commerce committee passed an amendment requested by an insurance company whereby their charter was enlarged to cover damage by falling aircraft.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That is right.

Mr. McNEVIN: But that is only one company, and a very large number of insurance companies are not prepared to accept that obligation until there is specific provision whereby the government accepts responsibility for damage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, April 22, 1942

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

SYNTHETIC RUBBER

Mr. ESLING:

1. Has the Standard Oil Company of the United States or any of its subsidiaries in Canada or any oil company in Canada registered with the commissioner of patents, rights for the manufacture of synthetic rubber?

2. If so, have any such rights been offered for the use of the Canadian government?

Question dropped.

PULPWOOD CONTROL

Mr. HATFIELD:

1. Has a pulpwood controller been appointed? If so, who is he?

2. Upon whose request was such controller appointed?

3. Have advisory committees been appointed in different sections?

4. If so, please list the committees, giving names of appointees, stating upon whose recommendation such men were selected?

5. Is there a serious shortage of pulpwood in Canada?

6. If so, in what sections does the shortage prevail?

7. Is there a ceiling price on pulpwood?

8. If so, is production being restricted because the ceiling price is too low?

9. Is volume of production or the ceiling price the most important?

10. What prevailing regulations restrict the export of pulpwood to the United States?

11. Is there a ceiling price in the United States?

12. Is the Canadian ceiling, if any, the same as the price ceiling in the United States, considering the rate of exchange?

Mr. HOWE: Stand.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I would ask the Minister of Munitions and Supply (Mr. Howe) if he will be good enough to expedite the answers to these questions. The situation is quite serious in New Brunswick and it will become more serious unless the position is clarified. The peeling season will be on almost immediately.

BANK OF CANADA—SHORT TERM SECURITIES

Mr. CARDIFF:

1. What dominion government short term securities are held by the Bank of Canada?

2. When were these securities issued and what is their maturity date?

3. For what purpose were these securities issued?

4. What other dominion government securities are held by the Bank of Canada?

5. When were these securities issued and what is their maturity date?

6. For what purpose were these securities issued?

7. By what means did these securities come into the possession of the Bank of Canada?

8. What provincial government short term securities are held by the Bank of Canada?

9. When were these securities issued and what is their maturity date?

10. For what purpose were these securities issued?

11. What other provincial government securities are held by the Bank of Canada?

12. When were these securities issued and what is their maturity date?

13. For what purpose were these securities issued?

Mr. ILSLEY: The information asked for in regard to Bank of Canada's holdings of specific securities is not of government record. The Bank of Canada Act sets forth the classes of securities which the bank may acquire and places limits on holdings of securities having a term longer than two years. Certain safeguards have therefore been prescribed by parliament, but no statutory provision exists for the publication of a detailed list of securities held. It is not considered that the dissemination of such information would serve any public interest. It might, in fact, work against the public interest by disclosing information which might benefit a limited number of persons operating in the security markets. The latest weekly statement of the Bank of Canada (April 15, 1942) shows the following holdings of dominion and provincial securities, classified as to whether they mature within two years or after two years, as required by the Bank of Canada Act: dominion and provincial government short term securities, $382,172,082.77; other dominion and provincial government securities, $214,869,680.81; total, $597,041,763.58.

See sessional paper No. 177 for details of dominion of Canada bond issues sold since September 1, 1939, in the first instance to the Bank of Canada. (This does not, of course, mean that all such securities are now held by the Bank of Canada.)

BEEF CATTLE EXPORTS

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East):

1. What recommendation did Mr. Donald Gordon, wartime prices and trade board chairman make to the government for dealing with the control of Canada's beef cattle exports?

2. Will the government refer Mr. Gordon's recommendations to the agriculture or some other committee of this house for consideration before acting on it?

Mr. ILSLEY: I submit that this question is not in order. The first part asks what recommendation has been made by the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board to the government for dealing with a certain matter. That is an internal matter; it would be a communication passing between the government and one of its officials. The second part of the question relates to a matter of government policy, to which the usual answer is that the government's policy will be announced in due course.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is not the real objection the fact that the question is rather embarrassing?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing embarrassing about it.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What is the present position of negotiations between the government of Canada and the government of the United States on the St. Lawrence waterways and power development?

2. What action has been taken in the matter?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. CRERAR:

1. An agreement providing for the St. Lawrence waterways and power development was signed at Ottawa, March 19, 1941. It is now before congress in Washington for approval. It has not been ratified.

2. Answered by No. 1.

REPRESENTATION OF VICHY GOVERNMENT IN OTTAWA

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Does the ambassador for Vichy still reside in Ottawa?

2. What is his name and present status?

3. Who compose his staff, where are they located and in what cities in Canada are offices maintained?

Mr. CRERAR: Information in reply to the three questions listed above was furnished to the House of Commons on January 22nd last and will be found on page 3 of Hansard of that date. There have been no changes in the personnel of the French legation, the status of the minister, or the location of the legation offices since that date.

*SHORTAGE OF COAL IN GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has the attention of the government been called to the recent severe coal famine in Cumberwell and many other parts of England and Great Britain?

2. Will the government consider arranging a large contribution of Nova Scotia and other Canadian coal or has it any proposals to aid this serious hardship and suffering in the mother country?

Mr. CRERAR: So far as I am aware the attention of the government has not been called to the matter referred to in this question. As to the second part of the question, I should imagine it would be extremely difficult to get any shipping to transport coal from Nova Scotia to Great Britain at the present time.

Mr. CHURCH: I meant for next fall and winter.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ARMY BOOTS

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West):

1. Have any wearing tests been arranged by the Department of National Defence on leather army boots?

2. Has any standard treatment been applied to army boots with a view to extending the average wearing life?

3. Has the attention of the department been called to the suggestions in this respect made by the select committee of the British House of Commons on national expenditures in their eleventh report?

Mr. RALSTON: Return tabled.

DECENNIAL CENSUS—OLD AGE PENSIONS

Mr. ESLING:

1. According to the last census, how many Canadian citizens are seventy years of age or over?

2. How many residents in Canada are in receipt of old age pension?

VALLEY FIELD CONSTRUCTION COMPANY

Mr. NICHOLSON:

1. What is the total value of contracts awarded to the Valley Field Construction Company since war began?

2. What is the total value of contracts awarded to the Valley Field Construction Company by Wartime Housing Limited?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

COMMODITY PRICES STABILIZATION CORPORATION

Mr. CHURCH:

For a return showing—1. A list of the price ceiling subsidies issued, the estimated amount of same and on what articles, or in what trade and commerce.

2. A list of the members of the Commodity Prices Stabilization Corporation, a list of their chief officers, servants and agents, showing where they are located, the number thereof, together with their salaries and other allowances.

3. Estimated cost of one year of maintaining the ceiling prices staff herein, and the aggregate number of officials and total payroll.

4. The estimated cost per annum of the operation of this corporation.

5. The walks of business life that are not yet supervised or directed by any departments of state.

6. What training the members of this corporation and their chief officials have had in actual trade or commerce, or in a competitive business.

7. What minister of the crown is responsible to parliament for the work of this corporation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would ask that this motion stand. I expect to make a statement to-morrow on the question of subsidies, after which this motion can be disposed of.

Mr. CHURCH: Will the minister deal with the statement which Mr. Gordon gave to a newspaper reporter a week ago? Mr. Gordon gave him this very information which was refused to this house before Easter. Is the minister responsible for the statement made herein by the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board?

Motion stands.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT—LEGAL SERVICES

Mr. CARDIFF:

For a return showing the names of all counsel retained since January 1, 1940, in connection with prosecutions or other legal work under the Combines Investigation Act, together with a statement of the total amount paid to such persons by way of fee, living allowance, travelling expenses or on any other ground.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL INCOME TAX AGREEMENTS

Mr. STOKES:

For a copy of all final agreements entered into between the government of Canada and the governments of any province with reference to the proposed vacation by the provinces of the fields of income and corporation taxes.

Mr. STOKES:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents exchanged between any minister or official of the government of Canada and any minister or official of a provincial government since February 20, 1942, with reference to the proposed vacation by the provinces of the fields of income and corporation taxes.

TORONTO SEWAGE DISPOSAL PLANT—USE OF STEEL

Mr. CHURCH:

For a copy of all orders in council, letters, telegrams, rulings, regulations and other documents exchanged between the steel controller or Department of Munitions and Supply or any officer thereof and the corporation of the city of Toronto or chief officials thereof, relating to the use of steel for the new sewage disposal plant at Toronto.

CONTROL OF BEEF CATTLE EXPORTS

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East):

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports and other documents dealing in any way with the control of Canadian beef cattle exports, exchanged between (a) any minister or official of the government and any member or officer of the wartime prices and trade board, (b) any minister or official of the government and any buyer, dealer in or producer of beef cattle in Canada, (c) any member or officer of the wartime prices and trade board and any buyer, dealer in or producer of beef cattle in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am quite content that this motion pass with the deletion of (a), for the reason that I gave a moment ago. It asks for the production of communications which are privileged.

Mr. ROSS (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The members of the prices and trade board are officers of the crown, and not civil servants. As I understand it, communications that are privileged are those passing between the government and its civil servants. But the members and officers of the price board are officers of the crown rather than civil servants, and I therefore submit that these communications are not privileged.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the communications referred to in (a) are not privileged, then the communications referred to in (b) and (c) are privileged. We must go on one or the other principle, and the principle on which I am proceeding is that the board is an agency of the crown and that the members and officers of the board, all being appointed either by the civil service commission or by order in council are servants of the crown and in no sense distinguishable from civil servants. Communications passing between them and ministers or between them and the government are no more properly producible than the advice which a deputy minister gives to his minister. I think that is the sound position.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): On the point of order, the minister may always waive the privilege, and I suggest to him that it might be in the public interest that he waive the privilege now because evidently there are communications passing back and forth between the government and the board which I believe it is in the public interest to know.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether I can waive the privilege or not, but I would not care to do so even if I could. The precedent established would be exceedingly serious, for then every time a minister was asked to state what advice he got from his deputy or a branch head I am afraid the leader of the opposition would rise and appeal on grounds of public interest that the privilege be waived and the house be given the information. That has never been done to my recollection.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The two cases are not quite analogous. The confidential relationship which exists between the minister and his deputy is far different from the relationship which exists between the minister and the chairman of the wartime prices and trade board.

Mr. CRERAR: Oh, no.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not one bit.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Quite different in principle.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am not so sure but that the time has come when we ought to know where some of this bad advice is coming from.

Motion as amended agreed to.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO CONSIDER BILL NO. 64

Hon. HUMPHREY MITCHELL (Minister of Labour) moved:

That a special committee consisting of Messrs. Bruce, Donnelly, Edwards, Fraser (Peterborough West), Lafontaine, Leger, McCulloch, Marier, Mitchell, Noseworthy, O'Brien, Reid, Roebuck, Shaw and Winkler, be appointed to consider a bill intituled: "An act to assist in the carrying on and coordination of vocational training" and that the said committee be empowered to send for persons, papers and records and to report from time to time.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might point out that the motion as moved differs from the motion as it appears on the order paper, in that one or two names are substituted, as follows: the name of Mr. Martin is deleted and that of Mr. Roebuck added. The minister asks for unanimous consent to these changes so that the motion will be read as put.

Motion agreed to.

LOAN OF $750,000,000

TO MEET LOANS OR OBLIGATIONS, TO PURCHASE UNMATURED SECURITIES, AND FOR PUBLIC WORKS AND GENERAL PURPOSES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That the governor in council be authorized to raise by way of loan under the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, 1931, an amount not to exceed in the whole the sum of seven hundred and fifty million dollars for paying or redeeming the whole or any portion of loans or obligations of Canada and also for purchasing unmatured securities of Canada and for public works and general purposes.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

THE PLEBISCITE

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE APPEARING IN "LE CANADA" OF APRIL 20

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) a question arising out of an article in Le Canada of April 20, last Monday, of which I will read only a part:

"By answering 'Yes' you keep conscription away," said Senator L. M. Gouin, in Montreal. "It is to prevent conscription that Mr. King asks to be freed from his pledges."

Was this authorized by the government? In view of the many different interpretations placed by some government ministers, members and provincial premiers on the construction of the question submitted on the plebiscite to be voted on next Monday, will the Prime Minister clarify the text of the question so as to enable the voters to understand it sufficiently to mark their ballots intelligently?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I believe that that is a question which should be answered by the Prime Minister, and I shall draw it to his attention.

BEEF

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION BEING TAKEN TO RELIEVE SHORTAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. FRASER (Peterborough West): On Monday the Minister of Agriculture said that in a day or so he would give a report to the house with regard to the beef situation. Is he now prepared to do so?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, we are getting closer to it all the time.

Hon. R. B. HANSON (Leader of the Opposition): I suggest that that is not an answer. This is an important question, and we ought to have a statement from the Minister of Agriculture at the earliest possible day.

Mr. GARDINER: That is about as close as I can get to an answer. We are drawing a little closer.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I beg pardon; I could not hear the minister.

Mr. GARDINER: We will make a statement in a very few days with regard to it.

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): The Minister of Agriculture should do something about it at once, because there are stores in this country which have not any beef.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

WAR APPROPRIATION BILL

PROVISION FOR GRANTING TO HIS MAJESTY AID FOR NATIONAL DEFENCE AND SECURITY

The house resumed from Friday, March 27, consideration in committee of a resolution to provide sums not exceeding $2,000,000,000 for the year ending March 31, 1943, for granting to his majesty aid for national defence and security—Mr. Ilsley—Mr. Vien in the chair.

Hon. J. L. RALSTON (Minister of National Defence): Two or three questions were asked me the last day that matters connected with the army were brought up. One was by the hon. member for Weyburn, with regard to a lease from the International Harvester Company of a building, in Weyburn I think it was. The hon. member had the idea, and so expressed it, that a building which had been leased by the department had been given up by the department and that when the manager of the company offered to allow the building to remain idle, so that it might be used again by the department, this offer was refused and the department insisted on carrying out the terms of the lease, which were that the department should put it in the same shape as it was prior to the leasing. He intimated that an expenditure of something like $2,000 had been made, and he said—I am reading from what he stated in the committee—at page 1665 of Hansard:

> It seems to me that this was a case of red tape actually interfering in what would have been an ordinary, common sense business transaction of accepting the offer of the International Harvester Company to let the building stand idle, to waive the rent and storage charges, so that in the event of the building being required the arrangement could have been picked up again right where it was dropped.

I had inquiries made about it, and my hon. friend is to some extent correct, in his suggestion that the local manager of the company indicated that he thought possibly it could be arranged that the building might stand idle and the department would not necessarily have to carry out its obligation to put it back in the same shape as it was before; that, perhaps, was the substance of the conversation between the representative of the department and the local manager. The local manager, however, said that he would refer the matter to the headquarters of the company at Chicago, and later he wrote this letter, from which I will read, dated October 20, 1941, addressed to Captain Evans, Department of National Defence, Military District No. 12, Regina:

> This will acknowledge your telephone conversation of a short time ago, advising us that it is the intention of the dominion government to cancel the lease on the above Weyburn property to take effect November 30th, 1941.
> The writer had some conversation with you regarding the removal of your improvements and other matters per your lease with this company, feeling that this work could perhaps be done at a later date.
> The writer took this matter up with Chicago office, and we are to-day in receipt of their letter, which states in part as follows:
> "We have discussed this matter, and it is our feeling that the terms of the lease should be complied with whenever the government vacates the building."

Unless the government intends to continue their occupancy of this building, all of the provisions of the lease should be complied with immediately.

This will confirm our telephone conversation of to-day regarding this matter.

Yours very truly,
A. P. Brown

This indicates that the headquarters of the company refused to carry out the suggestion which had been made in the course of the conversation, that the building might be allowed to remain idle and the improvements not removed. I trust that this will clear the matter up in the mind of my hon. friend. He had the impression, and gave it to the house, that the company had offered to waive the terms of the lease and not require the expenditure to be made.

The hon. member for Peel asked a question with regard to categories of the reserve army. My information is that instructions covering enlistment into the reserve army allow category C men to be accepted. Men, however, between the ages of nineteen and thirty-five who are category A or B cannot be enlisted unless they are (a) those who have been granted or would be entitled to postponement of compulsory training under the National Resources Mobilization Act; (b) members of Canadian officers' training corps of military age until graduation, also cannot be enlisted in the reserve army.

One other point which was mentioned, and which perhaps is not important, but it struck me rather forcibly and with some surprise, was with regard to the quantity of socks purchased by the department. The hon. member for Peterborough West quoted, I believe, from the report of the Department of Munitions and Supply to the effect that ten million pairs of woollen socks had been purchased. It sounded like a large amount, but the explanation is very simple. The quantity ordered since September, 1939, is 10,168,000 pairs. There have been actually issued to personnel of the active and reserve force units and to troops proceeding overseas since that time 5,336,364 pairs, leaving 4,831,636 pairs which have been ordered but which have not been issued. There were shipped overseas for the Canadian troops in the last year 626,000 pairs, leaving 4,205,636 pairs, and of these there are in stock 1,384,988 pairs, and there are due in outstanding orders which have not been delivered, 2,820,648 pairs. That information is given as of March 27, so that although there were 10,168,000 pairs ordered, of these roughly 1,300,000 were in stock and 2,800,000 had not been delivered.

[Mr. Ralston.]

Mr. FRASER (Peterborough West): I have a letter from Doctor Routley with regard to the supplying of socks to the Red Cross. They supplied the army with 195,578 pairs of socks during 1941.

Mr. RALSTON: I am sure the Red Cross have done splendid work in that connection. The initial issue for the active force is four pairs per man. The war replacement is twelve pairs a year, and the initial issue for the reserve is two pairs per man and the replacement three pairs.

Mr. GREEN: Within the last few days articles have appeared in the press to the effect that a change is being made in the type of training being given to the men in the army. It would be helpful if the minister would explain those changes. It does seem of the utmost importance that the army should be so trained that every man may be a fighter. I doubt very much whether that is the position at the present time. I believe there are men in the active army in Canada who have no rifles—if I am wrong I wish the minister would correct me—and certainly men who have had no rifle training. It is of the utmost importance that these men should be so trained. At any rate, the main consideration should be to train them in fighting. The Australian commander in Malaya, Major-General Henry Gordon Bennett, when he escaped after the fall of Singapore and returned to Australia, had this to say, as reported in the Ottawa Journal of March 16:

He charged that what he called barrack-square methods of training took the initiative out of troops.

It does seem that there is still quite a lot of the 1918 complex in connection with the training of our troops. Could the minister give us a statement to-day as to what changes have recently been made in the training of our troops?

Mr. RALSTON: I am not in a position to state that there have been radical changes in connection with the training of troops. The system of training, of which the committee is fully aware, is the training of men in training centres, which is quite different, of course, from the training which was given in the last war. I have read to the committee on previous occasions—I thought I had the references here—opinions which had been expressed by military men both of Great Britain and of the United States with regard to the advantages of training in training centres compared with unit training. I must say frankly that in my judgment there are some disadvantages in that a certain amount of esprit de corps is lost, and there is danger of the ardour of the community spirit being dampened by the fact that men are so long away from their particular units.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): Is that not a very important factor?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is quite right; it is an important factor. However, the trial has been made and the results have been seen. There is no doubt that men who have seen troops actively at work, actively engaged, who have been trained in training centres, are of one mind with respect to the desirability and the necessity of training in that way. There are, of course, constant changes in details of training. What might be called the frills in connection with drill are cut out; nevertheless most of these things have to be done if a man is to be made an efficient soldier and if discipline and smartness are to be maintained. By smartness I do not mean simply appearance for parade purposes, but alacrity, accuracy, energy, initiative, resourcefulness and readiness to obey an order. All these qualities are inculcated in the training of the individual soldier.

My hon. friend made one reference, and in that regard I would ask him to be as careful as possible in connection with statements he makes. The last time he made a statement with regard to rifles; it was that the army was equipped with rifles that would not fire. I corrected him on that.

Mr. GREEN: I was referring to a certain class of rifles.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, and I corrected him on that. It was not a good thing for this country for that statement to go out because it was undoubtedly incorrect.

Mr. GREEN: If the minister wants to open up that dispute, there is a lot to be said on both sides. I will not say more about it in case I might be accused of hampering the war effort, and I think it would be just as well for him to let it drop. If I am to be attacked on that question, I am going to defend myself. It was certainly not all onesided.

Mr. RALSTON: I am saying that my hon. friend made a statement with regard to rifles, that they would not fire, and I am saying that the statement was absolutely incorrect. I had expected he would indicate that he had been misinformed in connection with it. He is now making the statement that the active service force are without rifles.

Mr. GREEN: Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. GREEN: On a question of privilege, the minister is misquoting me. I said that some of the active service force were not equipped with rifles, and I asked him to correct me if I were wrong. I hope I am wrong. I hope every man in the active army has a rifle.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend says that some are not equipped with rifles. I have no doubt that there are some men in the active army who are not equipped with rifles. There are some men who do not have to carry rifles. I have, however, no knowledge of men in the active service force who should carry rifles who are not equipped with rifles.

Mr. GREEN: May I ask in that connection about such units as the drivers in the army service corps or men in the ordnance and men in different units of that type, who I understand are supposed to be carrying rifles. If they are not they are merely chauffeurs. Some of these men do not have rifles. My suggestion, made in the utmost good faith and for the sake of Canada, and certainly for the sake of the defence of the Pacific coast, was that all these men in the active army should have rifles with which to defend themselves and help to defend the country, and that they should be trained to use them. That was what I mentioned nearly three months ago in this house, and there has been plenty of time for the minister to check it up. Certainly in a part of the country that might become overnight a war front, I cannot see why these men should not be armed and should not be trained to use their arms.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend must remember that that is not the only part of the country which might become a war front. I can say to him that if these men are not actually carrying rifles, there are rifles for them. What I deprecate is my hon. friend having the impression go abroad that Canada's active forces engaged in operations have not rifles, because the idea is absolutely erroneous. I want to say to my hon. friend, if he will permit me to finish—

Mr. GREEN: Don't put words in my mouth.

Mr. RALSTON: I want to make that statement to him in the most emphatic way.

Mr. GREEN: The minister has admitted that what I have said is correct; that there are some men in the active army who do not have rifles. I do not need any curtain-lecture about making statements like that, especially when he admits they are correct. I want to have the condition remedied.

Mr. RALSTON: I am not giving any curtain-lecture, but I cannot call the roll and find what men have rifles at this particular minute; I am saying that we have rifles for them. If they go on the trucks in connection with training without rifles, that does not mean that there are not rifles for them. I say there are rifles available for them.

Mr. GREEN: Then I understand the minister's statement to be that there should be rifles for these men?

Mr. RALSTON: There should be rifles for the men for whom there should be rifles. That is all I can say. There are some units and some men in the active forces who do not carry rifles; some carry revolvers.

Mr. GREEN: Well, are all these men who should have rifles given training in the handling of rifles? Are they all being trained in the firing of rifles? Some of these men have been in the army for two and a half years.

Mr. RALSTON: I can assure my hon. friend that during the four-month training period they are all given training in the handling of rifles.

Mr. GREEN: But a good many of these men did not go through the training centres, men say who have been in the army for a year and a half or longer. Why is it not possible for every one of these men who is supposed to have a rifle to be given training in the use of the rifle?

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend is talking about a hypothetical case. I cannot call the roll of each man in each unit, but I can say that they are given rifle training and they pass all the tests in rifle training and are given musketry instruction; that is one of the elementary matters in the training of a soldier. I do not know what my hon. friend means by assuming that they have not been trained with rifles. If he has any particular instance I shall be glad to hear of it.

Mr. GREEN: Will the minister have a check made in the Pacific command to see whether or not every man who ought to be carrying a rifle has received training in the use of the rifle? I do not want to blame the local commanders if it is found such is not the case, but I believe the minister will find the position to be that many of these men for one reason or another have not had training in the use of the rifle, and I suggest that it is of the utmost importance that every one of them be trained to fire a rifle and that there be a rifle available for him, one that can be given out to him at very short notice.

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. RALSTON: I shall be glad to comply with my hon. friend's request and have a check made, but three months ago, I think it was, the hon. member for Weyburn asked me with regard to the arms of men in the active army on the Pacific coast at that time, and I gave a list showing that all these troops were fully armed with rifles. I have no reason to think that situation does not exist to-day. I can assure my hon. friend that the tests of elementary training include musketry and training with the rifle, and these active troops are allotted and issued rifles.

Mr. GREEN: As I said before, many of them were in the active army before the training centres were established.

Mr. RALSTON: But they are all required to pass their tests of elementary training annually.

Mr. GREEN: Well, will the minister check it up?

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly.

Mr. WHITE: At a centre such as Camp Borden which is known as an advanced training centre, would the minister say that there is a rifle for every man training there?

Mr. RALSTON: I would not.

Mr. WHITE: Could he say what proportion of rifles there is for the men?

Mr. RALSTON: Not at the moment, and if I could I do not think that is information which I should give. But I can assure my hon. friend that there are plenty of rifles for the training of the men at that centre.

Mr. WHITE: Could the minister give an estimate of the number of men at the training centre?

Mr. RALSTON: As I remember, there are three branches training there, armoured cars, tanks and, I think, an infantry training centre, and a reconnaissance wing as well. I cannot give an estimate of the number of men.

Mr. WHITE: Then the minister is quite satisfied that there are sufficient rifles at the Camp Borden training centre?

Mr. RALSTON: For the training of the men there, yes.

Mr. WHITE: Has the minister received any complaint of insufficient rifle ranges at Camp Borden for both machine guns and rifles?

Mr. RALSTON: No, I have not.

Mr. WHITE: Then would the minister make some statement in regard to an average soldier in a rifle or machine gun battalion? After he has taken his basic training of two months and then proceeds to Camp Borden or some other defence training centre, takes the prescribed course there and in due time goes on draft to England, is that soldier a fully trained soldier?

Mr. RALSTON: He is regarded as a trained soldier sufficiently to go as a reinforcement to England or in a unit.

Mr. WHITE. What further training does he take in England of the same nature, rifle, machine gun, mortar, anti-tank gun, et cetera?

Mr. RALSTON: I am sorry I cannot go into the details of the training syllabus in England. It depends on what operational role the particular unit is filling. As the committee knows, most of the units there are filling operational roles. The training depends on the syllabus which is issued at the reinforcement units. If the man is not sent to a unit, he is given individual training and sectional training as well. The training with the unit depends, generally speaking, on the syllabus which is laid down by the divisional commander. When I was over there, No. 1 unit was brushing up, had been in the line for, I think, six or eight weeks and had come out and was taking some individual training again; others were taking section training, they were going on with platoon training. The training depends on the divisional commander and the length of time they have been away from active training.

Mr. WHITE: What training would a soldier have with machine gun and tommy gun, and how many rounds would he actually fire?

Mr. RALSTON: I could not say.

Mr. WHITE: I have been told that the average soldier at Camp Borden does not fire more than fifteen rounds with a machine gun. Is there any truth in that report? If so, does the minister think that firing fifteen rounds with a machine gun is complete training?

Mr. RALSTON: I shall find out. I would be surprised if that is correct.

Mr. WHITE: Then as to the use of the anti-tank gun at Camp Borden, could the minister tell me whether privates, N.C.O.s and junior officers actually fire the anti-tank gun at Camp Borden, or is that reserved only for very senior officers?

Mr. RALSTON: I cannot tell. I shall be glad to have the chief of general staff here to give my hon. friend the information. My hon. friend understands that those are details of training which the minister does not have at his finger-tips.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): But he ought to have his technical officer here to tell us.

Mr. WHITE: Could the minister put on Hansard something of the training syllabus at Camp Borden and the approximate number of hours' training the men have on those various weapons?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes.

Mr. WHITE: Could the minister tell us something as to the training with trench mortars at Camp Borden?

Mr. RALSTON: There again I cannot give the details. It will be shown in the training syllabus. My hon. friend knows that two-inch mortars have not been available until recently; three-inch have been available, training has been done with them.

Mr. LOCKHART: Could the minister make a statement as to the changes in fatigue duties that have been made? It is apparent that there has been a considerable change in their routine duties; does that in any way affect the fatigue work?

Mr. RALSTON: We are endeavouring to make the establishment large enough so that fatigues may be avoided or reduced and the time spent practically entirely in connection with training. I must say that there are some objections as well as some advantages in that, because I have always felt that one part of a soldier's training was doing a certain amount of what are called fatigue duties, which are routine duties which would have to be performed if a soldier were on active service, just as they have to be performed in camp. But it has been felt that the training syllabus is so full that it is desirable to spend every possible moment on training. As my hon. friend probably knows, the training time is run off hour after hour, and there is barely enough time for soldiers to get the full training laid down in the syllabus at the basic and advanced training centres, without taking time for fatigue duties.

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): I am not a military expert at all, and I do not know anything about it. I do know, however, that old soldiers scorn the idea that these men in the training camps should not do fatigue duty. They say it is just as much part of their training as the marching up and down the streets of which we see so much these days. I think there is something sound in that. They have to do this fatigue duty if they are on active service; so why should they not do their fair share of it in the training centres? That is the theory which has been sold to me. I do not want to give it as mine at all, but I suggest that there is a great deal of sound common sense behind it.

Mr. RALSTON: As I intimated, I had somewhat the same idea myself, but in connection with the training centres those who are in charge of training, and in whom I have confidence, believe all the time possible should be devoted to the work of the syllabus. Of course that does not mean that when the soldier gets back to his unit he does not go on fatigue duty, as all other soldiers do. It only means that the time at the training centre is fully occupied with the syllabus that has been laid down.

Mr. LOCKHART: Notwithstanding what has been said by the leader of the opposition, do I gather, then, that the fatigue duty to be done by soldiers is being reduced from time to time, compared with what it was seven or eight months or a year ago?

Mr. RALSTON: That is correct.

Mr. LOCKHART: And does it apply only to men in the lower categories in the units? How far does it extend?

Mr. RALSTON: I am speaking particularly of the basic and advanced training centres.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): First I want to thank the minister for the information he gave the committee and myself, since I was particularly interested, with regard to the Weyburn barracks. I am glad to learn that the fault did not lie primarily with the government, but that the offer made by the manager was not endorsed by the headquarters of his company in Chicago. But I want to point out to the committee that this does not entirely dispose of the case; it means simply that the responsibility has been shifted. Here is a very excellent building, one of the best for use as a barracks anywhere in Saskatchewan, or probably anywhere in western Canada. It is standing idle at a time when we are putting up new buildings in other parts of the country. Under a lease we were paying, I believe, $560 a month in rent, and I agree that there would be no sense in the world in paying that amount of money if we were not using the building. Apparently the company were not prepared to abide by the offer made by their manager, that as long as the building was not being used no rent should be paid, but that the equipment put into the building by the government should remain there pending the time when it might be necessary to use that barracks again, when the rent would commence once more.

As the minister has pointed out, the company were not prepared to abide by that suggestion; but I should like to know why we have a National Resources Mobilization Act. In June, 1940, legislation was introduced in this house with a great fanfare. The government were going to start to do things; they were going to start taking over things, if they needed them. Here is an excellent three-story building, owned by a United States firm which has not used it for a great many years and is not likely to use it for a good many years more. It seems to me that the government would have been well within its rights in saying to that firm, "At some future date we may require this building. As a matter of fact, if we ever have to mobilize the second battalion of the South Saskatchewan regiment we shall require it, because it is the only place between Regina and the international boundary where in any emergency we can quickly assemble and equip five hundred or a thousand men. As long as that building is there, and since you do not require it, we propose to leave in it the equipment already there, and we will pay you rent only when we use the building." Under the National Resources Mobilization Act the government has power to do this. To me it seems a pity that we should spend $1,800 or $2,000 in taking out plumbing fixtures and equipment, since undoubtedly the day will come when we shall have to use that building again, when all that equipment will have to be put back. Therefore, while I am glad to have the statement by the minister that the firm did not support the suggestion made by their manager, certainly I think the government would have been well advised and quite within its rights in insisting that the offer should have been endorsed by the company.

I wanted to ask the minister one or two questions, the first arising out of what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver South with reference to the men on active service carrying on duties which do not ordinarily require them to carry rifles. I refer to orderlies, truck drivers, chauffeurs, clerks and so on. What is the minimum training that is given to all men in active service, in rifle and machine gun work? In other words, I take it for granted that the same procedure is followed as in the air force, where, no matter to what branch a man is sent, he is given a certain minimum training in the use of small arms. I think it would clarify the situation if the minister would tell us what is the minimum training that a man on active service must have in small arms, irrespective of what he is doing. The minister also speaks of there being rifles for all these men, and I take it for granted that this means Lee-Enfield rifles. One of the minister's secretaries was kind enough to send me some information with reference to the other rifles being used, mainly American, such as Edison, Winchester and various other makes which we generally class as Springfield. They are manufactured by different firms, but they come under the Springfield classification in that they are of ·300 calibre. I imagine those will be used principally by reserve units, by these guerilla bands which are being set up in the west or by the veterans' guard. I wonder whether, when the minister says there are rifles for all these men, he means Lee-Enfield rifles of ·303 calibre.

Would the minister explain to the committee what disposition is made of these men when they come out of the training centres? There have been some two hundred thousand or more men go through these training camps. Are they attached to active service units for further training? Are they brigaded into the division, or just what disposition is made of them after they finish at the training centres?

I should be glad also if the minister would be kind enough to outline the new plans that have been hinted at with reference to the reserve army. I understand that some of the reserve units are now being brigaded; that there is to be an increase in the period of training and an intensification of the training of these reserve units. Would the minister outline the plans of his department in regard to the reserve army?

Mr. RALSTON: With regard to the International Harvester company lease, my hon. friend makes a specious argument, and I am sure he realizes it is a fallacious one.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not realize it.

Mr. RALSTON: What he means is that we should use the National Resources Mobilization Act for the purpose of confiscation.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I rise to a point of order. The minister is crusty to-day; apparently is quite touchy. I am not going to allow him to say that I made a specious argument knowing it to be fallacious. He cannot impute motives to me.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not say—

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That is exactly what the minister said, whether he was conscious of it or not. The argument may be fallacious, but I certainly did not make it knowing it to be fallacious. The minister will not help either himself or the conduct of this committee by being sarcastic about me or any other member.

Mr. RALSTON: I did not say that my hon. friend intended it to be fallacious. I said that it was a specious argument, but it was fallacious. I said that it was suggesting confiscation. My hon. friend knows that under the National Resources Mobilization Act we have the right to take any property we desire, but the principle of law in this country is that unless you expressly provide that it shall be taken without compensation, compensation is allowed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I suggested compensation when the building was in use.

Mr. RALSTON: I beg my hon. friend's pardon; I thought he was suggesting that rent be paid for the time it was used. But there was a further point; there was a breach of contract. The requirement was that if you cancelled the lease you had to restore the premises to the condition in which they were at the time they were taken over. That had to be done in order to comply with the contract. They could have done the same thing and charged the cost to the government. It was done simply as a matter of legal obligation, that is all. I do not think the National Resources Mobilization Act comes into the picture at all.

With regard to the question my hon. friend asked relating to training in the use of rifles and machine guns, I am sorry I cannot give him the exact number of hours. I can only say now that the training is exactly the same as the training laid down in the British manuals. Under the British plan elementary training is given and tests have to be passed by the soldier. I promised one hon. member that I would bring down the syllabus so that hon. members will be able to see just how much training is done with rifles and machine guns.

With regard to the third question, with respect to rifles held by the active service force, I would say that they are not all Lee-Enfield rifles, but they are all ·303 rifles. Some are Ross rifles. The fourth question had to do with the disposition of men when they come out of training. They go to units if there are units forming, or they go as reinforcements. At the present time we have trained soldier companies which are really graduate companies in which men are kept at the training centres until the time comes for them to go either overseas or to their units. The answer generally is that they go on duty just as soon as duty is available for them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I asked the minister if he would outline the plan with reference to the reserve army.

Mr. RALSTON: The reserve army is part of the defence scheme of Canada; it forms a second line in that respect. Provision has been made for the forming of a reserve brigade group in each district. The greatest expedition in connection with the formation of these groups has been on the two coasts, but they are also being formed in the other districts. The idea is that an additional amount of equipment will be issued to the units in these reserve brigade groups. They consist not only of infantry, but also of artillery, medical corps, ordnance corps and all the auxiliary services which should go to make up a brigade group.

I had the interesting experience of attending meetings with the officers commanding the reserve brigade groups in three districts—No. 11 at Vancouver, No. 6 at Halifax and No. 7 at Saint John. We have explained to them as fully as possible what we can do, having regard to the allocation of equipment which is necessary in the times in which we live and in the emergency which exists. Equipment from Canadian factories does not by any means all go to Canadian troops; it goes to practically every field and every active front that there is. We have explained to them the situation. We have given them higher priorities than have been given to some of the other units. We have listened to what they had to say with regard to improvements and suggestions which they offered as to the expedition of the formations and the training and organization of these brigade groups. I think we pretty well covered the ambit of any questions which might arise in the minds of the commanding officers.

These reserve brigade groups will train as reserve units at their own armouries or local headquarters. They will go to camp for fifteen days during the summer. I think it was the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) who asked about the training of the reserve army. We expect not to dwell so much on individual training but to endeavour to see that the men who come there are dealt with along lines of training which will interest them and which will in as little time as possible give them the rudiments of soldiering and some of the basic principles which are needed in connection with organization and serving in units.

As hon. members know, full-time staffs are being formed and are being given to these brigade groups. The commanding officers and the administrative and training staffs have already been allotted to reserve units. We are seeing to it that in cases where it is required, having regard to local conditions or to the disposition of the particular unit, the staffs are commensurate with the necessities of the case. That is, we have adopted the principle that they are not to be sealed-pattern establishments so far as the administrative and training staffs are concerned. The district officers commanding are given considerable leeway in making recommendations so that these staffs may be able to take care of things as they arise and as they exist, having regard to the conditions.

These units are authorized to recruit up to war establishment. Generally speaking, the administrative and training staffs are authorized on the basis of an adjutant, a training officer, a regimental quartermaster sergeant, an orderly room sergeant and two training instructors. This applies where the strength is less than 300. One additional instructor will be provided for each additional 200 men. When the batteries are being decentralized, as I have indicated already, additional instructors will be authorized up to a total of one per company or one per battery.

Before the adjournment I dealt with those who would be eligible for enlistment in the reserve units. I stated that these would be men between the ages of seventeen and nineteen; men between the ages of nineteen and thirty-five who were in medical categories lower than B—

Mr. GREEN: Are those ages inclusive—that is the seventeen to nineteen?

Mr. RALSTON: Exclusive of nineteen.

Mr. GREEN: Seventeen and eighteen?

Mr. RALSTON: Seventeen and eighteen. Also men who have been granted or who are entitled to a postponement of compulsory military training under the National Resources Mobilization Act, and men over thirty-five and up to fifty; the officer personnel of the training cadres in all categories may be married men between the ages of thirty and thirty-five. This point was brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver South before the recess. We regarded this development as being sufficiently important to appoint Major General Browne, who had been adjutant general, as director general of the reserve army. General Browne is now engaged in visiting the different districts and meeting the officers of the reserve units and the brigade commanders. He is endeavouring to give them an outline of the plan and to let them know what is desired of them.

There is a most gratifying interest and enthusiasm among these men from thirty-five to fifty years of age, men who have certain family and business obligations but who are anxious to do something in order that they may be ready to serve if the time should come. The interest which is being shown by them is certainly gratifying. I feel that the reserve army gives an opportunity to men to do two things: (1) to qualify themselves for work in a shop or at a lathe or do something on the civilian side of war work, and (2) at the same time to prepare for the other task, to don a uniform if the time comes. It seems to me that that opportunity ought to be accepted and is being accepted by a large number of men who up to this time had not taken very much interest in army matters. If my hon. friend or any other member has any questions to ask about the reserve army development, I shall be glad to hear them.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I do not want to labour this question of the barracks; but it certainly comes very poorly from the minister, after saying that my argument is fallacious, to proceed to make the most specious argument imaginable, that a legal contract stands in the way of their use to-day when this country is at war. I am not suggesting confiscation. I was suggesting that so long as the building was standing there empty, the government had the power to say to these people: "We want this contract altered. Otherwise we shall use the National Resources Mobilization Act because as long as that building is empty we do not propose to pay rent. When we do use the building we will pay rent." That is not a fallacious argument at all, nor am I advocating confiscation. I certainly do not agree with the minister that a legal contract stands in the way at a time like this when Canada is in peril, and I do not think the people of the country whose man-power we are conscripting will take kindly the specious argument that a legal contract stands in the way of these barracks being used.

As to the minister's statement on the reserve army, as I understand the new plan, it is to step up the training of the reserve units. With that I am in hearty agreement. There is a real job to be done by these units. They have to put in fifteen days in camp, the equivalent of fifteen days in week-end manoeuvres, and the equivalent of another fifteen days made up of several hours put in during the evenings of each week. But I would draw to the minister's attention the fact that there are rural units, and the one in which I am particularly interested is scattered over an area of 200 miles or more, with 4 different companies, each with a company headquarters, 75 or 100 miles away from battalion headquarters. Obviously it is impossible for the men to meet for training in the evening. In the few places where there is a fairly large centre you can get a platoon together once in a while, but many of the boys live on the farm, a long way from company headquarters, let alone battalion headquarters. They cannot meet in the evening, and it is very difficult for them to meet over the week-end. There are no barracks, and there is no place for them to meet for week-end manoeuvres. This means that all the training they will get is the fifteen days in camp. Fifteen days is valueless in training a unit. It will only give them time to develop some sore muscles and a few aches when they return home. Has the minister in mind lengthening the camp period for reserve units in the rural communities which are scattered over a considerable area? I think they should have a minimum of thirty days in camp. They cannot meet in the evening and cannot hold week-end manoeuvres, except in the case of the larger units in the urban centres.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend ought not to assume that they cannot have week-end manœuvres because they are scattered. The training period at a week-end can cover a whole day, and you can put in longer hours in that way—if you are talking about hours. We have also provided, as I have indicated, for more instructors for dispersed units. There has not been—I am speaking subject to correction—consideration given to extending the camp period, the reason being that there are a number of units to be accommodated; you have only so much time in the summer, and you have to arrange a schedule of training to allow them all to come to camp. But I shall make a note of my hon. friend's suggestion. I think, however, the situation is covered by extra instructors and a concentrated period of training. Instead of training for simply one or two evenings a week, they can train for a whole day or a week-end at a time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I agree with the minister, and that is why I raised the matter of the barracks. Last year an excellent thing was done. The camps were so crowded in the summer that it was not possible for all the units to train; so a number of non-commissioned officers were sent down, and they used these barracks in the winter time to train four or five hundred men at a time. This meant that the men were able to get in a month's training in their own barracks. It was the only way to get them together under the supervision of the training officers, and with proper standards of training. The brigadier visited them, and there was an inspection of what went on. That would be better than to send men to camp for only fifteen days. It might be possible to give these men fifteen days in camp, in addition. Certainly something ought to be done for these dispersed units because they need the opportunity to come together and build up an esprit de corps. As it is, they hardly see each other. I draw the matter to the minister's attention as one worthy of consideration.

Mr. GRAYDON: There are one or two matters upon which I feel compelled to speak this afternoon, and I do so with reluctance for two reasons. One is that I can scarcely pose as an expert in the matters now under discussion, and the second is that any man with a keen sense of responsibility towards our war effort must be extremely careful in any statements he makes about the armed forces. With those considerations in mind I bring two points to the minister's attention.

On March 18 the Prime Minister made his statement with regard to the establishment of unity of command in three areas of defence in Canada—one on the Pacific coast, one on the Atlantic coast and one in Newfoundland. The choice of commander for each of these unified areas in the final analysis rested with the senior officer in that area in charge of one or other branch of our armed forces. I can make no comment which would be of any use to the committee with respect to the eligibility or usefulness of any of these three men, but I would bring to the attention of the committee reflections which one hears of public opinion from time to time, and that is, the public are anxious to know whether the appointments to positions of supreme importance in our national defence and in our national waging of this war are to be made strictly from the point of view of seniority of service or whether other factors which the public, rightly or wrongly, believes to be of importance are to be taken into account.

I point out to the minister the danger, of which he is already aware, of paying much attention to armchair critics of our war effort. I should not like to think that the minister would pay much attention to them. But one is compelled as a member of parliament at least to bring to the attention of the government what one hears among the public from time to time, so that if there is a germ of constructive suggestion in their ideas they may be adopted, not only with a view to increasing the efficiency of our armed forces but to improve the morale of the people for whom these forces are fighting.

While I hesitate to suggest that the element of seniority should be entirely disregarded with regard to appointments, may I urge upon the minister that in appointments particularly to positions of major importance, some measure of significance be attached to knowledge of the newest and latest types of warfare. I believe that the minister, the forces and the people of Canada all realize that it is not enough even to have men well trained with respect to methods of war as practised in 1939. Since that time, methods of waging war and the character of the war itself have changed so much that it taxes the best brains of the war offices in every one of the united nations to keep up to date as regards the instruments and style of warfare to be used.

What I am saying, as the minister will understand, is a reflection of opinions which have been expressed not only to myself, but, I am sure, to most hon. members. Most of us, including myself, are anxious that nothing we say shall be a reflection upon those who are commanding our armed forces in this country or elsewhere. But in Great Britain they have not hesitated to criticize, in the interests of the nation. Men of major standing in public life have done so; they have called for an end of what they term the Colonel Blimp mentality in their national war effort. I have not come to this chamber for the purpose of charging that we in Canada have any such mentality, but I want the minister to understand that in the interests of the forces and of the public a careful scrutiny should be made and a thorough survey instituted, by himself, or by someone else competent to do so, so that the public shall be satisfied that our forces are controlled and led by men who are up to date with regard to modern warfare; in other words, that the Canadian forces are led by the best brains and the most efficient men whom Canada can produce, regardless of whether they are of senior or junior standing. I am supported in this argument by what has been said by General McNaughton himself. If anything in the past few months has encouraged and strengthened the morale of the general public, it is that General McNaughton in his press relations has made mention of this very fact which I am trying, though inadequately, to put before this committee. He has said that younger men, men who have had experience in modern warfare, will be given responsible positions regardless of age or other circumstances which, though in peace time they may mean a great deal, in war time mean very little.

I have brought these matters to the minister's attention reluctantly and with much hesitation. I believe, however, he is entitled to know that there is a section of public opinion which would like some assurance from him that everything possible has been done to see to it that the men appointed to take command of our Canadian units have the aggressive mentality necessary to wage the sort of total warfare which is being employed against us by our enemies.

A word with regard to the training itself. I do not want the minister to answer this question if it would disclose something which should not be revealed, but it seems to me that the manual and the course used for the training of our armed forces, particularly our officers, though it may have been useful twenty years ago or even three or four years ago, may not be of as much effect to-day having regard to the kaleidoscopic changes which have taken place. I suggest that every possible effort be made to modernize our training to the very last minute. I want to see the Canadian army second to none in the world so far as up-to-date, efficient, offensive methods are concerned. The Canadian people have a right to expect that; as a member of parliament I hope that is what they have, and I am not suggesting otherwise. But I would emphasize as strongly as I can that the minister set aside everything in our training which may be obsolete, and apply to the training of our armed forces the methods of to-day.

I believe he will understand the spirit which moves me to make these suggestions, and on behalf of the Canadian people I urge that he give all possible consideration to them.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend speaks, if I may say so to him, as a man after my own heart. There is not anything that he has said with which I find the slightest fault. I have said in this house and I say to this committee that I do not regard seniority as being a governing factor in connection with appointments to commands.

He has mentioned the three combined commands, those of the Atlantic, the Pacific, and Newfoundland. It happened there that the senior officers were regarded as well qualified. They were appointed on that ground and, having taken counsel not only with those who are immediately around me, but with others as well, I shall be tremendously disappointed if that confidence is not justified. I am not going to deal with individuals, because that would be invidious. But Major-General Page, in Newfoundland, went to England and was there for some time; he went to Iceland, and afterwards, as hon. members know, took command of the fourth division. Major-General Alexander is a soldier of very long experience and a splendid record, which I will not relate here. I had an opportunity of seeing him at the Pacific coast, discussing matters with him and being around with him a great deal in connection with Pacific coast matters, and from what I learned and saw of how the three services are cooperating, while one will never be fully satisfied, I had every reason to believe that the appointment made and the decision come to by the war committee of the cabinet was eminently satisfactory. On the Atlantic coast, Major-General Elkins happened to be the senior man there. He had a splendid record in the last war. He filled several important posts in Canada and we were very glad to be able to avail ourselves of his services when the Atlantic command was established on the east coast, and found evidence of excellent cooperation between him and his colleagues of the other two services. It must be remembered that both these officers have officers in their command who have been overseas in this war, and know the conditions and the needs there both in training and operation.

Further than that, in connection with training—and this is what I want to emphasize—with all these units in Canada beginning with the second division, because the first division had to be trained by men who had not been overseas in this war, we have followed the policy of asking for men to be returned from England as brigadiers to command divisions. General McNaughton went with the first division and Major-General Odlum with the second division, and some of his brigadiers, two out of three, I think, were men who had been overseas. Major-General Price commanded the third division. He was brought back from overseas. He was not selected on the ground of seniority. He was not the senior by any means, but was given command of the third division on the recommendation of his senior officer who knew him and who believed that he would fit the job. Major-General Page was recommended for the fourth division in exactly the same way. He was not senior, but a brigadier in charge of holding units at that time. He had been in Iceland and in England and had been in charge of holding units there, and he was sent here on the recommendation of General McNaughton. Major-General Sansom who commands the fifth division was not senior but was brought back on the recommendation of his senior officer, who believed that he was best fitted for the job. Lieutenant-General Crerar had been in England three times in this war. He was first the senior officer at Canadian military headquarters in England and had done a splendid job for about a year in connection with the setting up of Canadian headquarters and, as well, in connection with the organization of the whole Canadian effort there. Lieutenant-General Crerar is a professional soldier, a staff officer of wide attainments and a man who has not simply administrative ability. He has a fine training on the general staff side as well. He was selected to command the second division and he is now commanding the Canadian corps. In every case without exception recommendations have come from overseas for the men who have been placed at the head of our formations, and that course is being followed in connection with the sixth, seventh and eighth divisions. The commanders of these will be announced in due course.

In connection with brigadiers, I have not at the moment a list before me, and I have not been able to recall them all, but I think at least two out of three in every case were men who had had service overseas and had come back with training and operational experience gained there. In addition to that, the brigadier in charge of training to-day is Brigadier Weeks, who was overseas for two years, and with him is Lieutenant-Colonel Sparling, who was overseas for a year and was brought back. The quartermaster-general is Major-General MacKenzie who was brought here from overseas.

The armoured corps, which is being trained at the present time, is being trained under the direction of officers from the other side. We had to get British officers in the first place in order that the suggestion made by my hon. friend would be carried out, namely, that the men would get the benefit of the latest experience in connection with operations and the latest methods of training. There are now over 1,000 personnel brought back within the last two months to carry on training in connection with the extended army programme.

Mr. GRAYDON: Officers and men?

Mr. RALSTON: Officers and non-commissioned officers. My hon. friend refers to the training of officers. We have put in charge of the training of officers at Brockville the Sergeant-at-Arms of this house, Colonel Gregg, V.C., who has returned after a splendid career overseas. He is now coming to take charge of the officers' training centre at Brockville. Colonel Scott of the Calgary Highlanders has come back to take charge of the senior officers' course. This indicates that we are trying to meet the specification which my hon. friend lays down, namely, to secure people who know what the latest types of training and operations are, and it means also that we are meeting the specifications which must be satisfactory to General McNaughton, or he would not agree to the junior war staff course coming back here. The officers' training course has been eminently satisfactory. These men who have come here have proved satisfactory, and the cadets will get the benefit of the experience and training of Colonel Gregg, V.C., who comes from the O.C.T.U., as they call it over there, of which he has been in charge in England.

That is the general set-up, and we are trying to carry out that policy. There are changes in training from time to time. In addition to what I have said, as the committee knows, the commanding officer, or the second in command, and one or two non-commissioned officers from each unit are being sent over for two or three months in England, so that they will come back to their units with the knowledge and experience they have gained there.

Mr. STIRLING: Units of the active army?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes. We are trying to keep that integration between the activities in England and the experiences gained there, and the training activities and operational activities here. I am really gratified that we have been able to make such exchanges as we have effected. I consider that our friends in England did us a good turn when they found it possible to accede to our request to send 1,000 or more officers and N.C.O's here to assist in connection with training this summer. Most members of the house know some of the men who have come back, who have been associated with that contingent. That is the general scheme.

While I do not profess to know the intimate details, how many hours are spent in connection with rifles or machine guns, and so on, I do know and feel that the training has been put in competent hands. It has been given to men who, if anyone should know, certainly do know what will be most successful and effective.

I close by expressing again what I said at the opening. My hon. friend has not said anything to which I take the slightest exception. I appreciate his moderation, and I know the point he mentioned is in the minds of people generally. The question of seniority cannot be allowed to override or to be the governing factor in connection with the command or training of men, which may involve the very existence of the country.

This war is too big to have its success or the progress of training interfered with by any one individual, and there must of course be changes from time to time. Changes have been made and probably will continue to be made, but when they are made it is not necessarily a reflection on individuals, but simply because we feel that adjustments and improvements can be made and that it is our duty to make them.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I wish to ask two questions which seem to me to be important. Do members of the reserve army at summer camp get pay and allowances?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, pay and subsistence allowances when they are necessary.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: I should like the minister to answer these questions so that the information will appear on Hansard and in the newspapers, because occasionally a private member gets into a hot-box over this. I know I do. It was announced at the beginning of the war by all three ministers that no political interference was allowed in recommendations for commissions. I know that is true, but I want the fact to get wide publicity so that people will not ask me any questions about it. Is that correct?

Mr. RALSTON: I can say to my hon. friend that there is no exception whatever to that.

Mr. COLDWELL: In view of the fact that the discussion has largely revolved around equipment and training, may I ask when we may expect the report of the commission which has been inquiring into the Hong Kong affair? It seems to me that since that will deal naturally with training and equipment, it would be helpful to this committee to have that report so that we might study it and see what deficiencies there were and perhaps base thereon some discussion as to improvements for the future.

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid—I hope the committee will believe me—that I know as little about that as anyone in this committee. When I came back from the west I did not have a chance to inquire, but when I came back from the east on Monday I made inquiry about it and from what I learned I anticipate it will not be very long before the report is received. I am afraid that is as definite as I can be, because it is entirely in the hands of the commissioner.

Mr. GREEN: What steps have been taken to build up new arms of the service, for example, paratroops? It was announced last fall that plans were in contemplation for setting up a corps of paratroops in Canada, but we have heard nothing about it since. It would seem that they would be very useful, either in case of an attack on Canada or for offensive purposes beyond Canada. Could the minister tell us whether or not such troops are to be raised and trained?

Another type is mountain artillery. Certainly on the Pacific coast it is generally considered that they would be very handy, perhaps a good deal more useful than field artillery. I have no doubt the matter has been considered by the authorities, but could the minister tell us something about it?

It would also be interesting to the committee if the minister were to tell us something about the newly-formed coast rangers. I do not know whether they have been formed on the Atlantic as well as on the Pacific coast, but I think it is a splendid idea. I hope they will be given every encouragement. I should like to see units raised in all parts of British Columbia. I understand they are being raised on the coast first, but I urge upon the minister that such units be formed also in the interior of the province. Then a question comes up in connection with their armament. At the present time they are supposed to use their own rifles, but as soon as army rifles are available provision should be made for issuing them to these men. They should also have at least some machine guns. They will be greatly handicapped if they have only their own rifles. The department should be very careful also to see that there is the closest coordination between the staff and these rangers. There is some danger of the men being used only as trail finders or scouts who can send back information to headquarters. The department will have to go further than that and see that in the plans for defending the coast the work of these rangers is coordinated with the work of the reserve army and of the active army. It may have been done already, but I suggest that the minister give consideration to that need.

It would help a great deal if the minister could tell the committee something at this time about these new types of units.

Mr. RALSTON: On the matter of mountain artillery I cannot say anything except that it has been considered. I do not want to make any statement with regard to it at the present time.

With respect to paratroops, I sometimes think there is a bit of mystery thrown around the words paratroops, commandos and guerillas. the term "guerilla" was used in connection with the Pacific coast rangers—

Mr. GREEN: That is an improper description.

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, I think so. From what I understand, the basic training which has to be done in connection with all three of these types of service is very much the same. I was talking to the press the other day and I endeavoured to give what I understood to be the situation regarding the nature of that training. Those troops have to rely very largely on almost individual initiative and resourcefulness. Paratroops are dropped; you cannot expect them to form up in sections immediately; they come down at different times, on staggered occasions, and the result is each man has to fend for himself. The same is true of commandos and so-called guerilla warfare. All I can say this afternoon is that we are establishing in the west—I am not going to give the location—a battle training school for the purpose of teaching officers and non-commissioned officers the technique of battle training. Battle training, while it sounds rather imposing, means nothing more or less than a hardening and toughening process of body and cultivation of the alertness, initiative, resourcefulness and bodily ability that may serve a man in a tight corner. All these kinds of troops are needed. That school I rather anticipate will be in command of, or at least advised by, Colonel Scott of the Calgary Highlanders, whom I mentioned a moment ago, who was in charge of battle training overseas. Officers trained in that school will go back to the units and give that special training to prepare men for paratroop operations when they are necessary. It does not complete the final phase, that is, the men actually jumping from a machine. That, they tell me, is comparatively the easiest part of the training—perhaps I may be treading on the toes of men who have been trained and acted as paratroops and consider it something different from that. The formation of an actual paratroop unit is not being gone ahead with at the present moment, but rather the training of men so that they can be used as paratroops when the time comes, with additional training to be done with aircraft, except the preliminary jumps which are done from towers.

With regard to the Pacific coast militia rangers, those bodies are being formed under the provisions of the King's Regulations and Orders (Canada), and the Militia Act; they provide an organization separate from the present reserve army, and provide for the formation of a unit here and there, not necessarily tied up with a reserve army unit. This formation is especially adapted to isolated communities; as the hon. member knows, particularly along the west coast of Vancouver island there are many of those communities. That organization is going ahead under some men who I think are extremely well qualified. I have met Colonel Taylor—

Mr. GREEN: He is very good.

Mr. RALSTON: He is one of the men concerned. I think he has had to do with logging and lumbering companies there and knows the type of country that may have to be fought over. He is doing an exceedingly good job; at the time I was there something like forty different units had been formed.

With regard to rifles, at the present time we are asking these men to furnish their own arms because we have none too many rifles in this country considering all the obligations we have undertaken. But I fully concur in what the hon. member suggests, and just as soon as rifles become available we shall endeavour to see that these particular units are not neglected.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there any restriction on the type of arms they may bring?

Mr. RALSTON: I do not think so, unless it has been made by the district officer commanding. I would anticipate that they would be mostly rifles. Probably within a short time there will be some augmentation of the arms they have. My hon. friend mentioned also the issue to them of machine guns. This again depends on equipment. The hon. gentleman may know that in addition to Bren guns we have some Lewis guns, particularly on the west coast; and I would hope that in due course some of those might be made available as well.

With regard to coordination, again I think my hon. friend knows that Colonel Taylor and the three other officers who are associated with him in connection with that organization are all on the staff of district headquarters. So that there is the closest coordination and integration. In fact these units are regarded as under district headquarters, they are being administered under the Militia Act, and the men have all the immunities of members of the reserve army. I am very enthusiastic about the Pacific coast militia rangers, I must say. I should add at the same time that the suggestion was made that similar formations should be set up on the Atlantic coast. We felt that it was undesirable to do this where we had the territory covered by reserve units. On the Atlantic coast we are endeavouring to see to it that platoons and perhaps even sections may be formed as part of the reserve unit covering a particular locality. That has been thoroughly discussed and explored with the officers commanding district headquarters both in Halifax and Saint John, and we believe it can be done. So that on this side the reserve units will not be of the militia type but rather of the army type, the difference being that one is part of a reserve battalion and the other is an individual unit, simply a member of a corps.

Mr. GREEN: Is it the intention to establish ranger units throughout the whole province of British Columbia?

Mr. RALSTON: I think it is. Colonel Taylor I believe has authority in that respect, to establish them throughout the whole of the island. But we do not want them to overlap the reserve units, in the areas covered by such reserve units. Where there is a reserve unit in an area; where a platoon or section of that unit can be formed which can keep in touch with battalion headquarters without too much trouble, we would prefer it to be a member of the reserve army.

Mr. GREEN: The minister said "throughout the island." Did he mean throughout the province?

Mr. RALSTON: Along the coastline, and of course the mainland as well.

Mr. GREEN: And the interior of the province as well?

Mr. RALSTON: I was not thinking so much of the interior.

Mr. STIRLING: The protected area?

Mr. RALSTON: Yes, more the protected area.

Mr. GREEN: I meant the whole province.

Mr. RALSTON: No, that was not intended. I am thinking of the Rocky Mountain Rangers, and other units to the east of the mountains, which would cover the reserve army territory.

Mr. GREEN: I only meant where there is no reserve unit in the interior.

Mr. RALSTON: I think that would be permissible.

Mr. REID: I should like to offer one suggestion in regard to the training of men on the Pacific coast. I refer to the lack of facilities for teaching men to shoot. There is only one rifle range close to Vancouver in the Fraser valley; that is what is called Blair range, in North Vancouver. Just a few days before I left my attention was drawn to the fact that five military trucks left Vancouver and proceeded to Chilliwack, which is represented by the hon. member for Fraser Valley, where they picked up fifty or sixty men whom they took to Blair range. Then the trucks left Blair range, headed back a hundred miles to Chilliwack, and then returned to Vancouver. This meant a round trip of from 380 to 400 miles in order to give this number of men a few hours of practice at the rifle range. There are considerable numbers of troops in Vancouver; there are troops in New Westminster, and other troops are being located throughout the Fraser valley. I think the minister should look into the matter of providing more rifle range accommodation, instead of endeavouring to transport all the men in training from the head of the Fraser valley and New Westminster through Vancouver and across the inlet to Blair range. I believe another rifle range should be established just as quickly as possible.

Mr. RALSTON: Certainly I shall look into the question.

Mr. CRUICKSHANK: That is just what I was going to speak about, so that there appears to be marvellous team work in British Columbia. There is something else that I think should be stated in regard to these guerilla units, so that it may be clear in the British Columbia press. The officer commanding has been referred to as Major Taylor, but I understand that recently he has been promoted, so that now he is Colonel Taylor. I should like it made very clear that he is Major Tommy Taylor of the old 29th, because that would promote confidence in British Columbia. Otherwise the people there might think they were being protected by Major Austin Taylor, which would be something very different.

Mr. HAZEN: A moment ago the minister was asked a question with regard to the appointment of officers. Would he give us some further information as to how commissions are granted in the army? It was announced some time ago that every candidate for a commission had to go through the ranks; that then, if his commanding officer found that he possessed the necessary qualifications, he would be given the status of an officer cadet and would have the right to take training at an officers' training school.

The statement was made that all candidates had to pass through the ranks. At the time I did not know what that meant. I thought probably it meant that a man would have to enlist in the army; that he would have to spend some time there; that after a while he would become qualified as an N.C.O.; that after receiving some training as an

N.C.O., and after gaining some experience, he would be recommended by his commanding officer for a course that would permit him to obtain a commission. On the other hand to pass through the ranks might mean, and perhaps did mean in this case, that all a man had to do was enlist and then within a day or two obtain a recommendation from his commanding officer which would permit him to go to an officers' training school and take a course.

I know of men who enlisted early in the war and, by reason of their qualifications, became N.C.O.'s. I know that since these men enlisted they have had a good deal of experience in handling men; that they have taken courses; that they have shown certain qualities of leadership, and some of these men would like to be recommended for commissions. Matters of this kind have been brought to my attention. But these men are not recommended by their officers commanding, probably because their officers regard them as valuable men and want to keep them in their units in the positions which they now occupy.

These men see their friends and companions, with whom they were familiar in everyday life, go into the reserve army, spend perhaps a week or two there, and then the first thing they know their friends are at Brockville taking a course, or coming away from Brockville with commissions, while they themselves continue as N.C.O.'s.

I should like to know how a man who has been in the reserve army for only a short time and who has had very little training can be recommended for a commission in this way, while other men who joined the army early in the war, who have had a great deal of experience as N.C.O.'s. are held back and denied the opportunity to obtain commissions.

There is one other thing I should like to ask the minister, and it is in connection with the reserve army. Would he tell us how these officers are appointed? Do they have to take an officers' training course after entering the army as privates, or can they be appointed in some other way?

Mr. RALSTON: In reference to the method of appointing officers, and particularly granting them commissions, so far as I know and believe the system which was announced has been followed. There are certain technical services such as the ordnance, merical and services of the kind in which officers do not need to serve in the ranks before appointment. I am sure my hon. friend is referring to the artillery, infantry and other such services. That method is being followed. Of course, my hon. friend knows that if an officer had a commission in the reserve army, his commanding officer could recommend him to go to Brockville.

I am particularly interested in what my hon. friend said about a young man who had served a long time as a non-commissioned officer, who could not get a recommendation for the course at Brockville but who saw others who had served less time recommended for that course. I know my hon. friend does not mean it, but he has cast a grave reflection upon the commanding officer. I took my hon. friend's words down, and his theory was that this man was not recommended because the commanding officer regarded him as being valuable and wanted to keep him in his present position. I say that a commanding officer who takes that position with regard to his men is not fit to be a commanding officer. If that young man was qualified to be recommended, he should have been. If my hon. friend has any case in mind in which he thinks the commanding officers have treated young men who were qualified in that way, he has only to bring it to my attention and I will see that the matter is promptly dealt with.

My hon. friend spoke of a young man who had been recommended after only a few days' training, but I do not think that that can be the case. These men are not recommended after a few days' training. They take their training and they are recommended in due course. My hon. friend realizes that if a man is in a unit it is necessary that he have the recommendation of his commanding officer. That may be barred to some, but I hope it is not. If a commanding officer is not playing fair, if he does not realize his responsibilities, the sooner it is brought to my attention the better it will be for the service and for the young men themselves.

Mr. HAZEN: How are officers appointed in the reserve army?

Mr. RALSTON: I am afraid I have not the qualifications before me, but certain qualifications are required. The commanding officer of the reserve unit makes a recommendation. I cannot give my hon. friend the particulars at the moment, but I shall be glad to give them to the committee at the next sitting.

Mr. HAZEN: Do they have to start in as lieutenants or can they start in as major or with some other rank?

Mr. RALSTON: I should be very much surprised if they could. I know I had to start as a lieutenant, but I do not know whether everyone has to or not.

Mr. HAZEN: A few days ago the papers announced that Hon. J. B. McNair, premier of New Brunswick, had joined the reserve army as a captain and was going to camp as a captain. I wondered how it was that a man could step into that rank.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend will have to ask the commanding officer of the Saint John district. I have no doubt that he will be able to answer in a minute. I do not think he is a man who would favour an individual because he happens to be in public life.

Mr. ISNOR: I would not like to see this resolution go through without bringing to the attention of the Minister of National Defence and the members of this committee, particularly those from the Pacific coast, the fact that there is another section of Canada vitally interested in our war activities. I have in mind the Atlantic coast, more particularly the coast of Nova Scotia. Paragraph (d) of the resolution reads:

> The carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the governor in council in consequence of the existence of a state of war.

Some time ago the city of Halifax, which is part of the province of Nova Scotia, made representations to the Canadian National Railways for the improvement of the underpass on the main road to Debert and other sections to the north and northwest. They did this largely because of the need for bringing in reinforcements should there be an attack on the Atlantic coast centering around Halifax. I remember quite well the explosion which occurred in the harbour of Halifax in 1917 when something like 1,700 lives were lost. It was caused by a collision of two boats at a point where only one should have been. You all recall what that meant to the port of Halifax and the people of Halifax. A similar occurrence could very well take place at the present time. We all hope it will not happen, but it is quite possible. I remember at that time the roads were blocked and it was impossible to bring into the city the doctors, nurses and others who were anxious to give assistance to those who were injured.

An officer commanding a unit in mlitary district No. 6 has stated that reinforcements could not be brought in sufficiently quickly to help to defend the port of Halifax, largely because the railway and the road could become blocked or be put out of business by sabotage. It is in this connection that I direct the attention of the Minister of National Defence to the necessity of placing at the disposal of either the Canadian National Railways or the Department of Munitions and Supply sufficient funds to remedy this dangerous hazard which now exists, the underpass entrance at Fairview.

The city of Halifax felt that the Canadian National Railway was the proper body to deal with this matter, but a great many persons in Halifax and Nova Scotia, including myself, feel that it is really a matter of defence. I think all members of this committee realize that Halifax is playing a large part in the transporting of goods, munitions and troops overseas. If anything were to happen to prevent the reshipment of goods abroad brought in by rail to the city of Halifax, it would be a calamity so far as the empire is concerned.

This underpass is on the main artery leading into the city. As I stated a moment ago, if we were so unfortunate as to have an attack I doubt very much whether troops could be brought in from Debert and other points quickly enough to give assistance to the defenders of Halifax. The estimate of the cost of doing this work is $137,500. Application was made to the Canadian National Railways, but the learned counsel who represented the railway company presented such a good argument that the commission decided it was not within their jurisdiction that they should spend this amount. They claimed that it was the duty of the provincial highway authorities to provide an artery sufficiently wide to carry troops to the city of Halifax. I urge the minister to take this matter into his serious consideration with a view to placing at the disposal of the proper authorities a sufficient sum to provide an artery wide enough for the transport of troops should the occasion arise when that will be necessary.

I should also like to express the thought which I believe is in the minds of a great many, if not all of those associated with the defence of the Atlantic area, concerning the commanding officers. On two occasions in this house the question was raised as to whether these men were qualified. I feel that I am expressing the thought of all in that area when I say that we are perfectly satisfied with those who have been placed in charge of the defence of the Atlantic coast. We are familiar with the background of those men, not only the officer commanding but those associated with him in the army, the navy, and the air force. We on the Atlantic coast are satisfied that these men are making a pretty good job of the work which has been assigned to them.

I should like to ask a question with regard to the reserve army officers. I do not know whether the officers of the reserve units are men who have volunteered for active service overseas or purely for home defence. The reserve army itself is set up for home defence, but I should like to know whether the officers of the reserve units at some time or another have volunteered for active service overseas.

In closing, may I urge the minister not to evade the question I have raised with respect to a sufficiently wide artery into Halifax—of course, I know the minister is not in the habit of evading questions or evading responsibility. What I mean is that I do not want him simply to say that the improvement of the main artery or road or underpass, or whatever he chooses to term it, is a question for some other body than the Department of National Defence. I feel that this work is so essential to the proper carrying on of our war activities that the minister should give it his very serious consideration.

Mr. RALSTON: My hon. friend in his very last words did give me an opportunity to say just exactly what he asked me not to say.

Mr. ISNOR: Then my language was unfortunate.

Mr. RALSTON: When he said that, I know that he recognized that I am not in a position to do more than that. I want to say to him with respect to the very representations that he has made time and time again—and no one in Halifax could ever accuse him of a lack of industry and persistence in connection with this particular matter—that I have taken it up, not from the point of view of the Department of National Defence undertaking the project itself, but in connection with the very hearing to which he refers, the hearing before the board of transport commissioners, when the suggestion was made that some grant be made out of the grade-crossing fund. I am interested in the matter both from the point of view of the movement of troops, as he is, and also from the point of view of the citizens of Halifax.

I can only say that I will talk with the officers again about it, and I will go further and talk with my colleagues in council about it and see if any way can be found which will make the situation better. I have done tactical schemes out of Fairview—I know the situation as well as my hon. friend, and I know it is not all that one would wish to see in connection with the operation of troops in the emergency of war. Therefore, instead of using the word "consideration," I will say that I will give the matter the closest study and draw it to the attention of my colleagues and discuss it actively with them.

Mr. ISNOR: Thank you very much.

[Mr. Isnor.]

Mr. HANSON (York-Sunbury): The minister has made a very satisfactory statement. I hesitate to intrude, but I happen to be very familiar with the situation at Halifax, and we all know that there is a bottle-neck. The only question is, whose responsibility is it to have it removed? I would assume that the railway had some responsibility, that the province of Nova Scotia also had some responsibility, and from the point of view of the evacuation of Halifax and the movement of troops into Halifax, the Department of National Defence also has some responsibility. Cannot these three bodies get together and have this situation cured? It certainly can be cured. It is merely a question of jurisdiction and dollars and cents, and the sooner that situation is cured, the better. It would bring a great deal of relief to the people of Halifax, where the situation would not be good in certain eventualities. I commend the minister for his undertaking to look into the matter further. It is just a question of getting around a table and discussing joint action, to have the thing done.

Mr. CHURCH: I should like to bring two or three matters to the minister's attention. He has been very obliging in supplying a lot of information that I wanted to get.

First, I would ask him in reference to the agreement which I understand is going to be signed in Toronto to-morrow about the use of the Canadian National exhibition grounds. The city of Toronto has spent about twenty-four million dollars on the grounds and buildings and permanent exhibits, and in view of that I think the minister should be good enough to make a survey and see whether the troops from the chief recruiting district in Canada, Toronto, cannot be housed in those grounds, as well as recruits from the neighbouring cities and towns. Toronto soldiers have been sent all over the country from Halifax to Vancouver. I wish to be helpful to the minister because I appreciate the great difficulties that anyone must have in operating a war department at this time. But I would say this, that in the last war recruiting was very greatly helped by having the home units stationed near their homes, where their families could see them, and their friends, many of whom they persuaded to join the colours. That policy was one of the greatest incentives to recruiting that we had in the last war. The minister was in the great war, and I appreciate what he did then in the matter of recruiting. The Toronto exhibition grounds comprise nearly four hundred acres. There is also the waterfront and the Ontario government's magnificent Elizabeth highway; the land on both sides of that highway is practically vacant. All this area could be used for military purposes, for the accommodation of all the regiments in southern Ontario. It is unnecessary to spend a large amount of money on another camp if proper use is made of those grounds. I hope the minister will consider the agreement with the city of Toronto and accommodate the troops of Toronto and southern Ontario in the Toronto area.

My second point is with reference to transportation. The minister a year ago brought down a return which showed that up to the end of 1940 the Canadian Pacific railway had received $2,750,000 and the Canadian National railway $2,500,000 out of the war, or pretty nearly as much as they made out of the whole four and a half years of the last war. What kind of treatment have the soldiers obtained from the railways? I travel on the trains. I have taken this matter up with the minister, and he did make some effort to get the railways to improve their soldier rolling stock.

While travelling on the railways, I see hockey, baseball, and other United States teams from across the border and touring amusement and theatrical companies pulling up in front of the stations in luxurious cars on Canada's American end of our railways on a railway paid for by the people of this country, and yet we cannot get proper rolling stock in Ontario to carry the troops. On one train I saw a car at the back with Royal Air Force boys, some having come from as far as London and from all over the Toronto district. What do they think when they see two or three luxurious coaches devoted to the use of some of the people who stay at home to whom I referred, while they themselves are packed in like a lot of sardines on an old used coach? Talk about Toronto's street railway and the overcrowding under private ownership! I have seen nothing to equal this. When troops who have to come from as far as Vancouver and Halifax receive such treatment, before another dollar is voted for betterments in this house to the railways I intend to ask for and have a showdown. The railways are making fabulous sums out of the war by the transportation of troops, munitions and food, and the people of Canada are not getting value for troop transportation. I admit that the minister sent me a reply he got last summer from the railways, promising improvements, but that was almost a year ago, and nothing much better has yet been done.
